'Garovel!'

"2571

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

'Look, it's barely a risk at all,' said Garovel. 'And who knows what juicy things we might be able to learn from those two and their reapers? And I'm referring to more than just this tree artifact, by the way. They could probably tell us all sorts of useful things about what their organizations are up to. Not to mention the war. We would just need to get them talking.'

Hector's expression relaxed a little, but he still couldn't say that he liked what he was hearing.

'And whatever this thing is--it'll probably make for a pretty good conversation piece, eh?'

Hector frowned. The others were getting quite close now. If he was going to do anything about it, he would have to make his decision now.

He turned away from the tree. ""Let's call it here for the day,"" he said loud enough for everyone to hear.

Carl and Ravi both looked at him, as did their reapers, but none of them were saying anything.

He wondered if it might not already be too late. Still worth a shot, though, he felt. He started walking back in the direction they'd come, aiming to join up with the rest of the group's stragglers.

'Hector, what are you doing?' said Garovel privately.

'If you want to pump them for information, then fine, but let's come up with a less risky way of going about it. And we should give Hanton a heads up, too. I'm sure he'd be willing to help us as long as it means acquiring information that'll help protect Atreya.'

'Hmph. Y'know, when I told you that I wanted you to act like a lord, I didn't mean that you should start bossing ME around.'

-+--++-

It was snowing yet again up in the Omarest Mountain Range, and their giant cabin was without power for the tenth day running. That old bastard claimed that this was another one of his ""family bonding exercises,"" but Francisco Elroy was beginning to think that the guy just didn't have enough fuel for the generator, anymore."

"2572

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

Maybe that was absurd, though. Damian Rofal still kept bringing them plenty of food, and made sure that everyone knew how to build a fire. It had a been a few years since Cisco had received instruction on that matter, and he thought it best to play along as if he didn't know anything.

The old man was a surprisingly patient teacher. Cisco watched him work with each and every one of the other Rofals, even Dunstan, who clearly did not wish to be here even more passionately than Cisco did.

But it was precisely because of the biting cold that Dunstan couldn't just ignore the rest of his family as he had tried to do in the early portion of their stay here. Everyone had to huddle together for warmth, especially at night.

Ridiculously enough, however, the old man's plan actually seemed to be working. As far as Cisco could tell, the Rofals were getting along a lot better than they were at the beginning. Where before they had been dismissive or insulting of one another, now they were talking more and even laughing.

Cisco and Dunstan were still the odd ones out, though.

Dunstan's hatred for his family was not going to go away anytime soon, Cisco felt. There was something very deep there.

Rezamaar, Dunstan's rather loudmouthed reaper, was more conciliatory in her disposition towards them, but seeing as they were all normal humans who couldn't see or interact with her, that didn't accomplish much. If anything, it just seemed to annoy Dunstan even more.

And since Cisco was Dunstan's "friend," he ended up being lumped in with him.

All in all, it was strange state of affairs, being trapped in this place with little more to do than observe a bunch of purported criminals who were mostly just trying to ignore him--probably because they were afraid of Dunstan now."

"2573

Ever since Dunstan manhandled Jonah and threatened to kill him--his own cousin--all of the other Rofals were clearly wary of him. When he entered a room, they typically left.

Apart, perhaps, from one: Grandma Rofal, Damian's wife. She didn't seem too bothered by Dunstan's presence at all.

And Cisco was left to wonder why that might be. She wasn't even hesitant around him. She just said whatever she felt like, even if it meant insulting someone, Dunstan included. And Cisco could tell that she managed to get under his skin a few times, too.

Maybe she just didn't think that Dunstan would hurt an old lady like her. If so, she was probably right. And if not, well. Maybe she just wasn't really thinking about the potential consequences of her actions. That would make a worrying amount of sense, too. As much of a lunatic as her husband was, she definitely wasn't totally sane, either.

But of course, if anyone laid a hand on her, Cisco could only imagine what Damian would do.

If it wasn't clear enough to him before, it was certainly clear to him now. Damian was no normal servant. That old man had real strength. More than Cisco had ever personally seen. The noticeable field density of the man's soul already made that point obvious, but the occasional sparring sessions that he held with everyone had really nailed that point home.

Damian had been training everyone in the usage of these rings that he'd gifted them. The red shadows that could be summoned out of them were incredibly malleable, and Cisco could see incremental improvement from everyone across the board. They could make the shadows move faster and create more sophisticated shapes. And Damian promised to take them to still further heights.

Perhaps that was another reason why the old man's ""bonding"" strategy seemed to be working. These Rofals clearly enjoyed what the shadows allowed them to do. And the prospect that they might become yet more powerful? Music to their ears, no doubt."

"2574

And if they grew sufficiently confident in their newfound abilities, then Cisco had no doubt that their attitudes toward Dunstan and him would also change--and not for the better.

In that sense, perhaps it was good that the Rofals had gotten to see what the two of them were really capable of. The enhanced strength, regenerating limbs, hand-to-hand martial abilities, and element transfiguration--they got to see it all.

Because Damian hadn't allowed them to hold back when he tested them.

The old man was a monster. Even when holding back, not using his ability, Damian could fight them both at once with only his bare hands. Cisco knew that age was deceptive when it came to servants, but even so, it was surprising all the same. When the vigor was running through him, the man could move like Cisco had never seen. Even working together and having enhanced strength of their own, Dunstan and Cisco could barely lay a finger on the old bastard.

That wasn't just the undead vigor accomplishing that. And sure, the difference in passive soul defense played a part, too, but that couldn't account for the gap being so massive.

No. He might've been crazier than a drugged-out chimpanzee, but Damian Rofal was a truly experienced warrior.

And odd as it was, Cisco had been learning a lot from him. Footwork, weight distribution, body stabilization, distance control, and especially grappling were all frequent subjects of instruction.

He'd learned a few unarmed killing techniques from his father when he was younger, but with this training, it felt like anything could be turned into a killing technique in combination with his fluorine transfiguration ability. One solid grapple, and the enemy would be completely at his mercy or dead.

In theory, anyway. Nothing he had learned so far had actually worked on Damian unless the man allowed it to for the purpose of demonstration.

And, of course, when Damian started using his ability, their training went straight to hell."

"2575

It was like trying to fight an invisible puppet. A puppet which could also transform into a wall. Or a blade. Or a storm. Or a hole in reality itself, perhaps.

Even after fighting the old man multiple times now, Cisco still couldn't tell what Damian's ability actually was. Nor could Dunstan.

Damian could make objects float through the air as if through telekinesis. He could freeze the boys in place, as if trapping them in invisible stone. He could sever limbs with only a look--or even crush them into nothingness.

That was the most alarming thing that they had seen, without a doubt. On one occasion, the man had seemingly atomized one of Dunstan's arms. Or vaporized it. Or teleported it to some unknown location. Just from looking, there was no telling what had actually happened.

Rezamaar and Dennex seemed to think it was an alteration ability that harnessed some kind of force that was as yet unknown to modern science.

And if that was true, then it wasn't very helpful information.

They tried simply asking Damian what it was directly, but he never gave them a straight answer. Usually, he just acted like he didn't hear them or changed the subject or just spouted some insane non sequitur.

Which was another subject unto itself.

Damian was definitely crazy. But sometimes, Cisco got the feeling that he was leaning into it, that he was pretending to be more insane than he actually was. Cisco had been noticing that there were some moments where he was extremely sharp. Not the mention the fact that this ridiculous family bonding exercise was actually somehow working.

Cisco began to wonder if there was more knowledge and wisdom concealed in even some of the crazier things that came out of his mouth. Some hidden messages. Or veiled truths, maybe.

And so, when the day came that the power in the cabin turned back on and Damian said that he had something very important to tell everyone, Cisco was paying close attention."

"2576

""You have all been making wonderful progress,"" said Damian. ""And as such, I think the time will soon come when we have our first, true family outing!""

A chorus of uncertain mumbles ran through the audience, and Cisco and Dunstan exchanged looks.

They didn't need words. They both understood the implications. Any chance at freedom was a chance to escape the old man's clutches. Ideas were already forming in Cisco's head about how they might be able to accomplish it, and he had no doubt Dunstan was the same.

Unfortunately, ideas of how impossible it might be were also forming. Dunstan hadn't tried to conceal his dislike for their current circumstances. Damian had to know that Dunstan would want to escape.

""And in celebration of this magnificent step forward--"" The old man raised his left hand somewhat, and the front door of the cabin swung open. ""--I've decided that it's time to give you all more presents!""

A line of various electronics came floating into the cabin, all bobbing up and down in air as if in tune with some silent music.

""I know how much you young folk hate being 'off the grid,' as they say,"" said Damian. ""So I figured that it was about time I let you reconnect with the world a little. But only a little! Okay?! Don't abuse this privilege, or Grandpa will have to punish you!"" And he smiled wide.

A flat screen television hovered right into Cisco's hands.

One of the younger Rofals, a teenage boy named Ricky, looked ecstatic as a tablet floated toward him. ""Wow, Grandpa! Thanks!""

""You're welcome, my boy!""

Ricky's apparent enthusiasm turned to curiosity. ""But do we even have an ISP way out here in the mountains?""

Damian blinked at him. ""Hmm? An ISP? Wazzat?""

And from there, it became quickly apparent that the old man didn't actually know much about modern electronics.

On the one hand, Cisco was surprised by his ignorance, but on the other, he wasn't at all."

"2577

Hmm. Maybe that could prove useful in making their escape, Cisco thought. There was a pretty good chance that Feromas, Damian's reaper, wouldn't know much about electronics, either. It seemed like most reapers weren't terribly knowledgeable about modern technologies.

""In any event,"" Damian continued, ""before I let you all play with your new toys, I should tell you that. Well. There've been some pretty big developments in the world. So try not to freak out too much if and when you turn on the news.""

""What are you talking about?"" said Dunstan.

Grandpa Rofal's eyes snapped to Dunstan, who was standing right next to him. His smile broadened, and he patted the young man on the head, which Dunstan batted away. ""Well, y'see, sonny, the second great Eloan war has begun.""

""What?!"" exclaimed Dunstan.

And he wasn't the only one.

The others had questions, too, and they did not hesitate to ask them.

Five nations. All coincidentally Abolish-influenced. Invading their neighbors simultaneously.

And the continent was in chaos.

Cisco didn't know what to think. While he'd been lounging around in these snowy mountains, the world out there was burning down?

A moment ago, he'd been hoping to find news of what had happened in Sair, to the Rainlords, to his family. But now, he wondered if that would even be possible. News this big must've been dominating every station.

If he had internet access, that wouldn't have been a problem, but that still seemed like it was off the table.

And indeed, after Damian finally let them disperse, Cisco plugged his new television into an outlet in the room that he and Dunstan had been sharing, and the only news he could find was of this war that Damian had just told them about. It didn't help that he only had five channels to go through."

"2578

But one thing, at least, was clear. Sair was directly involved in this war.

His homeland had been invaded.

Why, though? Because the country had been weakened by the Vanguard's attack on his kin?

That had to be it. This timing couldn't be a coincidence.

For a long time, he just sat there on edge of his bed. Thinking. Barely even listening to the television as the anchors and reporters began to repeat their vague explanations.

His parents were right.

He'd always been an obedient son. For the most part, at least. He never openly questioned their teachings. Even from a very young age, he'd understood the value of what they were trying to instill in him. Discipline. Vigilance. Preparedness.

If anything, it was his little brother Marcos who never quite seemed to understand. So Cisco had tried his best to help him. Not to coddle him. To show him how to be stronger. Even if it meant that the little brat thought he was a jerk.

But now, hearing about all this, Cisco realized that somewhere in the back of his mind, he had doubted his parents. Silently. He'd wanted to complain. To act like Marcos did. To be childish. Because he was a child, wasn't he? That was only fair, wasn't it?

Man.

He felt like he'd had some kind of grand epiphany, all of a sudden. Like he was waking up after having been asleep his whole life.

This was what it meant to be a Rainlord. This understanding.

It was in everything that he'd been taught. The history of his kin. Besieged. How many times had that land been invaded? How many tales had he heard of one war or another?

He could feel it in his bones. The pull of his ancestors.

It was his turn. As it had been theirs so many times before.

Cisco didn't have to wonder. That was what his father would tell him if he were here, right now. He knew it was."

"2579

'...Cisco, look at me,' came the private words from Dennex.

Cisco did so, moving his eyes but not his head. The reaper was floating right there next to the television.

A skeletal wolf wreathed in black flames, as always.

And yet... Cisco blinked. Did Dennex look different, somehow? A bit smaller, perhaps?

His eyes were probably just playing tricks on him.

'Are you okay?' the reaper asked him.

The answer to that was relative, he felt, but he decided to just say, 'I'm fine.'

'You have been staring at that television for over two hours now.'

Ah.

'And I have been calling out to you for the past five minutes straight.'

Ahhh.

Cisco leaned back on his bed and stretched his arms. 'I guess I was a bit lost in thought.'

'Listen. Anyone would be unsettled after learning what we have.' Dennex hovered over him and stared down into his eyes with his hollow ones. 'But shutting me out is not how you cope with it, my boy. I am not just your reaper, understand? I am your friend. And over the course of our time together, we may go through many more things like this. It is important that you lean on me. It is what I am here for.'

Cisco scratched the back of his own neck. 'What's there to talk about? Our family's in trouble, and we can't do anything about it. It's pretty straightforward, isn't it?'

'We can make ourselves ready for the time when we CAN do something about it.'

'I've been meditating every single day. And for more hours than I ever have before. Are you saying I need to do it even--?'

A shift in the Dantean news program on TV caught his attention. For the first time that Cisco had seen, the mustachioed anchor was brightening up--smiling, even. For the first time that Cisco had seen, the man wasn't talking about the war."

"2580

Dennex must've noticed the change in Cisco's demeanor, because he also turned to look at the television.

The infographic next to the anchor's head read thus:

Beast of Lorent slain by Atreyan Hero

The accompanying image was that of an award ceremony. The anchor explained that the President of Lorent had granted one of the country's highest honors to someone two days ago, in recognition of an act of heroism that surprisingly had nothing to do with the continental war.

And then they showed actual footage of this ceremony.

Apparently, this hero was the young black guy standing there with a big scarf around his neck. They must've mentioned his name, but Cisco didn't catch it.

He was too busy staring with widening eyes at the person behind him.

That was Matteo Delaguna right there.

Cisco had met him many times. And sparred with him, too. Only to get his ass kicked.

Not that he'd been the only one.

Matteo was a wrestling prodigy, already distinguished among the Rainlords. Cisco distinctly remembered him from an interhouse tournament between the Sebolts, Delagunas, Garzas, Strouds, Zabats, and well, him, the lone Elroy. It had been almost two years ago now, but it had left a lasting impression on him.

On his ego, in particular.

He remembered feeling like he was pretty hot shit before that tournament. Struggling in the first round and losing in the second had corrected that problem.

Well, okay, maybe it hadn't.

But he'd certainly gained considerable respect for the finalists--and most of all the winner, Matteo.

Cisco also remembered hearing all the other boys talk about him, about how it was only a matter of time before the rest of the world began to take notice of him, too. The sound of resigned admiration in their voices had made Cisco indignant, like he wanted to disagree with them for no reason.

No. Not for no reason. Because he was jealous. And childish, perhaps.

But seeing him on television now... it looked like they were right.

'Dennex...'

The reaper didn't require elaboration. 'What in the world is he doing there?'

'That's what I'd like to know.'

"2581 -- CCXXXVII.

Chapter Two Hundred Thirty-Seven: 'O, lost comrade...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

""Y'know, I've often heard that having an overly dark sense of humor can be a sign of dementia or brain damage, but personally, I think that's just a bunch of anti-psychopath propaganda, bought and paid for by Big Pharma and the normies who run it.""

As he listened to the wild-haired man on stage from an empty table in the back row of the outdoor theater, he began to wonder--and not for the first time--what he was doing here.

The rest of the crowd seemed to be enjoying themselves, though they also seemed pretty thoroughly sauced by this point.

""They're always trying to scaremonger and devalue our contributions to society, trying to convince people in various ways that we're the ones who are abnormal, not them. As if there was anything strange about us in the face of this ridiculous world we live in!""

As far as he could tell, the only other ones not drunkenly laughing or cheering were all sharing a table together a few meters away. And a couple were looking right at him.

He knew who they were. Members of the Freeman Fellowship.

He found himself paying more and more attention to them, lately. Their numbers seemed to have been growing, and if the expressions on their faces right now were an indicator, they were hoping to keep that trend going.

But of course, that wasn't really up to him, was it? He was just a servant, after all.

His reaper was right there next to him, being a silent enigma as always. Rezolo never laughed or cracked wise like most other reapers. It was rare to see him react with anything other than calm observance.

He doubted they would be able to convince Rezolo to join their faction, but who knows? Even after nearly five years with the reaper, he still didn't feel like he knew him very well at all."

"2581 -- CCXXXVII.

Chapter Two Hundred Thirty-Seven: 'O, lost comrade...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

""Y'know, I've often heard that having an overly dark sense of humor can be a sign of dementia or brain damage, but personally, I think that's just a bunch of anti-psychopath propaganda, bought and paid for by Big Pharma and the normies who run it.""

As he listened to the wild-haired man on stage from an empty table in the back row of the outdoor theater, he began to wonder--and not for the first time--what he was doing here.

The rest of the crowd seemed to be enjoying themselves, though they also seemed pretty thoroughly sauced by this point.

""They're always trying to scaremonger and devalue our contributions to society, trying to convince people in various ways that we're the ones who are abnormal, not them. As if there was anything strange about us in the face of this ridiculous world we live in!""

As far as he could tell, the only other ones not drunkenly laughing or cheering were all sharing a table together a few meters away. And a couple were looking right at him.

He knew who they were. Members of the Freeman Fellowship.

He found himself paying more and more attention to them, lately. Their numbers seemed to have been growing, and if the expressions on their faces right now were an indicator, they were hoping to keep that trend going.

But of course, that wasn't really up to him, was it? He was just a servant, after all.

His reaper was right there next to him, being a silent enigma as always. Rezolo never laughed or cracked wise like most other reapers. It was rare to see him react with anything other than calm observance.

He doubted they would be able to convince Rezolo to join their faction, but who knows? Even after nearly five years with the reaper, he still didn't feel like he knew him very well at all."

"2582

For his part, he wouldn't mind joining the Freeman Fellowship. They seemed a little crazy, sure, but this was Abolish. Everyone was crazy in one way or another. And they were at least not quite so violently crazy.

The Void knew that he'd seen more than enough violence in his life.

Growing up in the middle of the Vaelish Civil War had granted him far too much experience with that.

It was a bit strange to think about now, frankly. How different his life would be if he had been born in a different time or place.

He wouldn't have met those other children in the forest and banded together. He wouldn't have seen so much death and misery before achieving any kind of stability in his young life again, however fragile. He wouldn't have resorted to banditry.

And he probably wouldn't have met Dozer and the Monster of the East.

He wouldn't have joined Abolish on that same fateful day, either. He wouldn't have made a name for himself so quickly and become mildly infamous.

They wouldn't be calling him Loren Lighteyes.

On some days, he was able to take pride in that. On others, he wanted to rethink every decision he ever made.

It was a mixed bag. Most lives were probably like that, he figured. Maybe one day, if he continued to excel, he would be able to feel like more than just a disposable cog in the great machine that was Abolish.

The way that the Old Man had talked to them on that first day, he'd made it sound like they would be able to achieve greatness through following him. Like they all had conqueror's spirits within them, just waiting to burst out.

But it was five years later, and here he still was among the rabble, watching what passed for a "stage show" in Abolish encampments."
"2583

"I say, if anyone should be worrying about their state of mind, it's all the idiots who think they're somehow normal," said the stage performer. "Seriously, how deluded must you be if you don't feel at least a little bit cracked in the noggin by all the stuff goin' on these days?"

Loren currently had the displeasure of being in the same sect as that tempestuous gasbag up there on stage. Zahi Rambata had a certain way with words that involved never shutting up.

""Just last week, while doing reconnaissance, I met a guy with a wife and kids. But that wasn't the strange part. No, the strange part was that he didn't even realize anything was wrong with him!""

A low chorus of laughs ran through the crowd at that ""joke."" It was difficult for Loren to find it very amusing when he'd heard some variation of it a dozen times already.

""It was like seeing someone going through chemotherapy who didn't realize they had cancer!""

Loren still did not laugh, but the drunken crowd did. He had to wonder if it was because they actually found it funny or because they would laugh at just about anything, right now. Tough to say. Even some of the reapers were laughing, though, so maybe Zahi was onto something.

Loren decided to get up from his table and go for a walk. He'd already finished eating, and he didn't see much point in wasting the rest of his break on Zahi, of all people.

The encampment wasn't very large, and he soon reached the edge of it while Rezolo followed after him, silent as usual. The Gettira Plains stretched out before him, as green and vast as anything he'd ever seen.

The place didn't offer much in the way of natural cover, which was why there were constant patrols around the small encampment's perimeter."

"2584

They weren't expecting much in the way of resistance way out here, though. The war was on Eloa, right now, and this was Ardora, on the other side of the world.

The strangeness of the timing had not been lost on him. Anyone would've figured that the initiatives on Eloa should require all hands on deck, especially considering the Vanguard's supposed numerical advantage over Abolish, but apparently, the Old Man thought otherwise.

This had to be some kind of plan of his, Loren figured. While the Vanguard was distracted with the war, Dozer was sending out tendrils--like this sorry group--in order to... accomplish what, exactly?

Loren hadn't been able to piece that together yet. The encampment's leader--who also happened to be Zahi's much older brother, Kareem--had been keeping a tight lid on what their exact orders were.

They weren't conquering villages. They weren't fighting the Vanguard. They were just sending out scouting parties and marching--or driving, in the case of the lucky few sects who'd been able to requisition vehicles for themselves.

In any case, it was a shitty detail to be stuck on, Loren felt. Right now, all the glory and fame were back on Eloa. He hoped to get back that there as soon as possible.

But at least the view was nice. With the sun reaching low for the horizon, the Plains came alive with more colors than he'd ever seen on Eloa.

And the clouds. They twirled like snakes. Bumpy, gargantuan snakes. All across the sky, wreathed in all types of reds and oranges, yellows and green, blues and purples--as well as a few that were perhaps impossible to describe as anything other than ultraviolet.

Maybe there really was something special about this place.

He sure bloody hoped so, at least.

Movement in the distance acquired his attention before any of the patrols around him. His eyes narrowed as his vision sharpened."
"2585

But it was more than just that. Loren's eyesight was his most prized possession--and not coincidentally. He had been working on it from the beginning, ever since he discovered he was a mutation user.

And ever since Gohvis had helped him get a handle on his power.

He hadn't known back then how fortunate he was to have found an instructor so soon after his ability manifested itself. Since that time, he had heard and read many tales of the sad fate that had befallen many mutants throughout history.

He might've been nicer to Gohvis, had he known what a privilege and an honor it truly was to be taught by such a master and pioneer.

It was still a work-in-progress, of course, as all mutations were, but Loren could see farther, clearer, and in lower light than anyone else in this encampment. Or in the majority of Abolish, for that matter.

Now if only he could do something about these seven stubby little horns that crowned his head. He would've liked to not have to wear such bulky hats all time in order to conceal them. They made even other servants stare.

He'd heard from other mutants that it might simply be impossible to remove them, since it was supposedly impossible to ""undo"" any mutation, but Loren was highly skeptical of that claim. Gohvis didn't have horns on his head. Sure, he barely looked human anymore, but that was beside the point.

He wished he'd thought to ask Gohvis about it directly when he had the chance. Unfortunately, during his time under the Monster's tutelage, Loren had actually thought the horns were cool. It was only after returning to the world at large that his mind began to change on that matter."

"2586

In any event, Loren understood how lucky he was, as a mutant, to have as normal of an appearance as he did. Few others of their kind had been able to maintain such visually subtle mutations. Perhaps that would change for him in the future, but for now at least, he was more or less content.

These eyes of his were enough.

They saw, before anyone else, how the horizon was shifting. How those distant shapes were appearing. Seemingly from nothing, as mirages might.

But these were no mirages.

They were figures. On horseback. And they were not small in number, either.

Right away, he became both wary and confused.

That group was certainly large enough to be considered an army, but not one from this century. Or even the last one, perhaps. Horseback? If it was the Vanguard coming to attack, they would not be riding horses.

The patrols were beginning to take notice now, too. They could probably see the abnormal movement, at least.

Loren strained for more, trying to further sharpen his vision. He wanted to see these figures in greater detail. Who the hell were they? If it was just a bunch of local villagers, aiming to make a sort of show out of their collective strength, then they were going to be in for a rude awakening. The men in this encampment were already restless as is, and even on good days, they were not known for their mercy or restraint.

Whoever these poor bastards riding this way were, they were going to be massacred if they didn't turn around soon. Loren could already imagine--

What?

What the fuck?

The detail of the riders' faces came into focus, but Loren couldn't believe what he was seeing.

Those weren't normal people at all.

They were rotting corpses. He could see flesh peeling off their bones, dried blood all over their pale and torn skin, barely any hair on their bald heads. Some even looked like they were more skeleton than flesh.

And that armor. Not all of them were wearing it, but it didn't belong in this century, either.

An army of undead. But not like any Loren had ever seen."
"2587

Was it a mirage? As much he wanted to trust his eyes, they could still play tricks on him. Such a large force of decaying servants couldn't be real, could it? Clad like that? And on horseback, no less?

For a short time, Loren could only continue watching, blinking, and trying to process what he was seeing. But when the riders persisted, refusing to disappear as he hoped they might, he knew he had to speak up. He had to warn the rest of the camp.

""Unknown servants approaching!"" he yelled in Valgan, drawing urgent looks from the patrols around him. ""Inform Kareem! Send word! Unknown servants approaching from the west!""

More calls came out in response, echoing his warning, and without even moving, he could feel the camp coming to life with the sudden anticipation of battle. There was no telling if these ghoulish warriors in the distance actually intended to attack them, but they certainly didn't look friendly. Better to be prepared. Hopefully, none of the idiots around here would make him regret this decision.

'I cannot sense them yet,' said Rezolo privately. 'What do they look like?'

And Loren did his best to explain, expecting not to be believed.

Instead, however, the reaper was simply quiet for a time. Then he asked, 'What does their heraldry look like?'

'Their what?'

'Their war banners. Describe them to me.'

Still a bit confused, Loren looked toward the riders, searching for banners. It didn't take long to find them. There were plenty. 'They're just black.'

'Pure black? You're sure?'

'Yes. Is there supposed to be something on them?'

The reaper fell silent again, ignoring him.

'Rezolo, do you know who they are?'

'Those are not servants,' the reaper said. 'At least, not the kind you are familiar with. Those beings are not of this world. Not anymore.'

"What are you talking about?!"

"2588

'It would be too difficult to explain,' said Rezolo. 'Just prepare yourself. Either they will leave us alone, or this will be one of the worst fights you ever experience.'

Loren gave a wide-eyed frown as he kept scanning the horizon. The half-rotted soldiers were close enough now for the other servants on patrol to begin noticing the abnormalities about them. The confusion in the air spiked to an almost palpable degree, and then--

The riders vanished.

Like smoke. They disappeared into swirling plumes of black. Loren wanted to ask Rezolo for answers again, but he didn't get the chance before the riders reappeared.

Right next to him.

And in front of him. And already passing him by. They were mid-stride, running through the encampment--through tables and chairs and tents and walls. Even through people.

One passed right through Loren, too, and as it did, he felt a biting shiver across his entire body. And the smell. Rotten flesh mixed with ash. He might've vomited if he hadn't already smelled the like several times before in his life.

He didn't understand in the slightest. Were they incorporeal like reapers? They could phase through objects undeterred, but that feeling just now hadn't been the same as when a reaper passed through his body. Not at all.

Panicked shouts arose throughout the camp, and he could see his fellow servants lashing out at the riders, trying to attack them and failing. Nothing was landing. Like throwing rocks at smoke.

And there were so many of them. They just kept rushing past. Hundreds. Maybe thousands, even.

Until, just as quickly as they had arrived, they were gone.

Loren, along with everyone else, was left looking around, dumbstruck.

What the hell had just happened?

It was all the more confounding, because he couldn't see any obvious damage that had been done to the camp, either. The riders had surged through it like a crashing wave, the countless hooves creating almost that exact sound.

And yet, as Loren inspected his surroundings, nothing seemed disturbed. Everything was just the same as before the riders arrived."
"2589

Loren asked Rezolo the very same question that he could hear being uttered aimlessly by the other men around him. 'Where did they go?'

'No telling. Perhaps they achieved their objective.'

'Which was?'

'Let's search the camp.' And Rezolo didn't wait for him.

Loren followed. To his eyes, the reaper was an oversized gecko with glowing white eyes. The long toes and swollen tips of the reaper's large feet hung rigidly below him as he floated impossibly through the air. It almost looked like the reapers were all standing on some kind of invisible ball as they moved.

The rest of the camp was still intact, it seemed. The confusion among everyone was apparent, but he didn't see any injuries.

He spotted a commotion in the distance, however, and Rezolo was already heading toward it. As they got closer, the reaper wisely slowed in order to let Loren take point.

Loren pushed his way through a gathered crowd to see what they were all staring at.

The smell hit him first. Charred flesh. All too familiar. Not enough to make him recoil or wretch, but it was still far from pleasant.

And when he saw the body, it took him a moment to even recognize it as such. Blackened ashes were all that remained. If not for the small and the vaguely human shape left behind in the smote grass, Loren might not have been able to tell what he was looking at.

The low mutterings among the onlookers increased as someone else began to push through the opposite side of the circle.

It was Kareem, Loren realized. A tall man of dark complexion and chiseled features, Kareem was one of the few people in this camp who actually bothered to dress well for his job. His stiff black coat with its golden collar and buttons looked like it would have fit in at a much ritzier event than this.

""Who was it?"" said Kareem, loud enough for all to hear. ""Who was killed?""

"2590

'It was our aberration,' said Rezolo. 'It's impossible to identify the body from these remains, but I can sense that the aberration's abnormal soul is no longer among us.'

Disquieted murmurs passed through the crowd.

Loren had only met the aberration briefly and couldn't even recall the man's name, but he was aware of how highly sought after they were by many different sects. Their potential for growth was well-known, as was their insanity--which was saying a lot, if they were being judged by Abolish's standards.

Kareem scowled, and he looked around. ""Clean this up. Don't dispose of the remains. Seal them in an airtight container and bring it to my quarters."" His gaze settled on Loren. ""Lighteyes. You and your reaper are with me. Come."" He turned and started walking briskly away.

Loren had to hop over the ashen body and push through the reconvening crowd in order to catch up.

Kareem's reaper was attached to his shoulder, perhaps worried that the riders would show back up again. Morix was particularly strange in that way. Most reapers weren't known for their bravery, but Morix had a reputation for his cowardice. It caused no end of loose talk among the lower ranked Abolishers, theorizing how someone like that could have ascended to such a position of influence.

No one would dare say that while Kareem was within earshot, though. And it was typically Morix's fellow reapers who were talking like that, not their servants. The corporeals were generally more concerned with Kareem himself, and he was more than capable of commanding respect on his own.

""I want you to go around the camp and track the path that these apparitions took,"" said Kareem. His Valgan was strong and clear, much like his voice. ""Find the person who saw them first and go from there.""

""That person was actually me, sir,"" said Loren."
"2591

Kareem stopped and turned. ""Ah. I might've guessed. Perfect, then. You already know where to start. Confirm their trajectory through the camp and talk to everyone who saw them, especially the last person before they disappeared.""

""Do you know what those things were, sir?"" said Loren.

""The Mendocava,"" said Kareem. ""They aren't exactly the reason we're here, but they're close enough. Gather as much data as you can, Lighteyes. Take notes on everything. I don't care how irrelevant it seems. Put it in your report and bring it to me by morning.""

""Will do, sir.""

And they split up. Loren had to hunt down a notepad. A digital one would've been nice, but those things tended to break easily on long missions like this.

In the meantime, he tried consulting Rezolo again. 'So can you explain now? What the hell are these Mendocava?'

'That is just one of many names. Void Riders. The Undying Host. The Hunters of Ardora. They are ancient beings, often thought to have left this world for good or to have simply never existed to begin with. In some cultures, they are regarded as a force of nature.'

'But what are they? You said they weren't of this world ""anymore,"' didn't you?'

'Yes. It's said that the Void claimed them from their reapers. And rather than turning to madness with broken psyches, they came under the Void's direct control. Which is, supposedly, why they have the appearance that they do. They no longer have reapers to regenerate their bodies, and the Void, perhaps, sees no reason to fill that role for them.'

'Why would they have killed our aberration but no one else?'

'I don't know,' said Rezolo.

Loren kept pushing, but the reaper kept claiming ignorance. He wasn't sure he was buying that, frankly. Rezolo had a tendency to keep things to himself.

He soon discovered that this new task that Kareem had given him would probably take all night. It seemed like almost everyone in the camp had seen these damned riders. Figuring out who had seen them last would not be easy. And worse, he wasn't sure it would be worth the trouble."

"2592

What did Kareem hope to learn by discerning the riders' ""trajectory?"" Did he think they were headed somewhere else and wanted to follow? As far as Loren or anyone else could tell, they'd simply vanished into thin air. How were you supposed to follow that?

Hmm. On second thought, maybe that was exactly what Kareem intended to do. If they weren't going to pack up camp and leave, then they were going to stay, which probably meant that they would continue to deploy scouting parties.

Well, in any event, he had his orders. It wasn't his place to question them.

And it wasn't Zahi's, either, but that didn't stop the big-haired man from waltzing up to him and doing so.

""Who expected that, huh?! Not me, that's for sure!"" He had a habit of speaking Mohssian quite often, and he was one of the most fluent in their camp. Some found that obnoxious, but it wasn't a problem for Loren, since he was quite fluent himself. ""Hey, do you think they'll come back?""

""I have no idea,"" said Loren absently. He was more focused on surveying the soldiers around him, looking for ones he hadn't yet talked to.

""But if you did, you'd tell me, right? You wouldn't leave a brother hanging, would you?""

Loren ignored that question and kept walking.

""You're pretty cold, Lighteyes. Anyone ever tell you that? Cold as an ice cube on a winter's evening.""

""You're not exactly warm, either, Zahi.""

""I know of plenty of people who would say otherwise, friend.""

""Plenty of people who you've deceived, you mean.""

""Hey, I'm just being true to myself. I can't help it if people get the wrong impression. I'm a friendly guy who likes to have friendly conversations with other friendly people. Where's the harm in that, I ask you?""

""I think the harm comes when you stab them in the back.""
"2593

""Why would you say something so utterly untrue and hurtful?"" said Zahi. ""I know I put on a brave face, but I do have feelings, you know.""

""Feelings like anger and jealousy, maybe.""

""What, those don't count?""

Zahi kept pestering him, apparently having acquired enough of an interest in what he was doing for some reason. Loren mostly just tried to ignore him.

He consulted the other reapers around the camp, wanting to see if any of them could tell him anything more than what Rezolo had been able to, but he found no such luck. Despite there being more than fifty servants in this group, there were only about fifteen reapers.

No doubt, most of them were at some base somewhere, playing it extra safe and operating as communicators. Or simply doing something else. Loren was a little surprised to see how many reapers and servants rarely traveled together. While there were certainly benefits to splitting up--such as the servant being able to more easily go undercover as a normal human--Loren still felt that he would never be comfortable if he didn't stay with Rezolo all the time.

Their relationship was obviously a little odd, though. Especially in Abolish.

While Loren didn't feel like Rezolo was his ""friend,"" exactly, it would be a lie to say that he only cared about the reaper in terms of preserving his own life. True, he would've preferred it if Rezolo wasn't so quiet and mysterious, but after all this time together, Loren was beginning to feel like maybe words were a little overrated.

They'd had numerous close calls in the past, times when either Rezolo or him would have died or been captured if the other hadn't done or said something. Shielding the reaper with his body. Killing an enemy just before they could strike. Or a simple warning at just the right moment.

These things added up.

They had their own kind of understanding."
"2594

At length, Loren began to have trouble finding witnesses whom he had not already talked to. He was nearing the end of his mission, it seemed. He could probably stop here, because he already had a pretty good sense of the trajectory that Kareem was looking for. Northeasterly was most likely the way to go.

Before he was fully satisfied with his results, however, the members of the Freeman Fellowship approached him. They looked like they had something they wanted to say to him, but he decided to ask them what they had seen first. Nothing new, as expected. He tried to turn and move on, but the shorter one called out to him.

""Lighteyes, sir, one minute, please."" It was a young guy. Very young, in fact. Scarcely more than a boy, if his voice and physical appearance were to be trusted.

But of course, they weren't, really. For all Loren knew, the two older-looking ones were actually subordinate to the boy. Not likely, sure, but certainly still possible.

He waited.

The boy's gaze fell to Zahi, however, as if reluctant to say anything in his presence.

Not one to be deterred by things like awkward tension, Zahi just blurted out whatever he wanted, as usual. ""Oh, are you hoping to poach him from our sect? Because I don't think we'd appreciate that very much. We're a tightly knit bunch, you see. Like brothers. We share everything with each other. Clothes. Secrets. Beds. Toothbrushes. Even women.""

Loren couldn't let that go by. ""He's joking. Badly.""

""See that? We banter just like brothers, too. Everyone in our sect is the same. Loren is perfectly happy in the Rambata Rangers.""

""That's not our name,"" Loren had to say. ""We're the 331st Ranging Regiment."" And while he spoke the truth, he also knew that their official name wasn't all that much better. There were most certainly not 331 ranging regiments in Abolish. It was just a stupid naming scheme to make their numbers seem larger than they actually were."

"2595

Honestly, it probably caused more confusion to Abolish's own members than to any enemy spies that might have infiltrated their ranks, but there was no use complaining about it at this point. Especially when so many of his bosses had reputations for their total madness.

The shorter Freeman seemed hesitant. ""But is it true that you are happy with your current position?"" Wow, maybe he really was the boss of their little trio.

""Ooh, so I was right, then?!"" said Zahi. ""You really are trying to poach him?!""

""Membership within our Fellowship is flexible,"" said the same one.

""We would not necessarily be 'poaching' him, as you suggest.""

""Hmm, that ain't how I've heard it,"" said Zahi. ""I hear you guys're pretty fanatical about your rules 'n such.""

""Well, we're all fanatical in one way or another, aren't we?""

""Hah! True! Hey, then maybe I could join, too, eh?!""

""If you pass the entrance test, then sure.""

""Say what? Wait, does Lighteyes have to take a test, too?""

""No, he has received a formal invite from our leader.""

""Tch. Now that is some unfair bullshit right there...""

The little Freeman tilted both his head and his brow at Zahi with seeming sympathy. ""You are not genuinely disappointed, are you?""

""Hmph. That so hard to believe?""

""Well, yes. I'm sure the Fellowship's reputation precedes us. Do you truly think that you would be happy within it?""

""Maybe. I'm a complex guy. Full of nuance 'n stuff.""

The little Freeman chortled. ""Well, then take the test.""

""Maybe I will!""

Loren had had just about enough of listening to this shit. ""Our feelings don't matter. The real decision is up to our reapers, anyway.""

The little Freeman nodded. ""There is certainly truth in that, yes. But if you feel very strongly on the matter, I think you'll find that our group can be quite persuasive."" His beady eyes went to Rezolo. ""Though, of course, we would be interested in hearing your opinion as well.""

"2596

Rezolo, however, merely remained quiet, which Loren did not find surprising.

The little Freeman seemed to take that as a bad sign. ""A-ah, well, like I said, the matter is open to discussion if it interests you. Lighteyes has been invited by our leader, so we would be happy to work with you toward an acceptable compromise in becoming a member. You would not have to leave your current sect if you do not wish to.""

""Who is this leader of yours, anyway?"" said Zahi.

""That would be Germal, the Gentleman of Palei.""

Loren blinked. That guy was the leader of the Freeman Fellowship? Loren had met him a few times while studying under Gohvis; and while he was aware that Germal was rather famous in his own right, it was still difficult to bridge the mental gap in his mind between that one-horned weirdo and the increasingly talked about Freeman Fellowship.

Really, it had only been a few months since he first started hearing about the Fellowship, whereas it had been years since he'd last seen Germal. And at the rate they were growing, Germal had probably just made a list of servants he barely even knew and gave it to subordinates for this apparent recruitment drive of theirs.

Yeah. He decided that he shouldn't read too much into this whole ""invite"" thing being a big deal.

Perhaps Rezolo was thinking something similarly, because he chose that moment to finally speak up and say, 'What has Loren done to earn the honor of an invitation from your leader?'

""Hey, before that, tell us your name already, short stuff,"" said Zahi.

""Oh, my apologies. My name is Wallace Chandler. And the two behind me--""

""Can I call you Wally?""

""I... I suppose.""

""Cool. But yeah, anyway, Wally, how come Lighteyes here gets an invite, and I don't, hmm?""

"2597

""Well, to get the full picture of that, you would have to ask Germal,"" said Wally, ""but my understanding is that Lighteyes has been invited because of his reputation as a principled warrior who does not use excessive force to complete his missions.""

""You mean because he's not a bloodthirsty psycho,"" said Zahi. ""But hey, I'm not bloodthirsty, either.""

""Ah--y-yes, well, as I mentioned, the invitations are delivered at our leader's sole discretion..."

""Oh, but if it were up to you, then you'd give me an invite, right?"

""Er, well, I barely know you, so..."

He stuck his hand out. ""Zahi Rambata. Great to meet you. They call me the Bard of the Modern Era.""

""No, they don't,"" said Loren.

""Don't listen to him; he's just jealous. I'm a real man out of time, you see. Tell me, have you ever felt like you were born in the wrong period of history? Because that's me in a nutshell, my friend. Very relatable, right? Oh, and I can play twenty instruments, you know. And I'll talk your ear off if you'll let me, aha! And I'm also very much what you would call a joiner! It's why I'm with Abolish, in fact! Someone just offered me a membership, so I said okay! I didn't even have a reaper yet! Boy, was I in for a surprise later!"

""Th-that's all very nice, Mr. Rambata, but--""

""I'm all about maintaining morale, see. I think that's very important. You need cheering up, I'm your guy. You need a wingman when you go pick up chicks, I'm your guy. You need someone to carry something heavy up a hill for you, well, that's why I keep this killjoy around. But for anything else, I'm probably your guy. Just give me a chance, and you'll see how multi-talented I am."" Loren almost pitied the little Freeman. He'd seen Zahi get like this before. The man wouldn't stop talking until his listeners either ran away or caved to his implied demands.

"2598

In both cases, Loren's role in this conversation was pretty much over, so he decided to speak privately with Rezolo instead. 'What are you thinking?' he asked.

'Do you wish to join this Fellowship?' said the reaper, echoing.

'It has me curious, at least.'

'Fine. Then you have my permission, on the condition that you use it as leverage to get us transferred out of this sect.'

Loren had to stop himself from reacting visibly to that. 'You want out? You never mentioned that before.'

'I didn't have a problem with it until today.'

It took him a second to put those clues together. 'You're afraid of the Riders...'

'I am. And if you are not, then you are a fool. The Mendocava are far beyond our ability to deal with--beyond anyone in this camp.'

'They didn't attack us, though. Only the aberration.'

'Yes, and they rent him to dust. Even his bones cannot be harvested now.'

Loren threw another look around the encampment. Everyone else seemed to have already settled back down after the encounter with the Riders, but that wasn't terribly strange, he supposed. These were soldiers and madmen of Abolish. Flexibility under stress was arguably their greatest strength as a unit.

And yet here was Rezolo. The reaper might have sounded as calm as ever, but these weren't the words of someone confident or comfortable. In fact, this might've been the most scared that Loren had ever heard him.

'And as it will likely prove relevant to the mission,' the reaper went on, 'Kareem will keep prodding them. I would rather not be here the next time they appear.'"

"2599 -- CCXXXVIII.

Well, Loren couldn't really complain. He'd been looking for a way back to Eloa, and here it was, staring him in the face.

And yet.

Now that there was this new wrinkle in this regiment's mission, he had to admit, a part of him would be disappointed to leave. He felt now more than ever that Dozer had sent their sect to these Gettira Plains for a good reason. Surely, it was no coincidence that these Mendocava just happened to be here. Were they protecting something, perhaps?

It seemed he would not be among those who found out.

Chapter Two Hundred Thirty-Eight: 'A candle in the Dark...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector approached the tree again, this time with only Garovel and Hanton behind him. It was the dead of night, and the rest of the expedition was staying at a luxurious hotel in the nearest town. Sneaking out had been rather easy with Hanton's help, though Carl and Ravi's reapers might've been wondering where his soul had inexplicably disappeared to.

He'd left them a handwritten note on his bed, just in case. If they grew too worried about him and stormed into his bedroom, then hopefully they would relax knowing that he would be back by morning.

Probably. Inspecting a single tree shouldn't take all night, right?

He tried to be as gentle with the tree as he could, even going so far as to inspect the whole thing top to bottom, to discover an alternate entrance to the bark-covered door that he'd found before. The sparse moonlight didn't provide much help on that front, and unfortunately, he hadn't brought a flashlight, either. He'd figured that he wouldn't need one, seeing as he could just materialize a glowing hot cube of iron for light, but standing in this giant canopy of leaves, he suddenly became too worried about accidentally setting this poor tree on fire."

"2599 -- CCXXXVIII.

Well, Loren couldn't really complain. He'd been looking for a way back to Eloa, and here it was, staring him in the face.

And yet.

Now that there was this new wrinkle in this regiment's mission, he had to admit, a part of him would be disappointed to leave. He felt now more than ever that Dozer had sent their sect to these Gettira Plains for a good reason. Surely, it was no coincidence that these Mendocava just happened to be here. Were they protecting something, perhaps?

It seemed he would not be among those who found out.

Chapter Two Hundred Thirty-Eight: 'A candle in the Dark...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector approached the tree again, this time with only Garovel and Hanton behind him. It was the dead of night, and the rest of the expedition was staying at a luxurious hotel in the nearest town. Sneaking out had been rather easy with Hanton's help, though Carl and Ravi's reapers might've been wondering where his soul had inexplicably disappeared to.

He'd left them a handwritten note on his bed, just in case. If they grew too worried about him and stormed into his bedroom, then hopefully they would relax knowing that he would be back by morning.

Probably. Inspecting a single tree shouldn't take all night, right?

He tried to be as gentle with the tree as he could, even going so far as to inspect the whole thing top to bottom, to discover an alternate entrance to the bark-covered door that he'd found before. The sparse moonlight didn't provide much help on that front, and unfortunately, he hadn't brought a flashlight, either. He'd figured that he wouldn't need one, seeing as he could just materialize a glowing hot cube of iron for light, but standing in this giant canopy of leaves, he suddenly became too worried about accidentally setting this poor tree on fire."

"2600

Alas, after quite a while of searching, he found no other way in. So he set to work, trying to gingerly peel the bark from the doorway. He chose not to rely on the vigor, because he didn't want to deal with after effects of exhaustion.

It was a slow process. Garovel seemed to be getting antsy, even offering to stick his head through the doorway to take a look inside first. But since there was no telling what was waiting for them, that seemed a little too dangerous. Plus, it was most likely pitch black in there, anyway.

But the reaper's offer did get Hector thinking.

About how reckless Garovel was being.

Sure, in some ways, maybe that wasn't so abnormal, but it still struck Hector as strange. Garovel always at least TRIED to appear level-headed, even when proposing one of his batshit crazy plans--hell, especially when proposing one of them.

But these past few days, it almost felt like Garovel just didn't give a flying fuck, anymore.

Hmm.

So, as Hector tried to gain leverage over the bark without destroying the door with his materialization, he decided to just be direct and ask about it.

'Hey, Garovel, why're you being such a reckless jackass, lately?'

The reaper gave an echoing snort. 'What do you mean?'

'I mean, it's like you're trying to prove a point or something. And you don't care who or what might get trampled in the process. Even if it's you.'

'Alright, Mr. Judgmental. Just because I've suggested a few ideas recently that you didn't like, doesn't mean you need to start psychoanalyzing me.'

'Hmm.'

'And what does that mean? What kind of a response is ""hmm,"" hmm?'

'I think you're lying to me, Garovel.'

'Excuse me? Why would I be lying? And what about, exactly?'

'Something's different with you, and you don't want to tell me what it is.'"

"2601

'Ah. Hmm. Well, that's an interesting theory, Hector. But have you considered that possibility that you might be crazy?'

'I'm considering the possibility that YOU might be.'

'Hey, now, let's not start throwing those kinds of insults around.'

'I literally just said what you said first.'

'And that was very low of you, Hector. You're not supposed to stoop to my level. You need to be more gracious and understanding. And to let me abuse you verbally without fighting back. It's only fair.'

'Garovel, are you sure you're feeling okay? And not, like, EXTRA stupid or anything?'

'I'll have you know that I feel just fine, thank you very much. But your concern is noted.'

And it seemed like the reaper intended for the conversation to end there, but Hector wasn't yet satisfied. 'That's... not good enough, Garovel. If we weren't in the presence of a telepathic bird that can fuck with people's minds, then I might feel differently. But since we are, you've gotta give me something more. I need to know you're okay.'

'Ugh. What, are you planning to put me back in an iron jar again?'

'Technically, they're orbs, not jars.'

'Whatever. I don't like confined spaces, Hector.'

'I didn't think you did, Garovel. But I don't want the Sparrows screwing with your head.'

'They're not screwing with my head.'

'Are you sure? Would you even be able to tell if they were? I mean, they can mess with memories, you know?'

'Alright, alright, geez. Okay. You got me. It's not Hanton making me act weird. I've been acting weird deliberately.'

Hector paused his materialization work to glance at Garovel. 'Say what?'

'Listen. Hector. I don't know if you've noticed, but I'm not the only one who's been acting differently lately. You have, too.'

'I have?'

'Yes. And just like how you've become concerned with my behavior, I was becoming... well, slightly concerned with yours. Overall, I think you're doing great. But that in itself is also worrying.'

Hector just remained quiet, not sure what to say."
"2602

'I guess if I were to put all my observations and concerns into one, cohesive thought, it would be that I feel like your two blessings have begun to affect your personality,' said Garovel.

Hector blinked.

'And that worries me a little, because I liked you exactly how you were, shyness and all. A rather strong part of me doesn't WANT to see you change, Hector.'

Holy shit. 'Garovel...'

'But on the other hand, I have to acknowledge that you've kinda been killin' it, lately. And I don't just mean in growth as a warrior, either, although that's incredible, too. Your decision-making has been pretty on point. Seeing you talk to all these high-ranking people like it's no big deal for you... frankly, it still boggles my mind.'

Wow. Uh.

Hector still didn't know what to say. He hadn't expected Garovel's concerns to be nestled between this barrage of compliments.

'So yeah, I might've been kinda... pushing the recklessness a bit, as a way of testing you. I wanted to see how much I could influence you, or if you would actually resist my ideas.'

'I... uh... hmm.'

'And look, you've always been surprisingly sassy with me, so don't get it confused. I'm talking about the big ideas. When it comes to important matters, you've usually followed my lead. And that was fine, though I suspected it was primarily because you were terrified of making any kind of heavy decision yourself and bearing the accompanying weight of its consequences. I was perfectly content to be the one carrying that responsibility for you while you just concentrated on not letting people die.

'But lately, that doesn't seem to be the case for you, anymore. Which is rather surprising, to say the least. You've only been a servant for a little over a year now, and yet the change I've witnessed in you is... well, to be blunt with you, it's unlike anything I've ever seen in a servant.'"

"2603

Hector felt compelled to say something now. 'Garovel, I...' It was still difficult to find the words, though. 'I don't know what you want me to say. I mean... a lot's happened in this past year...'

'That, it has.'

'I don't... feel like I've changed that much, myself. Like, deep down, I mean. But... yeah, I do understand where you're coming from, I guess...'

'Really? You don't think you've changed deep down?'

'Uh... well, yeah. I feel like I've gotten better at hiding my, er, uncertainty, maybe... but that's about it.' He paused to think. 'Now that you're bringing all this up, though, maybe I'm just fooling myself...'

'What the hell?' The reaper paused for a silent laugh. 'I'm not telling you this in order to make you feel self-conscious. I just want to make sure you're aware of the changes you're going through.'

'Er, right...'

'Listen, Hector. I...' It was Garovel's turn to hesitate, which made Hector eye him curiously. 'I've grown very attached to you. Not just as my servant. But as my friend. And I've seen servants change dramatically in the past. Never quite this quickly or absurdly, but yes. So... I just...'

As the realization dawned on him, Hector took a long breath and nodded. 'You don't want me to snap and turn into some kind of gigantic asshole.'

The reaper chortled again. 'I wasn't going to phrase it quite like that, but yes, that is my concern in a nutshell, more or less.'

'That makes sense. I mean, I don't want to turn into a gigantic asshole, either.'

'Good. Glad to hear it.'

Hector returned to trying to gently pry the bark of the door in the tree. 'But Garovel, you don't need to ""test"" me. You can just tell me what you're worried about, and then we can discuss it.'

"2604

'I agree in sentiment. Problem is, like I said, I've seen servants change dramatically before. And they're not always as receptive to a calm discussion about these types of things as you are.' And a beat passed. 'Plus, it was an opportunity to mess with you a little bit. Can't very well pass that up, now can I?'

'I don't know, Garovel. They say the key to any healthy relationship is communication.'

'Oh, shut up,' laughed Garovel.

Which made Hector snicker, too. 'But if I shut up, how will we healthily communicate?'

'I'll just tell you what to do, and then you'll do it. How about that? Nice and simple.'

'Pass.'

Finally, the bark cracked enough, and a sizable chunk of it came free.

From there, Hector was able to use his gauntleted hands to gain leverage over the rest and pull it off with only his normal strength.

'Someone is approaching,' said Hanton. 'From the sky. A servant and reaper.'

Hector tensed and focused on the Scarf, but whoever it was hadn't entered its range yet.

After a few more moments of uncertainty, Garovel clicked his nonexistent tongue. 'I wish you hadn't warned him about that.'

'What?' said Hanton. 'Why?'

'Nevermind,' said Garovel. 'The ones approaching aren't a threat. We can relax.'

A servant approaching from the air? And not a threat? There were a number of people Hector knew who fit that description, but if Garovel wanted it to be another surprise or whatever, then that was fine. He focused on the door in front of him.

The cylindrical doorknob didn't turn at all, at first he thought it might be broken, but then he realized that no, it wasn't designed to turn. It was really just a handle. He pulled, but it still resisted. With the Scarf, he was able to sense multiple beams pressed lengthwise against the other side of the door."

"2605

A group of iron platforms materialized from below to push beams off the door. Two of them wouldn't budge, however, so he increased the upward growth force of his iron. Still, they refused to move, so he increased it again. And then again. And, growing frustrated, one more time.

Instead of being lifted out like the others, however, the two stubborn beams yanked their metal rests out of the door and went sailing into the unexplored room.

'What was that noise?' said Garovel from over Hector's shoulder.

The sound of heavy wood clattering against a stone floor arrived, and Hector avoided looking at the reaper. He pressed his hand against the door, and this time, it all but opened itself.

'I thought you were trying not to break anything,' said Garovel.

He took a curious step inside. ""I did try. I just... didn't entirely succeed.""

The room was pitch dark, as expected, but the shape was still quite clear to him thanks to the Scarf. It had been clear even from the other side of the door, but nothing in particular had stuck out to him.

Apart from the giant orb in the middle of the chamber, that was.

Along the walls, he could sense cabinets, tables, and bookshelves--most of which were empty or barely standing. And there seemed to be a bed, as well, nestled in the far corner. Perhaps someone lived here, once upon a time.

He materialized a hovering iron cube above his hand as a glowing light source. It didn't provide much light, but he was reluctant to go bigger. This was a tree, after all, and he was still worried about accidentally setting something on fire.

It seemed fairly clear, at least, that the giant orb was the mysterious thing that had lured them here, so Hector approached it for a better look. The Scarf surprisingly couldn't tell him much about it, but with a bit of light, he was able to see that it was apparently made of glass."
"2606

The sound of footsteps behind him arrived, and Hector turned to see Hanton there--or the illusory human form of him, at least. That would explain why the Scarf didn't sense him approaching.

Hanton's illusion looked around the chamber as if actually surveying it. And maybe he was. Hector didn't fully understand how the Sparrow's senses worked. Perhaps their illusions could also serve as conduits through which they perceived their environment. That idea sounded a little ridiculous to Hector, but then, so did telepathic birds and skeletal phantoms. Plus, Hanton's body was too big to fit through the door--as it probably was for most man-made buildings, so maybe sending in his avatar as a kind of a ""sensory probe"" was how the Sparrow usually handled things.

More sounds arrived, this time from outside the tree, and Hector could sense the physical form of someone with the Scarf there. He hadn't yet reached a point where he could recognize people by the aerial outlines that the Scarf described to him, but the shape was definitely familiar, at least.

""Hey, in there!"" came the voice of Roman Fullister.

Ah. So this was why Garovel hadn't wanted to warn him. The reaper always seemed to like allowing Roman to get the jump on Hector out of nowhere.

""Hey,"" Hector responded, though he did have his questions as he saw Roman and Voreese enter together. ""You said you were going back to Atreya.""

""I did."" Roman's smile was big and familiar. ""Then I came back.""

'We got to wondering what was taking you so damn long,' said Voreese. 'The Lorentians offered some kind of a sweet deal, didn't they?'

'You could've just called and asked about it,' said Garovel.

'Eh, Roman needed the flight practice, anyway.'

""I feel like I'm really starting to get the hang of it.""

"2607

'Perhaps he and Big Bird over here can race, one day,' said Voreese, addressing his humanoid illusion.

""Racing would be an utterly pointless and wasteful use of my energies,"" said Hanton.

'Spoken like a grumpy old man. Hey, what's your guys' average lifespan, anyway?'

""None of your business, is what it is.""

'What, was that too rude? Here, let me try again. Ahem. Please, m'lord, could you spare a morsel of information regarding the average lifespan of your glorious and noble kin?'

Hanton made no reaction.

Voreese just kept going, though. 'Oh, please, please, please, m'lord. Don't you see? Us pathetic commoners are so lacking in worldly knowledge that it is only by the grace of one as benevolent and generous as yourself that we might be able to gain anything of true intellectual value.'

Hanton allowed another beat to pass. ""...About 150 years,"" he said flatly.

And there was more silence, perhaps caused by how stunned everyone was.

'...I can't believe you actually gave me an answer,' said Voreese.

'Neither can I,' said Garovel.

Hanton, however, just turned away to observe the giant orb, walking around to the other side of it.

'Yo, am I crazy or did he actually LIKE it when I did that?' said Voreese.

'Nah,' said Garovel. 'There's no way. You were clearly trying to mock him by being as obnoxious as possible.'

'Yeah, I thought he would pick up on that, too! It was super obvious, right?'

'Of course. He must've just decided it was easier to answer you than keep listening.'

'Hmm, I don't know. I feel like I saw him smile a little. In like a ""I'm so superior"" kind of way, y'know?'

'That can't be,' said Garovel. 'He's probably just--'

""Hey, could we focus a little?"" said Roman. ""Like, what the hell is this place, even? And what's up with the giant orb? You guys know anything about that? Anybody?""

"2608

'Oh yeah,' said Voreese. 'Why are you guys fuckin' around with this weird tree, anyway?'

'Look closely,' said Garovel. 'You can sense that there's something off about this place, can't you?'

'Hmm.' Voreese floated over to Hector, not waiting for Roman. Her hollow gaze lingered on the orb. 'Ah. Yeah. It's suspiciously ""empty,"" isn't it? No soul power here at all. Interesting. Haven't seen a soul vacuum in ages.'

'Hector and I actually saw one while we were in the Undercrust. We didn't know what it was at first, but it turned out to be a powerful artifact known as the Moon's Wrath. It could absorb ardor and then shoot it back out as a destructive beam of light.'

'Oh yeah? That sounds awesome. How come you never showed us?'

'It got eaten by a worm.'

'Baha! Nice job, losers!'

Hector was too busy connecting the dots in his head to worry about her cackling. He remembered the Moon's Wrath quite clearly, but Garovel hadn't referred to it as a ""soul vacuum"" before.

So he was saying that this giant orb was like the Moon's Wrath, then?

""Are you saying that this thing can shoot out lasers, too?"" said Roman, reaching a hand toward the glass.

'Ah-ah, I wouldn't do that if I were you,' said Garovel.

Roman retracted the hand. ""Why?""

Voreese was the one to explain. 'Soul vacuums are rare, but they can have all sorts of weird effects. Like, if you're unlucky, sucking your soul right out of your body.'

Hector and Roman both blinked.

'It wouldn't kill you, since I've already got a handle on your soul, but it wouldn't exactly tickle, either, said Voreese. 'Existential pain is difficult to describe, and sometimes, the brain has a way of manifesting it into physical pain as well, just as a cherry on top.'"

"2609

Roman's expression spoiled into a twisted frown. He pulled a flashlight out of his pocket and switched it on, adding another much needed light source to the dim chamber.

Hector looked at Garovel. ""You didn't mention that when I touched the Moon's Wrath.""

'Oh yeah, well, you'd already touched it before I realized that it was a soul vacuum, so I didn't see much point in telling you after the fact.'

Hector's mouth just remained open a little.

'In any event,' Garovel went on, 'there are plenty of different things that this orb could be. Given its size and transparency, it's unlikely to have much in common with the Moon's Wrath.'

""How do we figure out what it does?"" said Roman.

'Try touching it,' said Voreese.

""Garovel literally just told me not to,"" said Roman.

'Yeah, and now that you know what you'd be getting yourself into, it'll be funny.'

""Shut up, Voreese.""

'She's actually not entirely wrong,' said Garovel. 'The direct approach could work, but before we give that a try, how about we look through some of these bookshelves, first? There might be some relevant writing on what this thing does.'

'Yeah, yeah, if you wanna be all ""smart"" about it,' said Voreese.

And the group split up, Hanton included, in order to do as Garovel suggested. The first book that Hector looked through was written in a language that he didn't understand, and as he was about to ask Garovel about it, he glanced over and noticed Hanton holding a book as well.

Literally holding it. Then putting it back on the shelf. And grabbing another.

The man might've been an illusion, but those books were definitely real. He could sense their shape with the Scarf.

And so he had to ask. ""How are you able to pick those books up?""
"2610

Hanton's illusory form looked over at him with a raised eyebrow. ""You are not familiar with telekinesis, Lord Goffe?""

""Can't say I am,"" said Hector.

Hanton dropped his hands, but the book remained floating in front of him. ""Strange. I was under the impression that you could do it yourself--in some form, at least.""

It took Hector a second to register what he meant. He was talking about Hector's orbiting technique. Yeah. Even if Hanton was familiar with materialization--and perhaps he wasn't--the Sparrow probably didn't know much about that particular technique, did he?

Hmm.

Hector wanted to inquire further, to ask about how powerful this telekinesis actually was. But he held back. There was no way Hanton would share that information.

And in a background thought process, he was recalling Rasalased's words about Wrobels being much more powerful in the past. Or concealing their strength in the modern day.

Still, it was interesting to know. The ability to move objects with his mind was no small thing. Hector's imagination was already running wild with how potent such a thing could be, especially if it could achieve anywhere near the same level of speed as the velocity states of materializers.

'I'm envious,' said Garovel from Hector's peripheral vision. 'If reapers could use telekinesis, a lot of our problems would be solved.'

Hanton breathed half a laugh. ""Would you use it for anything other than annoying us corporeal beings?""

'Heh, well, it would be nice if I could at least turn the pages of a book without requiring someone else's help,' said Garovel.

""Ah, yes, I imagine that must make learning quite a tedious affair for you, at times.""

'Yep. It's also why so many of us are such blabbermouths. Talking is pretty much the only way we can accomplish anything. I keep wondering if technology will ever progress to a point where that'll change for us, but I'm not exactly optimistic.'

"2611

'Same,' said Voreese. 'Plus, I don't think I'd trust any new tech that could supposedly help us like that. You're gettin' into the territory of miracles there, and historically, those are pretty fuckin' few and far between. And I definitely don't wanna be some technological guinea pig, either.'

The reapers kept talking, but Hector returned the majority of his attention back to the book in his hands. He had to interrupt Garovel privately in order to ask what language it was.

Garovel gave it a look while Hector held it up and turned the pages for him. 'Ah, I see two languages, actually. Old Mohssian and Nykeirian.' Then publicly, he said, 'Hey, Voreese. You're Nykeirian, aren't you?'

'Sure am. Why? Got something for me?'

'Come have a look.'

She floated over and spent a few minutes directing Hector to flip past certain pages before ultimately landing on what seemed to be a later chapter. And while she kept reading, Garovel went over to help Roman out.

'Holy fucking shit balls,' Voreese eventually said. 'Garovel, this thing's a Fusion Forge.'

'Oh, please, tell me you're not just messing with me.'

'Nope. Says it right here, clear as day.'

The reapers both started laughing.

Hector, Roman, and Hanton all merely exchanged looks with one another as they waited for an explanation.

'That is some magnificent luck,' said Voreese.

'Assuming we can get it working again, that is,' said Garovel.

'Oh, yeah. It must still work, though, right? I mean, it doesn't look damaged at all.'

'Sure, but Forges tend to all look different, so we don't really know what damage would look like for this one, either. And given how valuable these things are, there's probably a reason it's just sitting here, seemingly abandoned.'

'Aw, don't say that. You're really bringing down my mood.'

'Just trying to temper our expectations here.'

'Yeah, yeah. We need a skilled integrator to inspect this fucking thing.'

'More than just one, probably.'"

"2612

'Know anybody who might fit the bill?' said Voreese.

'Maybe,' said Garovel. 'We should be extra careful who we ask, though. I think trustworthiness is an even more important qualifying factor than skillfulness. Something like this could attract the wrong sort of attention, if word gets out.'

'You're right about that.'

""Would you mind telling us what a Fusion Forge is?"" said Hanton.

'Oh yeah, sorry,' said Garovel. 'Put simply, a Fusion Forge is something that, historically, can only be created by an extremely powerful integration user. It's a kind of super-advanced tool for them, used to combine materials--even soul-infused ones.'

'We're talkin' like emperor-level strength requirements here,' said Voreese. 'Less powerful integrators might still be able to make use of a

Forge, but they can't create one.'

'And even then, it can still be dangerous,' said Garovel. 'If you don't know what you're doing with this thing, then you're liable to kill not only yourself but also your reaper, too.'

""Oh, good,"" said Roman dryly.

'This is a fantastic find,' said Garovel, 'but it won't be easy to actually get any use out of it. Especially if it's broken, which I suspect it is.'

""I see,"" said Hanton, eyeing the glass Forge anew. ""So then... not to put too fine a point on it, but what would you say is the bottom line here? Do you believe this object is worth accepting Lorent's offer and possibly irritating the Queen?""

Everyone looked to Garovel, who fell quiet for a time, deliberating.

'...Yes, I do believe that,' the reaper said. 'This thing is so valuable that, even if it doesn't work, it's STILL worth it. Just the idea that we might be able to fix it SOMEDAY would be enough.'

Hanton nodded. ""In that case, I'm sure the Queen will understand.""
"2613 -- CCXXXIX.

'I'm not concerned about her misunderstanding the Forge's value,' said Garovel. 'I'm concerned about what she'll think regarding our apparent division of loyalties between the two countries.'

'True,' said Voreese. 'I'm sure she'll play it off gracefully, like always, but there's no way she'll be happy about having to share Hector with Lorent. He's the pride and joy of Atreya, right now.'

Hector's brow tilted upon hearing that last part. She was exaggerating, obviously, but he knew what she was getting at.

Weirdly enough, though, a part of him also felt like the Queen would be upset with him if he didn't take the deal, too. Like, she would be disappointed if he passed up something this valuable, even if it was for her own sake.

Hmm. Maybe it was just one of those situations where neither option was perfect.

As usual.

""Well, in any case, it sounds like you have already made your decision,"" said Hanton. ""Let us finish up here and return before the Lorentians begin to worry too much.""

Chapter Two Hundred Thirty-Nine: 'Amid the churning sand...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

The Uego Desert was quite a sight in the evening. The enormous dunes had a way of catching the sunlight with their slopes and curves that made them shine, and the heat that still lingered from earlier in the day made that gentle shimmer tremble and waver.

The uncommon purity of the sands themselves might've also factored into the scene. More than perhaps any other desert in the world, the Uego had a large percentage of translucent or even transparent grains of sand.

That was said to be the work of Asad's earliest predecessors, the arasaba, the mythological creatures from which his moniker--the Lion of the Desert--originated. They were said to have gifted their ability to create sand upon those who gained their favor, before ultimately departing from this world."

"2613 -- CCXXXIX.

'I'm not concerned about her misunderstanding the Forge's value,' said Garovel. 'I'm concerned about what she'll think regarding our apparent division of loyalties between the two countries.'

'True,' said Voreese. 'I'm sure she'll play it off gracefully, like always, but there's no way she'll be happy about having to share Hector with Lorent. He's the pride and joy of Atreya, right now.'

Hector's brow tilted upon hearing that last part. She was exaggerating, obviously, but he knew what she was getting at.

Weirdly enough, though, a part of him also felt like the Queen would be upset with him if he didn't take the deal, too. Like, she would be disappointed if he passed up something this valuable, even if it was for her own sake.

Hmm. Maybe it was just one of those situations where neither option was perfect.

As usual.

""Well, in any case, it sounds like you have already made your decision,"" said Hanton. ""Let us finish up here and return before the Lorentians begin to worry too much.""

Chapter Two Hundred Thirty-Nine: 'Amid the churning sand...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

The Uego Desert was quite a sight in the evening. The enormous dunes had a way of catching the sunlight with their slopes and curves that made them shine, and the heat that still lingered from earlier in the day made that gentle shimmer tremble and waver.

The uncommon purity of the sands themselves might've also factored into the scene. More than perhaps any other desert in the world, the Uego had a large percentage of translucent or even transparent grains of sand.

That was said to be the work of Asad's earliest predecessors, the arasaba, the mythological creatures from which his moniker--the Lion of the Desert--originated. They were said to have gifted their ability to create sand upon those who gained their favor, before ultimately departing from this world."

"2614

Asad had gazed upon this desert many times over the course of his life--and not always for good or peaceful reasons.

And unfortunately, this was another such occasion.

The Abolish-backed invasion of the Calthosi Armed Forces into his homeland of Sair had thus far proven to be largely a stalemate, but according to the scouts, Abolish did seem to be very slowly gaining ground. It wasn't yet enough to cause real concern, but it wasn't encouraging news, either.

Asad had been involved in a few wars already in his lifetime but never one of this scale--and never one that threatened the very existence of Sair.

That was what was really weighing on everyone's mind, he felt. The idea that, if they failed, everything they had built here over the last two centuries would be reduced to ruin.

The reapers of his Hahl had always told him that if a day like this ever came, it would come quickly. And he'd nodded along like a good student and son.

However, only now did he feel as though he truly understood. And even that was debatable.

He still occasionally found himself wondering how they'd ended up in this position. Their entire purpose in joining with the Rainlords all those years ago was precisely to prevent circumstances such as these. And later, when half of the Hahls partnered with the Vanguard, the same reasoning had been used.

True, that was all before he was born, but he knew the history well. His parents would've surely been rolling in their graves if he didn't.

And yet here the Sandlords now were, relying on the already-strained Vanguard. Any other allies that they had made over the years were either busy with their own war, in hiding, or simply long dead.

The isolationism that his brethren on the Golden Council so loved to speak about--well, it wasn't looking so wise now, was it?

It was hard not to be bitter during their meetings, these days."

"2615

His relationship with the other councilmen felt strained from both ends.

They were displeased with how he had gone against them in order to aid the Rainlords and subsequently jeopardize their relationship with the Vanguard; and he was displeased with how they didn't seem to realize that they would be in a much better position to fight this war now if they had just done as he had requested and supported the Rainlords against the Vanguard, at least politically if not militarily.

The Vanguard was not supposed to be a political organization. Even if some of the Rainlords were members, the Vanguard simply didn't have the right to remove them from their own territory--not without the support of the rest of the government. If the Sandlords had made clear their opposition to the Vanguard's actions, this whole thing might have been resolved peacefully.

At least, that was Asad's opinion. The rest of the Council clearly did not share it.

They seemed to be under the impression that the Vanguard would have pulled out of Sair entirely--or worse, attacked the Drylands, too.

Which was an absurd notion to Asad; but of course, explaining as much had not proved easy.

The Vanguard wanted their alliance with the Sandlords to continue. Never was that more clear than now. Sair was far too important geographically, and the Sandlords knew this land better than anyone. And with the Sunsmith finally stepping onto the world stage as a powerful enough figure to truly oppose the other juggernauts, the Vanguard would have even less reason to pick a fight with them.

How he wished Zeff had accepted his proposal a year and a half ago. Perhaps a very public marriage between Emiliana Elroy and Midhat Najir would have been enough to prevent all of these problems from growing so out of control.

Or maybe he was just deluding himself."

"2616

There was no sense in whining about it now, he told himself. What was done was done, and allowing resentment to build up in his heart would do nothing to improve the situation--not for his people and not for himself.

His father had taught him that.

The Lord Salim Najir had been a man of few words. Asad's mother had typically been the one to raise her voice or decide punishment--and between him and his brother Haqq, there'd been plenty of that to go around.

In fact, there was only a single instance in Asad's memory of his father ever sounding angry. Perhaps the rarity of it was precisely why he remembered it so vividly.

It had happened not long after he'd become a servant at the age of fourteen and manifested his ""divine"" materialization ability. At first, he'd been ecstatic with the discovery. He had the most esteemed power among the Sandlords at his fingertips. What was there to dislike?

He soon found out, when all of his peers began treating him differently. It was like they suddenly thought he was above them--or that he thought he was, perhaps. At that tender age, he couldn't recognize the quiet resentment in their eyes. He couldn't understand why all of his friends suddenly seemed so different.

They weren't mean, of course. That was the confusing part. They were perfectly cordial. They were just... detached. They would still invite him to play with them, to hang out, but they couldn't laugh like they did before. They couldn't relax. It was like everyone was walking on eggshells around him.

If he'd been more emotionally mature, perhaps he would've been able to navigate those relationships better. Instead, he'd started picking fights. For no real reason, either--or at least, none that he could have articulated at the time."

"2617

Really, he'd just wanted someone to treat him like a normal person again, even if that meant getting them to punch him in the face.

And when his father had learned of what he was doing, that was the one and only time that Asad recalled him ever growing frighteningly angry. But it was not because of the fights that he'd picked, precisely.

His father seemed to understand that part well enough.

No, what truly bothered Salim Najir was when Asad kept complaining.

Many times over the course of his life, Asad had remembered that moment for how strange it was. Of all the things that could have possibly set the man off, why had it been that? There were so many worse things that he and Haqq had done in their youth. Setting off fireworks in his office, for example. Or giving each other black eyes. Or eating so many sweets that they both vomited in the middle of a prestigious dining event with Hahl Saqqaf.

It hadn't been any of those. His father had been cool as a cucumber in each and every instance. Never yelling. Always gentle.

Aside from this one instance in which he apparently could not abide Asad's childish whining.

For many years, the oddness of that memory had continued to puzzle him. Maybe his father had just been having a bad day. Maybe his father had just gotten fed up after listening to him for too long. Or maybe it was some other thing.

But somewhere along his maturation into a man, Asad felt like he understood, because he remembered what his father had said afterwards, once he'd calmed down.

""Every man has his own burdens to bear. His own misery. But not every man has to let those burdens belittle him. Not every man has to become pathetic.""

And if that didn't sum up his father's entire philosophy for life, then he didn't know what else would."

"2618

He wondered what his father would make of the current situation. Was this war just another burden to be borne?

Maybe it was.

His mother certainly wouldn't have been quiet about it, though.

Asad didn't think that he had ever seen two more different people than Salim and Yasmin Najir. How they'd ended up married--much less, happily so--he still struggled to wrap his head around.

He'd heard from the reapers that their union had been arranged, then called off, then rearranged, then called off again, before finally going through. Apparently, the drama had arisen from the uncertainty between the two Hahls, rather than between the bride and groom. No doubt, the families had seen their opposite natures and been concerned.

But for whatever reason, it had worked out. His mother never seemed to mind his father's stoicism, and his father never seemed to mind his mother's temper. In fact, his father was perhaps the only person who was ever spared from her biting wit.

While it might've been an exaggeration to say that their marriage had been openly ""affectionate,"" Asad did remember the occasional moment of tenderness between them.

He wished that he'd realized sooner how special their relationship was. They'd made it look easy, never arguing--at least, not in front of him.

Compared to his own marriage, the memory of theirs felt like some far off dream.

He didn't want to think about that right now, though.

They were expecting another major offensive from the Calthosi any day now. The last few attacks had only been harassments, probably scouting for weaknesses in their defenses. They weren't likely to find any, though. Asad had been walking the lines, checking the comms, and assessing the troops and ordnance all day long--and he wasn't the only one doing that, either.

The Uego Desert was a death trap, just waiting for the enemy to try and cross it."

"2619

Asad finally sat down and breathed a heavy sigh. He'd decided to take a rest in the final bunker that he'd checked for the evening. Asho Duxan, son of the Lord Hasan Duxan, had taken over Asad's shift in making the rounds.

Asad wondered if he would even be able to sleep tonight. His body felt weary enough for it, but pre-battle tension had a way of ignoring that. And nighttime, of course, was a favored opportunity for launching attacks.

For a while, he just kept staring out the long, horizontal hole in the bunker. This modest structure was almost entirely buried in the Uego sands, and the nightly wind occasionally whipped a dry spray into the domed chamber.

Glass could've kept the sand out, of course, but any glare from the sun or moon would hinder visibility, which was much more important than any discomfort that Asad was feeling from getting splashed in the face with sand every now and then.

Plus, this wasn't bad. Bad was when the sand swept in and covered his whole body in a matter of seconds. Bad was when the winds had been strong enough to make the sand grains draw blood after pelting him in his youth. Bad required goggles and body armor.

This was just fine.

The pair of silent sentries sitting next to him were wearing goggles and armor, however. And judging from the amount of sand on the floor, still waiting to be removed, maybe these fellows had gotten a taste of bad earlier.

With all that gear on, there was no telling which Hahl they belonged to, but they must've been young if they were stationed here. They might even be non-servants, since he didn't see either of their reapers hanging around.

His own reaper, Qorvass, phased through the wall and hovered over to him. 'I don't think the Vanguardians like our desert very much,' he said in Valgan.

'I'm not sure WE like our desert very much,' said Asad."

"2620

'Even so, it's obvious that many of them aren't handling the heat very well,' said Qorvass.

'Well, it's winter, so maybe they are enjoying the freezing nights,' said

Asad, unable to conceal his amusement.

'They aren't.'

Asad couldn't say he was surprised. Extreme temperatures were something of a weakness for servants, especially those lacking experience or training in such environments. The effects of very high or low temperatures on the brain were big factors. Overheating obviously impaired one's cognitive ability, and regenerating could only do so much against that. And freezing, of course, was arguably even more debilitating.

While it was true that passive soul defenses could neutralize those problems, the younger servants wouldn't have that luxury. And hell, even a lot of the older ones might still be uncomfortable--and therefore irritable--if they weren't accustomed to working in places like this.

'Abolish will be in the same boat,' said Asad. 'In fact, they'll probably be worse off. This is where having soldiers who lack discipline can become a major problem.'

'I appreciate your optimism,' said Qorvass. 'By the way, have you forgotten anything today?'

Asad almost resented that question. 'I don't think so.'

Lately, the reaper had gotten into the habit of asking him that every day. Asad had found it annoying at first, but after a couple of instances where it helped him to remember something, he decided that maybe there was some utility in it, after all.

'You're sure?' said Qorvass. 'You didn't leave the Shards behind again, did you?'

'They're right here.' Asad touched the breast pocket concealed beneath his bulky robe.

Qorvass seemed to be especially wary of where the Shards were, these days. Which wasn't so surprising, really. There were only four of them in total, and two of them were no longer in Sair."

"2621

Now more than ever, the potential that lay dormant in the Shards was constantly on Asad's mind. If he could just unlock their power, he could ascend to a level of strength that the Sandlords had not wielded in centuries.

That would change things, of course. Abbas Saqqaf would no longer be the undisputed powerhouse among them, but Asad was confident that they would be able to work through any political challenges that might arise. The safety that the Shards would be able to provide would far outweigh any drama between the Hahls, he felt.

But there was a reason why the last seven Lions had all failed to accomplish this feat.

No one knew how to do it, anymore.

Qorvass believed that it was simply a matter of growing old enough, of allowing their soul synchronization to reach a certain threshold; but the reaper had also admitted to him privately that he didn't actually know what that threshold was or when they would pass it. Despite him being even older than the Shards themselves, the reaper could provide no definitive historical evidence that this theory was actually true.

Certainly, it was comforting to imagine that all Asad had to do was survive, to live long enough to obtain some godlike power that would solve all their problems. It was no wonder why Qorvass wanted to believe that.

It was much better than the alternative explanation, where it is simply impossible for Asad to unlock the Shards' potential in the first place.

Better to keep hope alive, right?

Soon. Just a little longer. Someday. Eventually.

Those all sounded nicer in one's mind than simply ""never,"" didn't they?

Frankly, Asad didn't know what he believed, anymore. On the one hand, he'd gotten confirmation that Rasalased really did still exist within the Shards; but on the other, the Dry God had apparently mentioned something that seriously challenged Qorvass' theory of eventuality.

Worthiness."
"2622

When Hector and Garovel had explained their strange encounter with Rasalased to him and Qorvass, that was the thing that Asad found the most curious.

Rasalased was apparently able to gaze deeply into their souls and judge their character. To measure their worthiness. And most importantly, he said that he had ""learned his lesson after the three.""

There was little doubt in Asad's mind that the Dry God had been referring to the War of the Three Sands. If Rasalased was able to perceive the greater world beyond the Shards, then it would only make sense that a time in which the Sandlords had tried to annihilate each other left a lasting impression on him.

Perhaps before that conflict, the Shards worked just as Qorvass said. Any sufficiently skilled Lion would be able to unlock their power. And after seeing the destruction wrought by such indiscriminate strength, Rasalased decided to take a more cautious approach.

If that was the case, then Asad had to wonder what hope there was for him. What did it even mean to be worthy of the Dry God's power? He had a feeling that only Rasalased himself could answer that question.

And he had another feeling that perhaps his own inability to access the Shards, to even speak to Rasalased, was itself an answer. Maybe Rasalased had already judged him and found him lacking.

He certainly wasn't perfect. It seemed like every day, he discovered some new way in which he was a failure. As a friend. Or a warrior. A lord. A father. A husband.

What was left for him to be worthy of? From the sound of it, Rasalased would see right through him. There was no point in putting on airs.

His golden eyes eased shut as he rubbed his forehead, trying not to dwell on those thoughts again. Trying not to imagine how many people he'd let down, how many he would in the future.

Trying not to let the weight of the world crush him."

"2623

He was only in his forties, and yet he already felt like an old man sometimes. How did the truly old servants do it, he wondered? Surely, at one point or another, they all must have felt this same pressure that he did.

Well. The ones that hadn't lost their minds, anyway.

Maybe there was a connection there. Maybe he should have a talk with Abbas, the next time they were both free.

Which would probably be never, a stray thought told him.

He stood up. A bed was waiting for him a couple floors down, and sleep was starting to sound pretty damn good. He shuffled over to the sandy hole in the floor and slid down the ladder until he reached the bottom.

It was dark and cramped, but at least the wind's howling was a bit softer in here. The bed was right next to his feet, so he didn't even bother struggling for a light source. He just plopped down and pulled the dusty blanket over him.

From experience, he knew that there was a fair chance that at least one scorpion was sharing this bed with him, right now, but if that was the case, then he wished it a good night's rest, too. He was too tired to give it much more than a passing thought.

His tattoos factored into that lazy sentiment. He didn't actually have to worry about his skin being penetrated by something as weak as a scorpion's stinger. In fact, since he was still wearing the ring that Haqq made for him, such a sting might just reflect back on the creature and kill it, instead.

Perhaps that was the last thing on his mind as he fell asleep, because he dreamt of his mother. Of the months she had spent, working to the point of exhaustion, trying to complete these same tattoos for him."

"2624

She had, quite literally, poured her very soul into these tattoos. And as a result, Asad was a far more durable servant than just about anyone else in his age range. They had saved him time and again, most recently at Dunehall during the battle with the Marauder of Calthos.

Having them inscribed into his flesh, however, had been the most torturous thing he had ever experienced. And at the age of thirteen, he hadn't been prepared for it at all. Apparently, his mother had to do it before he became a servant, else the tattoos would disappear whenever the regeneration was invoked.

He hadn't understood that very well, back then, and he'd resisted his mother every time she wanted to continue the process. He'd thought it was some kind of punishment. It certainly felt like it.

Eventually, he grew so terrified of it that she resorted to anesthetizing him before each session. That had been a major improvement, as far as he was concerned, though he still had lingering pain for days afterwards.

And once the tattoos were finally completed, it was a tremendous relief. His peers in school looked at him differently but not in a bad way. If anything, they seemed to think the tattoos were cool. It wasn't until after becoming a servant and realizing he had the divine materialization of silicon and oxygen that their behavior began to change. In retrospect, though, perhaps the tattoos had played some sort of role there, too. They certainly made it more difficult for him to blend into a crowd.

His mother had tried to do the same for his brother Haqq, but she hadn't been able to finish his.

She died at the age of thirty-three, when without warning, her reaper released her soul and disappeared."

"2625

None of the family's other reapers could explain what might have prompted her reaper to do such a thing. By all accounts, their relationship had appeared to be just fine.

In many ways, his mother's death was as mysterious as her life. She had been younger than Asad was now, and yet her skill with integration was legendary. Asad had never once heard of someone else being able to accomplish what she did with these simple black tattoos.

But he had also heard that integration could be like that. It was a bit different from the other ability types--even mutation, with which it seemed to have the most in common. Supposedly, integration was more ""varied"" and ""scholarly"" in its usage. While age and experience were certainly factors, there was greater opportunity for true genius to achieve unexpected results with it.

There was a reason why the most famous integrators were generally inventors, after all.

And yet, even so, Yasmin Najir had been a mysterious enough figure that Asad often wondered if there wasn't more to it. Somehow. He might've been her son, but to say that he knew her well would've been an exaggeration.

Some days, she would be all passion and fury, speaking her mind to anyone who would listen--and to many who wouldn't. She would be full of energy and affection, wanting to spend as much time with him and Haqq and their father as she could. And on other days, she would disappear into her lab, consumed with her work or research. Asad might try to pester her, to regain her attention, and she would barely notice him--or even tell him off in quite a cold and curt manner.

She was so different, in fact, that he remembered asking his father if he had two mothers. The man had explained quite bluntly that, no, that was just how she was."

"2626

His mixed memories of her worked their way into his dream. Images of her smiling face. Feelings of her warm embrace. Followed by colder eyes and closed doors. And the pain from the tattoos. Coming and going.

And she spoke to him. Telling him to quit crying. That she wouldn't always be there to make everything better. That he had to take care of his little brother. That he should learn from his father's example. That a day would come when everyone was depending on him.

He saw Eloa. The whole continent. Burning. He saw creatures he'd never seen before. Monsters, humanoid but not. Gangly and distorted. Melting out of the ground. Rampaging. Slaughtering. Devouring.

And he saw them all turn toward him, hunger in their eyes. Until it turned to fear.

He snapped awake, thrashing. The blanket was wrapped around his face, and he had to take a few moments to undo it. His breathing was labored, though he couldn't tell if that was from the dream or from the blanket.

For a while, he just sat there in the pitch darkness, trying to clear his mind and failing.

He pulled one of the Shards out of his robe. He could feel where they had both pressed up against him while he slept. If not for the tattoos, he would probably have a bruise there.

He gripped the crystal and closed his eyes.

And he tried. Again.

He concentrated on the Shard, on its shape, on his own soul passing into it.

And again, he came up empty. As expected, nothing became clearer.

He sighed and returned it to his pocket with the other one.

The darkness was interrupted by the sudden appearance of an abnormally illuminated scorpionfly descending through the ceiling."
"2627

'Oh, you're already awake,' said Qorvass privately. 'Good. Come back up.'

'What's the matter?' he said, already making his way over to the ladder.

'Well, um. There's... a cluster of vending machines in the middle of the desert.'

Asad stopped climbing the ladder briefly, blinking dully for a moment before continuing.

'They just suddenly appeared there,' the reaper elaborated. 'No one's quite sure what to make of it.'

'Vending machines,' Asad said incredulously.

'That's right.'

And sure enough, when he made it back up to the bunker's main floor, grabbed a pair of binoculars, and looked out through the wide observation window again, he saw exactly what the reaper had described.

A ring of six tall, boxy machines. Just sitting there, half-buried in sand, but also lit up, as if operational.

Obviously, there were no electrical outlets way out here, so what in the world was powering them? As if their appearance alone wasn't strange enough.

The scouts were looking his way. ""We've already radioed it in, Lord,"" said the one on the left through his faceguard. ""Command doesn't seem to know what to make of it, either. Apparently, we aren't the only ones seeing something like this. They've received reports like ours from a dozen other bunkers.""

""What do you make of it, Lord?"" said the other scout.

Well, this was Abolish they were dealing with, Asad thought. Morons and lunatics filled their ranks. Perhaps he shouldn't overthink this.

""It's probably a diversionary tactic,"" said Asad. ""Keep an eye on them but watch their surroundings, too.""

""Yes, Lord.""

Abolish knew by now that their invisible soldiers weren't going to work, anymore. Not by themselves, at least. The sands of the Uego made it all but impossible for the enemy to sneak across without leaving very noticeable tracks, and even if they somehow got past that, the Sandlords had also planted thousands of booby traps in this region--a number which was still growing by the day."

"2628

That was one of the things that Asad and the other senior warriors had been making sure to emphasize when making their rounds. The management of the defensive line's observational systems was key in the battle--and indeed, in the war. If they allowed Abolish to infiltrate their land again, then they might not be able to recover from that problem a second time.

To that end, Haqq had proved very helpful. Many of the new traps they were using were based on his designs. Some were quite simple and even non-lethal, like the Jamal-3, which was a sound-triggered paint-thrower, designed to be used in conjunction with scouts and snipers.

Others, however, were quite deadly indeed. The Kubra-4 was a sound-triggered explosive using soul-infused materials. An average servant caught in the blast radius would be reduced to a red mist, and even an older one would have a hard time living through it with passive soul defense alone.

Haqq was already at work on the Kubra-5, which he claimed would be even more powerful, despite the fact that they still had plenty of Kubra-4s waiting to be used. Their deadliness was precisely why they hadn't seen much action yet. The audio-based trigger meant that a snake could slither too close, and then suddenly an entire sand dune would be removed from this plane of existence.

They did make for one hell of a deterrent, though. Asad had a couple Kubra-4s in this very bunker. He hadn't received advisement to use them yet, but he did have the authority to do so whenever he wished.

Right now, though, his mind was leaning more toward the long-range artillery that he had in stock. Those were older and not Haqq's designs, but with a bit of soul-infusion, they would pack plenty of wallop. He ordered one of the scouts to go fetch some mortars and shells, just in case."

"2629

When the materials arrived, Asad began pressing his soul into them. He could leave the actual firing of the mortars to the two lads in the bunker with him, though. If their position came under attack, it would be better if he was free to directly engage the enemy.

After the mortars and shells were infused, he tried to contact the targeting center over the radio, but there was only static now.

Someone had started jamming them. Some form of attack was probably going to arrive soon, then. That was useful information to know, which why he often liked to use the most vulnerable radio first.

Asad couldn't claim to be very technologically savvy himself, but he knew that his kin had recently developed several new types of jamming-resistant radios, all apparently using different techniques.

So when he opened the corner cabinet, he had a veritable buffet of devices to choose from. The first one he picked didn't work, either, but the second one did. Maybe Haqq would be able to explain precisely why that was, but all Asad cared about was getting through to observational support.

Sure enough, they already eyes in the sky for him, along with coordinates for the mortars.

Asad still remembered a time when mortars didn't have any kind computational assistance built into them, but he wasn't about to complain about things being better back then.

Before they could fire, however, he spotted a change among the group of vending machines.

A brightly lit sign rose of out of the sand at the center of them. In Valgan, it read: ""DON'T SHOOT. COME HAVE A SNACK.""

'...They can't possibly think that's actually going to work, can they?' said Qorvass privately.

Asad didn't even want to answer that. ""Fire,"" he said.

And the first shell went flying."

"2630

Asad watched with his binoculars, waiting and bracing himself for the blindingly bright explosion to arrive.

And it did, but it was not on target. It instead landed far afield, obliterating a dune in the distance.

Targeting errors were perfectly common, and the two young ones were already trying to make adjustments, but Asad had enough experience to know that something else was the problem. That was too much of an error. These boys here would've had to be complete amateurs to screw it up that badly, and they wouldn't be out here if they were.

Qorvass corroborated his thinking. 'Someone deflected it.'

""No adjustment,"" said Asad aloud. ""Just reload.""

The bunker scouts both answered in the affirmative.

The illuminated sign in the middle of the vending machines crumbled to pieces, and a new one rose up from the sand to take its place.

This one read: ""HEY! I SAID DON'T SHOOT! CAN'T YOU READ?!""

And suddenly, Asad found himself rethinking everything.

The first sign, he could chalk up to being an elaborate and ridiculous practical joke by one or more of Abolish's many lunatics. They could've rigged it up somehow, found a way to secretly bury it out here--sure, fine.

But this second sign... it had responsive text on it--as if it had just been made after its creator witnessed what happened.

And how many people were there who could do something like that in so short a time?

Of course, that could be the point of their ploy here. Perhaps they predicted the response and prepared the second sign for this exact reason. Psychological warfare, of a sort. Abolish had plenty of--

The second sign broke itself apart, and a third sign arose from the sand, reading: ""PLAY NICE, KIDDOS, OR YOU'LL BE REMOVED FROM THE GAME EARLY.""

~~((National Do Something Nice Day Special -- Page 1 of 24))~~

Chapter Two Hundred Forty: 'The Lion's share...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Asad could see the young ones looking to him for instruction, but he didn't have much for them, at the moment--other than a mounting sense of dread.

Qorvass wasn't helping with that feeling, either. 'It can't be...'

He was reluctant to ask but he had to. 'Do you know who is doing this?' said Asad.

'I can't sense him, but that power over machines... making such complex things like magic...'

'Spit it out already.'

The reaper's insectoid gaze locked onto him. 'It might just be Morgunov himself.'

Well, then.

That was the last thing he had wanted to hear, and yet he wasn't terribly surprised by it, either. There were plenty of old, dangerous madmen in Abolish, but that bastard was the one who always came to mind first.

'Then get out of here, Qorvass.'

'No,' the reaper said.

'Now isn't the time for--'

'If it's really him, then it's already too late for me to flee,' said Qorvass. 'Separating myself from you would just make things even easier for him.'

Asad wanted to argue, but he could tell from the reaper's tone that it would be pointless. He got back on the radio. ""Possible encounter with the Mad Demon. I repeat. Morgunov may be on the battlefield. Do you copy?""

There was only static, however.

""Please respond,"" he tried again, though he was already moving to retrieve another radio, one that utilized different antijamming measures.

That one didn't work, either. Nor did the next one.

And in the meantime, a fourth sign arrived.

""STOP FIDDLING WITH YOUR TOYS AND COME GET A SNACK.""

The two bunker scouts were looking at him again, not the sign. He couldn't see their faces through all their gear, but from their body language, they didn't seem scared--which was a minor miracle unto itself, professionalism notwithstanding.

A fifth sign: ""IF YOU DON'T, I'LL HAVE TO BRING THE SNACKS TO YOU.""

"2631 -- CCXL.

~~((National Do Something Nice Day Special -- Page 1 of 24))~~

Chapter Two Hundred Forty: 'The Lion's share...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Asad could see the young ones looking to him for instruction, but he didn't have much for them, at the moment--other than a mounting sense of dread.

Qorvass wasn't helping with that feeling, either. 'It can't be...'

He was reluctant to ask but he had to. 'Do you know who is doing this?' said Asad.

'I can't sense him, but that power over machines... making such complex things like magic...'

'Spit it out already.'

The reaper's insectoid gaze locked onto him. 'It might just be Morgunov himself.'

Well, then.

That was the last thing he had wanted to hear, and yet he wasn't terribly surprised by it, either. There were plenty of old, dangerous madmen in Abolish, but that bastard was the one who always came to mind first.

'Then get out of here, Qorvass.'

'No,' the reaper said.

'Now isn't the time for--'

'If it's really him, then it's already too late for me to flee,' said Qorvass. 'Separating myself from you would just make things even easier for him.'

Asad wanted to argue, but he could tell from the reaper's tone that it would be pointless. He got back on the radio. ""Possible encounter with the Mad Demon. I repeat. Morgunov may be on the battlefield. Do you copy?""

There was only static, however.

""Please respond,"" he tried again, though he was already moving to retrieve another radio, one that utilized different antijamming measures.

That one didn't work, either. Nor did the next one.

And in the meantime, a fourth sign arrived.

""STOP FIDDLING WITH YOUR TOYS AND COME GET A SNACK.""

The two bunker scouts were looking at him again, not the sign. He couldn't see their faces through all their gear, but from their body language, they didn't seem scared--which was a minor miracle unto itself, professionalism notwithstanding.

A fifth sign: ""IF YOU DON'T, I'LL HAVE TO BRING THE SNACKS TO YOU.""

"2632

~~((National Do Something Nice Day Special -- Page 2 of 24))~~

Asad had to remain calm.

The defensive line was under constant surveillance. Even if the enemy had somehow neutralized every single radio in the bunker, his kin would surely notice the communications blackout soon and send reinforcements.

If they were really up against the Mad Demon, though, then those reinforcements were doomed, too. Alone, the only warrior on this battlefield who stood a chance against him was Lamont, and how long would it take to alert him of Morgunov's presence here?

If they were working in unison, the Golden Council might be able to mount a defense, but right now, they were divided.

Asad had to stall. And even more importantly, he needed to get word out about the severity of the threat. It wouldn't matter how much time he managed to buy if the ones who showed up to help were unprepared.

There was one method that might work. A very old-fashioned tactic. But Morgunov would probably block that, too, if Asad didn't wait for an opening first. No doubt, Morgunov was watching them like a hawk, right now.

As he was thinking, a sixth sign appeared: ""DECIDE SOON. I'M GROWING IMPATIENT.""

'Our options are limited,' said Qorvass, clinging onto Asad's shoulder. 'The smartest move might be to play along with whatever sick game he has in mind, right now.'

Asad's jaw clenched as he tried to think, tried to find some alternative. Conventional procedures went out the window when dealing with someone like Morgunov.

Hmm. So maybe... an unconventional strategy was in order?

He was suddenly reminded of the young lord from Atreya for some reason.

Asad stepped closer to the edge of the bunker and concentrated. He raised his right hand into a fist and summoned a quartz construct in the distance, near where the vending machines were located.

If it was to be a game, then Asad could play."

"2633

~~((National Do Something Nice Day Special -- Page 3 of 24))~~

He used veins of molten quartz in order to embed Valgan letters into a larger case of glass. It needed to glow so as to be visible in the night, but the extreme heat meant that the case wouldn't contain the letters for long. He could already see them beginning to melt through the glass and ooze out onto the sand below.

But the message was a simple one. ""WELCOME TO SAIR,"" was all it said.

And there arrived an intervening period of silence as they waited.

The response did arrive. ""I DON'T FEEL VERY WELCOME,"" it read.

'Where in the black hells are you going with this?' said Qorvass privately.

'Just trying to buy time, honestly.'

'Well, hurry and say something else, then. Anything to keep him distracted.'

That advice wasn't very helpful, Asad felt. He annihilated his sign and remade it with a new message.

""IS THIS YOUR FIRST TIME VISITING?""

'Wow, Asad.'

'Look, I'm open to topic suggestions.'

""NO, I HAVE BEEN HERE MANY TIMES,"" came the response.

And Asad actually found that a bit curious. Many times? Really? Visits from the Mad Demon would have been historically significant, and as far as Asad was aware, there were only a couple of instances where he had appeared here. Could he be lying? It would be far worse if he were telling the truth.

Unless he and Qorvass were wrong, and he actually wasn't conversing with Morgunov, right now. Wouldn't that be nice.

Before Asad could craft a reply, another mechanical sign appeared.

""I'M LOOKING FOR A FRIEND OF MINE,"" it read.

Asad had a rather strong feeling that he knew who that friend was, but he didn't see any harm in playing dumb with his response. ""PERHAPS YOU COULD DESCRIBE THIS FRIEND.""

The answer arrived swiftly. ""LIKES TO WEAR ONE COLOR AT A TIME. GREAT PERSONALITY. KNOWS HOW TO LAUGH. VERY SOCIABLE. GOOD DANCER. SURPRISINGLY SKILLED MIME. A TOTAL GEMINI.""

"2634

~~((National Do Something Nice Day Special -- Page 4 of 24))~~

Qorvass shifted on Asad's shoulder. 'He's screwing with us.'

That seemed pretty clear to Asad, as well. But messing with them was better than killing them. He went to work on his response.

""THIS FRIEND WOULDN'T ALSO HAPPEN TO BE A MASS MURDERER, WOULD HE?""

""OH, SO YOU'VE MET HIM!""

""HE DIDN'T MAKE A VERY FAVORABLE IMPRESSION ON US.""

""COME NOW, THAT CAN'T BE TRUE! I'M SURE IT WAS JUST A MISUNDERSTANDING!""

Qorvass sighed. 'How long do you think you can keep this up for?'

Asad had no idea, quite frankly. And for all he knew, it might be an hour or more before Lamont finally got word and came to see what was happening for himself--assuming he would even show up at all, that was. Asad doubted that anyone, even Iceheart, would be very eager to face this particular monster.

And of course, Morgunov probably knew all of that and more. If he was willing to waste time toying with them like this, then he must have been supremely confident.

Or just totally insane. How strange that Asad might actually be hoping for that to be the case.

""WHAT WOULD IT TAKE TO CONVINCE YOU TO LEAVE SAIR ALONE?"" read Asad's next sign.

""OOOH! ARE YOU ASKING FOR A LIST OF DEMANDS?!""

""YES.""

""OKAY, OKAY! LET ME THINK FOR A MINUTE! I HAVEN'T MADE ONE IN A WHILE!""

And they found themselves waiting again. Asad tried to focus on his breathing and keeping his mind clear. His hand went to the Shards in his pocket unconsciously.

'Do you think there's any chance he would actually leave if we acquiesce to whatever ridiculous demands he is about to make?' said Asad.

'No,' said Qorvass. 'I've been following his career for hundreds of years now. Morgunov is the type to make us burn down our own home and then still rob the ashes afterwards.'

"2635

~~((National Do Something Nice Day Special -- Page 5 of 24))~~

When the next sign arrived, it was the largest yet, displaying an enormous wall of text.

""OKAY, SO HEAR ME OUT: I WANT AN ARASABA. Y'KNOW, ONE OF YOUR SUPER COOL LION-FAIRY-BEASTS? THAT WOULD MAKE ME SO HAPPY. AND ALSO, TEN BUCKETS OF YOUR BEST ICE CREAM. COOKIES 'N CREAM FLAVORED. I'VE HEARD YOU GUYS HAVE STARTED MAKING AMAZING ICE CREAM IN RECENT YEARS, BUT I'VE YET TO TRY IT. THIRDLY, I WANT TO PLAY WITH THE SUNSMITH'S FANCY NEW ARMOR. JUST FOR A BIT. I'LL GIVE IT BACK TO HIM, PROMISE. OH, AND BRING ME THE COUNTRY'S BIGGEST RUBBER BAND. FOR KEEPING, I MEAN. I WON'T BE GIVING THAT BACK. ALSO, BUILD ME A SAND CASTLE HERE IN THE DESERT. A REALLY BIG AND ELABORATE ONE. IT'S OKAY IF IT BLOWS AWAY IN THE WIND, THOUGH. I JUST WANT TO TAKE SOME PICTURES WITH IT FOR MY SCRAPBOOK.""

About halfway through, Asad began to wonder if he really needed to read it all. He kept his response short and sweet, not wanting to discourage further rambling. ""ANYTHING ELSE?""

""YES, BUT TELL ME WHAT YOU THINK OF THOSE, FIRST.""

Well, damn.

'He doesn't actually believe that arasaba are real, does he?' said Qorvass.

'Who knows?' said Asad. 'Maybe that's the point. To make impossible demands.'

'Challenge him on it,' said the reaper. 'Keep him talking.'

It was as good a plan as any other, Asad felt. ""ARASABA DO NOT EXIST,"" read his next sign.

""THAT'S WHAT SOMEONE WHO IS TRYING TO HIDE THEM FROM ME WOULD SAY.""

Asad honestly didn't know what to say to that. And as he was deliberating, another sign arrived.

""IF ALL OF THAT IS TOO UNREASONABLE, HOWEVER, THERE IS ONE OTHER THING THAT WILL SUFFICE.""

Ah. Was this where Morgunov steered the conversation back to Ivan?
""AND WHAT WOULD THAT BE?""

""YOU, ASAD NAJIR.""
"2636

~~((National Do Something Nice Day Special -- Page 6 of 24))~~

Asad froze up, eyes stuck wide after seeing those words. Was he seeing that right? Him? Morgunov was after him? What sense did--?

""So are we doin' this or what?"" came an unfamiliar voice in Asad's ear.

He didn't even think. He just reacted. Asad dove forward and spun around, launching a bladed disc of soul-strengthened quartz right where he had just been standing.

And indeed, the man was there. The Mad Demon. He caught the disc between gloved fingers as if it were no more dangerous than a frisbee.

The two scouts were scrambling back, trying to create distance while freeing and raising their weapons.

Morgunov just looked at them expectantly as their guns refused to fire, both seemingly jammed simultaneously.

There was no time to process it. Asad had to protect them, or they were dead. With all his concentration, he summoned a great prism of glass, blasting through the roof of the bunker with its explosive growth and carrying everyone with it.

He made the prism force the scouts away from him, propelling them both outward in the direction of Kuros. He couldn't be too forceful, of course, or else he would kill them before Morgunov could, but he could at least give them a head start on their journey back to headquarters.

Morgunov, in the meantime, disappeared. Asad was left searching frantically for where he had gone. Was this invisibility? It couldn't be with all the sensors around, could it?

""Peekaboo,"" came Morgunov's voice, again in Asad's ear.

Asad reacted the same way again, but this time, Morgunov caught him by the wrist and pulled him back toward him like he barely weighed anything.

He writhed within the Mad Demon's clutches, trying to summon his materialization again and failing almost entirely. Where should have appeared a flurry of glass spikes, only a miserable sputter of dust arrived instead."

"2637

~~((National Do Something Nice Day Special -- Page 7 of 24))~~

Morgunov was chuckling. ""Now, let's just calm down for a hot sec, shall we? Is it too much to ask for a nice little conversation before you try to kill me? That's quite rude, you know.""

'Hmph,' said Qorvass. 'Are you really going to pretend like you didn't want Asad to attack you? After popping up behind him like that?'

""Ah, Qorvass!"" said Morgunov with widening eyes and smile. ""How long has it been?! Decades?! Centuries?!""

What? Asad stopped struggling to listen.

'I wouldn't have minded if it were a bit longer,' said Qorvass.

""Oh, my feelings,"" said Morgunov.

And it was only now that Asad realized the Mad Demon was speaking with two voices.

""So what do you think?"" said Morgunov, not waiting for a response. ""Is it time for our plan to finally come to fruition? You've been undercover so long! You must be tired of pretending by now, right?! Come and join me again! We've missed your company!""

Asad's expression hardened as he tried not to react, but he still couldn't keep his gaze from trembling. He wanted to look at Qorvass, but the reaper was attached to his upper back.

For a time, no one said anything.

""I'm just messin' with ya,"" said Morgunov with a laugh. ""Qorvass didn't betray you. Scary thought, though, right? Never can be too sure of what the ol' reapers are really up to, can ya? Could just be a matter of time 'til he sells you out. Or everyone you've ever cared about.

D'you think that'd be worse? I think it might be. Tough to say, really. Depends on how selfish you are, I suppose. Deep down, y'know? So deep that you're afraid to even admit it to yourself, perhaps, hmm?"

'Are you done?' said Qorvass.

""Just a little food for thought,"" said Morgunov. ""As the senior servant here, it's my duty to impart the wisdom I've gained over the years to my juniors.""

'You're so full of shit.'

And the Mad Demon just cackled."

"2638

~~((National Do Something Nice Day Special -- Page 8 of 24))~~

'What is your interest in Asad?' said Qorvass.

""Eeheheh. Well, I did mention that I wanted an arasaba, didn't I?"" The emperor's silver gaze locked onto Asad with manic interest. ""The Lion of the Desert is pretty much the same thing, I'd say.""

'You want him as your pet? To what end?'

Rather than answering, however, the Mad Demon just kept staring.

Asad had never met Dozer or Morgunov before, but after all that he had been through in his life, all that he had seen and done, he had come to think that he was prepared for an encounter like this. Not in terms of power, of course, but in terms of mental fortitude. Psychologically.

He'd heard the tales. Of people meeting a hostile emperor. Of the overwhelming presence, full of palpable malice. He'd heard that many who experience it were forever changed, that weaker servants could just... break. Spiritually. They would simply give up. On trying. On growing. Or even on living. And their reapers would have little choice left but to release them.

He'd thought that, by now, he couldn't possibly be susceptible to a thing like that. Or that the tales were exaggerated, perhaps. There was no way that someone's presence alone could do such a thing, surely.

And yet now, with the Mad Demon holding him in place like a helpless child and staring straight into his soul, Asad Najir was made to doubt.

Those eyes. And that wild hair. Black speckled with gray, bobbing and swaying with the slightest movement of the madman's head, as if it were a living creature unto itself.

Asad's vision blurred and darkened around the edges. It felt like the entire world was shrinking around him. Like Morgunov was making it shrink.

And maybe he was.

In that moment, Asad felt as if no feat could possibly be out of this being's reach. Because this wasn't a man. This was a god taking the appearance of one."

"2639

~~((National Do Something Nice Day Special -- Page 9 of 24))~~

Dread crept through his mind like a spider. Breathing was becoming more difficult. And he could swear that the Mad Demon's face was beginning to take on the appearance of an actual demon. Twisting, distorting, silver eyes beginning to emit a harsh light.

It was too much. Far too much. He had to constantly remind himself that it couldn't be real. That it was an illusion. That Qorvass had warned him of something like this happening years ago.

It felt like that thin rope was his only tether to reality, the only connection between his waking mind and what was actually happening. Shivers coursed through his whole body as the temperature seemed to drop.

Where was he? Everything had gone dark, apart from Morgunov's giant form. He wondered if--

And then he was back. In the bunker.

It was still somewhat dark, but only due to the night, as it had been before. He could see again. And Morgunov looked human.

""Eheheh. Resilient. How fun."" The Mad Demon's smile hadn't changed, though. It seemed as if that might just be a constant of the universe.

""What was that?"" said Asad, out of breath. ""What did you do?""

""HMMMMMMMMMM..."" Morgunov touched his bare hand to Asad's face, as if inspecting him, then traced the shape of his bald head. ""These tattoos are interesting. They're adding to your resilience, aren't they? Where'd you get 'em?""

Asad didn't want to answer that.

'Stop this.' The reaper's voice sounded noticeably more shaken now. Before, he'd spoken to the emperor with surprising calmness. Familiarity, even. That was still there, to an extent, but Asad could sense a hint of desperation in his tone. 'Please.'

Morgunov chuckled. ""Don't worry, Qorvass. I'm just testing his limits. I won't break this one. I've gained so much more control since the last time.""

"2640

~~((National Do Something Nice Day Special -- Page 10 of 24))~~

Qorvass fell silent, but Asad had heard enough to know there was a horrible tale there that the reaper had never shared with him.

And perhaps Morgunov could tell what he was thinking. ""Eheh. Ol' Qorvy never told you about that, eh? Hmm, I can see why. Not the most comforting story in the world."" His nose twitched and he rubbed it. ""I almost feel like spilling the beans myself, but y'know what? That would be downright disrespectful of me, don't you think? So if anyone ever tells you that Morgunov is a disrespectful jerk, you go ahead and tell them that they're wrong. Got it?"" And he winked.

The crystal prism that Asad had previously summoned was still largely intact, and they were now suspended a dozen meters above the busted bunker below. Asad's thoughts went to the two scouts who'd escaped. It seemed like the warning about Morgunov's presence might not have made it through the radio, but if those two could get back to base, then that was something, at least.

""Hey."" Morgunov turned Asad's head back toward him. ""Watcha thinkin' about, hmm? You never answered my question about your tattoos, you know. That's quite rude. You're not distracted by something, are you?""

Asad just remained silent.

""Like, maybe, those two dudes you were with earlier? You're not worried about them, right? If so, then let me dispel all your concerns. They're just fine."" He released Asad's face and raised his hand. ""See?""

The great prism shook and bent as two figures came shooting up through the bottom of it and stopped right in front of Asad, suspended on squirming tendrils of clanking machinery.

And Asad's heart sank.

The two scouts were struggling, but it was obviously in vain. One of them was trying to say something through his faceguard, but a mechanical mask covered his face and muffled his words to the point of near silence."
"2641

~~((National Do Something Nice Day Special -- Page 11 of 24))~~

""Hush now,"" said Morgunov, frowning suddenly. Somehow, that expression was even more unsettling than his ever present smile. ""You haven't yet earned the right to speak, little ones. Behave yourself and you may yet live."" He paused. ""I mean, okay, you probably won't, honestly, but hey, it becomes a non-zero possibility, at least.""

The muted screaming ceased.

Morgunov's smile returned, and he eyed Asad again. ""That's better. Are you able to concentrate on what matters, now? I sure hope so. Wouldn't want you to miss out. You're the key, you know. I'm going to let you see all sorts of amazing things before our time together is concluded.""

Mechanical tendrils reached for Asad now, and he didn't even have the heart to fight them. With two hostages, no materialization, an emperor staring him in the face, he didn't really see much point in struggling.

And indeed, when he consulted Qorvass privately, the reaper affirmed as much.

The only positive was that Morgunov released the monstrous grip of his hand in order to let the machines take over.

""So tell me,"" the Mad Demon went on, ""where'd you get those tattoos?""

""...My mother gave them to me when I was young,"" he said.

""Ah, is that so? Neat! Those must've been quite the boon, eh? Kept you nice 'n safe, I bet. Is your ol' mama still around?""

""No.""

""Hmm, really? You're not lying to me now, are you? Lying is the tool of cowards, jerks, and swindlers, you know. You don't want to be one of those three, do you?""

""It's the truth,"" he said tiredly.

Morgunov eyed him intently for a long moment, bobbing his head from one side to another. ""Welp. Alrighty, then. Guess I believe you. So have you managed to speak to your Dry God yet?""

Asad thought he couldn't be surprised anymore, but that did it, and his eyes bulged.

Morgunov just waited quizzically for his response, though."
"2642

~~((National Do Something Nice Day Special -- Page 12 of 24))~~

Again, Asad did not wish to answer.

Morgunov pursed his lips like a duck. ""You're just gonna leave me hanging like that, huh? It's not that complicated. Simple yes or no answer. Either you've talked to him or you haven't. Oh! Or are you thinking that you shouldn't tell me because it's privileged information?! Yeah, that must be it, right? Well, not to worry, lad. There's nothing you could let slip about Rasalased that I don't already know. If anything, I could probably teach you a few things! But only if you're nice!"" And he was laughing again, because of course he was.

Qorvass answered for him. 'We have not met Rasalased yet, no.'

""Aha! I thought not! Somethin' aboutcha just gave off that sort of vibe, y'know? An aura of doubt and frustration and disappointment. Very pitiable, honestly."" He clapped a hand down on Asad's entangled shoulder. ""I feel for ya, homie. It's tough, trying to measure up to everyone's expectations, isn't it? But the thing you've gotta understand is, no one actually cares that much.""

Asad just returned a look of mild exasperation as the mechanical tentacles raised him up in midair, suspending him face-first in front of the Mad Demon.

""Mm, I can tell by your expression that you don't understand yet,"" said Morgunov. ""You're still caught up in all the little traps that people lay out for one another. The quiet tyrannies of 'expectation.' Of social responsibility and morality. You can't see how meaningless all that stuff actually is.""

Asad gave a muted sigh.

Morgunov snapped his fingers and began circling around Asad as he talked. ""But that's okay. I won't lecture you. Too much, eheheh. Youngins should be allowed to learn at their own pace. I'm sure you'll figure it all out on your own, eventually. If you survive your encounter with little ol' me, I mean. Eheheh, admittedly, that IS still a problem for you, right now. I'll be rootin' for you, though.""

"2643

~~((National Do Something Nice Day Special -- Page 13 of 24))~~

""But in any case, down to business. I think I know what your problem is. You're frustrated 'cause you can't talk to Rasalased, right? And that's understandable, because you've got a few years under your belt now, hmm? Still a child as far as I'm concerned, but you're not a baby anymore, at least. So you should probably know how to talk by now, right? Kids are s'posed to be able to talk. Only makes sense.

""And you think it's your fault, am I right? Like you're just too dumb to figure it out. Can't quite put your finger on what's wrong, can ya?

Hence the frustration! Boy, do I know that feeling! How many experiments have I had like that?! Oh, it's just the worst!" He spun around to face Asad again. "Good news, though, lad! It's actually NOT your fault! Or at least, I'm eighty percent sure that it's not! Which is pretty good, right? Quite favorable odds! Just don't blame me if it turns out I'm wrong. Twenty percent is still twenty percent, okay?"

Asad's mouth wasn't covered like the other two, and after listening to all this rambling, he was feeling bold enough to speak up. "What in the world are you talking about?"

Morgunov poked him in the forehead. "The tattoos, dear boy. If they were able to protect you from me crushing your spirit, then I'd say there's a fair chance that they are also 'protecting' you from Rasalased. By preventing you from even being able to communicate with him."

Asad blinked. That... couldn't be true, could it?

Morgunov snapped his fingers again. "And if that's the case, then the solution to your problem is obvious! Just remove the tattoos!"

"But... they can't BE removed..."

"Oh? Is that a challenge I hear?"

"2644

~~((National Do Something Nice Day Special -- Page 14 of 24))~~

"N-no, it's not," said Asad.

Qorvass spoke up again. 'He just meant that they grow back during regeneration. That's all.'

"Ah. Well, that shouldn't be a problem," said Morgunov.

Asad shut his eyes, trying not to imagine where this was leading. And failing. It already seemed quite obvious what torment awaited him. Was there anything he could do? Was there anything anyone could do?

Regret filled his mind. He hadn't felt this helpless in many years. If he'd realized sooner that things were going to end up this way, then he would have attacked the Mad Demon a lot more instead of giving up so quickly. Even with his materialization suppressed, there had to have been some way that he could have put up more of a fight.

The quartz prism shook and shifted again, and this time, it kept doing so, until Asad could feel the whole thing beginning to sink. He could see the horizon rise slowly in the distance.

""In any event, this is hardly the proper place to start flaying you alive,"" said Morgunov. ""Battlefields are for battle, not science and/or torture. Not to worry, though! I've got plenty of suitable locations in mind! Collecting laboratories and workshops has become something of a hobby of mine, you know. I haven't yet found one in Calthos that I like, though. Ooh, hey, do you know of one in Sair?""

Asad made no response.

""Now, now, there's no need to give me that look. No one likes a sore loser.""

Asad just hung his head and sighed.

""C'mon! You should be happy! I'm helping you out, after all! If I'm right, then you'll soon be able to contact your Dry God, you know! Isn't that cause for excitement?! I'm a swell guy, aren't I?!""
"2645

~~((National Do Something Nice Day Special -- Page 15 of 24))~~

'Why are you so interested in Rasalased?' said Qorvass.

""Hmm? Well, why wouldn't I be? He's a fascinating dude, isn't he?"" said Morgunov.

'You lie. You have some design for him. I know it.'

""Eheheh.""

'Hmph. You know something? I would quite like for you to meet him as well.'

The prism reached the ground again. The bunker was gone, too, leaving only empty sand behind. A nightly wind arrived, strong and biting cold, as was normal during the winter months in Uego.

Even that wind couldn't prevent the Mad Demon's piercing laughter from reaching Asad's ears, however. ""You think I wouldn't be able to handle him, huh?! To be honest, I'm kinda hoping that's the case, myself!""

Qorvass made no other response, nor did Asad.

Morgunov didn't move, though. His loud amusement settled, and he simply remained standing there before Asad, Qorvass, and the two others. He looked around, fiddled with something in his pocket, sniffed absently, and scratched his cheek.

Asad wanted to ask what he was doing, why he wasn't taking them back to the Abolish encampment, but he held his tongue. If Morgunov wanted to waste time, then so be it.

""...Ever get a feeling like you're a little too good at what you do?"" said Morgunov. ""Like you gotta slow down to let the rest of the world catch up, or else you just won't have as much fun playing with everyone?""

Asad just returned a flat expression.

Morgunov made a few popping noises with his mouth and swung his arms to and fro in front of him. ""Well. Maybe just a few more minutes. If none of 'em were able to figure me out, then I guess they only have themselves to blame, eh?""

What was the madman rambling about now, Asad wondered?"
"2646

~~((National Do Something Nice Day Special -- Page 16 of 24))~~

""Mm. I wonder if it's inattention or stupidity or just fear. Could be any or all of 'em, really. Maybe I should've left some hints. Bah, but I feel like that's just cheating, y'know? If someone wants to challenge me, then they shouldn't need me to give them a hand, right? Why should I have to be a worse version of myself just so they can stand a chance? It's unfair, I tell you! But I guess waiting like this is also kinda helping them out, so... Hmmmmmm. Ooh, maybe I should build an obstacle course for them! Or would that be too patronizing, you think?""

And the man just kept going, looking back and forth between Asad and the horizon, acting as if he was asking for Asad's opinion but never waiting to hear it before continuing.

At length, Asad began to wonder if the torture had already begun.

Then the Mad Demon fell suddenly silent, and his head snapped to the southeast. His already wide eyes seemed to grow even wider, and the delight on his face was obvious. ""Finally! A contestant!""

Asad turned to look as well, but he couldn't see or sense anything yet. The wind seemed to be picking up considerably, though.

""Ah, is that who I think it is?! What a brazen boy he's become! I hope he knows what he's doing! Eheheheh!""

The wind kept rising. And rising. And rising still more, until it began lifting up the sand and swirling it around them, blocking most of Asad's view of the sky.

Morgunov chopped the air horizontally with one hand, and the sandy whirlwind dispersed in an instant, torn apart by a fleet of tiny machines that had leapt out of the dunes below.

And they weren't alone, either. Morgunov motioned eastward with his hand, and a giant, snake-like machine launched out of the sand and sailed toward a distant figure in the sky there."

"2647

~~((National Do Something Nice Day Special -- Page 17 of 24))~~

The wind picked up suddenly again, and the mechanical snake veered off course. Instead of hitting the figure, it circled around it and then came sailing straight back toward Morgunov.

Morgunov barked a laugh, and the snake disassembled itself into a thousand tiny pieces. The parts scattered and rained down around the Mad Demon and his captives.

Asad could see some of the machine parts disintegrating into dust, too, before being swallowed by the desert.

""Parson Miles!"" shouted Morgunov. ""Get your butt down here and say hi! It's been too long! Let me get a look at ya!""

Asad blinked and strained to see. Captain General Parson Miles? The one behind the plot against the Rainlords? He couldn't truly be here, could he? He'd been removed from Sair on the Vanguard's own orders.

But as the figure slowly descended from the sky and as Morgunov raised a giant light bulb out of the sand to help illuminate the area, Asad saw that it really was him.

Asad had only met him a couple times, many years ago, but recent events had made him refresh his memory with all the pictures and documentation that the Sandlords had of the man.

Morgunov was cackling again. ""Wow! Still keeping yourself nice 'n young lookin', I see! How've you been?!"

Miles' long coat flapped wildly around his missing legs as he hovered there, apparently deciding that it was better to remain in the air. He was using pan-rozum, no doubt, and likely didn't plan on releasing it for as long as he was in Morgunov's presence. ""Oh, we've been better,"" he said quite calmly in two voices. ""This war of yours has been keeping us busy.""

""Of mine?"" said Morgunov. ""You're misinformed! I'm just lending Calthos a hand against the big, bad Vanguard! They wouldn't stand a chance against you jackbooted thugs otherwise, eheh! I mean, just look what you did to poor Sair!""

"2648

~~((National Do Something Nice Day Special -- Page 18 of 24))~~

""Yes, we're sure you have only the noblest of intentions,"" said Miles. ""We don't suppose there is anything we could say to convince you to leave this place, is there?""

""Lemme think! Hmm! Well, I suppose I do already have what I came for! There's no real reason I have to stick around!""

""It's a trap,"" said Asad. ""He was waiting for--"" A mechanical mask wrapped itself tightly around Asad's face.

Morgunov frowned, and the air grew abruptly heavier--so heavy in fact that it felt like gravity had increased, too. ""Tsk, tsk. I haven't been this disappointed in someone in many years, Mr. Lion. That was quite uncool of you, I must say.""

Miles just tilted his head, though. ""You don't honestly think that you were tricking us, do you?""

Morgunov's smile returned immediately. ""Well, I was hoping not, but you were a little slow getting here, so I didn't want to expect too much of you, either! And I just don't like it when people butt in on conversations that they aren't ready for. Really muddies the waters, y'know? And I hate muddy waters.""

""Unless you're the one doing the muddying.""

""Ooh, what could you possibly be referring to, I wonder? Probably some other thing you're misinformed about, I bet!""

Miles ignored that comment and threw a look around the area. ""You're very bold, coming out here without any backup.""

Rather than responding, however, Morgunov merely returned a wide, toothy grin. Then he changed the subject. ""What're you doing back in Sair, by the way? Last I checked, you were over in Jesbol. Shouldn't you be handling the conflict in Melmoore, right now? Would've been a much shorter trip for you.""

""You've been tracking our movements? We're honored that we warrant that much consideration.""

""Don't get too happy. It's only because you're usually joined at the hip with one of the marshals. Now answer my question. Did you happen to get a little 'tip' that I might be showing up here? From an old pal, perhaps?""

"2649

~~((National Do Something Nice Day Special -- Page 19 of 24))~~

Miles frowned deeply. ""Unfortunately, we cut ties with the old pal that you're thinking of a long time ago.""

""Yes, I heard something to that effect,"" said Morgunov. ""But then I thought, maybe that's just what you wily kiddies WANT me to believe!

To help keep Papa Morgunov off the scent, hmm?! While you're getting up to all sorts of sneaky business!"

"We would never presume that we could slip anything past you, of all people," said Miles.

"Flattery or sarcasm? Perhaps a bit of both? You're a walking contradiction, y'know that? Or a floating contradiction, in this case."

"Coming from you, we will take that as a compliment."

"Eheheh. So what're you hoping to achieve by showing up here all of a sudden and challenging me, hmm? Just the boring tactic of trying to buy time for your big, scary friends? Or do you actually think you can take me down all by your lonesome?"

"The former, I'm afraid."

"Aww! Booooo! Have some stones, man! Tell me I've seen my last sunset or something cool like that!"

"Heh, we don't see much point posturing in front of someone who can see right through us."

"Ooh, flattery again? Say, you're not tryin' to join Abolish, are you?"

"Afraid not."

"Pity. All in all, I thought you performed well during our clash at Bellvine. Struck the killing blow on me. Pretty impressive."

"You weren't exactly yourself, though, were you?"

"Eheh, what does it even mean to be oneself? Who knows? Maybe I was closer to my true self then than at any other point in my life!"

Miles' eyes narrowed a little, and he glanced at Asad before addressing Morgunov again. "You said... you already have what you came for?"

"I did say that, yes. Good listener."

"Your objective was to capture Asad Najir, then?"

"Hmm? Oh, is that who this is? Honestly, I just nabbed him 'cause I thought his tattoos looked cool!"

Miles bobbed his head. ""Considering who I'm talking to, that's actually somewhat believable...""

"2650

~~((National Do Something Nice Day Special -- Page 20 of 24))~~

""Of course it's believable,"" said Morgunov. ""You think I would ever be so morally bankrupt as to lie? If so, then I must say, I'm insulted.""

Miles made no response.

Morgunov just kept talking. ""Hey, where's your Titan at? If you knew I was going to be here, then you must've told him, right? Or do you really think that Iceheart will be enough to stop me?""

""Maybe you should wait around a bit longer and find out,"" said Miles.

And Morgunov paused, wide eyes stuck open--perhaps with contemplation, perhaps anticipation. Then he smiled broadly, of course. ""Eheh! If you think I came here unprepared to fight anyone less than Sermung himself, then I'm afraid you're going to be in for a rude awakening, my boy!""

It was Miles' turn to pause. He looked much more uncertain than Morgunov had, however.

""Feel lucky, Parson Miles,"" laughed the Mad Demon. ""I don't give out warnings like that very often. Usually, I just do stuff and sort out the consequences later. Eheh, or leave that part to other people!""

""People like us, you mean,"" said Miles.

""Mm, maybe.""

""Well, unfortunately, as much as I might like to turn around and leave you be, I don't think that would be a very wise move, right now.""

""Oho! And why not? I mean, I wasn't going to let you get away without playing with me a lot more first, but I'm still curious to know what kind of reasoning goes on in that sneaky little head of yours!""

Miles' expression tensed.

It seemed clear to Asad that Morgunov was still just screwing around in anticipation of others showing up. He could attack Miles at any moment, and Miles probably knew that--which was why the Vanguardian captain general didn't seem to mind letting this conversation drag on for however long the Mad Demon wanted it to.

""If you must know,"" said Miles, ""I have a number of reasons.""

""Do tell!""

"2651

~~((National Do Something Nice Day Special -- Page 21 of 24))~~

""Well, the first reason is simply because Sair is the gateway to Intar,"" said Miles. ""If the Vanguard allows you to take it, then you may well be able to drag another of the continental superpowers into the war.""

""Mmhmm, mmhmm,"" said Morgunov while bobbing his head. ""Bold of you to assume that I couldn't do that without conquering Sair first, but go on.""

That earned a pause from Miles before he continued. ""Secondly, you clearly have some plan for Asad Najir.""

""Oh, that's clear, is it? Why is that clear? You said it was believable when I said I just grabbed him for his tattoos, didn't you?"" Morgunov held a hand in front his mouth and gasped. ""Unless?! Don't tell me! You were lying when you told me that?!""

""We thought that much was obvious.""

""Eheh. Well, maybe. But you know what's REALLY obvious? This act of yours, pretending like you don't already know what I'm after. You're not concerned about Intar. You're concerned what I'll do with the power of a god at my fingertips.""

""What in the world are you talking about? The power of a god?""

""Ah, yes! Don't let the facade of ignorance slip! Maybe I'll believe you if you keep it up for long enough!""

""You really are a madman..."

""You're still in contact with the Liar of Lyste, aren't you? That's how you knew to come here. And why you're here alone. When you found out how urgent it was, you knew you didn't have time to wait for backup, hmm? Organizing a proper response to me would take quite a while, now wouldn't it?""

Miles was just frowning.

""I've got an idea!"" said Morgunov. ""I think I'll go pay the Liar a visit next! I wonder what interesting things I'll be able to learn from him!""

Still, Miles remained silent.

""And y'know! I bet it would be an even better meeting if you came along, too, Parson Miles!""

And the sand dunes all around them began to tremble."

"2652 -- CCXLI.

~~((National Do Something Nice Day Special -- Page 22 of 24))~~

Chapter Two Hundred Forty-One: 'The Calamity at Uego...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

As the machines began to appear, the mechanical tendrils that were keeping Asad in place started to move and shake with violent force. They were not just tendrils, he learned. They were connected to hulking figures beneath the sand--figures with so many different and moving parts that he scarcely knew what he was looking at.

And there were so many of them. Dozens, at least. Just one of them was holding onto him and the two scouts, while still having more tendrils and body parts to spare.

The noise they made was particularly unsettling. Given their size and shapes, they seemed like they should have been incredibly loud, making all sorts of clanking and whirring sounds.

But they weren't. They were quiet. Asad could only make out muted puffs and hisses, faint sliding noises, the light tapping of many small footsteps on sand, and the swiping sound through open air whenever their tentacles moved quickly.

These things hadn't been slapped together haphazardly. They were thoughtfully crafted--and deadly efficient, most probably.

Only two of them moved to engage Parson Miles, while the one holding Asad skittered closer to Morgunov, who was just watching with a big smile on his face.

Miles zoomed up into the air, leaving a sand-whipping twister beneath him for the approaching machines. They both got yanked off the ground and sent flying, and for a second, Asad thought that was it for them.

But it wasn't. Not at all.

Their appendages all retracted into their bodies, and they both became balls. Large jets appeared in place of their missing limbs, adjusting their trajectory to stay with the tornado and ride it up toward Miles.

And Miles must have noticed, because the tornado burst apart just as they were getting close to him, and they were both sent careening away.

Until their jets adjusted and they caught themselves, growing wings and propellers."
"2652 -- CCXLI.

~~((National Do Something Nice Day Special -- Page 22 of 24))~~

Chapter Two Hundred Forty-One: 'The Calamity at Uego...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

As the machines began to appear, the mechanical tendrils that were keeping Asad in place started to move and shake with violent force. They were not just tendrils, he learned. They were connected to hulking figures beneath the sand--figures with so many different and moving parts that he scarcely knew what he was looking at.

And there were so many of them. Dozens, at least. Just one of them was holding onto him and the two scouts, while still having more tendrils and body parts to spare.

The noise they made was particularly unsettling. Given their size and shapes, they seemed like they should have been incredibly loud, making all sorts of clanking and whirring sounds.

But they weren't. They were quiet. Asad could only make out muted puffs and hisses, faint sliding noises, the light tapping of many small footsteps on sand, and the swiping sound through open air whenever their tentacles moved quickly.

These things hadn't been slapped together haphazardly. They were thoughtfully crafted--and deadly efficient, most probably.

Only two of them moved to engage Parson Miles, while the one holding Asad skittered closer to Morgunov, who was just watching with a big smile on his face.

Miles zoomed up into the air, leaving a sand-whipping twister beneath him for the approaching machines. They both got yanked off the ground and sent flying, and for a second, Asad thought that was it for them.

But it wasn't. Not at all.

Their appendages all retracted into their bodies, and they both became balls. Large jets appeared in place of their missing limbs, adjusting their trajectory to stay with the tornado and ride it up toward Miles.

And Miles must have noticed, because the tornado burst apart just as they were getting close to him, and they were both sent careening away.

Until their jets adjusted and they caught themselves, growing wings and propellers."

"2653

~~((National Do Something Nice Day Special -- Page 23 of 24))~~

The machines zoomed after Miles, who in turn flew away, no doubt wanting to put more distance between him and them. A flurry of visible bursts of air surged out from Miles' hands, and the machines zigged and zagged between them.

Asad could hardly believe his eyes. Their mobility was absolutely absurd. The way they could react and dodge so quickly in midair--he'd never seen any machine do that, much less ones that seemed to be operating autonomously. Perhaps they had pilots flying them remotely. Asad found himself hoping that was the case, because the alternative meant that the Mad Demon was even further ahead technologically than he'd imagined.

The captain general was at least managing to stay ahead of the flying death machines, but he was clearly struggling. Finally, one of his air bursts connected, knocking a machine off course and sending it into the side of a dune, kicking up a giant cloud of sand.

Morgunov was still chuckling, though, and threw a glance Asad's way. ""Glad he's not making it too easy on 'em! They'll never improve, otherwise!""

Miles seemed to be turning the tables on the remaining machine, zipping around it and launching an even more furious surge of blasts at it, battering it around. Even if he wasn't quite landing a solid hit yet, it seemed like only a matter of time now.

But Asad could see the sand dune being disturbed again, and the machine that had been knocked down came blasting out of it, this time boasting a new adjustment.

A red flash cut through the night sky in an instant. A laser. Followed by several more, rapid fire. They nearly hit Miles, getting closer each time, until he noticed and began evading, which unfortunately meant that he had to stop attacking the one that he'd had on the ropes."

"2654

~~((National Do Something Nice Day Special -- Page 24 of 24))~~

Morgunov clicked his tongue. ""Hmm, I wonder if the targeting system is off because of that hit it took or if it just needs some more tweaking in general..."" He raised a hand, and two more machines leapt forth from the crowd surrounding him. ""Experiment time! Hooray!""

Now there were four robots going after Miles, all deploying jet propulsion and lasers. The sky began to light up with each bright red beam, and it wasn't long before the captain general was no longer able to avoid them.

A beam skewered him through the side and severed his right arm completely. The man went tumbling down toward the ground, seemingly trying to catch himself but only managing to angle and slow his descent. He still left a large cloud of sand behind when he landed.

The machines didn't let up, though. They dove into the screen of sand, and Asad could no longer tell what was happening. More wind arrived, turning the screen into a whirlwind, then a twister, then finally a full blown tornado.

Its massive funnel just kept growing in size, obliterating dunes left and right, tossing more and more sand in the air.

Then the tornado divided. Into two. Then into three. Then four.

Four tornadoes of equal size, whipping up winds so furious that Asad could see several of Morgunov's stationary robots beginning to rattle, struggling not to get pulled in.

And the winds only kept increasing. The nearby machines had to dig into the sand with their tendrils in order to remain where they were.

Morgunov, meanwhile, was just stroking his bare chin thoughtfully as he kept observing the scene with a smile.

The flying sand was so ferocious now that Asad could feel it pelting him and starting to activate his tattoos. The slight pressure and golden glow told him that these winds had enough power behind them to tear through a normal person, and his thoughts immediately went to the two scouts."

"2655

They did have protective gear on, so hopefully they would be fine, but he wanted to add a layer of quartz armor to them, just to be sure. To do that, though, he would need his materialization.

He tried again to summon it but nothing happened. His ability was still being suppressed by the Mad Demon's overwhelming soul power.

And with his movement completely neutralized, what else could be done? Nothing. He was powerless.

All he could think to do was beg.

""Morgunov!"" yelled Asad over the howling wind, drawing the madman's glance. ""Please! Don't let my men die in this storm!""

The man stared at him for a moment, perhaps thinking it over. ""Hmm! Now that you mention it, yeah! This is pretty callous of the noble Vanguardian over there, isn't it?! Let's see how he--!""

And he kept talking, but Asad wasn't able to hear him over the raging winds. The tornadoes were so close now, threatening to yank Morgunov's robots right out of the sand despite how dug in they were.

Then, amid the increasingly dense swirl of sand, Morgunov disappeared from Asad's view. He couldn't tell where or how he'd gone, just that he'd vanished. More of the machines began to disappear, too, and again, Asad couldn't tell how. Had they dug even deeper in? Or just been yanked into the air by Miles?

He could hear faint traces of screaming, cutting in and out between the sand-riddled winds. And to his horror, he realized that it was the scouts. He caught glimpses of them, of their gear being shredded, of blood flying.

They were dying.

And all he could do was watch.

Desperate, he and Qorvass activated pan-forma, hoping that it would allow him to materialize again. But it was in vain, as they both knew it would be."

"2656

Asad raged in place. He struggled, wanting to thrash his way to freedom, at least, but even with undead strength, the mechanical tendrils held him fast, preventing all but the smallest movements.

The thought occurred to him that they might be better off if Qorvass tried to use this opportunity to flee, while the Mad Demon was possibly too distracted.

But neither of them really believed that he would be able to slip away. Morgunov had more tricks up his sleeve, no doubt.

And indeed, they soon saw another one.

The hellish winds ceased.

All at once and without warning.

They just stopped. The four tornadoes each burst apart like popped balloons, and within seconds, there was no wind at all anymore.

Asad searched for some explanation, utterly confused until he saw Miles in the sky with a machine wrapped around him like a spider that had just caught a fly.

Or at least, it looked like Miles from this distance. It was made more confounding by the fact that Asad noticed another figure that could have been Miles, too. And then a third. And a fourth. He could only make out their vague shapes, but each one could have been the captain general.

Regardless, they'd all been caught, seemingly in unison. One machine each.

Morgunov, meanwhile, also reappeared in his view, on the ground. He was in the middle of where the four tornadoes had been just a few moments ago, and he was staring up at his captives. He crouched down briefly, then leapt up into the sky with enough force to explode the sand beneath him. The nearest robot released a captive just as the Mad Demon passed by and skewered the figure through the chest with his face.

And when the figure vanished, leaving no trace behind, Asad understood that Morgunov had just obliterated a clone made in pan-rozum. Morgunov landed on a distant dune with a booming thud, then leapt back up to do the same thing again, leaving only two."

"2657

As he watched with utter incredulity, it seemed entirely clear to Asad that Morgunov was still just having fun. The fact that he was jumping at the clones in midair--that seemed especially ridiculous. Asad obviously didn't know the full extent of the Mad Demon's powers, but given everything that he'd witnessed thus far, he had to imagine that the madman had some means of flying at his disposal. And yet he wasn't using it. He was just jumping.

Instead of destroying the third clone of Miles, however, Morgunov grabbed him by the head, palming it like a basketball while the clone's body ragdolled wildly around him. Perhaps the clone was flailing on purpose, struggling to counterattack in the midst of that absurd situation, but Asad couldn't tell; and it didn't take much longer for Morgunov to leap after the fourth and final clone, closing in at rocket speed.

Just as his flying robot let go of the fourth clone, the Mad Demon took the third in hand and quite literally dunked it down on top of the fourth. The impact between the clones was strong enough to send an audible shock wave through the air, and one of them was obliterated while the other got spiked into the ground with another sandy explosion.

Asad felt the reverberations from both hits and saw the sands all around them tremble, too.

Morgunov, meanwhile, was still up in the air, sitting on one of his hovering robots and laughing his head off. ""Is that one point for me or two?! Or maybe it should be four, since there were four of you?! Eheheheh!""

Dear merciful gods, Asad thought. This really was just one big game to him, wasn't it? He'd known that all along, but somehow, it was never more obvious than right now."

"2658

As the sand settled, the figure of Parson Miles stood back up. The man's bones were still visibly realigning as he glanced in Asad's direction with a haggard look on his face.

Morgunov crossed his legs as the machine he was sitting on descended slowly. ""So how much longer until one of your bosses shows up to play with me?!""

Miles tried to brush the sand off his coat and did not entirely succeed.

""Any minute now, I'm sure.""

""Ooh! Think you can last that long?!""

The captain general made no response.

Morgunov gave another laugh and snapped his fingers.

More mechanical tendrils burst out of the sand beneath Miles' feet. He leapt away with a surge of wind, but two of the tendrils still caught him around the upper leg. His whole bottom half vanished into thin air, and Miles nearly slipped free again until another robot came down on him from above and wrapped itself around him.

The tendrils reaffirmed their grasp on him, too, and Miles got pulled beneath the sand, disappearing entirely from Asad's view. More shock waves arrived as the desert itself began to quake and tremble.

An eternity seemed to pass while Asad waited and watched. Miles would pop out of the sand, thrashing and wrestling with two or more machines, only to be dragged back down again. And this just kept happening. Over and over. Until at length, Morgunov apparently grew bored of it and had the machines let the man go. They dropped him off in a battered heap in front of Asad and the small crowd of robots surrounding him.

Morgunov scratched his brow as he floated closer. ""Any minute now, you said?""

On all fours, Miles tried to say something but just spat up blood, instead. He was still struggling even to stand.

""Oh, what's the matter?"" said Morgunov. ""Problems with your regeneration?""

"2659

""W-what did you do to us?"" said Miles between hacking coughs. He tried to push himself up but wasn't able to.

""Me?"" said Morgunov. ""That's very presumptive of you! What makes you think I did something? Maybe you're just getting slow in your old age, eheh!""

Miles rolled onto his side, revealing a large gash in his back that didn't appear to be closing.

The Mad Demon hopped off his robot and landed next to Miles, tilting his head at him. ""Don't you think it's a little unfair to everyone else how we can just shrug off mortal injuries like they're no big deal? And then sleep off the pain and exhaustion later? How's a normal person supposed to live with peace of mind, knowing there are all these unkillable psychos out there in the world? And don't even get me started on hyper-states! Talk about scary!""

""What--what nonsense are you--?""

Morgunov squatted down and put a hand over Miles' mouth. ""Shh, shh. You should probably save your breath, right now. Don't worry. I'll talk enough for both of us!"" He motioned one of his robots over and then opened its chest cavity to retrieve something.

Black and red chains. Morgunov tossed them on top of Miles, then rolled him over with his foot until the Vanguardian was wrapped up. Morgunov fused the chains together with one hand and hoisted the squirming Miles over his shoulder like a sack of potatoes.

""Man, those bosses of yours sure are taking their sweet time, aren't they? You don't think they abandoned you, do ya? Buncha honorable and noble guys like them? No way, right? Yeah, they're probably just waiting until the absolute last possible second to jump in and rescue you! For maximum dramatic effect! That's what I'd do! I'm sure they're--""

And the Mad Demon paused, staring at the robot in front of him. It was emitting a low, repeating beep, and its eyes were flashing yellow.

""Ah, y'see? Looks like I was right!""

"2660

Morgunov clicked his tongue, and the robot in front of him crouched down, allowing two others to climb on top of it.

Then something else happened that Asad could hardly believe.

The three machines unfolded themselves in countless different ways, clanking and scraping against one another, until they reformed and became one, much larger robot.

Now it was the size of a van--and very bulbous looking, besides. Its ""head"" was still domed and bearing blinking ""eyes,"" just like all the other robots, but its body was so much larger. And judging from the way the other robots appeared to function, there was no telling what kind of mechanical tricks it might be concealing within its black-and-gray frame.

Its giant chest cavity opened up, and Morgunov tossed Miles inside. The chamber slid shut with a shunk, and the Mad Demon smiled again, waving the robot off. It responded by rocketing away from the ground and soaring into the night sky.

Then Morgunov turned to Asad. ""Enjoying the show?"" he said, motioning to more of the robots. ""Sorry, you probably shouldn't be here for the good part. For your own safety, you understand. Wouldn't want some emotional teenager to accidentally kill ya! You know how they can be, I'm sure.""

The machine that was holding him crouched down, too, and two more robots piled on. Just like the ones from before, they unfolded and began merging into a single machine--only this time, they did it while maintaining their grip on Asad. The inner chamber of the robot quickly formed all around him, until all light disappeared, and he was sealed inside.

--++--++--

Morgunov tingled with excitement as he watched the Robert Mk. III launching away with Asad Najir and Qorvass inside it. Not only were the packages secure, but things were finally about to kick off for the first time in a long time.

A long, long time."
"2661

He'd almost forgotten what it was like, this feeling just before a big fight--the kind of fight that he wasn't a hundred percent sure he could win.

There was a time when he hated this feeling. That was only normal, after all. The fear alone tended to overwhelm the inexperienced. The unenlightened.

Fear was the catalyst. The focal point. The most beautiful and fleeting feeling of all.

Even at his age, the effects of fear on the body were remarkable. The fight-or-flight response. Such a marvelous achievement of evolution. It deserved so much more appreciation than it ever received.

In many ways, that was Morgunov's greatest philosophical motivation for everything that he did. Every goal he chose to pursue in the world, every change he tried to bring out.

The spreading of fear. There was no greater teacher than fear. Everyone seemed to loathe it, but the more people who came to appreciate it, the better off this world would be. On that point, he held absolute conviction.

Perhaps one day, the world would come to understand that and commend his efforts.

Eheh. Okay, yeah, probably not. But it would definitely remember his efforts, at least. Maybe that would be enough.

At the moment, however, as he watched the Mk. III dwindling into the distance, the only thing on Morgunov's mind was who would appear next. Who would it be? Who had come to challenge him? Iceheart was the most likely candidate, of course, but he was hoping--

His head twitched as he sensed a surge of power in the distance. Something bolted across the sky. Not a person. Just a pocket of power moving at lightning speed.

It struck the Robert Mk. III with Asad in it.

Morgunov saw the distant explosion, then the Robert tumbling down into the sand.

And the Mad Demon's smile, the expression that normally came so easily to him, disappeared. His brow lowered, and he squinted.

This was another thing that had not happened in a very long time.

He felt irritated.

Genuine, unmitigated annoyance.

Whoever had just done that... they were about to have a bad day, Morgunov decided."

"2662

If he inspected the crash site later and discovered that Asad and Qorvass had just been killed because one of those damn marshals was too stupid to realize their own ally was inside the robot, then Morgunov was going to be a lot more than just annoyed.

He was going to be angry. And that was something he hadn't felt in an even longer time.

There wasn't much left in this world that could set him off, anymore. He'd learned long ago how to take things in stride, to just enjoy life. But one thing that he'd never quite been able get past was that special Vanguardian blend of hypocritical moralizing combined with utter incompetence. There was just something so keenly unbearable about that habit of theirs.

So if that mixture ended up being responsible for the premature conclusion of an experiment that he had very much been looking forward to, then Morgunov could already tell that he was gonna have to do something quite mean-spirited to the Vanguard before he would feel better.

For now, though, it was just irritation. If Asad was still alive, then everything would be fine. And with any luck, the Mk. III would keep possession of him.

In the meantime, he would have to deal with these challengers.

Yes. Multiple.

He could sense them now, in the distance. They were arriving in even larger numbers than he expected, and thanks to Bool's memory, most of their souls were familiar.

And it was quite a party. He recognized Lieutenant Generals Wes, Kehl, Harisson, and Vernon. From the rank of General, he noticed Lawrence, Min, Edward, Fremont, and Calvin. And from the Captain Generals, he spotted Jules, Eckard, Malinda, and Meris. Combined with Parson Miles, that was a sizable chunk of the Vanguard's top brass taking part in this operation.

They must've known who they were dealing with.

But of course, it wasn't the generals that he needed to worry about. Sure, they could become a problem if he let them, but it was those two at the front he needed to take seriously.

Lamont and Jackson. Together."

"2663

Still no Sermung, though. Frankly, a part of him was disappointed. All the preparations he'd made to face the Crystal Titan--they were a bit wasted, now. And moreover, it made him wonder where the ol' Sermu actually was, right now. Surely, there couldn't have been many things that demanded his attention more than the Mad Demon knocking on the door to Intar.

Oh well. Iceheart and the Star of the West would make for suitable replacements.

Unfortunately, these fellows were not like Parson Miles. They weren't going to just fly up to him and have a nice chat before everything went down.

No, these guys were the surly sort. Too serious by a half. Iceheart especially, though Jackson wasn't much better. Morgunov knew well in advance that they were just going to attack him without so much as a howdy-do.

Sermung wouldn't have been so rude. Unless he was in a bad mood, maybe. Which, come to think of it, he usually was whenever Morgunov met up with him.

Hmm.

Eh, that was probably a correlation not causation thing, right? Yeah.

Anyway, the first task would be to deal with the light-wielders. Those guys always tried to get a few cheap shots in before anyone else could. It was like they thought that just because they could attack at the speed of light--or near to it, at least--they were somehow entitled to drawing first blood.

The Roberts would be ruining their fun, however. That was one of the earliest tricks that he'd worked into their design: reversible mirrors. Their black frames could turn inside out, revealing a shiny inner coating.

They weren't all identical, though. Different wavelengths of light required different materials to be reflected. Glass for infrared, aluminum for UV, iridium for X-rays, and so on.

The best thing, though? Every Robert knew what to look for. They all tracked their opponents and singled out the ones they were strongest against, for maximum obnoxiousness. And efficiency, of course. But mostly obnoxiousness."

"2664

Already, the Roberts were doing their jobs, leaping in front of him to receive and bounce back attacks from the light-wielders--some of which were invisible to the naked eye without soul vision.

Technically, Morgunov didn't need them to do that for him. If he wanted, he could take those hits just fine and barely be slowed down. But it was more fun this way. He'd put a lot of work into the Roberts, so he liked seeing them do their thing.

There were thirty-eight of them currently surrounding him. That number would probably be good enough, he figured. As long as he kept the marshals busy himself, the only way the Roberts would struggle would be if one of the Vannie generals started to dramatically overperform.

But was that all he wanted? To be ""good enough?""

Of course not.

He didn't become the Mad Demon by settling for mediocrity. He did it by breaking his enemies' spirits.

He raised his hands, and more Roberts arose from the sands around him. In an instant, their numbers swelled to near a hundred.

They were all Mk. Is, the smallest and most mobile models. But of course, due to their ability to combine, they weren't JUST Mk. Is. With a snap of his fingers, they could reduce their numbers by half and become Mk. IIs, or to a third and become Mk. IIIs.

Each Mark increase meant a further loss of mobility but also a disproportionate improvement in firepower and durability. There were some weapons that couldn't even fit inside a single Mk. I or II. The Mk. IIIs were where things started to get really intense, and anything higher than Mk. V was still experimental.

A Mk. IV would be a good way to start things off, he decided. He waved four of the Mk. Is over and motioned to them. All he had to do was think about what he wanted, but he liked waving his hands. It made him feel like the conductor of an orchestra.

The four smacked together, unfolded themselves, and combined into the Mk. IV--a hulking beast of a machine, as big as a bus."
"2665

With so much space to work with, Morgunov had a lot of options to choose from. The Mk. IV's innards could be rearranged into a wide variety of different weapons, many of which he'd designed personally. The one that he currently had in mind, however, he actually didn't come up with. At least, not exactly. He did invent it, technically, but he only got the idea for it after watching what was otherwise a terribly made science-fiction movie.

The Anti-Air Scatterburst Particle Exciter, was one of his favorite creations of the last few decades. He hadn't used it in actual combat yet, but he'd gone through quite a long phase of testing during various field experiments.

The name hadn't really stuck, though--not even the acronym, ASPE. Instead, Jercash had started calling it the BSLG.

The Big Scary Lightning Gun.

Which, admittedly, Morgunov did like the sound of a little better. The sly boy had a way with names, dang him.

Technically, though, it wasn't quite ""lightning"" that it was shooting. It just kinda looked that way to the untrained eye. Really, it was just shooting a scattered group of ionic channels, through which were carried very powerful currents.

And the channels could be adjusted as desired, of course, but he had always found it best to lean into the ""scatterburst"" aspect of it.

The result, therefore, was a spray of lightning so massive that, for more than a few seconds, it could turn night into day.

Which was what he did now. He pointed the BSLG straight at the oncoming Vannies and let it rip.

And standing this close to it, without his passive soul defenses, he most certainly would've been rendered both blind and deaf instantaneously.

Fortunately, he was the Mad Demon.

So he just smiled with wide eyes, as if watching fireworks."

"2666

The bolts arced across the sky, filling the horizon and making the desert itself quake from the dozens of sonic booms going off simultaneously.

Needless to say, the attacks from the light-wielders came to an abrupt end. The lightning shredded their ranks, sending them in all different directions--a few of which were down toward the ground in charred heaps.

The dark of night returned as the afterimage of the bolts faded, but more light was already beginning to arrive--this time from the Vannies' end.

Specifically, from Jackson.

Morgunov didn't budge, though. He'd fought the Star of the West before, of course, but not for many years. He was curious what the fiery fella could do, what with all the gossip surrounding him. Some were even saying that he was on the level of an emperor now.

Wishful thinking, most likely. But heck, if it turned out to be true, then Morgunov would actually be quite pleased to welcome another member into the fold. There hadn't been a new emperor in over three hundred years. In fact, the last one to achieve that status was none other than himself. It would be nice not to be the new guy in the office, anymore.

Of course, there'd been many claims of new emperors over those three hundred years. Too many to count, quite frankly. And the Mad Demon had greatly enjoyed putting those claimants to the test. The other emperors rarely ever seemed to care about such things, but they were boring, so that wasn't too surprising. He was only too happy to serve as the ""gatekeeper"" for their little clique.

So when the horizon began to come alive with fire, Morgunov's smile only widened.

It was a bit like watching the sunrise. Only, he knew that the sun hated him and wanted to reduce him to ashes.

Then again, maybe that wasn't too different from the real sun."
"2667

Even at this distance, he could already feel the heat. And then he saw the tidal wave of white hot flame approaching, scorching whole dunes and melting them before even touching them. The bottom half of the wave plowed through the ground, splashing molten liquid into the air like a boat cutting through water.

Hmm. Not bad.

Not enough, though.

It would probably require two or three Mk. Vs to absorb so much heat, but they would need time to combine, first. Soul-infused, the attack would knock out dozens of Mk. Is if he waited.

So he'd have to deal with it himself.

He took a crouching step forward, launched away from the ground with an explosively powerful jump, clapped his hands together, and concentrated as he soared closer to the inferno.

Integration was not a well understood ability, even to this day. Over the course of his long life, most of the other integrators that Morgunov had met only had a solid grasp on the basic principles of it. Two materials being fused together. Learning new materials through the hyper-state of pan-wzrost.

But there was so much more.

The fusing process itself was fantastically complex, yet so easy to pull off that the youngins rarely ever gave it a second thought. With sufficient practice, the bonds between molecules or even atoms could be directly manipulated.

Admittedly, that wasn't easy, but it opened up a world of possibilities regarding energy transference--for example, in the instigation of both endothermic and exothermic reactions. Or in other words, the absorption and release of heat.

So this gargantuan wall of fire in front of him wasn't that big of a problem, really. Sure, it was a buttload of heat that needed to be absorbed, and sure, transferring all of it into something without causing that thing to violently explode was dangerous beyond measure.

But what was a battle without a little danger, eh?"

"2668

Fortunately, Morgunov knew a couple tricks when it came to transferring so much heat at once. Any normal material would be unable to withstand such an extreme and sudden spike in energy, but he had a very abnormal material on hand at all times.

His very own body.

Passive soul defenses combined with soul-strengthening went a long way toward preventing his body from instantly exploding. Plus, he didn't actually have to absorb all of it. He could simply transfer a huge portion of it straight into the ground, effectively turning the sandy desert into even more of a sea of molten glass than it already was.

But he pushed himself to his absolute limit, still. He wanted to take as much heat directly into his body as he possibly could--not because he needed to, per se, but mainly because he wanted to throw it all back in the Vannies' faces.

He ended up bursting into flames. Literally, the heat caused most of his clothes to catch on fire. It was a bit painful, but the discomfort from the heat raging through every cell of his entire body was much more noticeable.

He had experience with this, though, having been set on fire many times before. That was why he always made sure to wear fire-retardant pants and undies. Too many times, he'd been caught butt naked during an experiment or a battle or a battle experiment. So it wasn't too agonizing or distracting for him.

The flamey boy would have to do a lot better than this to make him flinch.

He sent a good eighty percent of the tidal wave's heat right back at them, while still allowing some of it to remain with him just because fighting while on fire was also kinda cool.

And now, apparently, it was Iceheart's turn to step up."
"2669

The rebounding wave of heat curved suddenly upward and kept going, where it would eventually vent off into space.

Then came a fleet of deadly javelins--though not the kind any normal person would be able to see. These were invisible, having no solid form, instead being made purely from the absence of heat. Localized bodies of absolute zero--or near enough to it, at least. And packed with soul-infusion for extra oomph, of course.

Therefore, without soul or thermal vision, they were impossible to detect. Fast moving, stealthy, and capable of ceasing all atomic movement on impact, they were truly the weapons of a cold and callous monster like Iceheart.

Against someone else, they might've ended the battle right then and there.

Instead, he made them all but disappear by rapidly bringing them into equilibrium--like icy bullets melting as they traveled through warm water. And when they were close enough to hit him, he didn't even have to dodge, as they just splashed against him, no stronger than a brisk gust of wind.

Which was actually kind of pleasant, after how much he'd just been sweating.

Eheh. What a silly matchup.

Lamont and Jackson could each affect thermodynamics in their own way, so together, their mastery over it equaled--or perhaps even exceeded--his own. Morgunov was already getting the feeling that this would become a stalemate if he didn't hit them with something else.

Thermodynamic manipulation was a tough opponent to deal with, though. Such abilities were a threat to the stabilization of any system, small or large. To effectively fight against that, he would require some very specialized tools and tactics.

Of which, he had many. He would need some Mk. Vs for this.

And thankfully, after the time he bought for them, several were now ready for action."

"2670

Compared to the Mk. IVs, the Mk. Vs might not have seemed all that different. They were a bit bigger, sure, but the Mk. IVs were still pretty huge. The color scheme was the same. The Mk. Vs had all the Mk. IVs' weapons. They had the same beady, glowing eyes on their little, domed heads.

Really, there was only one major feature that set them apart.

But what a feature it was.

The Cage System.

Of all his brainchildren, the Cage System was near the top. He'd come up with it when trying to think of how best to take advantage of all the extra space in the Mk. V's torso. It seemed a waste to just cram more weapons in there--though he'd ended up doing that, too, of course.

The Cage System was designed to capture targets of an extremely high threat level. In fact, it was one of the ways in which he planned to catch himself a pet god. He wasn't yet sure if it would actually work, of course, since he'd never had any suitable test subjects for it--other than feldeaths, perhaps, but he didn't want to count those annoying jerks.

Lamont and Jackson, though?

They were looking quite suitable, indeed.

He set all four of the freshly combined Robert Mk. Vs to target them as they drew close. But targeting didn't mean engaging them directly. Instead, the Mk. Vs cloaked themselves with Invisibility. For now, their only goal was to position themselves and bide their time.

The marshals, meanwhile, were hoping to keep him pressured and focused on the two of them so that he couldn't obliterate their little buddies--which was a wise strategy, because he very much wanted to do that."

"2671

The Vannie generals--the ones that weren't already smoldering on the ground, at least--were trying to interfere again. He knew they were just going to utilize hit-and-run tactics against him while leaving the real bulk of the fighting to Lamont and Jackson, but unfortunately, they were still at a level of power such that he couldn't simply ignore them.

If the generals' attacks landed at just the wrong moment, or if they devoted all of their power into a single blow, then they might be able to damage him significantly--which would then set the marshals up for a truly life-threatening attack.

Even for him, that was a lot to keep track of, which was where his modest army of Roberts was meant to come in.

Somehow, though, he'd almost forgotten that he didn't just have the Roberts at his disposal. He had a few kiddies on his side, too, didn't he?

The Man of Crows had slipped into the fleet of Roberts so stealthily that Morgunov barely even noticed. When had he even arrived? What a sneaky boy, eheh. He felt a surge of pride in the lad.

The result, in any case, was chaos.

Glorious, glorious chaos.

The Vannies and the Roberts crashed into one another in midair, destroying what little sense of rank and order had remained. The desert immediately below them was already unrecognizable. Jackson's attack had melted it; Morgunov's counter had turned it into a bubbling cauldron; and now, the countless explosions, lasers, lightning strikes, blasts of radiation, and more were only compounding the matter further.

Not to mention, the soul-infusion making every attack more potent.

A black haze was beginning to form, a ruinous smoke that threatened to fill the area if not for the constant barrage of attacks pushing it around."

"2672

Lamont and Jackson were sticking to him like glue, both in the air and on the ground, following him wherever he leapt, even when he hopped atop Roberts or their own generals. Their wispy, amorphous bodies barely seemed human anymore as they had both become the very essence of cold and hot, respectively.

They swirled around him like twin ghosts, smothering him with innumerable blades of frost and flame. Waves of heat or its absence tried to pummel him constantly, to throw him off balance. And hands appeared from thin air, trying to grasp and grapple with him, to prevent his movement so that any other attacks might land.

This was a deadly dance, the Mad Demon knew--and a bit unfair, considering how many hands were flying his way. They were only supposed to have four between them, but he was counting upwards of twenty. If he actually bothered to deflect them all, he might've been in trouble.

Half or more were mirages, though--illusions conjured by heat and pan-rozum, meant only to distract. Some were more effective than others, but he could usually tell the real from the fake.

The auras tended to give it away. Theirs, as well as his own.

So when he was able to grab Lamont's wrist and yank him closer to clutch his neck, Morgunov wasn't sure why the man looked so surprised on his icy face. Had he thought he would be able to slip away again like a cold breath of air? Just because pan-rozum was normally able to wriggle free of soul-infused hands?

No, no, no, eheheh. Not with this particular glove on. Lamont was probably feeling its soul-weakening effects already.

His back was now turned to Jackson, and he could sense that the flamey boy was gearing up for another doozy of an attack. Probably something more concentrated--and therefore, more deadly--than that tidal wave had been.

Yeah, probably didn't want to mess with that. Now seemed like a good time for the Mk. Vs to decloak."

"2673

There were a few reasons why he didn't let the Roberts use their Invisibility more frequently. The first was simply that, usually, the entire point of deploying them was to have them take some of the enemy's attention away from him--which they couldn't exactly do if no one could see them.

The second reason was that there weren't enough Invisibility-inducing aberration items to go around. Most them were already in use by his boys. He could've simply ordered them to hand them over to him, of course, but he felt like they needed them more than the Roberts did, honestly.

And the third reason was that Invisibility made it impossible for the Roberts to communicate with one another, unless they were all utilizing the same invisible ""umbrella,"" as it were. And the Invisibility items tended to have a very limited range, so if he wanted the Roberts to operate invisibly, he had to sacrifice either mobility or teamwork--both of which were the Mk. Is strongest attributes.

That was much less of an issue for the Mk. Vs. Their mobility was already greatly diminished, and they were powerful enough that they didn't need to work together. Not to mention, Invisibility complemented the Cage System oh-so-nicely.

When one of them sprung up behind Jackson in midair, Morgunov had to twist around to see the man's face.

That was perhaps his guiltiest pleasure of all. He loved to see that look of sudden realization. Of shock. And the haughtier the person, the more satisfying it was.

Eheh. It didn't get much haughtier than a marshal. They were just brimming with that sense of superiority and self-righteousness.

In the moment, the Mk. V's giant torso was like the open mouth of a dragon as it closed in.

The Star of the West reacted too late, and the surge of flames that came pouring out of him in all direction disappeared behind a wall of black and silver."

"2674

There was little doubt in Morgunov's mind that Jackson had more than enough raw power at his disposal to tear the Robert Mk. Vs to shreds.

But it wasn't just about strength.

That was the beauty of the Cage System.

Over the many long years of having Ivan as his subordinate/unwilling test subject, Morgunov had learned a thing or two about suppressing servant abilities. The Salesman of Death was arguably the best at that, after all--or at least, he was, until a few years ago when Morgunov perfected the Mk. V design.

The truth was, there were actually a number of different ways to suppress a servant's power. The first was oppressive field density, but of course, that didn't work on servants with powerful enough passive soul defenses. On the surface, at least.

The second was brain freeze. Preventing the servant from thinking prevented them from activating their power in the first place. And naturally, slowing down their thought processes also had deleterious effects on ability usage.

The third was the destruction of the physical body. The power stemmed from the brain, of course, but without a conduit through which to flow, the servant's power was like electricity stuck in a battery. Useless. Plus, bodily destruction served as a great distraction when trying to overwhelm someone. Most people weren't able to concentrate very well while under the realization that their body was being attacked. That was why servants often trained themselves psychologically to improve concentration and why reapers tried to nullify signals from the brain that might prematurely tell it to shut down--but those tactics had their limitations.

Especially if the bodily destruction was designed to be particularly horrific.

The fourth method, seemingly, was Ivan's power. Alteration of the weak force--the bonds between subatomic particles.

Morgunov had learned, however, that Ivan's power was not uniquely special in this way. Ivan's ability allowed him to ""suppress"" the body as a conduit by distorting energy transfer between atoms. While he wasn't ""destroying"" the body, exactly, he was still preventing its normal function by numbing it to the extreme.

Therefore, any power that could accomplish the same feat could achieve the same result.

Morgunov had been very pleased to learn that."
"2675

The Cage System, therefore, employed every single one of those tactics. There was no sense in picking and choosing when he didn't have to, he'd always thought.

As soon as the Mk. V's walls slid shut, the inner chamber was supercooled, filled with weaponized hallucinogens, bombarded with various radiations, diced up with saw-toothed blades, and sprayed with flesh-eating microbes--all of which were permanently infused with his very own soul, of course.

Oh, and there was one other little trick thrown in there. Little being the operative word.

Teeny, tiny machines.

But those were one of Papa's most special-est of secrets, eheh. Even Bool didn't know about those nanoscopic beauties.

And it wasn't for a lack of effort, either.

Whenever they entered pan-rozum together, he could tell that the reaper wanted to uncover all of his juicy secrets. Because of course he did. Morgunov didn't blame him. If their positions were reversed, he would've been the same way.

But he'd learned long, long ago that reapers weren't nearly as wise or powerful as they all liked to believe they were.

Morgunov was at a point now where pan-rozum was less of a fusion of two souls and more of a... subjugation of one over the other. Bool was just along for the ride now, and Morgunov could tell that he didn't entirely love it. If not for the massive benefits afforded by their militant endeavors, the reaper probably would've never done it again.

Bool was but a plaything in his hand. More so than ever before. He'd seen the entirety of the reaper's soul, all the complexity of it, all the quaint simplicity of it, the admirable parts, the ugly parts.

Still hadn't found that sense of humor, though. Hmm. Had to be in there somewhere."

"2676

The rest of the Vannies were clearly upset by what they were witnessing, but the Roberts and Crowe were giving them plenty to think about. Oh, and were there a few more of his boys here now, too?

Eheh. Adorable.

Iceheart was struggling quite hard in his grip, trying to freeze him, slow his mind down maybe. And frankly, Morgunov was feeling pretty chilly. At this rate, his teeth might start chattering soon.

But again, his integration-based mastery over heat transference made this quite manageable. He wanted to warm Iceheart up and maybe thaw his frozen face out a bit, but alas, it wasn't to be. Iceheart specialized in that, after all. Would've been pretty embarrassing if he couldn't even maintain his own iciness, eheh.

It was interesting how he managed to prevent his own brain from freezing, though, wasn't it? Morgunov had been curious about that for years now, actually. Mm, yeah, Lamont would make for a great test subject, too. Another Mk. V decloaked, and Morgunov was about ready to toss him in.

But the Mk. V that contained Jackson was shaking pretty violently, now. That was actually another tactic of the Cage System--rattling the subject inside to help disorient them. The more confused they were, the better.

The shaking was too violent, though. That wasn't normal.

And he could feel the heat leaking out, too.

Well, poop.

He flung Iceheart into his own Mk. V and spun around just in time to see the first Mk. V glowing white hot. Its metallic body was distorting and bending, on the verge of combusting.

Morgunov put his hand forward, trying some last second heat transference to help the Mk. V survive, but it was too late.

The machine erupted like a volcano, and Jackson came flying out.

Morgunov frowned. The Mk. Vs could repair themselves quite extensively, but this? A bunch of half-molten scrap? Yeah, that was pretty unlikely--though, he did spot a few parts still wriggling here and there, trying their best.

Agh, he loved the Roberts so much."
"2677 -- CCXLII.

Jackson was free again, but he didn't seem to be doing too well. Morgunov was just waiting for him to launch another attack, but the poor fellow was flying around all haphazard-like, tumbling through the air and zigzagging for no apparent reason.

Despite being destroyed, it looked like the Mk. V's Cage System had still done a number on him.

Morgunov felt a swell of pride in his mechanical child and wiped away an imaginary tear as he snickered to himself.

Abruptly, a group of Vannie generals were flanking him, getting close enough to draw his glance. Some heavy materialization bombardments flew his way, and for a split second, he thought he might actually have to deal with them personally.

But then a troop of Mk. IIs rolled through them like bowling pins and started splitting off to go capture their scattered remnants.

Honestly, he was starting to feel a little bad. This was his first time deploying the Roberts in real combat, but they were exceeding his expectations by a substantial margin. If the enemy didn't get its act together soon, this whole battle might come to a disappointingly swift conclusion.

Hmm, maybe the Vannies just needed a little encouragement.

""Eheheh! C'mon, fellas! Don't tell me you're finished, already! It's been so long since I fought you guys! I've still got so many new tricks I wanna show ya!""

That was encouraging, right? Yeah, he was pretty sure it was.

Chapter Two Hundred Forty-Two: 'The forest's reflection...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector talked to the Queen over the phone again. As the reapers had predicted, she at least sounded understanding of his decision to take the land offer from the Lorentians. He of course made sure to explain that he'd found a very valuable artifact on the land and that it wasn't his intention to slight her or the Atreyan government in any way.

Whether or not she was actually cool with it, only time would tell, he felt."

"2677 -- CCXLII.

Jackson was free again, but he didn't seem to be doing too well. Morgunov was just waiting for him to launch another attack, but the poor fellow was flying around all haphazard-like, tumbling through the air and zigzagging for no apparent reason.

Despite being destroyed, it looked like the Mk. V's Cage System had still done a number on him.

Morgunov felt a swell of pride in his mechanical child and wiped away an imaginary tear as he snickered to himself.

Abruptly, a group of Vannie generals were flanking him, getting close enough to draw his glance. Some heavy materialization bombardments flew his way, and for a split second, he thought he might actually have to deal with them personally.

But then a troop of Mk. IIs rolled through them like bowling pins and started splitting off to go capture their scattered remnants.

Honestly, he was starting to feel a little bad. This was his first time deploying the Roberts in real combat, but they were exceeding his expectations by a substantial margin. If the enemy didn't get its act together soon, this whole battle might come to a disappointingly swift conclusion.

Hmm, maybe the Vannies just needed a little encouragement.

""Eheheh! C'mon, fellas! Don't tell me you're finished, already! It's been so long since I fought you guys! I've still got so many new tricks I wanna show ya!""

That was encouraging, right? Yeah, he was pretty sure it was.

Chapter Two Hundred Forty-Two: 'The forest's reflection...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector talked to the Queen over the phone again. As the reapers had predicted, she at least sounded understanding of his decision to take the land offer from the Lorentians. He of course made sure to explain that he'd found a very valuable artifact on the land and that it wasn't his intention to slight her or the Atreyan government in any way.

Whether or not she was actually cool with it, only time would tell, he felt."

"2678

His stay in Lorent had ended up being extended yet again, as the Lorentians wanted a few more days with him to go over various things in order to finalize the deal. Unfortunately, it wasn't quite as simple as just signing his name on a dotted line or being handed a land deed. He had meetings with a number of leading figures from the lower Jagwa territory, including mayors, secretaries, real estate CEOs, and bankers.

Those latter ones were decidedly less hospitable than the others. While everyone else seemed pleased to work with the famous ""hero"" from Atreya, the bankers acted like they didn't even want to be in the same room with him.

Hector wasn't exactly surprised, but still. They could've been a little more polite about it.

""Yes, they are a bit of a surly bunch, aren't they?"" said Ravi Zaman as they were having dinner together again. ""Not that I can entirely blame them. Your Darksteel National Bank may still be an Atreyan operation at the moment, but would I be incorrect in assuming that you intend to expand into Lorent?""

Hector tilted his head as he slipped a chunk of grilled salmon into his mouth. This wasn't the first time that particular question had popped up over the last few days. Far from it, in fact. It seemed like every businessperson he talked to wanted to know his answer to that, even when it wasn't relevant to the land deal that was supposedly the purpose of their meetings.

And he'd already talked to Amelia Carthrace about it, too. And Garovel, of course.

The Bank only had been meant for Atreya--hence the word ""National"" in the name. Not to mention, the primary objective of the Bank was to prevent Atreya from being flooded with foreign money and losing financial independence."

"2679

And yet now, it seemed like the Bank itself might become another avenue through which foreign money might arrive in Atreya.

That was a big point of concern for him--and for Madame Carthrace, though she seemed to think that there were preventative measures that could be taken.

Hector still felt quite a bit out of his depth on this one. But if it really was true that expansion into Lorent could be conducted safely, then... well, that was a lot of money on the table.

Moreover, he'd been learning in his conversations with Amelia that, while the Bank was doing well in terms of both customer growth and stabilization of the national economy, the Bank itself still wasn't making much of a profit yet.

Part of the problem, she said, were old governmental regulations that were specifically designed to limit the growth of banks. There were several she'd mentioned, but the one she took particular issue with was the law that forced newly formed banks to keep up to two hundred thousand troa in ""reserve"" for every customer they took on.

According to Amelia, the reason this was such a problem was because ""reserve,"" in this case, was a legally binding term that meant the Bank could not invest that money into anything else--which severely limited the profitability of their entire operation. Therefore, the only way to recoup their costs was to burden their customers with some rather hefty service fees.

Right now, because of all the uncertainty in the economy and abroad, their customers were putting up with it--presumably for the sense of security that the Bank provided--but Amelia believed that it was only a matter of time before this began to threaten the Bank more dramatically.

For a while now, she had been trying to convince the Queen to repeal some of these regulations. In the beginning, she had thought that it wouldn't be an issue, due to their good relationship with her and the rather extreme state of financial affairs facing the nation.

But apparently, it was an issue."

"2680

After reading up a little more on the laws in question, Hector learned that they had originated about sixty years ago, after a series of new banks had collapsed, all within two years of each other. It turned out to be an elaborate scheme to ""store"" people's money and ""invest"" it in legitimate-seeming companies; and then when those companies declared bankruptcy, the investing banks would follow suit, ridding themselves of any responsibility to pay back their customers.

Tens of thousands of Atreyan citizens had lost their life savings, and millions of troa had essentially been stolen without hard evidence of any legal wrongdoing, because the bank owners supposedly didn't have access to the money, anymore. It had been ""lost"" in some tragic fire--or similarly destructive accident--that had befallen one of the companies that they had invested in.

It was widely believed that the money had really been used to buy huge volumes of products that were illegal or otherwise lacking a paper trail, in order to avoid the attentive gaze of auditors and insurance companies.

Multiple attempts had been made to find the culprits over the years, but they never resurfaced, probably for fear of facing the wrath of the newly crowned King Martinus. Even if they had technically not broken any laws, the King had made his displeasure over the situation quite widely known, and it would've certainly been within his power to change the laws retroactively just to punish the involved parties. The public probably would've been on his side, too.

When he'd read about all that, Hector had gained a modicum of appreciation for the regulations--or what they had been attempting to accomplish, at least.

It still seemed clear to him that the problems facing the nation now trumped any concerns over something like that happening again, but according to the Madame Cathrace, Queen Helen wasn't quite in agreement on that point. Or at least, not yet."

"2681

The Queen seemed to think that it was ""not the right time"" to remove those regulations--which implied, at least, that she intended to remove them in the future.

But Amelia was apparently starting to think that perhaps the Queen liked the current situation just fine. The economy was still recovering, after all. The Bank would continue to help with that, even if its profit margins were minimized.

Or in other words, perhaps the Queen simply didn't want the Darksteel National Bank growing too powerful.

When Hector had heard the Madame Carthrace float that idea to him, he hadn't been sure what to think. And now that he'd had a few days to let it stew in his mind, he was uncomfortable with how much sense it made. He didn't want to imagine that Queen Helen was being so mistrustful of his intentions or that she might care more about some political power game than about the hundreds of thousands of Atreysans who were still struggling financially, right now.

There must've been more to her reasoning than what Amelia had inferred. There must've been.

But if Amelia was right, then that would mean the Queen had been thinking this way for months now--not just as a result of this business with Lorent. And if that was the case, then he had even more reason to think that she was displeased by his land acquisition.

He honestly didn't know what he would do if his relationship with the Queen ever truly soured. She was one of the people he trusted most, out of everyone he'd ever met. The notion that she might start working against him? He didn't even want to humor that possibility.

And yet, here he now was, doing exactly that.

Because if Atreya wouldn't lift its regulations on the Bank, then... wasn't that even more motivation to expand their operations into Lorent? Where the rules might be more lenient?"

"2682

Hector had his own investors to think of, too. Meeting with all those Atreyan lords, asking for their financial backing--if he didn't start turning a profit soon, they wouldn't be very happy with him.

Not to mention, his own friends had helped him out, too. Roman had just fucking GIVEN him ten million troa. If that wasn't the ultimate bro-move, then Hector didn't know what was.

And of course, the Rainlords had put their faith in him, as well.

The last thing he wanted was to let all that trust and generosity go unrewarded. Honestly, he was still a little shocked that they had decided to invest any money in him to begin with, much less twenty-five million troa. Sure, they hadn't seemed very pleased by the idea when he and Garovel had asked for their help, but that number spoke for itself.

Their faith in him was... well, it was mind boggling, quite frankly. Heck, he felt like the Rainlords probably wouldn't even get that mad at him if he couldn't deliver.

Yet somehow, imagining that outcome made him feel even worse.

Like he'd be kicking them when they were down. After all they had been through, the last thing they needed now was to take a huge financial hit because of his incompetence.

And so, with all of that in mind, Hector decided to just keep on chewing his salmon. It was perfectly cooked and melted in his mouth, but he kept chewing it for a while longer, anyway.

Ravi's question--of whether or not he intended to expand into Lorent--was not something that Hector wanted to answer, right now. Giving voice to his thoughts didn't feel like the smart move here.

Even if he'd pretty much made up his mind, already.

Ravi might have grown on him a bit in the past few days, but Hector wasn't so comfortable with the guy as to tell him things that he hadn't even finished discussing with Garovel and Amelia yet."

"2683

After persistent silence, Ravi seemed to understand that Hector wasn't going to answer him and decided to change the subject. ""Have you heard about the developments in Hoss?""

Hector shook his head.

""Apparently, Jercash has been causing the Vanguard no end of difficulty up there,"" said Ravi. ""They've had to deploy three separate marshals in order to contain him, and even then, he's still proving problematic for them.""

""...Is that the kind of intel that you should be sharing with me?"" said Hector.

The man gave a dismissive shrug. ""Why wouldn't it be? You're not with the Vanguard, are you?""

Hector breathed half a laugh. ""So your superiors wouldn't be upset if they found out what you just said to me?""

Ravi's smile was a mischievous one. ""Mm, that would depend on which superiors you're talking about, I imagine. Just don't mention it to anyone outside the Freeman Fellowship--unless you secretly hate me, which I sincerely hope is not the case.""

""I won't,"" said Hector with another small laugh.

Ravi had a way of making people like him. That much was obvious by now--and not just because of his own interactions with him, either. Nearly everyone the guy spoke to seemed to be exceptionally courteous or otherwise pleased to see him. Doormen, waitresses, receptionists, janitors, cooks, staff members working for other politicians--it didn't seem to matter who they were or what they did. They all liked him. Hell, even when he and Hector ventured out onto the town for lunch, random passersby would stop and say hello with big smiles on their faces or little anecdotes to share about their lives, as if speaking to an old friend.

Of course, a lot of them also stopped to stare or greet Hector, wanting to get a picture with him, but that was beside the point."

"2684

It was simply impressive, Hector thought. Ravi might not have been a Lorent native, but Riverton P.J. certainly didn't seem to mind having him around.

Hector felt like he could learn a few things just by observing this guy, the way he conducted himself. Maybe such natural charisma wasn't possible to replicate, but there had to be some technique involved, he figured. He had wondered if maybe just asking him about directly was a good idea. Would Ravi be willing to share some of his social wisdom?

Probably. The dude seemed pretty damn agreeable about most things. Man, if the rest of the Freeman Fellowship was like Ravi, then Hector wouldn't mind meeting more of its members.

...And yet.

Despite his growing affection for Ravi Zaman, a part of Hector was very discomforted by him. This was the man's job, after all--to make people like him. Just because he was good at his job didn't mean he was good as a person. When it came down to it, Hector still barely even knew that guy.

And perhaps most of all, Rasalased's words were lingering in Hector's mind.

""Be wary of pretenders,"" he'd said.

Hector didn't want to believe that warning was referring to Ravi Zaman, but he also couldn't afford to ignore the possibility.

He had to stay alert. Vigilant. And at times, it felt like Riverton Hall was trying its best to prevent him from doing that, what with its fancy meals, welcoming faces, spacious rooms, comfortable beds, and beautiful views of the city and the greater Imara Forest that encompassed it.

It was such a weird feeling. He liked it here. And he didn't like how much he liked it.

With each passing day, he became more eager to get back to Warrenhold. According to Ms. Rogers, the reconstruction work on the Bell Tower was coming along quite well."

"2685

Most of the Rainlords had already returned to Warrenhold, leaving only Matteo and a handful of lesser known members of the various Houses. It had been a bit of a pain to convince them to go back, especially Salvador, Mevox, and Zeff; but Hector was sure that this was for the best. They couldn't even get near him anymore because of all the attention he was drawing here. Better to have them back at Warrenhold, making sure everything was safe.

He had also finally received word from the treasure hunting teams--word which was filled with both relief and worry.

The good news was that the Vantalayan team had successfully recovered the Blackburn Triplets and routed Abolish from the town of Miro.

The bad news was that even after days of fighting, the so-called Killer of Krohin was still at large and actively harassing them, hindering them at every turn without actually engaging them in another direct fight.

It seemed he was a bit of a sore loser.

Also, they had found the treasure that the Triplets had originally gone there to find: the Sword of Unso.

Unfortunately, it was currently being used against them by the Killer of Krohin.

Hector would've been fine with it if they decided to simply return to Warrenhold, but they were apparently quite determined to complete their mission. If they left now, then not only would they be giving up on the Sword, but the Killer would almost certainly retake Miro. Hector told them that they could bring the Miroans back to the Warrenhold, too, if necessary, but they decided not to resort to that just yet.

Hence Hector's continuing worries.

But he had to admire them, too. And if he were the one on the mission, he would probably feel similarly. Letting the Killer get away and enslave more hapless villages--that wasn't a very appealing notion. Especially after hearing more of the details about the human trafficking going on over there."

"2686

It was sometimes difficult to wrap his head around how horrible things were in other parts of the world, right now. Before meeting Garovel and becoming a servant, he'd always just had a vague feeling that, yes, of course terrible stuff was happening out there. That was just how it was. That was life. That was humanity.

But now, it was a bit different. More and more, he was finding himself in positions where he might be able to do something about some of that horrible shit.

He didn't want to get a big head about it, of course, or start thinking he could solve all the world's problems; but it was still a pretty fucking surreal feeling to him, this notion that... well, he was holding quite a bit of power at his fingertips. And not just in terms of physical strength, either.

This sense of responsibility in the back of his mind was beginning to feel quite heavy.

But also exciting.

If things kept on like this, how much more would he be able to do? How much farther down this road would he be able to travel? He had no idea, and at times, it seemed like it must all come to a screeching halt or he might go sailing off a cliff--but still, he very much wanted to find out. Because there were plenty of reasons to think that it might not all end in absolute disaster.

The other two treasure hunting teams, for instance--they'd both reported in, as well. And their news was much less troubling than that of the Vantalayan team.

They had been dispatched to completely different continents, though--Qenghis and Ardora--so there was little reason to worry that they might get caught up in this Eloan war going on."

"2687

The team that had been sent to Qenghis was looking for the Sun Hat of Amordiin.

Given how useful the Scarf of Amordiin had turned out to be, Hector was intensely curious to know what the Sun Hat might be capable of. He was trying to keep his expectations relatively low, though. According to Garovel, Amordiin had worn the Scarf at all times, even in the bath, but that was not the case for the Sun Hat. And while Emiliana Elroy had told him about it last being seen in Qenghis, she also mentioned that the book she'd read that it was written over 240 years ago.

Which, sadly, was still more recent than Garovel or any of the other reapers had seen it.

For that reason, He and Garovel had almost decided against sending a team after it. The only thing that changed their minds was the fact that Emiliana had managed to provide quite specific details regarding its location.

""A kingly prison, northwest of the great city of Jeruda.""

Considering Jeruda was one of the largest cities in the world, that was an easy starting point for a search. And a ""kingly prison""--while sounding slightly oxymoronic--also sounded like it might be a pretty good landmark.

And he and Garovel figured that if the team couldn't find any leads, that was fine, too. They would be able to return soon and be sent after some other item. No big deal.

But apparently, the hunters had found a new lead. The ""kingly prison"" turned out to be a castle called Dagracourt.

Needless to say, Hector's interest had been piqued even more than before.

Dagracourt had, in ancient times, been the place where the rulers of Jeruda sent all of their political prisoners. At first, it was a nice place, meant to appease an angry peasantry that was threatening rebellion after having seen justice not done countless times. High-ranking officials would go there for a time, enjoy a spa-like ""imprisonment,"" and then be given a new title and powers elsewhere, after their scandal had passed.

Then the peasantry really did rebel, overthrew the government entirely, and Dagracourt become a place where the previous ruling class was sent to be tortured for the rest of their days."

"2688

As such, Dagracourt's prestigious reputation turned into one of absolute dread and horror, and it was eventually abandoned. Nowadays, it was regarded as a spooky ruin that even the locals avoided.

It took the team several days to explore it, but they found a records room in which a ""peculiar hat"" was listed as having been removed by someone named Remi Viviloro. There was a chance the name was just an alias, of course, but it was another lead, at least; and now the team was looking for more clues in Jeruda.

Their search could still reach a dead end, but hell, as long as they weren't being attacked, Hector considered that enough of a win so far.

The Ardoran team was similar. He'd sent them after the Mask of Amordiin, which according to Emiliana Elroy, was last seen in the Gettira Plains--though, again, she mentioned that her information was quite out of date, in this case over 330 years old.

Despite that fact, the team had already discovered that the Mask had at one time been in the possession of a local lord. Apparently, it had been stolen by a thief and caused all sorts of commotion when the lord started executing suspects without trial. As a result, the new king of the land came down upon the lord's head and had him executed, which historians say probably avoided a revolt.

But the Gettira Plains were incredibly vast, and the team was following up on famous thieves who had lived in the region during that time period. By all accounts, they sounded optimistic, but again, Hector wasn't holding out hope.

There was one more team, as well. Not a treasure hunting team like the other three, but a scouting party in deep cover.

A team that they had sent to Sair."

"2689

Hector was more worried for them than even the Vantalayan team, but as of yet, they had not reported anything too troubling. The Vanguard and the Sandlords were apparently getting along with only minor disputes between them, as the aid that the Sandlords had given the Rainlords had apparently not yet come to light.

If it did, though... Hector didn't even want to think about what kind of problems that might bring. Frankly, he'd been against the idea of sending that team into Sair in the first place, but the Rainlords were adamant about the need for trustworthy intel from the region. Which he understood, of course. It was their land. If he was in their position, and it was Atreya that was at risk, then he would probably feel the same way.

But it was nerve-racking, all the same. He was expecting to receive terrible news any day now--or to simply stop receiving reports altogether.

He had therefore been incredibly tempted over the last few days to go ask Ravi if he knew anything about the conflict in Sair. The guy had been a little loose with information from other war zones, so it wasn't inconceivable that he might be willing to share details from that one, too.

But that would be extending quite a bit of trust Ravi's way, Hector felt. Too much, perhaps.

It was one thing for Ravi to volunteer such information without being prompted. It was another thing for Hector to ask about it. Doing so would immediately reveal to Ravi that Hector had some kind of interest in the region--and that might be enough for the man to look deeper and start connecting all sorts of dots that Hector didn't want him to.

And no matter how Ravi might contextualize things, he was still a member of Abolish at the end of the day.

Hector had to keep that in mind."

"2690

Additionally, there was still the dangling thread of Chort, the so-called Beast of Lorent.

Hector hadn't forgotten what he'd seen in that vision Pauline showed him.

Chort had been brought here and experimented on. Which left the question of who had done it and why. Hector had the impression that the earliest events from that vision had occurred many years ago, but the facility that Chort had been kept in seemed to be government run.

So how trustworthy was the Lorentian government, really? Could Abolish have been involved in that whole mess? Could Ravi have? Or maybe Carl and the Vanguard?

He'd already talked to Garovel about this at length, and ultimately, the reaper came to the conclusion that, even if the government here was shady, the land in Jagwa was still too valuable of an opportunity for them to pass up.

And reluctantly, Hector agreed, but that didn't mean he intended to let the issue drop, either.

He'd tried looking into the name Lozaro more--the person who Chort claimed had ""brought him into this world""--but thus far, Hector hadn't found any mention of him here in Lorent. According to Garovel, the man was some kind of internationally famous mad scientist, but his current whereabouts weren't widely known, it seemed.

He wanted to find out more, but another part of Hector wondered if searching harder for such a person would be a good idea. It would obviously be a big problem if the guy was in Lorent, and Hector would rather know about his presence here than not, but what would a confrontation with a mad scientist look like?

Nothing good, Hector suspected.

He supposed, right now, the wisest course of action was simply to prepare. For whatever came next.

He'd been trying to talk to Rasalased again, too, because if anyone knew what was really going on in Sair right now, it would probably be him. Two of the four Shards were with Asad, after all.

But unfortunately, it had been radio silence so far."
"2691

It didn't help that Hector still had no idea how he'd managed to do it that first night. Rasalased had mentioned something about his blessings interacting with each other, hadn't he? How the hell was he supposed to replicate that? Because normal meditation wasn't cutting it.

He had started to think that it wasn't even up to him. Maybe it was actually Rasalased controlling when they could speak. Rasalased had made it sound like Hector was the one in control, but it just seemed more sensible that the ancient warrior god would have that power, not him.

And if that were the case, then surely, Rasalased would warn him if anything truly dire were to happen over in Sair. So maybe he could just relax a little. Ease his mind.

No.

It would be at this very dinner with Ravi Zaman that Hector would realize just how mistaken that assumption was.

The first indication that something was amiss was simply the look on Ravi's face. Visibly tensed jawline. Hard, wide eyes staring at his phone while the color drained from his face.

""...Something wrong?"" asked Hector, having just about finished his plate.

Ravi didn't seem to hear him. Nor did his reaper, whose name they had since learned was Beldorix. They were both just staring at his phone.

""Mr. Zaman,"" Hector pushed, drawing a few blinks out of the man.
""What's the matter?""

""...It appears that Sair has just been conquered,"" the man said.

'What?!' said Garovel.

Hector didn't know what to say. He wasn't even sure he'd heard that correctly.

""A report just came in,"" Ravi went on. ""Perhaps it is mistaken, or perhaps it is too early to be using a term like 'conquered,' but... it seems that the Sairi forces have just lost a decisive battle in the Uego Desert. The Calthosi are moving in now, unimpeded.""

Hector pulled out his own phone, but he couldn't find anything to corroborate Ravi's information. No news on the internet. No messages from the Rainlords back at Warrenhold.

Until about twenty minutes later."
"2692

Hector could hardly believe what he was reading. A stream of texts were coming in from Gina back at Warrenhold, bringing him up to speed on intel from the Sairi team. Apparently, she was receiving constant updates from them.

The Vanguardian and Sandlord forces had been broken through and were now in a scattered retreat. Abolish had already entered Kuros and was seemingly headed for the Golden Fort, the seat of Sandlord power.

People were fleeing the city. Average citizens were being slain in broad daylight or rounded up. The undercover team had defended themselves from hostiles twice already and were now pulling back.

No confirmation yet on any high-ranking casualties, but rumors were spreading that Lamont and Jackson had both been killed.

By the Mad Demon himself.

It was too much to take in all at once. Ravi excused himself from the table, and Hector hardly even noticed.

For a while, he just sat there, reading and rereading while he waited for more news to arrive.

It couldn't be true. It couldn't. Rasalased would have warned him that something like was going to happen. And the Vanguard... and the Sandlords... they were too strong to be defeated so abruptly like this...

It made no kind of sense.

'We need to keep a level head,' came Garovel's private words, finally drawing Hector's gaze away from his phone.

'...Lamont AND Jackson?'

'It's just a rumor, for now. One that greatly benefits Abolish by being spread around, I might add. I highly doubt that they have both been killed.'

'It says Morgunov was there, though...'

The reaper gave a grim nod. 'Yes. It does.'

Hector leaned back in his chair. A waiter dropped off a dessert entree with a smile. A chocolate sundae. He just sat there for a moment, blinking at it. 'Garovel, what the hell am I doing here...?'

'Hector...''

"2693 -- CCXLIII.

He already knew what the reaper probably wanted to say--that there was nothing he could have done to prevent this. That whatever had gone down in the Uego Desert had been entirely beyond him.

And he knew the reaper would be right, too. There was no sense in agonizing over it.

If only he could be entirely sensible.

He sighed and rubbed his forehead, trying to find his concentration again. Suddenly, his multiple thought processes all felt like one, big useless one.

'Let's head back to Warrenhold,' said Garovel.

He didn't look back up yet. 'But we still have a few more meetings here...'

'Eh, fuck 'em. The Rainlords need us, right now. We can take care of the rest of this later. Or better yet, have Ms. Rogers do it for us.'

Hector found it hard to disagree.

He took a deep breath and stood.

Chapter Two Hundred Forty-Three: 'O, ingenuous children...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

This wasn't right. Not at all.

Parson Miles, at this point in his long life, liked to think he had acquired some semblance of control, of order. Laying plans. Nudging the world toward peace through controlled and necessary conflict. Trying to avoid needless bloodshed. And reacting appropriately when things went awry, which they often did.

He'd learned that long ago. It wasn't about crafting the perfect plan. It was about making the right decisions when things inevitably went pear-shaped.

But this.

Well.

Getting captured by the Mad Demon.

What was the right decision to make, now?

He'd stopped struggling a while ago. This mechanized beast had a solid hold on him, and whenever he acted up, its grip only became that much more oppressive. When he relaxed, the machine at least allowed him to think straight. And as a result of multiple prior attempts to escape, he'd lost time--and perhaps quite a lot of it. He didn't even remember ending pan-rozum and separating from Overra, but there she was in front of his face."

"2693 -- CCXLIII.

He already knew what the reaper probably wanted to say--that there was nothing he could have done to prevent this. That whatever had gone down in the Uego Desert had been entirely beyond him.

And he knew the reaper would be right, too. There was no sense in agonizing over it.

If only he could be entirely sensible.

He sighed and rubbed his forehead, trying to find his concentration again. Suddenly, his multiple thought processes all felt like one, big useless one.

'Let's head back to Warrenhold,' said Garovel.

He didn't look back up yet. 'But we still have a few more meetings here...'

'Eh, fuck 'em. The Rainlords need us, right now. We can take care of the rest of this later. Or better yet, have Ms. Rogers do it for us.'

Hector found it hard to disagree.

He took a deep breath and stood.

Chapter Two Hundred Forty-Three: 'O, ingenuous children...'

This wasn't right. Not at all.

Parson Miles, at this point in his long life, liked to think he had acquired some semblance of control, of order. Laying plans. Nudging the world toward peace through controlled and necessary conflict. Trying to avoid needless bloodshed. And reacting appropriately when things went awry, which they often did.

He'd learned that long ago. It wasn't about crafting the perfect plan. It was about making the right decisions when things inevitably went pear-shaped.

But this.

Well.

Getting captured by the Mad Demon.

What was the right decision to make, now?

He'd stopped struggling a while ago. This mechanized beast had a solid hold on him, and whenever he acted up, its grip only became that much more oppressive. When he relaxed, the machine at least allowed him to think straight. And as a result of multiple prior attempts to escape, he'd lost time--and perhaps quite a lot of it. He didn't even remember ending pan-rozum and separating from Overra, but there she was in front of his face."

"2694

The reaper was unconscious, however, so he couldn't even talk to her during this long, dark journey. That was another reason why he'd stopped struggling. He didn't want this blasted machine to accidentally kill her while trying to suppress him.

Maybe that was a needless concern, though. If one thing had become clear from his brief ""fight"" with Morgunov, it was that these mechanical abominations were damn well made.

That crazy bastard. How many of these giant, transforming drones did he have at his beck and call? And how long had he been keeping them secret?

At this point, there was no telling, but Parson had a genuine fear that the numbers might be truly staggering. This was the Mad Demon, after all. If he had managed to mass produce these things...

An army of soldiers that could take down even a captain general...

No. No, that was impossible, even for him. The metal--or whatever material these damn things were made from--had clearly been permanently soul-strengthened by Morgunov himself. And while Parson didn't personally know much about that process, he did know that it was very time-consuming. Surely, the madman didn't have the patience required to do that over and over again, thousands of times...

God, he hoped not.

He was suddenly reminded of a reoccurring topic that he'd heard various reapers discussing over the years.

The terrifying advancement of technology.

The vast majority of reapers he'd known over his life were either dismissive or frightened of technology, and the frightened ones often liked to debate whether it would be prudent for servants to directly intervene in such things and work to actively suppress innovation.

He'd even known a few reaper collectives who were dedicated to that very task. He'd never taken much of a personal interest in their objectives, but...

Maybe he should have.

Ugh, or maybe he should've done the exact opposite.

Dammit."

"2695

These machines were so much more advanced than any other technology that Parson had ever seen. Just how far ahead was Morgunov? Compared to the rest of the world, how many more years would it take before someone else could build machines like these? Twenty years? Fifty? More?

Even disregarding the emperor-level soul-strengthening, these things were absurd.

They could think. Seemingly, at least. Maybe the old bastard had just been controlling them somehow, giving them an appearance of autonomy, but Parson could've sworn that these robots were actively problem solving when fighting him. And they probably held plenty of other secrets that Morgunov hadn't even bothered to reveal to him.

The more he thought about it, the more he felt like trying to suppress innovation was the wrong way to go. Maybe in the past, when the Mad Demon didn't exist, that tactic might have worked, but now? There was no suppressing Morgunov's genius. He could do whatever he bloody wanted, innovate however he pleased.

And if something wasn't done, then eventually, nobody would be able to keep up with him. Not even Sermung.

Assuming that wasn't already the case.

Morgunov did say that he'd come prepared to face Sermung himself, didn't he?

No, it was far too early to be thinking things like that. By any estimate, Lamont and Jackson will have at least been able to achieve a stalemate. That would buy time for Sermung to arrive and push Morgunov out of Sair.

And that, of course, would buy time for the Vanguard as a whole.

He wondered what Jules, Calvin, and Vernon would make of these machines. They were in the Vanguardian encampment as it was preparing to engage Morgunov, so perhaps they had gotten a good look at them during the clash. With any luck, the Vanguard would be able to capture one of these things for study. At the very least, word needed to get out about the leap in strength that the Mad Demon had made.

As if he wasn't terrifying enough before."

"2696

Parson was left to stew in his thoughts for a long while as he waited for the blasted robot to reach its destination. Wherever he was being taken, it was probably going to be an absolute nightmare.

Morgunov had said that he intended to take him to Germal, of all people, but he doubted that would be their first stop. If Asad Najir had been captured, too, then Morgunov would probably treat him as the priority. Probably, being the key word. There were really no certainties when it came to predicting the Mad Demon.

Parson could only hope that the others had arrived in time to save Asad, though he doubted it immensely. His plan to stall the Mad Demon until they got there had been far from ideal--not the least because Morgunov saw right through it.

What a day.

When he woke up this morning, he hadn't expected to be facing down a hostile emperor all by himself. And as he sat here in the darkness, contemplating his fate, he began to wonder if he hadn't been bamboozled.

That message he'd received from a Courier out of the blue. Maybe he'd been a fool to trust it.

""Morgunov seeks the power of a god in Sair,"" it had read. ""If he captures Asad Najir, he may find it. And all we have worked for will be imperiled like never before. Please, old friend. Do whatever you can, for the sake of the bond we once shared and for the vision that I hope we still do.""

It hadn't been signed, of course. And sharing that bit of intel with his superiors directly would have jeopardized so many other things, his life and career being among them.

Perhaps it would have been wiser to disregard it, to remember that Germal had never been the same after Bellvine and especially not after Damian.

But that letter had stirred something in him. Something he thought long dead."

"2697

He hated the prospect that he might've allowed himself to be betrayed by someone he hadn't trusted--or even seen, for that matter--in decades. The idea that he might have allowed childish feelings to interfere with his judgment...

But no. If it had truly been a trap, Morgunov probably wouldn't have said all those things he did. The Mad Demon seemed to have some lingering resentment for Germal--which wasn't terribly surprising, really. The madman had known that they were secret partners for ages, now.

Frankly, Parson had no idea how Germal had managed to stay alive all this time as a member of Abolish. Why hadn't Morgunov killed or exposed him years ago? Parson remembered asking him that very question many times before their final parting, but Germal had never given him a straight answer.

Parson had his theories, of course. Maybe Koh was somehow able to protect him from Morgunov. Parson had seen what that monster was capable of firsthand, so it wasn't out of the question. But even if that was the case, it didn't explain why Morgunov hadn't simply exposed Germal's treachery to the rest of Abolish.

And while it was true that Germal worked under Dozer and not Morgunov himself, that fact alone couldn't explain it. Surely, Dozer would listen if Morgunov told him that one of his most trusted subordinates was a traitor.

Then again, maybe he wouldn't. Dozer and Morgunov's relationship was a centuries-long subject of mystery--even to the rest of Abolish, Parson suspected.

Agh. He couldn't see the whole picture, and he hated that. He doubted that any good might come out of this disaster, but if it did, then perhaps it would arrive in the simple form of answers to questions that he'd harbored for what seemed like a lifetime now.

If he was actually going to see Germal again...

Hmm."
"2698

He would have to think about what to say, he supposed. They certainly had a lot of things that they could discuss, if they ever found the opportunity to do so. But how much of it would just be lies? Or manipulation?

Old friend or not, how could any semblance of trust between them ever be truly restored?

He felt the machine begin to decelerate, heard mechanical parts shifting and whirring. After what seemed like a couple more minutes, the change became even more pronounced, and the machine slowed down enough that Parson couldn't even tell if they were moving, anymore. The loud howling of jets changed, too, as if reverberating off of walls or perhaps the ground.

And then, at last, he felt a gentle touchdown, and the machine went quiet as its propulsion systems appeared to power down.

It took a while longer before the metal door slid open, making him squint while his eyes tried to adjust to the light. A pair of hands grabbed his chains and yanked him out and tossed him onto the ground like a sack of barley.

He looked around, searching for anything that would help him make sense of his surroundings.

There were so many robots, all lined up and standing at attention. And some of them were so much larger than others, black-and-silver giants amid a crowd of machines that Parson had previously thought quite large.

And he wasn't the only captive, he realized.

He recognized several of his fellow generals. Eckard, Malidnda, Meris, Harrison--and more.

So many more.

Then he laid eyes on Asad Najir, and his heart sank. Unlike the others, however, the tattooed man was blindfolded.

What about the marshals, though? Where were Lamont and Jackson?

Parson didn't have enough time or even the proper viewing angle to look over everyone before that all-too-familiar voice arrived."

"2699

""Apologies for the long flight, kiddos. I wanted to find a nice local workshop to use, but it seems like the Sandies were pretty paranoid about me using their own toys against them. Either that, or there was a series of freak accidents involving soul-empowered fire! Which is actually more common than you might think, eheh!""

A foot arrived and rolled Parson over onto his back, forcing him to look up at the Mad Demon looming over him.

""So? What do you think?"" Morgunov looked over his audience, who were all battered even more badly than Parson. Blood, bruises, and scorched or frozen flesh abounded. ""Pretty impressive haul, wouldn't you say? Everyone is going to be so jealous of my collection!"" And he pointed. ""Especially that one, eheh.""

Parson turned and saw the unconscious face of his superior and long-time mentor. Lamont.

Parson shut his eyes. He hadn't lost control of his emotions in many, many years, and he didn't intend to let it happen now.

It was difficult, though.

""Hmm?"" said Morgunov, pressing a gloved hand to his heart. ""What's everyone bein' so quiet for, eh? No questions for me? Or concerns? C'mon, fellas, I'm here for you! Feel free to open up and talk about your feelings. The REAL stuff, y'know? And don't worry. There will be no judging. This is a safe place. No one--except me--will EVER hurt you here! I promise!""

Nobody said anything, in part because half or more of them were still unconscious and the rest knew how bad this situation was. The amount of mission critical intel Morgunov would have access to if he got any of them talking...

He could agonize over that later, Parson decided. ""...Where's Jackson?"" he asked.

""Ah, concerned about the flamey boy, are ya? Well, if it makes you feel better, he did manage to wriggle out of my grasp. But, uh. Eheh. He won't be feelin' too hot for quite a while, I expect.""

"2700

""What are you talking about?"" said Parson.

Morgunov stared at him for a second. ""So you're not even gonna acknowledge that stellar pun I just dropped on you? Jackson not feeling too 'hot,' anymore? Hmm? C'mon, that was great.""

Parson wasn't much in the mood to play along.

""Hmph,"" huffed the emperor. ""Well, if you're going to be rude, then I don't see why I should explain anything to you. Only good boys deserve explanations.""

And before Parson could even respond, Morgunov stepped over him and walked away.

The machines began to disperse, creating more room around the pile of captives and allowing Parson to get a better look at the enormous chamber they were in. It seemed to be some sort of hangar. He spotted several main battle tanks in the distance and even a few fighter jets parked even farther away. And unless his eyes deceived him, those models were the Altay and the F4 Phantom, respectively, both of which informed Parson that Morgunov had brought them to Calthos.

It was a bit strange that such units were sharing a hangar, but this place looked largely abandoned otherwise, so there was no telling why only a handful of such expensive units would be here to begin with. Decommissioned hardware would normally be stored in much larger quantities than this while they waited to be scrapped for parts or perhaps sold off.

Morgunov wasn't heading for those units, though. He he was going toward a line of long workbenches. Parson was content to wait here and not see what exactly the madman was going to do over there. He tried to nudge himself closer to Lamont, hoping to prod him awake, perhaps.

It didn't work so well. Even if he wasn't chained up, his body still felt incredibly weak, and he couldn't seem to harness his power of oxygen transfiguration at all. His head felt mostly clear, if a bit sluggish, but his body was numb all over."

"2701

""Monty,"" Parson whispered. ""Monty, wake up."" He writhed weakly and vainly within his chains, but nothing could be done. He wasn't even able to hoist himself into a seated position.

He sighed. Lamont wasn't going to respond, was he?

'Overra?' he tried.

And he waited.

No answer there, either.

Where were all the reapers? Parson couldn't see any of them. They must've still been inside each of the robots--and unconscious, most likely, because a few of those reapers weren't given to being quiet, even in the face of an emperor.

He tried to think. To focus any thoughts that might be useful. Escape was essentially impossible. Not useful to dwell on, at the moment. But that didn't mean they were doomed, either. If he operated under the assumption that he eventually would be free again, one way or another, then he could view his current time as a chance to learn about the enemy.

About the Mad Demon himself.

From an intelligence-gathering standpoint, this was an invaluable opportunity.

The emperor of madness had been reclusive for the last twenty years or more. A few rumors had even begun to spread that he might've accidentally killed himself in one of his own experiments--or gotten lost in some foreign reality, never to return. Parson had never believed such things for a moment, of course, but they did paint a certain picture of the strangeness of Morgunov's absence.

The more reasonable speculation had been that Morgunov was simply working on something and didn't intend to reveal himself until it was ready. And seeing these machines, that seemed be right on the money.

And yet, this timing was also suspicious.

Ever since the outbreak of this new continental war, Parson had been thinking that something was off. Before news arrived of those five simultaneous invasions, the long-awaited Project Blacksong had been imminent. Now, it was delayed due to the massive number of redeployments required to deal with the war."

"2702

Parson had to wonder if Morgunov had intended to disrupt Blacksong all along. After such a long absence, could it really be a coincidence that Morgunov decided now was the time to reemerge?

Well. Of course it could be a coincidence. That was the trouble with the Mad Demon. It was impossible to tell whether he had planned for something or not. Skill and good fortune became almost indistinguishable.

Hell, Parson had experienced that phenomenon himself. When he acted the fool, people tended to underestimate him, but among those who didn't, those who knew the truth about him, the reverse reaction sometimes appeared. They would overestimate his ability, attributing some great wisdom or predictive intelligence to him when, in reality, he'd simply gotten lucky.

And Overra never let him correct anyone on that particular point. If they wanted to give him credit he didn't fully deserve, then so much the better, she always said.

'Because luck is a skill, too,' she explained. 'Having the wherewithal to take advantage of opportunities as they arise is just as important as those opportunities arising in the first place. Too many people allow their own good fortune to pass them by without so much as a second glance.'

It sure sounded nice when she'd put it like that.

Perhaps this was karma, then, to be on the receiving end of an enemy's good fortune.

With this apparently disastrous outcome of the battle at Uego, the Vanguard as a whole was now in danger. Even before this, it was already having problems with disorganization, and now its total number of generals had been reduced by, what, a third? More?

How many of their forces were now leaderless? How many innocent lives were now at stake? Or soon would be?

It was enough to make a normal man lose hope.

Parson Miles was not a normal man, however. Despite all of these things, he was not panicking."

"2703

In fact, this was a lesson that he had learned as a result of seeing so much devastation over the years--a lesson that the Mad Demon himself had played a large part in teaching.

A lesson about the tempering nature of chaos.

Time and again through the ages, the story was the same. When this kind of danger arrived, when threats became imminent and real, when the fragile harmony of the world began to break--that was when people rose to the occasion.

On both sides. Good and evil.

It was true of the normal folk, and it was truer still for servants.

That was the double-edged sword of emergence.

So many of his peers failed to understand this simple truth. Because of emergence--and indeed, the nature of humanity itself--these kinds of difficult tribulations were not only inevitable, they were needed.

It wasn't enough to preserve peace. Peace never lasted. Not while Abolish existed.

Peace was important, of course. It allowed wealth to be created. Technology to advance. Civilization to flourish and grow. Of course these were all great and wonderful things.

But peace also made men weak. Even vigilant warriors would eventually become complacent.

And what would happen when true malevolence arrived? Hell bent on crushing them? Those weak warriors would crumble.

The Breaking of Korgum would happen. Or Lac'Vayce. Or Exoltha. Or any of countless other historical examples.

Abolish, or someone just as evil, would triumph. Good people, peaceful people, innocent people, they would all be trampled into dust.

Sparing people from war, therefore, was not a kindness. Not always, at least. Too often, it was simply setting people up for disaster.

And that was why, even now, Parson's spirit was not broken.

This great Eloan war... it was inevitable. If not now, then it would have happened later.

And by happening now, it would give the younger generations their much needed chance to grow.

It would temper them."

"2704

That was also, essentially, why he and Overra had worked so hard to oust the Rainlords from the Vanguard. While it was true that plan had gone slightly off the rails, the core justifications behind it remained unmitigated, even now.

Zeff Elroy, the Water Dragon of Sair, had needed the push. As did many others, of course, but he was the most important. The Water Dragons of Old were some of the most powerful forces for good that the world had ever seen, but at the rate he was growing, Abolish would have killed him off within the next fifty years, at most.

But now, the lad was on his way. After all those emergencies, Zeff was probably twice as strong as he was before, if not more.

It was just a shame what had happened to Mariana. Her death had not been necessary. Not at all. She was a good woman, and moreover, she would have likely become a strong ally against Abolish, too.

Hopefully, her death would continue to inspire Zeff and perhaps others to greatness in the future, but Parson had to admit, such a gamble was far from ideal.

And it reminded him of his own wife. And his mother. Rest their souls.

But this was the hard truth.

It had not escaped his notice, the idea that if he hadn't weakened Sair by removing the Rainlords, then Morgunov might not have chosen to attack now.

The idea that the disaster at Uego might have been his own fault.

But such self-flagellating thoughts were beyond worthless, he knew. It was one thing to have a guilty conscience. It was another to blame yourself for things that were entirely beyond your control or that might have happened anyway, even if you had done everything differently.

If Morgunov hadn't chosen Sair, he wouldn't have simply remained quiet. He would have chosen some other hapless country. Perhaps one that was even less prepared for him than Sair was."

"2705

~~((Halloween Special - Page 1 of 30))~~

It was just a shame that Morgunov had chosen now, of all times, to resurface. Parson had hoped for a few more years to prepare the young ones and root out more of the poison within the Vanguard's ranks. Only rarely had he been able to prove it, but Abolish had undoubtedly snuck dozens or even hundreds of spies into the Vanguard with the influx of new members over the last few years. Not to mention, he suspected several older members as well.

And with such a heavy defeat on the war table, the temptation to turn traitor would only increase. Certain cowardly fools out there would delude themselves into believing that they could surrender themselves to Abolish and be spared the same fate as everyone else. And others might just be broken.

Certainly, it would've been easier to give up. To just stop struggling. To let Abolish win. It would bring an end to this endless back and forth, at least.

Parson had seen it many times. Servant and reaper alike. Just snapping, one day. Murdering their brothers-in-arms with little to no warning. Going on truly unhinged rants, proclaiming to the heavens that Abolish had it right all along, that they should just put everyone out of their misery and be done with it.

That it was all pointless.

And Parson would be lying if he said that, in his darkest moments, he had never harbored such thoughts.

The longer he lived, the more terrible things he bore witness to, the clearer it became how unnatural servants really were. At times, he wondered if nihilism and madness weren't simply the inevitable destinations toward which they were all creeping.

And he wondered if reapers weren't trying to hide that fact from them, for their own good.

It was no wonder why Sermung wanted to die.

But even so, Parson Miles planned to continue down this road for as long as he was able."

"2706

~~((Halloween Special - Page 2 of 30))~~

At length, Morgunov's footsteps returned, drawing Parson's gaze. The man's walk was bouncy with obvious delight, almost to the point of skipping.

""What's this?"" said Morgunov, still with two voices as he looked over the tied up Vanguardians and Asad. ""None of you made even a little progress in trying to escape? C'mon, I gave a big ol' window there and everything! What, are the chains too strong? Or are you just too weak? Mm, maybe a little of column A and a little of column B? Don't tell me you're too scared to even try! Eheh!""

""To hell with you, Demon!"" said a voice that Parson identified as Lieutenant General Harrison.

Morgunov's head twitched. ""Oho! Who said that?""

No response arrived. Which was the correct course of action, as far as Parson was concerned. Harrison had always been a courageous one, but this wasn't the time or place. Right now, that sort of defiance was just foolish posturing.

""Hmm? Don't be shy now! I was just about to praise your fighting spirit! I'm a big appreciator of passion, you know!""

Still, no one said anything.

Morgunov frowned briefly, then smiled again. ""Well, whoever it was, your turn will come. Don't you worry your self-righteous little head. Oh, and how about this? When it's your turn, if you have the guts to say something like that again, I'll give you a nice little surprise! A reward! For being so full of gusto! So try and muster up that bravery again, if you can!""

Stay quiet, Harrison. Stay quiet, damn you.

Morgunov paused, listening.

Thankfully, though, Harrison managed to keep his mouth shut.

Morgunov sniffed audibly and scratched his nose, perhaps disappointed. ""Anyway, sorry for keeping you all in suspense. Just wanted to take a quick gander around the facilities. Been a while since I was here, so I wanted to see what I was workin' with. Turns out, we've got some real old school toys here. Medieval, you might say!""
"2707

~~((Halloween Special - Page 3 of 30))~~

One of the machines moved suddenly, grabbing hold of Asad with a pair of metal tentacles and carrying him over to Morgunov.

And as Parson looked at Asad again, saw his blindfold again, a question occurred to him.

Why was Asad Najir the only one with a blindfold?

Off the top of his head, a couple of different answers came to mind, but before he could delve too deeply into either, Morgunov caught him staring and must've noticed something in his expression.

""Hmm,"" said the Mad Demon. ""What's the matter, Parsey Boy? You wanna watch? Bet you do, huh? Deep down, I mean. You Vannies are horribly repressed, aren't you? Especially you company men. Gotta 'fight the good fight,' and all that, right? Never can just sit back and enjoy your own Void-given abilities for what they're really best at. No, no, you have to pretend you don't enjoy that part. Wouldn't want anyone to think you've grown psychotic and bloodthirsty over the years, oh no. You only resort to such measures when it's absolutely, one hundred percent unavoidable, am I right? Of course I'm right, eheh.""

What a sick bastard.

But Parson did want to see what Morgunov was going to do to Asad. He still wasn't entirely sure what the Demon's interest in him was or how Asad was supposed to help him obtain the ""power of a god.""

Should he actually respond, though? Parson felt like saying that yes, he did want to watch would just encourage Morgunov to leave him behind.

So he merely remained quiet.

""Eheh, alright, c'mere ya little rascal! But don't say Papa Morgunov never did anything for ya!""

A second machine scooped Parson up like a loaf of bread, and then they were off.

Morgunov made his way back toward the workbenches while the robots followed. They didn't stop there, however. They kept going, headed through a wide tunnel in the hangar wall, and eventually arrived at an entirely different chamber.

Full of black, metal cages. And giant vats of some pale, bubbling substance."

"2708

The heat in here was intense, and the musty stench was almost entirely foreign to Parson's nose.

Almost.

A memory scratched at the back of his mind. Something faint, yet still somehow horrid. A half-remembered nightmare. His whole body prickled with abrupt discomfort, and breathing became slightly more difficult.

His mind remained calm, but his body was reacting. In a familiar way, no less.

He'd smelled this only a handful of times before, in the presence of particularly nasty greatworms.

All worms in the Undercrust had an innate ability to strike terror in their victims, but it didn't work on sufficiently experienced warriors--with rare exceptions. Some could secrete an ooze that released panic-inducing fumes. Passive soul defense usually offered fair protection against it, which told him that these fumes must have once belonged to a truly monstrous creature.

Had Morgunov gone hunting for greatworms in recent years? That wouldn't be so surprising, Parson supposed.

The machine carrying Asad slapped him down onto a large table in the middle of the room, and Morgunov circled around him.

""Alrighty, let's try this the easy way first, shall we?"" said Morgunov.
""Where are the Quta Jaf'lah?""

The what?

Rather unsurprisingly, Asad made no response. He just lay there, on his back and blindfolded. To his credit, he wasn't showing much fear at all, but if these fumes were able to affect Parson even a little, then they must have been horrifically effective on a servant as young as Asad.

""Tsk, tsk, c'mon. You don't actually think the silent treatment will work, do you? Eheh. If so, then let me just dispel you of that notion right now. It will not.""

Asad was squirming now, jaw clenched.

""The Shards of the Dry God? How about that? Ring any bells? Papa Morgunov knows that you know where they are. And Papa Morgunov doesn't like it when children are stingy with him. Or when they lie.""

"2709

~~((Halloween Special - Page 5 of 30))~~

Parson had to wonder if any of this was even necessary. Surely, the Mad Demon could have simply pressured Asad with his overwhelming soul power and compelled him to be truthful. Morgunov was the inventor of that technique, after all.

So was he just doing this for shits and giggles?

Well.

Yeah, there was a decent chance that was precisely the reason. If this were any other emperor, then Parson would've been certain that they wouldn't want to waste their time, but this was Morgunov.

That reasoning, however, made Parson feel a bit bolder all of a sudden. He felt that, perhaps, if this was all just some big game to him, then the mad emperor might not mind if Parson chimed in with his own distracting inquiries.

""Why did you blindfold him?"" asked Parson, trying to sound as genuinely curious and non-threatening as possible.

Morgunov's piercing silver gaze rose to him, and for a second, he just stared at Parson.

In that second, it felt like the man was weighing the entirety of his existence, deciding whether to end it or not.

Then he smiled that insane smile again. ""Well, you never know who might be watching. Or listening, even. But sadly, he wouldn't be able to answer my questions if I plugged his ears, now would he?""

In all his time corresponding with Damian, Parson had learned many things about the Mad Demon of Abolish. And one of those things was that, oddly enough, the man seemed to enjoy teaching.

If it was the right student. And only if.

According to Damian's tales, Morgunov was ruthlessly cruel and vicious toward students who earned his ire. Parson recalled one story about some poor bastard named Heinrich who'd had his entire bloodline extinguished after Morgunov decided that the man hadn't been taking his lessons seriously. And another about a guy named Lozaro, who was already an infamous scientist in his own right, until he fell asleep during one of Morgunov's lectures.

Supposedly, Morgunov ""tore him from the very fabric of reality itself,"" though Parson hadn't quite been able to understand what that meant or how Damian knew it to be the case."

"2710

~~((Halloween Special - Page 6 of 30))~~

This was all to say that Parson knew what thin ice he was treading on here. While he felt that it might be possible to gain valuable knowledge from Morgunov, he also had to be exceptionally cautious with his choice of words and mannerisms.

""...I don't understand,"" said Parson. ""How is covering his eyes supposed to prevent someone else from watching?""

Morgunov paused, tilting his head at him. ""Hmm? You're not a toddler anymore, Parsey Boy. Surely, you know about the existence of Sparrows.""

As a matter of fact, he did.

""Or did you perhaps think that I didn't know about them? That they were some kind of super Vannie secret? You guys are pretty protective of them, aren't you?""

Parson was still struggling for a response, and Morgunov didn't give him much of a window before he kept talking.

""Oh! Or are you just trying to play dumb in order to take advantage of my affection for curious little dumplings? Tryin' to get on my good side like the cunning monkey you are, hmm?""

Shit, he needed to deflect. ""Actually, I was more wondering whether the blindfold had anything to do with Asad's reaper.""

Morgunov just looked at him, eyes and smile unmoving.

""I thought that, perhaps, you didn't want Asad to see his surroundings, because he then might be able to give information to his reaper.""

""I see, I see,"" said Morgunov. ""That's a rather gutsy implication there, my boy. You're suggesting that I allowed Qorvass to escape."" His eyes widened slightly. ""That I made a mistake.""

There was no use balking now. ""I'm just curious. It seemed odd to me.""

""Yeah-huh?""

""...And if you were worried about Sparrows,"" said Parson, ""then you would need to cover my eyes, too, wouldn't you? As well as everyone else's?""

""Eheheheh. The cunning monkey, indeed!""

"2711

~~((Halloween Special - Page 7 of 30))~~

""Are you admitting it, then?"" said Parson. ""You let the reaper escape?""

""Why so curious?"" said Morgunov. ""Ya think that one little ol' reaper might be your salvation, Parsey Boy? You know better than that by now, don'tcha?""

""I don't know,"" said Parson. ""What if Qorvass manages to contact Sermung?""

""Eheh, here's hoping!""

Wow. Momentarily, Parson was tempted to say that he remembered witnessing the two of them clash before--and moreover, that he remembered how Morgunov hadn't looked quite so happy then.

But his better judgment won out. There was no point in antagonizing the madman--even if, on occasion, Morgunov had been known to respect those who dared to try it.

For now, all that mattered was playing the part of an eager student. And stalling for time, perhaps, though he knew that part was likely to be a futile endeavor.

As Morgunov's attention seemed to be drifting back down to Asad, Parson came up with a new angle of approach.

""You know what I'm really curious about,"" he said, ""is those machines of yours. They're remarkable.""

""Mm, like 'em, do ya? Thought you'd be more upset, considering how easily they handed you your own keister.""

Parson had to relinquish a nod at that. ""Got me there. But I can still admire their craftsmanship, can't I?""

Morgunov gave him a sidelong look. ""You're not one of them masochistic types, are ya? They're not those types of machines, I'll have you know! They're good boys! I only designed them for the very wholesome purposes of kidnapping, murder, and conquest!""

Right. Parson wondered if he should try to lean more into his own madness here. To invoke a sense of kindred spirits, perhaps. ""Wasn't my intention to suggest otherwise. Did you really make all those things yourself, though? That seems like so much work. Even if I had the know-how, I don't think I'd have the patience.""

""Oh, indeed, indeed. Took me quite a few years, you know. Probably coulda finished 'em faster, but I can be a bit of a perfectionist when it comes to this kinda stuff. If it's worth doing, it's worth overdoing, I always say.""

"2712

~~((Halloween Special - Page 8 of 30))~~

A few years, was it? From the way he'd said that, he probably didn't have an assembly line somewhere constantly cranking out more of these monstrosities.

Probably.

As much as he might've liked to ask Morgunov about that directly,

Parson decided against it. He had to be careful. He couldn't afford to push his luck too much.

Because there was another reason why he wanted to stall the emperor.

Beyond merely trying to keep himself and the other captives alive for even a millisecond longer, there was the greater objective of the Vanguard to think of. Even now, taken off the chessboard as he was, he was still mindful of the future. Maybe he would never be able to fight again. Maybe Morgunov would kill him after he'd found Germal and had his fun.

But Blacksong was still coming. It had to be.

Sure, there was the concern that their losses at Uego had been too great, that perhaps the remaining leaders would get cold feet and delay or even abort the entire operation as a result.

But Parson didn't believe that. He couldn't.

If anything, they should know that the timetable needed to be sped up, not delayed. Uego was a terrible loss with potentially catastrophic consequences, but ultimately, it was still only one battle. A major offensive was needed in order regain momentum, to maintain morale and to rally their forces.

That was the only real strategy now, he felt.

If the Vanguard didn't take dramatic action, if they allowed this continental war to devolve into a series of attritional battles, then it was already as good as over. The losses at Uego truly would reverberate throughout the continent and slowly degrade troop morale, young and old alike--not to mention the effects that it would have on all the non-combatants of Eloa."

"2713 -- CCXLIV.

~~((Halloween Special - Page 9 of 30))~~

And Sermung was only one man. If Dozer took to the field, too--which was likely now that Morgunov had made a move--then Abolish would be able to divide and conquer more easily than ever. They could lure Sermung to one battlefield with one emperor while overwhelming another with the second.

The marshals were meant to be a safeguard against that, but with the way Morgunov's blasted machines had manhandled everyone, that strategy might no longer be viable. For the moment, at least.

So there was no doubt in Parson's mind.

Blacksong, in one form or another, was coming.

It was just a matter of holding on until then.

Chapter Two Hundred Forty-Four: 'Renewed anger...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector Goffe had never seen them this way.

Thus far during their stay at Warrenhold, the Rainlords had been frequently restless and frustrated. He saw it in their body language, in their apparent need to constantly be working on something, and he heard it in their voices, underpinning every word in every meeting. Rarely had it seemed like any of them could relax, but he had thought that, perhaps, they were beginning to. Perhaps, a little, they were warming to his home, this place of rest and safety.

But that was all gone now. So much so, in fact, that Hector began to wonder if it had been there in the first place, if he'd just been seeing what he wanted to see.

The news from Sair had them in a fury.

There were calls for immediate deployment of all their forces to retake the country. There were calls to march into Calthos and take Abolish by surprise. There were even calls to attack the Vanguard in order to locate and recover their captive kin.

But one thing, at least, was clear.

They didn't know what to do."
"2713 -- CCXLIV.

And Sermung was only one man. If Dozer took to the field, too--which was likely now that Morgunov had made a move--then Abolish would be able to divide and conquer more easily than ever. They could lure Sermung to one battlefield with one emperor while overwhelming another with the second.

The marshals were meant to be a safeguard against that, but with the way Morgunov's blasted machines had manhandled everyone, that strategy might no longer be viable. For the moment, at least.

So there was no doubt in Parson's mind.

Blacksong, in one form or another, was coming.

It was just a matter of holding on until then.

Chapter Two Hundred Forty-Four: 'Renewed anger...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector Goffe had never seen them this way.

Thus far during their stay at Warrenhold, the Rainlords had been frequently restless and frustrated. He saw it in their body language, in their apparent need to constantly be working on something, and he heard it in their voices, underpinning every word in every meeting. Rarely had it seemed like any of them could relax, but he had thought that, perhaps, they were beginning to. Perhaps, a little, they were warming to his home, this place of rest and safety.

But that was all gone now. So much so, in fact, that Hector began to wonder if it had been there in the first place, if he'd just been seeing what he wanted to see.

The news from Sair had them in a fury.

There were calls for immediate deployment of all their forces to retake the country. There were calls to march into Calthos and take Abolish by surprise. There were even calls to attack the Vanguard in order to locate and recover their captive kin.

But one thing, at least, was clear.

They didn't know what to do."

"2714

~~((Halloween Special - Page 10 of 30))~~

With several of the family heads still stuck in Vantalay, they seemed to realize, begrudgingly, that they couldn't make a hasty decision here. The constant debates in the Grand Hall of the Night made a return, especially between the reapers since they didn't even have to sleep.

Their scouts in Sair had been trying to gather more intel, but none of it was good. Abolish's presence in the Drylands seemed to increase by the hour, and the scouts had to continually pull farther and farther back. Every town they passed was either abandoned or in the midst of evacuating.

The scouting team, led by one Isaac Sebolt, had begun setting up a position in Callum, the nation to Sair's south. As intelligence on Sair itself was dwindling, the scouts were shifting their attention to how Sair's neighbors were reacting.

Sair's largest neighbor, of course, was Intar, which covered its entire western and northern border, and considering all that he had recently learned about Intar from Prince David, Hector couldn't help but wonder how that continental superpower was reacting to this news.

Neither Callum nor Intar were directly involved in the war, at the moment, but Hector felt like that might change any time now.

Hector wished he could do more for the Rainlords. Sitting in on their meetings and listening to them agonize over what the best course of action was--that certainly didn't feel like enough, even if they seemed to appreciate his presence.

He was told that he had a calming effect on them. Apparently, before returning to Warrenhold, they were going at it like cats and dogs, whereas now they were at least managing to remain mostly civil in their discourse.

Hector kinda doubted that, though. He had a hard time imagining the heads of the Houses screaming at each other like that--and even more of a hard time imagining that he might've been the reason why they would have stopped."

"2715

~~((Halloween Special - Page 11 of 30))~~

More than anything, though, Hector was worried about Asad. He had of course tried to call the guy, but unsurprisingly, the Lord Najir had not answered him. Hector hoped he was just too busy with evacuations or something.

He desperately wanted to contact Rasalased again and perhaps learn something useful, but the Dry God had not appeared before him.

Which was baffling, quite frankly. How in the world could the conquest of the Sandlords' territory not be something that Rasalased wanted to talk to him about? Even assuming that Rasalased hadn't seen it coming, surely he would still want to discuss it now, right?

There must've been something else going on. Either he was doing something wrong himself, or there was more to Sair's conquest than there appeared to be.

Or Rasalased was just being incredibly callous, but Hector sincerely doubted that. If nothing else, he'd seemed much too interested in meeting Asad for that to be the case.

He voiced these concerns privately to Garovel, and the reaper seemed to be of the opinion that there was indeed something strange going on.

'Morgunov's presence there alone makes that a virtual certainty,' said Garovel in the echo of privacy. 'I doubt he would make a move just because he wanted to conquer some land. He's got some kind of plan for Sair, I'm sure.'

'Hmm. Think Rasalased might know what it is?'

'It's possible. But this is an emperor we're talking about. I wouldn't be surprised if Morgunov had some kind of protection against Rasalased's sight. You might recall that Rasalased wasn't able to discern exactly who the ""shadow"" following Emiliana Elroy was.'

Hector tried to think back and was struggling to. 'Shadow?'

'Back when we all met Rasalased, remember? He warned Emiliana that she was being followed.'

'Oh yeah... and then later, that shadow turned out to be Gohvis.'

'Mhmmm.'"

"2716

~~((Halloween Special - Page 12 of 30))~~

It was a disconcerting thought, to be sure. The idea that Morgunov might have some way to counter Rasalased's abilities? Agh. Hector very much wanted to believe that the seemingly benevolent Dry God was more powerful than any living servant, emperors included, but was that really the case? Or just wishful thinking?

There was no telling how strong Rasalased really was, especially outside the ""space"" within the Shards. Even if he was older than Morgunov, he didn't exactly have a normal body anymore. Hector had to wonder if Rasalased's power could even grow in such a state. If his soul was being ""preserved"" in those Shards, then it seemed somewhat logical that his strength could be ""frozen,"" in some sense.

Or hell, he could be weaker than he was in life.

Perhaps it was all a matter of perspective. Whatever the case, Hector intended to ask Rasalased about it at the next opportunity.

In the meantime, there was at least one other person that he needed to talk to through strange and supernatural means, and that was Emiliana Elroy. He had hoped that she might be able to tell him more about the attack, but apparently, the whole thing was news to her.

In the end, she was the one asking him questions. Her telepathic ""speaking voice"" remained mostly calm, but he could sense her emotions through the Shards.

Her heartbreak.

Worry, sorrow, helplessness, and just... pain.

He wished he could do more for her. But that was nothing new, of course.

The only thing she was able to tell him about Abolish's movements was that Gohvis himself had not mobilized.

'I'll try harder to find out more about their operations,' she promised.

The just made him more concerned, though. 'Don't push it. Even if you found out something really useful, I don't even know if we would be able to take advantage of it. And I don't really have the means of passing it along to the Vanguard, either, so...'

She gave a mental sigh."

"2717

~~((Halloween Special - Page 13 of 30))~~

The silence drew out, and Hector struggled to think of what to say. He'd told her what he needed to, but he didn't want to just excuse himself and leave her hanging, either.

What was the right way to handle a conversation like this, he wondered? It wasn't the first one of its kind that he'd had with her, and he had a terrible feeling that it wouldn't be the last.

'...I'm sorry you're going through all this,' was the only thing that came to mind.

It did not elicit a response from her.

He tried again. Maybe something more reassuring would do the trick. 'I promise I'll do everything I can to help you and your family.'

'...I appreciate what you are trying to do, Hector,' she said, 'but let's not kid ourselves. What can you do? You are just as powerless as I am in this situation.'

He blinked, not having expected such biting cynicism from her.

Maybe he should have, though.

He'd been dealing with so many non-servants lately--and politicians, to boot--that he'd kinda forgotten that she wasn't like any of them. His growing ""reputation"" didn't mean anything here. To Emiliana, he was probably still just some random kid she met in the middle of all that craziness that went down in Sair.

Which was a more accurate assessment than anything else, honestly. Lord or not, ""hero"" or not, he was out of his depth. He'd been out of his depth for quite a long time.

He felt her let go of her Shard, and that was that.

The next couple days were agonizing as it felt like all he could do--all anyone in Warrenhold could do--was wait for more news to arrive. News of the treasure hunts. News of the Sandlords. News of the other fronts in the war. News of anything.

That was just the prevailing feeling of unease, though. There was no lack of work that needed doing, including but not limited to meditating, training, the Bank, the reconstruction, the land deal, and plenty of meetings, of course.

There was one meeting, however, that took him by surprise, as it arrived in the dead of night.

The Queen of Atreya paid him a visit."

"2718

~~((Halloween Special - Page 14 of 30))~~

Ms. Rogers had to come and get him out of bed. By the time Hector made it downstairs and over to the Entry Tower in order to welcome her, Queen Helen was already seated at a long, polished black table in the East Hall, the tower's most spacious chamber. Around the Queen were her reaper Mehlsanz and Lynnette Edith, as well as the Lord Dimas Sebolt and a handful of Rainlord reapers, including his own Iziol, Axiolis, and Mevox.

""I hope you will forgive the suddenness of my visit,"" said the Queen upon seeing him. She was wearing a black cloak with the hood still up, as was Lynnette--which was a little weird, since she usually wore white.

""It's no trouble at all, Your Highness,"" said Hector. He took the open seat by her side at the head of the table. ""And, er... I appreciate your discretion. I know you're mainly doing it for the sake of my guests.""

Helen gave him a smile, then eyed the small cluster of reapers around her. ""I have been wanting to meet these Rainlords of yours ever since they arrived. I am glad to finally have found the opportunity.""

Hector's face tightened a little as he tried not to wince at that mention of them being 'his Rainlords.' He was sure she didn't mean it in the same sense as, for example, Leo did, but it was still unfortunate phrasing all the same.

Garovel interjected. 'Will you be able to stay the whole night? Or even longer, dare I hope? We have quite a bit here that we would like to show you. There's still a lot of work left on the restoration, but we're pleased with the results so far.'

Helen exchanged glances with Mehlsanz--and perhaps a few private words, as well. Then she addressed Garovel. ""I had only intended to stay the night, but I suppose we could take the day, too, and depart tomorrow night, instead.""

"2719

~~((Halloween Special - Page 15 of 30))~~

'Excellent,' said Garovel. 'I'm glad you're able to escape the media's gaze for a single day, at least.'

""Well, don't speak too soon,"" said the Queen, her smile suddenly growing faintly weary.

'No kidding,' said Mehlsanz. 'There's been so much going on lately that it wouldn't surprise me if some other terrible news arrived and forced us back to the capital.'

'That's very true,' said Garovel. He looked over at Dimas. 'I hope you've been treating our Queen well, Lord Sebolt. Hector and I are very protective of her, you know.'

Helen gave an airy laugh. ""He has been a perfect gentleman.""

'Bit on the quiet side, though,' added Mehlsanz.

Dimas looked as expressionless and stoic as ever. ""I happened to be awake, and I thought it would be rude to leave her alone in this giant castle, as it is apparently her first ever visit here.'"

'He's understating things,' said Iziol. 'After getting to know King William so well, we've all been eager to meet the wife of such a charming man, especially after he spoke so highly of you.'

""Oh my,"" said Helen. ""I shall tell him you said that.""

'Please do,' said Iziol. 'I only wish I could've had a conversation with him directly.'

The Queen tittered. ""No wonder William took such a liking to you. Hector, you didn't tell me the Rainlords were such smooth talkers.""

""Uh..."

'We're only that way towards people we like,' said Mevox. 'Sadly, our reputation elsewhere is not always so pleasant.'

""So I have heard,"" said Helen. ""I have met several Sandlords in my day, so I must admit that I had perhaps allowed some of their opinions of you to color my own.""

'Ah,' said Mevox. 'Yeah. Historically speaking, we have what you might call a love-hate relationship with those guys.'

And the Queen's smile diminished somewhat. ""I can only imagine how you must feel about the news of current circumstances.""

"2720

~~((Halloween Special - Page 16 of 30))~~

'Well,' said Mevox, 'I'd like to say it's complicated, because that's the way our feelings toward them usually are. But it's not. In this case, I don't think it could be any simpler.'

""You wish to go to their aid?"" said the Queen.

'Damn right we do. But we can't.'

Helen nodded.

'What DO you intend to do, then?' asked Mehlsanz.

'We are still rather torn on that point,' said Axiolis. 'But at the moment, we are trying to locate any Sandlords who managed to escape.'

'And how has that been going?'

'Not well,' said Iziol. 'Abolish seems to have moved very swiftly. Right now, it is not even clear if any of the heads of the Hahls made it out. We are hoping that one or more of them will try to make contact with us soon, but they are no doubt dealing with an oppressive communications blackout.'

'I'm confident that many of them did escape,' said Axiolis. 'They are a paranoid sort and would most assuredly have had many contingency plans for exactly this scenario. Whether or not they will actually risk reaching out to us, though--that is a different story.'

""You do not think they would?"" asked Helen.

'Not right now, no,' said Axiolis. 'I suspect many are already safely in hiding and feel that the wisest course of action is to wait things out.'

""I see...""

'Not all of us share Ax's optimism,' said Mevox. 'It's difficult to hope for the best when you fear the worst.'

'Have faith, old friend,' said Axiolis. 'You'll see.'

'Is that faith in Lhutwë you're asking me for? Or faith in your best bud, Qorvass?'

'Is it too much to ask for both?'

'Yes.'

'Hmph. Then have faith in how well I know the Sandlords,' said Axiolis.

'I'm just trying to be realistic here. I don't want you getting your hopes up, only to be crushed later when we learn the full truth of things.'

'On the contrary, I'm the one who's being realistic. You're just assuming the worst because you're afraid.'

'Hah. If you say so.'

"2721

~~((Halloween Special - Page 17 of 30))~~

'Let's not trouble the Atreyan Queen with our bickering, shall we?' said Iziol, turning everyone's attention back to her. 'Allow me to again thank you for letting us take refuge within your borders. It is our hope to not overstay our welcome, but with the war on, I fear we may have need of Warrenhold for some time yet.'

""As far as Hector has told me, you have all been perfect guests and exceptionally helpful in restoring the castle,"" said Helen. ""If you continue on as you have been, then you can be certain that your welcome will never expire.""

'That is comforting to hear,' said Iziol. 'Thank you.'

The pleasant exchanges continued to overwhelm the conversation, but Hector could hardly be disappointed about that. He had a feeling that the Queen hadn't shown up in the middle of the night like this just to meet the Rainlords and have a nice chat. She probably wanted to talk about Lorent but not with an audience. He kept expecting her to ask for a chance to speak in private, but she never did--not before Garovel offered her a room in the Tower of Night, at least.

Perhaps she'd had a long day, because she accepted and retired to bed soon afterward--or tried to, anyway. More reapers kept appearing on the way up to her room, and naturally, they all wanted to talk. At length, Mehlsanz took over her conversational duties.

If nothing else, Hector was glad to see her hitting it off with the reapers. The last thing he wanted was strife between her and the Rainlords.

Before he could return to bed himself, however, Lynnette grabbed his shoulder and made him turn to look at her.

""Hey,"" she said. ""You'll have to tell me about this Beast of Lorent you fought. I want all the details.""

"2722

For a moment, Hector just stood there, looking at her. ""Ah... sure...""

She retracted her hand. ""Um. Later, I meant. Not right now. You're probably tired, aren't you?""

He didn't know what to say. Garovel was talking to the Rainlord reapers and seemingly not even paying attention to him.

Uh.

He was tired. Not anymore, though. Should he tell her that? He should, right? He didn't get many opportunities to talk to her, after all.

Oh god, he wasn't prepared for this.

""...Hector?"" she said, giving him a sidelong look. ""Are you tired?""

""...Are you?"" Shit, what was wrong with him? He'd learned that strategy from Garovel--how to answer questions he wasn't sure about by just repeating them back at the asker--but now was not the time. It was totally unnecessary.

""Um. Not really, I suppose. But I'm accustomed to guarding the Queen while she sleeps.""

He just nodded stupidly.

Now Lynn also seemed like she didn't know what to say, anymore.

Well, fuck.

They were already quite high up the Tower of Night. The Queen's designated guest room was only one floor above his own quarters. He was trying to remember the layout of the Tower and failing. These floors were huge. He was certain there was a common area where they could go to talk. Nearby. Somewhere.

Fucking fuck.

They ended up just kind of standing there in middle of the big, open hallway.

Where did everybody go? When did it get so empty in here? Should he call Garovel for help?

Oh, man.

""Oh!"" said Lynnette suddenly. ""Madison asked me to talk to you about something a while ago. What was it, ah...? Er...""

""Madison?"" said Hector. ""You mean Madison Reach? Lord Dimas' girlfriend?""

""Yeah. She wanted Gina and I to ask you about sending someone out to investigate some kind of shady group or something..."" Lynn rubbed her neck. ""I kinda forgot...""

""The Andalero group,"" said Hector. ""Yeah, Gina mentioned it.""

""Oh. Um. Okay. Good.""

And the awkward silence returned."
"2723

~~((Halloween Special - Page 19 of 30))~~

There had to be something he could talk about. Wasn't he always feeling like he was juggling a billion different things? He could just pick one and go from there, couldn't he?

Or could he?

What if it was boring and just led to more of this shit?

Oh no.

Oh shit.

Agh.

No, he shouldn't talk about himself. He should ask about her. That was way smarter, right?

""S-so how's your family doing?"" he blurted. There was nothing smart about this at all, was there?

""Oh, um, they're doing well. Thanks for asking.""

He nodded again.

""I bought my mom a new sword a couple weeks ago. She, er, collects them. It's kind of her hobby. And mine, I guess. But, um, she really seemed to like it. It was an ancient Melmoorian warblade. Or a modern recreation of one, I should say. Heh, a real one would be, like, insanely expensive. And probably be in a museum. Um..."

Hector listened like she was giving a lecture for an upcoming exam that he really needed to pass.

She trailed off, though, having perhaps grown uncertain if he cared about a single thing she was saying.

Hey, that was one of them social cues, wasn't it? He needed to say something here and let her know that he actually was interested in the conversation.

No sweat. He knew just what to say.

Uh.

Something to do with swords...

Aw, fuck, dude, c'mon!

""Uh--h-have you ever heard of something called the Sword of Unso?""
Oh god, was that right? It wasn't, was it? He should've just said something simple and reassuring.

Lynnette blinked at him with her one eye. ""You mean from mythology?""

""Er, yeah... I think. Do you know much about it?""

Her singular gaze drifted up and left. ""Um... it's been a while, but yeah, I remember reading about lots of mythical swords when I was younger. They're pretty fun to imagine."""

"2724

~~((Halloween Special - Page 20 of 30))~~

""Right,"" said Hector hesitantly. ""Because... it's not... real..."

She paused. ""What's with that tone? Are you trying to tell me that the Sword of Unso is real?""

""Well, I mean... yeah, I'm pretty sure it is.""

She just returned a blank expression with her mouth slightly agape.

""At the moment,"" Hector went on, ""it's supposedly in the possession of a really dangerous guy named Thaddeus Croll. Also known as the Killer of Krohin.""

Her eye drifted away from Hector's face. ""I... huh... it never occurred to me that all those legendary blades might actually exist..." Her head snapped back to Hector. ""Why do you know so much about the Sword of Unso's current whereabouts?""

Hmm. Was it okay to tell her about the treasure hunting mission in Vantalay? Probably. But...

It wasn't just his secret, now was it? If it was his own safety on the line, he would've been happy to tell her everything, but he was also mindful of the team's operational security, too. Lynnette was obviously trustworthy, but he still wanted to be exceptionally cautious.

If word ever got out that the Lord of Warrenhold was actively hunting rare artifacts of power around the world...

Well, that seemed like the kind of thing that could bring a lot of trouble down on his head from some very dangerous parties.

""That's... kind of a sensitive subject,"" said Hector.

She frowned. ""Hmph. You've gotten a lot more mysterious lately, you know that?""

He didn't know what to say to that.

""I mean, you were always quiet, but now, it feels like you have all sorts of secrets.""

Well, she wasn't wrong. He still didn't know what to say, though.

Her frown twisted up into a half-smile, and she breathed a quiet laugh. ""It's kind of annoying, is what I'm trying to say.""

That pulled a small laugh out of him in return. ""I, uh... I wish I could share more with you.""

"2725

~~((Halloween Special - Page 21 of 30))~~

Lynn exhaled an exasperated breath and folded her arms. ""Are there any other mythical swords that you just 'happen' to know the locations of?""

He scratched his brow. ""Uh... hmm.""

She waited but not for very long. ""You're not going to answer that question, are you?""

""I probably shouldn't...""

She backed up a few steps and leaned against the pitch black wall behind her. ""Why did you even bring up the Sword of Unso, then? Just to tease me? That's pretty mean, you know.""

Oh, shit, uh. ""Actually, I was wondering if you knew anything about what powers it might have.""

""You know its location but you don't know that?""

""Well, I've heard some things, but I'm not too sure...""

""What sort of things?""

He supposed he could part with that much intel, at least. ""Like... it can cut through almost any material.""

""Hmm. That might be one way of describing it. As I recall, the Sword Unso was special because it could create 'pathways.' By cutting. Through just about anything, like you said. Even air.""

""Huh...""

""In the hands of a skilled warrior, it was supposedly able to carve out an entire tunnel through a mountain--or even make a bridge over a river.""

""Whoa. But wait, it could actually build a bridge? Like out of stone or something?"

"No, I think it's made out of air. Like the bridge would be invisible to the naked eye, but you could walk on it. I guess. It was just a cool story, I always thought. I have no idea how it would function in reality, but that was how it was described."

"Interesting..." That didn't quite track with what the team in Vantalay had reported of its capabilities after fighting the Killer. Was that because the tale was only half-true? Or could it be that the Killer just hadn't revealed all of its powers to the Rainlords yet?

He supposed he should pass that information along, just in case. Better safe than sorry. And heck, maybe it would help them take down Croll."

"2726

~~((Halloween Special - Page 22 of 30))~~

And now that he was thinking about it, that was a pretty good excuse to flee this conversation. He needed to go tell the Vantalay reapers about this critical piece of new intel. Yeah. Putting it off for even a moment longer wasn't wise. The Rainlords could be fighting Croll this very second, and this could be the information they need in order to turn the tide of battle in their favor.

Definitely. That was pristine logic. Not motivated reasoning at all.

"I should go tell Arumoro what you just told me," said Hector, straightening his back and looking toward the staircase down the hall.

"Who's Arumoro?" said Lynn.

"Oh, uh. He's a reaper whose servant may, uh... benefit from what you just said."

"Really? I thought reapers knew pretty much everything already."

"Ah. Heh... well, they certainly act like they do." He started ever so slightly turning his body to leave. "It might be a time-sensitive situation, so I shouldn't delay..."

Lynn nodded understandingly. "Oh, okay. Let's go, then." And she took a step closer.

Ah.

Hmm.

She intended to come with him.

Shit.

He supposed he could play up the mysterious, need-to-know-basis thing again, but... aw, fuck.

Wait, no, there was something better. ""I-is it okay for you to leave the Queen's side?""

""Ah, no, I'm off the clock, technically. She told me that I should try and relax while we were in Warrenhold.""

""Wow, uh, really?""

""Yeah. She seems to think I don't get enough rest or something."" She started moving ahead of him, as if to urge him along, and he figured that he couldn't justify standing around like a stump, anymore.

This had not gone as planned. Now they were just walking together.

""Hey, tell me something,"" said Lynn. ""Do I seem like an uptight person to you?""

Oh, boy. ""Uh...""

""Hector.""

""Er, what?""

""Do I seem uptight?"" she repeated, more slowly this time.

""Ah, I mean... n-no?""

""Hector, that wasn't convincing at all.""

"2727

""Y-you don't seem uptight,"" Hector tried.

Lynn just gave him a flat look.

Yeah, she didn't believe him. Hmm. Maybe he could turn this around on her, though. ""...Why does the Queen think that you're not getting enough rest?""

Lynn put her eye forward as they descended the dark stairs. ""I don't know.""

""...You sure about that?""

""What are you implying?""

""I'm just wondering if you actually are getting enough rest,"" said Hector.

""Hmph. You're one to talk.""

""Maybe. But I'm also undead. You're not.""

""I'm fine.""

""...Really? You're not pushing yourself too hard with your training?""

""Of course not. I know my limits.""

""I don't know. I'm inclined to trust Her Highness' judgment on this one..."

She snorted. ""Are you seriously trying to use the Queen against me?""

""You need your rest, Lynn.""

""What're you, my mother?""

Hector snickered. ""Oh, there's an idea. Maybe we should give her a call. See what she thinks.""

""Whoa, whoa, whoa. There's no need for threats.""

A related thought occurred to Hector. ""Were you able to try out the hot springs when you were here with the King?""

""Oh, no, the renovations weren't done yet. Are they finished now?""

""More or less. They still need some final touches, but they're functional now, at least. If you're supposed to be relaxing more, then you should give them a try.""

""That does sound pretty nice. And I'm curious to see what they look like, too.""

They kept talking as they made their way down, which was quite a lengthy journey, because the Tower of Night was still lacking one important feature.

Elevators.

Of Warrenhold's eight great towers, the Tower of Night was the largest and most secure by far. That was thanks entirely to the nighrock from which it was built.

But unfortunately, the strength of the nighrock also made it incredibly difficult--if not impossible--to work with in renovating the place."

"2728

~~((Halloween Special - Page 24 of 30))~~

At first, Hector thought it was just too much of a problem for a normal construction company. He thought maybe he would be able to find a servant-run company that could deal with the nighrock; but now, after letting the Rainlords assist in the reconstruction effort for quite a while, he was starting to wonder if even that was doable.

Thus far, none of the Rainlords had been able to put so much as a dent in the Tower of Night.

It was a bit of a delicate situation, though. Since there were so many people currently living in Warrenhold, there was understandable concern about using too much power and accidentally hurting someone with flying debris.

When news of the continental war broke, they had been in the process of organizing for a new, more ambitious attempt at breaking through the nighrock, but that had since been indefinitely postponed. The most powerful servant at their disposal, Melchor Blackburn, had been a key part of that plan, and he was now in Vantalay, along with several others who would've proven very helpful in mitigating damage.

All in all, though, it was pretty shocking.

When Voreese first described nightrock to Hector and Garovel, she had made it sound tough but not this tough. She'd mentioned that it would require someone on the level of Harper Norez to break through it, but this was far beyond that, Hector felt. Harper was a powerful Lieutenant General of the Vanguard, yes, but Hector was reasonably certain that there were several people here among the Rainlords who were stronger than him.

And yet the nightrock had bested them all.

So far, at least.

After talking to Voreese about it again, she expressed surprise as well.

'Huh,' she had said. 'This stuff seems a little sturdier than I remember...'

"2729

~~((Halloween Special - Page 25 of 30))~~

Hector hoped they would be able to find a solution to this problem soon, because trekking up and down these stairs every day was kind of obnoxious.

Plus, it wasn't exactly friendly to the disabled or injured. That wasn't a big problem at the moment, but Hector wanted to be prepared if it ever was.

Little Ramira Elroy had been something of a warning, in that regard. Her foot had been wounded back at Dunehall, and she'd been on the mend ever since. Luckily, she was small enough for Zeff or even Marcos to carry her up or down the stairs without any trouble, but seeing her roam around on her tiny crutches had caused Hector to imagine much worse scenarios.

Warrenhold was supposed to be a place of safety, after all--and the Tower of Night, the safest building. There might very well come a day where they needed to take in a large number of injured people. Sure, they could be placed in the other towers--and probably would--but what if this place ever came under siege?

The more he'd thought about it, the more important the Tower of Night seemed.

The other seven towers all had nightrock inside them, too, but only in small amounts--a single, black chamber in the heart of each building, to be precise. The rest of their stone, while still not entirely normal, was at least malleable. The new elevators in the Entry Tower had been especially welcome, since that was the tallest of all eight towers.

Their current destination, the Bell Tower, would soon have working elevators, too.

Renovations on it were coming along pretty well. The first floors were pretty much done, and it was turning into quite a handsome building. The light gray stone here now looked pristine, and the edges of each room had been lined with a dark walnut wood that provided a pleasing degree of visual contrast, Hector felt."

"2730

~~((Halloween Special - Page 26 of 30))~~

The reapers for the dispatched teams were almost always gathered together in order to share information with one another and relay it back to their respective servants on a moment's notice. They'd swapped between various gathering spots over the last few weeks, but their most recent one was here on the Bell Tower's second floor.

When Hector and Lynn arrived, Lynn paused in the open doorway, seemingly surprised at the sight before her. She'd donned her Hun'Kui made goggles and was therefore able to see all of the reapers clustered together like nowhere else in Warrenhold.

Hmm. Hector wondered if he shouldn't be showing her this. She was obviously going to wonder what they were all doing.

Eh, it was fine. Lynn was trustworthy, and she still couldn't hear anything the reapers were saying, anyway. There was zero risk of her accidentally compromising one of the missions.

There were four circles, one for each team, but the reapers were still occasionally intermingling with one another. As Hector understood it, they all wanted to stay up to date on the status of each others' missions. That seemed needlessly confusing to him, but apparently, the reapers didn't feel the same way.

So essentially, the reapers for the Vantalay team knew everything that the reapers for the Qenghis, Ardora, and Sair-scouting teams knew--and vice versa. They claimed that it was because there was always a slight chance that one mission might somehow affect another or that something learned in one part of the world might be useful to pass along, but Hector didn't entirely believe that.

He thought it a lot more likely that the reapers just wanted to know everything going on, because that was how reapers were.

And of course, with the developments in Sair, they had plenty of extra reason to be interested in what the scouting team had to report."
"2731

~~((Halloween Special - Page 27 of 30))~~

The atmosphere in here was tense. Normally, when so many reapers gathered together, it was a jovial affair--or at least, in Hector's experience, it was. Even when talking business or otherwise discussing quite serious subject matter, reapers always seemed to find a way to enjoy themselves.

But not this time, it would seem.

The news of Sair's defeat had affected their spirits. The same could be said of all the Rainlords in Warrenhold, of course, but these reapers seemed to be particularly different, Hector felt.

It was a little hard to explain why, though. Their collective demeanor was more serious. They didn't joke around with each other very much, anymore. But there was something else, too. Something Hector couldn't quite articulate.

A vague feeling. A kind of heat in his mind. It was both familiar and unfamiliar to him, like he should recognize it but couldn't. And it was bothering him enough that he often devoted a background thought process to just trying to puzzle out what it was.

In any case, Arumoro was at the back of the room. Hector could've gone to any of the reapers from the Vantalay team, but Arumoro was the one he'd grown the most personally familiar with. He was the reaper for Raul Blackburn, one of the mildly infamous Blackburn Triplets.

'Lord Goffe,' said Arumoro as he watched them approach. 'And Lady Edith. What brings you here?'

Hector relayed what Lynn had told him about the Sword of Unso. He made sure to qualify his statements with a level of uncertainty, wanting the reaper to take them with a grain of salt. Lynn chimed in as well, reiterating her points, and Arumoro thanked them for the information.

And that was it. That was all Hector had wanted to do here.

But before they could leave, one of the reapers from the scouting team said something that made the entire room full of reapers go quiet.

'We've just made contact with Abbas Saqqaf.'"
"2732 -- CCXLV.

~~((Halloween Special - Page 28 of 30))~~

Chapter Two Hundred Forty-Five: 'O, fledgling commander, falter not...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

The reapers all turned to look at Hector. None of the Rainlord heads were immediately present. They were all either asleep or Dimas Sebolt, the man with chronic insomnia.

It wouldn't take long for the reapers to fetch them, of course, but judging by the expressions on all these skeletal faces, they were expecting him to step up and do or say something first.

Well, then.

A part of him wanted to pretend he hadn't heard anything and just go crawl back into bed. Someone else would handle it. And Abbas probably wanted to talk to a Rainlord, not him, right? Yeah.

...Eh, who was he kidding?

He took a long, deep breath and walked over to the reaper who'd delivered the news. ""What kind of contact?"" he asked. ""Remote or direct?""

'Direct,' said the reaper. This one name's was Levinox, as Hector recalled, and he was linked with Cristina Sebolt of the scouting team. 'My servant is looking at him at this very moment.'

Hector nodded and turned to the others. ""Inform the family heads. Bring them here, please.""

'You got it.'

'Sure thing.'

'Heh, yes, sir.'

Three reapers departed instantly, followed by two more who said nothing. That number made sense, because there were currently five Rainlord heads in Warrenhold: Zeff, Dimas, Horatio, Joana, and Salvador. The only other one was Evangelina, who was in Vantalay.

'Garovel, I need you,' thought Hector as he turned back to Levinox. Garovel said something, but Hector was too busy processing what he wanted to say to Abbas to respond.

Levinox spoke up again before him, however. 'Lord Abbas is talking about their status. The Sandlords have been completely pushed out of the Drylands. They're scattered. The Vanguard has apparently regrouped in the Wetlands, but the Sandlords are having difficulty linking back up with them. They've been running into fierce opposition wherever they go.'

"2732 -- CCXLV.

~~((Halloween Special - Page 28 of 30))~~

Chapter Two Hundred Forty-Five: 'O, fledgling commander, falter not...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

The reapers all turned to look at Hector. None of the Rainlord heads were immediately present. They were all either asleep or Dimas Sebolt, the man with chronic insomnia.

It wouldn't take long for the reapers to fetch them, of course, but judging by the expressions on all these skeletal faces, they were expecting him to step up and do or say something first.

Well, then.

A part of him wanted to pretend he hadn't heard anything and just go crawl back into bed. Someone else would handle it. And Abbas probably wanted to talk to a Rainlord, not him, right? Yeah.

...Eh, who was he kidding?

He took a long, deep breath and walked over to the reaper who'd delivered the news. ""What kind of contact?"" he asked. ""Remote or direct?""

'Direct,' said the reaper. This one name's was Levinox, as Hector recalled, and he was linked with Cristina Sebolt of the scouting team. 'My servant is looking at him at this very moment.'

Hector nodded and turned to the others. ""Inform the family heads. Bring them here, please.""

'You got it.'

'Sure thing.'

'Heh, yes, sir.'

Three reapers departed instantly, followed by two more who said nothing. That number made sense, because there were currently five Rainlord heads in Warrenhold: Zeff, Dimas, Horatio, Joana, and Salvador. The only other one was Evangelina, who was in Vantalay.

'Garovel, I need you,' thought Hector as he turned back to Levinox. Garovel said something, but Hector was too busy processing what he wanted to say to Abbas to respond.

Levinox spoke up again before him, however. 'Lord Abbas is talking about their status. The Sandlords have been completely pushed out of the Drylands. They're scattered. The Vanguard has apparently regrouped in the Wetlands, but the Sandlords are having difficulty linking back up with them. They've been running into fierce opposition wherever they go."

"2733

~~((Halloween Special - Page 29 of 30))~~

""Have they talked to the governments of Callum or Intar yet?"" Hector asked. Logic would dictate that Sair's neighbors didn't want Abolish conquering it, either. They'd been dragging their feet so far, but they had to be reevaluating their positions on the matter now.

Levinox took a minute to relay Hector's question and receive an answer. 'Intar has proven difficult to reach. They have spoken to Callum, however, and unfortunately, it appears that Morgunov has promised not to invade them as long as they don't provide refuge to the Sandlords.'

Oh shit.

""And Callum's government actually believes him?"" said Hector with wide eyes.

'It would seem so,' said Levinox. 'Callumi authorities have been trying to capture them on sight, ostensibly to turn over to Abolish.'

Damn. ""Is it even safe for them to be having this conversation, right now? Is their current position secure?""

Another long pause. 'That is debatable. The Callumi authorities themselves aren't too much trouble for the Sandlords, but if they alert Abolish to their location, then the situation could worsen again.'

Hector knew what he wanted to say here. But it would be taking a huge leap. It might ruffle a few feathers.

He grit his teeth for a moment as he mulled it over.

He had to say it. Of course he did.

""If they can at least make it to Lorent, then I can provide them with a place to regroup.""

Levinox fell silent again, relaying the message.

Hector wanted to say that they were welcome in Warrenhold--because they were, of course--but at the moment, it seemed safer to just say Lorent. It was a lot closer for the Sandlords, too.

And while he didn't think the Queen would refuse to help them when her own family had ties with Sandlords, he also didn't want to test his relationship with her too much. And welcoming another group of refugees who were being hunted by one of the most powerful organizations in the world without her permission... well, that seemed like it might annoy her.

Just a bit."

"2734

~~((Halloween Special - Page 30 of 30))~~

They could work through the details later. The Queen couldn't get mad at him as long as they weren't actually coming to Atreya yet.

Well. Okay, maybe she could. But she couldn't do anything about it if she did. Lorent was outside her jurisdiction.

President Dance might have a thing or two to say about it, though--if he ever found out about it, that was.

As he waited for Abbas' response via Levinox, Hector noticed Garovel hovering there next to him. The expression on the reaper's skeletal face implied that he had something he wanted to say, but he merely remained silent.

'Lord Abbas says that would be much appreciated,' said Levinox. 'They will head for Lorent right away.'

""Do they have civilian refugees with them?"" asked Hector.

'...Yes. Many.'

Hector nodded. ""Can I get a rough estimate of the number?""

'...Perhaps three hundred.'

Hmm. Less than he'd imagined, but that amount would still prove challenging to conceal from the Lorentian government. Would it be better to just ask the Lorentians for help directly?

Maybe, but he still didn't fully trust them. He might've gained their favor, but this was an emperor of Abolish they were dealing with. If Morgunov made the same promise to the Lorentians that he did to the Callumi, they might very well agree to it. He highly doubted that they liked Hector Goffe of Atreya more than they feared the Mad Demon.

Hell, he wondered if even Queen Helen would be able to hold out against something like that.

He did not wish to find out. Yeah. It was safer for everyone if he just tried to keep everything as quiet as possible for now.

"Alright," he said. "Tell the scouting team to stick with them and keep us updated on their movements. We'll try to link up with them at the Lorent-Callum border and proceed from there."

He still had plenty of questions, particularly regarding casualties, but the situation was still too fluid for that, Hector felt. He could ask those things later, once Abbas and his group were safe."

"2735

Hector was concerned about why Abbas hadn't been able to get through to Intar. From the conversation that he'd had with Prince David not too long ago, it had seemed like the Sandlords were on fairly reasonable terms with the Intarian government. Maybe that had been too much to assume.

Or maybe there was something else going on in Intar.

Prince David had mentioned a "culture war" dividing the country at the moment, but Hector hoped that wasn't the cause of this. Surely, the Intarians would be able to see that there was an actual war going on right now and that it needed to take precedence. Their neighboring country was on the verge of collapse, after all. That had to be a wake up call for them, right?

The Rainlord heads soon arrived--Dimas first, followed by the all the rest in a group.

Naturally, they had plenty of questions that Hector didn't yet have answers for. He brought them up to speed on the conversation he'd just had.

""Just like that?"" said Zeff. ""You've already offered them asylum?""

And maybe it was the man's tone, that voice of a perpetually judgmental teacher, but Hector abruptly felt uncertain. Had that been a mistake? ""I... didn't think it would be wise to delay,"" he said, struggling to maintain his composure.

Zeff said nothing further, however. He just kept looking at Hector with that stern-as-hell face of his.

That was just his normal expression, though, Hector knew. It was intimidating, but it didn't necessarily mean that he disapproved. He shouldn't read too much into it, he decided.

Or tried to decide, at least.

He was suddenly feeling more self-conscious. Maybe because everyone was staring at him.

'You made the right call,' came Garovel's words, cloaked in the echo of privacy.

Hector had to consciously avoid reacting to that, but it was a relief to hear. Had Garovel guessed what he was thinking? Yeah, he probably did, didn't he?

Heh. Dammit."
"2736

Axiolis floated forward. 'I would like to speak to Worwal.'

Worwal was Abbas' reaper, as Hector recalled. Hector saw no reason to get in Axiolis' way and so just motioned toward Levinox. ""He said that they were heading for the border right away, so he might be too busy to talk, but feel free to give it a shot.""

Axiolis just nodded and hovered closer.

""I want to head out soon, too,"" added Hector, focusing on the urgency of the task ahead. That always seemed to be the best way of distracting himself from his feelings of insecurity. To just concentrate on what needed doing immediately. ""I'll need Levinox to come with me, so we can work out the best location to meet up.""

Dimas, who was not one to chime in very frequently, cocked an eyebrow at him. ""You intend to go personally?""

Hector didn't know why the man seemed surprised. ""Of course I do. I'd like for everything go smoothly and quietly, but if the Sandlords end up attracting attention from the Lorentians, then I should be there to help smooth things over with the government.""

The Lord Sebolt's eyes shifted to Hector's left, where Lynn was standing. ""And what of your guests?""

Ah...

Hmm.

The Queen had just talked about staying a full day at Warrenhold. Moreover, he knew that he and she still had quite a bit to discuss with regards to Lorent. If he suddenly decided to leave, it might look he was trying to avoid her--or that he just didn't care what she had to say.

Agh.

Either way, he still felt like he needed to be there for the Sandlords, right now. He'd have to go and talk to her before he left. According to Garovel, lords weren't supposed to apologize, but for inconveniencing the Queen, an exception definitely needed to be made, Hector felt."
"2737

""I'll go talk to the Queen, right now,"" said Hector. ""Levinox, please meet me at the Entry Tower in half an hour.""

'Okay.' He motioned to two other reapers behind him. 'Rokoz and Orongel are also connected to the scouting team. They should probably come with us, too, in case something happens to my connection.'

Hector paused at that, thinking it over. It was a fair point. If Cristina Sebolt somehow ended up killed, captured, or separated from the Sandlords, then meeting up with them would become a lot more difficult.

But he didn't want to overcommit, either. These three reapers were their only connection to the scouting team--and by extension, the Sandlords. The scouting team did have more non-servant members as backup, but Hector didn't want to rely on them unless he had to. The non-servants of the team were meant to provide support for the servants in the field, not to send intel back to Warrenhold. He didn't want to divide their attention any more than was absolutely necessary when lives were on the line.

""Alright, but not both of them,"" said Hector. ""One reaper needs to stay here and keep Warrenhold updated on what's happening out there.""

The three reapers looked between themselves for a moment, then gave Hector an acknowledging nod.

'Very well,' said Levinox.

And with that, he left the Rainlord heads there to converse with the scouting reapers and Sandlords. They probably had a lot to talk about and not much time to do it in.

He made his way over to the Tower of Night again.

Lynn followed, of course. ""Seems like you're being pulled in a hundred different directions, lately.""

""Sorry,"" said Hector. ""I was... really looking forward to spending time with you and the Queen tomorrow.""

""Today, you mean. It's after midnight already.""

""Right."" He wondered if there was anything he could do to make it up to them."

"2738

When they arrived at the Queen's room, Hector reached toward the door to knock on it, but her voice arrived first.

""Enter.""

They did so and found her sitting on the edge of her bed with the adjacent lamp to her turned on. Mehlsanz was floating there next to her, which explained how she'd known they were there before Hector even knocked.

There was something else, however, which probably shouldn't have been an issue but was.

The Queen was in a nightgown.

It wasn't particularly revealing, but it still made Hector feel intensely awkward all of a sudden. Where did she even get that? Hector hadn't seen any luggage when she and Lynn arrived.

Ah, Ms. Rogers had probably procured it for her, hadn't she?

""Mehlsanz informs me that something has happened,"" said Helen.

Hector did his best to explain, though it was made more difficult because he didn't know where to put his eyes.

""...So you will be leaving for Lorent immediately, then,"" she summarized.

""Y-yes.""

""I see..."

There arrived a long pause.

Then the Queen stood up from her bed and started toward the bathroom. ""What coincidental timing. I was just thinking about paying a visit to Lorent, myself.""

Hector blinked, awkwardness forgotten, and he exchanged looks with Lynn.

She seemed just as surprised.

""Y-your Highness,"" said Lynn, ""it could be very dangerous. You really shouldn't--""

""Oh, I know."" The Queen assessed her own hair in the bathroom's mirror while speaking through the open doorway. ""I will not be accompanying you on your mission. I will simply be going to Riverton, P.J. and meeting with President Dance.""

Lynn shook her head, not with disapproval but with confusion. ""What? Why?""

""I was planning to do so soon, anyway. Now seems like a good time. Hector wishes to operate discretely, no? But he has become quite famous there. My presence in Lorent will provide a helpful distraction for both the government and the media.""

"2739

That was... one way of looking at it, Hector supposed. He couldn't help feeling like there was more to her reasoning here, though. ""Are you sure it'll be that easy? Won't they also try to beef up their security while hosting such an important guest?""

""Perhaps,"" said the Queen, ""but such increases would be limited to P.J., I am sure, and you are heading for the border, are you not?""

""Yeah..."

""Then there should be no problem. And besides, if the Lorentians catch you acting suspiciously, I will be there to bail you out. So to speak.""

Hector looked to Garovel for help.

The reaper shrugged. 'Doesn't sound like we can change her mind,' he said privately.

Hector was getting that impression as well and breathed a sigh.

""Alright, then, uh... I guess I'll try to pay you a visit in P.J. when I can, then.""

""Oh?"" said the Queen, looking away from her mirror to eye him. ""You are not intending to march the Sandlords right up to Riverton Hall, I hope.""

""No, no. I'll find them a suitable place to rest first, of course.""

""In Lorent or in Atreya?'

Ah. The big question. ""Well, I was thinking Lorent first, but if you don't mind me bringing them all the way here to Warrenhold, then..."

""I do not mind. But will your Rainlords?""

""No, they're worried about them even more than we are.""

""Mm.""

He still couldn't see her again, and he couldn't tell what she was doing.

""I, uh... I gotta say, Your Highness, I'm a little surprised that you aren't pushing back more against providing refuge for them..."

""Hmph. I resent what you are implying. Abbas Saqqaf himself has come to you for help. What did you imagine I would do? Order you to turn a blind eye like some stone-hearted louse?""

""No, I just mean... I know it's not exactly an ideal situation.""

"2740

""Heh. You have a talent for understatement, Hector."" She moved away from the mirror and disappeared deeper into the bathroom. ""But the Sandlords are our allies--and valuable ones, at that. If they have come to us in their hour of need, we should not turn them away.""

Hector could only agree.

And yet, it did feel a little strange, hearing all this from her. While the Sandlords were indeed allies, there was the minor issue of Helen's own relationship with them.

It wasn't even a year ago when Helen had been run out of Sescoria by a handful of Abolish terrorists. Certainly, if she had been able to acquire the Sandlords' aid at that critical time, they would have been able to make quick work of Abolish--and saved everyone a lot of trouble in the process.

But obviously, that hadn't happened.

Atreya's alliance with the Sandlords stemmed from a political marriage between Helen's brother, Prince Meriwether, and Nasira Saqqaf. And while Prince Meriwether had turned against the conspirators at the end, he had still been a part of the inner circle that had ousted her in the first place.

So ultimately, in the Queen's own hour of need, she could not go to the Sandlords for help. Yet here she now was, telling him that they needed to behave like good allies.

She wasn't wrong, of course, but Hector couldn't help sensing a level of awkwardness beneath this whole situation. He had to wonder if she harbored any feelings of resentment toward them.

Probably not, he figured. She was the Queen. She had to be dignified and stuff. Above that kind of thing.

...Right?

""You're not concerned about Atreya getting dragged into the war by helping them?"" asked Hector.

""Of course I am concerned about that,"" said the Queen. ""But I am also concerned about the war coming to our doorstep while we have few strong allies who are willing and able to support us.""

"2741

'I have to agree,' said Garovel. 'If Abolish manages to conquer western Sair as well, then that will almost certainly pull the neighboring Intarians into the war, whether they like it or not. And if Intar enters, it has the power to impact all five war fronts at once. Which is why I'm thinking that Abolish won't actually try to finish Sair off--or at least, not yet. It seems more likely to me that they will want to expand their influence AROUND Intar first.'

'Which would mean invading Callum next,' said Meslhanz, 'followed by Lorent, and then quite possibly Atreya.'

'Yes,' said Garovel. 'I doubt they consider us anything more than a speck on the map, at the moment, so there's a slight chance they might just pass us by and not even bother invading, but that's one of the best-case scenarios, as far as I'm concerned.'

'I don't know about that,' said Mehlsanz. 'The best-cases would all involve Abolish being defeated before even getting close to us again.'

'Mm. Call me a pessimist, but that sounds too optimistic to even humor.'

The Queen reemerged from the bathroom, having redonné her dark attire from when she'd first arrived at Warrenhold. ""In any case, we should not dawdle. Matters must be attended to. I look forward to seeing you in Lorent, Hector. Hopefully, we have a greater opportunity for a long talk.""

From there, the conversation didn't last much longer. They said their goodbyes and went their separate ways, the Queen and Lynn leaving first.

Hector made a quick trip over to his own room since it was so close and changed into some clothes that he didn't mind getting destroyed. Unfortunately, he didn't have a black cloak at his disposal like his royal guests did, but he had plenty of dark coats and pants--and of course, the Scarf of Amordiin.

It didn't take him long before he was ready, and he made for the Entry Tower to meet up with Levinox."

"2742

When he arrived, he found the reaper in question there waiting for him.

Along with a whole bunch of other people.

And for some reason, Hector found that surprising. He'd intended to go alone, but that seemed like an altogether foolish notion all of a sudden--not because it would be dangerous for him to do so, but just because the Rainlords simply wouldn't allow it.

The sight of them all there pulled a faint smile out of him as he approached. ""You guys really don't need to come with me,"" he tried, knowing it was most likely a futile effort.

'Yeah, what are you all thinking?' said Mevox, the reaper of Salvador Delaguna. 'We'll be just fine without your help.'

'Ah, yes, agreed,' said Iziol. 'Dimas and I must obviously go with him, but the rest of you are unneeded.'

'You're all adorable,' said Voreese, only then making Hector notice that she and Roman were there in the crowd. 'Roman and I are all the assistance Hector needs. Too many of you clods will just slow us down.'

Axiolis hovered forward as well. 'Amusing, but let us be serious. A large group would attract attention. You wish to be fast and quiet, yes? Then we should send only those of us who are most suited to that end.'

'Heh, well, no offense, but I'd say that eliminates ol' Zeffy boy,' said Mevox.

Zeff gave the reaper a look but said nothing.

'As much as we might like to accompany you, we feel that it is best we stay here,' said Axiolis.

Which Hector found surprising. And quite agreeable. Zeff did have Marcos and Ramira to look after, so it made plenty of sense.

'I'm glad you think so,' said Garovel. 'We'll be more at ease knowing that Warrenhold is safe in your hands.'

Axiolis just nodded."

"2743

""A part of me thinks that you should be staying as well,"" said Zeff, looking at Hector. ""Any among us could serve as a reasonable liaison without putting you in danger.""

Hector met the man's hard gaze for a moment. His tone was harsh, but Hector still somehow sensed a warmth in them.

Zeff was worried about him. Or he just didn't think Hector could handle it. Maybe a little of both.

""...Only 'a part' of you thinks that?"" said Hector, trying to restrain his smile.

Zeff did not react to his prodding, however, and merely maintained the same stony expression as always.

Well, that was fine. Hector decided to change the subject. ""A small group, then,"" he said. ""Dimas and Roman are easy choices because you both have such great aerial mobility.""

Those two exchanged glances with one another.

""Hmm,"" Hector continued, ""and I feel like Mevox will throw a fit if I don't bring him and Salvador.""

'Whoa, hey now!' said Mevox. 'I take offense to that, Mr. Warrenlord! You're not allowed to talk that kind of shit to me! We don't know each other well enough yet!'

""Oh, I think he knows plenty about you already,"" said Salvador with a chortle.

'Ah, and you've turned my own servant against me, I see. Truly, a wicked mind is leading this operation. I fear for all our safety now.'

""We can leave him behind, if you want,"" said Salvador. ""Lock him in an iron box. I give you my consent.""

'I'm pretty sure it's MY consent that's important here!'

""Eh.""

Hector assessed the remaining candidates. Horatio Blackburn, Joana Cortes, and a few more Sebolts and Delagunas. ""Horatio and Joana, I would like the two of you to stay, as well.""

They both frowned.

""Why?"" said Joana."

"2744

Because she was Zeff's one and only sister, that was why. Plus, her husband Rick was incredibly helpful in the reconstruction of Warrenhold. But most of all, Hector didn't want to take so many of the family heads with him.

Only the last reason sounded good enough to vocalize, though. ""I don't think it would be wise to bring the heads of all the families. We already have Evangelina out in the field.""

Joana's frown deepened, but she said nothing further.

Horatio's expression was tough to read. The man looked a bit haggard, but he usually looked that way, of late. He and Dimas had only very recently become the heads of their respective Houses, but Horatio seemed to be having a significantly harder time with the transition than Dimas did.

Many times now, Hector had wondered why that might be. He'd offered to lend the man an ear, if he needed one, but Horatio always politely declined.

Truthfully, Hector was worried about the guy in more ways than just one. Sending him out on a mission right now didn't seem like a good idea, if for no other reason than because he still seemed to be finding his footing.

All the Houses had suffered in one way or another, but House Blackburn was in an especially peculiar situation. The former head, Ismael Blackburn, had been killed by Ivan at Dunehall. Right in front of Hector's eyes, no less. And in the aftermath, his wife, Nere Blackburn, apparently had a mental breakdown. Hence why they had all turned to Horatio and not her.

However, Nere had recently returned to taking a leadership role. Sort of. From what Hector had seen, it was mostly Sentsia, the woman's reaper, who did the talking.

It was all quite odd, and Hector could tell that there was a lot more going on with them than he knew about. He hoped that he would be able to grow closer with them one day and learn more of their history--and of what was troubling them so much, perhaps--but he didn't want to rush things. They were a grieving family, after all."

"2745

With the team more or less decided on, there wasn't much else to do other than leave. A couple more Rainlords ended up joining from House Sebolt--as well with Matteo Delaguna, as always. Hector had been about to ask where that guy was when he suddenly appeared, clad all in black and ready to go.

They ascended the Entry Tower together and headed over to the halfway-constructed garage. When finished, it would be similar in size to the underground bunker that Hector and Colt had used when on the run from the law. This one connected to the Entry Tower just below the top level and already had enough space in it for a dozen or so large vehicles.

At the moment, there were only a few here, but the team didn't need more than one. They all piled into a black SUV, save Roman and Dimas. Matteo got behind the wheel, started the engine, and drove it up the ramp and out onto the freshly-paved surface.

Matteo just headed toward the gate, apparently thinking that they would be driving the whole way there.

Dimas Sebolt, however, had other plans.

The vehicle lifted off the ground, ignoring gravity and flying over to Dimas and Roman, who were already headed north.

Hector had the front passenger seat, and Matteo just gave him a flat look along with a few dull blinks. Then he turned the engine off again and sighed before leaning back in his seat.

Hector hadn't quite expected Dimas to just take the initiative like this, either, but it did seem pretty convenient. And from what Hector understood, after what had happened to his last two airplanes, Roman hadn't been eager to get his hands on a third one just yet, even as a rental.

It wasn't the most comfortable flight, of course. The car wasn't exactly aerodynamic, and it definitely wasn't pressurized properly; but that didn't bother the group of undead servants and incorporeal reapers very much."

"2746

Hector wondered if Dimas could somehow make this a more viable means of travel for normal people. Could his gravity alteration power be used to vacuum seal and pressurize the vehicle? Or could it be used to counter the effects of air resistance to mitigate turbulence?

He felt like it might be doable, but without knowing more about the Dimas' power actually functioning on a technical level, Hector couldn't be sure. At the very least, it seemed like it would be a lot more complicated than just wrapping the car in a gravity bubble.

Whatever the case, they appeared to be moving at pretty good clip.

The landscape below was mostly dark, but the lights from roadways and small homesteads were passing by relatively quickly. In that regard, at least, it didn't feel much different from a normal flight.

Lorent was a big country, though, and its border with Callum was pretty far. It would probably be a few hours before they arrived, Hector figured. And with all the noise from the roaring wind, it was almost impossible to hold a conversation.

With physical voices, at least.

The reapers settled in rather quickly and began talking, as usual.

Garovel asked one question in particular that caught Hector's attention. 'Have you been able to learn anything else from Lord Abbas about the situation in Sair?'

'Indeed,' said Levinox. 'Even before their forces in Kuros were scattered, many of their people were already unaccounted for. He doesn't have confirmed numbers at the moment, but he fears that even after regrouping, there will be a large number who are MIA.'

'Does he know the whereabouts of Lord Asad Najir?' said Garovel.

'Zeff asked that earlier,' said Levinox. 'Abbas said that Asad is currently unaccounted for, but that he was on the front line at Uego, where the heat of the battle took place.'

Oh no.

The reaper said nothing further, but he didn't have to."
"2747

Hector tried to keep listening, but he found it difficult. Even with Focus allowing him to divide his attention, it was hard to let any of what the reapers were saying into his head now. They were saying something about machines and armor, but Hector's mind was too far gone.

If Asad had been on the front line, where the Mad Demon himself had been, then anything could have happened. He could be captured or dead or even still fighting for his life at this very moment. He could've been on the run or trapped somewhere or leading his own band of refugees like Abbas.

Hector just didn't understand how this could be true. Rasalased would have warned him. He would have. This made no sense. So was Levinox wrong? Was Abbas mistaken?

The Shard was right here in his pocket. Hector had been sure to bring it with him.

He'd been trying to contact Rasalased again ever since that night when he accidentally did it while asleep, but after so many repeated failures, he'd begun to think it was just straight up impossible. That night must have been a fluke or something. He'd been about ready to call it quits, at least until he thought of some other way to approach the problem.

But now.

Now he was just mad. And confused. Something obviously wasn't right here.

He needed to understand. More than anything else, he needed that. It was the single most important thing in the world, at the moment. Why the fuck had Rasalased not warned him about what was going to happen? Did Rasalased just not know? Was Morgunov just that powerful? Was Asad actually just fine? Or was something else going on entirely?

Unconsciously, he reached into the vest pocket of his coat and clutched the Shard tightly with one hand. And with frustration filling his mind, with emotion and determination filling his heart, he closed his eyes and concentrated, pouring as much of his soul power into the Shard as he could possibly cram in there."

"2748 -- CCXLVI.

And instantly, he felt an enormous shift take place.

His mind was divided more noticeably than a moment ago. He was still in the car, being carried through the sky. He could sense himself there, feel his limbs, hear the half-muted words of the reapers passing through his head.

He was somewhere else, too. Somewhere different. Deeper. Yet still tethered to himself.

Maybe this was what they called an out-of-body experience.

Hmm. Or maybe not. It felt similar to when he'd contacted Rasalased the last time, but not exactly the same. Probably because his physical body wasn't asleep.

Or was it? Shit, this was confusing. He felt split, yet whole. Near, yet far.

And the Shard. It was in his hand, yet all around him. It pulsed with life, reverberating like a heartbeat. Like his own heartbeat.

""Young Hector,"" came that familiar voice.

Chapter Two Hundred Forty-Six: 'O, drowning Sand...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

""Rasalased,"" said Hector. ""Finally. I've been trying to reach you for days now.""

""Yes, you have.""

That response gave him pause. ""...Have you been avoiding me?""

""Yes, I have.""

""Why? You know what's happening out there, don't you? You must!""

""Because terrible though it may be, I knew you would seek to interfere, had I warned you.""

Hector took a moment to think about that. ""You think I would've run in to fight Morgunov like some kind of moron?""

""No."" The Dry God allowed a beat to pass. ""Then again, perhaps, yes. But that is not the only reason I wished for you not to interfere.""

""And what does that mean?""

""Morgunov, as you call him, may be exactly who the Lion needed to encounter.""

""What?!"

""It is difficult to explain.""

""Yeah, it sounds like it! But I'd like you to try, anyway!""

""You must promise not to go after the Lion, Young Hector. There can be no victory if you do.""

"2748 -- CCXLVI.

And instantly, he felt an enormous shift take place.

His mind was divided more noticeably than a moment ago. He was still in the car, being carried through the sky. He could sense himself there, feel his limbs, hear the half-muted words of the reapers passing through his head.

He was somewhere else, too. Somewhere different. Deeper. Yet still tethered to himself.

Maybe this was what they called an out-of-body experience.

Hmm. Or maybe not. It felt similar to when he'd contacted Rasalased the last time, but not exactly the same. Probably because his physical body wasn't asleep.

Or was it? Shit, this was confusing. He felt split, yet whole. Near, yet far.

And the Shard. It was in his hand, yet all around him. It pulsed with life, reverberating like a heartbeat. Like his own heartbeat.

""Young Hector,"" came that familiar voice.

Chapter Two Hundred Forty-Six: 'O, drowning Sand...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

""Rasalased,"" said Hector. ""Finally. I've been trying to reach you for days now.""

""Yes, you have.""

That response gave him pause. ""...Have you been avoiding me?""

""Yes, I have.""

""Why? You know what's happening out there, don't you? You must!""

""Because terrible though it may be, I knew you would seek to interfere, had I warned you.""

Hector took a moment to think about that. ""You think I would've run in to fight Morgunov like some kind of moron?""

""No."" The Dry God allowed a beat to pass. ""Then again, perhaps, yes. But that is not the only reason I wished for you not to interfere.""

""And what does that mean?""

""Morgunov, as you call him, may be exactly who the Lion needed to encounter.""

""What?!""

""It is difficult to explain.""

""Yeah, it sounds like it! But I'd like you to try, anyway!""

""You must promise not to go after the Lion, Young Hector. There can be no victory if you do.""

"2749

Hector put two and two together. ""Are you telling me that Morgunov is currently holding Asad hostage?""

Rasalased made no response, however.

""And you know where they are, too,"" Hector surmised.

""It matters little. I will not tell you something that will only lead to your own demise.""

Well. Hector didn't necessarily disagree on that particular point. He might've been able to skate by with Ivan and Leo, but those were just freak accidents. There was absolutely no way in hell that he would be able to pull anything like that off again, much less against the Mad Demon, of all people.

But hearing Rasalased say all that made Hector curious about something else. ""...You're actually able to see my death? That far into the future?""

""It would not be very far at all. Trust me.""

""Ah..."" Okay. Damn. That degree of roasting felt a little uncalled for, but alright. ""Er... can you at least confirm for me that Asad is safe, right now?""

""Of course he is not safe. He has never been in more danger in his life.""

Hector sighed. ""You're not helping your case here, Rasalased...""

""It is an experience that he must have, else he will be unable to grow and meet me.""

""Say what? How could that be true?""

""I will not lie to you. He may die. Morgunov may simply extract what he pleases from the Lion and then kill him immediately. But the reaper has escaped, and the risk, I believe, is worth it. No other opportunity may arise.""

That brought a whole host of new questions to Hector's mind, but one in particular stood out. ""What does Morgunov want from Asad?""

""Me, I suspect.""

""What?!""

""Morgunov seeks that which lies beyond this world. And he believes I may be able to help him find it. This much, he has made obvious. But his intentions thereafter, I do not know. Chaos guards his mind.""

"2750

Hector's thoughts were racing. Morgunov was after Rasalased? Worse news, he could hardly imagine. ""What do you intend to do?""

""The only thing that I can. Wait.""

""Are you kidding? You plan to just LET Morgunov find you?""

""As much as he seeks to use me, I too seek to use him. There is much I may be able to learn from such an experience. Which is not something I can often say.""

Oh god, what the fuck? ""But you have no idea what he'll do to you!""

""Yes.""

""And--there's still Asad! He's--!""

""Yes. This will be difficult for him.""

Hector couldn't believe what he was hearing. Rasalased sounded so cold. So matter-of-fact.

But maybe he shouldn't have been surprised. In their first encounter, sure, Rasalased had made a favorable impression upon him. He'd seemed a little mixed up, but Hector's overall feeling was that the Dry God ultimately wanted what was best for everyone. For him. For the Sandlords. For the Rainlords, too.

Was it really that straightforward, though? Were people always as uncomplicated as that? What about ""gods,"" then?

Rasalased barely even seemed human now. What did he really want, Hector wondered? Being trapped in the Shards like that--what could he want? It wasn't like he was devoid of all desires or anything, right? He'd ""wanted"" to help Hector before, seemingly.

Hmm.

""...You are disappointed in me,"" said Rasalased.

Was he? Perhaps he was. ""I'm just... trying to understand you, is all.""

""It is not through safe journeys and easy trials that great deeds are achieved, Young Hector.""

Hector still didn't like what he was hearing, but he tried to listen carefully. ""...Okay. But what 'great deed' are you trying to achieve, then?""

""Me? Nothing at all. My only aim is to help others do thusly. My time has long passed.""

""...Time is not time, Rasalased.""

And for a while, the Dry God remained quiet. ""Heh. Perhaps so.""
"2751

""What you decide to do now,"" said Hector, ""could have... no, it will have very far-reaching consequences.""

""I am aware.""

""Are you? If you allow Morgunov to get his hands on you--""

""We will have an interesting conversation. I have been wanting to meet these modern 'emperors' and evaluate them. It will be a good opportunity. And a dangerous one.""

Hector wanted to sigh. Maybe he needed to rethink his approach here. He recalled something that Garovel told him about the Shards, about them being catalysts for unlocking great power. That had to be what Rasalased was getting at here, in his own roundabout way.

""...You want Asad to harness the power of your Shards, don't you?"" said Hector.

""Heh.""

What? What did 'heh' mean? Agh. ""Rasalased...""

""If I allow the new Lion to unseal my soul, it would do more than simply amplify his strength. Much more.""

""Er... what do you mean, exactly?""

""There is far too much to explain, Young Hector. But as a Shardkeeper, you must already have some idea of what I speak, no?""

""Uh... Shardkeeper? I didn't realize this thing came with a title, too...""

The Dry God gave a brief laugh that seemed to make the whole world tremble. ""Well, you are a bit more than a Shardkeeper, in truth. That title refers merely to anyone who holds one of my Shards, however fleeting. Shardkeepers are not normally able to converse with me so easily.""

""Er, I see...""

""If and when the Lion unseals my soul, all Shardkeepers will have their strength amplified as well. But as so few Shards remain, that includes only you and Young Emiliana Eirwen Elroy.""

Oh. Right.

Yeah, Garovel had mentioned that, too, hadn't he? Somehow, Hector had forgotten about that part. He'd thought it was just Asad who would be affected.

""What bitter irony that a Rainlord should now be counted among my Shardkeepers. And a trustworthy one, at that. The world truly is an absurd place.""

"2752

Hector wasn't quite sure what to say now. A power boost from the Shards sounded pretty fucking sweet, quite frankly.

""And there would be other effects as well,"" said Rasalased. ""As I said, there is far too much explain.""

""Well, I'm not busy. I've got plenty of... opportunity to listen to you, right now.""

""Heh. Yes. But there are more important matters to discuss, no?""

Were there? Shit, there probably were.

""You never know what may happen. Our conversations have a way of ending prematurely.""

Okay, now that was definitely true. He'd always kinda felt like Rasalased was to blame for that, though. Hmm.

""Ask about what you feel is most pressing, Young Hector.""

If he didn't know any better, he would've thought Ras was worried about time.

But he wasn't wrong. And the more he thought about it, the more Hector realized there was a still a rather obvious point of concern. ""...What if Morgunov gets his hands on one of the Shards? That'd make him a Shardkeeper, too, wouldn't it?""

""Indeed. Which is why I do not intend to let the Lion unseal my soul until he is free again.""

""Hmm.""

""But that is only my intent. If I feel that I am left with no other choice, I may allow it before then.""

""Ah... you mean if Morgunov threatens to kill Asad and Qorvass if you don't let him unlock the power?""

""No. I would sooner let the new Lion die than allow my power to fall into Morgunov's hands.""

Shit. Brutal. Hector had a rather strong feeling that Asad and Qorvass would agree with that sentiment, though. But that did beg the question. ""How would you end up with no other choice, then?""

""If the existence of all my remaining kin were to be threatened--truly threatened--then that may change my mind. It would depend on the circumstances.""

"2753

He was talking about the complete destruction of Sandlords.

Genocide, Hector realized.

And by all accounts, the Mad Demon of Abolish was absolutely someone who might try to make that happen--especially if he discovered that it would motivate Rasalased.

Aw, fuck. Hector could already see this going terribly.

""...And how do you expect Asad to escape Morgunov's clutches?""

""That, I do not know. But there is little chance that Morgunov will kill him before getting what he wants.""

Well, that was true, Hector supposed. They probably had time on their hands, though Hector could only imagine what type of horrible captivity Asad must have been enduring, right now.

Agh, he wished he could do more. Even if Ras was willing to tell him where Asad was, what difference would it make? Short of Sermung himself, who in the world could possibly hope to rescue Asad Najir?

Hmm.

The more he thought about it, the more that seemed like the only real option.

""...Rasalased, do you know anything about Sermung? Like, his current whereabouts, I mean?""

""You would seek his aid?""

""Eh, I just... I don't know. That would be pretty dangerous for me to do while the Rainlords are in my home. But, uh... it was just a thought, I guess. So you can't, like, sense his super-powerful soul from afar or something?""

""I am afraid not. The world is a large and crowded place. And the strongest among you often have a desire to conceal yourselves.""

""Are you saying Sermung is able to hide his soul power from you?""

""Perhaps. Perhaps not.""

Ah. Hector had been wondering when that shit would start again.

""It may help if I knew where to search for him. Alas, I do not.""

Damn. Hector had to wonder what the most powerful man in the world was doing right now. Maybe he was outside his area of expertise here, but this seemed like exactly the kind of problem that the Crystal Titan would be interested in."

"2754

Surely, the emperor of the Vanguard would want to prevent an emperor of Abolish from acquiring new and dangerous power. But other than himself, how many people knew about this situation, Hector wondered? It certainly seemed like the Sandlords had been trying to keep Rasalased's existence a secret, so it was a fair bet that Sermung didn't know what Morgunov's plan here was.

Which meant that someone needed to tell him... unless, of course, the Sandlords had already managed to. But from the sound of things, they'd been far too busy.

Agh. He was probably just being presumptuous, though. This was the Vanguard. They had all kinds of resources at their disposal. They even had their own teams of Sparrows, according to Hanton Gaolanet. Their spy network was probably spectacular.

...But if that were true, then why had Sermung allowed this to happen in the first place? If he knew what Morgunov was after, he would've surely come to Sair himself and stopped him, right?

Hmm.

Yeah, this was above his pay-grade for sure, Hector figured.

He could worry about that later. He didn't know how much longer this conversation would last, so he tried to think of what else he should ask about.

It didn't take him long to come up with something. ""The last time we spoke, you told me to be wary of pretenders.""

""Yes.""

""What did you mean?""

""Was that not clear? Those who sought to use you for their own gain? Those who hid their true intentions from you? Those who harbored dark secrets within their souls? There were many who fit the term.""

""Ah... but could you, like, gimme some names or something?""

""I am not good with names.""

""Oh, right, you told me something like that before, didn't you?""

""Ah, did I? Splendid. No further explanation is required, then.""

""Well, I don't know about that. Maybe you could narrow--""

""What are your intentions for my kin, Young Hector? You are going to meet them, are you not?""

"2755

""Yeah, alright, just ignore me. That's fine."" Hector didn't think he would be able to get Rasalased to talk about anything he didn't want to. ""But, uh... regarding the Sandlords, I just want to help them stay safe. Beyond that, I wouldn't say I really have any 'intentions' for them.""

""Is that so?""

""Er. Yeah. Why do you sound so curious about that?"" Hector might've been squinting with his physical body, but he couldn't quite tell in this weird headspace or whatever it was. ""Hold on. Can't you just read my mind or something?""

""Alas, I cannot.""

""What? Why not? You were doing that all the time before.""

""Yes, but your aura has grown significantly since then.""

Hector stuck on that remark for a moment. Yeah, there was another subject he needed to ask about. ""What can you tell me about auras?""

""It is a power that belongs to all, though few are able to sense it. Even I can only do so in a limited capacity.""

""It seems to be a specialty of the Sparrows,"" said Hector.

""Ah, yes, the Wrobels. You are being careful of them, I trust?""

""Er, yeah.""

""...Your answer lacks confidence, Young Hector.""

""Well, that's not too abnormal for me.""

""Hrm.""

""Anyway, keep telling me about auras, please. So they're like a hidden power that everyone has? Even non-servants?""

Rasalased took a moment before continuing. ""Yes. And no.""

""Ah, thanks for clearing that up.""

""Theoretically, I believe, all may possess the power of aura. But not all do.""

""Uh, okay..."

""I believe it is because an aura is not itself an independent power.""

""...What do you mean?"

""Your materialization, for example. That is an independent power. It relies not on anything else, other than you. Your soul power, as well. That is independent.""

""Hmm. But don't those both 'depend' on the connection I have with my reaper?"

""Yes, but that is a different manner of dependency than that which I speak of. Your materialization and soul power do not directly affect one another. If one grows, it does not impact your skill with the other.""

"2756

""So you're telling me aura is dependent on another power?"

""Yes. You might say that it is a product of your entire self. All of your abilities. Even the parts of you which hold no physical power, such as your emotions and memories, are retained within your aura.""

""Huh..." Hector supposed that made sense with what he knew of auras so far. It was still a little strange to imagine, though. ""So... if my aura continues to grow, what will it do for me? Like, what are the actual effects of it?"

""Ah. A good question. Ultimately, no two auras are identical. Many may share similar attributes--especially if the individuals they belong to are of similar mindsets--but their effects can vary greatly.""

""Hmm.""

""An aura born from a vicious murderer will have quite different effects than one born from a gentle nurturer, for example.""

""I see. And how is a new aura 'born,' exactly?""

""Another good question. Had I still a body, perhaps I would be researching that very subject.""

""You don't even have a guess?""

""Perhaps. Perhaps not.""

Yep. On the whole, Hector couldn't be too disappointed. Rasalased seemed to be more coherent now than in any of their previous conversations. He felt like he was learning a lot. ""Okay, uh... then can you tell me what the current effects of my aura are?""

""Hrm. No.""

Well, fuck. ""Really? Not at all?""

""It is shielding your thoughts from me. That much is obvious.""

""Right...""

""Yours is a peculiar aura.""

""Uh. It is?""

""Yes. It is warm and friendly, yet not docile. It is comforting, yet not self-certain. It is protective, yet also somewhat aggressive, as if readying itself to boil.""

Hector wasn't too sure what to make of any of that, especially those last bits. Aggressive? Really? And it was supposed to be a reflection of himself?

Hmm."

"2757

""If you find that concerning,"" said Rasalased, ""then you should be mindful of precisely what kind of man you are becoming.""

Hector mulled that point over. ""...You think I'm turning into a bad person?"

"Heh. Not at all, Young Hector. However, I think a man who never questions himself in these ways is not a man who should be trusted to determine right from wrong."

It sounded a bit like a lecture was coming his way, but Hector couldn't help pausing at the Dry God's words. This struck a chord with what Garovel had been talking about not too long ago, worrying about how much he had changed in a relatively short amount of time.

As much as a part of him wanted to dismiss Rasalased's concerns here, Hector felt like he should be careful. This was the wisdom of literal ancients that he was listening to. Just because it made him uncomfortable or because he didn't want to believe it could be true--that wasn't good enough reason to reject it without first giving it real consideration.

"Your power and influence are growing, Young Hector. This much is clear. And as a result, your role in events to come shall similarly change. Despite your age, you are fast approaching a point at which many older servants begin to struggle with the nature of their existence. The sweet allure of countless ideas and philosophies--born from your own mind and others--will eventually find you and try to win your favor. Some may even succeed, to the betterment of all.

"But if you are unable to pick and choose well, to hold true, then the suffering of one shall inevitably become the suffering of many. Your misery shall spread through the world like a plague, until eventually, if you are lucky, some kind soul finally grants you the heroic mercy of ending your monstrous life."

Holy fuck."

"2758

As Hector listened, he felt like he barely understood what Rasalased was trying to say, but if nothing else, it definitely seemed important. "...You've seen that type of thing happen before, I take it?"

"Of course," said Rasalased. "Even for non-servants, the confrontation with the self is all but inevitable. The weight of decades or even centuries of experience, knowledge, and responsibility--it will instigate one form of change or another. You have already seen this, too, have you not? With that sheep of yours."

Ah. Hmm. ""Leo had his mind messed with by Ettol, though.""

""Perhaps. Or perhaps he merely had his existing traits amplified. It seems reasonable to me that the so-called God of Impulse might be able to prey upon one's weaknesses in such a way.""

Not a very comforting thought. Hector wanted to ask Ras about Ettol again, but he recalled him saying that he didn't know about him beyond the name. Better to stick to more immediately relevant and useful subjects, Hector figured. ""What's your opinion of Abbas Saqqaf?""

""Names mean little to me, Young Hector.""

""Oh, uh... the current head of Hahl Saqqaf? You know the name Saqqaf, at least, right?"" Which brought another question to the forefront of Hector's mind. ""Hey, what Hahl did you belong to, by the way?""

""You ask questions faster than I can answer them.""

""Er, sorry...""

""I was born to Hahl Duxan.""

""Oh. So Lord Hasan Duxan is your direct descendant, then?""

""No, the main family branch has deviated many times for a multitude of reasons.""

""Ah..."" Hmm, maybe that was a dumb thing to say.

""But yes, I am familiar with Hahl Saqqaf. How strange it is that they now hold so much power over my kin. I remember when they were naught but an afterthought among the Hahls. The weakest and most easily forgotten, by far.""

"2759

""Is that resentment I hear in your voice?"" said Hector.

""Heh. Perhaps. But they are my kin, nonetheless. A different part of me is proud of what they have achieved. Including Abbas, of course."

"So you do know who he is, then."

"I have been following the head of Hahl Saqqaf's exploits for many years now, yes. But only just now, thanks to you, did I learn his name."

"That's... pretty weird, but alright. I guess, um, back when you helped me against the Salesman of Death, you knew that Lord Abbas was going to show up and help me, didn't you?"

"Ah. I knew of the possibility, yes. There could have been many other outcomes, however. Truthfully, I did not expect him to emerge victorious in that battle."

Hector paused at that bit of news. "Excuse me? What did you expect to happen, then?"

"I thought it more likely that the deal you struck with the Salesman, as you called him, would be the deciding factor."

Hector had to think back. That whole situation felt like some kind of crazy fever dream in his memory now, and it was a bit difficult to recall it with perfect clarity.

The "deal" that he'd struck with the Salesman of Death had, in short, been to help Abolish seize control of the Golden Fort in exchange for sparing the lives of the Rainlords.

And yeah, Hector remembered that the deal had been more or less agreed upon when Abbas Saqqaf suddenly showed up in his mechanized armor and took down the Salesman single-handedly. That had been unexpected, for sure.

But to think that it had surprised even Rasalased...

Hmm.

"So you thought I'd be in a really terrible situation right now," said Hector. "Caught between a deal with Abolish that threatened the lives of everyone I cared about and trying to help the Sandlords."

"Indeed."

"Great. That's, uh... real comforting, Rasalased."

"2760

""I would have offered more aid to you, assuming we were able to speak again thereafter,"" said the Dry God.

""...Did you have any reason to think that we would speak again?"" said Hector.

""Hrm. Does hope count as a reason?""

""Ugh..."

Rasalased laughed. ""In any event, I was quite impressed by Abbas Saqqaf. It is a relief to know that one so capable leads my kin during these uncertain times.""

Hector caught that last word and held onto it for a while, thinking. ""You seem... a little different, Rasalased.""

""Do I?""

""Yeah. You're a little more... chipper, I guess. And you keep saying the word 'time' without telling me how it's not actually time or whatever.""

""I see.""

And silence arrived.

Hector waited, but it seemed like he would have to be the one to say something again. ""You feelin' okay?""

""Now that you mention, I suppose I do feel a bit different from usual. How odd.""

""Do you have any idea why that might be?""

""Well, time is indeed not time. Perhaps I have just grown a bit forgetful. Thank you for reminding me.""

""That wasn't really what I was trying to--""

""I shall try to be more vigilant in the future.""

""Oh. Uh. Good..."

""Alas, this conversation should come to an end. You will be arriving soon, and your attention should remain focused on my kin. Thank you for keeping me company, Young Hector.""

""Er, ah, no problem. Any, uh, last second advice for me?""

""Hold true, as always, Young Hector.""

""Ah...""

He didn't even get to say farewell before he was booted back into reality.

Hector blinked and shook his head, feeling a similar level of disorientation as waking up from a deep sleep. It took him a second to realize that he was in the same place, the front passenger seat of a car as it soared through the night sky."

"2761

The reapers were still conversing about one thing or another, but he could barely catch what they were they were saying. It seemed like they still had a bit more time before arrival.

His mind lingered on that conversation with Rasalased for a while, going over everything they'd talked about.

In the end, though, he couldn't help coming away with this very uncomfortable feeling. This feeling like Rasalased had been keeping something from him, like the Dry God had ended things prematurely for some reason.

And with everything else going on in the world right now, Hector didn't appreciate all the terrible things that might imply.

It made him wonder if something was going on with Asad, with his imprisonment. Or with something else entirely, perhaps. Considering how Rasalased had apparently chosen not to warn him about the attack on Sair, it wasn't outside the realm of possibility that the Dry God might do something like that again.

Hector sighed.

It was understandable, he supposed. Rasalased had his own reasons. Of course he did. Hector couldn't exactly fault him for that.

He couldn't help feeling a bit disillusioned, though. He'd have to be careful of growing too reliant on Rasalased for guidance.

At length, the deafening howl of wind around the vehicle began to lessen, and Hector could see the ground approaching through the window. Dimas Sebolt set the car down in the middle of an empty road.

Everyone exited together, wanting to stretch their legs and take in the landscape. They seemed to be pretty far away from civilization, though, because there wasn't much light to work with. Only the stars and a dim moon staved off pitch blackness.

According to Levinox, Abbas' group was already quite close. The reaper had been in constant communication with them, coordinating their approach by feeding information to Dimas during the flight."

"2762

His conversation with Rasalased hadn't felt all that long, but he knew full well that there was some sort of time dilation effect. The same thing had happened when he talked to him in his sleep. Most likely, several hours had already passed.

Yet even so, Hector was a bit surprised to hear that the Sandlords had made it all the way across Callum so quickly. Sure, they had already been in the country by the time his own party had left Warrenhold, so the distance traveled was probably similar or perhaps even shorter; but still, he'd expected the Callumi authorities to prove more of a hindrance to the Sandlords' progress.

Not to mention, there were supposed to be three hundred civilians with them. Hector wondered how Abbas' group was managing to move so many so quickly.

According to the reapers, the Lorent-Callum border was only a short hike to the east, but Hector couldn't see any kind of barrier out there in the dark. Only open plains. Hector asked Garovel privately if there were any nearby guards on patrol, but apparently, that wasn't a problem, either.

It was convenient, but it also made Hector concerned about the overall safety of Lorent as a nation. There was a war going on, and it was literally headed in this direction. Border security should've probably been something of a priority at the moment, shouldn't it have?

Maybe he would broach that subject the next time he visited Riverton Hall.

'Hold on,' said Levinox, drawing everyone's glance. 'The Sandlords are not alone, anymore.'

The group perked up collectively in the darkness, waiting agonizingly for elaboration. Hector could see the reaper's skeletal expression distorting with apparent confusion as he was no doubt trying his best to decipher the information he was receiving.

'...They're under attack,' Levinox finally said. 'Abolish caught up to them.'"

"2763 -- CCXLVII.

Chapter Two Hundred Forty-Seven: 'The hand that needs grasping...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

A string of explosions rocked the night sky, but Lord Abbas Saqqaf couldn't let that deter him. The suit could take it, and so could he. He soared through the onslaught head on and clobbered one of the Abolish bastards in midair.

Unable to stand up to the force of the impact, the enemy's body simply exploded into a cloud of blood.

That was one down, but there were plenty more left. Dozens of them-- and all flying, too. Only some of them seemed to be flying under their own power. His visor was picking up several identical high-energy readings among the group of hostiles. The speed of combat made it difficult to be certain, but he was fairly certain that he caught sight of machinery on their arms and backs.

More toys of the Mad Demon, Abbas figured.

But that was fine. He was mainly just glad there weren't any more of those hulking monstrosities here. He'd been forced to fend off two of those damn things back in Sair, and while he'd emerged victorious, the suit hadn't quite been the same since.

It was still mostly functional, thankfully, but it wasn't regenerating like it was supposed to. He would've like to run full system diagnostics to figure out what the problem was, but he would need at least eight uninterrupted hours to do so. That obviously wasn't possible when, for the past three days, he'd had to be combat ready at all times.

Even without diagnostics, though, he had an unsettling suspicion about what the problem might be. There weren't many things that could hamper regeneration for a sustained period of time, after all.

He had more pressing matters on his mind at the moment, however.

Abolish flies buzzed all around him, a veritable swarm. No doubt, they all hoped to be the one to deliver his head to their bosses, but none of them were going to succeed.

Apart, perhaps, from that one with the birds. The Man of Crows."
"2763 -- CCXLVII.

Chapter Two Hundred Forty-Seven: 'The hand that needs grasping...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

A string of explosions rocked the night sky, but Lord Abbas Saqqaf couldn't let that deter him. The suit could take it, and so could he. He soared through the onslaught head on and clobbered one of the Abolish bastards in midair.

Unable to stand up to the force of the impact, the enemy's body simply exploded into a cloud of blood.

That was one down, but there were plenty more left. Dozens of them--and all flying, too. Only some of them seemed to be flying under their own power. His visor was picking up several identical high-energy readings among the group of hostiles. The speed of combat made it difficult to be certain, but he was fairly certain that he caught sight of machinery on their arms and backs.

More toys of the Mad Demon, Abbas figured.

But that was fine. He was mainly just glad there weren't any more of those hulking monstrosities here. He'd been forced to fend off two of those damn things back in Sair, and while he'd emerged victorious, the suit hadn't quite been the same since.

It was still mostly functional, thankfully, but it wasn't regenerating like it was supposed to. He would've like to run full system diagnostics to figure out what the problem was, but he would need at least eight uninterrupted hours to do so. That obviously wasn't possible when, for the past three days, he'd had to be combat ready at all times.

Even without diagnostics, though, he had an unsettling suspicion about what the problem might be. There weren't many things that could hamper regeneration for a sustained period of time, after all.

He had more pressing matters on his mind at the moment, however.

Abolish flies buzzed all around him, a veritable swarm. No doubt, they all hoped to be the one to deliver his head to their bosses, but none of them were going to succeed.

Apart, perhaps, from that one with the birds. The Man of Crows."
"2764

Gathering intel on him had become a priority since the beginning of the war, yet details had remained sparse all throughout. His apparent ability to manipulate flocks of black birds made little sense to Abbas' mind--and to the many reapers among his brethren, as well.

Because there was more to it than simply controlling them. If that were all it was, his ability might be easily explained by some sort of psychic connection developed via mutation. But no, those birds could do so much more. They were supernaturally resilient, able to withstand conventional firearms, extreme temperatures, and more force than even most servants. Plus, they could spit acid, fire, ice, electricity, toxic fumes, and even explosions.

And their agility. They were speedy little bastards, quick to dodge.

Strong, too. The Man of Crows often sat or even stood atop a cluster of them as if they were a solid platform. They sometimes went to the aid of his subordinate Abolishers, too, which was quite obnoxious.

The damned things were more akin to dragons than birds.

For a while, Abbas had thought they might also be machines, just disguised. But after blasting whole swathes of them to pieces personally, he saw that they were indeed biological.

That encounter had not earned Abbas much favor with the Man of Crows, it seemed. This was going to be their seventh clash in as many days. Even before the disaster at Uego, Albert Crowe had been gunning for him.

If the suit's systems were at optimal performance, and if he didn't have so many civilians to look after at the moment, Abbas might have welcomed the opportunity to end Crowe's obsession with him permanently. It certainly would've been one less major headache to worry about.

Crowe didn't care about having an honorable duel, however. He had the tactical advantage, and he didn't hesitate to keep pressing it.

Not that Abbas expected any better from Abolish, of course."
"2765

If he hadn't recalibrated his visor and ocular replacements prior to escaping the Golden Fort, it would've been almost impossible for him to track the movement of Crowe's birds well enough to keep the civilians safe.

They were like giant tendrils, snaking and expanding through the air, scattering on a moment's notice and reconvening elsewhere just before striking again. And the collective power that their formations gave them was simply absurd. Abbas was probably the only one present who could hope to block or divert their assaults.

Which was saying quite a lot.

Much of Hahl Saqqaf was here with him, servant and non-servant alike. They had over two dozen fighters present, including his son Raheem, his grandson Amir, and even his great grandson Badat. As a result, their entourage was a hastily assembled mixture of ground-based vehicles, deployable helicopters, and people simply being carried by servants--either physically or with abilities.

In the better moments, the servants had been able to carry everyone, even the vehicles, but they couldn't keep doing that when faced with an attack; so now the pace was slowed again while clusters of Saqqaf warriors broke off to engage the enemy.

Abbas was under no illusions, though. It was all resting on his shoulders, right now. His sons and cousins were strong, but if he fell in battle here, Abolish would probably kill or capture everyone.

For that reason, it may have seemed unwise to have Worwal with him during this fight. But the unfortunate truth of the matter was that they simply didn't know where else to go.

The prevalence of invisible aberrations had changed the nature of this war. Too many times, the Golden Council had received reports of reapers who had separated from their servants for their own safety, only to get ambushed and captured or killed.

But most of all, it was those damn machines of the Mad Demon. Even when reapers tried to escape by themselves into the ground, far and deep into the earth, those machines were still a threat.

They could show up anywhere at any moment, it seemed.

Abbas had a rather strong feeling that at least one or two of them was still chasing him, though perhaps that was just paranoia getting the better of him."

"2766

In an ideal world, Abbas would have loved the chance to capture one of the machines in order to study it. Haqq Najir had certainly harped on about that, requiring quite an irritating degree of convincing before finally realizing that such a feat was impossible. Abbas had seen it firsthand. When defeated, the machines annihilated themselves, leaving seemingly no trace behind.

Because of course they did. This was the Morgunov they were talking about. If anything, Abbas would have been even more mistrustful of the machines if they didn't self-destruct in some way. That would have just made him wonder why Morgunov was allowing them to study his technology so easily.

Haqq was still quite young and naive in that way. A budding genius he might have been, but when would his arrogance stop causing him to underestimate others? Emperors, especially.

The boy had been helpful, though. After the fight with Ivan at Dunehall, Abbas had wanted to make upgrades to the suit right away. The world at large might have been praising him for his incredible victory, but he knew the truth. That fight had nearly been a disaster. It absolutely could have gone Ivan's way if conditions were even slightly different.

So Abbas had been doing his best to ignore all of the attention--even from the Vanguard, when he could.

To his mind, there had been no greater priority than elevating the suit to new heights as quickly as possible. He'd kicked the hornet's nest by capturing Ivan. This attack would have arrived eventually, and he needed to be prepared.

If only he could have done more.

Even in its sub-optimal condition, the suit was probably still more powerful now than it was when he'd faced the Salesman. The incredible, tide-shifting potency of the suit's fusion-propulsion system in that fight had greatly motivated him to find a way to weaponize that technology."

"2767

He hadn't had enough time to truly refine it, but with Haqq's help, a working prototype--the Ro'Hada 0-A--was now attached to his right arm.

And thank the benevolent gods for that.

Without it, he probably would have been killed by those two machines that ambushed him outside Kuros. The Ro'Hada--or the Dark God's Death in Mohssian--had made the difference in a critical moment when one of them had him pinned and the other was approaching, mere seconds away from barreling into him and destroying his already-battered armor.

But it was unstable. The Ro'Hada may have saved him once, but he knew from his number crunching during development and testing that it was a weapon of last resort. Technically, there was still about a 1.328 percent chance that, whenever he pulled the trigger, it would create a chain reaction that would likely result in his death before the suppression system could kick in.

He had to be prepared for that whenever he chose use it.

...And also that there was, theoretically, a 0.0000000014 percent chance that the chain reaction would defeat the suppression system and create an explosion powerful enough to wipe out everything within two kilometers.

He hadn't mentioned that bit of math to anyone, not even Haqq. He was hoping to iron out that particular kink the next time he had access to a decent workshop.

Right now, though, he had to deal with Crowe and his lackeys, preferably without resorting to the Ro'Hada 0-A.

It wouldn't be easy. The cruise missile in his chest piece was no longer functional, as was one of the two drones in his shoulder.

He did, however, still have a few other tricks up his armored sleeve. Quite literally, in this case. His forearms concealed a dozen micro-RPG launchers of his own design."

"2768

With heat-seeking capability, omnidirectional quick-turn movement, and a maximum range of four hundred meters, these miniature missiles were perhaps Abbas' best means of crowd control. And Crowe's giant flocks of birds certainly qualified.

The mini-missiles were too recent of an addition to be permanently soul-strengthened like most of the suit, but that was no problem. He pressed his soul into them now and loosed a quarter of them from his left arm, then another quarter from his right.

The ones from his left whistled across the sky and ripped through the nearest flock with a series of air-shaking explosions.

The copious amount of smoke they left behind was also by design. With his soul power still lingering in it for a few moments, it provided an invaluable screen as he closed in.

And the best part was that he didn't have to worry about his own vision being obscured, because the quarter of mini-missiles from his right arm had not yet exploded, having been deployed for a slightly different purpose. They were, in fact, more than just missiles. They observed their surroundings, tracking enemy movement with coordinate data and sending it straight to the heads-up display on his visor.

With that information, Abbas still knew precisely where the Man of Crows and the five Abolishers around him were, even through the smoke.

There was no point in easing up off the throttle. He pushed the suit for more speed and went straight for Crowe.

The Man of Crows didn't have time to react. Abbas torpedoed straight through, taking an arm, leg, and half his rib cage with him. More blood splattered across the suit, staining it even further red than before.

Damn. That was the first solid hit in a while, but it obviously wouldn't be enough to overcome Crowe's regeneration. Moreover, his visor warned him of another flock already whipping toward him from what would otherwise have been his blind spot.

He jetted out of the way, though only just. Claws, acid, and flames scraped his right arm, doing minimal damage."

"2769

Five more hostiles were closing in, his visor warned him. Crowe's men. All using pan-rozum with various metallic elements. Abbas had identified each of them in previous encounters, but their names didn't matter to him, for the most part. He'd only wanted to know if there were other infamous names to be wary of. Thankfully, there weren't, but there was one who kept distinguishing himself as a more threatening opponent than the others.

Otto Konig. Abbas had never heard of him before this war, and according to the suit's database, he was a fixture of Crowe's otherwise frequently-rotating cast of subordinates. That, at least, implied that he had the Man of Crows' trust. And after butting heads with him several times, Abbas could see why.

The way the man fought was not entirely unlike that of Melchor Blackburn. Not as refined or overwhelming, perhaps, but his aerial mobility might have been superior. Possibly. It had been many years since Abbas had sparred with Darktide, so perhaps that was an unfair assessment.

Either way, Konig was threatening enough that Abbas didn't want to let any of his kin fight him alone. He used the suit's visor to keep a near-constant track of both him and Crowe. If either of them got too far away, he would move to intercept.

Which was a problem, currently, because while Konig and the other four lackeys were coming in for another attack, Abbas just barely noticed that Crowe was instead moving toward the civilians.

This could not be allowed.

Abbas picked an opponent that wasn't Konig and blasted straight through him like a cannonball through a wet paper towel. Pan-rozum or not, their body couldn't hold up against a simultaneous full burn from the suit's six jets.

Konig gave chase, of course, as did the three slower enemies, but none of them would be able to catch him before he caught Crowe.

Another flock of birds, however: that was different story."
"2770

A bombardment of ice and lightning arrived as the flock whipped toward him. He had to jet out of the way, unfortunately. If the suit was still able to regenerate properly, he would have simply ignored the attack--or even leaned into it, perhaps, and countered. He couldn't be so reckless here. The longer this fight went on, the more his resources dwindled.

He had the mini-missiles, though. They were one of the few systems that was still fully operational, regeneration and all.

For now, at least.

He deployed another quarter portion from each arm, and this time, both sets connected immediately. He would've been thrown off course completely if not for the suit's automated impact mitigation system. It excelled in helping him maintain optimal flight speed while in close proximity to his own targeted explosions.

The flock shriveled back, but it wasn't defeated. It would soon return, Abbas knew--probably sooner than his missiles finished regenerating, but he still had two more quarter portions on each arm if that happened.

He soared out of the smoke cloud, still intent on catching Crowe before he could attack the civilians.

But Crowe had turned around to face him--with four more flocks swirling around him, no less.

Crowe still wasn't fully regenerated from the earlier hit Abbas had landed. Another solid blow, perhaps to the head this time, might just finish him--at least for this fight.

It was like Crowe was daring him to go for it.

The four flocks were a challenge. If they were the ones to land a solid hit on him, they could probably penetrate his armor and weaken him enough to give Crowe a decisive advantage.

Or just outright kill him. That was unlikely, though.

Regardless, Abbas didn't intend to take such a risk. He had Crowe's attention again. That was all he needed in order to keep the civilians safe a little longer.

Maybe Crowe had a hard time comprehending that. Abbas didn't give a damn about proving which of them was stronger. Bravado was not a factor in his thinking.

Only the objective. The civilians. His kin."
"2771

Abbas made a hard right turn, swooping up and away from Crowe and the civilian entourage on the ground. He could all but sense Crowe's frustration with that avoidant maneuver as the four flocks of birds bristled and spun toward him, giving chase.

Good.

If Crowe was getting emotional, Abbas could only see that as a positive thing for their battle. The Man of Crows would be more likely to make mistakes, to act recklessly. This back-and-forth between them had gone on for days, after all. Abolishers were not known for their patience or mental discipline.

He lead the flocks away from the refugees. If he kept moving, they would keep following--so long as he didn't create too much distance too quickly. That would just motivate them to go after the civilians again.

It became a mad aerial dance. Bolting across the sky, weaving in and out of oncoming Abolishers who thought they could cut him off as he circled back around.

The flocks stuck on him, too--all of them, this time.

That was ideal. Many times previously, Crowe had tried to divide his attention between Abbas and the civilians, no doubt hoping to kill or capture them while the Lord Saqqaf was distracted.

An annoying strategy, but one that Abbas had made sure to consistently thwart. Crowe must have finally realized how unfeasible it was and--

'I sense Bloodeye approaching from the north!' came Worwal's private warning. The reaper was clinging to him inside the suit, not merged with a hyper-state.

That news was just about the worst thing Abbas could imagine, right now, short of more robots or Morgunov himself showing up.

Bloodeye was the other primary instigator in this war on his homeland. From the very beginning, it had been Crowe and Bloodeye together that led the invasion.

True, they hadn't been able to stand up to Iceheart, even while working together, but neither had Iceheart been able to pin them down and eliminate them. Their hit-and-run tactics in his presence had caused no end of headaches.

And now, Iceheart wasn't even here, anymore."

"2772

Gods.

He couldn't think about any of that, right now. Everything was riding on him. He had to focus.

If all else failed, he still had the Ro'Hada as a last resort. Until that hope was gone, he had no cause for despair.

Abbas turned and fought. He wouldn't have Crowe alone for much longer, so he decided to take advantage of the time while he could. It would likely prove a futile effort, as Crowe no doubt knew of Bloodeye's imminent arrival and would therefore try to play it safe.

But he had to try.

Crowe's men, including Konig got in the way again--or tried to, at least.

The Lord Saqqaf was not having it. They bombarded him with a smattering of explosions and materialization, hoping to block his vision or pin him down or perhaps something else entirely; but he blasted straight through it all at full burn. He skewered one man and didn't stop, even when the body refused to be bisected and instead stuck to him like bloody ornament.

The body struggled a moment, trying to get a grip on the suit no doubt, so Abbas zagged suddenly right and barreled into Otto Konig's liquid metal body.

Konig tried to stick to him, too, but that was fine. Abbas still had plenty of control. At this speed, with this much momentum, jets could handle the weight difference just fine. Turning was obviously more difficult, but he could compensate. The suit was already assisting him with calculations and flight path guidance on his visor.

He could still aim for Crowe. And now the impact would be three times as heavy. Roughly speaking. Konig's metal body probably made up for the weight disparity that the suit itself added to Abbas.

Crowe saw him coming. Of course he did. And he wisely tried to move out of the way. Those black wings offered great mobility of their own.

Not enough, though.

Abbas pierced two flocks of birds before clobbering the Man of Crows with his small mountain of metal and flesh."

"2773

Crowe's body stuck onto him, too, added to the pile. Now the weight was beginning to become an issue. Abbas could hear the jets straining.

It was the perfect time to cool them down, then.

He opened both hands wide and vented several supercoolant packs on his back. Liquid hydrogen spewed out, splashing everywhere.

Normally, the venting would be a much more controlled process, but while he was covered in mangled bodies and twisting metal, control was a luxury. And of course, he wanted the coolant to get all over his opponents.

After having been both reminded of and further impressed by Iceheart's effectiveness on the battlefield, Abbas had been trying to increase the suit's freezing capabilities to new heights. While he didn't yet have the ""cryo-weapon"" of his dreams at his disposal, the addition of several spare supercoolant packs was a start.

And they seemed to be doing well. System heating metrics were way down, and he could feel the three bodies around him squirming less than before.

But he wanted more. Crowe was still in one piece and struggling. That needed to be rectified.

Abbas couldn't even see out of his visor anymore, but the compass on the HUD was still working, at least. Bloodeye was approaching from the north, and Lorent was to the west.

He banked hard left, hearing the cooling hiss of the hydrogen almost overpowering the howling wind.

For a moment, he seriously contemplated just crashing straight into the ground. All these bodies would take even more damage than he would, especially if they were partially frozen already.

But no. Too reckless. With the suit's regeneration still in question, he couldn't risk it.

So he tapped all five fingertips together on his right hand, instead.

The suit's anti-personnel shock shield activated, covering his entire body in electricity."

"2774

Everyone's grip on him loosened instantly. Even the guy he'd nearly cut in half exploded apart. And suddenly, he was free again--covered in frosted blood and guts, but free.

Able to see now, the visor tracked Crowe and Konig both falling toward the ground in statue-like heaps, barely twitching. The remaining flocks of crows were visibly disoriented, too, without orders from their master.

Excellent. Crowe's subordinates were rushing to his aid, but more mini-missiles would provide cover while he moved to finish the job.

'Bloodeye just disappeared,' warned Worwal.

Ah.

Invisibility again.

It had been a while since one of the Abolishers had tried that tactic, doubtless because most of them had realized that it was no longer effective.

Abbas had installed a Sound Navigation and Ranging device precisely for this purpose. True, it wasn't as effective in air as it was in water, and there was some added latency to account for, but it was certainly better than fighting blind.

The first pulse was ear-splitting and grinding--enough so that he would've certainly gone deaf at this range without passive soul defense or a very powerful sound dampener. It had to be so loud, of course, or else the pulse wouldn't travel with enough strength to bounce back and be useful.

Bloodeye was already quite close, the HUD revealed. And with the latency of sonar in air, Abbas knew that he would be even nearer than what the suit was telling him.

It shouldn't be too much of a problem, though. Bloodeye was dangerous, but he was a known quantity. His power was that of bromine transfiguration, and he relied heavily on fumes and acids to smother his opponents.

A relatively common fighting style, primarily elevated by the strength of the servant's soul and pan-rozum. It was still deadly, of course, especially when part of a team, but alone?

Abbas could handle him so long as Crowe stayed down for a bit longer. This situation was bad but still salvageable. As long as he stayed focused. He had to keep reminding himself of that."

"2775

He needed an attack that would cover a wide area. The sonar couldn't give him pinpoint accuracy, so he had to account for that. The mini-missiles might work again, but he had something better in mind.

Abbas, Haqq, and all their researchers had spent considerable time breaking down the many problems that the Invisibility-inducing aberrations presented so that they could develop countermeasures. Discerning how they functioned was key to that effort, and the major issue there was figuring out how the cloaking ""shadow"" actually interacted with light.

Whether it should be regarded as ""magical"" or ""a matter that was beyond science"" was irrelevant. Obviously, it was not reflecting or refracting light as any normal material would, which meant there were really only two other options for how the interaction might work.

Either the light was passing perfectly through the cloaked entities as if they were not even there; or the light was being absorbed entirely and a perfect replica of what was ""behind"" the entities was being projected back out to the eye of the viewer.

The first possibility seemed less likely, because logically speaking, if light was truly passing through the cloaked entities, then anyone inside should have been rendered blind, as the light would also be passing through their eyes without touching their photoreceptors. And by now, they knew very well that the invisible aberrations were not blind at all.

The only reason they had theorized this as a potential explanation at all was because, well, these were aberrations they were dealing with. Much like servants, they did not always follow the conventional wisdom of science, to the chagrin of many lifelong academics like himself.

In this case, however, their extra caution was unwarranted. Through further field testing, they had indeed been able to confirm that it was the second method. The light was being absorbed and a perfect image was being projected back.

It was an incredible feat, far beyond what any ""normal"" technology was currently capable of. If it could be reproduced with said normal technology, that would be a tremendous breakthrough.

But right now, that didn't matter. What mattered was that first bit: the light was being absorbed.

A high-powered laser, therefore, would be especially effective against it."

"2776

He had just the thing. A sweeping laser ""net,"" capable of covering seventy cubic meters of space in front of him with a single flash. It could also be concentrated into one giant beam--and empowered with his soul, of course--if he wanted to do some real damage, but the situation didn't call for that. Yet.

The suit opened up at six different points: the shoulders, waist, chest, and palms of his hands. Focusing lenses appeared from each compartment, varying in size relative to their location. Then red lights blasted out all at once, crisscrossing and weaving together to form a crimson web of glowing beams.

It filled his vision, illuminating the sky far more than the still rising sun. He didn't register any damage being done, though. The lasers should've been able to shred the Invisibility of any cloaked units--or simply shred the units themselves.

He swung the net wide across Bloodeye's last known location, searching to and fro.

There it was. A sudden splattering of blood and tumbling chunks of flesh arrived. The cloaking shuddered, and Abbas saw seven men there, less than twenty meters away.

Well. Three men, now.

The others were in bad shape, too, apart from Bloodeye himself, who was only scorched across his face and chest but otherwise fine.

Time for concentration, then. Abbas locked onto the man with his visor and made every single laser converge on him at once.

In an instant, it burned a hole straight through Bloodeye's chest and set his black trench coat ablaze.

The man reacted by converting his entire body into red fumes. The flames were immediately extinguished, even while the fumes scattered out wide.

Abbas didn't intend to let himself be surrounded and smothered. He might've liked to use the laser net again to further scatter Bloodeye's fumes, but this was where the downside kicked in. The power draw. More than perhaps any other weapon in his arsenal, the lasers demanded power. The suit could regenerate its own fuel cells, but only very slowly--and only when it was functioning properly, which it most certainly was not."

"2777

That was okay, though. The mini-missiles would serve just fine here. And the smoke would--

Bloodeye's movement changed suddenly. Instead of the red smoke enveloping Abbas, it shrank back down and compressed, reforming Bloodeye's human body.

The unexpected maneuver made Abbas wary as he waited for the attack to come. If Bloodeye wasn't going to try to smother him with smoke and acid, then what did he intend to do? Stall for time while Crowe recovered? There might've been wisdom in that, but Abbas wasn't going to let it happen so easily.

He pushed the jets for another full burn and torpedoed himself straight toward Bloodeye.

What happened next, however, was outside all possible predictions or expectations.

Abbas slammed into him, just like he'd previously done to Crowe and Konig, but Bloodeye held firm, holding onto Abbas' torso with both arms and legs as if trying to crush the armor with his bare hands.

That was most certainly impossible. The suit, even in its currently battered state, was more than durable enough to withstand the enhanced strength of any servant.

But then Bloodeye began to change. His face distorted, flashing between sickly grays and purples. His eyes and nose began bleeding, and he coughed up a nasty red glob right onto Abbas' visor, blocking most of his vision but not all.

The man's jaw stretched and grew, realigning itself, popping out teeth as big as a crocodile's. His eyes bulged grotesquely, looking as if they might burst until his skull reshaped itself as well--and not for the better. It became lumpy and stretched, with entirely new bones sticking out, looking like broken horns. His nose shifted, too, twisting diagonally. It flared out and grew, while also melting partway into the rest of his plumpening face.

And then other, smaller faces began to appear in the man's flesh. All horrified and screaming, like something out of a nightmare. A literal monster."

"2778

Abbas Saqqaf didn't even know what he was seeing. He didn't get much time to mull it over, either, because Bloodeye's now massive jaw lurched toward him. He pulled back at the last second, but the teeth still found his left shoulder and crunched through the suit's armor.

The bite was solid. It didn't take his arm off, but that was arguably worse, because now he couldn't even get away. He felt the teeth dig into his flesh and even pierce bone before Worwal numbed the pain entirely.

He called on the shock shield again. Electricity blasted out of the suit in fractured bursts, sparking badly around the broken shoulder.

But it worked.

Bloodeye spasmed and loosened his grip on him, allowing Abbas to grab him by his neck and twist with all the might that the suit and undead strength combined could provide.

A sickening crack arrived, but that was all. Abbas had wanted to tear his head clean off, but that didn't happen. The man's neck merely kept twisting and cracking, and Abbas could see in his crimson eyes that he was regaining his faculties, despite the shock shield still remaining active.

Abbas growled with frustration and flung him straight down to the ground, just wanting to give himself a moment to breathe. To think. To reassess what the hell had just happened.

Bloodeye sailed into solid rock with meteoric force, leaving a crater the size of a house behind and a cloud of dust to accompany it.

What sense did that transformation make? An illusion? No, Abbas had been able to feel the change. The weight differential. The thrashing, twitching movement.

A hallucination, then? Had some aerosolized drug made it past the suit's filters and even the system alerts?

Everything else seemed perfectly normal. He still felt clear-headed."
"2779

He had never seen such a thing before. Monsters, yes. But never one like that--and more importantly, never one that at first appeared perfectly human.

He didn't get the opportunity to consult Worwal on it. Just as he finished wiping most of the blood off his visor, a warning of incoming attacks arrived. Blodeye's two remaining men were both blasting him with materialization, and he needed to evade.

Simple enough. But a third attack came with even less warning attached to it.

A flock of crows on his right side. Acid, flames, and lightning all obscured the assault, making it difficult to tell which direction to evade in. Even with the visor's aid, which was now flickering, he couldn't be sure. He had only a split second to guess.

He chose to dive down.

That was incorrect. The birds appeared like a hundred tiny spears with the speed of a freight train, shredding his entire right side and sending him into a tailspin as system alerts flashed across the HUD.

Armor integrity critical. Multiple power failures. Impact mitigation errors. Flight assistance errors. Weapons systems failing. Hostile targets closing in.

He was nearly in freefall. He had to stabilize. Flight assistance be damned. The jets were still working, the beauties. He could do it all in his head.

He twisted his body and angled himself down as he activated a hard burn. With the computer drilled into his thalamus and cerebral cortex, he could tell the suit exactly what to do with only his mind. It was more difficult and dangerous without the benefit of guidance vector calculations being pumped straight into his brain, but he'd practiced this scenario hundreds of times.

The suit swooped down low, clipping a line of tall trees and taking their tops off before finally achieving stable flight again."

"2780

He remained at a low altitude for a while longer, knowing that most of the Abolishers were after him and that flying up higher would just make him an easier target.

He needed time to reevaluate the suit's condition, as well as the situation at large. So many failing systems. Was anything regenerating?

Here and there, it seemed, yes--and at a massively slowed rate. Both arms and shoulders torn to hell, as was his right leg. But the helmet was still working. And the mini-missiles. Jets, of course. Radar and sonar. The coolant system. Shock shield. Flares.

Ah.

And the Ro'Hada.

Even after the beating his right arm had taken, the ace up his sleeve was still fully operational. That was good news, at least. He had designed it to be even more durable than the rest of the suit. That was a necessity when it came to a last resort weapon. It needed to endure even when everything else gave out.

But was the situation truly that dire?

Debatable. The more this battle dragged out, though, the more the scales seemed to be tipping in its favor.

Either way, he would need to get up fairly close if he intended to use it.

That part, at least, looked as though it would not be an issue. Bloodeye and the Man of Crows were both on his tail now. No doubt, their murderous instincts were telling them that he was on the verge of death here. He could practically taste their bloodlust, their eagerness to claim the prize that was his head.

Of the two, Bloodeye now seemed the most problematic. Not knowing what he was capable of put a big asterisk next to any plan that Abbas could concoct. And if he reacted incorrectly like last time, with his armor in its current condition, Crowe's next strike might very well be a fatal one."

"2781

They'd been chasing him for a while already, having left all their subordinates in the dust. He was alone, too, though. Covering fire from his family would've certainly been welcome right about now, but they were too far away to do anything.

The suit could still outrun these two, however. If they doubled back to attack his family, he would have to turn and fight, but for now, at least, it seemed as though they were intent on chasing him down. Perhaps they didn't realize that he was purposely allowing them to keep up.

So much the better. It gave him time to think. Without Bloodeye and Crowe to worry about, he had confidence that his Hahl could handle the others. His sons were strong.

But this stalemate couldn't last forever. Something would have to give sooner or later.

'Abbas,' came Worwal's private words, 'our allies--'

A system alert cut him off. A bad one. ""Incoming AIM,"" read the visor with an accompanying tracking dot.

Unfortunately, AIM stood for Air Intercept Missile.

Where the hell that thing had launched from, Abbas had no earthly idea, and there wasn't time to worry about it. The suit, even in its battered state, could probably withstand most air-to-air ordnance relatively well when accounting for his own passive soul defenses.

But he had to assume that it was soul-strengthened by someone very powerful. That was the protocol here. If it was normal, he'd be fine either way. But if it wasn't, and he didn't take it seriously, it could kill him instantaneously.

He could go supersonic, but that would only buy him a few extra seconds, because that thing was almost certainly capable of doing the same. And at this point, the suit might not hold together very well during supersonic flight.

He deployed flares and banked hard right, watching the HUD as sweat dripped down his face.

No dice. It didn't lose target lock. Contact in under ten seconds."
"2782

Max burn. More flares. More evasive maneuvers. Both of the drones on his shoulders were broken, but he deployed them anyway. They just fell out of the sky, but that was fine. Anything to pull the damn thing off of him.

Still didn't work, though.

The mini-missiles were his best hope now, but he'd only get one good chance. They didn't have an AIM's range, speed, or tracking accuracy. If he deployed them too soon, that was it. If he deployed them too late, that was it. If the soul-strengthening somehow allowed the AIM to withstand their barrage, that was it.

Mind racing, he waited. Six seconds left. Five. Four. Three.

He loosed the mini-missiles.

They hit.

The AIM exploded.

The blast was close--and just as powerful as he'd feared. It rocked the sky, catching him with the edge of its radius and spiking him toward the ground.

So many system alerts. More than ever.

He was barely conscious of anything other than the fact that he was falling. Where had that missile come from? Where was he going?

Worwal was talking. Telling him he had to do something.

He hit the ground and left a running crater, an elongated trench, before finally grinding to a halt.

The suit was smoldering. Smoke and heat. Beeping, sizzling, crackling.

He tried to move and found it difficult. Still disoriented. Suit resisting him, too.

Another alert appeared on the visor, flickering harder now.

""Incoming AIM,"" it read again.

He just blinked at it, scarcely able to comprehend what he was seeing. A second one?

Worwal was talking again, telling him to move, among other murky things.

He was probably right.

Abbas struggled. Head was clearing but not fast enough. Needed to get up. Disorientation was probably affecting the suit's responsiveness. Missile contact imminent. Eleven seconds. Ten. Nine. Eight. Seven. Six. Fi--

It was gone. The tracking dot disappeared. Visor malfunction?

No.

He sensed someone there. Nearby. Then he saw them.

An armored figure. Not like his. Old. Medieval.

Was that... a knight?

Why was there a knight standing over him? Did that missile hit him so hard that he went back in time?

""Get up, Lord Abbas."" The knight reached a hand toward him.

""Fight's not done yet. And we're gonna need you.""

By the gods, those words cut into his mind like a friendly knife. Clarity returned almost immediately. Almost involuntarily, even.

And he took the knight's hand."

"2783 -- CCXLVIII.

Click to display entire chapter at once -- (mobile link)

Hector had to admit, Lord Abbas wasn't looking too good. His suit of mechanized armor was cracked and crumbling in a dozen different places, and tendrils of both smoke and steam were leaking out everywhere.

Not to mention the blood all over him.

Still, though, it wasn't as bad as it had been after that encounter with the Salesman of Death. Large chunks might've been missing, and yeah, it kinda looked like a giant shark had taken a bite out of his shoulder or something; but at least Abbas was able to stand up.

That was good. Because thinking about who could've done something like this to the freaking Sunsmith, of all people...

Well, it wasn't comforting.

That inbound missile had been a real problem-and-a-half to deal with, too. They probably wouldn't have even known about it if Worwal hadn't warned Levinox. And without Dimas Sebolt's help flying and Garovel's help aiming, Hector doubted he would've been of any use in that situation.

In fact, he was certain he wouldn't have.

The thing had been so damn fast. Dimas, flying at his max speed while also carrying Hector, had only been able to provide the two of them with a window of a couple seconds to attack.

But somehow, they'd managed it, via a combined barrage of gravitic bullets and iron slugs launched via Hector's orbital technique.

It was a pretty fucking intense experience, actually. Hector had never flown that fast through open air before. The Scarf had been going nuts with the howling air currents all around him. So much information pouring into his brain at once. Too overwhelming to be very useful.

But a part of him wanted to give it another try. Maybe he could get the hang of it.

And he had a feeling that in this fight, he might just get that chance."
"2783 -- CCXLVIII.

Chapter Two Hundred Forty-Eight: 'The Battle at the Border...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector had to admit, Lord Abbas wasn't looking too good. His suit of mechanized armor was cracked and crumbling in a dozen different places, and tendrils of both smoke and steam were leaking out everywhere.

Not to mention the blood all over him.

Still, though, it wasn't as bad as it had been after that encounter with the Salesman of Death. Large chunks might've been missing, and yeah, it kinda looked like a giant shark had taken a bite out of his shoulder or something; but at least Abbas was able to stand up.

That was good. Because thinking about who could've done something like this to the freaking Sunsmith, of all people...

Well, it wasn't comforting.

That inbound missile had been a real problem-and-a-half to deal with, too. They probably wouldn't have even known about it if Worwal hadn't warned Levinox. And without Dimas Sebolt's help flying and Garovel's help aiming, Hector doubted he would've been of any use in that situation.

In fact, he was certain he wouldn't have.

The thing had been so damn fast. Dimas, flying at his max speed while also carrying Hector, had only been able to provide the two of them with a window of a couple seconds to attack.

But somehow, they'd managed it, via a combined barrage of gravitic bullets and iron slugs launched via Hector's orbital technique.

It was a pretty fucking intense experience, actually. Hector had never flown that fast through open air before. The Scarf had been going nuts with the howling air currents all around him. So much information pouring into his brain at once. Too overwhelming to be very useful.

But a part of him wanted to give it another try. Maybe he could get the hang of it.

And he had a feeling that in this fight, he might just get that chance."
"2784

Worwal informed them that their opponents were Bloodeye and the Man of Crows and that Bloodeye had some kind of strange transforming power, but there wasn't enough time to swap more intel than that.

'I sense them,' said Garovel.

'As do I,' said Izio.

Hector had wanted Garovel to retreat underground, but the reaper insisted on tagging along for observational support. Hector hadn't been too pleased about that. Sure, Garovel had turned out to be correct in helping him take down the missile, but that didn't change how risky the whole thing was.

And now that they knew precisely who they were up against, Hector was even more uncomfortable.

'Garovel, you need to fall back,' thought Hector in the intervening seconds.

'Too late for that, buddy.'

Was it really, though? 'Go underground. Now.'

'No.'

Hector grit his teeth and wanted to argue. He didn't get the chance, because an ear-piercing gunshot rang out from a short distance away.

One of the Rainlords was there, nestled behind a large rock with one of the largest rifles Hector had ever seen.

""That's a hit on Crowe!"" the man called out.

Hector looked toward the horizon and saw the black swirl of birds there. At this distance, he couldn't tell if the shot had done much.

The gunman was Dimas' cousin, Rolando Sebolt. As Hector understood it, he was actually older than Dimas by about fifteen years, so the soul power that he must've been pushing into that giant weapon was probably quite potent.

Lord Abbas still went over to him, though, and laid a hand on the massive scope. ""Do it again,"" he said in his Valgan accent.

Rolando gave him an acknowledging nod, and then Abbas blasted away from the ground, rocketing back up into the sky again."

"2785

~~((Thanksgiving Special - page 1 of 30))~~

'We'd better stick with him,' said Iziol.

Salvador Delaguna stepped closer with Matteo right behind him.

""We'll head to that northern hill there,"" he said, pointing. ""Send one of 'em our way if you want help up close. Otherwise--"" He pulled out another heavy rifle from a duffel bag, though it wasn't fully assembled yet. ""--we'll provide cover.""

""Understood,"" said Dimas, and he gave Hector a look that seemed to be assessing whether or not he was ready to be carried off by gravity again.

Covered in full armor, however, Hector couldn't exactly answer with the expression on his face. Dimas must've come to the conclusion that he was indeed ready, because the Lord of House Sebolt did not waste another moment and launched away from the ground with Hector in tow.

It was a good thing he didn't have a problem with motion sickness. Holy shit.

They soared almost straight up, then arced toward direction of the enemy. Roman was keeping pace with them as well, though Voreese was not with him. She had stayed by the car with a few others, mostly reapers, including Levinox.

Hector's grip on his shield tightened as they drew closer. It was probably his best hope of surviving this battle.

He wanted to keep his mind clear, but a background thought process, he couldn't stop thoughts from manifesting.

Bloodeye and the Man of Crows. Very high-ranking Abolishers. Not top tier threats like Ivan or Jercash or Gohvis, perhaps, but they were probably on a similar level to the Marauder of Calthos, whom Hector had encountered at Dunehall.

That guy had been kind of overshadowed at the end of the day but definitely hadn't been a pushover. He'd taken on Zeff, Asad, Melchor Blackburn, and Xuan Sebolt all by himself."

"2786

~~((Thanksgiving Special - page 2 of 30))~~

Sure, there'd been extenuating circumstances, as Melchor and Xuan had still been exhausted from their own clash at Marshrock, but it was hard for Hector to just put all of his concerns out of his mind.

Because now they were facing two such people.

And in another thought process, Hector kept reevaluating their combat strength. On the ground, they had Salvador, Matteo, Rolando, and one other gunman in Rico Sebolt. Rico and Rolando were something of a duo, from what Hector had seen.

In the air, they had Dimas, Roman, Abbas, and himself. And that last one was pretty debatable, regarding aerial combat.

All things considered, this wasn't the most fortunate of match ups. If Abbas fell or was otherwise incapacitated, even briefly, then someone might just die.

Or they all would.

So more than anything, their role here was to support Abbas, Hector felt. They had to keep him alive, no matter what. Which meant they needed to keep Bloodeye and the Man of Crows separated. Whatever their powers were, they would be weaker in isolation; and allowing them to attack Abbas together one of the worst-case scenarios.

But that was exactly what was happening when they finally caught up.

There was barely any time to process what he was witnessing. So much going on at once. New enemies with new powers to assess. Everyone zipping back and forth in midair, wrestling and clawing at one another, throwing explosions and punches and explosive punches. Fire and lightning and acid and smoke and blood spraying everywhere in midair.

Perhaps now more than ever, the parallel thought processes were crucially valuable.

The enemies were easy to tell apart, at least. The Man of Crows was obviously the dude with all the fucking crows flying around him, but Hector hadn't expected him to have giant black wings growing out of his back, too. Mutation user?"

"2787

~~((Thanksgiving Special - page 3 of 30))~~

The crows themselves were obviously abnormal, too, being the sources of much of the fire, lightning, and acid thrown around. And Hector could tell that they were even more dangerous than they looked, because Abbas was clearly trying his best to avoid them. If the Lord Saqqaf could just ignore their attacks and blast through, he assuredly would've been.

But what in the fuck was up with Bloodeye? Worwal's description of a ""strange transformation power"" was an understatement if ever there was one. The guy looked like some kind of demonic alligator-goblin, which might've also implied mutation, but his body was frequently shifting between its solid form and crimson smoke.

Hector had seen such shifting before with Xuan Sebolt's usage of transfiguration and pan-rozum.

Bloodeye's fumes seemed to be having a harder time keeping up with Abbas than the crow guy did, so perhaps that was why Dimas chose to go after him first.

A hail of gravitic bullets sprayed across Bloodeye's horned backside, peppering it with bloody holes and making the monster turn his head toward them.

An instant later, Hector had a present for him, too.

A giant ball of iron, as big as a car, launched via his orbital technique.

It clobbered him, carrying him off into the distance.

Which actually surprised Hector a little bit. He hadn't expected that to work quite so well. But then again, that was a quite literal ton of solid iron he'd just flung at the guy, and there was nothing up here for Bloodeye to brace himself against.

Inertia and momentum had been on his side for that particular interaction. He had no doubt that Bloodeye would be back, though-- and soon.

But in the meantime, they could gang up on the crow guy with Abbas."
"2788

~~((Thanksgiving Special - page 4 of 30))~~

Unfortunately, the crow guy seemed to have already noticed them. A flock of black birds came snaking through the air.

Dimas dodged, but an errant lightning bolt from one of the crow's mouths caught him.

And then Hector was falling through open sky.

Dimas had dropped him, he realized.

Shit.

What to do? His vision was limited through the slit in his helmet, and the Scarf was sending him all sorts of confusing information with how fast the wind around him was moving.

But he'd wanted to give it a second try, hadn't he? Well, now was the time.

He shut his eyes and concentrated, trying his best not to think about the fact that he was currently in freefall, the fact that he'd soon hit the ground and be turned into canned meat if he didn't do something about it.

High winds had intense effects upon the Scarf. He knew that from his first trip to Lorent, when he'd met Pauline Gaolanet, the Sparrow at the airport.

And the effects now were similar, perhaps even stronger. He could sense so many pathways in the air, all linking together, pushing each other or crash against one another. It was like trying to pick out individual strands of spaghetti within a giant bowl. One big mess.

But that was the wrong way of looking at it, wasn't it? Individual strands weren't that important. The groupings of strands were more informative, weren't they?

Yeah.

Some of the currents knotted together, creating nothing but chaos that disrupted his senses, but around them, the air could still flow. If he could ignore the holes and follow the other paths, maybe this was doable.

Oh hey, there was a flock of crows chasing after him from above.

Wow, couldn't they tell he was already falling out of the sky? That was pretty aggressive. What a bunch of dicks.

Hmm, maybe one of these thought processes was a little too calm."
"2789

~~((Thanksgiving Special - page 5 of 30))~~

Whatever the case, this ruled out flying, Hector decided. While it was true that he'd been practicing his flight quite a bit recently, he didn't think he had enough speed with it yet to warrant using it against these guys.

These motherfuckers were using pan-rozum. They might not have been able to keep up with Abbas, but they were still damn fast. Abbas could break the sound barrier, if he wanted to. The fact that he wasn't running circles around them was impressive enough on its own.

No, he had to prioritize speed here, Hector felt--even if it meant losing some of his control and maneuverability.

And to his mind, his flight wasn't even that stable yet. If it was just a matter of maximizing speed, then one of his most primitive techniques would be best here.

He pummeled himself with a big block of iron from the side. He took the hit with Haqq's shield, but it still sent him flying, just as desired.

He tumbled haphazardly through open air, which made it difficult to keep his bearings but not impossible. He maintained his concentration on the Scarf, using the oncoming flock of birds as a fixture point. Even if he couldn't be quite sure of his own location within this wobbly storm of air currents around him, he knew that he wanted the distance between him and those crows to be increasing, not decreasing.

They were getting closer, so he slammed another block into himself, even harder this time, aiming more upward and diagonally.

The impact was more disorienting, but it worked. It created distance.

For a moment, at least. The birds weren't letting up, of course.

So he did it again. And again. And still again, essentially ping ponging himself back up into the sky and toward the battle."

"2790

~~((Thanksgiving Special - page 6 of 30))~~

Thank god for the Scarf of Amordiin. Without it, there would've been no way he could sense where anyone else was.

Roman was zooming around the crow guy but keeping his distance, probably caught in the dilemma of trying to draw attention but not too much attention.

Dimas had regained his composure and was on the way to attack again. Hector sensed him looking in his general direction, but the Lord Sebolt didn't move to catch him with gravity again. Perhaps he thought Hector knew what he was doing and so didn't want to interfere.

A very generous assumption, if true.

As he neared the midair combat zone again, Hector could still sense the flock of crows chasing after him from below. He would need to deal with them, somehow, else they would be a distraction for Abbas.

After one last aerial tumble, he managed to catch himself on an upside down platform of iron. And for a brief time, as his physical momentum remained with him, pushing the platform higher, his feet were firmly planted on it as he looked down through his visor at the ascending onslaught of murderous crows.

He didn't yet know how durable those little feathered bastards were, so perhaps it was a good time to test them out. With enough concentration in the Scarf, he was very aware of their individual spatial locations relative to himself.

So he started doing two things: spinning up a slew of new iron boulders in orbit around him, and clapping iron boxes around the birds at range. If he could thin their numbers a bit, then perhaps they wouldn't be quite so deadly.

Some of the boxes weren't quite on the mark, which wasn't too surprising considering how quick the damn things were; but some of them were dead on. And immediately, scores of iron cubes began dropping out of the sky, taking black birds with them."

"2791

~~((Thanksgiving Special - page 7 of 30))~~

Hector didn't bother collecting them yet. He didn't know if the birds would be able to break free without assistance, and he didn't want to bring them so close to his body and to Garovel while lacking that critical piece of information.

The flock as a whole still remained quite strong, though. The density of birds packed in there was even greater than he thought. Already, they were spitting fire and acid in his direction.

He had to move, but not before launching one of his boulders at them. It rocked through them, attracting lightning and acid attacks that caused it to crack apart and scatter--but that still didn't render it worthless. The broken chunks sprayed across the flock in a wide pattern, smashing clusters of birds out of formations and sending blood and feathers flying.

Hmm. He felt like that had done even more damage to them than if the birds had just tried to avoid the boulder altogether. Maybe they didn't expect it to have that much force behind it.

Or maybe they were just a bunch of stupid birds that attacked anything that came close.

If that was the case, then he could probably take advantage of that, couldn't he?

He knocked himself away from his upside down platform just as it was engulfed in flames and acid--a combination which combusted and sent him tumbling through open air again.

He was getting used to this, though. He still had more boulders in orbit around him, and it wasn't that much more difficult to keep them there even while moving like this, so long as he maintained his focus.

The flock was still chasing him, but it had lost probably a third of its number already.

Time to make it more.

He repeated his process, catching himself on another big slab of materialized iron that was moving with him through the air, then clapping more boxes around more birds."

"2792

~~((Thanksgiving Special - page 8 of 30))~~

They were closer now, so he didn't have quite as much time to work with as before, but was he still able to lessen their numbers and deliver another speeding boulder into the remaining flock before leaving.

And indeed, the birds crudely attacked the boulder again, splitting it apart and blanketing themselves in more iron chunks, just like before.

So they really were that primitive, then. Either the crow guy couldn't manipulate their behavior that closely, or he was simply too distracted by his fight with Abbas to spare that much attention for Hector.

The latter might've made the most sense, actually. He was close enough to sense Abbas' insane movements now at the edge of the Scarf's range. The Sunsmith was pressing his advantage with a flurry of hand-to-hand attacks in midair. The man was using the jets on his suit to put his entire body weight and more into his punches, which he weaved into spinning kicks and compounded with three-dimensional movement, zipping above and below the Man of Crows constantly.

Given the technology at Abbas' disposal, hand-to-hand combat seemed a bit quaint to be employing now, but Hector had to admit, it still looked pretty damn overwhelming. The crow guy couldn't even get away from him now and was only able to dodge maybe a fifth of the attacks overall--perhaps even less as the barrage continued, unabated.

Plus, Dimas appeared to have a rather strong matchup against the birds. While Hector had been trying to deal with one flock, Dimas had been dealing with three and was now even pulling another away from Abbas.

The birds were flying all over the place, being thrust up and down like yo-yos through the sky as gravity rapidly increased and decreased around them. Some dropped and just kept falling, unable to resume flying."

"2793

~~((Thanksgiving Special - page 9 of 30))~~

The Man of Crows was on the ropes, Hector felt. But he also remembered what terrible shape the Sunsmith's armor was in. That was probably why Abbas was resorting to such a straightforward beat down now. His technological arsenal was limited.

Hector couldn't get too comfortable, he knew. Even as he saw the flock of crows chasing him slow down and begin to disperse, even as they stopped spitting deadly attacks in his direction, he was reluctant to conclude that the battle was already won.

He did, however, allow himself to reach the apex of an arc and land on a hovering iron platform. It was still wobbling and moving with his momentum, but the footing was mostly stable. And after all that, he didn't feel too disoriented. He'd expected a lot worse, quite frankly.

He took a moment to reassess the situation. None of the boxed crows had broken out yet, as far as he could tell, so he started collecting them and boxing up more.

It might have been a needless effort, though.

Abbas was still going hard. No doubt, the crows were losing their potency because of how badly he was slapping the shit out of their master. It seemed like every hit was landing now, drawing more and more blood, with only the occasional glancing blow being returned.

At this point, Hector couldn't even picture how he might assist in such a fight. A ranged attack would risk hitting Abbas, and trying to help up close would probably just earn himself a flying roundhouse kick to the face or something. Either that, or Abbas would have to start pulling his punches, and Hector certainly didn't want that.

Hector was watching in morbid awe. One of Abbas' metal boots caught the crow guy in the side, folding the man's body in half--and not in the normal direction. Abbas was trying to grab his head, seemingly--probably to rip it off his shoulders--but the guy was barely managing to wriggle away.

Honestly, the fact that the crow guy wasn't dead yet was kind of impressive in its own way. Abbas was moving like a man possessed."
"2794

~~((Thanksgiving Special - page 10 of 30))~~

Hector didn't mind letting someone else do the heavy lifting. That was the point of providing combat support.

'Bloodeye inbound on your right,' came Garovel's private warning.

Well, shit.

Hector couldn't sense Bloodeye yet with the Scarf, so he had to turn and look.

Okay, what the hell? The dude had wings now. He definitely hadn't had those before. And unlike the Man of Crows', Bloodeye's were not feathery at all. They were clearly more fleshy and gnarled. They barely even looked like wings, actually. It was like some sort of horribly deformed pterodactyl.

The fact that Bloodeye could apparently grow wings was strange enough on its own, but why had he grown them? He'd already been capable of flight via his red smoke form in pan-rozum.

Regardless, Hector knew at once what his task here was.

Delay, delay, delay. He just needed to buy time for Abbas to finish off the crow guy.

Or in other words, he just needed to be as obnoxious as possible.

And when he thought about it like that, this seemed doable. Obviously, he couldn't take either of these monstrous Abolishers in a fight. But he could almost certainly annoy the shit out of them.

Dimas and Roman both seemed to be thinking the same, because they were already pelting Bloodeye with scarcely visible attacks, trying to slow his progress. Hector, meanwhile, prepared a couple more boulders while circling around on his hovering platform. He wanted to wait for a solid opening before attacking again, because it seemed like Dimas and Roman might just provide one soon. That, and if he fired a boulder off too soon, the bastard would probably just dodge.

As Bloodeye entered the edge of the Scarf's range, however, Hector sensed him do something incredibly strange.

Bloodeye opened his toothy maw, reached his own hand deep into it, and pulled out a fucking missile."

"2795

~~((Thanksgiving Special - page 11 of 30))~~

It made no sense. Of course it didn't. Lengthwise, the missile was larger than the dude's whole body. It was physically impossible for him to have been keeping a missile in his freaking stomach--nevermind the implication that he'd had more than one in there.

Absurd. The missile was already active, too, with the rocket on its tail firing even as it emerged from Bloodeye's mouth.

'Garovel, are you seeing this shit?!

'Worry about it later! Stop that thing before it achieves its top speed!'

The reaper was right. The last missile was so damn fast that it would've bridged the current distance between Bloodeye and Abbas in the blink of an eye. This one obviously needed time to accelerate, and that was their only window to work with.

With the way Abbas and the crow guy were locked in close quarters combat, Bloodeye should've been reluctant to use such a dangerous weapon for fear of hitting his own ally in the process; but Hector had a feeling that these these Abolish maniacs probably didn't give a fuck about things like that.

He loosed one of the iron boulders. At this range, he didn't expect it to hit and just wanted to give Bloodeye something to think about. But to that end, Dimas achieved better results than any of them.

Perhaps too much so.

Dimas did to Bloodeye what he'd just been doing the crows, yo-yoing him up and down with gravity. He ended it off by flinging the monstrous man straight upwards, even higher into the sky--and perhaps, Hector briefly thought, all the way out into space.

But not before the missile managed to slip out of the gravity well. And much to Hector's surprise, it didn't go for Abbas.

It went for Dimas.

And it was blindingly fast. There was barely a moment to react."
"2796

~~((Thanksgiving Special - page 12 of 30))~~

Hector put out a hand, aiming to materialize an iron wall into the missile's path. Dimas raised both hands, perhaps trying to throw it off course.

It was Roman Fullister, however, who actually succeeded.

He just happened to be the closest to the missile's flight path. Why it hadn't picked him in the first place was impossible to say. Perhaps Bloodeye had simply thought the gravity user to be the bigger problem. Perhaps it was just pure chance.

Whatever the case, there was no time to question why or make an informed decision, no time to use logic or concoct a strategy. There was only time enough for Roman to let his instincts take over, to do what required as little thought as possible.

He put his very own body in the way.

Hector's eyes widened at the sight of the explosion, and in the back of his mind, he had to remind himself that Voreese hadn't been with him. Roman would be fine.

But the man had really just taken one for the team.

The aerial battlefield shook violently, and the resultant shock wave nearly knocked Hector off his hovering platform. Even at this distance, smoke and shrapnel still made it all the way over to him, piercing his armor in a couple places.

Dimas had been closer, though. He might've still been caught in the explosion a little, Hector realized.

He concentrated on the Scarf while steadying his platform simultaneously.

The air currents all around him were swirling like mad. He'd just gotten accustomed to the crazy winds at this altitude, and now everything was confused again. But he kept searching. Dimas had to be around here somewhere.

Ah. There. Below him.

Something wasn't quite right, though.

Dimas' left arm and leg were missing.

Damn. That could be fixed shortly, though. And at least he was still alive.

'Another missile above!' yelled Garovel."
"2797

How many of these damn things had this motherfucker swallowed?

Hector didn't waste time trying to confirm anything visually. He just materialized a giant dome high over everyone's head, adding as much thickness to it as quickly as he could. Thankfully, there was more time to react than with the last missile, because Dimas had flung Bloodeye so far away.

The iron dome lingered there in the air for a couple seconds, falling and beginning to pick up speed even as Hector kept beefing it up--until the explosion arrived.

The iron ripped and scattered into a million pieces, threatening them all with even more shrapnel than the missile itself provided. Hector did his best to annihilate what he could, but the twisted chunks of iron were like a heavy rain for a few lingering moments.

The smoke was the real danger, though. It obscured their view, and Hector had a rather strong feeling that Bloodeye would be pouring through it any moment now. He tried to focus on what the Scarf could tell him, but Bloodeye could also be smoke, so he had to be extra attentive.

And indeed, when the dark red fumes plumed diagonally out of the dark gray smoke, he almost didn't see them.

Bloodeye was headed toward Abbas now.

The two missile explosions seemed to have caused a mild disruption in the fight between the Sunsmith and the Man of Crows, but they were still going at it. Some of the birds had returned to harass Abbas as their master struggled to get away, but Abbas had a solid grip on one of his wings now and seemed to be trying to achieve the same on his neck.

Hector needed to keep buying time. And hitting Bloodeye with another boulder wouldn't be nearly as effective while the dude was in his smoke form."

"2798

Wind might be the trick, Hector thought. If a solid object couldn't stop the smoke, then maybe a tornado would. He'd recently gotten a crash course in tornadoes, after all.

But could he actually generate one with just his iron? In his battle with that tornado back at the airport, he'd been trying to smother and calm it, and this was basically the exact opposite.

He had an inkling of how he might attempt it, but not having pulled this off before, he couldn't help feeling enormously anxious in a background thought process.

He needed to create a whirlwind with orbiting iron cubes. The problem, though, was that the point of origin for the orbiting was not himself. It needed to be Bloodeye. Who was still moving.

If he'd had more time to think the problem through, Hector probably would have just been even more hesitant. Creating orbiting cubes around an enemy--much less ones that were moving fast enough to stir up a violent wind--that was a shaky idea, at best.

But he went for it.

His spatial awareness was key. Without a good sense for Bloodeye's exact location within Hector's own sphere of influence, this technique would be horrifically imprecise. Concentration, experience, and the Scarf of Amordiin were the deciding factors.

The literally fuming Bloodeye made for a terrible target. His amorphous body seemed like it was going everywhere at once--but of course, it wasn't. Bloodeye's aim was clear, at least. Hector used that to his advantage.

The cubes materialized around the red smoke, moving with it as they spun up, accelerating. The disturbance of the wind was made more visible by the distortions it created in Bloodeye's form. Perhaps that was hesitation on display as well, mixed with confusion.

But no. Fuck. It wasn't working. It was barely slowing Bloodeye down, if at all, even as Hector kept trying to ramp up the speed."

"2799

Hector didn't know why. Maybe he'd been foolish to think he could create a strong enough whirlwind so quickly. Maybe the altitude had something to do with it. Maybe heavy wind didn't affect pan-rozum-created fumes like he thought it would. Or maybe Bloodeye was just too damn strong.

Whatever the case, Bloodeye was getting through. He was going to make it to Abbas. He was going to interfere in their fight and help the crow guy. He was practically on top of them, already.

The smoke bent visibly downward, and then Hector noticed Dimas there, still mid-regeneration as he tried to pull Bloodeye off of Abbas with pure gravitic force.

It wasn't entirely taking, though. The smoke resisted. As if it had a mind of its own. Because it did, of course.

Neither wind nor gravity was enough to deter Bloodeye's fumes. Hector's orbiting cubes were distorting with Dimas' gravity, too, making it more difficult to keep the wind up and the pathing correct.

Not a very good combination, unfortunately.

Bloodeye made it to Abbas. The red smoke became a red cloud, expanding continuously and enveloping the crow guy, too.

Hector racked his brain, trying to think of something. How the fuck were you supposed to fight smoke?! With the view of the fight obscured, he couldn't even tell what was happening anymore. Was Abbas holding his own? Should he jump in there and try to help? That seemed like a terrible idea, but launching iron boulders into the smoke blindly didn't seem much better.

Before he could decide, the crow guy came flying out, tumbling through the air with one wing missing and a dozen trails of blood following. His neck was still attached to his shoulders, but only just. A fist-sized chunk of it was gone.

Maybe that was the ticket, then."
"2800

Hector abandoned his previous orbital project and started a new one-- with a quite a different objective in mind, this time. He gathered all of his focus in order to sense everything the Scarf could tell him about the Man of Crows.

The guy's black wing was regrowing. His movement was slowing. He was trying to steady himself. He would soon succeed, no doubt.

They couldn't have that.

Iron cubes orbited around the crow guy as he moved. Birds were circling around him, too, but they seemed pretty disorganized, still. Hector knew they'd be a problem again if the guy got his bearings back.

This time, wind was not the goal. This time, he had a clear target. He was just waiting for the bird guy to stop tumbling. There would be a perfect moment to strike, Hector felt, when the guy caught himself in midair. The cubes would be the least likely to miss.

In the meantime, though, he could do more. He still had mental room to work with. An entire thought process to spare, more or less.

He used it to fill the cubes with molten iron.

He'd only done this one before, so perhaps it was a bit risky... but it had sure been effective last time. That was undoubtedly his most powerful technique, at the moment, and this would be a new variant of it.

Would the Man of Crows be able to take it better than Chort had?

Probably.

Hector doubted it would tickle, though.

The moment arrived. The wing had completed enough of its regeneration, and the crow guy stopped himself in midair with a suddenly furious beating of both feathered appendages. From the look on his face, he only just barely glimpsed the four giant, red hot cubes around him before their orbits shifted.

And they all converged inward simultaneously."

"2801

~~((Thanksgiving Special - page 17 of 30))~~

The impact was far bigger than Hector expected. This was a genuine explosion. The aerial battlefield shook from the force of it alone, and molten iron splashed out in every direction at once, flashing bright enough that Hector had to squint from behind the eye slit in his helm as he watched.

The Man of Crows dropped. Covered in what was essentially lava, his figure was barely even humanoid anymore as he fell, motionless as a statue, through open air.

The birds were still following him, though. Disorganized, but following.

That seemed like evidence that the job was not yet done.

Hector bounded off his platform, annihilating it behind him. He let himself fall--skydiving in a full suit of plate armor.

He watched the birds closely for any signs of life. With the Scarf, he could tell that the crow guy had lost some body parts in that attack, but it was tough to sense exactly which ones were missing beneath all that molten iron. He could annihilate it for a better look, of course, but that seemed imprudent, considering how much it must've been impairing the Man of Crows' senses, at the moment.

Was the head still attached? That was all he wanted to know, really. At this range, it would be difficult to target such a small point on the man's body with a powerful enough blow--which was why he'd resorted to this variant of his strongest technique first--but maybe it would be doable if he got a bit closer.

He pushed himself downward with velocity states on the back of his armor--an extra layer of descending iron.

It worked surprisingly well. He jolted closer to the Man of Crows by several meters, and he could see with his own two eyes the molten iron was being disturbed. A scorched arm and an inflamed wing were trying to wipe it away."

"2802

That was useful information. He traced the positions of the arm and wing with the Scarf and located where the head should been below the iron. By now, the neck might've finished regenerating, or it might've been in even worse condition after that attack. There was no way to tell while it was covered.

If he wanted to decapitate the Man of Crows, he'd have to remove the molten iron first. He needed a better look, and he didn't want the iron to dampen the force of the blow, either.

But that would obviously expose him to danger, too.

No time to think about it. They were falling. That ground was coming up fast.

He annihilated the molten coating.

In that moment, he had a full view of the Man of Crows' smote and sundered body. It was in pieces and still trying to regenerate, but the head, neck, and most of the torso were intact. The limbs looked like they'd exploded out of their sockets.

And the guy saw Hector there, approaching from above. They locked gazes.

That was certain death in the man's eyes. Perhaps he saw the same thing in Hector's.

Hector had an orbiting blade already prepared. It didn't need to be big to sever the neck, but it was. Wide and flat, the size of dinner table. Better to overdo it than under.

He loosed it.

Straight and true, it flew--thanks again to the Scarf, most likely.

And it cleaved the Man's neck from his shoulders. Blood soared amidst the charred flesh and scattered feathers.

It still wasn't over, though. Hector could sense the crows around him. Three separate flocks, all twitching at once, all suddenly converging toward him.

Hector knew at once. So long as that head was unrestrained, those birds would probably remain within his control.

Finishing this meant doing something about that."

"2803

~~((Thanksgiving Special - page 19 of 30))~~

He'd practiced creating truly cold iron during his training with Zeff, but he didn't have much confidence in it yet. Molten iron was much easier by comparison. It pulled on an ""emotional"" command from his mind, feeling something like anger and ferocious concentration. Lowering the temperature, then, seemed to be about summoning the opposite feelings, which still felt somewhat strange to him. He could do it, just not as easily.

It wasn't just the difficulty of the technique that concerned him, though. It was its efficacy. He didn't know if it would actually be able to freeze someone this powerful. By all accounts, the molten iron should have melted the Man's body within seconds, but clearly, his passive soul defense was so strong that he'd only ended up with burnt flesh, instead.

And if he relied only on the cold to subdue the Man of Crows, then nothing less than freezing would do.

Which was why he didn't intend to rely on cold alone.

Hector traced a quick outline of the Man's face with the Scarf and created a frozen iron mask for it in his hand. He might've liked to simply coat the guy's face in iron, instead, but he was certain the field density of the Man's soul would prevent his materialization from functioning that close to the skin. He had to do this the hard way.

It all happened within a few moments.

As he soared close, the iron mask was so cold that he'd immediately lost sensation in his right hand, even through the gauntlet he was wearing. Which was a good sign, at least.

But the birds were there, too. The quick little bastards.

He slammed the mask onto the Man of Crows' face and just barely twisted himself around in time to take the brunt of the first flock's attack with Haqq's shield.

It dented impressively but held together, and Hector went flying off course as the unshielded extremities of his iron armor shattered."
"2804

~~((Thanksgiving Special - page 20 of 30))~~

He could sense more crows en route. Two other flocks. They weren't as rigid as the one he'd faced earlier, nor were they spewing ranged attacks; but he couldn't just wait around for them to skewer him. Garovel was with him, after all.

And, well. It worked before, so he did it again. Hector knocked himself out of the flocks' paths with an iron boulder, narrowly avoiding both streams of beaks and claws.

As he tumbled, struggling to keep the severed head in view of his eye slit, he caught sight of something that took priority over just about everything else in his mind.

He saw a reaper melt out of the Man of Crows' head.

The face was covered by the frozen, soul-infused mask, but the back was still open, which was something he'd been intending to fix. But that was where the reaper appeared from. Perhaps it was trying to flee during the confusion, believing Hector would be too distracted by the flocks and the utter mayhem of freefall to notice.

Hector didn't have to think. He hadn't even been certain that the Man of Crows had been using a hyper-state up until now, but it didn't matter. There was no need to be surprised or to question it.

The reaper was a servant's weak point. There was only one action to be taken here. Instinctual.

And for it, Hector had the perfect technique, something he'd picked up from a man he admired more than almost anyone.

He launched a crude iron javelin with a simple, straightforward velocity state. No orbiting or parallel thought processes required.

It missed.

But that was okay.

It just had to get close enough to the Man's reaper. Which it did.

The iron shaft branched out violently, becoming a deadly tree of blades in the direction of the reaper.

And it connected."

"2805 -- CCXLIX.

~~((Thanksgiving Special - page 21 of 30))~~

With his soul pressed into it, the iron branches skewered the reaper dozens of times, shredding its soul in the blink of an eye.

Hector didn't get the opportunity to even process what he had just done, however.

Right as his own killing blow was struck, a flock of crows crashed into him, tearing his armor apart and ripping through his body like paper. He barely sensed the flock's form at the last moment, convulsing and scattering.

He tumbled through open air again, having lost all sense of direction. He reached out with the Scarf to get his bearings, only to sense that he was heading straight toward some kind of gargantuan wall.

Wait, no.

That was the ground, wasn't it? Because he was falling. And it was far too late to do anything about it now.

Everything went black as he hit solid earth.

Chapter Two Hundred Forty-Nine: 'O, inciting tribulation...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector awoke with a start, jolting upright and taking a moment to blink away the disorientation in his vision.

'Easy there,' came Garovel's echoing voice. 'I decided to wake you up a bit early, just because there's a lot of people who want to talk to you. So take it slow. It'll probably take you a full week to recover completely.'

Hector tried to think. Recover from what? Agh, his head was pounding. Everything was, actually. ""What happened?"" he mumbled.

'Don't remember?'

""I remember a battle... er, in the sky...?""

'Yeah, and you hit the ground like a ton of bricks. Killed you real good. Big splat. Blood everywhere. Even your brain didn't survive, so I had to regenerate you from scratch.'

It was coming back to him.

He was in his own bed, he suddenly realized. ""We're back at Warrenhold already? How long was I out?""

'A full day.'

""Agh...""

"2805 -- CCXLIX.

~~((Thanksgiving Special - page 21 of 30))~~

With his soul pressed into it, the iron branches skewered the reaper dozens of times, shredding its soul in the blink of an eye.

Hector didn't get the opportunity to even process what he had just done, however.

Right as his own killing blow was struck, a flock of crows crashed into him, tearing his armor apart and ripping through his body like paper. He barely sensed the flock's form at the last moment, convulsing and scattering.

He tumbled through open air again, having lost all sense of direction. He reached out with the Scarf to get his bearings, only to sense that he was heading straight toward some kind of gargantuan wall.

Wait, no.

That was the ground, wasn't it? Because he was falling. And it was far too late to do anything about it now.

Everything went black as he hit solid earth.

Chapter Two Hundred Forty-Nine: 'O, inciting tribulation...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector awoke with a start, jolting upright and taking a moment to blink away the disorientation in his vision.

'Easy there,' came Garovel's echoing voice. 'I decided to wake you up a bit early, just because there's a lot of people who want to talk to you. So take it slow. It'll probably take you a full week to recover completely.'

Hector tried to think. Recover from what? Agh, his head was pounding. Everything was, actually. ""What happened?"" he mumbled.

'Don't remember?'

""I remember a battle... er, in the sky...?""

'Yeah, and you hit the ground like a ton of bricks. Killed you real good. Big splat. Blood everywhere. Even your brain didn't survive, so I had to regenerate you from scratch.'

It was coming back to him.

He was in his own bed, he suddenly realized. ""We're back at Warrenhold already? How long was I out?""

'A full day.'

""Agh... ""

"2806

~~((Thanksgiving Special - page 22 of 30))~~

'You did well, Hector,' said Garovel. 'Perhaps a little TOO well, in fact.'

""...What do you mean?""

'You slew the Man of Crows.'

Ah...

He remembered now.

The reaper. He'd killed the reaper.

His eyes eased shut, and he lay back down again with his forearm pressed against his forehead.

And he sighed.

He'd been in so many fights now. So many life and death situations. It felt a little strange to think about it, but... he still wasn't really used to killing. Especially people. Reapers.

In fact, that might've been the first reaper he'd ever killed. It was a bit hard to be certain, thinking back on some of the more chaotic fights he'd been involved in, such as the one at Dunehall where there'd been tons of invisible enemies around.

If nothing else, that was the first reaper he had knowingly killed.

Yes. The first.

He didn't much like that word. First. It implied there might be many more to come.

Egh.

While he didn't exactly feel bad about it, he didn't feel great, either. Hell, he hadn't even known the reaper's name. Or the crow guy's for that matter. When it came down to it, he'd barely known anything about them. Beyond the fact that they were the ""enemy"" and that they were infamous, they'd been mysteries to him.

It made him question things.

Could he have taken the reaper captive, instead?

Hmm.

Not likely. The way those crows had been gunning for him, they would've killed him and freed the reaper immediately thereafter. And the Man of Crows would have escaped. And Garovel might've been dead now, too.

Or maybe not. Maybe he was lacking imagination in some way.

Ugh.

He didn't like how... unbothered he was, right now. He felt the weight of his actions, the importance of them, but he didn't feel guilt. Like, at all, really.

That was a good thing, he supposed. And not wrong, perhaps. But it was still... concerning, in its own way."

"2807

~~((Thanksgiving Special - page 23 of 30))~~

He'd done what he had to, though. He'd protected Garovel. And their allies.

If the Man of Crows and his reaper hadn't wanted to die, then the motherfuckers shouldn't have been trying to kill them.

Pretty simple.

Still strange, however. Despite how much death and destruction he'd seen, this sense of permanence still felt weird to him. Servants could come back from so many things. Even the bloodiest and most gruesome of fights often didn't carry much sense of finality to them.

Perhaps Garovel had some idea of all the different thoughts that were going through his head right now, because the reaper wasn't saying anything. He was giving him time to think, seemingly.

Still on his back, Hector decided to break the silence with a question. ""...What happened to Bloodeye?""

'Still alive, unfortunately. He escaped.'

Hmm.

'Which means the rest of Abolish will know that Abbas found allies near the Lorent-Callum border.'

""Shit. You think they'll be able to identify us?""

'Well, it's a bit of a toss up at this point. None of our reapers recognized Bloodeye's soul, so our individual identities might still be safe--at least until any of us run into him again. But then again... you've gotten kinda famous lately. And your armor is pretty distinctive. I wouldn't be terribly surprised if they figured out who you were.'

""Fuck...""

'Plus, some of them probably know that you were at Dunehall. With Ivan. Which is another matter, by the way.'

Hector hadn't forgotten. He'd been hoping to talk to Abbas about that very subject as soon as possible, in fact. ""Just tell me that Ivan isn't free.""

'He's not free.'

Hector opened his eyes and turned to look at the reaper. ""Wait, really? He's not?""

'As far as Abbas knows, at least, a small group of Sandlords managed to escape from the Golden Fort with Ivan's frozen head before Abolish showed up to sack it. There's no telling where it is right now, though.'"
"2808

~~((Thanksgiving Special - page 24 of 30))~~

Hector exhaled a long breath. Frankly, he'd been trying not to worry too much about the problem of Ivan simply because he didn't fucking know what to do about it. So to hear that it wasn't an immediate issue was an enormous relief--more so than he'd realized, even.

'That being said,' Garovel went on, 'we still can't ignore the threat that Ivan poses to us now.'

That put a bit of a damper on Hector's little relief party. Primarily because he knew the reaper was right. Dammit.

'We have to assume that Abolish is tracking the group who escaped with Ivan's head. Freeing him is probably their top priority, right now.'

Yeah, that sounded about right.

'If they find and revive him, he's going to be pissed. At two specific people, most likely.'

""Me and Abbas.""

'Both of whom are here at Warrenhold.'

Hector sighed. ""Couldn't they just, like... drop his head to the bottom of the ocean somewhere? Or better yet, launch it out into space?""

'Ah. If only. You're not the first to have had that idea. Launching captives into space, that is. Unfortunately, it doesn't work.'

He kinda figured as much. Seemed too easy. ""Why?""

'Because for whatever reason, the servant-reaper bond is constrained by Eleg's atmosphere. If you send a servant into space, the bond will fade until they simply die. Or in other words, if Ivan's head leaves the planet, then his reaper will be able to resurrect him from scratch again.'

""That blows...""

'Kinda, yeah. But it's also good that Abolish can't do shit like that to us. I can only imagine how different history would be if such a tactic were possible. By now, there'd be countless reapers who'd lost their servants like that.'

""I don't care about history. I care about how upset I feel.""

Garovel chuckled. 'That's exactly the type of level-headed thinking we need, right now.'

"2809

~~((Thanksgiving Special - page 25 of 30))~~

Hector let out a small laugh of his own and rolled out of bed. He was abruptly reminded of how sore and stiff his body was. He stretched his neck. ""What about the ocean, though? You didn't explain why that wasn't an option.""

'Well, that one has multiple reasons. In general, it's just a bad idea to abandon any captive's head, no matter how remote you think the location might be. Anything could happen to it out there. For example, a temperature shift could cause it to thaw, and if brain function returns, the servant would be able to communicate telepathically with the reaper again.'

Hector rubbed his chin. ""So it would be better to hide it in like a snowy tundra region or something...""

'Methinks you've missed the point about it not being a good idea to abandon captured heads in random places. But technically, you're not wrong. There've been a number of notorious prisons throughout history that were located in frozen regions for precisely that reason. In fact, I'm sure there are still a few being used to this day.'

""Really?"" said Hector. ""I was just kinda talkin' out of my ass...""

'I could tell. And yeah, that's a thing, though it's probably less common than it used to be. A few hundred years ago, there was a series of wars often referred to as the Icy Clog that took place in northern Ardora. They were all about trying to free captive servants from various prisons. Lasted decades. A real shitshow, if ever there was one.'

Hector allowed a beat to pass before turning to look at Garovel again. ""I still feel like it'd be possible to hide the head somewhere that no one would ever find it.""

'Are you fucking kidding me, right now?'

""Look, I'm just saying, like, what about a super deep hole in an iceberg or something?""

"2810

~~((Thanksgiving Special - page 26 of 30))~~

'And what if the iceberg melts one day?' said Garovel. 'Or simply shifts? Or if a reaper happens to wander by? Or something else, perhaps?'

Hector gave a shrug and stood up. He was naked, he suddenly realized. He decided to sit back down and pull the bed sheets over him again.

'I've seen it all before, buddy,' said Garovel. 'No need to start getting embarrassed in front of me now.'

That was probably true. If only it was as simple as deciding not to feel embarrassed. He pulled the sheets with him as he got up again and made his way over to the closet to fetch some clothes.

'Anyway, even if you did find a really good place to hide the head, there are artifacts out there that are capable of helping reapers locate their lost servants. The Vanguard has access to a few such things, so I'm sure Abolish does, too.'

""Artifacts?"" said Hector. ""Magical ones, you mean?""

'You could say that. They can look like all sorts of different things, but we generally refer to such items as ""soul compasses."" They're rare but highly valued. I wouldn't be surprised if Abolish was using one to help them track down Ivan, right now.'

Clothes in hand, Hector waddled over to the bathroom. ""Doesn't that mean the people who escaped with the head are in a shitload of danger?""

'It sure does. They'll have to keep moving until they find a place they think is secure enough to store the head.'

""Does such a place even exist?"" said Hector. ""I mean, if they're being chased by friggin' Morgunov, then...""

'Yeah, it's a tall order. Short of asking Sermung himself to look after it, I'm not sure what you would do in such a situation. I don't envy their position, right now.'

"2811

~~((Thanksgiving Special - page 27 of 30))~~

""Shit..."" As he got changed, a different question occurred to him. ""So wait a minute, how do these soul compasses work, exactly? Can they help you track down ANY soul you want?""

'No. Only souls that you are bonded with, such as that between a reaper and servant.'

""Ah...""

'Which is why Abolish actually might NOT be using a soul compass to track Ivan, just yet. Because it means that Ivan's reaper has to be involved in the chase. Which is risky. And with the war going on, they probably can't spare that much high-level manpower to protect the reaper while they go on some long ass soul hunt across the world.'

""Hmm.""

'Such hunts have been known to last for years or even decades, in extreme cases. I remember one time, about 1500 years ago, when a prince of the Mohssian Empire was captured by a famous general of the Valgan Empire. Now THAT was a hunt. A half century of constant clashes spanning the entire planet, including the Undercrust. I've heard it called the greatest chase in history.'

""Geez...""

'It finally ended when the chase led them to Exoltha, and a group of feldeaths annihilated both parties.'

""Holy shit...""

'Yeah, it was pretty fucked. And also a valuable lesson. Don't screw around in Exoltha.'

As Hector finished getting ready, one last thought occurred to him, and he frowned. ""Aw, shit, I was supposed meet the Queen in Lorent, wasn't I?""

'Well, you didn't HAVE to. It was an open invitation, I think.'

He straightened his black tie. ""I really don't want her to think that I'm ignoring her.""

'She might like to meet Abbas. Perhaps it would be a good idea to take them. You were thinking of getting the Sandlords settled in Lorent, anyway, weren't you?'

That was true, he supposed."

"2812

~~((Thanksgiving Special - page 28 of 30))~~

'Not to mention, there's that OTHER matter to look into,' said Garovel.

Fully dressed now, Hector poked his head through open bathroom doorway before walking out. ""What other matter?""

'Oh, c'mon, you know the one. The other matter.'

""Uh...""

'The one involving the thing. Inside the other thing.'

Ah, wait a minute. ""Hmm. Weirdly enough, I think I actually know what you're talking about...""

'Heh. Good. Then there's no need for me to ramble on. Our reaper-servant communication skills are doing excellently.'

""If you say so.""

A beat passed, and Garovel tilted his head at him. 'Again with the all black getup, huh?'

""Hey, these are the nicest clothes I've got."" It was true. Ms. Rogers had picked them out and gotten them fitted for him. She said they belonged to the Umbral Heart line from Domingo. He didn't know what any of that meant, but they sure felt nice on his skin and didn't restrict his movements as much as other fancy clothes he'd worn.

And apparently, they were ""expensive but not TOO expensive."" According to Ms. Rogers, they would allow him to appear respectable and distinguished in front of people who cared about these sorts of things without looking like he was showing off.

That all sounded good to Hector.

'I wasn't questioning their niceness,' said Garovel. 'It's just a lot of black, y'know? A black man in a black suit in a black tower. Don't you think a splash of color might do you some good?'

Well, the reaper had a point. Hector scratched the back of his head as he looked around his room. He went through the dresser near the closet, searching for something he could wear with color on it. Some extra piece of clothing he could wear with or perhaps on top of--

He popped his head out, suddenly realizing.

He wasn't wearing the Scarf of Amordiin, right now."

"2813

~~((Thanksgiving Special - page 29 of 30))~~

Where was it? He looked around, but the Scarf was black, and just like Garovel had said, so was the whole damn tower.

'By the bed,' said Garovel, apparently not needing an explanation of what Hector was after.

And indeed, there it lay, on the nightstand next to the amber lamp.

Hector breathed a sigh of relief and went over to pick it up again.

Immediately, the fullness of the room filled his mind as he could sense the flow of air all throughout it.

'I'm surprised you didn't notice you weren't wearing it sooner,' said Garovel.

""You said you regrew me from scratch, right?""

'Yup.'

""So then...""

'Dimas Sebolt carried it back for us,' said Garovel. 'At my request.'

""Ah...""

'Yeah.'

""So now he knows what the Scarf is capable of.""

'Yes, he does. I didn't exactly explain it to him, but he was touching it for several hours while you were busy being dead.'

Hector squinted. ""Wait a minute. Why didn't you just resurrect me then and let me carry it back myself?""

'Oh, um. Well, y'know. I probably should've, huh? Guess it slipped my mind. Probably would've saved us some time, too. Bit of a BONEHEADED move on my part. Heh. Get it? Boneheaded?'

Hector did not react.

"Cuz you see me as a skeleton, right? Skeleton joke.'

Hector just kept staring at him.

'You could at least pretend to laugh. It was a little funny.'

Still, Hector made no response.

'Alright, stop that. You're freakin' me out. Say something, damn you.'

The truth was, something else was bothering Hector. He stepped closer to Garovel, looking the reaper up and down, searching for signs of anything amiss. Hmm.

'Excuse me, but my eyeholes are up here.' And after a beat, he added, 'They ARE up here, right?'

Hector ignored him. He didn't find--

Ah.

There was a gash on Garovel's backside. Small but there. Smoldering with ethereal, black-and-white smoke."

"2814

~~((Thanksgiving Special - page 30 of 30))~~

""You were wounded in the battle,"" said Hector, displeased--both with Garovel for hiding it and with himself for having allowed it to happen in the first place.

'It was nothing. I'm already back in top form.'

""...Are you?"" said Hector. ""That's why you had to let Dimas carry the Scarf, isn't it? Because you couldn't revive me?""

'Listen, I was just feeling a little woozy. I could still talk. Kinda. For a while. Anyway, I'm fine now.'

Hector's frown only deepened, however.

'There's no point in worrying about me. And besides, reapers are more durable than you give us credit for, Hector.'

""...I just killed one of you, Garovel. And it wasn't that difficult.""

Garovel fell quiet at that remark.

""I knew you should have stayed behind with Voreese,"" said Hector.

'And I knew you would reach that conclusion if I told you about my wound. Hector, I'm not going to just keep sitting on the sidelines while you do all the heavy lifting, alright? I need to be with you when shit hits the fan. I need to be useful. I'll lose my fucking mind otherwise.'

""Garovel, this isn't... agh..." How was he supposed to explain? Technically, the reaper was supposed to be the one in charge here, but Hector didn't know if he could put up with this.

'I helped, didn't I?' said Garovel. 'I warned you about that missile from Bloodeye. Gave you the chance to intercept it with a big dome, remember? Maybe that doesn't seem like a big deal to you, but if that thing had hit, it could've shifted the entire tide of the battle. I mean, when you think about it, I saved all our lives.'

Hector just sighed.

'And besides, the safest place for me is by your side,' said Garovel. 'You may not think so, but it's true. With all those invisible assholes in Abolish, you're one of the few people who can actually sense their presence and protect me from them. Am I wrong?'"

"2815

The reaper did have a point, Hector knew, but he was still far from convinced. And worse, it was starting to sound like there was no way that he would be able to make Garovel see reason here.

'Hector, I refuse to be one of those reapers who gets sniped by some low-level douchebag while their servant is distracted. I'm sticking with you. I don't care how dangerous it gets.'

Fuck.

'And I REALLY don't want to be one of those reapers who allows their servant to get captured for twenty years or some shit, either. That would be hell.'

""Garovel, you're being unreasonable...""

'I know I am. But I didn't take you on as a servant because I wanted to be reasonable. I took you on because I wanted to save some fucking lives. To be involved in some heroic-ass shit! And you still need my help, goddammit! I mean, don't get me wrong! I'm super proud of you and all, but battles are crazy, and my experience is invaluable to you!'

Hector held up both hands. ""Alright, you're getting a little worked up...""

'I've BEEN worked up! For thousands of years, I've been worked up! You know how much bullshit I've seen and couldn't do anything about! I go through these phases of feeling incredibly powerful and then incredibly useless! I'm not gonna become your fucking pet reaper, okay?! I'm gonna do everything I can to keep being useful, and you're not gonna stop me from doing that! We're in this together, you little shit!'

Wow. Hector just kind of stood there, not even sure what to say anymore.

Garovel seemed to be done now, though. And an awkward silence arrived.

After a while, Hector scratched his cheek and looked around the room again. ""So... about that splash of color you mentioned... ""

"2816

After a while longer of rifling through his clothes, Hector was finally able to pick out something to wear that wasn't black.

Garovel was still not entirely pleased with the outcome, however. 'Of all the possible colors, you choose GRAY?'

It was his undershirt that he had changed. It contrasted with the black of his suit and also made his black tie more visible. ""Yeah, y'know, it's like, thematic. Because we live in Gray Rock.""

'So you're trying to wear the environment?'

""Look, I don't know fashion, alright? But I think it looks decent, at least. You never said I looked bad.""

'No, you look fine. Very lordly. I guess. Doesn't change the fact that gray is the most boring color in the world.'

""I don't know if I can trust your opinion on this, Garovel.""

'That's hurtful. In fact, I think my wound from Crowe just reopened.'

He was finally ready to leave the room, until he reached the door and remembered yet another thing that he should probably ask about.

""Where's the Shard?""

'Oh, it's under your pillow,' said Garovel.

Hector gave him a look.

'What?'

""You had Dimas put it under my pillow? Like the Tooth Fairy?""

'Yeah, what's wrong with that?'

""I just... I mean... why the pillow?""

'Why not? Clearly, it was a pretty good hiding spot, since you were just sleeping on it and didn't even notice.'

Alright, whatever. Hector ventured over to the bed and grabbed it.

""Did you tell Dimas how important it is, too?""

'I think so. Sort of. My memory's a little fuzzy on that one. I don't think I went into detail about it being your personal hotline to an ancient warrior god of his ancestral rivals.'

""That does seem like it would be a little hard to explain...""

As they left the room, Hector briefly wondered if perhaps he could've located the Shard without asking Garovel where it was. He recalled having some weird kind of... extra awareness of its location in the past. Maybe if he'd concentrated, he could've sussed it out on his own.

Hmm. Maybe he'd try to test that theory out later."

The Tower of Night was busier than he'd ever seen it--which wasn't too surprising, really. If all three hundred of Abbas' refugees had made it to Warrenhold, then the number people within the castle had almost doubled overnight.

He wasn't too concerned about having enough room for everyone, but food was another matter. No doubt, Ms. Rogers was having a hell of time with all of these new guests.

On every floor, he could see the Rainlords and Sandlords intermingling, but they were easy to differentiate from one another. Even if their bronzier skin, head coverings, and robes didn't give them away, it would still be obvious because the Sandlords looked like they'd all been through hell.

So many wounded.

He was glad to see they were being tended to, though.

Hector was a bit worried how the Rainlords and Sandlords were going to get along under one roof, but this was an encouraging sight, he felt. And they'd shared a country for ages, so maybe there was hope.

With each room or crowded corridor that he passed, Hector sensed a lot of eyes on him and heard plenty of hushed whispers.

It was making him self-conscious. These clothes weren't making him stand out too much, were they? They couldn't be. They practically blended into the nightrack.

As he neared the first floor, a crying woman stumbled in front of him and all but fell at his feet. She was saying something, but he couldn't tell what it was, either because she was sobbing too hard or because she was simply speaking a different language--or perhaps both.

'I think she's thanking you,' said Garovel privately. 'Ah. For saving the lives of her grandchildren.'

Hector's brow peaked in the center, and a somber frown split his face as he helped the poor woman back up to her feet. When he looked her in the eye, it only seemed to make her cry harder."

An unfamiliar pair of men pushed through the crowd and gently put their hands on the woman, pulling her away from him. They didn't say anything, perhaps because they didn't speak Mohssian, but they did give him nods of acknowledgment.

Hector just stood there for a minute longer, watching them go.

Wow, he thought. He had no idea who that woman was, and he felt like she might've been giving him a bit too much credit; but all the same, he was unbelievably glad to have played a part in helping her.

He was abruptly reminded of why he was doing all of this, why he wanted Warrenhold to become a bastion of safety in the first place. He hadn't forgotten, of course, but still. Seeing all these people like this... battered and in need...

It was an odd mixture of emotions. Sorrow and frustration. He hoped he could do more for them. With every fiber of his being, he intended to keep them safe, at the very least.

He was starting to draw even more attention, just standing here like a weirdo, so he moved on.

Garovel led him out into the main plaza, around which stood all of Warrenhold's eight great towers.

The reaper pointed out Lord Abbas, who was overlooking the underground lake on the far side of the plaza.

The man wasn't in his armor, but he did seem to be tinkering with something in his hands. He wasn't alone, either. A sizable crowd was gathered around him, most of whom Hector did not recognize. A few Rainlords were sprinkled in there as well, however.

They all turned to look his direction as he approached.

Abbas' reaper--Worwal, as Hector recalled--was the first to speak up. 'The Lord Darksteel of Warrenhold. This is a magnificent fortress you have here.'"

"2819

'We appreciate your kind words,' said Garovel, 'even if you are only being polite. It still needs quite a bit more work before it will be deserving of a term like ""magnificent,"" I feel'

'Oh, you are being too harsh, surely,' said Worwal. 'Why, this castle is a wonder and a half. The size alone is enough to leave a lasting impression in the mind, but the fact that it is also underground makes me think that it could only have been the work of a true artist of the architectural craft.'

'Ah, that artist would be one Stasya Orlov,' said Garovel.

Worwal's hollow eye sockets widened a little. 'That name is familiar, though I have not heard it since before the banners of Al'Imbratur were flown in Kuros.'

'Indeed. My friend Voreese would be able to tell you more of her, if you are interested.'

'I would be. Perhaps we could--'

""I'm afraid I must interject before the entire day disappears during this conversation,"" said Lord Abbas. ""Unfortunately, there are more pressing matters to be discussed than that of your lovely home, Lord Goffe.""

'Of course,' said Worwal. 'Forgive me. I have something of an obsession when it comes to the matter of grand masonry.'

Oh? Hector's head perked up a little at that.

Abbas seized full control of things before Hector could respond, however. ""Firstly, please allow me to thank you for coming to our aid. I believe it is no exaggeration to say that your efforts saved the lives of my entire Hahl, and I could not be more grateful.""

""Oh. Uh... er..."" Shit. He should've practiced for this or something.

""If the situation had grown any more dire, I would have been forced to do something quite drastic indeed,"" said Abbas. ""So thank you for stepping in when you did."" And he offered him a handshake.

Well, Hector knew how to do that much, at least. He shook it."

Abbas held his gaze for a long moment, not saying anything.

Hmm, perhaps he was waiting for Hector to take the initiative. Uh. Shit. There were plenty of things to discuss, weren't there? He thrust his uncertainty into a background thought process as he tried to think about what to say.

This handshake was going on for a bit too long, Hector suddenly realized. He tried to pull his hand back, but Lord Abbas maintained his grip.

And the man tilted his head at him. ""So I wasn't hallucinating,"" said Abbas.

Hector didn't know what was happening, right now. He tried to pull his hand back again, and this time, Abbas let him go.

""Everyone,"" said Abbas, apparently addressing the small crowd around them, ""would you mind giving us a moment, please?""

A string of acknowledging murmurs ran through the onlookers, and a minute later, they had all dispersed. Only the handful of Rainlords remained behind, and Hector noticed that they were looking at him, as if expecting something.

Hmm.

He gave them a nod, and then they dispersed, too.

Abbas' gaze lingered on those departing Rainlords for a bit longer before returning to Hector again. ""The Rain is very attached to you, it would seem. Asad did not mention that.""

Again, Hector did not know what to say, so he merely remained quiet.

A mild smile crossed Abbas' face. ""Perhaps he thought it too unbelievable. The idea that these frigid puddles would act so deferential to someone not of their own blood--if I had not seen it with my own eyes and heard it with my own ears, I may have simply thought him a fool.""

Deferential? Eyes and ears? What exactly had he been seeing and hearing from the Rainlords over this past day, Hector wondered?"

""There is something very peculiar about you, Lord Goffe."" Abbas' dark brown eyes held on him, seeming somehow more penetrating due to how deeply sunken into his long, thin face they were. ""Something familiar.""

Hmm. Hector had a feeling he knew what the man was getting at, but he wanted some elaboration first. ""Familiar in what way?""

""It is difficult to describe,"" said Abbas. ""I have felt its like before--I am sure of that. But it has been a very long time since I felt it so... strongly.""

Garovel interjected before Hector could answer. 'When WAS the last time, if you don't mind my asking?'

Abbas gave him a look. ""So you are aware of it, then.""

Garovel gave a light chortle. 'Maybe just a bit. But please, answer my question. I'm quite curious.'

Abbas took a moment to think, and his gaze grew distant. ""I was but a child. Not yet a servant, even. My grandfather introduced me to a man named..." He shut his eyes, perhaps to help him concentrate. ""Hanseth. Yes, that is what it was. Hanseth.""

'Jara Hanseth?' said Worwal.

Abbas looked at his reaper. ""I don't recall his first name. And you and I had not met yet, so I don't know if we are referring to the same person.""

'Mm. You're probably thinking of Jara. Or perhaps his brother, Kizo Hanseth. They were both friends of your father around that time.'

'Hanseth, you say,' said Garovel. 'I've heard that name before. And not in the most flattering of contexts, unfortunately.'

'That does not surprise me,' said Worwal. 'Jara had a reputation for being something of a... ""kook,"" to put it nicely. Many a strange idea were born from that man's mind.'

'Is Jara still alive?' said Garovel.

Worwal's skeletal face twisted awkwardly. 'Ah... no. He was killed. By Kizo, no less.'

'Oh.'

"2822

'Quite an odd story, that one,' said Worwal. 'And rather long, as well.'

'I should like to hear it another time, then,' said Garovel.

'And I should like to tell it.'

""Regardless,"" said Abbas, ""I only meant that it is familiar in its strangeness and intensity. I do not mean to imply that you are the same at heart as this Jara character. I did not even know the man.""

That was a bit of a relief, Hector supposed. It sounded like Jara Hanseth wasn't someone he wanted to emulate, though he was admittedly still curious. Moreover, he figured he could offer some elaboration of his own now. ""The Wrobels call it 'aura,'" he said.

Abbas' head reared back, and he blinked at him. ""You are in contact with a nest of Wrobels?""

Hector had a hunch that Abbas would know of them. The dude was old as hell, after all, and the leader of the Golden Council besides. ""I am. But I can't say more than that without betraying their confidence.""

""That must be quite helpful, indeed,"" said Abbas. The surprise on his face was not going away. ""Aura, you said? How did you come by this strange power?""

Even though he trusted Abbas Saqqaf and felt like they could gain a lot by swapping information, Hector didn't want to give too much away too quickly. Not to mention, there were more pressing questions on his mind. ""That, too, might be best saved for a different conversation,"" he said. ""Right now, I'm more interested in hearing what your current plans are.""

""Ah."" Abbas' expression returned to its more rigid state. ""At the moment, making repairs to my armor is the priority. That battle would have gone much more smoothly if its functionality had not been so greatly compromised by those damnable abominations of the Mad Demon. ""

"2823

Hector observed the object in Abbas' hand another time. It seemed to just be a hunk of metal, yet Abbas was still fiddling with it even while they talked.

The Lord Saqqaf took notice and held it up more easily for Hector to see. ""The central processing unit for the suit's cerebral implants. Fixing it has been an exercise in tedium.""

Cerebral implants? What the heck? ""Er... what's wrong with it?"" asked Hector.

""It was crawling with nanoscopic saboteurs,"" said Abbas. ""I managed to contain them, but removing them has been akin to picking lice out of my son's hair one by one. If only there was a solution as quick as shaving him bald.""

Nanosopic? The more he talked to this guy, the more Hector felt like he was out of his depth here.

'You're talking about nanomachines?' said Garovel, sounding truly shocked. 'Used by Morgunov?'

""Indeed. Quite the obnoxious little things. I would have liked to study them, at the very least, but it appears they have some sort of built-in self-destruct mechanism whenever they are 'caught.' How the old thu'ban managed that, I do not fully know. Perhaps it is something to do with their proximity to one another, but I have tried catching them in groups and yet they still annihilate themselves, so that cannot be the only trigger."" The man broke for a sigh. ""I dread to think that he could have actually harnessed the observer effect at a quantum mechanical level, but that may be exactly what he did. Haqq Najir has been studying them around the clock and trying to learn more, though I am not hopeful for his findings.""

Yeah, okay, wow, Hector felt pretty stupid after listening all of that and retaining almost none of it. He could at least pick out the name Haqq Najir, though. ""How long do you think it will take you to repair your armor?""

""That is a difficult question to answer."" Abbas touched a hand to his mouth as he eyed Hector. ""But perhaps you will understand. You were gifted the Amir-9 prototype unit by Sazandara, were you not?""

Hector paused. Amir-9? Prototype? What was he--?

Oh, wait a minute.

""You mean this?"" Hector materialized Haqq's heater shield into his left hand.

The Lord Saqqaf's eyes just about popped out of his head. He said something Valgan that Hector didn't quite catch, and then recomposed himself. He pocketed the CPU he was holding and then held his hands out as if to ask for the shield. ""May I?""

Hector handed it over.

Abbas inspected it up and down with his mouth hanging slightly open.

Hector and Garovel exchanged glances while they waited.

Abbas pressed his right hand against the face of the shield, stretching all five fingers out wide and closing his eyes. After a moment, he opened them again and handed the shield back to Hector.

Rather than taking it, Hector simply dematerialized it.

Abbas blinked as he shook his head. ""Unbelievable... how in the world were you able to assimilate it into your materialization?""

""Uh... well, I didn't do it. Rasalased did.""

That response made Abbas look even more incredulous.

Hmm. So it was called the Amir-9 prototype, huh? That was news to Hector. He'd just been thinking of it as Haqq's shield this whole time. He resummoned it into his hand and looked it over again.

""Unfortunately, it seems to have lost its soul-enhancing properties, but other than that, it's still just as durable as it used to be, I think.""

Apparently, Abbas still needed a few more moments to find his words. ""...And it still regenerates on its own? Without thought from you?""

""It does,"" said Hector.

""That is what I was getting at before you... showed me..." He trailed off, eyes having grown distant again.

Worwal jumped in to help him again. 'His armor can regenerate in a similar manner, is what he is trying to say, I believe.'

"2825

""I see,"" said Hector, though he was mostly just saying that to be polite. ""By the way, uh..." He offered the Amir back to Abbas. ""Er, I know this was a gift and all, but if you want it back, then please, take it. I, ah... I actually have a collection of about three hundred more of these sitting in an armory at the top of the Entry Tower." Plus a few more in the hands of Rainlords on the other side of the world, but that wasn't worth mentioning, Hector felt.

Abbas looked positively disgusted at that information. ""Three hund--?" He shook his head. ""Do you have any idea how long it took Haqq and I to develop this prototype?""

Hector just kind of pressed his lips together flatly. He suddenly recalled Garovel mentioning something about how big of a deal it was that he could create so many replicas of this shield, about how it could gain him quite a bit of influence and attention in the world that he wasn't yet prepared for.

So much crazy shit had happened since that conversation, though. Thinking back on it now felt almost quaint, somehow.

Lord Abbas sighed and took the shield. ""Thank you, I suppose. In any event, my armor should be able to repair itself rather quickly once the nanomachines are expunged from it. I suspect it will take at least four more days to remove enough of them to restore the primary systems. For all systems, however, we might require an entire week. Or more, perhaps.""

Hector scratched his upper lip. ""How much could you get done in one day?""

""Why do you ask?""

""Because I would like you to come to Lorent with me.""

""As I said, the armor takes priority over everything else, right now.""

""I have a Fusion Forge there.""

Abbas fell silent. And just stared at him."

"2826 -- CCL.

Chapter Two Hundred Fifty: 'Partnership of the Age...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- (mobile link)

Hector pressed his lips together flatly again as he waited for Abbas to respond. It seemed like the man wasn't going to, so Hector decided to elaborate. ""We're not sure how it works. The Forge might just be broken. We wanted a skilled integrator to inspect it.""

""You have... a Fusion Forge..."" was all Abbas managed to say. He looked dazed now.

In spite of himself, in spite of wanting to remain as composed and lordly as he could, Hector couldn't help smiling a little. He put a fist in front of his mouth to hide it, not sure if it would offend the Head of the Golden Council. ""Perhaps you could work on your armor on the way?"" he suggested, trying his damndest not to start laughing.

Abbas and Worwal both squinted at him, then exchanged looks with one another.

'Do you truly have a Fusion Forge in your possession?' said Worwal. 'You are not trying to prank us, are you?'

That did it. Hector shut his eyes and chuckled into his closed fist. Shit. He had to clarify immediately. ""It's not a prank,"" he said, regathering himself. He looked to Garovel for help.

Garovel was turned around and doubled over in the air. The black shroud that covered his skeletal form was shaking violently. With suppressed laughter. He was having an even harder time than Hector was, apparently.

'You ARE pranking us!' said Worwal.

Garovel started guffawing outright.

""No!"" said Hector, still struggling to keep his composure. ""It's real! I swear! Come with us to Lorent, and you'll see!""

""How in the world did you get your hands on a Fusion Forge?"" said Abbas.

Hector took a second to let Garovel calm down. And then he shrugged.

""I just found it.""

"2826 -- CCL.

Chapter Two Hundred Fifty: 'Partnership of the Age...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector pressed his lips together flatly again as he waited for Abbas to respond. It seemed like the man wasn't going to, so Hector decided to elaborate. ""We're not sure how it works. The Forge might just be broken. We wanted a skilled integrator to inspect it.""

""You have... a Fusion Forge..."" was all Abbas managed to say. He looked dazed now.

In spite of himself, in spite of wanting to remain as composed and lordly as he could, Hector couldn't help smiling a little. He put a fist in front of his mouth to hide it, not sure if it would offend the Head of the Golden Council. ""Perhaps you could work on your armor on the way?"" he suggested, trying his damndest not to start laughing.

Abbas and Worwal both squinted at him, then exchanged looks with one another.

'Do you truly have a Fusion Forge in your possession?' said Worwal. 'You are not trying to prank us, are you?'

That did it. Hector shut his eyes and chuckled into his closed fist. Shit. He had to clarify immediately. ""It's not a prank,"" he said, regathering himself. He looked to Garovel for help.

Garovel was turned around and doubled over in the air. The black shroud that covered his skeletal form was shaking violently. With suppressed laughter. He was having an even harder time than Hector was, apparently.

'You ARE pranking us!' said Worwal.

Garovel started guffawing outright.

""No!"" said Hector, still struggling to keep his composure. ""It's real! I swear! Come with us to Lorent, and you'll see!""

""How in the world did you get your hands on a Fusion Forge?"" said Abbas.

Hector took a second to let Garovel calm down. And then he shrugged.

""I just found it.""

"2827

""Are you sure that it is a Fusion Forge?"" said Abbas.

That was actually a good question, Hector thought. ""Well, Garovel said it was, so... if it turns out to be a fake or something, then... blame him, not me.""

'Whoa, whoa, whoa. First of all, it was Voreese who first said it was a Fusion Forge, so if anything--

Their conversation continued on for a while longer, as did the Lord Saqqaf's incredulity. And frankly, Hector didn't feel like he was doing a very good job of convincing the man that they weren't bullshitting him. But in the end, Abbas agreed to go to Lorent with him, which was all that really mattered.

Hector had more that he wanted to discuss, but he figured they could talk more during the trip.

In the meantime, Hector wanted to check up on things around Warrenhold. Having just woken up, he still didn't feel like he had a clear picture of everything that had transpired while he was asleep. He figured Garovel would've told him right away if anything really terrible had happened to any of the other combatants in the battle, but Hector decided to pay a visit to everyone, anyway.

Roman, having been blown to pieces by a missile, had also been regrown from scratch by Voreese. Unsurprisingly, he was in even more pain than Hector, which was doubtless why Hector found him enjoying a nice long soak in the bathhouse.

They didn't talk long, as Roman soon drifted off to sleep.

Hector almost woke him up, because he was fairly certain that he'd heard it was a bad idea to sleep in a hot spring, but after thinking about it, he decided that it was probably fine. Roman was undead, after all. And obviously tired, besides."

"2828

Hector might've liked to get some more sleep of his own, but now wasn't the time--nor would it be any time soon, he figured. He found Salvador Delaguna by chance among Hahl Saqqaf, tending to some of their wounded. Hector hadn't expected to see him there, as he didn't realize the man had any medical experience; but indeed, after watching him work for a few minutes, it seemed clear that Hector had been right. He didn't have any.

Salvador was just helping his niece out, apparently. Clarissa Delaguna didn't hesitate to chastise him when he made mistakes or moved too slowly for her liking, but she was also taking the time to show him how to do things properly.

It was a bit of a strange sight. Such a giant man, hunching over tables and bed-ridden people, clearly trying to be as gentle as he possibly could with his enormous hands.

Hector admired it, though. If he had more time, he would've liked to join in. Medical knowledge might not have been too useful for him personally, but maybe one day, in sufficiently terrible circumstances, it could be the difference between someone living and dying.

Maybe that was what Salvador was thinking, too.

Something else to add to his to-do list.

Hector found the Sebolts in the Entry Tower. Dimas had suffered some pretty heavy wounds in the fight, too, and his new girlfriend was now hanging onto him like some kind of human bracelet.

""Thank you so much for keeping my man safe, Lord Goffe!"" said

Madison Reach. ""I was so worried!"" She pecked Dimas on the cheek, then perhaps thought that wasn't enough and went back for a second, much longer kiss in the same spot.

An impressive amount of lipstick stayed on Dimas' face. As usual, though, his expression was impossible to read.

The other Sebolts in the room snickered and whispered among themselves."

"2829

Maybe it was a bit rude, but Hector felt more of a kinship with the onlookers. The sight of Madison clinging to him like that made Hector want to tease Dimas, too. ""Not at all,"" said Hector. ""If anything, it was your boyfriend here who was keeping me safe.""

""Oh?"" Madison's big, curious eyes went to her beau.

Dimas, however, kept his eyes on Hector. ""You're too modest, Lord Goffe. I did hardly a thing."" Something about the way he said 'Lord Goffe' so stiffly made Hector think that Dimas might actually be somewhat uncomfortable--which was not something Hector had seen from him before.

""Have you ever seen him use his powers, Ms. Reach?"" said Hector.

""Oh, a little bit, yeah. Dimas doesn't like to show off much, you know. He can be kinda shy, sometimes.""

""You don't say?"" said Hector. ""How so?""

""Well, for instance, he doesn't like kissing for more than three seconds in front of other people, but when we're alone--""

Hector felt his chair raise off the floor and begin floating toward the door.

""It was nice talking to you, Lord Goffe,"" said Dimas, ""but I am sure you have many other pressing matters to tend to. We wouldn't want to keep you.""

Hector just laughed and didn't put up any resistance. Motive aside, the man wasn't wrong about him having other things to take care of.

His next encounter was not nearly so jovial, unfortunately. He first noticed it when crossing the main plaza and sensing a sudden disturbance in the air over the half-sunken town below Warrenhold. He returned to nearly the same spot where he'd talked to Abbas earlier and looked out into the distance, concentrating harder on the what the Scarf could tell him.

Air tremors might've been the best way to describe it. Indicative of heavy impacts. Not enough to make the cave itself tremble, thankfully, but still noteworthy, just the same.

That area over there was where he and Zeff often trained together."
"2830

Hector decided to check it out. As he got closer, the impacts became more obvious, the tremors more violent. And the cave indeed began to shake.

Perhaps that was why the Lord Elroy had chosen to move even farther away from Warrenhold than usual. He didn't want to hold back, today.

As he approached, a car-sized chunk of ice flew toward Hector, and he had to slip out of the way. For a second, he thought Zeff was attacking him, but after a moment, he realized that it had just been part of an even larger iceberg that had shattered on the ground.

All the ice disappeared after a moment, replaced by a tornado of water.

And a scream.

Raw frustration. Anger. Agony.

The whirlwind of water seemed to grow in power, as if to conceal the noise, and soon it was spinning so fast that it was yanking loose boulders out of the distant ceiling and carrying them around it like orbiting satellites.

Hector had to armor up, even as he backed away. He added extra layers, too, just trying to add more weight so that he didn't get pulled away from the ground.

Then the tornado burst apart, sending a tidal wave of water and rocks in all directions. Hector materialized another Amir to help take the brunt of it, but it still knocked him on his ass and sent him skidding across the wet, stony floor.

Water still drizzled down around him as he picked himself up again.

Zeff was just sitting there now, hunched over, his thick black hair soaked and dripping.

Hector had no idea what to say, but he kept his armor on as he approached, hopefully allowing the metal clink of his footsteps to alert Zeff to his presence. There wasn't much light around, so Hector materialized a glowing iron cube, too.

""...No training today, Hector. You're still recovering."" The man didn't bother to look up at him."

"2831

Hector tried to think of the right words. They didn't come.

Asad Najir and Zeff Elroy had a unique relationship, Hector knew. Something akin to best friends, perhaps. Zeff might not have let it show before, but the fact that Asad was missing must have been tearing him up inside.

Especially after everything else the man had already lost.

And now Hector had confirmation from Rasalased that Asad was not only missing but actually captured by Morgunov.

Hector considered telling Zeff. Would it help anything? Would it just cause Zeff even more misery?

He wasn't sure.

But there was one thing Hector knew for sure. He knew that if their roles were reversed, he wouldn't want Zeff to hide this from him.

So he had to say something. Dammit.

""...Rasalased told me that Asad was captured by Morgunov.""

Zeff made no response.

Hector waited, though. For something. For anything. An explosion of water, maybe. Or at least some yelling.

But it didn't come.

Zeff just kept sitting there, not looking at him.

""...Zeff?""

Nothing.

That was weird. He didn't even seem surprised. Maybe on some level, Zeff had already known. Or suspected as much, perhaps.

But did that make sense? Wouldn't Zeff have been more worried that Asad was just dead? Not captured?

Hmm.

In any case, Hector didn't want to leave it there. ""Rasalased believes that Asad will make it out of this alive. And be stronger for it, too.""

Still, Zeff remained quiet.

""I don't know if that's true or not, but... Rasalased hasn't steered me wrong so far.""

""Hector.""

""Yeah?""

""Leave me alone.""

""...Alright.""

Without another word, Hector crossed the lake and returned to the castle. He wasn't too concerned about Zeff running and doing something stupid like trying to mount a one-man rescue. As long as Asad's actual whereabouts were unknown, that wasn't really an option."

"2832

Which was to say nothing about the prospect of having to fight the Mad fucking Demon. Considering the fact that he'd just taken down two marshals, even Zeff had to know how utterly moronic that would be.

Hector checked up on the renovation progress as well, but as expected, there wasn't much change. It had only been a day and a half or so since he last checked, after all. And of course, with the arrival of the Sandlords, many among the construction team had gotten distracted or otherwise volunteered to assist in getting everyone settled.

Everyone's priorities had temporarily shifted. That was alright. And understandable. The renovations weren't that urgent.

Were they?

The more he thought about it, the more he had to admit, the possibility that the war might come to Atreya was rising. And if it did, it would most likely come through Lorent now. And geographically speaking, Warrenhold was the first line of defense for Atreya.

...Maybe the last line of defense, too.

Now there was a disconcerting thought.

He put it out of his mind for now.

By the time he finished making the rounds, it was already nearing dinnertime. He'd been grabbing snacks from the kitchen throughout the day, but he was still famished. He decided to give Her Majesty a call before eating, though. He only managed to get a hold of her secretary, but that was fine. He just wanted to let her know that he would be visiting Riverton Hall the day after tomorrow.

After dinner, he went straight to bed. When he awoke, he was still sore all over, but he wasn't quite so stiff anymore, at least.

They set out in the early morning--using regular, old, non-flying cars this time. Since it wasn't an emergency situation, they didn't need Dimas to help them cut down on their travel time so much. Plus, Abbas was bringing a few non-servants with him, and an unpressurized vehicle at high altitudes would not have been kind to them."

"2833

Abbas continued to tinker with the helmet of his armor during the ride. He had decided not to bring the entire suit with him, as most of it was apparently in a delicate stage that made moving it problematic. Haqq Najir had stayed behind at Warrenhold to continue working on it.

Hector used the opportunity to tell him what he'd already told Zeff about Asad's captivity.

Abbas was in turns displeased and confused. He had a few questions about Rasalased but not as many as Hector might've expected. Abbas seemed to already have some idea of what was going on there. Perhaps Asad had told him, or perhaps he'd been talking to people around Warrenhold.

Either way, it wasn't anything that Hector hadn't heard before. Once that conversation was out of the way, Hector was eager to move on to topics that he felt were more pressing.

"I was wondering what you plan to do after you finish repairing your armor," he asked.

Abbas took his time responding. "Truth be told, I have been wondering about that, myself."

Hector frowned and eyed the other members of Hahl Saqqaf in the car with them. They didn't look very encouraged by those words, and Hector couldn't blame them.

He couldn't really blame Abbas, either, though. The guy might've been their leader, but he was in a horrible position, right now. His country had just been stolen from him. His kin, crushed and scattered.

If he was feeling a bit lost, then that made perfect sense, unfortunately. Hector sympathized.

But even so, admitting as much in front of his people... Even if there were only a handful of them here, right now, Hector didn't see much logic in that.

He might've still been new to this whole lording business, but in his experience, keeping up appearances was half the battle.

Well, okay, in his experience, it might've actually been more like ninety percent of the battle."

"2834

Before the silence could become too deafening, however, Worwal stepped into the conversation. 'I believe the best course of action is to get in touch with the Vanguard and join the fight for the Wetlands. The situation may look grim, but as far as we know, Sair might still be saved.'

Garovel had something to say about that, apparently. 'I would caution against that. I've gotten word that the Vanguard has already lost its grip on the Wetlands.'

'You've gotten word?' said Worwal. 'From where?'

'We have informants still in the country,' said Garovel.

Informants? That was news to Hector. Garovel couldn't have been talking about the scouting team of Rainlords, could he? Hmm, maybe he was. Hector had assumed that the scouting team had returned to Warrenhold with Hahl Saqqaf and the rest of the refugees, but it would also make sense if they'd redeployed to western Sair, instead.

Agh, so many moving parts to keep track of. Hector was glad to have Garovel around for these sorts of things. Hector hadn't seen him all that much while making the rounds earlier, and he knew it was because Garovel had been busy talking to virtually every other reaper in Warrenhold, old and new arrivals alike.

Hector had wondered if this was going to be the new paradigm, with the two of them dividing the responsibility of overseeing Warrenhold's operations. It certainly helped save time, even if it meant not getting to see Garovel quite as often.

If this really was going to continue into the foreseeable future, though, then they would probably need to spend more time bringing each other up to speed at the end of each day, Hector figured.

'That can't be true,' said Worwal. 'The Vanguard couldn't have lost the Wetlands so quickly. Didn't we just receive word that Jackson survived the clash at Uego?'

"2835

'Not lost,' said Garovel. 'Losing. And yeah, it sounds like Jackson made it out alive, but I'm also hearing rumors that he is gravely wounded and unable to lead.'

'Wounded?' said Worwal. 'He's undead! Why should his wounds matter so much?'

Garovel's hollow gaze went to Abbas. 'Why should the regenerative properties of your armor be impaired?'

Worwal paused. 'You are saying that Morgunov attacked him with nanomachines, as well?'

'It's possible,' said Garovel. 'Probable, even. You two didn't even come into direct contact with Morgunov, correct? And yet you were still infected. I think it's quite likely, therefore, that Morgunov hit Jackson with something far more potent.'

Silence arrived for a time until Worwal broke it again. 'Even so, that doesn't change the fact that reuniting with the Vanguard is our best option, at the moment.'

'That is your choice to make, of course,' said Garovel. 'But we will not be able to assist you. The Rainlords are still fugitives from them. Even if they are busy with the war, we can't risk drawing their attention to Warrenhold.'

""The Vanguard cannot help us,"" said Abbas. His downcast gaze was fixed on the helmet in his hands.

That made the silence return briefly as everyone waited for him to elaborate.

Worwal had to push him. 'What do you mean?'

""The Vanguard is the entire reason we are in this situation to begin with,"" said Abbas. ""They drove out the Rainlords, weakening the nation and inviting attack from Abolish. We were fools to side with them over our own countrymen."" The Lord Saqqaf took a heavy breath and rubbed his brow. ""Asad was right.""

More silence.

Damn, Hector thought. He didn't necessarily disagree, but... damn.

'If we had openly opposed the Vanguard, that would have invited an attack just the same,' said Worwal."

"2836

""No,"" countered Abbas. ""The Vanguard's mission is to fight Abolish, no matter the geopolitical circumstances. Most likely, they would have still come to our aid even if we stood with the Rainlords.""

'You can't know that,' said Worwal.

""At the very least, we should have reminded the Vanguard of their code of non-interference. They had no right to move against the Rainlords the way they did.""

'That code doesn't apply to servant-led governments like ours.'

""A matter of debate. One which we should have held, instead of simply cowing before them."" He shook his head. ""We have disgraced not only ourselves, but also our forefathers. And the people suffer for it, as always.""

Worwal didn't have a response for that, apparently.

Shit.

Generally speaking, Hector had never really considered himself to be a very positive person, but fuck. Someone really needed to give these two a pep talk.

That seemed like a job more suited to Garovel, honestly, but the reaper wasn't saying anything. In fact, he was just staring at Hector. Expectantly.

What the heck? Did Garovel want him to say something? Why wasn't he giving him orders privately, then?

Eh, maybe Hector was reading too much into his expression. It was just a skeletal face, after all. What was there even to read?

""...If you can't rely on the Vanguard,"" said Hector, ""then it's clear what your next move should be.""

Abbas looked up at him, as did Worwal.

""Regroup,"" said Hector. ""Find your people. Reform the Golden Council."" Hector thought he saw a smirk flash across Garovel's bony mouth.

'...That is easier said than done,' said Worwal. 'We have no idea where the other Hahls have gone.'

'Really?' said Garovel. 'None of them?'

Worwal shook his skull. 'We kept many different rallying points in the event of such an attack, but all of the ones we checked were already razed or taken by Abolish by the time we arrived.'

"2837

""In fact,"" said Abbas, ""that was where I encountered two of the Mad Demon's killer robots.""

'That's very alarming,' said Garovel, sounding surprised. 'Does that not suggest that Abolish had access to privileged information?'

'It does,' said Worwal. 'I have to imagine that was a contributing factor to the scattered nature of our retreat. If I had to guess, I would say that each of the Hahls has gone to ground and intends to wait quite a while before risking contact with anyone outside of their respective families.'

Hector understood. But he had a hard time buying all of that. ""Do you think one of your own kin would have given up details like that?""

'I would like to say no,' said Worwal, 'but the more times goes by, the more skeptical I become.'

Hector didn't know the Sandlords like he knew the Rainlords. He couldn't treat them like they were the same. But even so, it seemed to him that there was at least one way in which the Sandlords and the Rainlords were extremely similar. Their sense of honor. ""Is it possible that the leak could have originated from the Vanguard, instead?"" he asked.

Worwal and Abbas both paused at that.

""...Perhaps,"" said Abbas. ""The rallying points might have been shared with certain Vanguardians whom had gained one or more of the Hahls' trust.""

'Either way, it makes no difference without proof. Even if we could contact the other Hahls, they would likely be incredibly suspicious of us. As we should be of them.'

""What about Hahl Najir?"" said Hector. ""Haqq was with you, but where are Jada and Imas?"" Asad's daughter and sister, respectively. There was Asad's wife and son, too, but Hector couldn't quite recall their names, at the moment.

'We don't know,' said Worwal. 'Nor does Haqq.'"
"2838

Hector's hand went to the Shard in his coat pocket. It didn't quite fit perfectly in there, but he'd gotten accustomed to the feeling. He pulled it out. ""I... might be able to help with that, too.""

Abbas and Worwal both stared.

""If Rasalased is cooperative, he could probably lead us to the other Hahls,"" said Hector.

'You sound uncertain,' said Worwal.

""I am,"" said Hector. ""Talking to Rasalased is difficult. I still haven't quite figured out how to do it at will. But I'll try my best and hopefully get some answers out of him soon.""

""...I still cannot believe you are able to converse with him,"" said Abbas.

Honestly, neither could Hector. He didn't know if he should admit that, though.

They continued talking for the length of the journey. Worwal asked about their recent trip through the Undercrust, having apparently already heard quite a few different things that he wanted confirmation on. Hector mostly let Garovel handle it while he concentrated on contacting Rasalased.

Again, he found himself struggling. How had he managed it the last time? He remembered getting frustrated. Emotional.

...And that had actually worked? Hmm. He supposed it had.

How weird. Usually, allowing himself to get upset seemed like it was the exact opposite of what he was supposed to do. In fact, he wasn't even sure how he was supposed to do it now. What, was he just supposed to pretend that he was mad again?

Eh.

He gave it a shot.

Shockingly, it didn't work.

He tried a few more times and failed a few more times. It seemed like he would have to actually get mad again in order for it to work, but how the hell was he supposed to do that? Think anger-inducing thoughts? That seemed pretty weird."

"2839

He was definitely missing something here, he felt. Why would it be an emotional trigger, of all things? What sense did that make? The only thing he could compare it to was his materialization, with how he used a kind of ""emotional command"" in order to manipulate temperatures.

But this was completely different, wasn't it?

...Wasn't it?

Why in the world would it be the same? Or even just similar?

Hmm.

Maybe there was a common denominator here that he just wasn't quite seeing.

...An emotional command. He'd only been thinking about the 'emotional' part of that term. But what if that wasn't the issue?

Argh.

Before he could finish working through his thoughts, the vehicle arrived at its destination. Hector tried to shove the problem into a background thought process, but he was suddenly feeling a tinge of nervous anticipation. That big tree in that open field over there was looking pretty damn important, right about now.

Truth be told, he hadn't really given it all that much thought before. Garovel and Voreese said they needed skilled integrators for the Fusion Forge. Abbas Saqqas was a skilled integrator. Pretty straightforward reasoning.

But now that it was imminent, Hector's mind was beginning to go in all sorts of directions. Obviously, Abbas considered the news of a Fusion Forge to be incredibly important for it to be worth the trip all the way out here, so what was he going to think when he saw it?

And more importantly, what might he be able to do with it?

Hector didn't want to get his hopes up too much, but at this point, he couldn't help himself. Would Abbas be able to make crazy weapons? Crazy armor? Or some kinda super weird shit?

...Fuck, it was probably gonna be some super weird shit, wasn't it?"
"2840

He led the entourage to the tree and welcomed everyone inside.

Hector and Garovel had been worried about leaving the Forge here all by itself. They'd considered various options, such as moving it to Warrenhold, but they didn't want to risk damaging it or making some other kind of mistake with their lack of knowledge regarding its usage. They'd also considered assigning someone to stay and guard it, but without knowing when--or even if--they would be able to find a use for this thing, they decided against that, too. Plus, no one else knew of its existence, so there wasn't much chance of it being stolen.

For now.

Instead, Hector had simply encased the whole huge thing in an iron box. That way, in the unlikely event that someone else had found this room, there would at least be a barrier in place to prevent them from doing anything to the Forge. True, it wasn't the greatest safety measure in the world, but when Hector annihilated the iron, there the Forge still was, waiting.

Its giant glass body gleamed against the meager daylight from the open doorway. Abbas walked toward it first, holding up a hand behind him, telling the others in their party to stand back. His steps were slow and measured as his gaze drank in the view.

The man took his time.

Hector was eager to know more, but he wasn't eager to rush him. From the way Garovel and Voreese had described the Forge, this thing seemed pretty fucking dangerous in the wrong hands. Hector was prepared to give the Lord Saqqaf all the time in the world to examine it.

Abbas got very close to the glass, but Hector could sense via the Scarf that the man wasn't actually touching it.

At length, Abbas finally spoke up. ""Do you know who crafted it? Or how long it has been here, perhaps?""

"2841

'No on both counts, I'm afraid,' said Garovel. 'But it appears to be at least as old as the early Mohssian Empire. One of the books on that shelf over there mentions the Forge, and it is written in both the Nykeirian and Old Mohssian languages.'

""A minimum of two thousand years, then."" The sheer awe in Abbas' voice made Hector's anxiety spike somewhat. ""Magnificent.""

'Can you tell if it's still functional?' asked Garovel.

""Its condition appears absolutely pristine, but when it comes to Fusion Forges, without being able to consult the creator, the only way to know for certain is to test it out.""

'That... sounds rather dangerous,' said Garovel.

A beat passed.

""Yes,"" was all Abbas said.

Ah.

Hmm.

Everyone fell quiet again, and Abbas continued his inspection, circling around the stony base of the giant glass globe.

Eventually, Garovel spoke up again. 'Y'know, if you think it's too dangerous, we understand. No matter how useful the Forge is in theory, it's not worth losing you, Lord Abbas. I mean, it REALLY isn't. So. Please. Don't feel pressured to do anything you are not comfortable with.'

""Oh, we are far beyond the realm of comfort already,"" said Abbas.

Yikes, Hector thought. A question stirred within him, and he had to ask it. ""Have you ever worked with a Fusion Forge before, Lord Abbas?""

Abbas scratched his temple, not taking his eyes from the globe. ""As a matter of fact, I have."" There was a wavering laugh in the tone of his voice. ""It nearly killed me.""

Hector was not pleased to hear that.

""I was young and foolish then,"" Abbas went on. ""I refused to heed my mentor's warnings.""

'Or mine,' added Worwal.

""Yes. I wanted to prove myself--that I was the intellectual equal of so many of the great men around me. It was pure egoism.""

"2842

At that, Hector wanted to ask another question, but it sounded rather rude in his head.

Thankfully, Garovel posed a similar enough inquiry first. 'Have you had any GOOD experiences with a Fusion Forge, Lord Abbas? Like where you actually made something cool and didn't almost die in the process?'

""Tell me,"" said Abbas. ""Have you ever heard of a man named Dolf Rachman?""

Garovel was quiet for a lingering moment. 'I most certainly have. The Rachman Duels were the stuff of legend.'

A short laugh escaped Abbas' lips. ""He would have been pleased to hear someone say that. Many historians, reapers included, seem to treat him as little better than an ant whose most noteworthy accomplishment was getting stepped on.""

'Historians can be cruel,' said Garovel. 'And cowardly, too--especially when their work involves a living emperor. It may be another century or two before Rachman is given a fair shake by the historical community.'

'Even that may be too optimistic,' said Worwal.

'Why do you bring Rachman up?' said Garovel. 'You knew him, I take it?'

""He was my mentor,"" said Abbas. ""One of several, in truth, but the one I loved most, to be sure. He would have been ecstatic to discover a new Forge.""

Hmm. Hector couldn't help noticing that Abbas was not giving a straight answer to Garovel's earlier question.

""Dolf's own mentor was Kalim Lotorevo--an even more remarkable man, though I never had the privilege of meeting him. Kalim was the one who made the Forge that I used in my idiotic youth. The Earth Cruncher, is what they called it in Mohssian. An incredible, hulking thing. Full of grinding metal and fire--and honestly quite terrifying to be near when in use. Not like this one at all, I'd say."" Abbas paused, and Hector sensed a silent sigh between breaths. ""But Dolf treasured it more than any other object in his workshop. And he was heartbroken when it was finally attacked and destroyed.""

"2843

'That makes a lot of sense,' said Garovel. 'I remember how much of a stir the Duels caused in the beginning. Everyone thought Rachman was insane to be challenging emperors to single combat, but if he had a Forge at his disposal, then that would explain why he was able to surprise so many people with his strength.'

'In fairness, he WAS insane,' said Worwal. 'Never have I known a more absurd individual than Dolf Rachman. He was nowhere near old enough to be threatening Morgunov and Dozer the way he did. But he was convinced he could defeat one or even both of them.'

'In the beginning, the Duels weren't to the death, were they?' said Garovel.

'That's right. His goal was to simply show the world that they could be beaten. To weaken their influence. It wasn't until the eighth consecutive duel in as many years that Morgunov finally decided that he had grown tired of the game and refused to fight him again unless they raised the stakes by including their reapers in the contest.'

'That was when the Duels began to gain worldwide attention, no?' said

Garovel.

'Indeed. It was an utterly ridiculous agreement--and very captivating, I must admit.'

""It was precisely that increased pressure that made Dolf burn at his very brightest,"" said Abbas. ""His brilliance shone through like never before. The items he was able to craft with the Earth Cruncher toward the end... they were truly awesome. They kept him alive when he should have died a dozen times over. I am convinced that Morgunov grew to fear him after that final Duel, and that was why the workshop was attacked and the Forge, destroyed. He was afraid that Dolf would finally beat him one day, and so resorted to sabotage.""

"2844

'You might be right about that,' said Garovel, 'but I find it a little hard to believe that Morgunov would be afraid of anything. All accounts that I've heard of the guy have painted him as an absolute lunatic who loves battle, even when he is losing.'

'Don't bother trying to make that argument,' said Worwal. 'I've told Abbas the same and more a hundred times over. His mind is made up on this particular matter.'

'Fair enough.'

""Morgunov loves the image that the masses have of him,"" said Abbas. ""This idea that he is incapable of fear, immune to worry, that he is in so many ways an immovable genius beyond the scope of normal human understanding--these are all music to his ears. Propaganda to help sow the seeds of fear. In the end, he is just a man like any other.""

Damn. Hector wasn't sure whose word to trust more here, but he had to admire Abbas' passion, at least. If nothing else, it was clear that the Lord Saqqaf had been thinking about the problem of Morgunov for a very long time now. And with the conquest of Sair, Abbas was probably feeling more strongly about it than ever.

Abbas wasn't done talking yet, though. ""I've sometimes heard it said that if Dolf had only been more patient, he might have become an emperor himself one day, but I knew him better than anyone, and that simply wasn't his way. He was not a man who could abide mediocrity in virtually any aspect of his life. Every pursuit had to be given the entirety of his effort, and the Duels epitomized that part of him more than anything else. Frankly, I'm surprised he lived as long as he did. And I'm even more surprised his reaper went along with him."

"2845 -- CLI.

""For all his other faults, I always admired that about him. His single-minded, unshakable drive. In that way, I have often felt small when compared to the enormous shadows that he and his mentor both cast. But seeing this Forge here now... I feel that this is an opportunity that I absolutely must not let pass me by."" Abbas circled around the other side of the Forge and then looked Hector in the eye. ""I promise you, I will get this Forge working if it is the last thing I do.""

Hector sensed an ever so slight shift in the air as he listened to Abbas' words. The man's intensity was obvious enough from his words and expression, but with the Scarf, Hector felt a little something more. A trembling in the room's air currents.

Abbas was, perhaps unintentionally, affecting the environment with his... words? His soul? His will? Hector wasn't sure.

But whatever it was, it made Hector quite certain that Abbas meant what he said.

Chapter Two Hundred Fifty-One: 'The song's whisper...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

The party lingered at the tree for a while longer. Hector wanted to head to P.J. soon and meet the Queen, but Abbas' fascination with the Forge was so apparent that he didn't want to pull the man away just yet.

Unfortunately, it seemed like it would be a while before Abbas could give him an idea of what sorts of items they could create with this thing.

""For that, I will require a better understanding of what this Forge is truly capable of. The Earth Cruncher specialized in metalwork, but this is obviously quite different. Were you able to learn its name, by the way?"

'No,' said Garovel. 'It wasn't written down, but we weren't looking for it, either. Do Forges usually have names?'

'Yes,' said Worwal. 'They are typically given to them by their creator, but if this one's name has been lost, then we should give it a new one.'

"2845 -- CLI.

""For all his other faults, I always admired that about him. His single-minded, unshakable drive. In that way, I have often felt small when compared to the enormous shadows that he and his mentor both cast. But seeing this Forge here now... I feel that this is an opportunity that I absolutely must not let pass me by."" Abbas circled around the other side of the Forge and then looked Hector in the eye. ""I promise you, I will get this Forge working if it is the last thing I do.""

Hector sensed an ever so slight shift in the air as he listened to Abbas' words. The man's intensity was obvious enough from his words and expression, but with the Scarf, Hector felt a little something more. A trembling in the room's air currents.

Abbas was, perhaps unintentionally, affecting the environment with his... words? His soul? His will? Hector wasn't sure.

But whatever it was, it made Hector quite certain that Abbas meant what he said.

Chapter Two Hundred Fifty-One: 'The song's whisper...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

The party lingered at the tree for a while longer. Hector wanted to head to P.J. soon and meet the Queen, but Abbas' fascination with the Forge was so apparent that he didn't want to pull the man away just yet.

Unfortunately, it seemed like it would be a while before Abbas could give him an idea of what sorts of items they could create with this thing.

""For that, I will require a better understanding of what this Forge is truly capable of. The Earth Cruncher specialized in metalwork, but this is obviously quite different. Were you able to learn its name, by the way?""

'No,' said Garovel. 'It wasn't written down, but we weren't looking for it, either. Do Forges usually have names?'

'Yes,' said Worwal. 'They are typically given to them by their creator, but if this one's name has been lost, then we should give it a new one.'"

"2846

'Ooh, I love naming stuff,' said Garovel. 'The best names are ones that come with built-in nicknames. How about the Toby? Short for Globey Toby. Or Orby? Short for Orby Orbington. Or Glassy? Short for Amassy Glassy.'

'Those are all impressively terrible,' said Worwal.

'Thanks. Think you can do worse?'

Worwal thought a moment. 'George the Forge.'

'Wow, okay. Good job.'

Perhaps having some inkling that this was going to spiral out of control if he didn't do something, Lord Abbas decided to intervene. ""A new name is not a trivial matter. It should only come after we understand its capabilities better.""

'Really?' said Garovel. 'What difference does it make if we name it now or later?'

""A Forge's name is more than just words. It binds itself to the Forge metaphysically and becomes entwined with its identity. A name can even impact the properties of the Forge itself, altering its power in minor ways.""

'Are you serious?' said Garovel. 'I thought this was all scientific stuff when it came down to it, but you're talking about straight up wizardry, right now.'

""Make of it what you will, but I am not lying. Most importantly, an ill-fitting name can have negative effects. I have heard of one case in which a Forge was rendered all but useless due to a badly chosen name.""

'Well, shit,' said Garovel.

A lull in the conversation arrived as everyone was apparently thinking at the same time.

Hector decided to break the silence himself, because there was one thing he wanted to know. ""What... what name was so bad that it ruined a Fusion Forge?""

Abbas eyed him for a time. ""...It was too ridiculous to utter.""

Hector just frowned.

Garovel had him covered, though. 'C'mon, now you've gotta tell us.'

The Lord Saqqaf sighed. ""...The Great Tornado Toilet of Ultimate Toilation.""

Hector had to cover his mouth to hold back his laugh.

Garovel didn't even bother."

"2847

Hector had to ask. ""Was that Morgunov's doing?"" It certainly sounded like something a total lunatic would name his Forge. Hector was hoping not, though, if only because he didn't want to find anything that the Mad Demon had done amusing.

""Actually, no,"" said Abbas. ""It was a different madman by the name of Rakko.""

Garovel's laughter began to settle. 'Ah. Him. Yeah, that makes sense. Y'know, I kinda miss that guy. He was a good emperor in his time.'

Abbas cocked an eyebrow. ""That is not what I have heard.""

'Well. Okay. ""Good"" may be a strong word. He wasn't an evil son of a bitch, at least. And that's all I really ask from servant emperors.'

""Did he not raze Arkotesh to the ground?""

'Yeah, but I'm pretty sure that was an accident,' said Garovel. 'And he worked to help the people he displaced for many years afterwards.'

""Arkotesh,"" Abbas repeated. ""The academic capital of the world for a thousand years up until that point. The birthplace of geometry, algebra, the calendar system.""

'Yeah, but he also apologized. When's the last time you heard an emperor apologize, huh?'

The Lord Saqqaf did not look convinced.

'Look, we can stand around here and argue about history all day, but I'm sure we have more pressing things to be doing, don't we?'

And indeed, they did. They stayed a while longer to let Abbas give the Forge another once over, but then they were on their way to the capital.

Riverton, P.J. was quite far away, however, and the Imara Forest was so dense that even the highway passing through it felt a bit claustrophobic. The speed limit on these winding roads was noticeably lower in the Jagwa region and Atreya.

They settled in for a long ride.

On the bright side, Hector had plenty of time to come up with more questions for Abbas."

"2848

""The naming thing is still confusing me,"" said Hector. ""If the Forge's name is so important that it becomes a part of its... metaphysical identity or something, then... shouldn't it be impossible for us give the Forge a new name? Shouldn't its original name be too important?""

Abbas returned a nod. ""That is entirely possible, yes. However, even if its name was never written down and has been forgotten by all who yet live, I should still be able to discover what it is via the Forge itself. If its name is truly a part of it, then it should be able to tell me what it is. In theory.""

Hector and Garovel exchanged glances.

""But on the other hand, if the Forge is broken--or if it was never given a name in the first place, perhaps--then yes, a new name will be required before it can achieve full operation.""

'The way you talk about Forges is peculiar,' said Garovel. 'You treat them as though they are living things.'

Abbas bobbed his head to one side. ""That may not be an inaccurate way of thinking about them. While they are certainly not alive in the same sense that any of us are, they do have a certain... presence to them that is purely their own. As objects, they are undoubtedly greater than the sum of their parts. And for that Forge in particular, such thinking may be even more true than usual.""

'What do you mean?' said Garovel.

""The location of a Forge is another important factor in its function. I do not think it is mere coincidence that it currently resides within an enormous tree. That tree no doubt plays a large role in that Forge's power.""

""Hmm,"" hummed Hector. ""So moving the Forge to Warrenhold is out of the question, then?""

"2849

""Ah... most likely, yes,"" said Abbas. ""I cannot say for certain that it would be impossible, but with any Forge, its environment is key. Even if we could move it safely--and I am not sure that we could--doing so could disrupt its power in ways that are difficult to understand.""

'I guess it's a good thing we decided to hold off on that, then,' said Garovel.

Hector wasn't entirely prepared to concede, though. ""But... if it's already broken, then wouldn't now be the best time to move it?""

Abbas' brow crinkled together with apparent disapproval. ""Perhaps. And perhaps it would acclimate to the new environment of Warrenhold quite well. Or perhaps it would be rendered completely useless. I do not think it is worth the gamble.""

Hector gave a slight sigh. ""Yeah, alright, I understand...""

He hadn't really thought it would work, but it sure would've been nice. He wouldn't have had to worry about keeping it safe quite so much, at least. Even if it had meant uprooting the whole damn tree and taking it back to Atreya, it would've been worth the hassle, he felt.

But yeah, the tree probably wouldn't survive. Plants couldn't grow in Warrenhold, after all. Maybe it could work if they transplanted it aboveground, but even that was debatable, since there wasn't much natural vegetation there. Plus, it would kinda defeat the purpose of using a castle to protect it if it wasn't actually in the castle. They would have to build a special sanctuary for it or something--and they could just do that here in Lorent, instead.

Hmm.

A sanctuary, huh?

...Like a second castle? A brand new one? Just to protect the Forge?

Oh, baby.

That would be so fucking expensive, though.

But oh, baby...

He tried not to delve too deep into that fantasy. It was tempting. God, it was tempting. But he wanted to be pragmatic. For the most part."

"2850

By the time they arrived in the capital, the sun was already waning in the sky. Combined with the thick canopy of leaves covering most of the city, it felt like nighttime. Hector made sure to call ahead again so that the Queen would be ready to meet them. Certainly, he didn't want to just waltz into Riverton Hall with Abbas Saqqaf by his side, so he asked the Queen to come to them.

There was a quiet place that Ravi had showed him the last time he was here. A little hole-in-the-wall diner with some of the best chocolate milkshakes he'd ever tasted. To be safe, though, Hector picked the next building over, instead. An even-more-empty taco shop.

They'd brought some hats, hoodies, and sunglasses with them from Warrenhold for this occasion, but with how barren the place was, maybe they weren't even necessary. They picked a booth near the back and sat down. A server came over to take their order, and they decided to go ahead and eat while they waited. Hector made sure to pay in cash. He'd brought Lorentian loros, as well as Atreyan troas, so it wasn't a problem.

The food wasn't very good.

That actually made Hector a bit more comfortable, though. He found that diner next door a bit strange, honestly. If the their food was so great, why didn't they get more business?

Maybe he was just being paranoid. Not every great restaurant could afford equally great publicity, but still. The fact that Ravi had recommended it to him was enough to cause concern, too. As much as he wanted to trust Ravi Zaman, Hector felt like there wasn't any harm in being extra careful.

Other than having to choke down these awful tacos, he supposed. If he wasn't so hungry, he probably wouldn't have even finished them."
"2851

When the Queen and Lynn appeared, they were both wearing clothes that were more casual for them than he'd seen in a long time. Or what felt like a long time, at least. Not since they'd been on the run from Abolish had they looked so... normal. Little to no makeup, lack of bright colors in the wardrobe, not even the sword that Lynn always carried with her.

Though, it wasn't like she needed it to protect the Queen.

And it wasn't like she needed expensive clothes or that fancy white cloak in order to look good, either.

""Hello there,"" said the Queen softly as she joined them at their modest table.

Lynnette decided to sit at the table across the narrow aisle and turn around to face the taco shop's front door.

""Hello..."" Hector almost added a 'Your Highness' to that but caught himself. It felt a little weird to not use her honorifics, but he was sure she would understand.

""I am pleased to see you, Helen,"" said Abbas. The gentleness in his voice took Hector by surprise.

""And I you, Abbas. It has been some time.""

""You've grown into a fine young woman.""

She giggled lightly at that. ""I am well into my thirties, you know.""

""Hah. Is that meant to make you sound old?""

""Youthfully experienced, is how I like to think of it.""

The Lord Saqqaf gave her a brief smile before his expression turned more serious again. ""Thank you for sending Lord Goffe to our aid. It could not have been more timely. I dread to think of where my family would be right now if he had not arrived when he did.""

Her gaze flitted between the two of them for a moment. ""I am glad to hear that. He was quite adamant about it. He scarcely even asked my permission before departing. It may be a stretch to say that I 'sent' him.""

""Perhaps, but you could have intervened, if you wished--and been well-justified in doing so, I am sure.""

"2852

The Queen's expression betrayed nothing of her thoughts, but she paused a moment before changing the subject. ""How fares your Hahl?"" she asked.

""Well, it is still intact,"" said Abbas, ""which may be more than can be said for others. I do not know what has become of the other Hahls, but I suspect we were among the luckier ones. Hahls Kattan and Dagher worry me most. Their homes were even closer to Uego than the Golden Fort was. They likely received the least warning of the invasion.""

""I see,"" said Helen. ""Do you have enough space at Warrenhold for everyone?""

""Yes, but we do not intend to stay there long.""

""I would imagine not. The Rainlords must make for awkward bedfellows, no?""

Abbas shook his head. ""Far from it. We have our differences, but it is precisely in times such as these that our commonalities rise to the surface. Their presence is a welcome comfort.""

The Queen seemed surprised, but then nodded. ""I am sure that my brother Meriwether would like to see Nasira and Rashad before you go. They are well, I hope?""

""They are. And I have no objection to their meeting, of course. We are but guests, after all.""

""Where do you intend to go, if not Warrenhold?""

Abbas glanced Hector's way. ""We are thinking of here. In Lorent. Hector has kindly offered us a place on his land. Temporarily, of course.""

Helen's gaze turned briefly to Hector, too. ""Are you sure? You are welcome in Atreya. I do not know if the Lorentians will be quite so understanding as we are.""

Abbas folded his hands on the table. ""I do not intend to ask for their permission. We will remain here covertly.""

The Queen's head reared back a little. ""Perhaps I am misunderstanding something, then. That seems a needless risk when you have a perfectly viable alternative in Atreya.""

"2853

""It is not a question of viability,"" said Abbas. His eyes shifted around the empty restaurant, and he looked at Worwal for a moment before continuing in a slightly lower voice. ""I must work on the Forge that Lord Goffe has recently found. If I can get it up and running, it could be exactly the boon we need to turn the tide of this war back in our favor.""

Her posture stiffened a bit as she listened. ""You truly believe this Forge to be so important?""

""I do.""

""More important than seeking out aid from Intar?"" she said.

At that, the Lord Saqqaf paused and rolled his neck to one side for a moment. He exhaled heavily. ""I am sure that one or more of the other Hahls will attempt to acquire Intar's help. I will leave that task to them. However, knowing what I do of Intarian politics, I have little reason to believe that such efforts will bear fruit. It is worth checking, of course, but I am rather confident that Intar will attempt to maintain their neutrality, even now.""

The Queen blinked. ""Surely not. Abolish is all but knocking on their door.""

""Their congress is paralyzed by divisive rhetoric. They will not take action until their land is directly attacked."" The man paused for a light shake of his head. ""Hmph. Perhaps not even then. They may just expect the Vanguard to take care of everything for them, as usual.""

The Queen looked concerned, her frown deepening, but she made no response.

""As for the Vanguard,"" Abbas went on, ""I think it best that my kin and I try to decouple ourselves from them as soon as possible. They may still be useful as allies, but it is clear to me now that we have grown too reliant on them over the years. And too trusting.""

"2854

Hector hated to admit it, but Abbas' assessment tracked fairly well with what Prince David had told him not too long ago. The sociopolitical divide in Intar between the Blue Moon Party and the Grand National Republic Party was exacerbated by their differing opinions on interventionism. The Grands, who were currently in power, might be inclined to aid Sair, but if they did, they would risk losing said power to the Moons.

Or something along those lines. Honestly, it all sounded pretty fucking complicated to Hector, and keeping up with a foreign nation's political drama wasn't the easiest thing in the world.

Hmm. Maybe he should ask Hanton to keep an especially close eye on the situation over there. Come to think of it, the Sparrow was probably already doing that, but Hector wouldn't mind confirming as much.

And maybe putting Roman on it would be a good idea, too. Or some of the Rainlords, perhaps. There were a few Sebolts who might be suited to it. Or Blackburns?

He kept that internal debate going and assigned it to its own thought process as he continued listening to Abbas and the Queen.

"Hector has told me of this Forge," Helen was saying, "but I must admit, I do not fully understand its value. It can be used to create items of incredible power, yes? But what manner of items would that be, precisely? Weaponry, no doubt, but what kind of weapon would it take for you to reclaim Sair from the likes of Morgunov?"

"Your skepticism is understandable," said Abbas. "At the moment, the fact of the matter is that I simply do not yet know what we will be able to create. In fact, it may not even be weaponry that results from our efforts. Not weaponry in the conventional sense, at least." He broke for a weighty pause and glanced Hector's way one more time. "However, after giving the Forge a preliminary examination and thinking on it for a while during the drive here... I may have a very vague notion of the possibilities."

"2855

"Is that right?" said Helen. "Well then, please, don't keep me in suspense."

"I think it may have something to do with fire," said Abbas, "but not like that of a roaring inferno, as one might normally expect from anything called a 'forge.' I think it will have a... gentler aspect to it."

That was the first Hector was hearing of that. Abbas must really have been mulling that assessment over for a while.

The Queen did not look terribly impressed, though. "A... 'gentle' super weapon." She didn't say anything further, perhaps because the tone of her voice was saying it for her.

How were they supposed to fight the maniacs of Abolish with something gentle?

""As I said, it may not be weaponry that is born of the Forge.""

The Queen just gave a doubtful nod.

""I know how it sounds,"" said Abbas. ""Perhaps the Forge will not live up to my hopes. That is quite possible. Likely, even. I have no illusions about that. But even so, I must pursue this opportunity. Wherever it may lead me.""

--+-+--+

Caster Egmond unfolded his chair and sat down in it.

He was earlier than most of the others. That was abnormal for him. For the longest time, he had stopped taking these meetings seriously. He had stopped caring about the cause, the shared misery and accompanying sense of camaraderie. He'd just been going through the motions, playing a part, repeating the words he'd heard thousands of times by now.

""It's not as bad as we make it out to be in our minds.""

""People aren't judging us as much as we think they are.""

""We command respect, in our own way.""

""We have other, more important qualities that we can focus on.""

""If our reapers haven't given up on us, then we shouldn't give up on ourselves.""

And to think, he'd actually begun to believe all that stuff for a while. For a long while. Decades, even.

But now?

He sighed quietly to himself."

"2856

The others were filing into the chamber now. Some looked about as discouraged as he felt. Others were more poised, guarded. Veterans of this place, like him.

He felt like a kid again, in the worst possible sense of the phrase. A mere child.

It wasn't supposed to be this way. He was supposed to be long past these feelings of inadequacy. As far as servants went, he was getting up there with the rest of them. His soul power was nothing to sneeze at. He could use pan-rozum, for god's sake.

He wasn't weak. He was strong. One of the strongest in Abolish, in fact. The Marauder of Calthos, they called him. Caster the Immovable, they called him.

And he'd been working on his image, too. Calm. Collected. Measured. Polite. Different from the men under his command. No longer acting the fool or the lunatic like so many others in Abolish.

So why, then, had the attack failed so miserably? Why had Ivan been captured by the bloody Sunsmith, of all people?

And why had Gohvis been able to punch him so hard that he nearly exited the troposphere?

It didn't make sense. The gap in strength between them should not have been that wide.

He hadn't even been able to look his own men in the eye after suffering such an absurd degree of humiliation.

And now, of course, he'd missed out on the opportunity to regain his honor. By the time he arrived at Uego, the battle was already over.

From the sound of it, Morgunov hadn't needed any help, but plenty of his peers had been able to grab a sliver of glory for themselves, at least. Vanguardian generals had been ripe for the picking, apparently.

But he'd been too slow.

Again.

How many times had he been shown up on the battlefield over the years? How many times had he been passed over by his superiors in favor of someone more ""suited to the task at hand?"" Someone more ""versatile?""

Someone whose ability wasn't destruction."

"2857

The other men in this group understood. They were all going through the same thing. His brothers of destruction.

They had to hold these meetings in secret, though. It would be too embarrassing if any other members of Abolish discovered what they were doing here. Hell, even most of their own reapers didn't know--or they thought it was for some purpose other than encouragement and support. Whenever one of the boys expected an outsider to show up, that was usually when they broke out the playing cards and alcohol.

They couldn't show weakness. They all knew that entirely too well by now. If nothing else, destruction users had to have the appearance of strength, of self-certainty.

Because oftentimes, that was simply how destruction users were.

Or at least, that was Caster's view of it. Whether or not servant abilities were in some way linked to the psychology of the servant--that was a matter of debate for the more academic among them. Caster believed so, but he most certainly had to acknowledge that there were outliers.

Which was what these men were. Outliers.

Destruction users were supposed to be more simple-minded. Not ""dumb,"" necessarily, but easier to please, at least. Not so ambitious or self-reflective. They were supposed to revel in their destruction, in their power.

But this group wanted more. They always had. When it came down to it, one might call that the source of all human unhappiness. The desire for that which they could not have.

Even now, there were those among them who did not believe it was hopeless. Guys like Paulie over there, still so blissfully young and inexperienced.

""I'm just saying, there has to be more to this power than we know. We just need someone who's, like, super ultra smart to help us analyze it and discover its hidden depths.""

"2858

""You think we haven't tried that?"" said someone on Caster's right. That one's name was Deacon. Not as much of a veteran of this little club as Caster but definitely an experienced fellow in his own right. ""We work for the most brilliant mind who has ever walked this planet. You think no one has ever brought this to him? Of course they have.""

Paulie didn't respond, but his face spoke of stubborn refusal to accept what he was hearing.

Deacon wasn't done. ""I know it's difficult to accept. Believe me, I do. But isn't that why we're all here in the first place? Because we need help with exactly that problem? Acceptance? We are what we are, gentleman. No amount of wishful thinking is going to change that. The important thing is to focus on what we can change. To hone our other skills.""

""That's right,"" said a man named Olaf on Caster's left. ""If even the Mad Demon himself can't find a path, then that path simply doesn't exist. Listen to us, Paulie. It'll save you years of agony. Years that you could be spending on more productive things.""

""It's true,"" said yet another man. This one was Tim, and he was sitting next to Paulie. ""Face it, my boy. There's a reason why there's never been an emperor who used destruction. We've got a hard limit on our abilities. That's just the way it is. Ain't nothin' to be ashamed of.""

Unsurprisingly, Paulie still didn't look convinced. ""I don't believe that. There were plenty of emperors or emperor-equivalent servants in the ancient past who've been lost to history, right? One of them could've had destruction. We can't know for sure that they didn't.""

A low chorus of disagreement and general grumbling ran across the men.

""Just look at Caster!"" said Paulie, pointing. ""Strongest we've ever had! Respected by everyone! He's an example of what we could all become! And he's still growing!""

Oh, god."

"2859

If only the boy knew how bad it really was. The last thing Caster wanted to do was crush his hopes, but maybe that would be for the best. Maybe he should just confess to his own crippling insecurities here and now, in front of everyone. That was the point of these meetings, after all. If anyone would understand, it would be the guys.

But he still hesitated.

Paulie wasn't entirely wrong. Caster did want to be something of a role model for all these poor bastards. He wanted them to be able look at him and see something for their future selves besides dying in obscurity.

So this was a lose-lose situation for him, in other words.

What else was new, eh?

Before he was forced to make a decision, however, Deacon chimed in and saved him. ""Caster has had many of his own struggles with this over the years. You can't just point to him and act like it's such a straight line to where he's standing.""

""First of all, he's sitting, not standing,"" said Paulie. ""And second, I'm not saying it'll be straightforward or easy. I'm just not ready to give up. Just because Morgunov couldn't crack it doesn't mean it's uncrackable. He could've missed something. I mean, he can't be that smart.""

Dead silence arrived.

Ah.

That had not been a wise thing to say.

Luckily for Paulie, it didn't take him long to realize his mistake. ""Uh. W-what I meant was that, he might have been too busy to really look into it, y'know? Like, if the problem didn't interest him enough, then, er, he wouldn't have had enough, ah, motivation to... um... dig into it for real... since he's not destruction himself, right? That's all I was getting at.""

The others in the group were still just staring at him.

Truth be told, Caster's own sympathy for the boy had lessened quite a bit, too. This may have been a place for having difficult conversations, but that was most assuredly not one of them."

"2860

Caster kept a cool head, though. ""Let us call it a day, shall we? Good discussions, everyone."" Best to end things here before Paulie stuck his foot in his mouth again and got himself killed.

Caster stood up, and the others all gradually followed suit. There was nowhere to put their folding chairs, so they mostly just picked them up or left them where they were.

In the middle of this blown out gymnasium.

The missing roof, broken floor, shattered windows, and crumbling walls did not provide the most comforting atmosphere in the world, perhaps. But privacy was more important, and abandoned areas like this were great for that.

And of course, they were not normal men. They were not comforted by pristine surroundings. At the end of the day, despite their status as outliers, they were still men of destruction. Perhaps there was something soothing in this type of environment.

The beautiful calm of a devastated world.

Artful, Caster felt. More so than any painting, certainly.

They all went their separate ways. Those who belonged to the same sect probably didn't want to be seen returning to camp together. It would just draw needless attention to themselves.

Caster, for his part, didn't care so much about that anymore. He always had men in his sect or others hanging around him for one reason or another. Such was the life of a Judicator. People were always looking for someone to pass judgment for them on this dispute or that one.

Lately, he'd been swamped by arguing Raiders, all looking for someone to decide who got what spoils from the war. Killing each other over and over didn't accomplish much when they were in disagreement, especially when their reapers refused to risk their own lives getting involved. So they relied on the Judicators to sort everything out. Sometimes, violently. But always decisively."

"2861

Paulie, however, was not from his sect. So it was bit strange when the lad caught up to him on his way back to camp and struck up a conversation.

It started off with awkward pleasantries mixed with apologies. The boy seemed to be trying to figure out if Caster was upset with him for questioning Morgunov's genius.

He was.

But he also wasn't going to let that show. Trivial things were for trivial people. Until they were repeated and grew into non-trivial things.

Either way, Caster was ready to move past it, for now. ""What do you want, Paulie?"" he said.

""Ah, er, I just wanted to talk to you privately,"" said Paulie. ""It's just, like, I know those other guys mean well 'n all, but I don't think they get it. They've given up, and they won't be happy until I do the same.""

That wasn't it at all, Caster thought. They weren't concerned with their own happiness. They were trying to preserve what was left of Paulie's. The kid probably wouldn't be able to see that, no matter what anyone said to him, though.

Such was youth.

Caster kept those thoughts to himself. The boy had obviously come to him because he was looking for someone who wouldn't try to rain on his parade. It was a little obnoxious, but Caster supposed he could at least hear him out. There was still quite a long stretch of ruined town ahead of them, so there wasn't much harm in filling it with a pointless conversation.

And besides, the slow, grueling march of time would do plenty of enthusiasm-crushing without any help from himself, Caster felt.

""You were quieter than them,"" said Paulie. ""I thought maybe you were... of a different mind, I guess. More open, y'know?""

""Open to what, precisely?""

""Possibilities. Listen, I... I've been... uh...""

Caster gave him a look, just waiting. Honestly, he already knew everything Paulie might say. But why was the kid getting so hesitant all of a sudden? Nerves? Paulie had never struck him as a nervous speaker."

"2862

""Promise you won't tell anyone what I'm about to say?"" said Paulie.

Absolutely not, but Caster had no qualms about lying. ""Of course. If that's what you want.""

""I... I've been hearing voices, lately,"" said Paulie. ""Well. Just the one voice, I suppose. But it's in my head. When no one else is around. And it keeps telling me things. Whispering. It tells me to look harder at my ability. At our ability. It says there's more to be found.""

Hmm.

Alright, well, that was a new one, at least.

Oddly enough, though, Caster still wasn't all that surprised. While it was true he hadn't heard this particular excuse before, it also wasn't terribly uncommon for people to be hearing voices in their head.

This was Abolish.

Half of them were insane. And the other half were also insane, if for no other reason than because they were willing to work with the first half.

And Caster worked, primarily, with that first half. He'd encountered many, many people in his life who claimed to be hearing voices in their heads. He recalled one gentleman who'd had his mind blown when he discovered that those voice were, in fact, his very own thoughts.

Caster had never had a particularly strong sense humor, but that had made him laugh.

He could recall other examples, however, which were not nearly so amusing. Old tales, mostly. Of psychics. People who loved to toy with vulnerable young minds, twist them to their will, plant ideas in their heads, or simply break them for no other reason than to prove that they could.

He hadn't heard stories like that in ages, though. Over half a century, at least. It was rumored that one of them had bitten off more than they could chew by trying to manipulate the Mad Demon and that in response, Morguonv had rendered their kind extinct."

"2863 -- CCLII.

If that rumor was true--and Caster was inclined to believe that it was--then Paulie probably wasn't being toyed with by some psychic. Which was perhaps a shame. Caster might've liked to learn more about psychic powers. It was doubtful that someone like him would be able to add such a thing to his repertoire, but it could be worth trying.

They were always talking about honing other skills, after all. He would've appreciated the opportunity, at least.

In any case, Paulie was probably just going mad. Or rather, more mad than he already was.

But that was fine. Caster wasn't the type to discriminate based on such things. Some of the best friends he'd ever known had been madmen. Before they'd gotten themselves killed. Or released. Or tried to kill him.

Caster could at least humor the lad. ""Has this voice ever identified itself to you?"" he asked.

""Yeah,"" said Paulie, ""though, uh..." He leaned and lowered his voice to a whisper. ""I'm not entirely sure I believe it.""

Right. Caster had seen this behavior before, too. Trying to speak quietly so that the voices don't ""overhear."" Worried about how they'll react to what's being said.

Yep. Definitely madness.

""Go on,"" Caster urged, lowering his voice as well. ""I won't tell anyone.""

""Well, the voice says... it's a god.""

""...I see. And does this god have a name?""

Paulie glanced around at the annihilated town. ""Malast.""

Chapter Two Hundred Fifty-Two: 'O, illuminating path...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

The meeting between Queen Helen and Lord Abbas lasted for quite a while longer. They discussed various possibilities and intentions for the future. The Queen was even so bold as to bring up the issue of Intar's offer to annex Atreya, apparently wanting Abbas' opinion on the matter.

Hector found that quite surprising, for a couple of reasons. It was incredibly sensitive information, first of all. If her political opponents or the Atreyan public caught wind of the offer, it probably wouldn't be good for her. The fact that she was trusting Abbas with such details--that alone spoke volumes to Hector about her feelings toward the Sandlords."

"2863 -- CCLII.

If that rumor was true--and Caster was inclined to believe that it was--then Paulie probably wasn't being toyed with by some psychic. Which was perhaps a shame. Caster might've liked to learn more about psychic powers. It was doubtful that someone like him would be able to add such a thing to his repertoire, but it could be worth trying.

They were always talking about honing other skills, after all. He would've appreciated the opportunity, at least.

In any case, Paulie was probably just going mad. Or rather, more mad than he already was.

But that was fine. Caster wasn't the type to discriminate based on such things. Some of the best friends he'd ever known had been madmen. Before they'd gotten themselves killed. Or released. Or tried to kill him.

Caster could at least humor the lad. ""Has this voice ever identified itself to you?"" he asked.

""Yeah,"" said Paulie, ""though, uh..." He leaned and lowered his voice to a whisper. ""I'm not entirely sure I believe it.""

Right. Caster had seen this behavior before, too. Trying to speak quietly so that the voices don't ""overhear."" Worried about how they'll react to what's being said.

Yep. Definitely madness.

""Go on,"" Caster urged, lowering his voice as well. ""I won't tell anyone.""

""Well, the voice says... it's a god.""

""...I see. And does this god have a name?""

Paulie glanced around at the annihilated town. ""Malast.""

Chapter Two Hundred Fifty-Two: 'O, illuminating path...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

The meeting between Queen Helen and Lord Abbas lasted for quite a while longer. They discussed various possibilities and intentions for the future. The Queen was even so bold as to bring up the issue of Intar's offer to annex Atreya, apparently wanting Abbas' opinion on the matter.

Hector found that quite surprising, for a couple of reasons. It was incredibly sensitive information, first of all. If her political opponents or the Atreyan public caught wind of the offer, it probably wouldn't be good for her. The fact that she was trusting Abbas with such details--that alone spoke volumes to Hector about her feelings toward the Sandlords."

"2864

Second of all, he'd kinda been under the impression that she'd already decided not to accept Intar's offer. With how well the economy seemed to be recovering, it probably wasn't necessary anymore, right?

Then again, he wasn't an economist. And with how distracted he'd been lately, he was sure that the Queen had a much better grasp on that whole situation right now than he did. So if she was still considering it as an option, then maybe the recovery wasn't going quite as well he'd thought.

Or maybe there was some other factor he didn't know about.

Whatever the case, Abbas ended up advising her against taking the offer, though he admitted to harboring significant bias.

""It is nothing against Intar, mind you,"" he clarified. ""At heart, I am simply an independence-loving man. My family instilled that in me at a very young age, and I do not think it is ever going to change. Nor would I wish it to.""

The Queen's smile was a soft one. ""The Sandlords of Sair declared independence from Calthos two hundred years ago, yes?""

'It was actually closer to three hundred,' said Worwal, 'but Sair wasn't officially recognized as a nation until about two hundred and twenty years ago, yeah.'

The Queen nodded while keeping her eyes on the Sunsmith. ""And you yourself are... how old, Lord Abbas?""

""One hundred and fifty-four.""

""Goodness.""

""My parents were among the founders."" His eyes dropped to the table. He fell quiet.

Hector didn't need him to say more in order to guess what was going through his head, right now. The guy had personally lived through the majority of Sair's lifespan as a nation. And it was directly threatened.

""...Sair may still be relatively young,"" said the Queen, ""but that region is not. And your people are not. I may not be quite the student of history that my husband is, but as I recall, your kin have survived far worse than this.""

"2865

'That is very true,' said Worwal. 'Our Hahl is still intact. We have wonderful allies. And hope. I've seen times when all we had was the latter. And even that was debatable.'

Abbas made no response, but the expression on his face seemed to soften a little.

Maybe it felt a little weird for him to receive consolation from someone who was so much younger than him. Over an entire century.

Hector had to wonder what that was like. Perhaps he had it all wrong. Perhaps after living as a servant for that long, Abbas had reached a point where age just stopped mattering to him altogether. In a way, that would make sense. Worrying over age differences all the time did seem like it would get a little exhausting after a while, especially if you don't have many peers left in your own age group.

That might explain why Lord Abbas never seemed to talk down to him, despite how young he was.

Or wait, did that explain that? Come to think of it, Hector wasn't actually sure how old Abbas thought he was.

He... he wasn't under the impression that Hector was super old, right? Asad probably mentioned it to him at some point, right?

Unfortunately, the more he let those questions stew in a background thought process, the more Hector came to realize that there was no good way to ask them.

After their meeting, Abbas and Worwal departed first, taking the vehicle and their accompanying entourage back towards the Forge and Atreya. Hector intended to stay in Lorent with the Queen and fly back with her.

And he was finally able to speak with her alone.

Somehow, it felt like ages since they had last been able to do this.

The Queen must have been waiting for this opportunity, too, because she didn't waste time with softball questions. ""If Lorent is attacked, do you intend to fight in its defense?""

"2866

Fortunately, Hector had already been thinking about the answer to that for a while now, himself. ""Well, it would depend on the circumstances of the attack, but... probably, yeah. Especially now that I have the Forge to worry about.""

The Queen kept her gaze fixed on him. ""And if I were to order you to not get involved, would you listen to me?""

He took a deliberate breath. He'd been thinking about that question, too. And frankly, he didn't have a good answer yet. ""Why would you order me not to get involved?""

""Perhaps to prevent Atreya from getting swept up in this war. Perhaps to prevent you from becoming a political pawn of a foreign nation. Perhaps simply because I feel you are needed more at home. Would my reasoning matter? Hypothetically speaking, this would be a lawful order from your queen, Hector.""

Agh. Shit. He needed to choose his words carefully here. ""Well... we both want to protect Atreya. But I don't think letting Lorent get invaded, especially by Abolish, would help keep Atreya safe, no matter what kind of promises they might make to you.""

The Queen fell quiet. Maybe that hadn't been what she wanted to hear. Or maybe she was just thinking. Her expression was stone.

Hector found a difficult question of his own to ask. ""If Morgunov found out the Sandlords were here... and if he made you the same offer that he made to Callum, that he wouldn't invade so long as you handed them over to him, would you take it?""

The Queen took her time responding to that one. ""...No, I would not.""

Hector had kind of expected that response, yet he still found it a little surprising, somehow. ""You'd really risk antagonizing the Mad Demon?""

""It would antagonize the Sandlords first and foremost,"" she said. ""And frankly speaking, I do not think we would be able to capture Abbas Saqqaf and 'hand him over' to anyone.""

"2867

That was a fair point, Hector supposed. But he wasn't quite satisfied yet. ""Alright. Then... what if Morgunov were to say that handing them over wasn't necessary? That we just had to not provide refuge for them, instead?"

The Queen sighed. "'Are you just trying to think of how best to paint me into a corner?'"

Hector relinquished a sympathetic smile. "'Kinda.'"

She dropped her gaze down to the table and stared at it while she thought. And she kept staring.

Mehlsanz decided to chime in. 'Either way, it would be a major crisis. You can't take Morgunov at his word. Especially after what his men did to this country before.'

The Queen was still thinking, though. Perhaps even she didn't know what she would do in that situation.

Hector kept waiting for an answer, but the silence was growing rather extreme, and he began to feel like he was torturing her. "'...Well, on the bright side, I don't actually think that Morgunov is going to show up around here anytime soon.'"

That made her look up at him again. "'I agree, but why do you sound so confident?'"

Now there was a sentence he'd never expected to hear. "'Ah... I think Morgunov has already gotten what he wanted out of Sair. I kinda get the impression that he's more interested in his... er, 'scientific' experiments, now.'" Torturing Asad Najir, specifically, but Hector didn't feel like that gruesome little detail was necessary to mention here. The Queen had enough on her mind already, he felt.

"'I see,'" she said with trepidation. "'You think he will be preoccupied for a while, then?'"

"'Morgunov himself, yeah. His goons, maybe not so much. I, uh... er...'"

Garovel stepped in now. 'Hector killed the Man of Crows two days ago.'

Mehlsanz's hollow eye sockets bulged. 'He did WHAT?!'"
"2868

'Hector killed him,' Garovel repeated. 'I watched it happen. It was pretty crazy and--if the Queen will excuse my language--fucking awesome as hell. Rarely have I ever been so pleased with the outcome of a battle.'

The Queen seemed surprised, but it was Mehlsanz who looked the most shocked by far.

'I don't...' She stared at Hector directly. 'H-how...? The Man of Crows... is incredibly dangerous.'

'Was,' said Garovel.

'You really killed him? Permanently?'

The intensity of her reaction was making him feel a little awkward again. He managed to give her a nod, though.

'Albert Crowe was an infamous killer of rising stars in the Vanguard. I personally knew three good servant-reaper pairs who died at his hands. I never encountered him myself, but from everything I heard during my time with the Vanguard, the man was an absolute menace to deal with. And now you're telling me he's dead at your hands? I... I don't...'

Hector felt the need to clarify. "'I-it was just a lucky shot, honestly. His reaper picked the wrong moment to escape and gave me an opening to land a killing blow. And Lord Abbas beat the crap out of him beforehand, so he wasn't at full strength or anything. So, er, I just, uh--'"

'He's being modest,' said Garovel. 'Not only did he kill the Man of Crows, he saved Abbas' life, too. Scored a lot of points with Hahl Saqqaf as a result, I think. They were singing his praises at Warrenhold.'

'I don't believe what I'm hearing,' said Mehlsanz. Her tone was on the brink of laughter. 'That's... phenomenal.'

'Yes, it is,' said Garovel. 'But it also probably pissed off Abolish quite a bit. There's a solid chance that Bloodeye will come looking for a rematch.'

'You fought Bloodeye, too?'

'Oh yeah. Very strange powers on that guy. No idea what was going on there. Abbas still kicked the shit out of him, though."

"2869

Mehlsanz's skeletal jaw just hung slightly open.

Hector hadn't expected this conversation to turn into such a deluge of compliments. He very much wanted to keep things focused on what was most important, but he wasn't quite sure how to do that. Technically, they weren't really off topic.

'Do you have any useful intel on Bloodeye?' asked Garovel. 'Anything you remember?'

Mehlsanz took a moment to think. 'Um... well, he was similarly infamous, though for slightly different reasons. Where Crowe was renowned for being something of a hero killer, Bloodeye was more renowned for his utter brutality. He doesn't take prisoners. Rumor was, he enjoys killing so much that he even sometimes goes against the orders of his superiors in order to do so.'

'Ah. One of those types.'

'Indeed.'

'What about his powers? Did you hear anything about them? He used some sort of transformational ability. I've never seen the like before. He pulled a freaking missile out of his mouth.'

Mehlsanz just looked bewildered.

The reapers kept talking, but it soon became clear that Mehlsanz couldn't tell them much else about the enemy.

At length, Hector thought up another topic that he wanted to ask the Queen about.

""Your Highness, are you seriously considering Intar's offer of annexation?""

'Oh yeah,' said Garovel. 'I thought you would've made up your mind by now, but the way you were talking about it to Abbas, it sounded like that wasn't the case at all.'

""Ah. Yes, well, that had more to do with my interest in Lord Abbas' perspective than with the offer itself. I felt that telling him about it would be a good way of hearing his earnest thoughts about the nation. Politicians often guard such feelings carefully.""

Garovel still wanted clarification, though. 'So you're not really considering the offer, then?'"

"2870

A slight smile crossed the Queen's face, and she bobbed her head to the side. ""Oh, I don't know... They DID improve their terms quite a bit after all the publicity Hector garnered for himself in Lorent.""

Garovel chortled. 'How ""improved"" are we talking here, exactly?'

""More money,"" said the Queen. ""Another billion troa for each of the great houses, to be precise. Plus, another ten billion on top of that for building new schools around the country. And two additional representatives in the Intarian Congress, as well as four additional electors in their Holy Imperial Council.""

'Ooh,' cooed Garovel.

Holy Imperial Council? That name confused Hector, and it must've shown on his face, because the Queen offered an explanation.

""The Holy Imperial Council is how they choose their presidents. The territories each vote, and then the Council decides the winner based on a point-value system attributed to each territory before each election. More electors on the Council would mean that our people's votes matter more.""

Huh. That sounded a little complicated, but he felt like he understood. It still left him wondering something, though. ""Why do they call it the Holy Imperial Council? Isn't that kinda... weird and medieval-sounding?""

Garovel took the opportunity to jump in. 'Yep. That name is actually a remnant of the Mohssian Empire. Back then, the Holy Imperial Council had tons of power. They handled whatever affairs the emperor didn't feel like taking care of himself--which was usually A LOT. Nowadays, though, its only role is to elect the president. Kind of a traditional thing.

The electors don't have any power of their own. They just vote for whoever their territories tell them to.'

'There've been many attempts to change the name,' added Mehlsanz. 'A few times, it even came to a full blown referendum. And it's been close, but in the end, the Intarians have always voted to keep the name the way it is.'"

"2871

~~Christmas Day Special - (page 1 of 24)~~

'I think it's a heritage thing,' said Garovel. 'The Mohssian Empire had a rich history, and Intar was at the heart of it. The people there might understandably have some lingering attachment to it. But yeah, it's super weird that any part of a republic should still be legally referred to as ""Imperial"" anything.'

Hector had to agree. It was strange to imagine that something from the Mohssian Empire still existed today in an official capacity like that. In a spare thought process, it made him wonder what a modern day Mohssian Empire might look like.

Probably wouldn't be very pretty, he felt.

'Still, that's a big upgrade,' said Garovel. 'Intar really offered us all that just because of little ol' Hector here? I'm blushing vicariously through him.'

The Queen giggled.

'That last one is particularly interesting,' said Garovel. 'Granting us more power in their government is no minor thing.'

'It is,' said Mehlsanz. 'It would give us a disproportionate amount of influence for our total population and land. But that's not saying much. We'd still be dwarfed by the larger territories--of which, there are many.'

'True. And I wasn't suggesting that we should take the deal, just so it's clear. I, too, am an independence-loving man, at heart.'

'Heh. Are you sure you aren't just worried about losing your position of influence in the government if Helen gives up her power?'

Garovel paused at that. 'Oh, damn, I didn't even think about that, actually. Shit. Hector wouldn't be a lord anymore, would he? Oh, no, no, we can't have that. You have to refuse, Your Highness.'

The Queen laughed again, a bit harder this time. "'I appreciate your enthusiastic support.'"

'I imagine Hector and all the other lords would be able to retain their titles,' said Mehlsanz. 'They just wouldn't have any legal authority in their regions anymore.'

'That's still unacceptable,' said Garovel. 'I'm power hungry, dammit.'"
"2872

~~Christmas Day Special - (page 2 of 24)~~

"'I will be sure to keep your ego in mind when making my final decision on the matter,'" said the Queen.

'Thank you,' said Garovel. 'I appreciate that. How much time do you have to decide, by the way? Is there an expiration date on this deal, or is this just going to become an indefinite thing that keeps getting brought up every time we meet? If it's the latter, then let me just say, I wouldn't mind as long as the stakes keep getting raised each time, too.'

"'There is no expiration date,'" said the Queen, "'but I do feel that it would be rather rude of me to go too long without giving them an answer. Most likely, I will send them a formal response within the next six months. It may not be final, however, depending on how interested Intar truly is. Negotiations for a matter such as this could continue informally for several years.'"

'Hmm. So you're saying that Hector and I have plenty of time to make them juice up their offer again.'

The Queen gave him a bemused smile. "'...Juice up?'"

'Yeah. To make juicier. Jucify. It's a technical term.'

'I'm not sure it is,' said Mehlsanz.

As the conversation continued, the two reapers began to overwhelm it for a time. Until at length, Queen Helen asked Hector about his plans for the lower Jagwa region of Lorent. The truth, of course, was that he didn't really know yet.

But that topic did remind him of something else. Something he almost wished he'd forgotten about. Even now, he was reluctant to bring it up. But he had to. Clarity was important for matters like this.

""Your Highness,"" he said slowly, ""it's my understanding that... Madame Carthrace has talked to you about loosening some of the regulations regarding banks in Atreya?"" It wasn't exactly a question, but he posed it like one.

The Queen eyed him steadily. ""Yes, she has.""
"2873

~~Christmas Day Special - (page 3 of 24)~~

""I'm... still pretty new to all this,"" said Hector, trying to be very careful with his words, ""but it seems to me that... my bank would be able to grow a lot more quickly and help a lot more people get through this economic depression if those regulations weren't quite so strict. But Madame Carthrace tells me that you... feel differently.""

""I do,"" said the Queen. ""While I did not create those regulations, I think that they were placed there for good reason. And it is precisely in times of crisis like this one when influence and power shift in unexpected and potentially terrifying ways. I will freely admit that I am afraid of the Darksteel National Bank growing too powerful too quickly.""

Wow.

Hector had to admire the way she just came right and said it. That still didn't exactly soften the blow, though. ""...You think I would abuse that power?""

""As a matter of fact, I do not,"" said the Queen. ""But your Bank is more than just you. How many employees do you have now, I wonder? And how many more would you need in order to cope with the explosive growth that you would undoubtedly see if I were to change the law purely for your benefit?""

Hector frowned. ""I get what you're saying, but... Your Highness, there are still a lot of people suffering financially, right now. And we have the power to change that. If you're worried about something like... corruption in my bank--or whatever else--then let's address that issue. I don't think we should avoid the whole thing just because we're worried about one aspect of it.""

""Respectfully, Hector, I don't think you do get what I am saying. The economy is on the road to recovery. The situation is improving. And at a historic pace, I might add. Just because we can make it go faster does not mean we should. We would be opening ourselves up to the same essential problem that the Vanguard is currently having: bloat. And once that becomes an issue, it is very difficult to fix.""

"2874

~~Christmas Day Special - (page 4 of 24)~~

Hector tilted his head. ""...Wouldn't that be my problem to deal with, not yours?""

""If your bank continues to grow unchecked, it could become the entire nation's problem,"" said the Queen.

Hector furrowed his brow. ""And if it continues to stagnate, then that could also become the entire nation's problem.""

""Stagnate?"" she said with obvious doubt. ""In what way is your bank stagnating, Hector? Customers are flocking to you, are they not?""

""They are. Because the nation is in crisis. And yet we're still barely operating in the green. What happens when it's not? They'll take their money elsewhere, because we can't afford to lower our service fees and incentivize them to stay."" Hmm. Maybe he was picking up a thing or two from all his conversations with Amelia.

The Queen paused at that, but she still looked unconvinced. ""Why would they leave? The law applies equally to your competitors, does it not?""

Hector was a bit surprised to hear her say that. ""Actually, no, it doesn't. Older banks are given more leeway. Once this crisis passes and people aren't quite so worried about stability anymore, the older banks that manage to survive will probably be able to make a killing while we collapse from the inside.""

""Those older banks have earned that privilege through years of proving their credibility. I appreciate what your bank is doing for the nation at the moment, but it is still very young, and I do not think it should be given special treatment just because of abnormal circumstances.""

He exhaled, trying not to sound exasperated. ""Your Highness... I'm not asking for special treatment. I'd be happy if the regulations were loosened for all banks, not just mine.""

""Hector, I am sorry, but the answer is no. I will not risk long-term stability for short-term gain.""

""That's... I don't think that's what the choice is, Your Highness. I agree that unchecked growth would be dangerous, but it wouldn't be unchecked. And if the bank is allowed to generate revenue without charging our customers through the nose for it, then that will contribute to the long-term stability of the nation, too, don't you think?""

""I'm afraid I disagree.""

"2875

~~Christmas Day Special - (page 5 of 24)~~

Damn. She sounded like she wasn't going to change her mind, no matter what he said.

Hector still wasn't quite prepared to give up, though. He had one more argument up his sleeve. ""Your Highness... my bank has a lot of investors who've taken a big risk by supporting me. Including the Rainlords. If the Bank collapses, they'll take a huge hit. Not to mention all the Atreyan lords who contributed."" There was Roman, too, but Hector had a feeling that he'd be just fine.

""Considering the ingenuity displayed by both Amelia Carthrace and yourself, I highly doubt that the Darksteel National Bank will collapse. I am sure you will find a way to continue operations within all currently legal means. Turning a massive profit, however, may prove to be a challenge, yes.""

Ingenuity, huh? ""...Does that mean you wouldn't mind if we expanded our operations into Lorent?"

At that, the Queen paused for a long moment, eyeing him, then Garovel, then him again. "Is that a threat, Hector?"

He could hardly believe his ears. "Why would it be a threat?" he said, unable to conceal his bafflement.

The Queen didn't answer. She just kept staring at him.

Garovel decided to step in now. 'This is getting a little too heated for my tastes. Let's all take a breath and remember that we're on the same side here, shall we?'

The Queen indeed took the requested breath. She shut her eyes for a moment, too, before opening. "Hector... my entire reason for blocking foreign banks from jumping in to aid with the economy was to prevent foreign interests from tearing this nation apart like a pack of piranhas. If you expand into Lorent, it would create a new stream through which such piranhas might arrive."

Hector wished Amelia was here to help. He felt like he wasn't making his best possible arguments. But he kept trying. "If anyone ever tried to use my bank in such a way, I'd have their account terminated in an instant."

"2876

~~Christmas Day Special - (page 6 of 24)~~

The Queen gave him a sympathetic smile--or a patronizing one. He couldn't quite tell which, and he didn't like the uncertainty he was feeling about it.

"I appreciate you saying that," said the Queen, "but I do not think you will have the time to monitor all of your accounts for such activity. And the more your bank grows, the more difficult that problem will become."

"So I'll hire someone," he said. "A whole team, if need be. It's important enough to warrant it, I think. And I'm sure Amelia will agree."

The Queen paused again. "Amelia, is it? You've grown quite familiar with her in these past few months, it would seem."

Had he? Oh. He didn't typically use her first name out loud, did he? Either way, that was beside the point. ""That... doesn't seem relevant to what we were talking about, Your Highness.""

""How much do you trust her, Hector?""

He blinked at that question. ""Well... quite a bit. I mean, you appointed her to be my financial advisor, Your Highness.""

She took a deep breath. ""Yes, I did. However, I did not foresee how pivotal her role in things would soon become. By your side, she is on track to become one of the most powerful individuals in the country. And perhaps beyond, judging from the way you are talking.""

Hector's posture stiffened in his chair. ""Do you not trust her?""

She bobbed her head a little. ""For the most part, I do. Her family is another matter, but her strained relationship with them makes that a moot point. My only issue with her--impolite as this may be to say--is her age.""

Hector just cocked an eyebrow at that. Impolite was right. Damn.

""Oh, do not look at me like that,"" she said. ""I adore Amelia. I truly do. And it is precisely for that reason that I worry what will become of your bank once she is no longer able to run it for you.""

"2877

~~Christmas Day Special - (page 7 of 24)~~

Geez, Hector thought. Just how far ahead was she thinking here?

""She's not that old, Your Highness...""

She gave him a look. ""It has been making me wonder if we should try to find a reaper for her. That would give me peace of mind. Somewhat, at least.""

He scratched his brow at that notion. A reaper for Amelia Carthrace? Hmm.

The Queen was still giving him that same look, as if there was more she was trying to say.

""...The Rainlords don't have any available reapers, if that's what you're getting at,"" he said.

""Hmm."" She looked away, then promptly looked back at him again.

And again, he understood without explanation. ""I... don't think the Sandlords have any available, either. But I suppose I could check..."

""It would not be ideal if the reaper has divided loyalties,"" said the Queen, ""but if it cannot be helped, then so be it. As long as it is a division between allies, then I suppose it would suffice. Assuming the reaper is trustworthy, of course. I would want to meet them. Several times, in fact, before any commitment is made.""

""You're talking like it's already been decided..."

The Queen breathed a slight laugh. ""True. I have been thinking about it for a while, I suppose, so my mind is already made up. Do you think Amelia might have a problem with it?"

Now there was a question. As much as he might've liked to think that becoming a servant was all upsides and no downsides, he knew that wasn't quite true. Even assuming they could find a reliable reaper--which was a big assumption--the Madame Cathrace might not love the idea of letting herself be killed as part of the process.

That would be like the ultimate trust exercise. And it wouldn't be terribly unreasonable if she didn't want to go through with it, he felt.

""I honestly don't know,"" said Hector. ""And, uh... I'm not really sure how I would broach the subject with her, either..."

""I do not mind doing it,"" said the Queen.

Somehow, he wasn't surprised by that."

"2878

~~Christmas Day Special - (page 8 of 24)~~

Their conversation continued for a short while longer as they discussed the bank's potential expansion into Lorent. By the end of it, though, Hector still wasn't entirely sure what to think. The only thing that was clear was that the Queen didn't exactly love the idea, but she wasn't trying to forbid him from doing it, either.

Maybe she could tell that he wouldn't be very happy if she just came right out and told him no. Or maybe she felt that that would be overreach on her part.

Frankly, he wasn't sure what he would've done if she had forbidden him from expanding. He didn't want to go against the Queen, obviously, but he also didn't want to let down his investors, especially the Rainlords. And her authority didn't extend to Lorent. If she'd acted like it did, then... well, maybe it would still be justified since he was one of her subjects.

Hmm.

In any event, once they they were done talking, Hector considered returning to Riverton Hall with the Queen. Technically, there were plenty of things he could discuss there with various Lorentian officials. It wouldn't be a wasted trip, and he had made the journey all the way here to the capital, already.

In fact, that was part of the reason why he'd let Abbas leave first. In the back of his mind, he'd intended to remain with the Queen and hitch a ride back to Atreya with her.

But all of a sudden, he couldn't help feeling like none of the encounters at Riverton Hall were particularly pressing. The only thing that seemed truly urgent right now was the Forge. He very much wanted to go meet up with Abbas again and see if he'd discovered anything new yet.

Perhaps that was a silly notion. He and the Queen had only talked for an hour so.

But he decided to go for it, anyway. Besides, he wanted to try out some new things with his materialization on the way back."

"2879

~~Christmas Day Special - (page 9 of 24)~~

Knowing a thing or two of aerial combat now, Hector felt like his flight capabilities were significantly lacking. Sure, he'd managed to stabilize it since first coming up with the technique, but it was far too slow to be useful in a real fight. He'd certainly learned that lesson the hard way. Having to ping pong himself through the air in that battle at the border had not been ideal. If not for the Scarf enhancing his spatial awareness beyond normal means, that strategy would have been useless.

He needed to develop greater speed and control.

And seeing the mechanized armor of the Sunsmith in action again was making him think that perhaps he didn't need the little ""hovering pod"" that he was previously using to fly. Even if it was stable, it was obviously unwieldy and not very aerodynamic.

But if he could integrate his flying technique directly into his armor... that might open up a world of possibilities for him, Hector felt.

How to do it, though? He had an idea, but frankly, he wasn't entirely sure it was possible.

The basic principle of the hovering technique was to create a constantly-rematerializing ""cradle"" below a static iron platform for himself to stand on. The static component was key, since he couldn't very well stand on a platform that was constantly moving.

...But could he wear armor that was constantly moving? It wasn't like he would slide out of it while he was completely covered.

It might rip the flesh off his bones, though. If it was moving was enough to counter gravity, then that probably wouldn't tickle, he imagined.

He was tempted to give it a try, just to see how bad it would be. Maybe it would be surprisingly okay.

Ultimately, though, he decided against that. The more reasonable solution seemed to be in utilizing layers, just as the hovering technique normally did. A static inner armor with a gravity-counteracting outer armor.

With that idea in his head, he sat on a big hovering platform at the edge of the city and took a long, deep breath.

Oh, boy, these first attempts with experimental new techniques never went well, did they? And his whole body was going to be wrapped up in this one."

"2880

~~Christmas Day Special - (page 10 of 24)~~

He told Garovel to keep his distance while he tried this out. The last thing he wanted was to accidentally hurt the reaper somehow.

For the outer layer, he decided to keep things simple. It didn't need to be as complexly fitted together and interlocking as his static armor. That would've just made it needlessly difficult to maintain its constantly-moving form. Plus, it would probably reduce air resistance more if it was simplistically shaped.

And so, he began to create the outer layer. It melted into existence around him, smooth and already moving while stationary. It coated his entire armor, save only for the eye slit and a small hole at the neck for the Scarf of Amordiin to fit through.

When he dematerialized the hovering platform beneath him, Hector half-expected to drop like a stone. But he didn't. He stayed in the air. The coating was working.

The scraping against the static layer was intense, however. It was even louder than he'd thought it would be. Metal grinding against metal--but it was all around him, becoming almost like the roar of an engine but more piercing. Not to mention, the vibrations that the technique sent throughout his body were their own kind of disorienting.

For a time, he just hovered there, trying to give himself time to acclimate. If he concentrated, perhaps he could dull the noise--in his mind, at least, if not in reality.

And he had a thought. Maybe he could use that thing Emiliana had told him about here. Sto. A ""storage state"" technique of the mind.

While he couldn't place the actual noise into storage in his mind, maybe he could place his perception of that noise in there. To isolate it. And numb himself to it. To make it so that the only way for him consciously hear it was if he concentrated on it."

"2881

~~Christmas Day Special - (page 11 of 24)~~

It worked surprisingly well. And easily. That was probably another benefit of Focus, he felt. In fact, it was so easy that Hector had a feeling that he wasn't even utilizing Sto properly. Instead, he might've just shoved the noise perception into a background thought process and ignored it. That probably wasn't how this sophisticated ""state of altered consciousness"" stuff was supposed to work.

But hey, if it did the trick, it did the trick. He didn't see much point in agonizing over it right now, especially during an experiment.

He focused on his work. The vibrations from the scraping were an interesting aspect of it. The grinding along the top side of his armor was not nearly as strong as the grinding along the bottom side. Which made sense, he realized. The bottom was serving as a ""cradle,"" going against gravity and holding the weight of his entire body plus the static armor, whereas the top side had basically no pressure being applied to it at all.

He'd had to take all of that into account when creating the outer layer in the first place, of course. If he gave both sides the same amount of force, then either top would float away or the bottom wouldn't be able to hold his weight.

So in a way, these scraping vibrations were helpful. If he paid close attention to them, he could literally feel the difference between the pressure being applied to the bottom side and top. Perhaps, then, he could use that as a kind of gauge. If the difference in the vibrations were to grow too great, then that would probably be a bad thing, right? So maybe it could serve as a good warning mechanism for the overall balance of this technique."

"2882

~~Christmas Day Special - (page 12 of 24)~~

He tried to keep that in mind as he began to make the outer layer move. He started off slow, wanting to get a feel for things. The vibrations shifted along with him, grinding slightly differently as they pushed the static armor horizontally through the air.

Hmm. Pretty manageable so far. The different angles of force that needed to be applied simultaneously were a bit tricky, but he wasn't struggling. It was just new to him.

Time to ramp up the speed, then. He angled himself downward like a missile in order to reduce air drag, gathered his concentration, and sent himself flying.

The canopy of trees below were rushing past now. And the Scarf was telling him all about the buffeting winds around him.

Yeah, that was better. Pretty fast. He was already moving more quickly than he'd ever gotten on that hovering pod thing.

The vibrations were significantly different, too. They were weaker on the bottom than he expected, and now he was starting to gain altitude without meaning to. Those trees were getting smaller pretty quickly.

But he could adjust. He just had to pay attention to the angles of vibration. Lighten the application of force below. Simple.

Alright. Cool.

...Hmm, this was going a little too smoothly. He was almost disappointed. It was still a little nerve-racking, but eh. Obviously, he'd been through a lot worse.

How fast could he really go, he wondered?

In theory, he should've been able to fly just as fast as he had been able to ping pong himself around before. Those giant boulders had been utilizing velocity states, which were still the underlying principle of this mobile outer layer. Same basic concept, just being applied differently. And constantly.

He wanted to see what would happen. It was dangerous, of course, but. Welp. Benefits of being undead.

He punched it. He made the outer layer around his feet and legs push him as hard as could manage.

And he soared."
"2883 -- CCLIII.

~~Christmas Day Special - (page 13 of 24)~~

Again, he found himself gaining altitude unintentionally and had to compensate. That was going to be a reoccurring issue, wasn't it? He'd have to keep that in mind.

But this speed. It was exhilarating. Going this fast through the open air, with the whole wide world stretched out below him? It was like a dream.

Was this really his top speed, though? He kinda doubted it.

What if he just kept applying that same force over and over again? Would he keep accelerating? And how was his control? He'd just been going in a straight line this whole time, but obviously, that wasn't going to do the trick in an actual fight.

He decided to try banking left.

Holy fuck, everything went wrong at once.

Turbulence, vibrations out of balance, losing altitude.

He tried to compensate and overcorrected. The turbulence made it too difficult to tell what the right balance was, and he ended up zooming almost straight up--which he had to correct again, only now it was even worse.

Then the outer layer began coming apart, breaking away from him in chunks that went sailing off in their own directions. And with his thoughts disorganized, his concentration disrupted, and iron flying haphazardly all around him, Hector began to enter freefall and saw the forest quickly rising up to meet him.

And he only managed to hold on to one cogent sentiment as all of that was happening.

Yep. This seemed about right.

Chapter Two Hundred Fifty-Three: 'That which eludes Knowing...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Abbas had never seen anything like it. Even the Earth Cruncher didn't truly compare. They were only similar in the most superficial of ways.

He wished he had more to contrast it with, but he'd only heard of others, never gotten close to them. He'd actually been hoping to change that soon, what with the Vanguard having grown so eager to win his favor. In time, he was sure that he would have finally been able to gain access to their famed Golden Hour in Intar."

"2883 -- CCLIII.

~~Christmas Day Special - (page 13 of 24)~~

Again, he found himself gaining altitude unintentionally and had to compensate. That was going to be a reoccurring issue, wasn't it? He'd have to keep that in mind.

But this speed. It was exhilarating. Going this fast through the open air, with the whole wide world stretched out below him? It was like a dream.

Was this really his top speed, though? He kinda doubted it.

What if he just kept applying that same force over and over again? Would he keep accelerating? And how was his control? He'd just been going in a straight line this whole time, but obviously, that wasn't going to do the trick in an actual fight.

He decided to try banking left.

Holy fuck, everything went wrong at once.

Turbulence, vibrations out of balance, losing altitude.

He tried to compensate and overcorrected. The turbulence made it too difficult to tell what the right balance was, and he ended up zooming almost straight up--which he had to correct again, only now it was even worse.

Then the outer layer began coming apart, breaking away from him in chunks that went sailing off in their own directions. And with his thoughts disorganized, his concentration disrupted, and iron flying haphazardly all around him, Hector began to enter freefall and saw the forest quickly rising up to meet him.

And he only managed to hold on to one cogent sentiment as all of that was happening.

Yep. This seemed about right.

Chapter Two Hundred Fifty-Three: 'That which eludes Knowing...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Abbas had never seen anything like it. Even the Earth Cruncher didn't truly compare. They were only similar in the most superficial of ways.

He wished he had more to contrast it with, but he'd only heard of others, never gotten close to them. He'd actually been hoping to change that soon, what with the Vanguard having grown so eager to win his favor. In time, he was sure that he would have finally been able to gain access to their famed Golden Hour in Intar."

"2884

~~Christmas Day Special - (page 14 of 24)~~

They had always protected that thing with an absolutely absurd level of paranoia, due in no small part to that blasted Magician of theirs. By all accounts, that man had been guarding their only Forge like a jealous housewife for nearly two centuries now.

And for what? What technology did the Vanguard have to show for all that effort? What had the Magician come up with that was so vital to their enterprise?

Perhaps they were keeping that, too, a secret, but Abbas doubted it. More likely to him was that this so-called Magician of Light was, in truth, incompetent and arrogant. How the man had convinced the Vanguardian leadership that he should be the one to look after the Golden Hour, Abbas could only imagine.

But it was the world that had been suffering as a result of such foolishness.

Meanwhile, Morgunov was obviously making great strides with his own work. There was little doubt in Abbas' mind that the Mad Demon had a new Forge of his own and was using it to create these mechanical nightmares. Either that, or his old one, the Cauldron of Chaos, had not been truly destroyed during the Jungle Wars like the rumors had said.

Supposedly, Sermung himself had put an end to it, so Abbas was inclined to believe that was the truth. Sixty years was certainly enough time for Morgunov to have created a new Forge for himself.

Hmph. Abbas remembered overhearing some of the younger servants in the Golden Fort discussing Morgunov's absence from the world stage over the last few decades. They dared to hope that he might have grown tired of waging war or become otherwise indisposed permanently.

Abbas couldn't fault them for their youth and inexperience, he supposed. But there had never been any doubt in his mind that the Mad Demon was working on something this whole time. More than just one thing, most likely.

He didn't even want to imagine what other horrors that madman was waiting to unleash. He had a feeling that Uego had just been a taste of what Morgunov had in store for them."

"2885

~~Christmas Day Special - (page 15 of 24)~~

In any event, with the way the war was going, Abbas felt that there was little chance of him being allowed access to the Golden Hour now. He hoped that someone would be able to do something with it, though. Anyone, so long as they weren't with Abolish, would do.

Forges were too important to be left idle and unused. In the right hands, they had the power to enact incredible change in the world. For good or ill.

As far he knew, there were only six Forges in the world--and that was counting the one in front of him now. Perhaps there were more, squirreled away and lost to history like this one, but he doubted it. They were simply too highly sought after.

How many wars had been fought over these objects, he wondered? It was hard to say. Even with reapers constantly watching, so much had still been forgotten to the ravages of time. And oftentimes, the self-appointed stewards of remembrance were themselves secretive.

Abbas had visited the Prime Archivers in Luugh multiple times for this very reason. If anyone could help him learn more about Forges that had been lost or destroyed, it would be them. Theoretically.

He had never met a more uncooperative group of reapers. They weren't ""hostile,"" exactly, but they refused to aid him in his search and demanded exorbitant payment each time he visited.

It had been many years since his last trip, but even after double-checking with Worwal, he did not recall ever reading about a Forge that matched this one's description. A giant glass orb in the heart of a giant tree.

Assuming that really was glass.

It seemed to be, but looks could be very deceiving when it came to Forges. Or so he had read.

He took a deep breath and pressed his bare hand against it." "2886

~~Christmas Day Special - (page 16 of 24)~~

He partly expected the world to erupt into fire around him or for his mind to be assaulted by a tidal wave of ardor. That would have at least given him something to work with.

But it was silent. Still.

Not quite dead, though.

The tree would not be alive if that were the case. It was deeply connected to the Forge, though he was not yet sure how. Was it drawing life from the Forge's dormant power? Or was its life force sustaining the Forge? Perhaps a bit of both? Mutualism would be an interesting strategy to employ in the creation of such a thing.

He wished he knew who had made it. In terms of historically famous integrators, there could not have been many candidates. Hamenszoon was likely still too recent, so perhaps someone like Unso or Skapa. But then again, if someone that famous had been its creator, then how could it have ended up here, abandoned?

He was just guessing, of course, but it seemed more plausible to him that this Forge had been created by a so-called ""secret emperor."" That was, someone who held the requisite level of power but never revealed it.

It was difficult to know how many such people had existed throughout history. Some reapers argued that none did, that it was simply impossible to keep such might secret for long. And he could see the logic in that. But he'd also read accounts of past emperors being bested by completely unknown warriors. Unso, for example, had been slain by a cabbage farmer, of all things, when the emperor tried to seize his land from him.

That account had read like something out of a mythic legend, though Abbas had since met several reapers who swore up and down that it was true."

"2887

~~Christmas Day Special - (page 17 of 24)~~

However, what became of that cabbage farmer was still a matter of dispute. Some argued that his anonymity was destroyed by that event and that he went on to be known by the much more famous name of Ferrico, another emperor of that Age.

Others claimed that the cabbage farmer was actually Unso's rival, Isaac, in disguise and that the whole affair had been a ruse in order for Isaac to get close enough to Unso to kill him.

And still others said that it was all some sort of cosmic fluke, that the cabbage farmer somehow killed Unso's reaper without even realizing it and that afterwards, the farmer was himself killed by ambitious upstarts seeking to make a name for themselves by slaying the man who had brought down an emperor.

For his part, Abbas leaned more toward the first theory. While it did seem difficult to keep such incredible power concealed, he wasn't convinced that it would be impossible, especially if one had centuries to devote toward that quieting effort.

It did make him wonder what sleeping giants might exist in the modern world, however. And what would it take to stir them?

A continental war, perhaps?

Hmph. He was letting himself get distracted. He tried to focus on what was in front of him.

This Forge was all that mattered, right now. He needed to let everything else melt away.

He kept his hand pressed against the glass and closed his eyes.

The art of sensing ardor was a strange thing. On the one hand, it was as obvious as soul power. Any reaper or sufficiently aged servant could detect it. But on the other hand, there were many subtle complexities to ardor that were lost on those who had not actively worked with it for years.

Ardor. The so-called ""planet force."" The Earth Cruncher had not utilized it, but this one clearly did. He could sense its presence all throughout the base that the giant orb rested upon."

"2888

~~Christmas Day Special - (page 18 of 24)~~

This would be tricky, Abbas knew. He had to do something that was generally considered incredibly stupid by integrators.

He had to begin the process of fusing his own consciousness with a material object. In this case, the Forge.

For reasons that were perhaps very obvious, the use of this technique was greatly discouraged. A sufficiently terrible mistake at this stage might mean trapping himself in this Forge for all eternity--or at least until Worwal decided to take mercy on him and release his soul.

Abbas was confident that wouldn't happen, though. Mostly confident.

Dolf Rachman had taught him of this method. With normal objects, the fusion of the consciousness was a supremely stupid and pointless activity. There was nothing to be gained, other than the potential loss of one's own body.

It was akin to walking a narrow ledge across the side of a cliff. The balance and skill required to do it were technically achievable, but the risk was so great--and the reward, so small--that there was little point in learning.

When it came to soul-infused or ardor-infused objects, however, this that was not the case. One could discover any number of useful things about the object in question while dancing at the edge of brain death.

The trick, of course, was to not actually fuse his consciousness with the Forge, to hold himself back just enough so that he could catch a glimpse of the true nature of the thing.

He wanted to find its name. With the name, he would probably be able to unlock other bits of dormant information. The name was like a key in that way. Or the first in a line of dominoes, perhaps. It depended on how one wished to conceptualize it.

Which was an important aspect to this whole thing, by the way. His chosen method of conceptualization of this process would affect the clarity of his searching ability. If he didn't maintain a strong grasp on what he was doing and why, it would not work. Or it would just take an incredibly long time."

"2889

~~Christmas Day Special - (page 19 of 24)~~

As he pressed himself more deeply into the Forge, he had to be careful. Getting a good, clear look at the ardor therein was the goal, but that was also where the temptation lay. Go too fast, stretch too far, lose concentration, and this slumbering beast would swallow him whole before he even realized what had happened.

Or at least, that was how Dolf had described it. Abbas wasn't terribly keen to find out how accurate that had been.

The ardor was there. Just at the edge of sight. If it was possible to squint with one's mind's eye, then that was what he was doing now. Strain to see. To understand.

What was your name, damn you? If you recalled that much, then there was a fair chance that you were still operational. If not, then... well, this was going to get a lot more complicated.

He lost time. Hours, maybe. There was a moderate chance that time was simply flowing differently in this strange space. If he hadn't been relying on his own body as a tether back to reality, he would have known even less. Days or even months could have transpired without his knowledge. Years. Decades.

Time might've become little more than an illusion in this place. Hell, for all he knew, it could've started going in circles.

It was confounding, to be sure. But the distortion of time was almost certainly a factor in how objects like these were able to keep memories within them, Abbas knew. Such fleeting pieces of information would normally be lost to time's arrow. But here, it could be preserved. The steady march of entropy could be held at bay. For a while, at least.

How long that ""while"" might be--well, that was anybody's guess. How long could a Forge last before eroding to dust? If left alone, perhaps these things had the potential to outlast humanity. Ardor was the fuel of the planet, after all. The relevant time scale could have been approaching the cosmic for these bad boys.

Shame they usually ended up obliterated long before nature could run its course."

"2890

~~Christmas Day Special - (page 20 of 24)~~

Slowly, the ardor at the edge of his senses was becoming clearer. He tried to press onward, to ""move closer,"" but it was a deceptive process. He couldn't expect the desired change to be immediate or even obvious. It would appear when it appeared. Hopefully.

To perceive memory, he would first need to perceive the ardor's flow. Information was often found within disturbances there, sometimes referred to as ""whirlpools"" or ""knots."" Without a clear view of that flow, they might as well have been invisible.

Oh, goodness. Yes, the ardor was coming into focus.

But there was so much here.

He'd expected a lake, but this was a sea.

Just how old was this thing? Had it been created this way? Or had it been accumulating ardor over time? Already, this seemed to dwarf the amount of soul power that had existed within the Earth Cruncher.

That didn't necessarily mean it was more powerful, however. With a machine of creation, what truly mattered was the creative potential that had been poured into it--and the skill of the person who hoped to use it, of course.

...But yes, this was surprising. Why was there so much? And it was so dense, too. Streams layered upon streams, so close together that they almost appeared to be flowing through each other.

Almost. Because, of course, that was impossible. If the flow was disrupted to such an extent, the ardor would clash and begin to leak, eventually dissipating.

This was simply a masterful use of space. The efficiency with which these flows had been pressed so closely together--Abbas had to admire the craftsmanship. If he survived long enough and reached the point where he could create a Forge of his own, he would have to remember this technique.

Unfortunately, this density was also going to make his search more difficult. Oh, and gods forbid if he had to make repairs. That already sounded like a nightmare."

"2891

~~Christmas Day Special - (page 21 of 24)~~

Hmm. But looking at the quality of the ardor's flow, the Forge seemed to be in rather good condition. He couldn't spot any major breaks or diversions--no ""hemorrhaging,"" as it were.

He had a feeling there were many smaller ""bleeds"" going on elsewhere, though. He would have to inspect the Forge with a fine tooth comb before he dared to try and reactivate it.

Which was a whole other problem--and an even more dangerous one, in fact. Right now, he was just searching for the name in order to help him comprehend what this thing was truly capable of. If and when the time came to actually turn the Forge back ""on,"" that was when the real fireworks would happen.

The kind of fireworks that could kill him and Worwal in the blink of an eye. That was why it was so important to ensure that repairs had been done properly before trying to flip that metaphorical switch. Worst-case scenario, the Forge would explode and leave a city-sized crater behind.

Admittedly, that possibility seemed quite unlikely--and not just because he was confident in his ability to do everything correctly. This Forge had a gentleness to it. An explosion would be ""out of character"" for it, he felt. If it were to destroy itself, it would probably go some other way. Ah, an implosion perhaps.

It could still suck him and Worwal in, though. And they would still be just as dead.

His search continued for what felt like a long while. He could sense many tiny knots in the ardor's flow, but without the name, they were all but impossible to read. Perhaps Dolf could have done something with them at this stage, but alas, he could not.

The name, the name. Where could it be? He sincerely hoped it had one. If it didn't, then he was searching this entire sea for nothing.

Agh."
"2892

~~Christmas Day Special - (page 22 of 24)~~

He could feel his consciousness slipping. This frustration wasn't doing him any favors. The tether was weakening. He had to pull himself out before the risk became unacceptable.

So he did.

His eyes opened, and his hand came away from the glass. And he felt his own body again. Breath in his lungs. Flesh and bone wrapped around his soul.

He gave a long, tired sigh.

This wasn't going to be easy, was it?

After a few moments of allowing his thoughts and emotions to settle, he moved to press his hand against the glass again.

But halfway, he stopped himself.

Perhaps he needed to rethink his approach. There was far more ardor in this machine--if it could even be called that--than he had expected. At this rate, searching for the name could take days, weeks, or even months. Hell, maybe longer. He didn't really know how deep the ardor was, yet.

He looked around the chamber. It wasn't just the Forge in here. This place was obviously some kind of ancient workshop. Hector and his associates may have already inspected it from top to bottom, but perhaps it would be prudent to give it a look himself. They said they hadn't found the name in any of those books over there, and he believed them, but there could still be useful clues therein.

Honestly, he didn't know what he was looking for. He had a faint hope that something he learned would help him to locate the name when he dove back into the ardor. Some kind of historical context, maybe?

He couldn't read the language that these books were written in, but fortunately, Worwal could.

So they set to work--Worwal reading, Abbas turning pages. He counted twelve books on this shelf, and perhaps another ten or so on a different shelf by the door.

But if he had to sit here and let Worwal read every single one of them, cover to cover, then he would."

"2893

~~Christmas Day Special - (page 23 of 24)~~

This was why he'd tried to start with the Forge, first. Going through all of these texts was obviously going to take ages, but there'd been a chance, at least, he could have learned what he needed from the Forge right away.

A shame.

At least he could relax his mind a little while he let the reaper read. The strain of that dive through the ardor was probably not something he should ignore--even if he'd been about to do just that. He could handle another two or three dives, most likely, before requiring real rest.

Meditation was a fair substitute, though.

Or it would have been, if he didn't have so much trouble settling his thoughts.

Even at his age, with all his experience, he still encountered this problem, sometimes. His younger self would probably have expected to grow out of this by now. But worries only ever seemed to grow with age. And power.

What would become of his kin? That nagging question lay at the root of every concern that crossed his mind.

Before this war had come to their doorstep, Abbas had harbored an idea. It was an absurd notion at this state in time, far beyond his or Haqq's ability to achieve. But if he'd pushed for it more, if he'd worked harder... then perhaps they wouldn't have had to flee from their homes. Perhaps they wouldn't have had to suffer such disgrace--or not to this extent, at least.

It wouldn't have stopped Morgunov, most likely. But it might have stopped his horde of madmen.

This armor. Creating copies of it, lesser ones if need be. That was the idea.

That had always been the ultimate goal when designing it: to one day make it usable by much younger servants. Or perhaps, dare he imagine it, even non-servants.

The Mudarra'un--or the Armored, in Mohssian. An entirely new warrior class. An elite group of soldiers, trained in the use of his armor."
"2894

~~Christmas Day Special - (page 24 of 24)~~

It was a long-held dream, one that he'd gone back and forth on over the last twenty or so years. Sometimes, it seemed entirely achievable. Other times, he chastised himself for not staying focused on more realistic goals.

Just creating the prototype suit had been so incredibly laborious. And it still wasn't even done. Rather, it felt like a constant project, always tweaking, always refining. A slow crawl toward strength.

He may have achieved victory over Ivan, but he knew only too well how close it had been. That was a victory with an asterisk next to it.

Obviously, not every suit needed to be as powerful as this one, but at the end of the day, what was more important? Creating the Mudarra'un or continuing to improve upon the prototype?

Ideally, he would be able to do both. Pragmatically, he knew that to be impossible.

He had hoped that perhaps this Forge would be able to change that, but now he was more uncertain than ever about that possibility. Given its apparent age, there was absolutely zero chance that the creator had intended for it to be used on machinery.

That might be a problem.

Or it might not.

And worrying about it was making his stomach turn.

He took a moment to steady his mind, to quell his emotions. That was all anxiety was, ultimately. An emotion. A persistent one, perhaps, but an emotion, nonetheless.

First and foremost, he was a man of rationality. To calmly assess every situation, to think everything through as much as time allowed--that was the ideal that he had always striven to achieve.

That was another lesson that he had taken from Dolf--though not by Dolf's design. That man, in so very many ways, had been the furthest thing from rational. True, he did have his moments of it--and Abbas had been supremely relieved whenever they occurred--but those who knew Dolf would have certainly characterized his life as one of constant, fiery passion.

Until it had been snuffed out, that was."
"2895

Abbas admired his mentor for many reasons, but that was not one.

And Dolf had known that, too.

""That's good,"" the man had once told him. ""That's how it should be. You are my apprentice, not my clone. A copycat is never as good as the original. So take what I have to teach, and then pursue further knowledge in your own way."" And he'd laughed. ""Who knows? Maybe one day, my accomplishments will look quaint compared to yours!""

Abbas remembered thinking, at the time, that he'd been sarcastic in saying that last part. But now, all these years later, and after having had a couple apprentices of his own, Abbas felt differently.

As a teacher, the idea that his students might one day achieve wondrous or remarkable feats--that was one of the most appealing thoughts in the world.

Dolf hadn't been joking, Abbas had come to believe.

Somehow, that seemed more relevant than ever.

It had been some time since Abbas felt that familiar burn of ambition within himself. As a young man, it had been there all the time. A constant pressure to prove himself to his elders and his peers.

When had that changed, exactly? The slow grinding of age had whittled him down, it seemed. He might've liked to think of it as ""growing,"" but was that really so? Was it growth when the motivation deep within one's soul had diminished so greatly?

Hmm.

Perhaps the gods were giving him another chance. If he allowed it to, perhaps this Forge could reawaken his ambitions from all those years ago.

Heh. He felt like such an old man.

A thud arrived from outside, heavy enough that he could feel the ground tremble briefly beneath his feet. He stood up to go take a look, while still holding onto the book in his hands and turning pages for Worwal.

He opened the primitive wooden door and saw Hector there in the distance, standing in the middle of an elongated crater."

"2896

What in the world was he doing, Abbas wondered? Had he just arrived? It looked like a meteorite had struck the field.

Not the most graceful of landings, apparently.

Come to think of it, though, he had not actually seen Hector flying during that last battle--unless he was feeling extremely generous with the term ""flying,"" perhaps.

Abbas just stood there in the doorway, turning pages absentmindedly as he watched Hector hobble closer.

Broken a few bones, eh?

Ah.

Abbas was beginning to get the picture.

It was true that Abbas hadn't quite gotten a clear understanding of the young Atreyan lord's strength, but he also hadn't given it much thought, either. The boy had saved his life. And finished off the Man of Crows.

Could that have really all been a fluke? He hadn't thought so.

Now, though?

Hmm.

Perhaps.

And not terribly difficult to believe, either. It would not be the first time that Abbas had seen a young servant best a much older one through little more than good fortune.

But from everything else that he had seen thus far, there was obviously still more to this young man than just luck. The Lord of Warrenhold? Encountering Rasalased? The strangeness of his power? A nest of Wrobels at his disposal? And a Fusion Forge, too?

He would have been a fool to dismiss all of that as luck, too.

No. There was, at the very least, a certain... grit to this young man. It was difficult to describe, having known him for so short a time.

He would have to pay closer attention in the future, Abbas decided.

Hector's composure improved as he got closer, until he finally zoomed the rest of the way and landed gently in front of Abbas.

""Learn anything yet?"" the young man said, ever so slightly out of breath."

"2897

For a moment, Abbas just gave him a look. He shifted his gaze back to the crater in the distance, then back to Hector. ""...Are you alright?""

The boy was keeping his armor on for some reason. ""Oh, uh, yeah. I'm fine. I was just, er... experimenting with my ability a little and, uh..."" He threw a glance back toward the crater, too. ""I'm still working out the kinks. You know how it is, I'm sure.""

Mm. Indeed he did know. A fair explanation, he supposed.

He decided to let the matter drop. Whatever the truth was, Hector most likely did not wish to appear weak in front of him. That was probably why he wasn't removing his armor. If he'd really been ""experimenting,"" then his clothes might very well be soaked in his own blood, right now. And considering how long he'd taken to shamle out that crater for using his materialization to carry himself closer, he'd probably been trying to buy time for himself to finish regenerating.

Fair enough. Abbas couldn't fault him for caring so much about appearances. Any leader needed to be aware of such things. Abbas and Worwal were not the only ones here, after all. A handful of his family members were waiting by the car and probably saw that little display, too.

""Unfortunately, progress has been slow,"" said Abbas, turning to go sit back down. Worwal asked him privately to turn the page again, and he did so. ""And I suspect it will be for some time.""

""I see,"" said Hector. Garovel phased through his armor as he closed the door behind him. ""Is there anything I can do to help?""

""Thank you for the offer, but I am afraid not.""

""Are you sure? Anything at all? I could bring someone here to assist you, if you want. Haqq Najir, maybe?""

""Haqq should remain focused on my armor until its repairs are complete,"" said Abbas. He eyed the Forge again. ""And this... well, let's just leave it at that, shall we?""

"2898

""Alright,"" said Hector, ""but is there anyone else? Literally, anyone you can think of. If they're trustworthy and could help, then I'll do my best to bring them here for you, even if I have to go halfway around the world.""

Something about the boldness of that statement made Abbas want to tease him. ""Perhaps Xixa would be of some use. I hear she is quite good at keeping things to herself.""

Hector paused at that, his expression unreadable, but Garovel spoke up in his stead.

'Yes, I'm sure the Goddess of Secrets would be very helpful. If she existed. Or are you saying you know where we can find her?'

""I'm afraid not,"" said Abbas, exhaling half a laugh. ""And while there might be plenty of individuals out there who could assist me, I do not think it worth the risk. As you said, Hector, trustworthiness is a key factor. But Forges are so highly prized that someone whom I currently believe to be trustworthy might soon discover the motivation for betrayal upon seeing it.""

Hector frowned but bobbed his head to the side a little, as if acknowledging the strength of his point.

""I am certain that I will be able to revive it,"" said Abbas. Which wasn't entirely true. He was certain that he would either do it or die trying, at least, but that wasn't something that he wanted to admit. Not even to Worwal. ""I only need time.""

The Lord of Warrenhold stepped closer. ""You'll have all you need.""

Hmm. He did have a way of saying comforting things, didn't he? Why was that, exactly? Something in his tone? In his expression, maybe? Abbas couldn't quite put his finger on it.

""By the way,"" Hector went on after a time, ""there was something I wanted to ask you. What are your thoughts on building a castle around the Forge?""

Abbas blinked."

"2899 -- CCLIV.

Chapter Two Hundred Fifty-Four: 'The Roar of Old...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

The Eternal Storm was even more ferocious than he'd heard. The raging winds, the skewering hail, the earth-shaking thunder. It was small wonder why everyone avoided the Dáinnbolg. Even if all the feldeaths disappeared tomorrow, it wouldn't revive this dead continent unless this storm was somehow quelled.

A gargantuan figure stood in the darkness, barely visible until lightning flashed across the sky and briefly illuminated it.

A tall, narrow building, it was. It looked like it reached all the way up into the dark, long-hanging clouds above, though he couldn't quite tell that for sure from here on the ground.

""This must be the place. It looks just like the voice said it would.""

Caster Egmond had no idea what he was doing here. How in the world had he let Paulie talk him into this nonsense? Not only was this going to be a gigantic waste of time, it had already proven to be an insanely dangerous waste of time.

They'd been on Exoltha less than a day, and yet within that brief span of time, Caster had seen more feldeaths with his own two eyes than in the rest of his life combined.

They were everywhere. Even now, he counted five of them on the horizon. Hulking, ethereal reptiles of various sorts. Some with huge shells like turtles, others looking more like dinosaurs. Some had twenty limbs or more. All had eyes that burned with white flames, and beams of black and white energy frequently spewed from their mouths as they attacked each other.

That was the only reason the two of them were still alive, Caster felt. Most of the feldeaths were more concerned with fighting one another than with them.

They'd certainly had a few close calls, though. Paulie was missing his right arm, and half of Caster's face was scorched black and still stinging."

"2899 -- CCLIV.

Chapter Two Hundred Fifty-Four: 'The Roar of Old...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

The Eternal Storm was even more ferocious than he'd heard. The raging winds, the skewering hail, the earth-shaking thunder. It was small wonder why everyone avoided the Dáinnbolg. Even if all the feldeaths disappeared tomorrow, it wouldn't revive this dead continent unless this storm was somehow quelled.

A gargantuan figure stood in the darkness, barely visible until lightning flashed across the sky and briefly illuminated it.

A tall, narrow building, it was. It looked like it reached all the way up into the dark, long-hanging clouds above, though he couldn't quite tell that for sure from here on the ground.

""This must be the place. It looks just like the voice said it would.""

Caster Egmond had no idea what he was doing here. How in the world had he let Paulie talk him into this nonsense? Not only was this going to be a gigantic waste of time, it had already proven to be an insanely dangerous waste of time.

They'd been on Exoltha less than a day, and yet within that brief span of time, Caster had seen more feldeaths with his own two eyes than in the rest of his life combined.

They were everywhere. Even now, he counted five of them on the horizon. Hulking, ethereal reptiles of various sorts. Some with huge shells like turtles, others looking more like dinosaurs. Some had twenty limbs or more. All had eyes that burned with white flames, and beams of black and white energy frequently spewed from their mouths as they attacked each other.

That was the only reason the two of them were still alive, Caster felt. Most of the feldeaths were more concerned with fighting one another than with them.

They'd certainly had a few close calls, though. Paulie was missing his right arm, and half of Caster's face was scorched black and still stinging."

"2900

They didn't have access to regeneration, either, because neither of them had wanted to tell their reapers where they were going, much less bring them along. If they both ended up dead, then well, their reapers would realize eventually.

Kalikos occasionally checked in on him, and Caster had to act like everything was fine, like he wasn't staring death in the face and trying not to blink first.

They'd told the reapers that they were going on a training retreat deep into the Otoron Mountains in Calthos. The reapers didn't come with them because, technically, their respective sects were still on duty. The extra respite that they had been granted after the victory over Sair was conditional. They could still be called back to fight at any time, so the reapers needed to stay behind in order to alert them if such orders arrived.

All things considered, the timing was rather convenient--which was perhaps how Paulie had managed to convince him. After all, if they didn't go now, then who could say when another opportunity would present itself? This war seemed like it could go on for a long while. Even if the lingering fighting in Sair died down completely, they would doubtless be sent to a new front within a week; and if they got separated, then it would become that much more difficult to coordinate a little excursion like this.

What utter madness.

He just had to keep reminding himself that he was undead. He didn't actually have to worry about being killed here.

Probably.

He did recall a few old rumors that some feldeaths could, in fact, kill you permanently even if your reaper wasn't present, but those were just rumors, he was fairly sure. They'd never been confirmed. Which they would've been, if they were true.

...Right?

Yes, of course they would've. The eggheads in Research loved that kind of stuff. They wouldn't have looked into it and told everyone all about it. Or maybe Morgunov himself would've.

Definitely.

An even-larger-than-usual explosion in the distance made him turn and stare."

"2901

"We should hurry inside," said Paulie, "before more hail arrives." He didn't wait for Caster and ran ahead.

It was true. The kid wasn't looking so great. His clothes were in tatters, and apart from his missing arm, he was also covered in blood, having been skewered by hail on several occasions. Caster had been able to protect him from a lot of it but not all, especially when the hail whipped around in the wind and attacked from the different angles.

Caster's own attire was still mostly fine, though. A bit of soul-strengthening applied to the cloth was all it took to prevent it from being shredded. Alas, he hadn't thought to do the same for Paulie's clothes until it was a bit too late.

If they'd known more about what they would be facing, they might've brought some soul-strengthened hazmat suits. The time crunch would've made that a bit difficult, however.

Caster approached the building at a more leisurely pace, uncertain if it would truly prove to be the refuge that Paulie was obviously hoping for.

How in the world could any manmade structure still be standing in a place like this? Even assuming it was strong enough to prevent the Dáinnbolg from battering it to dust, how had all these feldeaths not blasted it into oblivion? It couldn't be luck that had allowed it to survive all this time.

Which was another issue. When could such a thing have possibly been built? And by whom?

Frankly, he hadn't even expected this so-called "Tower of Remoria" that Paulie had been going on about to even exist. Sure, he couldn't deny that a sliver of hope in the back of his mind had been there, quietly nagging at him--an absurd notion that they might actually discover something relevant to the path of destruction.

But now that he was looking at this tower, that notion didn't entirely feel like hope anymore. It felt more like worry. Deep, terrifying worry."

"2902

There was no front door, just an empty hole to walk through. As he stepped foot inside, he tried to inspect the building more closely. Thankfully, he did think to bring a flashlight, at least. The pitch black stone looked pristine, and as he shone his light up to it, he could see embossed lines in its surface.

""This way!"" came Paulie's voice from deeper in.

""Don't run off on your own,"" Caster called out. He couldn't even see the kid anymore, but he could hear ascending footsteps. Caster looked for a staircase.

What were they supposed to be looking for? This place was empty. A reaper would have helped right about now in searching.

Being of sufficient age, Caster was able to vaguely sense the soul power coursing the building. If he busted down the walls, he would no doubt be able to see the flowing soul power with his own eyes quite clearly, but as long as it remained embedded within an object, it was still mostly invisible to him.

He found the staircase in question and took it. The next floor looked just as empty as the first, and he could hear Paulie's urgent footsteps already ascending to the next floor again.

They didn't actually have to go all the way up this thing, right? It was touching the clouds. It could have a hundred stories or more, for all they knew.

""Paulie, do you still hear the voice?"" shouted Caster.

The kid took a moment to answer. ""Yeah! It says to keep climbing!""

Of course it did.

He was beginning to hope that it would tell Paulie to jump off the roof when they got there.

Caster had asked Kalikos about Malast, this so-called ""god"" that Paulie was hearing. Apparently, as far as gods went, Malast was some kind of lazy son of a bitch who never did anything for anyone. So this whole trip made even less sense than Caster had first thought."

"2903

Caster didn't know what to think, now. He'd never believed in any gods, excepting perhaps the Void, but that wasn't a god, really. That was the supreme consciousness that existed within all things. The collective will of the universe. And even his faith in that wasn't terribly strong. He certainly didn't consider himself nearly as fanatical as many of his peers and subordinates.

But if this Tower was real, then perhaps so was Malast.

Ugh. He felt too old to be taking up a new belief system. Even if this Malast was real and everything he said turned out to be true, Caster would probably just... shrug, at this point. To be genuinely moved, Caster felt like he'd have to be shown something so utterly spectacular that it defied his own capacity for imagination.

Boy, these stairs were taking a while. The long trek through the Storm hadn't exactly been a picnic, and without a reaper to pep him back up, he was beginning to feel the familiar and unwelcome touch of fatigue. From the sound of the slowing footsteps over his head, Paulie was feeling it, too.

Without warning, the Tower shook violently, and light filled his vision for a moment, blinding him. The booming crash of thunder that he'd heard a hundred times before arrived again, louder than ever this time.

Disorientation held onto him for a few moments longer, but his passive soul defenses were enough to keep him steady. Lightning had just struck the building, he was fairly sure.

His ears were still ringing as he continued the climb, so he couldn't hear Paulie's footsteps anymore. Therefore, he was surprised when he reached the next floor and found Paulie crumpled over.

Hmm.

Still had a pulse. Still breathing. Just unconscious, probably. Might have been blinded or had his ear drums ruptured, though. Or both.

Caster tried to slap him awake, but the kid wasn't moving.

Wonderful."

"2904

Caster scratched his neck, thinking.

Well, he wasn't about to carry Paulie's ass the rest of the way up this tower. Tired as he was and without enhanced strength to help him out, that would not go well.

And besides, Caster was not a large man. In height, he barely broke a hundred and fifty centimeters. He had no delusions about that. Growing up, that had been his single most defining characteristic, and the world rarely ever let him forget it. Paulie might've been his junior by over a century, but that didn't change the fact that the kid outweighed him by thirty kilos or more.

So he left Paulie where he was and kept climbing. He'd worry about the kid on the way back down. Depending on what he found up there and how bad Paulie's condition turned out to be, he might just destroy kid's brain and have his reaper regenerate him. It would mean weaving a tale about what had happened to him during their ""training,"" but that was already sounding more appealing than trying to drag him all the way back to Eloa.

The wind outside the Tower picked up and began howling through the empty windows, casting hail throughout each floor like little daggers, sometimes making it all the way to him in the center of the building. He soon got used to it, though, as the climb continued with no end in sight.

He was left alone with his thoughts for a long while.

He remembered hearing that Gohvis had a home out here on Exoltha. He wasn't about to run into that dragon bastard, was he?

Of all the members of Abolish that Caster had ever met, Gohvis had to be one of his least favorites. Everyone was afraid of him, but the guy rarely ever helped with anything. He didn't even seem like a part of Abolish, really. Caster had no idea why Dozer put up with him. He highly doubted that Morgunov would, if Gohvis worked for him."

That had been a concern of many, in recent years. The loyalty of the Monster of the East. And now, with the war, it was a bigger question than ever, Caster felt. Why had Gohvis not involved himself in the war effort yet? Dozer may not have been taking to the front lines like Morgunov was, but he was at least sending forces to fight. Where were Gohvis' mutants? Why weren't they helping?

There were some who questioned the Monster's loyalty. And Caster was one of them.

He hadn't stopped thinking about it. If Gohvis hadn't intervened at Dunehall, Caster could have seized a glorious victory right then and there. Ivan would not have gotten involved--and even if he had, then Caster would have been there to help him when that damnable Abbas Saqqaf showed up and somehow captured him.

There was no doubt in Caster's mind that, together, he and Ivan would have conquered Dunehall and all of Moaban completely.

And he would have the respect of his peers and superiors--of Morgunov, most importantly.

Instead, he was a joke. And elsewhere in Dunehall, the other Rainlords had managed to slay Collins. Now, Ivan's forces were in shambles, leaderless and getting their members poached by countless other sects who were looking to take advantage of their weakness.

Where before, Caster had commanded eight different sects, now those same men were so few in number that he'd had to combine them into only three.

That wasn't even the worst part, though. The worst part was that after Dunehall, for whatever reason, Jercash had actually given him a promotion. He'd granted him control over all operations in Calthos. It hadn't made much sense to Caster at the time, but he'd tried not to look a gift horse in the mouth.

And then, before he'd even gotten the chance to take decisive action, Morgunov arrived and took everything away from him again. Bloodeye and Crowe were placed in charge, while he was all but demoted."

It wasn't like he had much room to advocate for himself, either. He'd allowed Collins to be killed, Ivan to be captured, and any element of surprise regarding an invasion of Sair to be lost.

But the most gut-wrenching aspect of it, the thing that really cut into his heart like a knife... was how Morgunov had spoken to him when taking command away from him. The Mad Demon hadn't gotten mad, not even in that strange, happy-yet-obviously-angry manner of his. He hadn't punished him or even threatened to do so.

Instead, he just said, ""It's okay, Casty. I'm sure you tried your best."" And gave him that look.

That look of utter dismissal. Of low expectations being met.

Absolutely soul-crushing. For a man of Caster's ambition, there was almost nothing more damning than that.

But in the end, it was just another example of what they'd been talking about in their meetings for years. The hard cap. Or ""the Wall,"" as some liked to call it.

It always came back to that, sooner or later. No matter how confident he was feeling after a good day or a strong victory, it was just a matter of time until someone or something reminded him of reality.

Oh, what he wouldn't give for the chance to break down that Wall.

They talked about coming to terms with it. They talked about learning to accept themselves for what they were. They talked about looking for other ways to grow their power, to round themselves out and ""achieve wholeness,"" as some put it.

But as he climbed this cursed tower in a dead continent on the edge of the world, he was in no mood to kid himself. If he really believed any of that horseshit, he wouldn't be here, right now. He would've told Paulie to shut his fool mouth and leave him alone."

The farther he climbed, the more exhausted he became. And the more exhausted he felt, the more irritated he grew.

What was with all this bullshit, huh? A stupid tower in the middle of nowhere, surrounded by feldeaths and a storm that could rip through even moderately-aged servants like tin foil--why did it have to be here, of all places?

He supposed it would make sense that the ""hidden potential"" of the path of destruction would be sealed away in such a difficult to reach location, but seriously. Come on, man. If he didn't find the answer he was looking for at the top of this damn thing, then he was going to tear this tower to pieces even if it killed him. So what if even feldeaths weren't able to take it down? He was angry enough that he was sure he'd find a way. Somehow.

His ragged breaths gradually turned more into growls as his pace began to slow, and his climb gradually became a crawl.

Goddamn Paulie and his goddamn voices in his goddamn head. This was going to be a gigantic waste of time. He just knew it. The disappointment was on its way. Only, it wasn't going to arrive alone. It was going to bring mind-numbing rage along with it.

Which was a very uncommon emotion for him.

Caster Egmond was not a nice man. He had learned that about himself at the tender age of thirteen. He realized how easy it was to hurt people, how trusting everyone was in the basic civility of others. They all seemed to believe that true malevolence simply did not exist in the hearts and minds of those around them.

Surely, everyone meant well as long as they were being polite, no? And maybe even when they weren't?

Regular people were so utterly ignorant in that regard.

That was why, in all things, Caster Egmond tried to keep his cool. Being physically outmatched by almost everyone he met throughout the entirety of his youth, he'd had no choice but to blend in. To seem normal.

To conceal his burning hatred of existence beneath a calm exterior.

He'd gotten so good at it, in fact, that he was sometimes able to fool even himself."

"2908

~~((New Year's Day Special - Page 2 of 12))~~

He hadn't been afforded the luxuries of so many of these other Abolishers. Able to just speak their minds, to cause mayhem wherever they pleased, get into fights whenever they pleased, and deal with the fallout however they liked.

He'd grown up in an environment of total oppression, and it had never really left him--partly because it was such a useful adaptation. True, he was getting to a point now where the natural field density of his soul was strong enough that more and more people could tell what they were dealing with as soon as they met him, but that was a relatively recent development.

For the vast majority of his life, his calm demeanor had been a boon. By and large, it set him apart from the rest of Abolish. It likely played no small part in helping him acquire promotions--more so than his combat prowess, perhaps.

Every once in a while, though, when circumstances were sufficiently aggravating and no one was around to see, his true feelings were able to bubble their way to the surface.

And it felt good.

To give in to it. Finally. It was like hearing someone speak the truth after listening to nothing but lies for years. Cathartic barely even began to describe it.

He should have been getting more and more tired as he climbed. He should have been nearing the point where he could hardly move.

But that hatred was energizing him. His limbs felt like they were on fire, but somehow, that just seemed appropriate. More and more, he was looking forward to reaching the top of this forsaken tower and going on a rampage when nothing was there. Maybe he would challenge a feldeath to a fight and get it to help him demolish this place."

~~((New Year's Day Special - Page 3 of 12))~~

If this voice that Paulie had heard was actually real, then why wasn't it talking to Caster now that the kid was down for the count? And what was the sense in talking to Paulie in the first place? This tower was obviously too difficult for a young servant like him to reach. Had it just been using Paulie as a means of getting to him?

The more he thought about his questions, the angrier he became, because the more it seemed like this was all leading up to a whole lot of nothing. He was just wasting his time on Paulie's delusions. Of course he was.

At length, he began to notice a change in the Tower itself. Floor after floor had looked identical, but now the stairwell was narrowing. He decided to stop briefly and look around one of the floors more thoroughly. The whole building itself was narrowing, he noticed. As if it were a sword. Tapering toward its point, perhaps.

He kept going.

Fog arrived next, thin at first but growing denser as he continued to climb. And he could feel an electric charge in it, too. He must've climbed high enough to reach the clouds, he figured.

Visibility dropped to almost nothing as he pressed on. He couldn't even see his own feet. He had to use the walls and handrails for guidance. He tried blowing the fog away with the path of destruction a few times, but it only allowed him a glimpse before converging back in on itself. He saw the path break upon the Tower's dark walls, too, with little more than a lingering rumble--which was more of a confirmation than a surprise.

Then came the noises.

Quiet. Muffled. Mixed. Sometimes, they sounded like shuffling or scratching. Other times, almost like voices. The fluctuating wind outside the Tower made it all the more difficult to tell what he was hearing.

He called out multiple times as he continued his climb but never received a response.

Hmph.

This couldn't be what Paulie had been hearing, could it? Or was the fog playing tricks on his mind. It did have a strange odor to it that he couldn't quite place."

"2910

~~((New Year's Day Special - Page 4 of 12))~~

If he was about to start hallucinating, then that would just be the icing on this shit-filled cake, Caster felt. One more obnoxious thing to deal with.

He wasn't going to stop until he reached the top. After coming this far, there was no choice. Even if nothing was here, he had to know that for sure. He'd be curious for all eternity if he didn't. There was no telling what--

The top of his head hit something, and he recoiled a few steps back down.

What?

He's been in the middle of a staircase, so how could he have run into anything? What could possibly--?

Brushing away the dense fog above him, he saw it. Dark stone. Just like the rest of the Tower.

A dead end.

For a time, he was just confused.

These stairs just led into the ceiling? There was no next floor? No outlet onto the roof? What the hell was happening?

What did he just climb all these fucking stairs for?!

That was it. The last straw.

He summoned the path into his fist and blasted the ceiling with as much destructive force as he could muster.

The Tower trembled from the impact, but that dark stone didn't budge.

Which just made him even more angry. How was that possible, huh? This power was called ""destruction,"" wasn't it? So why couldn't it even do the one thing that it was supposed to?! If there were things that it couldn't destroy, and if it didn't have any other fucking properties, then wasn't it just useless?!

He growled unconsciously, which in turn became a yell as he kept attacking the ceiling with his power like a battering ram. Everything else was forgotten as he let his rage consume him and mindlessly kept bashing with both hands, alternating between two paths of destruction, not letting up nor ever intending to until this fucking stone was gone. His screams blended with the deep, piping sounds of his paths, and the Tower's rumbling seemed to heighten, reverberating with his very own soul.

He just wanted to destroy."
"2911

~~((New Year's Day Special - Page 5 of 12))~~

At length, the stone began to crack. And seeing that weakness in it only emboldened him to attack even harder. He smashed through the ceiling, making the Tower shake so much that it seemed almost as if it was about to tip over.

But when the vibrations settled again, he was finally able to feel a brief moment of triumph. His breathing was ragged, and his shoulders were heaving, but he'd done it. He'd done something, at least.

He climbed through the hole he'd made.

Immediately, he could feel the difference in the wind. The fog was still too dense to see anything around him, but this must have been the roof.

Which meant that not being able to see his feet was a much bigger problem. He could walk right off the edge if he wasn't careful.

He decided to crouch down as he moved and brush away the fog in front of him with more paths of destruction. He didn't much care if he broke through the Tower again. Even if it collapsed with him still on top of it, he'd count that as another win.

It was still holding strong, though. Whatever that damn stone was, it could withstand a lot more than just one hit from destruction.

He took his time searching the roof, wanting to make sure he didn't miss anything. While these damn clouds made everything more difficult, he also had to acknowledge even through his frustration that they were probably the only thing keeping him safe from all the feldeaths around. These were clouds of the Dáinnbolg, after all. They must have been supernatural in nature, which meant they were helping to conceal his soul.

Eventually, after combing the edges and going back and forth across the roof, he found the apparent center.

And to his muted shock, there was actually something there.

Some kind of pedestal, it was. And on it, sat some kind of cube.

No. An orb.

No. A pyramid?

No? He blinked at it, not even sure what he was seeing, anymore."
"2912

~~((New Year's Day Special - Page 6 of 12))~~

He stepped closer, gradually realizing that his eyes weren't playing tricks on him. Probably. The object itself was shifting between different shapes every few seconds.

How in the world...?

He reached out to touch it but found disappointment again.

His hand phased right through it, as if it wasn't even there.

Confusion seized him another time. Stubbornly, he kept trying and kept failing to grab the object.

He could already feel himself receding back into his anger. Did he need to use the path of destruction on this, too? Because that notion was sounding all the more appealing with each passing moment.

Before he did anything impulsive, however, his ears pricked at the noises around him. They hadn't stopped. If anything, they seemed be growing louder. Scratching, scraping, shuffling, mumbling, whispering.

But this time, he could also hear a familiar piping noise beneath it all. Like paths of destruction were being summoned in the distance--or behind a wall, perhaps. But he couldn't make out a clear direction. They were all around him, yet as he searched the enveloping clouds another time, he found nothing.

Well, his rage was subsiding, at least. Clearly, there was something strange going on in this place. He didn't understand it, but it seemed that this was not a wasted journey.

Thank the Void. Or Malast. Or whoever the hell was responsible for it.

Hmm.

He steadied himself, trying to listen. The whispers were difficult to parse from all the other noises, not the least of which was the damn wind, but as he concentrated, they seemed to become clearer.

""A test, a test...""

""To grasp, to grasp...""

""To breathe, to breathe...""

""To see, to see...""

""To know, to know...'

""A test, a test...""

He couldn't tell if they were in his head like that of reaper voices or not. But they were growing louder, it seemed to him.

Perhaps a little too loud, in fact. Or maybe the other noises were waning."

"2913

~~((New Year's Day Special - Page 7 of 12))~~

The world around him grew slowly dimmer, slowly quieter--save only the voices. Their whispers became a chorus, of sorts, and their words, an almost rhythmic hum.

""A test, a test...""

""Come and try...""

""Be my chosen...""

""No, be mine...""

""No, mine...""

""A test, a test...""

Hmm.

He brushed the crowding fog away again with his hand and eyed the object on the pedestal. He'd already tried picking it up with soul-strengthened hands, so it clearly wasn't intangible in the same way that a reaper's body was.

Well.

If this was a test, then there wasn't really much else he could think to do, was there? He was a one-trick pony, after all.

He summoned the path of destruction.

He wasn't sure that he should try to destroy it, though. Somehow, that seemed like the wrong thing to do. If it was truly intangible, then perhaps the path would simply pass through it, as well. But if that happened, then he'd be stuck.

Agh.

He tried to be ""gentle"" with his use of the path--which, strictly speaking, was not entirely possible, but he tried to will his intentions into existence, anyway. He made it small, narrow. And only loosed it for a split second.

It connected.

The shifting object jostled off of the pedestal and clattered against the rooftop.

""No!""

""Wrong!""

""Return the phylactery!""

""Be quick, be quick!""

The passion in the whispers kept growing, but Caster would not be rushed.

Phylactery? Why were they panicking all of a sudden? And what in the world had just happened, anyway? Why had the path been able to touch it when his own two hands and soul could not?

He eyed the object more skeptically now.

""To grasp, to grasp!""

""Touch, chosen! Touch!""

""Return! Return!""

The voices were all but hissing at him, and he could hardly make out what they were saying, anymore."

"2914

~~((New Year's Day Special - Page 8 of 12))~~

He approached the object and knelt down toward it. The so-called phylactery, whatever that meant. The voices wanted him to grasp it? How the hell...?

Maybe...

He used both hands, summoning multiple tiny paths at once. In truth, they were more like bubbles than paths, and he tried to coat his palms and fingers in them as he moved to grab the object.

Oddly enough, it seemed to work. It jostled wildly in his grip, both because the bubbles were constantly appearing and reappearing and because the phylactery itself was continuing to shift. It hovered there haphazardly within his grasp as he did his best not to drop the damn thing.

""Good, good!""

""Yes, chosen! Yes!""

""Become one and see!""

""Breathe and see!""

""Return it! Return it!""

""No, keep it! Keep it!""

""Hold! Hold!""

""No, return! Return!""

What in the goddamn hell was happening, he wondered? These contradicting messages weren't helping. And they were just getting louder and louder, too.

""Who are all of you?"" he said aloud. ""Why are you talking to me?"" It was just an impulse that made him speak up like that. He didn't actually expect a response.

Which was good, because he didn't receive one. Not directly, at least.

Instead, the voices fell suddenly silent.

The rest of the world still sounded comparatively muffled, however. The howling wind was the most prominent noise again, and yet it was scarcely louder than his own breathing.

Had they not expected him to say anything to them? Had they not thought he could hear them? He was quickly getting sick of all these unanswered questions.

""Are any of you Malast?"" he tried again.

No answer.

Of course.

The phylactery, meanwhile, was gradually settling down, he noticed. It was getting easier to balance within his hands. As if it were calming down--or his own bubbles of destruction were, perhaps."

"2915

~~((New Year's Day Special - Page 9 of 12))~~

He watched it carefully as it eased closer and closer to his bare flesh, sinking through the ability that should have been destroying it.

Until, finally, it touched him.

He felt it there, in his hands. And it ceased shifting its form, too. It merely sat there, having settled on the shape of a trapezoidal prism.

Which made his eyes narrow.

Every user of destruction had a specific, two-dimensional geometric shape that their path conformed to. His was a trapezoid.

This could not be a coincidence, he decided. Given all the different types of polyhedrons that the phylactery had just been iterating through, it had to be connected to his power in some way.

But nothing was happening. He waited, but no new voices arrived. No new anything.

The muted sounds of the world around him began returning to normal, too.

Was that it?

""Hello?!"" he called out into the swirling cloud, having to shout over the wind. ""What am I meant to do with this?!""

He kept waiting, and no answer came.

He exhaled a long breath, feeling his fatigue wash over him again. Why couldn't anything ever be simple?

Well, he supposed he didn't need to destroy this blasted Tower of Remoria, at least. It hadn't been a wasted trip. He didn't understand what he'd actually accomplished during it, but hopefully, that would come in time. Very much hopefully.

He wasn't looking forward to the trek back down those damn stairs. Maybe it would be better to just jump off the roof and take his chances with the fall. Ah, probably not. Feldeaths might sense him again once he left the cloud. Oh, and Paulie. He was still somewhere on the staircase. Caster wondered if he'd woken up by now. If not, then--

'Check and see.'

Caster stopped. He'd just reentered the stairwell again, and his head hadn't even finished going below the rooftop. He threw a look around the area, as if the fog might tell him whose voice that was just now.

'If you are curious about Paulie, then think of where you last saw him, and you will see.'

"2916

~~((New Year's Day Special - Page 10 of 12))~~

Just the words alone were enough to put the idea into his head, and without even intending to, he was already doing what the voice said. He thought of Paulie, where he'd last seen him, collapsed in the middle of the stairwell far below him.

And immediately, an image flashed before him. In midair. Right in front of Caster's face. Like a projector screen.

But it didn't last. After a moment, it was gone, leaving Caster more confused than anything. What had he just seen? What had been in that image? It had been too fuzzy and fleeting for him to even process.

'You must be more accurate than that,' said the voice. 'To control the Tenor of the Veil requires both precision and concentration. You must learn.'

""...What the hell are you talking about?"" said Caster, still looking around for a source.

'Go on. Try again.'

Hesitant, he did so. Paulie. Unconscious on the stairs.

The image flickered in front of his face again, and he blinked at it in disbelief. It lingered there this time, but it was still too fuzzy to make anything out. Was that actually Paulie there? It just looked like a vaguely humanoid blob.

And then the image faltered before disappearing altogether.

What the fuck was going on here?

'Ah. A good attempt. Your memory yet lacks depth, but that will do, for now. Here. Allow me to assist.'

The floating image returned, crystal clear this time. Too clear, actually. It looked like Paulie was right there in front of him, like Caster could just reach out and touch him.

'That is because you can.'

What?

He didn't understand. How could--?

'Reach through.'

At this point, he didn't see any reason not to comply. He put his hand through the image and sure enough, he was able to grab Paulie's tattered collar.

'Good.'

Caster retracted his hand. He had to ask. ""Who or what are you?""

'A strange question. I am you, of course. And you are me. If you will it, then we shall soon be as one. And we will remind this slumbering world of many things.'

"2917 -- CCLV.

~~((New Year's Day Special - Page 11 of 12))~~

Chapter Two Hundred Fifty-Five: 'Thy bracing constitution...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector had been a little disappointed to realize that Lord Abbas wasn't quite so enthused about the idea of a castle around the Forge as he was. He hadn't actually refused to help build it, but it was clear that he had reservations about it.

Yeah, it would be expensive. Like, obscenely so. And yeah, Abbas probably had a point when he said that the tree served as quite good camouflage and that constructing a giant fortress around it might actually draw more attention to it, not less. And okay, sure, he might've also been right when he said that they would never be able to build a castle that was strong enough to hold back an emperor who had set their sights on the Forge.

But they couldn't just leave it out here unprotected, either, right? It was sitting in a fucking tree. One stray lightning bolt, and the whole thing could go up in flames. He had a feeling that the Forge would survive such a blaze, but its camouflage would be gone, at the very least.

The Sunsmith's arguments did get Hector thinking, though. If the entire purpose of the castle was to protect the Forge, then he shouldn't just ignore those points, Hector felt. He should try to incorporate them into the castle's design, somehow.

And Lorent was full of trees, right? The Imara Forest covered nearly fifty percent of its land. And as skeptical as he had previously been regarding the functionality of Riverton, P.J.'s weird architecture, Hector had to admit that he was beginning to see it in a new light now that he was imagining his own sneaky forest castle.

Maybe that had been the core logic behind building their capital here. Despite what a nightmare it must have been to clean up all the leaves and insulate all the buildings with trees growing out of them, the city probably would be pretty difficult to attack, wouldn't it?

Well, unless the enemy used fire, maybe.

Hmm. Come to think of it, he wondered what kind of fire prevention tech the Lorentians had. Maybe he should look into that."
"2917 -- CCLV.

Chapter Two Hundred Fifty-Five: 'Thy bracing constitution...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector had been a little disappointed to realize that Lord Abbas wasn't quite so enthused about the idea of a castle around the Forge as he was. He hadn't actually refused to help build it, but it was clear that he had reservations about it.

Yeah, it would be expensive. Like, obscenely so. And yeah, Abbas probably had a point when he said that the tree served as quite good camouflage and that constructing a giant fortress around it might actually draw more attention to it, not less. And okay, sure, he might've also been right when he said that they would never be able to build a castle that was strong enough to hold back an emperor who had set their sights on the Forge.

But they couldn't just leave it out here unprotected, either, right? It was sitting in a fucking tree. One stray lightning bolt, and the whole thing could go up in flames. He had a feeling that the Forge would survive such a blaze, but its camouflage would be gone, at the very least.

The Sunsmith's arguments did get Hector thinking, though. If the entire purpose of the castle was to protect the Forge, then he shouldn't just ignore those points, Hector felt. He should try to incorporate them into the castle's design, somehow.

And Lorent was full of trees, right? The Imara Forest covered nearly fifty percent of its land. And as skeptical as he had previously been regarding the functionality of Riverton, P.J.'s weird architecture, Hector had to admit that he was beginning to see it in a new light now that he was imagining his own sneaky forest castle.

Maybe that had been the core logic behind building their capital here. Despite what a nightmare it must have been to clean up all the leaves and insulate all the buildings with trees growing out of them, the city probably would be pretty difficult to attack, wouldn't it?

Well, unless the enemy used fire, maybe.

Hmm. Come to think of it, he wondered what kind of fire prevention tech the Lorentians had. Maybe he should look into that."

"2918

~~((New Year's Day Special - Page 12 of 12))~~

It seemed like Hector was spending more and more time in P.J., lately--and that probably wasn't going to change anytime soon, he figured. He was bouncing back and forth between Warrenhold and Lorent on a daily basis. After telling the Lorentian Secretary of Defense about their lackluster border security, they'd been calling him up constantly, asking him to sit in on more meetings every day.

He tried to attend some, but they were pretty difficult to listen to, especially when he had so much other stuff on his mind. And it felt a little improper for him to even be there, at times, too. If the Secretary of Defense hadn't sounded so... well, desperate, then Hector probably would have politely refused altogether.

The people on the Lorentian Security Council obviously meant well. They wanted to keep their nation safe as best they could. But it also became increasingly clear to Hector that they were a bit overwhelmed by the war. They were constantly talking about trying to recruit more ""superhuman soldiers"" to their side--a sentiment which Hector didn't necessarily disagree with--but their strategies for actually doing so were a bit lacking, quite frankly.

They seemed to think it was purely a matter of money, that if they diverted a large enough amount of government funds, they could hire pretty much anyone they wanted to protect the country. Which, by extension, meant that anyone opposing such an increase in funding was also opposing the safety of the nation.

Apparently, the reason they were under this impression was because, a few years ago, Lorent had a private security company on retainer called Greenworth.

A lesser known mercenary group who used servants, according to Garovel.

And according to Ravi Zaman, Greenworth had been involved in a number of national scandals, not the least of which was the sudden death of a politician. The details were disputed, however, with some claiming that Greenworth had actually been trying to save the man's life, not end it."

"2919

Hector wasn't sure what to make of that story. It sounded pretty shady, but at the same time, he had personal experience with extremely bad publicity. Maybe these Greenworth guys really were innocent.

In any case, President Allen Dance's predecessor had very publicly pushed to outlaw such government contracts with private security companies, and Greenworth had since left the country. Several members of the Security Council wanted Dance to help reverse that decision so that they could either bring Greenworth back or hire a new company to fill their shoes.

For his part, Hector thought this all sounded like a terrible idea, but he could also appreciate how difficult of a situation the Lorentians were in. With the war so close, they wanted to take steps to help keep everyone safe.

His instinct was to not trust any mercenary group with servants in it. Because how were they supposed to be held accountable? If they were more powerful than the government's military, then who could possibly hold their feet to the fire if they broke their contract? And what about the reapers? The Security Council didn't seem to be aware of that wrinkle, but would reapers even care about money? It seemed more likely that they would have some other agenda.

He kept his opinion to himself, however, because this wasn't his area of expertise. He was well aware of how young he was, of how much experience he still lacked. He didn't exactly feel qualified to be telling these heads of state what to do. In fact, he still thought it was pretty weird that they even wanted him to be present for their discussions in the first place.

Garovel seemed to think this was a deliberate bit of political maneuvering on the Lorentians' part. Trying to get him personally invested in the defense of the nation or whatever.

And maybe the reaper was onto something.

More and more, Hector was getting a feel for how these government people operated. What they said they wanted was usually not what they actually wanted. There was more to every action that they tried to take.

It was impressive, in a way. And exhausting, in another."
"2920

Hector had enough on his plate already and didn't much care to get involved in their messy political games.

And yet he was. Undeniably. By accepting their land, he'd accepted their problems, too. At least partially. It would've been both irresponsible and delusional to think that he could simply ignore what as going on in the rest of Lorent and expect everything to be fine in the lower Jagwa region.

So he tried his best to keep on top of things. He was beginning to think he would need a representative of his own in P.J. soon, too. Someone he could trust to handle most of these meetings in his stead and help him stay informed about what was happening in the capital.

Who that person might be, though... he currently had no idea. A Lorentian insider seemed like the most potent choice but maybe not the most reasonable one. He didn't really trust this government, so how was he supposed to trust someone who was already associated with it?

There was no need to rush, he supposed. Things were... mostly manageable, at the moment.

He'd been trying to conduct as many of his meetings outdoors as possible so that he could continue taking in P.J. while he was here. His insistence seemed to make a few of the officials uncomfortable, but rarely did any of them say anything.

Perhaps they were afraid of upsetting him. Or perhaps they were simply coming around to the idea that outdoor meetings beat the hell out of indoor ones. He hoped it was the latter, though Garovel didn't hesitate to remind him how useful the prior could be.

Ravi Zaman was eager to show him more of the city during his stay, which Hector certainly didn't mind. It was Ambassador Stoutamire, however, who proved to be the most enthusiastic tour guide."
"2921

Stoutamire was often traveling, the man explained. He would not stop going on about how nice it was to finally be home for more than just a couple of weeks. He wanted to show Hector this historical building or that one--and to tell him the stories accompanying them all.

Hector tried to be polite and pay attention, but he felt like he wasn't going to retain any of it very well. Garovel could remember it for him, he figured.

If nothing else, though, it was clear that the guy loved his country. Which was probably an important quality in an ambassador, Hector figured. Couldn't really fault him for spirit.

But of course, Stoutamire's trivia was never the actual purpose of their meetings. The purpose was to maintain a steady line of communication between Atreya and Lorent, to help keep each other up to speed on what was going on in the world--or as much as they were willing to share, at least.

And to that end, Hector could not fault Stoutamire in the slightest. The guy was plenty eager to share information with him. The Lorentians had learned quite a bit about the situations in Melmoore and Hoss. They'd gathered a fair bit of intel about Sair, too, but nothing that Hector didn't already know--which was to be expected.

In Melmoore, despite having been invaded by both Corrico and Ostra, the tide was supposedly beginning to turn in favor of the defenders. A recent battle in some place called Trintol had gotten quite a bit of attention on the world stage. Apparently, the Melmoorians had whooped some serious ass there and then gone on to retake a large portion of the northern countryside from the Ostran forces.

After the disaster in Sair, that was welcome news indeed. There was no word yet about who among the Vanguard the victory was being attributed to, which seemed a little strange, but Hector couldn't complain."

"2922

As for Hoss, things were looking less great over there. Arida, one of the largest cities on the continent, had turned into a battleground, and civilian casualties were reportedly skyrocketing.

The fact that such reports were making it out at all, though, was a minor comfort. That alone meant that their situation still wasn't as bad as the one in Sair. But yeah, it was still pretty fucking worrying, especially because there were supposedly three Vanguardian marshals in Hoss, at the moment.

Garovel seemed to think that might be old news by now, though. It was quite possible that one or more of those marshals had left to provide reinforcements for Sair, which certainly needed them. If so, then the situation in Hoss was probably only going to get more intense from here.

When it came to reciprocating intel, however, Hector found himself reluctant. Stoutamire just sort of volunteered all this stuff, so Hector felt it would be improper if he didn't return the favor for the Lorentians, but still...

Sharing details gathered by the active teams in Callum and Vantalay was a big deal. He didn't want to say the wrong thing and potentially endanger them. Plus, all of this stuff was treading awfully close to sensitive information regarding the existence of reapers and how they fueled the strength of all those ""superhuman soldiers"" out there.

He was uncertain how much he should reveal.

Garovel wasn't, though. He didn't want Hector to say shit, other than the most vague things imaginable. ""Sair is trying to regroup"" or ""the conflict is intensifying."" Stuff like that.

Which was what Hector ended up doing. Maybe that was a little unfair to the Lorentians, but Hector saw the wisdom in Garovel's thinking. For the time being. Their government hadn't really earned that level of trust yet, he felt.

But he'd probably have to come to a clearer decision about that sooner or later, he figured."

"2923

As for the treasure hunting teams, they still hadn't made much headway, but the Vantalay team was able to tell him about one ""John Wright,"" a.k.a. Donald Elias.

Hector had asked them to find out what they could about the man's status, but considering how busy they already were with keeping the residents of Miro safe, he hadn't been expecting much.

Donald Elias was an undercover operative of Atreya who used to work for Hanton Gaolanet. The Sparrow had asked King William to see about securing the man's release, but Hector, already having people in Vantalay, couldn't help being curious about him, too.

Plus, Hector kinda doubted that the King or Queen would be able to do much in this case. With Vantalay in the middle of a war that it instigated, that country probably wasn't going to be in the mood to negotiate with some tiny nation on the complete other side of the continent for a random prisoner.

But heck, maybe the Belgrants would prove him wrong. They'd certainly surprised him before.

In the meantime, though, he was interested to learn more about this spy that Hanton had talked up so much. From what the Vantalay team was able to gather, Donald was being held at a rather infamous prison deep in the heart of the country. If they were to mount a rescue, they said, then it would first mean a long and difficult trek through multiple heavily fortified locations.

Hector definitely hadn't intended to ask them to do that, but he appreciated their forward thinking. Hector wanted to be mindful of overstepping his bounds here. They were already playing with fire by having a team of wanted fugitives infiltrate the country. Having them attack a military installation and stage a daring rescue would've been seriously pushing it.

...Unless he got the Queen's permission, maybe. But he figured that could wait until after the team had finished dealing with the Killer of Krohin, at least. They didn't need more distractions from that objective right now, Hector felt."

"2924

In fact, Hector was debating sending them more reinforcements. It was a tough situation, though, because who would he send? If this Thaddeus guy was such a problem that even Leo and Melchor working together were having difficulty putting him down, then it'd probably require someone pretty damn powerful to actually provide assistance. Sending the wrong person or group of people might just make things even worse.

That, and he had the impression that they wanted to finish this themselves. Like a pride thing. They hadn't expressed a desire for reinforcements to be sent, and from the way their reapers were talking, they sounded fairly confident that their victory was inevitable.

But still. Not long ago, Hector had been quite confident that the Sandlords would kick the crap out of Abolish.

He didn't want to make that mistake again. True, the Vantalay team was strong as hell, but this war was full of surprises so far.

He wished he could go to Vantalay himself. And indeed, he found the notion more appealing with each passing day. Yeah, he was busy with meetings and shit, and it definitely wouldn't look good for Atreya--and now Lorent, too, perhaps--if he got caught up in that mess publicly, but...

Apparently, the Vantalay team had gotten their hands on some aberration-made rings that could render them invisible. So if he were to go over there personally, it would be a lot easier to lay low...

But getting into the country would still be a big problem, of course. It wouldn't be like Lorent. Vantalay was an active war zone, with battlegrounds shifting constantly. Any number of things could go wrong. It'd be a huge risk.

Or so Garovel kept telling him.

And he was probably right. As usual.

But there was another reaper whose opinion greatly concerned him on this particular issue. Ericoros, Leo's reaper."

"2925

Hector had been trying to make time to talk to Ericoros whenever he was at Warrenhold. If he and Garovel were ever going to change the reaper's mind about Leo, about joining their side in earnest, then it was crucial to keep talking to him on a regular basis.

It might never happen, of course. Even Leo didn't think it was possible to change Ericoros' mind about releasing him and rejoining Sai-hee. But Leo was a valuable enough player on the board to warrant the potentially wasted effort.

That was how Garovel put it, at least. Hector wasn't terribly comfortable thinking of it in terms like that, like this was all a big game. He understood what Garovel was saying, but still... these were people with lives of their own. They were definitely valuable in the grand scheme of things, but they deserved to be treated like free individuals, didn't they?

Despite the fact that Ericoros was currently their prisoner.

There was no getting around that, Hector knew.

He'd been trying to come up with a way to make Ericoros more comfortable, to feel included in what they were doing, without giving him too much freedom. This was a two-way street, after all. He wanted Ericoros to trust them, but they also needed to be able to trust Ericoros. If the reaper somehow escaped and brought Sai-hee here to Warrenhold...

Ugh.

As Melchor's reaper, Orric, had mentioned, this was going to take a long time. Many years, most likely.

Which was kind of a strange thought. As a servant, Hector was little over a year old now, and yet he was making plans for quite far into the future. It really wasn't that long ago when he felt the future wasn't even worth thinking about.

If this next year was as crazy as the last, then he wondered if Warrenhold would even be standing by the end of it."

"2926

Regardless, even if he couldn't go himself, Hector was hoping to send more reinforcements to Vantalay soon; and with a sudden influx of new servants at Warrenhold from Hahl Saqqaf, there were a few more candidates to consider now. Hector had been trying to familiarize himself with the structure of Hahl Saqqaf, but it was quite a bit different from the Rainlord Houses that he'd become accustomed to.

Because of Abbas, mainly.

None of the Rainlord families had such an old and powerful patriarch. The only person even remotely comparable to him was Melchor Blackburn, who, for whatever reason, was not the acting head of House Blackburn. Abbas' influence within Hahl Saqqaf was unlike anything else Hector had seen from these warrior families.

The guy had so many freaking kids. And his kids had kids. Who also had kids, too. And so on. Even after spending time among them for a few days, Hector still wasn't quite sure how many living generations of Hahl Saqqaf there currently were.

But there were definitely some noticeable gaps.

And while it was a bit early to be drawing too many conclusions about their family dynamics, it had quickly become apparent that many of Abbas' sons were standing in his shadow in more ways than one.

Not only was Abbas the most powerful warrior among the Sandlords, he was also a genius. Even in their battered state, everyone's reverence for him was apparent. As was their deference.

None of them wanted to make a big decision without first consulting him--a decision like heading off to Vantalay to support the Rainlords.

Hector hadn't actually asked any of them about that himself, but several of the Rainlord reapers had, and each time, the Saqqafs deflected in an identical way.

""Ask adabbi,"" they said."

"2927

Maybe they just didn't want to do it and were trying to find a way of politely saying no, but that wasn't the impression Hector was getting, especially because of how incredibly old some of Abbas' sons were. A couple them were apparently in their early eighties.

Which, on the one hand, was kind of nuts. Asad Najir was only like forty-five or something, Hector thought. And yet he'd been a member of the Golden Council, while these guys weren't. And for all Hector knew, there could've been other council members who were even younger than that. Hasan Duxan hadn't seemed all that old, either--but looks were also deceiving, of course.

Still, Hector had to wonder if that kind of age disparity caused any kind of resentment or bitterness from these guys. It'd be understandable, if it did. Hector wondered how the Sandlords handled it. Maybe Abbas' sons had their own important positions in their government.

But on the other hand, the fact that Abbas' oldest sons were only in their eighties also left some lingering questions--questions that were too awkward to even ask.

If Abbas was a hundred and fifty-four years old like he'd said he was, then did that really mean he didn't start having children until his mid-seventies?

Or...?

Did it mean that he'd lost the ones who were born earlier than that?

Not a pleasant thought, to be sure--and made all the more so because of how much sense it made. The younger Abbas was, the more difficult it would have been for him to protect his children.

It made Hector think of Zeff.

Hector wanted to spend more time with the Elroys, to see how they were all doing, but it was difficult enough just finding the opportunity to keep up his training with Zeff. Hanging out with the Elroy kids was tough to justify when he had so much other stuff constantly competing for his attention."

"2928

Garovel had been telling him that it soon wouldn't be a matter of ""finding"" the time for things, anymore. It would only be a matter of ""making"" time for them. And Hector was beginning to understand what he meant by that.

With so much going on all the time, so many people requesting meetings with him in both Atreya and Lorent, everything was just totally different now. If he wanted to, he could book every hour of every day for the next month with one thing or another. A meeting or training or maintenance or patrolling or reading paperwork for the Bank or listening to reports from various reapers--there was, quite literally, always something that he could be doing.

Free time simply didn't exist, anymore.

Unless he went out of his way to create it, was Garovel's point.

At this rate, he wondered if he would ever watch another movie or play another video game again.

Right now, his ""free time"" was all going to patrolling Gray Rock. It used to stress him out so much, but now he looked forward to how relaxing it was. Compared to facing down some insanely powerful servant or monster, it was quite pleasant to be dealing with regular ass criminals.

He could use the time to multitask, too. He could read up on various subjects that interested him while en route to wherever Garovel sensed the next ""doomed"" person. Or he could just mull things over in a background thought process or two. It was nice to just take time to think about shit.

Unfortunately, Garovel was having an increasingly difficult time finding people with the ""aura of death"" around them. Well, okay, that wasn't actually unfortunate. It was obviously great that crime seemed to be on the decline in Gray Rock, especially after the spikes that it had seen after his return from Sair."

"2929

But if crime kept going down, then he wouldn't be able to justify going out on patrol very often, and then his free time really would disappear. He'd have to find some other way of unwinding while still feeling like he was being productive. Soaking in the hot spring was great for the prior, but not so much for the latter.

Hmm, maybe he could find a hobby that included the Elroy kids, somehow. That, alone, might make it feel more productive. He felt responsible for all the Rainlords in Warrenhold, of course, but when it came to Marcos and Ramira, that feeling was... magnified, in a way.

Perhaps it wasn't quite accurate to say that he was ""closer"" to the Elroys than with the other Houses, but there was definitely something different about his relationship with them. Between the familial link of Garovel and Chergoa, Zeff teaching him so much about materialization, and Axiolis being the one who introduced them to all the other Rainlords--he couldn't deny their special status in his mind.

And even aside from Emiliana, there were more Elroy kids out there whom he hadn't met. Francisco and Gema Elroy, wherever they were.

Regarding Emiliana, she'd been fairly quiet, recently. She must've been busy doing... whatever it was she did. Research under Gohvis or something. She hadn't tried to contact him, as far as he'd been able to tell. He wanted to think that no news was good news, especially with the war going on. If she was getting roped into the conflict, he hoped that she would tell him, but maybe that was foolish.

He hadn't exactly volunteered information about his own, insanely dangerous adventures, either. He didn't see much point in giving her cause to worry about her family any more than she probably already was."

"2930

Either way, if this radio silence kept up for much longer, he would try to contact her again soon. Apart from just wanting to check up on her, she might've come up with new treasure hunting clues for him. He hadn't wanted to dispatch a fifth squad, as the reapers all seemed to agree that it would mean spreading their forces too thin, but now that Hahl Saqqaf was here, that might have changed.

With so many teams out looking for these artifacts of power, at least one of them would have to find something, right? It hadn't been looking great so far, but he was trying to think positively for a change.

Hmm.

Yeah, it didn't suit him, he concluded. Better to just plan on everyone coming back empty-handed.

And to that end, Hector's greatest concern at the moment was motivating him to spend the majority of his time differently than usual.

That concern being Ivan.

If the Salesman of Death returned, perhaps with Bloodeye in tow, then the entirety of Warrenhold would be endangered. Everything that he and Garovel had been working so hard to build over the last several months could be destroyed overnight.

More than anything, he couldn't allow that to happen. If he was truly the Lord of Warrenhold like everyone said he was, then protecting this place was his responsibility.

Which was why he decided to start taking an even more active role in the castle's reconstruction.

The one thing he had right now was time to prepare.

And heck, maybe it wouldn't even be Ivan. Maybe it would be some other invader. And maybe it wouldn't be for many, many years.

But he felt in his bones that it would happen eventually. One way or another, Warrenhold would definitely come under siege, one day. With all the shit he'd gotten himself involved in? All the fugitives and refugees he was accepting?

It was inevitable, Hector thought.

And when that day came, he aimed to make sure that the attackers got a lot more than they bargained for."

"2931

He figured that a good first step was to materialize a kind of rough ""false castle"" aboveground. As long as it was all materialized, it wouldn't matter as much if it got obliterated. Plus, since nobody would actually be living in it, he didn't have to worry about things like insulation and heating and plumbing.

It was mainly just to help conceal the doorway to the Entry Tower. The longer the enemy spent wandering around on the surface, trying to locate the way inside, the more time they would have to organize their real defenses.

And it was kinda fun just creating entire towers out of his iron. He found himself spending perhaps a little too long on them, comparing them against pictures of real buildings from around the world and trying to make them look as believable and cool as possible.

He'd never been to the beach before, but maybe this was what building sand castles was like. He'd always wanted to give that a try.

He couldn't go quite as nuts with it as he might've liked, though. It required a gigantic amount of iron, after all. Multiple buildings, each with multiple floors. And all that iron that he devoted to this project would count against his volume limit while he was in the area. He had to exercise some restraint, unfortunately.

His preliminary results were looking pretty alright, though, Hector felt. Nothing as visually impressive as Stasya Orlov's work, of course, but it was a decent start, at least.

It helped that there was already some aboveground construction going on in the first place, so he could weave the iron buildings into and around them. The only real issue was making sure that his phony iron castle didn't get in the way of any of the real buildings that were still going up. Sure, the ones up here weren't as important as the eight towers underground, but they would probably still get used eventually, one way or another. He didn't always want to receive guests underground, especially with all the Rainlords down there."

"2932

It wasn't quite the majestic iron fortress that he'd envisioned in his mind, but maybe he could keep adding to it as his volume limit increased. Slowly. Over a period of many years.

Tch. Okay, he was kinda disappointed with this humble collection of metal towers. They were shinier than the others, which was sort of neat, but he couldn't help wanting more of them. There was still so much empty ground left to fill.

Maybe he should go out and try to achieve emergence again. That was the fastest way to increase his volume limit. Sure, it would mean risking his life--and probably endangering the whole country, come think of it--but a nice, big, shiny castle would make it all worthwhile, right? Garovel and the Queen and everyone else would understand, surely.

Nevermind the fact that actively trying to achieve emergence was supposedly counterproductive and might actually prevent it from happening. That was beside the point.

Dammit. Well, at least he would have something to look forward to in the years to come. In the meantime, he could focus on refining the towers and making them look pristine. Come to think of it, he'd probably have to remake them a lot, wouldn't he? They might start to rust after a while. He wondered how long--

""What'cha doing?"" came a feminine voice from below him.

The interruption made him blink. He'd been perched atop an iron platform, inspecting the crenellations on his southernmost tower and trying to decide if a tiled roof with a high apex might look better. When he looked he down, he saw a woman with long blond hair and unfamiliar face, staring back at him.

His confusion lingered for a few moments more, first because she was quite pretty, and second because she wasn't actually there.

He could sense it with the Scarf. She was an illusion."

"2933

He connected the dots. ""...Pauline?"" he said.

""Aha, hello,"" she said with a nice smile. ""I was wondering if you would be able to tell it was me. What do you think of my avatar? Nice, right? I'll be honest--if you don't tell me it's nice, I'm going to be upset.""

""...It's nice."" In another thought process, he was reaching out with the Scarf, trying to locate her invisible avian body. With so much open air out here, though, it was difficult. She might've been too far away.

""Your enthusiasm could use a little work, but I suppose that will do. So what are you doing?""

He slowly destroyed his platform and let himself back down to the ground. He supposed he could tell her the truth here. In fact, he'd been wanting to share a bit with someone. Beyond the fact that it was to prep for a potential siege, Garovel hadn't demonstrated much interest in his iron castle strategy--perhaps because it was taking a while. Probably thought it was tedious or something.

That, and he'd been thinking about asking one of the Sparrows for help on this project, anyway.

""It's a decoy castle,"" he explained. ""Not terribly unlike your family's estate, actually.""

""Oh?""

""I'm just trying to, ah... have a bit of forethought, I guess. In case Warrenhold is ever attacked.""

She was quiet a moment as her avatar gave the nearest tower another look, the expression on her human face looking abruptly more serious than a second ago. ""...Are you expecting an attack to arrive soon?" she asked.

Ah. Difficult question. ""Not sure. Maybe. Better safe than sorry, though.""

She gave an admmissive nod.

""Hey, uh... I don't suppose you could work some of your illusory magic and help spruce it up a bit for me, could you?""

Her brow furrowed. ""Excuse me? 'Illusory magic?' What do you think I am? Some kind of sorceress?"" A whisper of a smile was creeping across her lips, however.

Hector took that as a cue to double down. ""...A little bit, yeah.""
"2934

That pulled a laugh out of her. ""Well... hmm. I wouldn't mind helping, but in order to maintain the illusion, I would have to remain in the area. Unfortunately, I can't just create a permanent illusion here for you and leave.""

""Ah..."" Hector looked at his surrounding work, sizing it up again and thinking. ""So... I should create, like, a 'nest' for you around here, is what you're saying.""

Her avatar's eyes bulged a little. ""I... uh... you'd be willing to do that? To just give me a place of my own in your castle?""

Oh, maybe that was a bigger deal than he'd thought it was.

Yeah, it definitely was. What was wrong with him?

He'd done this before with Gina, too, he suddenly recalled. Just inviting people to stay in his home as long as they wanted.

Gina had probably been more deserving it, though. When it came down to it, he still didn't really know all that much about the Sparrows or Pauline herself.

Eh, but it would be aboveground. After all that craziness they'd been through together in Lorent, he felt like she was pretty trustworthy.

Hmm.

He scratched his neck. ""Well, if I were to give you your own, er, spot here, what would you need in order for it to be comfortable?""

""Ah, wait a minute. Trying to use my desire to leave home as a means of learning more about my kind, is that it? That's rather underhanded of you, Lord Goffe. I thought you were the more straightforward and earnest type.""

Um. That hadn't been it at all, but now that she mentioned it, it didn't sounded like a terrible strategy. She obviously found her father a bit stifling, and he did want to learn more about the Wrobels.

Still, though, that wasn't his priority. ""...Look, I just want my castle to be as impregnable and cool as possible. And having a Sparrow around seems like it would help with that.""

"2935

Her gaze lingered on him for a moment, eyes seeming somehow sharper, almost as if they'd turned into her true avian ones. ""My father would not be pleased to hear any of this, I'm sure.""

Hector gave a shrug. ""I'd be happy to make a place for him here, too.""

She frowned, then sighed. ""Of course you would...""

He couldn't help chuckling a little at that reaction. ""Did I just cause you to decide against it?""

""Perhaps.""

He pressed his lips together flatly, not sure how else to convince her. He kinda doubted that Hanton would actually want to stay here, but he also didn't want to promise not to let him do so. Warrenhold was a fortress, after all. If Gray Rock was ever invaded, the Lord Gaolanet might have need of the protection that this place could afford him.

As would many others, Hector suspected. And in such circumstances, he didn't intend to turn anyone away without a good reason.

Her avatar straightened and took a deep breath. ""I guess you'll have to entice me with an especially nice room, then.""

Uh-oh.

""First of all, it has to have a good view. I want to be able to see really far away. Most of Gray Rock, preferably. Secondly, I want a nice, big cushion to sit on. It should conform to the shape of my body without being too squishy. And definitely don't just throw together a pile of sticks, okay? I'm not that kind of sparrow. My feathers are too big, and branches will just get stuck in them. Third, I want an open ceiling that also has a hanging perch. Sometimes I like to sleep like that. Fourth, I want a steady supply--""

""Should I be writing this down?""

""--of seeds. The good stuff. Safflower, sunflower, golden millet--oh, and walnuts. I like those. Even if they're still in the shells, that's fine. I also like my water slightly below room temperature. Cold but not too cold. Brisk, I would say, not icy. And yes, I would be writing this down if I were you.""

"2936 -- CCLVI.

Chapter Two Hundred Fifty-Six: 'Thine intervening ambitions...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

For what must have been the thirtieth time today, Francisco Elroy hit the dirt with a heavy thud. He decided to stay there for a while longer. He wasn't prepared to give up quite yet, but the thought grew more tempting each time he found himself kissing the ground like this again.

He was exhausted. And sore all over. His vigor had worn off a while ago, which should have been his cue to go rest, but he wanted to make the most of his training while he still could. For as much as he disliked Damian Rofal, Cisco had to acknowledge that these sparring sessions were invaluable.

And once he and Dunstan escaped, they might never be able to receive this level of instruction again.

Crazy as it was to consider, a part of him thought that maybe it would be better not to escape. To just let the old bastard have his way. To make use of these messed up circumstances for as long as they might continue.

The worst part was, it actually made sense. He could see the logic in it.

And maybe a bit more than just logic...

Now that Damian had taken him and rest of the Rofals away from that damn cabin in the mountains, things were quite different. He'd brought them out to Melmoore.

To the front lines of the continental war.

It had barely been a week since they'd arrived, and he'd already witnessed more real combat than in the rest of his life combined.

Witnessed, but not exactly participated in. The amount of actual fighting he'd done was still comparatively minimal. Why Damian had bothered to bring them to a war zone if he didn't intend to make them fight, Cisco had no idea.

He wasn't necessarily complaining about that part, though."
"2936 -- CCLVI.

Chapter Two Hundred Fifty-Six: 'Thine intervening ambitions...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

For what must have been the thirtieth time today, Francisco Elroy hit the dirt with a heavy thud. He decided to stay there for a while longer. He wasn't prepared to give up quite yet, but the thought grew more tempting each time he found himself kissing the ground like this again.

He was exhausted. And sore all over. His vigor had worn off a while ago, which should have been his cue to go rest, but he wanted to make the most of his training while he still could. For as much as he disliked Damian Rofal, Cisco had to acknowledge that these sparring sessions were invaluable.

And once he and Dunstan escaped, they might never be able to receive this level of instruction again.

Crazy as it was to consider, a part of him thought that maybe it would be better not to escape. To just let the old bastard have his way. To make use of these messed up circumstances for as long as they might continue.

The worst part was, it actually made sense. He could see the logic in it.

And maybe a bit more than just logic...

Now that Damian had taken him and rest of the Rofals away from that damn cabin in the mountains, things were quite different. He'd brought them out to Melmoore.

To the front lines of the continental war.

It had barely been a week since they'd arrived, and he'd already witnessed more real combat than in the rest of his life combined.

Witnessed, but not exactly participated in. The amount of actual fighting he'd done was still comparatively minimal. Why Damian had bothered to bring them to a war zone if he didn't intend to make them fight, Cisco had no idea.

He wasn't necessarily complaining about that part, though."

"2937

Damian had also been disappearing with surprising frequency. One minute he would be there, and the next, he'd vanish.

At first, Cisco and Dunstan had thought that would be advantageous for making their escape, but they'd attempted it five times already, and Damian had always caught them without fail. One or both of them would suddenly stop moving. Or their reapers would come floating up out of the ground, seemingly paralyzed after trying to flee on their own.

And then the old bastard would insist on another sparring session and beat the daylight out of them both.

Damian never seemed to get angry about their attempts to flee, though. If anything, it looked like he found them amusing. And he never stopped giving them tips, either, even while smashing their faces in.

""All tuckered out?"" came the old man's voice again. ""Ready for bed?""

Cisco groaned and rolled over. He saw Dunstan a couple meters away, also struggling to get up again. Their respective reapers, Dennex and Rezamaar, were suspended in midair behind the old man.

""Have you thought about making a break for it when I'm asleep?"" said Damian, sounding genuinely curious somehow.

Rezamaar answered him. 'Well, yeah, but Feromas will sense us and wake you up immediately.' She couldn't move, but she could still speak, apparently. She didn't sound terribly upset about the situation, either, come to think of it.

""True."" Damian paused for a chuckle. ""What if I make him promise not to wake me up, then?""

'Why would you do that?' said Reza.

""Why wouldn't I? Could be fun.""

'Don't let him bait you,' said Feromas. 'Even if I agreed to that, it wouldn't work. He can sense you in his sleep.'

""Aw, don't tell them that! It was gonna be a surprise!""

'Try being more subtle next time, then.'"
"2938

Subtlety didn't seem like one of Damian Rofal's strong suits, Cisco thought as he finally managed to heave himself up onto all fours. Actually standing up wasn't looking too likely, however. His sense of balance was taking so long to return that he was beginning to worry it might not come back at all.

""Let's call it there for today,"" said Damian. Perhaps he'd grown tired of waiting for them to get back up. ""Better luck next time, boys.""

Cisco could hear a bit of laughter from the peanut gallery on his right. Several of the other Rofals had gotten into the habit of observing these sparring sessions with obvious delight. They never seemed to grow tired of watching Dunstan in particular get smacked around.

They weren't all like that, though. The littler ones mostly just seemed curious, and the grandmother, Damian's wife, kept trying to tend to Dunstan's wounds. Dunstan just kept brushing her off.

Cisco, however, didn't mind taking her up on her offer. She was a loony old lady, to be sure, but she had her moments of tenderness, he'd noticed. Plus, none of these people were undead. To Cisco's mind, that fact alone afforded them some leeway.

Servants were supposed to look after non-servants, even when they were assholes who might not necessarily deserve it. That was how he'd been raised to view this power of theirs.

Maybe Dunstan viewed things differently, but Cisco felt that way more strongly than ever. It was embedded into his heritage as a Rainlord. If he let that go, he would be a disappointment to both himself and his ancestors.

Dennex was allowed to hover over to him again, but Cisco didn't have him invoke the regeneration or numb his pain. Better to let wounds like this heal naturally for as long they could. Less of a hangover later."

"2939

He made his way out into the crude veranda of the house that they'd been squatting in. All of the homes in this neighborhood had been abandoned, but with the Melmoorians having pushed the Ostrans back up north, there was a chance that the residents might be returning to this little suburb soon.

Maybe. Dennex seemed to think it would still be a while yet. After having been pushed out by the encroaching war front, the reaper suspected that the people who fled wouldn't be so eager to come back until the conflict was fully resolved.

Which made sense, Cisco supposed. But it also made sense to him that those people wouldn't want to just abandon their entire lives in this place, either. And from the sound of it, this war might continue for quite some time. Or at least, that was what he'd been overhearing from Reza and Feromas. They both agreed that, with so many active fronts, the tide would probably shift many times before the end. If one side started losing in Melmoore, they could divert forces from another front in order to pick up the slack and mount a counteroffensive.

Cisco had been trying to pay attention to any details like that. Damian wasn't sharing the reasoning behind his decisions--assuming he even had any--so Cisco had to make due with what the reapers were saying and whatever he could piece together on his own.

Feromas probably knew more than he was letting on, but then again, this was Damian they were talking about. Cisco wouldn't have been surprised to learn that even the old bastard's own reaper was being kept in the dark.

'Why don't you just ask him directly?' Reza was saying.

Dunstan was hunched over in his chair, resting his face on a small white table. He hadn't bothered to wipe off any of the dirt or blood yet, and he didn't look like he'd have the energy to do so anytime soon, either.

Her question went unanswered. Aloud, at least. Perhaps Dunstan was talking to her in his head.

Reza had a habit of not keeping private conversations private, Cisco had noticed."

"2940

Cisco collapsed into the seat across from Dunstan. He didn't plan on asking Reza what she was talking about, but Dennex did, apparently.

'Ask who about what directly?' the reaper said.

'Ask Damian about what his plans are,' said Rezamaar. 'I kinda feel like he'd just tell us if we demonstrated interest, y'know?'

'Are you serious? There's no way he'd do that after we've tried to escape so many times.'

'Yeah, but I don't think he's too worried about us actually managing to get away. So by extension, he wouldn't be worried about us telling anyone else about what he's up to, right?'

'Well, that man's mind is a mystery,' said Dennex, 'but I'm sure Feromas would never allow it.'

'Ah, yeah. The party pooper. We'd have to ask when he's not around, probably.'

'They're always together, though.'

'We'll have to figure out some way of separating them, then.'

'That seems impossible.'

Cisco stopped listening and rubbed his throbbing temples, but on the whole, he had to agree with Dennex. And while he appreciated both of the reapers' attempts to make their little quartet here feel like it had any agency whatsoever, he was a bit on the pessimistic side when it came to their current circumstances.

Perhaps it had something to do with how many beatings he'd taken over the last few days. Freedom was beginning to feel like a distant luxury that he would never be able to enjoy again.

And yet.

He wasn't prepared to give up, either.

He was a Rainlord. He didn't need hope in order to keep trying.

And he finally had a lead. He had to make it to Matteo Delaguna in Lorent. Or Atreya. Whichever one it was, he'd figure it out. Matteo could help him find his family. He was sure of it.

He just had to get away from Damian Rofal."

"2941

The longer he stayed with these Rofals, the more entrenched he would become in their affairs--and the more motivation Damian would have to prevent him from leaving.

Or to hunt him down.

Agh. That might actually be the worst-case scenario, Cisco thought. If he somehow managed to slip away, he didn't want Damian to come looking for him. He knew his father was powerful, but Cisco didn't know if even the famed Water Dragon of Sair would be able to stop this crazy old man.

He definitely didn't want to bring the problem of Damian home with him.

And in that sense, maybe it would be better to remain totally ignorant of whatever Damian was planning. If Cisco didn't know anything, then Damian wouldn't worry about him leaking sensitive information.

If only it was that simple.

By now, it was clear that they weren't going to escape by any normal means. Brute force was obviously out of the question, and stealth wasn't looking too great, either. And as such, they needed to bide their time and gather more information.

That was how Dennex had explained it a few days ago, anyway.

And yeah, going by that logic, it might've seemed a bit stupid to keep up the escape attempts, but there was more to their reasoning. The escape attempts were still useful as a way of gathering their own kind of information--as a "limit testing" strategy, Dennex had said.

With each attempt, they tested the extent of Damian's capabilities. Thus far, it didn't seem like they'd gotten close to even making him break a sweat, but in time, that could change. They had to approach each attempt as a learning experience unto itself. The more they understood what they were facing, the better they could prepare for the next attempt."

"2942

The way Damian could disappear, for example, was very odd. Even the reapers couldn't sense him approaching or leaving. It was perhaps their largest problem right now, because it created an air of fear around them at all times. He could be right there without any of them knowing. He could be eavesdropping on any of their conversations.

It was a form of psychological manipulation, Dennex said--a way to make them second guess everything they were saying, and by extension, everything they were thinking. And of course, the thought that he could pop up anywhere at any moment would also make them more reluctant to try and flee.

Cisco didn't know if he agreed on that point. He thought the reaper might've been giving the guy a little too much credit. Damian was terrifying, sure, but he was also a chaotic mess, and that type of ploy seemed a little too calculated and cerebral for him.

Plus, Damian still had those big, underground worm monsters at his beck and call. Cisco had first heard about them from Dunstan--and thought him crazy, at the time--but he'd seen them a couple times with his own two eyes since then.

If nothing else, those things made it about a hundred times more difficult for the reapers to flee underground. Not that Damian even needed the help.

Lakefire. Come to think of it, Cisco was starting to wonder if Damian actually had any reason for bringing them to Melmoore. Maybe this was all just some random whim of his with no real justification behind it.

Would that be for the better or worse?

With Damian's constant vanishing, there was no way to know, really. He could've been going off and doing all sorts of things, talking to anyone, or even stealthily involving himself in the war. Sabotaging one or both sides, perhaps.

Hmm. Yeah, that seemed like something Damian would do."

"2943

Feeling his exhaustion weighing him down in his seat, Cisco considered just letting himself drift off to sleep right then and there. It was barely past midday, but they were prisoners, so what difference did it make? Dunstan seemed to be having the same idea. The guy hadn't moved in minutes.

As he was on the cusp of embracing that warm and familiar darkness, however, he felt something there on his right. A presence. Very large.

And very near.

He scarcely opened one eye before noticing the form of a giant animal standing there next to him. A wolf. A white one. As big as a car.

And it was staring at him.

Cisco's eyes were suddenly stuck open, his fatigue forgotten. Had he fallen asleep? Was this a dream? What was he even looking at?

The dog was already quite close, and now it stepped even closer, raising its massive snout up to his face and sniffing audibly. The air being sucked into its nose was loud enough at this distance that it sounded like a small wind tunnel.

'Cisco,' came Dennex's urgent echo. 'No. Sudden. Movements.'

That wasn't a problem. Cisco could do little more than blink, anyway. But the reaper was seeing this, too? So he wasn't hallucinating? Perhaps he would've felt relief if he'd had the presence of mind for it.

Then the wolf licked his cheek. Its giant tongue was so coarse that Cisco felt like the peach fuzz on his face might get ripped off, but the drool it left behind probably prevented that.

Well, he was most assuredly awake now, at least.

'Hello there,' came Reza's voice from somewhere. She sounded a lot more composed than Cisco felt.

The wolf didn't acknowledge her, instead remaining focused on Cisco and even nuzzling its head against him now. It smelled like it had been rolling around in dirt, though its fur coat looked pristine.

A man, however, appeared from behind the animal and responded to Rezamaar. A man with a single horn on his head. ""Hello. Please excuse our intrusion.""

"2944

'Not at all,' said Reza. 'I'm sure I speak for all of us here when I say that we're pleased by new company. Been going a bit stir crazy lately, you might say.'

The wolf was still pressing his head against Cisco's.

It was all too weird and sudden to process, but impulsively, Cisco couldn't help himself. He started petting the giant pupper.

Heh. The fella seemed to like it behind the ears a lot. He sat down next to Cisco's chair but was still so tall that he had to hunch over to stay around head level with the young man.

The horned man, meanwhile, was giving them a look and exhaling a weary breath. ""Apologies for my friend here, cedo. He is a bit quick to become attached to young ones like yourself, and he has been starved for affection ever since we dropped Durendia off.""

Cisco wasn't listening, though. He was too busy being awestruck. And quite pleased.

What species was this, he wondered? Judging by the relative height of the ears, length of the snout, and pure white coat, it looked like a Northern Ardoran wolf--perhaps a Jariki tundra wolf or a Katoa Mountains wolf, to be more precise--but this size was absolutely absurd.

Hmm, he supposed it could've also been an albino Western Eloan wolf--Dantean, maybe--but he thought albinism was associated with smaller-than-average sizes, not larger. Yeah, Northern Ardoran was the safer bet, he figured.

But still, he couldn't get over the enormity of this handsome fella. Wolves this size weren't supposed to exist. Not anymore, at least. It was like something out of prehistory, back when mammals were still competing with dinosaurs.

And what was that other smell, beneath the dirt one? Kind of ashy? Like smoke? Had this guy been near a fire recently or something?"
"2945

Cisco's fascination with the animal consumed his attention even while the conversation among the others continued. It wasn't his fault, though. Honestly, he'd always wanted a dog, and this specimen right here was one of the most incredible creatures he'd ever laid eyes upon. A part of him wanted to ask the horned guy if he could have him--along with any number of other questions.

'So who are you two, anyway?' Reza was saying. 'And what brings you here?'

""Oh, we are just a couple of travelers,"" said the horned man. ""We are searching for someone. A man named Damian. Would you happen to know where he is?""

'Y'know, I had a feeling you might be looking for him,' said Reza. 'Are you old friends of his?'

""Yes. You could say that.""

'I see, I see. Well, he has a tendency to just disappear. We're not sure when he'll be back. He kinda just shows up whenever he wants.'

The stranger's gaze lingered on Rezamaar for a moment, then shifted to the wolf. The pair seemed to share a silent exchange, and then the stranger said, ""That is interesting. So you have no idea where he is right now, then?""

'Nope,' said Reza, still perfectly casual. 'He seriously just disappears. It's kinda spooky, actually. But hey, if you'd like to leave a message for him, I'd be happy to deliver it for you whenever he shows back up.'

""That is kind of you, but what I have to say is something that must be said in person.""

'Mm, I see. Sounds important. Hope it's nothing too serious. Y'know, with all the craziness going on in the world, right now, I find myself becoming something of a worrywart. Which goes against my better nature, by the way.'

""Oh, I'm sure that's not true.""

Reza paused. 'Which part?'

The stranger gave her a look but didn't answer. Instead, he said something entirely different and unexpected, no longer addressing the reaper, seemingly. ""Please, show yourself. We did not come here for a fight, but if you keep hiding for much longer, I'm going to start thinking that you intend to ambush us.""

Cisco was paying full attention now, as was Dunstan, who'd finally raised his head off the table."

It wasn't entirely clear who the stranger was talking to, but Cisco could only suspect Damian. Was this guy implying the old man was already present but invisible or something?

Hmm. That... might explain a few things, actually.

Regardless, no answer arrived, leaving only uncomfortable silence behind.

""Koh can smell you, you know,"" said the stranger. ""He never forgets a scent.""

Ah, was that the name of the wolf? How interes--

Wait a minute. Koh?

Cisco had heard that before. Of course he had. ""Did you just say Koh?"" he asked, eyeing the beast anew.

The stranger regarded him for a moment, looking rather uninterested in him or his question, but then the man paused and tilted his head at him. ""Why, yes, cedo, I did. Do you perhaps recognize his name? Or has he simply piqued your curiosity?""

At the insistence of his mother, Cisco had memorized the names of the most famous Vanguardians and Abolishers in the world. Oftentimes, that had made for tedious study, but the name Koh was one that had been easier to remember. Because it supposedly belonged to a giant, wolf-like monster.

At first, he'd thought that was super cool. He loved dogs, so he'd been keen to learn more. But when he'd discovered that Koh was also known as the Man-Eater of Melmoore and the Silver Devil of Dante, Cisco's enthusiasm had quickly been replaced with dismay--especially as he continued to learn more about him.

This wolf was, among many other things, a prominent member of Abolish.

Which meant that this one-horned guy was almost certainly the same.

Hmph. Fine. He wasn't about to let something like a name make him lose composure.

""...What does Abolish want with Damian?"" said Cisco. He didn't expect this weirdo to actually answer that question, but the real purpose of it was to let everyone else at the table know who they were talking to. Maybe the reapers already knew, but judging from the expression on Dunstan's face, he didn't."
"2947

And indeed, the stranger did not answer him. Instead, he merely returned a smile.

A very striking smile. It had a warmth to it that was difficult to describe. Cisco had never seen the like before. What an odd feeling.

The stranger looked between Cisco and Koh for a moment. ""What is your name, cedo?"" he asked.

Cisco didn't quite feel like answering that. ""What's yours?""

""Heh. You remind me of someone, cedo.""

He wasn't sure what to make of that, so he said nothing.

The stranger turned toward Dunstan and stepped closer. ""In any case, I came to meet with Damian. If he does not wish to reveal himself, then that is a problem."" He raised a hand toward the other young man.
""Would you mind assisting me?""

Dunstan's thick, furrowed brow suggested that he would mind. But he, too, chose to say nothing.

""I won't hurt you,"" said the stranger. ""I ask for but a trifle. A moment of your time, only."" His hand moved closer.

Cisco was intensely uncomfortable all of a sudden. Like the whole world was abruptly turning upside down or inside out, like everything was no longer as it should be, like he should speak up. Intervene. Anything.

Yet his whole body hardly seemed to be listening to him. And thoughts arose in his mind as if from nowhere, both for and against that nebulous feeling.

Something was wrong. Everything was fine. Do something. Relax. This horned guy was creepy as hell. He seemed kinda nice, actually.

Dunstan was just sitting there, too. And the reapers weren't saying anything, either. Surely, if this situation was so odd or disturbing, then one of them would do something, no?

It would all be over soon.

There was nothing to worry about.

The stranger's hand stopped, mere inches away from Dunstan's face.

Damian Rofal was standing there, gripping the stranger's wrist.

""Ah. There you are, old friend.""

"2948

Cisco blinked upon seeing Damian. His head felt odd, but the warring thoughts abated, allowing him a kind of tired peace. He didn't let his attention waver too much, though. He'd never seen such a grave expression on Damian's face before.

""What do you want, Germal?"" the old man said. His tone was not at all the jovial one that Cisco had come to know.

""You're looking well, all things considered. I'm glad.""

""For a dead man, you mean?"" Damian released his grip on the other man's wrist.

'Where is Nerovoy, you monster?' said Feromas. The reaper, too, sounded shockingly different from his usual self. Where Damian sounded flat and cold, Feromas now sounded like he was barely containing his anger.

The stranger, apparently named Germal, regarded the reaper with an icy look. ""You should not ask questions you do not want the answer to, old friend.""

'And you shouldn't be using that body or that voice, outsider. If you think your tricks will work here, you are sorely mistaken.'

""When will you accept that I am Germal truly?""

'Never. Act like him all you want. Fool as many others as you like. Damian and I know what you really are. Until you bring Nerovoy back, there is no hope for a viable union between us again. Of that, you can be sure.'

Germal broke for a sigh. ""I had hoped that all this time would have allowed you to cool your head, but I see that is not the case.""

'You devoured my best friend of two millennium, you unholy son of a bitch. If you think that's something I'll ever--'

""And what if your other best friend were to become endangered?"" said Germal. ""At the hands of the Mad Demon, no less. Would that give you pause?""

Feromas fell silent."

"2949

Damian folded his arms. ""You seek an alliance now, of all times?""

""I seek to rekindle what we once had,"" said Germal. ""You do not trust me. That's fine. Verify for yourself that what I say is the truth. Parson and Overra are in Morgunov's clutches. You, more than any living being on this planet, know what that means. The danger they face.""

Damian's wrinkled face was like stone.

""If you would consign them both to a fate worse than death, then so be it,"" said Germal. ""The bond between us will be well and truly dead, then. And I will go to rescue him on my own. But you should be aware that if I, too, am captured, then it is only a matter of time before he comes for you, as well.""

""Hmph. Perhaps it would be better to have you take my secret to the grave, then,"" said Damian.

At that, Koh turned his massive head toward Damian and began growling.

And the air grew so oppressive that Cisco suddenly found it difficult even to breathe, much less move.

""...Hah. If you think you are capable of killing me, then feel free to try. I came prepared.""

""I'm sure you did.""

A long period of heavy silence followed, until at length, Germal broke it.

""Does no remnant of camaraderie remain within that broken heart of yours?"" the horned man asked. ""If not for me, then for Parson, at least?""

""You tell me,"" said Damian. ""You're the expert on feelings, aren't you?""

""Damian..."

""What? Is this not what you wanted when you tried to make me your puppet?""

""For the last time, that was not my intention. I was foolish and lacked experience with my--""

""Save your excuses. And don't apologize, either, for that matter.""
Damian paused for a throaty chortle. ""Y'know, in a way, you granted me freedom. Going half-mad has had its perks.""
"2950

To say that Cisco was surprised to hear Damian saying such things was an understatement. The old bastard knew he was crazy this whole time? And it wasn't all just an act, either?

The man's tone was different, too, to the point where it almost sounded like someone else was speaking, like he was using his vocal chords in a way that Cisco had never heard before.

Damian was so... calm. And severe. In an odd way, Cisco was reminded of his own father. The overall mannerism was just similar enough.

Germal sighed. ""Do you really mean that? If you would just remain by my side, as Koh does, then your madness would never trouble you again. I swear.""

""You think I forgot?"" said Damian. ""Or are you just playing dumb, as usual? If it's a choice between being insane or being your puppet, then that's no choice at all.""

Germal shook his head. ""My old friend... you would not be my puppet. I assure you. We would be companions. As we were always meant to be. Even if I wished otherwise, I do not have the power to bend you to my will in that way.""

""Hmph. The Liar of Lyste, indeed.""

""Why would I lie about that? I'm not the monster you think I am. If I were, why would I not simply force you to come with me?""

""Because it's not that easy, and we both know it,"" said Damian. ""Your tricks are messy. And the more powerful the subject, the messier they become. But just because it's difficult for you doesn't make you harmless, old friend.""

Germal turned away and paced a few steps back, scratching his head. ""We're getting sidetracked. I didn't come all this way to have an argument with you.""

""Hmph. How did you even find me?"" Damian's gaze shifted to the wolf. ""Was it really his doing? Or was that another of your little white lies?""

"2951 -- CCVII.

""If you will not believe a word I say, then is there any point in me answering you?"" said Germal.

""Good question,"" said Damian.

Another bout of tense silence arrived.

This time, it was Feromas who broke it. 'Overra. She has truly been captured by Morgunov?'

""Yes,"" said Germal. ""Even if you think I am lying, that fact will be simple enough to check on your own.""

'Hmph. And are we also to believe that you have some sort of plan to rescue her?'

""Indeed.""

'How? If Morgunov has her, the only way she'll make it out alive is if he decides to let her go. Don't tell me that's your plan. To convince that lunatic to release her?'

""That would make things easier, to be sure, but no. Any plan that involves that man's cooperation is a last resort, at best.""

'Then I ask again: how?'

""Can I count on your assistance, then?""

'If this sounds at all feasible, perhaps. If not, then you might as well turn around and walk away, right now.'

Germal took a long, slow breath. ""...What do you know of Project Blacksong?""

Chapter Two Hundred Fifty-Seven: 'O, kindling desire...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector watched with quiet marvel, hardly able to believe his eyes. He'd seen a lot of crazy shit recently, but the Forge sputtering on and off ranked pretty high up there.

Abbas Saqqaf was just standing there, eyes closed with both hands pressed against the spherical glass.

And a whiff of light kept appearing and disappearing within the giant orb.

Functionally speaking, it wasn't all that different from a simple light bulb, Hector supposed--a thought which might have dulled the spectacle a bit--but he couldn't help being amazed, all the same. The light was just... suspended there within the glass, like a blinking star that had been plucked straight out of the sky.

The light was too fleeting to get a truly good look at, and yet he was beginning to see what Abbas had meant when he had described the fire of this Forge as being 'gentle.'

That light had a warmth to it that Hector could feel with his very soul, somehow. Or maybe with his aura. He wasn't too sure about that, actually, because Garovel didn't seem to be able to sense it."

"2951 -- CCVII.

"If you will not believe a word I say, then is there any point in me answering you?" said Germal.

"Good question," said Damian.

Another bout of tense silence arrived.

This time, it was Feromas who broke it. 'Overra. She has truly been captured by Morgunov?'

"Yes," said Germal. "Even if you think I am lying, that fact will be simple enough to check on your own."

'Hmph. And are we also to believe that you have some sort of plan to rescue her?'

"Indeed."

'How? If Morgunov has her, the only way she'll make it out alive is if he decides to let her go. Don't tell me that's your plan. To convince that lunatic to release her?'

"That would make things easier, to be sure, but no. Any plan that involves that man's cooperation is a last resort, at best."

'Then I ask again: how?'

"Can I count on your assistance, then?"

'If this sounds at all feasible, perhaps. If not, then you might as well turn around and walk away, right now.'

Germal took a long, slow breath. "...What do you know of Project Blacksong?"

Chapter Two Hundred Fifty-Seven: 'O, kindling desire...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- (mobile link)

Hector watched with quiet marvel, hardly able to believe his eyes. He'd seen a lot of crazy shit recently, but the Forge sputtering on and off ranked pretty high up there.

Abbas Saqqaf was just standing there, eyes closed with both hands pressed against the spherical glass.

And a whiff of light kept appearing and disappearing within the giant orb.

Functionally speaking, it wasn't all that different from a simple light bulb, Hector supposed--a thought which might have dulled the spectacle a bit--but he couldn't help being amazed, all the same. The light was just... suspended there within the glass, like a blinking star that had been plucked straight out of the sky.

The light was too fleeting to get a truly good look at, and yet he was beginning to see what Abbas had meant when he had described the fire of this Forge as being 'gentle.'

That light had a warmth to it that Hector could feel with his very soul, somehow. Or maybe with his aura. He wasn't too sure about that, actually, because Garovel didn't seem to be able to sense it."
"2952

Still, it was an encouraging sight, to say the least. Clear progress being made. The Forge wasn't yet fully operational, unfortunately, but whatever the heck Abbas was doing seemed to be working. And the fact that Abbas was even allowing him in the general vicinity in order to show him this was also a good sign. Before, there'd been significant concern from the Lord Saqqaf and the reapers that any observers would be endangered during such work.

Something about having their souls sucked out of their still-living bodies and consumed in their entirety.

Didn't sound like a fun time.

Abbas wasn't worried about that anymore, though, it seemed.

""This isn't that kind of Forge,"" he said. ""It wishes only to stoke growth in its environment and abhors harm--perhaps even to a fault. The lack of aggression makes it safer to use but also limits its overall creative potential in certain ways. A fair trade off, I suppose--and one that I am more than happy with, given the circumstances. We will just have to accept the fact that the items born from this beauty will have a certain 'characteristic quality' to them. However, that in no way means they will be less useful.""

'I see,' said Garovel. 'Were you able to discover its name?'

""I was,"" said Abbas, drawing himself up and smiling somewhat. ""It was known as Agrian's Candle."" His smile spoiled a little, however.

'Emphasis on WAS,' added Worwal.

'What do you mean?' said Garovel.

""That was most definitely its name. Of that, I am sure. And normally, a Forge's name is supposed to be a kind of 'key' to discovering almost all of its mechanical properties and intended method of operation. But this Forge... I do not know how to describe it other than that it has, in part, rejected its own name.""

What in the world?

""I believe that may be why it was abandoned,"" said Abbas. ""It no longer identifies with its own name and has therefore been rendered all but powerless. You saw how it flickered? It is like an engine that refuses to start.""

"2953

Garovel hovered to and fro behind Hector. 'So we'll need to give it a new name, after all, is what you're saying.'

""Yes and no,"" said Abbas. ""I believe the word Candle is still accepted by it. It is the word Agrian's that it has a problem with.""

'Ah...'

Hector felt like he was beginning to get the picture.

""Worwal and I have been talking about who this Agrian person might have been,"" said Abbas. ""Unfortunately, he does not remember a famous integrator by that name. We were therefore hoping that you might know more, Garovel.""

Hector's reaper was quiet as all attention shifted to him.

They had the room all to themselves, just the four of them. Abbas had made sure to send his own attendants away, and now Hector understood why. If this information turned out to be sensitive in some way, then they didn't want it getting out. Surely, if they asked every reaper at Warrenhold if they recognized the name Agrian, one of them was bound to know something, but that could also be a risk--maybe not right now, but in the future, once the reapers inevitably began to disperse back out into the world.

Abbas and Worwal wanted to play things ultra safe here, and he didn't blame them. Indeed, their next words confirmed as much for him.

'If you don't know anything, that's fine,' said Worwal. 'We were just thinking that the fewer people we have to bring into this little circle of trust, the better.'

'I understand,' said Garovel. 'And the truth is... I do know of Agrian. I find it a bit difficult to believe that he could have been the one to create this Forge, but... at the same time, it makes a strange sort of sense.'

Worwal folded his skeletal arms in front of his black shroud, long scythe poking out to his side. 'Don't tell me you knew him personally.'

'No, no,' said Garovel. 'But during my time as a Prime Archiver, many stories from around the ancient world came to my attention.'

"2954

That seemed to pique Abbas' interest. ""I did not realize you were a Prime Archiver.""

'It's not something I like to advertise. We didn't part on the best of terms.'

""I see...""

'In any event, Agrian was indeed a powerful servant in his day, but the stories about him were always... shall we say, embarrassing? He struggled desperately--and sometimes pathetically--to distinguish himself from his much more famous mentor. And sadly, it would seem he never quite managed it, if even the two of you haven't heard of him.'

""Who was his mentor?"" said Abbas.

'Skapa,' said Garovel.

Abbas head reared back a little. ""That is good news, then, surely. Skapa made several of his own Forges.""

'Sure...' Garovel did not sound terribly convinced. 'Only, the stories about Agrian tended be more... cautionary in nature, rather than praiseworthy. Few of them involved him creating something that actually worked, and even in those, he was usually upstaged by one of his peers and made to look like a bitter fool by the end.'

'Wow,' said Worwal. 'I must say, you are not painting a very prestigious picture of our dear Forge's creator.'

Garovel paused for a brief sigh. 'Yes, well, I don't want to give you a false impression of him. But on the other hand, if he really did manage to create this Forge, then he must have been more skilled than the tales let on.'

Abbas brought a hand to his chin as he thought. ""His personality may explain why the Candle rejects his name. Or perhaps there was a particular event that made it turn against him. Either way, it clearly does not wish to be associated with his memory.""

Worwal gave a harsh laugh. 'That's quite the slap in the face. Abandoned by his own masterwork. Makes me feel a bit sorry for this Agrian.'

'I wouldn't rush to his defense too quickly, if I were you,' said Garovel.

'Oh?'

"2955

'Near the end of his life,' said Garovel, 'Agrian reportedly came to have such a vindictive nature that any perceived insult he suffered caused him to fly into a rage and level entire buildings before calming down again.'

'Ah...' Worwal's tone shifted to one of tired familiarity. 'He resorted to slaughtering innocents, then...'

'Well, er, actually, no. Not quite. According to several different sources, he went out of his way to never kill a single person directly, even his enemies.'

'What?'

'The stories disagreed about why that was, but none of them disputed its historicity. Some said he was, despite all appearances, quite softhearted and simply incapable of taking a human life, while others said that it was actually a strange sense of cruelty that motivated him in this way. They said that he preferred to destroy or otherwise remove all of a person's worldly possessions, leaving them with nothing.'

'There was one tale about a king who insulted him over supper by saying that a locket that Agrian had gifted the king's mistress ""had the craftsmanship of a drunken child."" Agrian kidnapped him in the middle of the night and abandoned him in the wilderness, telling him to ""try crafting something better."" The king survived and made it back to his stronghold, which apparently wasn't what Agrian had in mind, because he kidnapped him and did it again.' Garovel broke for a pregnant pause. 'The king didn't make it back a second time. No one ever saw him again.'

Geez, Hector thought.

""Hmm, "" hummed Abbas. ""Forgemakers are notoriously eccentric. That story rings true to me. And it would require a truly strange contradiction of a man to create a Forge that rejected its own creator.""

'You might be right,' said Garovel. 'Though the term ""eccentric"" is a bit generous, I think. He had many similar stories that did not involve kings, stories where he would simply burn down someone's house and tell them to ""start anew.""'

""Ah... ""

"2956

'Do you know what happened to Agrian in the end?' asked Worwal.

'His reaper released him, supposedly,' said Garovel. 'Against his will,

that is.'

'Mm. And the reaper's name?'

'Cantorix. Ever heard of him?'

'Afraid not.'

'Shame. If by some chance the reaper is still alive, he might prove useful in getting the Candle back up and running.'

'I admit I was thinking that as well,' said Worwal, 'but it would be incredibly unlikely.'

'Of course. If Cantorix had survived, then this Forge would almost certainly not have been abandoned.'

'Yes. It would have probably become a national treasure of Lorent, instead.' Worwal's hollow eye sockets fell to Hector for a moment, but he said nothing further.

'That, or it would've been destroyed,' said Garovel. 'In fact, I'd say that would've been the more likely scenario. How many Forges have there been throughout history? And how many have survived to this day?'

'Fair point.'

""Regardless, the Candle requires a renewed name,"" said Abbas. ""I thought the two of you should decide, seeing as it is technically not my Forge.""

'Wow,' said Garovel. 'That's... astoundingly honorable of you, Lord Saqqaf. Were you not tempted to give it a new name and claim ownership for yourself? Would've been a real dick move, but Forges are insanely valuable, and we wouldn't have been in a position to stop you. Hell, you might've even been able to keep us in the dark about the whole thing and act like nothing had changed.'

Abbas' expression remained blank as he met the reaper's gaze steadily. ""I would have to be quite the heartless wretch to stab you in the back after all you have done for me and my family.""

Garovel chuckled. 'I'm glad you feel that way, because I've known many people who would not agree with you.'

""As have I.""

"2957

'Well, this is quite a bit of pressure,' said Garovel. 'Whatever name we decide on right now could end up spreading across the entire world one day. It might even end up outliving all of us.'

Hmm. Damn. Hector had been racking his brain for a decent name a moment ago, but suddenly he felt like he shouldn't be the one to decide, anymore.

Worwal decided to chime in again. 'Allow me to suggest a name, then. I know the perfect one.'

Hector noticed a flat look cross Abbas' face.

'Alright, let's hear it,' said Garovel.

'The Candle of Reestablished Quietude.'

For a time, no one responded. They merely exchanged glances with one another.

'Bit of a mouthful, don't you think?' said Garovel.

'Hmm? Really? Well, how about the Renewed Candle of Glowing Radiance?'

Hector could see Garovel's skeletal expression twist, not wanting to shoot his fellow reaper down twice in a row.

Abbas saved him, however. ""Truthfully, Worwal has never been very good at naming things. Which is another reason why I wanted the two of you to do it for us, by the way.""

'Oh, here we go again,' said Worwal. 'Please don't slander me in front of our allies.'

""It's not slander if it's true,"" said Abbas. ""I offered to let him name one of my sons. Do you want to know what he suggested?""

'Oh, very much, yes,' said Garovel.

""Meteorite. He wanted my son to be named Meteorite Saqqaf.""

'I still want him to be named that, quite frankly. It's a great name. Very distinctive. Instead, you went with Nadim. How many other Nadims are there among our kin, huh? I'll never understand how all these repeated names don't drive everyone crazy.'

""You didn't even suggest the Valgan word for meteorite.""

'Because it would be that much more unique.'

Abbas just shook his head."

"2958

'Hmm,' mused Garovel. 'I'd like to take some time and think about this name for a while, but we probably shouldn't delay, should we? You need the name in order to continue your work, don't you?'

""Yes,"" said Abbas.

'But you also mentioned something about the name being able to affect the Forge's capabilities, didn't you?'

""Theoretically, yes. In minor ways. A name will not change its fundamentally gentle nature, for instance.""

'I see. And a bad name could end up being rejected by it a second time, I assume?'

""Indeed. Worwal is therefore disqualified from this exercise.""

'I shall carry this resentment for the rest of my days,' said Worwal.

Garovel chortled but then fell quiet, thinking deeply no doubt.

Hector tried to do the same. This was probably the kind of thing that a proper lord should take seriously.

A good name for a big ass candle in a big ass tree... capable of creating objects of untold power...

Uh.

Uhhh...

""Hector,"" said Abbas, making the young man look up at the man again. ""Perhaps I can assist. Come."" He turned and stepped toward the Forge, motioning for Hector to follow.

Uh-oh.

Hector did as he was bid and found himself standing incredibly close to the Forge's enormous glass bulb again. Not since discovering what it was had he dared to approach it like this. While he appreciated what Abbas had said before about it not being the ""type"" of Forge that would suck out their souls and devour them, he couldn't help feeling pretty fucking anxious, regardless.

Abbas placed a hand on his shoulder as they stood there together. ""Relax. It is dormant. It cannot possibly harm you. And your apprehension will do you no favors in witnessing the truth of its character for yourself.""

""...Okay."" Hector took a deep breath as he tried to steady himself. He watched Abbas place a hand on the glass and then look toward Hector expectantly."

"2959

He followed the Lord Saqqaf's lead and gently placed his bare hand against glass.

""Now concentrate,"" said Abbas. ""Close your eyes, if it helps. Take hold of your soul and slowly press it into the Forge. Use your soul to try and sense the object's shape, its volume. Then look more closely, if you can. Don't rush it. This may take--""

Hector was long gone.

He'd lost track of Abbas' voice almost immediately--and he wasn't too bothered by it, either. Perhaps he should have been.

But this was so strange.

And yet so familiar.

The darkness all around him was like a warm ocean. Soothing. Reassuring. It was welcoming him. Like an old friend.

He didn't have many of those. In fact, he might've had literally none. His memories felt a little foggy. Distant. Requiring real concentration to summon them.

Hmm. That didn't seem good.

He felt a little too... loose, somehow. His mind was stretching, going everywhere. But there was nothing to hold onto in here. Just the darkness. An endless expanse.

He refocused. No wandering. That seemed dangerous.

His thought processes were all feeling a bit sluggish, weighed down in this darkness. But if he concentrated all of them on the same thing, he felt fairly normal again.

Yeah. That was better. Clearer.

Where was he? Inside the Forge? Something like that, probably.

This felt an awful lot like when he'd first encountered Rasalased. That probably wasn't a coincidence.

And just like that encounter, there was probably something here that he wasn't yet picking up on. When Rasalased had been totally dormant, that space within the Shards had felt entirely empty.

So what was he missing here? Hmm. Obviously, Abbas had wanted to show him something. The ""true character"" of the Forge or whatever.

He could try meditating more deeply. That was what had allowed him to reach Rasalased. Seemed like it might work.

But he wanted to try something else here."

"2960

He was reminded of his recent efforts to speak with Rasalased, of the ""emotional command"" that it had required. Maybe this was similar.

He'd been thinking that the issue was his emotional control, that was difficult for him manipulate his own feelings in such a way. But he'd begun to think that perhaps that wasn't it--or at least not entirely.

Perhaps it was ""command"" part that he'd actually been underestimating. It had seemed simple enough to just think about what he wanted, to concentrate on trying to reach Rasalased--or in this case, the Forge--but what there was more to it than that?

Thinking about what he wanted wasn't quite the same thing as actually issuing a command, after all. It was the difference between hoping for someone to do something and ordering them to do it.

That was a difference that a proper lord should be thoroughly aware of.

Probably.

It seemed pretty fucking weird that he would need to give an order to the Shard or the Forge to do something like that, but then again, nothing about them was normal. This was the territory of souls and ardor and... aura? Or will, maybe?

Or some combination thereof, perhaps.

Willpower. Hmm. When it came to issuing commands, the concept of willpower felt like the more relevant thing. And he hadn't forgotten what Malast had said about him having ""the Supreme Will.""

Hector had been trying to connect that particular dot with a whole bunch of others for a while now, but it was a stubborn puzzle, to be sure. And frankly, Hector found it hard to believe that he, of all people, could possess something that sounded so... well, supreme.

Honestly, half the time, he felt like he had one of the weakest wills imaginable, like he preferred to just be a total doormat and let everyone else have their way. He'd been trying to work on that, but it was still a constant struggle.

As for the other half of the time, though...

Uh.

Well.

Hmm."

"2961

In any case, he tried to keep that in mind as he concentrated here.

Because this was important, he reminded himself. In fact, there might not be anything more important in his entire life, right now. This Forge could be the difference between Warrenhold's survival and its destruction. Between Atreya's survival and destruction. Between Garovel's. Between the Rainlords'. And the Sandlords'. And everyone he'd grown to care about so much.

Everything might be riding on this, he felt.

So if he needed to harness his Supreme Will or whatever the fuck it was in order to make this Forge listen to them, in order to make Rasalased listen to him, then fine. It was certainly worth a shot, at least, no matter how weird or unfitting or embarrassing it might feel to him.

When he reached out again with his soul, he tried to pour all of his focus into it this time. All his concentration. All of his effort. And determination. And certainty. And gravity.

And he issued the command.

""Show yourself,"" he said.

Those two words resounded through the dark sea around him. He had no idea how. Where had those words even come from? Where was his mouth? How was he hearing anything?

Hmm. Maybe it would be more accurate to say that he was feeling them, rather actually hearing them.

In any case, he also felt something there. Something waiting in the black.

Indeed, just as he thought, it was not empty.

He tried again.

""Show yourself to me, Candle.""

The darkness shuddered this time, bending inward. And a sound arrived, though he couldn't make it out. Too distant. Muddled. Could've been words. Could've been music.

He was about to try again when Abbas' voice arrived.

""Hector! What in the world are you doing?!"" The Lord Saqqaf's soul was suddenly there next to him, hovering in the darkness. ""Why did you go off on your own?! How did you go off on your own?!"

Oh.

Uh.

Those were all pretty good questions, actually.

A pretty good answer came to mind, though--or what felt like one, at least.

"I'm just looking around."

"2962

"Looking arou--? Hector, agh, I don't even know what to say that, to be quite honest. But you need to stay with me. If you make one wrong step, then your soul could become lost in here forever."

"Wait, what? I thought said that this Forge wouldn't do that."

"It won't, so long as I am able to guide you. But if you go wandering off by yourself, then anything could happen."

Anything, huh? Hmm. "...That kinda makes me want to do it even more now."

"Hector, please! This is no laughing matter!"

"Okay, sorry," said Hector. He couldn't help laughing just a bit, though. He felt like he'd been doing just fine a moment ago, but even so, he figured that he should probably listen to his elder on this one.

"Lead the way."

The Lord Saqqaf's soul seemed to relax a little, perhaps from a sense of relief. "You had me worried for a minute there. Now allow me to show--"

"Young Hector, what have you gotten yourself into now?"

"Who in the hell is that?!" said Abbas.

Oh geez. "Uh, that's, er--"

"Ah, Young Abbas. You can hear me, can you? How wonderful."

Abbas' soul was back to its rigid, bristling form. ""Who's speaking?! Identify yourself!""

""Ah--, no, that's Ra--""

""Be at ease, Young Abbas. I mean you no harm. Long have I wished to converse with you in this way."" And then he said something in Valgan that Hector didn't understand.

Abbas responded--also in Valgan and much more intensely.

Then Rasalased said something else. Then Abbas. Then Rasalased again.

Hector wished he had Garovel here to translate. ""Hey, guys, would you mind--""

Abbas shouted something. He was not calming down, it seemed.

""Er, is everything okay?""

""Yes,"" said Rasalased.

But not Abbas. In fact, Hector waited for him to say something, but the man was dead silent.

""...Abbas? You alright?""

""I have partitioned him off on his own,"" said Rasalased. ""I believe he requires a moment to settle down. Do not worry. I will continue to explain the situation to him in tandem. In the meantime, let us continue our exploration.""

"2963

""Our... exploration?"" said Hector.

""Indeed. It has been some time since I have been able to visit a new space. This is quite refreshing. And perhaps a bit unsettling.""

Hmm. ""It's been some time, huh? But Rasalased. Time is not time, right?""

""Aha. Indeed, that is so. Especially in this place. The flow is entirely distorted, varying wildly depending on where we go. That is assuredly the major peril to unwitting souls that venture here. One wrong step, as Young Abbas put it."

Hector might've blinked if he could feel his face. "Ohhh... I think I understand. You're saying that if we pass through the wrong area, our perception of time will become totally skewed? Meaning we could... lose, like, entire years outside while in here it'd only feel like seconds?"

"An extreme example. But not outside the realm of possibility. And also not the worst that could happen, either."

"Wait, really?"

"Of course. Because time is not time, that is a solvable problem. Perception, you see, is the thin rope on which the false idea of time dangles. When that rope becomes tangled, one of two things may occur. You may fall into an endless myopia of existential self-destruction. Which is indeed terrible. Or, you may learn to overcome the falsehood--to see through the great ruse that is time--and remake yourself anew, free of its linear vice grip."

"Uh..."

"Compared to that, having this hungry furnace of creation tear your soul apart like a starving Storm Bear would be much worse. Shredded hellishly into countless pieces of struggling cognitive misery. Do you not agree?"

"That... does sound pretty bad..."

"Yes." A beat passed. "But I am sure you will be fine, Young Hector."

"Ah, yeah, thanks..." At times, Rasalased had a really horrifying way with words, Hector was realizing."

"2964

"Let us not delay," said Rasalased. "Speak as you were."

"Are you sure Abbas will be okay?"

""Of course. Do not let him distract you, Young Hector. Speak as you were. With your soul's priority in hand.""

Uh. Hmm. ""You're being kinda pushy, Rasalased...""

""Am I? My apologies, then. I have not felt so eager in an Age. My curiosity may be getting the better of me. I mean not to alarm you, Young Hector.""

Hector stuck on that. ""In an Age, huh?""

""Indeed.""

That was a peculiar statement to make, Hector thought. Having only recently become more interested in history, Hector may not have been fully knowledgeable about the subject of Ages, but he did know that they were currently in the Seventh Age and that the Sixth Age--a.k.a. the Late Imperial Age--had been marked by the collapse of the last great empire, the Mohssian Empire.

As he understood it, Ages were not demarcated by a specific amount of time passing but instead by major historical events. The Seventh Age, therefore, did not yet have a similar nickname of consensus among historians--and probably wouldn't until the Eighth Age rolled around.

However, no Age thus far had been less than six hundred years, and they were currently only on the 291st year of the Seventh Age--or 291 7A--so it was a fair bet that this one would last for a while longer yet.

As Hector recalled, according to Garovel, Rasalased was well over a thousand years old but not more than two thousand, which would've placed his birth pretty deep into the Sixth Age but not quite the Fifth, a.k.a. the Conquering Age.

It was perhaps a strange direction for Hector's mind to wander off into, but it did put things into perspective quite a bit. And it made him want to ask Rasalased all sorts of questions about history.

Heh. Then again, he did have an even older reaper to ask. He had a feeling Garovel might get jealous if he started consulting Rasalased about history, instead."

"2965

""Rasalased,"" said Hector, ""an Age is a really long time, you know. What exactly has you so curious here? I mean, what do you hope to find?""

The Dry God fell briefly quiet. ""A way forward,"" he said.

Hmm. He'd been meaning to ask Rasalased what he knew about Fusion Forges for a while now, but there was still one other matter that he felt to be more pressing. ""Hey, uh... while I've got you, do you think you could locate the rest of the Sandlords?""

""Ah... you would seek out my scattered kin and protect them, too?""

""Er. Yeah.""

""Very kind of you. And quite bold. You invite much danger with such an endeavor.""

""I... am aware of that.""

""Heh. Or perhaps you are hoping to bring them to heel while they are weak? To make them not only dependent upon you, but forever grateful for it, too?""

""Rasalased, what--?""

""I jest. I know your heart, Young Hector. Your mind may be a mystery to me now, but I shall not forget what I saw of you during our first encounter.""

Hector didn't know what to say to that.

""I speak in jest, but others will not. Should you continue down this path, there will come much turmoil.""

Mm. What else was new, Hector thought?

""I warn you. My kin are greatly fractured now. This most recent blow has struck them deeply. At their faith in one another. I fear they may not recover.""

That surprised him. ""Really? You think it's that bad?""

""No, I do not think it. But I fear it. As many of them currently do. Their souls wither in isolation and doubt. I sense their collective sorrow from afar, and it bleeds into my own. A great mess of confusion.""

""I'm... sorry to hear that."" He didn't much care for this pessimistic streak from Rasalased, though. ""But your people have come back from worse. A lot worse.""

""Indeed we have. But not for many, many years.""
"2966

""So are you saying that you'd prefer I didn't try to reunite everyone?"" said Hector.

No answer arrived.

""...Rasalased?""

""I... I do not know, Young Hector.""

And again, Hector found himself surprised. Rasalased was uncertain?
And openly so?

That was new. And worrying.

Hector could appreciate his honesty, though. ""Do you think it would be better to leave them alone for a while?""

""Perhaps. Or perhaps not.""

Ah, Hector had been wondering when he would pull that card again.

""You are the more mystifying factor, Young Hector. I cannot tell if you would be able to get through to them.""

""Hmm. Well, I wouldn't really need to. Abbas would be the one who got through to them.""

""...No. He would not.""

""What?""

""I do not think that Young Abbas would be able to bring my kin back together. In their current state, they would reject him and maintain isolation.""

""Are you serious? Even with their own subjects being in such desperate need of their help?"

"They would not view it that way. They would see only certain death."

Oh, fuck. "But Abbas could..." Could what? Hector didn't know how to finish that thought.

"Eventually, yes, Young Abbas would get through to them, I suspect. After this war has reached its conclusion, perhaps."

That... actually made sense, Hector thought. After suffering such a horrific loss, it was entirely reasonable that the Sandlords might want to keep their heads down and wait out the storm. They had families to think of, after all. They could try to pick up the pieces after everything calmed down. And if they thought that Abbas would try to lead them back into the conflict in order to retake Sair right away, then...

He didn't like how believable that line of thinking was. And understandable, too. Hector couldn't exactly blame them for prioritizing themselves, right now.

Rasalased was not done talking. "You, however, would be an unpredictable element. Heh. As ever, it seems. I do not know how your presence might affect their spirits. Perhaps you would also fail. Or perhaps not." "2967

"Well, I wouldn't want to pressure them into rejoining the fight," said Hector. "I just want them to be safe. And if they're already safe where they are, then that's fine, too."

"I see. Such an attitude may see you perpetually involving yourself in the problems of others, Young Hector."

"Ah. Well. Maybe so. But that's better than waiting until those problems involve themselves with me, I think."

"Heh. Perhaps. Or perhaps not."

"So it sounds like you actually CAN locate the other Sandlords for us, if you want to."

"Yes. But please allow me to think it over. I will decide whether or not to assist you in this effort soon. For now, let us concentrate on the task before us."

"Alright, then. Thanks for your consideration, regardless of what you choose."

"Speak as you were, Young Hector. With force. I shall assist you."

Hector gathered his focus again. It was a little weird without his body. No eyes to close. No breathing to steady.

Hmm. Speaking with force, huh? That was one way of putting it, he supposed.

"...Show yourself to me, Candle," he said. And weirdly enough, he heard Rasalased echoing each word with a slight delay.

Was that what he'd meant by assisting? Hector didn't get the chance to ask.

The deep expanse around them pulsed. And kept pulsing. Like a heartbeat at first, but then quickening into a more constant thrumming.

And then an impact arrived, something that he felt with his very soul. He didn't know how to describe it, other than that it was forceful and sudden. It didn't hurt, exactly, but it definitely felt strange.

"Ah," came Rasalased's voice again. "Worry not. I will shield you from any assault."

Assault? What assault?

"Good Candle!" Ras called out more loudly. "Do not fear! We would see you mended and resurrected!"

The thrumming intensified and soon reached an overwhelming degree. It sounded at once muffled and all-encompassing.

"No! Your creator did not send us! We discovered you by chance alone!"

More thrumming, this time with varying rhythms.

Hector began to understand. Rasalased was... talking to it. Somehow."
"2968 -- CCLVIII.

The unintelligible noises continued, changing wildly. It sounded more like a broken subwoofer or something than a spoken language. How in the world could Rasalased comprehend any of this?

""Excellent,"" said Ras. ""If you wish to be made whole again, then please, embrace us. I know little of your kind, but I am certain that the process will be made much easier with your cooperation. Young Abbas here will guide you through it.""

Oh, hey, he could sense Abbas' soul beside him again.

""Uh--ah--y-yes, I shall do my best?"" That definitely wasn't a question, but Abbas' obvious uncertainty made it sound like one.

More thrumming arrived.

For quite a while, this time.

Hector could sense the darkness trembling more than ever now. It felt like he was in a bubble with heavy rain falling upon it--or a meteor shower, perhaps.

""...Oh,"" came Rasalased's voice again. ""Well... ah... I do not think that will be necessary. You are not yet whole, after all. A full retelling would be strenuous for you. And you have my assurances that these young souls are worthy of your trust. They would not--""

The rhythmic sounds cut him off, growing still more intense.

""Ah. You do not trust me, either... of course... I only meant--""

And the bubble shattered.

Chapter Two Hundred Fifty-Eight: 'A walk in the Dark...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Everything was truly black now. Hector couldn't sense a thing. No Abbas. No Rasalased.

Even his own soul was questionable. Was he still here? Where WAS here, even?

The world rose up all around him, ascended from the seemingly infinite pit below him. All within a few moments.

He was outside. In a field. A thin, ethereal fog covered everything, making him feel like he had to squint.

Ah, he could feel his body again. Or could he? The fog covered his own hands, he noticed. Like the fog was part of him. Or he was part of the fog.

Hmm."

"2968 -- CCLVIII.

The unintelligible noises continued, changing wildly. It sounded more like a broken subwoofer or something than a spoken language. How in the world could Rasalased comprehend any of this?

""Excellent,"" said Ras. ""If you wish to be made whole again, then please, embrace us. I know little of your kind, but I am certain that the process will be made much easier with your cooperation. Young Abbas here will guide you through it.""

Oh, hey, he could sense Abbas' soul beside him again.

""Uh--ah--y-yes, I shall do my best?"" That definitely wasn't a question, but Abbas' obvious uncertainty made it sound like one.

More thrumming arrived.

For quite a while, this time.

Hector could sense the darkness trembling more than ever now. It felt like he was in a bubble with heavy rain falling upon it--or a meteor shower, perhaps.

""...Oh,"" came Rasalased's voice again. ""Well... ah... I do not think that will be necessary. You are not yet whole, after all. A full retelling would be strenuous for you. And you have my assurances that these young souls are worthy of your trust. They would not--""

The rhythmic sounds cut him off, growing still more intense.

""Ah. You do not trust me, either... of course... I only meant--""

And the bubble shattered.

Chapter Two Hundred Fifty-Eight: 'A walk in the Dark...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Everything was truly black now. Hector couldn't sense a thing. No Abbas. No Rasalased.

Even his own soul was questionable. Was he still here? Where WAS here, even?

The world rose up all around him, ascended from the seemingly infinite pit below him. All within a few moments.

He was outside. In a field. A thin, ethereal fog covered everything, making him feel like he had to squint.

Ah, he could feel his body again. Or could he? The fog covered his own hands, he noticed. Like the fog was part of him. Or he was part of the fog.

Hmm."
"2969

Well, this was a new experience. This place felt somehow familiar, but he couldn't tell why. It was just an empty field. A forest in the distance.

Was the Forge showing him this? And if so, why?

A figure melted into existence in front of him. Once it was fully formed, though, it appeared more real and lively than he did.

He'd never seen clothes like those before. The ornamentation on them was elaborate, lined with silver and bright crimson, and yet there was still something primitive about them, too.

Hector was reminded of the vision that he'd seen with Pauline Gaolanet. This whole thing felt different than that, but not by much. And if this was a memory from the Forge's past, then was that an ancient person standing there in front of them?

It was just a guy. In a field. Looking around.

Hmm.

Not very informative.

Then the figure melted out of existence, but only briefly. He reappeared a few feet away, crouched down this time, seemingly to inspect the ground. Then he disappeared again, only to reappear another few feet away, now with shovel in hand, digging.

The hole expanded quickly as the figure kept flickering in and out of existence around it.

A time lapse, Hector supposed.

The hole grew deeper and more narrow as the man worked. Hector stepped closer to the edge for a better look. The figure's clothes kept changing between flickers, as presumably the days also were. Weeks or more must have passed by the time the man finally set his shovel down.

And the hole was enormous now. Big enough to fit an entire house, certainly. Maybe even two.

The flickering didn't stop there, though. The man kept blinking in and out of existence, only this time he was almost always on all fours with his sleeves rolled up and his hands in the dirt, sometimes elbow-deep. And the dirt itself was gradually changing, too, turning a darker, richer brown color. Where before it had been hard and riddled with rocks, now it was beginning to look quite soft and even."

"2970

Hector observed the stranger's work with increasing interest. Could this be the Forge's creator? Agrian?

He tried to get a better look at the guy's face, but the constant teleporting made it surprisingly difficult. The dude seemed to have a receding hairline and a pudgy face, along with a scowl permanently etched into it.

The vision slowed down to a normal speed, and just as Hector began to wonder why, a new figure appeared at the edge of the hole.

This one was more finely dressed, with a chiseled jawline and perfectly coiffed blond hair. He said something in a language that Hector didn't understand, but Agrian, who was still toiling away in the dirt, ignored him. The man said something else and began laughing.

That clearly got under Agrian's skin, as he stopped working, and Hector could see his shoulders trembling. From the back, it might've appeared like he was crying, but looking at his face, no, that was anger.

Rage, actually.

Agrian didn't do anything, though. He went back to work, and the stranger went away.

Hmm.

Hector supposed he didn't need to know exactly what had been said in order to get the gist of what was going on here. The vision sped up again, and Agrian's work leapt forward. Seeds were planted; the hole was filled; and a tiny tree sprouted forth.

Once it was growing, he seemed to be monitoring it constantly, watering it and continually tending to the soil all around it.

Then Hector noticed that all of the grass around it died, leaving only dry, cracked earth. Even in the distance, the forest was brown and dwindling, with dozens of trees fallen over or momentarily on fire.

Hector worried for a second that the growing Forge might've been the cause of all this, but as he watched Agrian trying to shield the sprout from a punishing sun, watering it constantly, even hunching over it with his own body after the tent he erected blew away in the wind, Hector changed his mind."

"2971

Even after the apparent drought ended and greenery returned to the rest to the area, Agrian's trouble did only seemed to worsen. He started working on some sort of cabin or primitive shelter, presumably to take up permanent residence next to the sprout, but before he could finish it, the thing went up in flames.

Hector spotted a group of unknown figures in the background, all carrying weapons. They were gone before he could discern much else about them, and only Agrian remained, covered in blood as he sat cross-legged, apparently meditating in front of the sprout.

He built another shelter. This one lasted a bit longer before being struck by lightning and going up in flames, too. So he built still one more shelter, this one even more primitive than the first two, probably because he didn't expect it to last very long, either.

And the vision slowed down again, showing Hector a scene of the man holding back a literal flood. He'd raised giant walls of dirt and rock in a big circle around the sprout and wooden hut, but the water was so high that some of it was still splashing over the top.

Hector spotted the blond man again, high in the sky this time, just hovering there and watching the scene unfold. Not lifting a single finger to help. And smiling wide, too.

That particular sight was enough to make Hector wonder if that blond dude was somehow the cause of all this crazy weather.

The vision sped back up again, and the insanity continued. Windstorms. Another drought. Hail the size of baseballs. Lightning crashing down in huge clusters. A dozen tornadoes. More flooding. A fucking earthquake.

Even as he watched it all happening with his own two eyes, Hector still wasn't sure how the sprout was surviving so much shit."

"2972

And it was all back-to-back, too, Hector noticed. If they were talking about a span of like two thousand years or whatever, then yeah, sure, all this stuff was bound to happen sooner or later, but the sprout was still barely up to his waist. He may not have been a botanist, but didn't that mean that all these disasters were taking place within like five years of one another or something?

The vision slowed again, this time on a raging wildfire. The forest in the distance was already consumed, lighting up the the entire horizon. The grass was alight, too, and the flames were approaching quickly.

Until they weren't.

The vision slowed too much, perhaps. Everything was reduced to a crawl. Flames mid-flicker. Smoke mid-billow. Countless glowing embers wafted in place, as if stuck in glass. There was one right in front of his face, and Hector couldn't help reaching out to try and touch it.

His fingers phased right through it. No surprise there, he supposed. Super weird and kinda awesome, but no surprise. He wasn't actually here, after all.

How trippy, he thought. The world in slow motion. A raging inferno, too.

Hmm. He didn't know what else he could do here other than admire the spectacle. Why had the vision slowed down so much? This seemed a little excessive. Was the Forge trying to show him something that was particularly fleeting?

He looked carefully, but nothing looked all that strange, really. Agrian was there. The sprout was there. And the flames all around. He couldn't even see the blond dude around, this time.

After a spell, however, he heard a new noise. The vision had sounds of its own, but they'd all slowed down so much as to become a kind of low, background hum at this point.

This new sound did not belong. While the world remained slow, this sound was much more recognizable to his ears--in terms of speed, at least. He couldn't fully place what it was, though. Maybe like a combination of cloth ripping and glass tearing. Repeatedly.

Then a dark hole appear in front of him. Several of them, in fact. All in midair."

"2973

Was the vision breaking down, Hector wondered? He sure hoped not, because he had no idea how to fix it. But hmm--Rasalased had mentioned something about a ""retelling"" being ""strenuous"" for the Forge, hadn't he? Was this what he'd meant?

Agh. So confusing.

The holes in the air kept growing. And distorting. Seemingly bending space--or the image of space, perhaps--around them.

Until at length, pitch black hands began reaching out of them.

And at that sight, Hector could only gape.

Inhuman figures emerged from their dark depths, crawling out like spiders with too-few limbs. They flopped onto the ground in mushy heaps, writhing there in apparent silence. Their forms were so strange that Hector's eyes had a hard time holding onto them. They seemed to have arms--kind of --but where were their heads? Or their torsos, even? In one moment, they looked vaguely humanoid, and in the next, they looked more like a pile of black sludge.

Not entirely unlike a worm of the Undercrust, he thought.

But not entirely like them, either. He could sometimes catch sight of horrified faces buried buried beneath their dark, slimy flesh, as if people were trapped inside their bodies, struggling to get out.

What in the fuck was happening here? How were these things involved with the wildfire?

The vision began to speed back up again, but only to real time. The inferno came alive in all its terrifying fury. Hector could feel the searing heat and smell the choking smoke as well as if he were actually there.

Agrian and the sprout were only a few steps away, and the illusion was so complete that he almost felt as if he might actually be able to go over and touch them. Maybe his hand wouldn't simply phase through the image this time--or at least, that was his what impulses were telling him.

He kept a solid grip on his faculties, though, trying to pay attention."
"s 2974

The weird slime monsters were creeping closer, seemingly unbothered by the flames.

Agrian slapped the ground with both hands, and a massive tidal wave of dirt flew up in the distance, blanketing half the fire on the horizon in an instant.

Hector was amazed, but within moments, the flames had somehow returned. And for some reason, Agrian didn't seem to notice the inhuman abominations coming his way, either.

Man, this looked bad. Hector wished he could help. He wondered how the hell Agrian was going to get out of this shit.

And damn, this heat was crazily realistic. He knew from firsthand experience. On many occasions, he'd been this close to a raging fire--typically whenever Garovel had led him to a burning building while out on patrol--and it felt exactly like this.

The Forge really knew how to create convincing illusions, didn't it? Well, fire was apparently its specialty, after all. It made sense.

...Right?

As he continued watching the scene unfold in real time, he couldn't ignore the growing question in the back of his mind.

This was all an illusion, wasn't it?

Obviously, the Forge didn't have the power to send him back in time or some shit. That wouldn't make any sense. It'd cause one of those paradox things that would destroy the fabric of the universe or whatever.

Admittedly, he wasn't exactly an expert on this stuff. His certainty waned by the moment.

Because, even if it made no logical sense to him... what if, somehow, it was real? And he ended up just standing here like a stupid asshole, gawking the whole time?

Agh.

Just as a test, he tried putting his hand out and summoning an iron javelin to skewer the closest slime monster.

No iron materialized.

The monster, however, still recoiled and shriveled away from him as if it had been hit."

"2975

Hector looked at his open palm, even more unsure of what had just happened than ever. An iron javelin probably wouldn't have been enough to repel the monster like that. It would've just stuck into it like a pincushion, probably.

So did that mean his iron was working differently in this place? Or was this just some other kind of power entirely? Granted to him by the Forge for this vision, perhaps?

Or maybe this was all him. The effects of Domain. Or Focus. Or the Supreme Will. Or whatever.

He didn't have the luxury of standing around and mulling it over, unfortunately. The monsters were multiplying, he noticed.

Their sludgy bodies quivered grotesquely before splitting apart--but the strangest thing was that they didn't seem to lose mass when doing so. Not like those worms from the Undercrust did. It was more like these things were making up straight up clones of themselves. And some were starting to walk on too legs, raising their arms up toward Agrian.

And toward Hector, too.

Agrian was still busy working on suppressing the flames, throwing dirt around like a dark ocean against a stubborn, burning coastline. Whether he'd noticed the monsters--or could even see them in the first place--Hector couldn't yet tell.

Hector attacked with his ""iron"" again. This time, he tried to imagine something more effective against sludge than a javelin. A big iron cylinder with, hollow inside to keep the sludge contained, but also with a perfectly-fitted block shooting down through it from the top.

A kind of makeshift hydraulic press, was what he was going for.

Instead, the chosen monster simply splattered apart like it had been hit with a bomb.

Hector blinked as black goo flew everywhere, even making it all the way over to him and hitting him in the face."

"2976

One surprise after another. So he could actually feel that, too? He wiped the slime off with his other hand, glad that not much had actually flown this far.

Agrian had been hit by it, too, and had stopped what he was doing to look around. Yeah, okay. He was definitely noticing the sludgy abominations now. And as he was looking around, his eyes suddenly stopped.

On Hector.

Oh.

Okay.

So this was happening now.

The surging flames reacquired both of their attentions. The creeping monsters weren't far behind in that regard, either.

Another tidal wave of dirt doused the entire western horizon, and Hector wondered if he might be able to accomplish anything remotely similar with this weird new power.

He put his hand toward the eastern horizon and imagined a tidal wave of iron blanketing all the fire there.

And... to his own amazement, it actually worked. The flames vanished in seconds, as if the oxygen had been sucked right out of the atmosphere or something.

Then a row of rock pillars sprang out of the ground, surrounding every abomination at once. They began trying to squeeze through, and then the pillars all connected to each other with nets of spikes, shredding the monsters like so much cheese.

And Hector was in awe again. There'd been dozens of them mere moments ago, and now they were little more than piles of trembling goo on the ground. Maybe Agrian didn't need any help, he thought.

Until, that was, he saw the fires that Agrian had just put out flare up again. Hector put it out for him with a simple wave of his hand. Then he turned, expecting to see the eastern horizon alight again also, but... it wasn't.

What the hell, man?

Well, whatever. He suppressed the flames to the north and south, too, feeling a bit like some sort of fire god all of a sudden."

"2977

Smoke still filled the area, making it obnoxious to breathe. Hector could see the scattered piles of sludge struggling to regather themselves. They weren't succeeding, though. Agrian's earthen cages were maintaining a solid grip on them.

The danger seemed to have passed.

Wow.

If only all his battles were this easy, Hector thought.

Agrian turned toward him again, sizing him up. The man said something, but there was no way in hell Hector could understand whatever language that was. Nykeirian, maybe? That was the language the books in the tree had been written in, right?

Boy, a reaper sure would've come in handy right about now. Hector wondered how Garovel was faring through all of this.

The vision began to speed up again.

It accelerated much faster this time, judging by how fast the sprout was growing now. And the natural disasters seemed to stop, too.

Hmm. Yeah, they probably hadn't been very natural at all, had they? But why'd they stop? He had a feeling that it wasn't because of his intervention. Maybe the blond dude had died in some distant country or something and therefore left Agrian alone, finally.

Hector could see him doing something to the sprout as it continued to grow. He placed some kind of bulbous orb in the middle of it, which seemed pretty weird until Hector realized what was happening.

The trunk of the sprout gradually expanded outward, around the orb. And Agrian kept replacing the orb with wider and wider ones, until finally he placed a big, wooden slab there.

This must've been how he'd managed to create such a huge room in the middle of the tree without killing it. He hadn't dug all that space out after the fact. It had been hollow from the beginning."

"2978

Watching Agrian work was kind of amazing, Hector felt. Seeing the tree take shape, knowing what it would eventually become--he couldn't pull his eyes away.

Well, he was a sucker for construction, too, so maybe that factored into things a bit.

By the time the vision slowed down again, the sprout had grown into a full blown tree--not quite the gargantuan one that Hector had come to know in the modern day, but still pretty damn impressive. And the room that would contain the Forge had finally finished taking shape, too.

Agrian was already working on the Forge, as well. The base was about halfway complete, which was somewhat surprising in its own way, Hector thought.

The base of the Forge was just a big stone slab--or that was what it had looked like, at least. But at this incomplete stage, Hector could see a cluster of living roots inside it, seemingly pulled up from underground. Agrian was pouring a murky, dark green liquid in there, too, and as he did, the roots therein began to flex and glow with an ethereal white light.

That kind of light was familiar, Hector thought--specifically, because it wasn't touching its surroundings. It was like the way that reapers could glow in the dark without actually lighting up anything around them.

After he finished pouring, Agrian started doing something to the stone. Touching it all over. As if giving it a massage or something.

Pretty weird, but at this point, Hector had expended just about all of his bewilderment. Honestly, he felt like nothing else about this vision would be able to surprise him. He was prepared to just accept whatever crazy shit happened next and roll with it.

That notion was soon proven wrong, however, when he watched

Agrian take a break from his work and step outside the tree, perhaps for a breath of fresh air. There, he witnessed a new figure approach Agrian.

A hulking, feathery figure."

"2979

It was a Sparrow, Hector saw. It looked at once familiar and strange to him. Familiar, because at a glance, he could've absolutely mistaken it for Hanton or Pauline Gaolanet. And strange, because he began to notice many subtle differences.

Its huge body was still quite plump and round, but its plumage was noticeably sharper. Not so soft and fluffy. The overall color was similar as well, aside from a slightly more golden tinge.

And the head. A cluster of feathers protruded from its temples, almost like a crown, fluttering with each movement the bird made.

The real question, though, was if its telepathic abilities were any different. Hector still remembered what Rasalased had told him about Wrobels being ""the worst of all possible enemies.""

Were these the ones he'd been referring to? And for Ras to have said that, just how powerful had these guys been?

Agrian did not appear surprised by the bird's sudden presence. They faced one another for a long time, with only Agrian saying anything aloud.

Hector couldn't help wondering why he was being shown this scene in the first place. Did the Forge expect him to understand what they were saying? Even when half the conversation wasn't coming through the vision, and the other half was in a language he'd never heard before today?

Hmm.

Maybe he should try talking to the Forge again himself, Hector decided. ""Hello?"" he said aloud.

His voice carried no weight, however. He felt it in his mind, but it was like the sound didn't reach his ears. Not the like the sounds of the vision were.

Ah, wait, had he not put enough willpower into it or something? He tried again.

""Candle,"" he said aloud. ""Hello? Can you understand me?""

That was better. The sound definitely carried that time.

How weird."

"2980

The vision stopped, as if the entire world had been put on pause.

Then arrived those rhythmic pulses that he'd heard before, the ones that Rasalased had been conversing with.

He still had no idea what they were saying, but hey, it was something. It meant that the Forge had heard him, at least--perhaps even that it had understood him.

Maybe he could work with that.

""I'm sorry,"" said Hector. ""I can't understand what you're saying. Can you understand what I'm saying?""

More unintelligible noises.

Hmm.

""Uh... Okay, let's try this. If you can understand me, then beep once for yes, twice for no.""

There came a period of silence. Then a single beep.

Holy shit, Hector thought, exhaling an amazed laugh. What the fuck, that actually worked? He felt like he'd just made contact with an alien species or something. ""O-okay, well, uh..." Shit, he could start asking it all sorts of questions now. Where to start?

His eyes fell upon the motionless Agrian. Maybe they should start off easy. Confirm a few things. He pointed at the man. ""Is that Agrian?""

Two beeps arrived.

Hector blinked. Wait, what?

He needed to ask that again. ""That man there,"" he said, pointing with more fervor this time, ""the one who worked so hard to keep you safe, is that Agrian?""

Again, there were two beeps.

Oh shit...

Hector rubbed his forehead, suddenly having to rethink everything he'd just seen--and partially lived through. If this dude wasn't Agrian, then who the hell was he?

Agh. Didn't seem like he'd be able to ask anything other than yes or no questions here.

He wondered if the others were having better luck than him. The Forge was probably showing them similar visions, right? So maybe they were way ahead of him in terms of communicating with it by now."

"2981

Oh well. No point in worrying about any of that right now, Hector supposed. He needed to focus on what he could do--just in case this opportunity to learn more about the Forge didn't come around again, for some reason.

""This man here is your creator, isn't he?"" asked Hector.

One beep in the affirmative.

""...So is that why you don't like the name Agrian's Candle, then? Because it gives credit to the wrong person?""

Another lone beep.

Aha.

But then there two more beeps arrived.

""What? Did you just say yes and no?""

A single beep.

Hmm. What could that mean? Yes and no...

Needed more information. Coming up with more questions like this was kinda tough, because he kept thinking about all the things that didn't have a simple, one word answer.

But hey. Maybe he was going about this the wrong way. This was an artifact of untold power, apparently capable of creating enormously elaborate visions. It didn't necessarily have to answer his questions with words, now did it?

""...Can you show me who the real Agrian was?"" he asked.

Another affirmative beep arrived, and the vision sped forward. The tree grew to even greater heights, and the Forge was nearly complete.

But something had definitely happened in the intervening years. The images had flashed by so quickly, but Hector was sure that he'd caught a glimpse of some crazy shit in there. Lots of fire or something. He'd have to go back and check on that afterwards, if possible.

In front of him, he saw a man standing under the tree. His back was to Hector, but that wasn't the first thing that Hector noticed.

The tombstone was.

Hector stepped closer for a better look, unsure what to expect. The tombstone had an inscription on it that he couldn't read, but as he circled around the guy, he was surprised to see a familiar face.

It was the same blond dude from before, the one who'd seemingly been harassing the Forge's creator."

"2982

And Hector looked, but no one else was around. So this asshole was the real Agrian, then? He'd kinda suspected as much. What he hadn't expected, though, was the expression on the guy's face.

He almost looked like a different person. Not quite older, exactly, but definitely more haggard, like most of the life had been drained out of him. The smug smile that had seemed a permanent fixture on his face before was nowhere to be found now.

And actually, Hector could see that he was crying.

Damn.

Hector's gaze fell to the tombstone. He couldn't read the inscription on it, but he had a pretty good idea who it must've been for. He just wished he'd gotten the poor guy's name. Maybe Rasalased or Abbas would be able to tell him later.

But the Forge wasn't yet complete, Hector recalled. And the only one here now was Agrian, who seemed to be pretty torn up about the original creator's death. Did that mean...?

As the vision began to speed up again, Hector saw Agrian lingering around the tree for many days. Months, maybe. The man just seemed to be examining everything closely. Hector wasn't sure what he was doing until Agrian finally set to work.

Perhaps he'd just been trying to understand his friend's creation this whole time.

Had they actually been friends, though? Hector had to wonder.

Hmm. Life could be weird like that, he supposed. Old enemies being future allies.

But wait a minute. Didn't this mean that Agrian still tried to name the Forge after himself? Even after all the shit the original guy went through?

It did, didn't it? Wow, so he really was an asshole, then. Hector had been prepared to give him a bit of sympathy, but now that was all dried up again.

But he supposed that did technically mean that the Candle had two creators. Hence the Forge's confusing ""yes and no"" answer."

"2983

The next question on Hector's mind was whether or not this Forge had ever actually seen any use. If Agrian had finished it but also fucked it up by naming it improperly, then had Agrian even been able to make anything with it? Had the thing ever been turned on, for that matter?

As he kept watching, he was a bit surprised to see that Agrian had indeed managed to create something.

Some sort of lantern, it looked like.

Hector lingered on the scene of him pulling it out of the Forge for quite some time. Apparently, the big glass orb could split itself open like an egg in order to let its contents be retrieved.

Even more than that, though, Hector was interested in the actual creation process. It looked like the base of the Forge functioned as a receptacle for materials. He saw Agrian tossing things in there rather haphazardly, chunks of metal and glass, rocks and oil, followed by a final topping of a melted, red hot material before closing it back up again.

And as Agrian worked, tree roots came up through the base, extending through the giant orb like tentacles as a warm glow appeared in the center.

Hector watched closely, asking the Forge to keep rewinding and playing the scene over and over for him.

As far as he could tell, it was the roots that were doing the heavy lifting here. They seemed to operate with fine motor precision, handling objects delicately, while Agrian merely held his hand to the glass and kept his eyes closed. They would sometimes grab two or more separate pieces out of the base and then wrap them in a wooden cocoon. The sphere's glow would then pulse more greatly for a period of time--maybe a few hours, maybe a few days--and then the cocoon would fall away, revealing its work. Either the previous pieces were now fused together as by welding, or they were completely different, as if blended entirely into one, new material."

"2984

Other times, the roots didn't bother with a cocoon. They molded things in front of his eyes, shaving away at metal as if it were no more resilient than a bar of soap. Or they would slot shaped pieces together--and not always successfully, either. He could see that it was a slow process, sometimes relying on simple trial and error.

That was probably the result of the user, though, right? Agrian looked like he was just standing there with his eyes closed, but he must've been controlling the roots with his mind.

All in all, it was hard not to be impressed. Being able to see the Forge in action for the first time was pretty amazing. He hoped Abbas was able to see this, too.

Overall, though, Hector figured that creating something would probably take a really long time, especially if the desired item was super complicated. Plus, Agrian had probably been more skilled with the Forge than Abbas currently was.

Yeah. He should keep a handle on his expectations here, Hector felt. Even with all this new information at their disposal, it would probably be a while yet before Abbas was pumping out any crazy artifacts of power.

But hmm.

There was obviously still plenty more to learn here. Not just about the Forge, but about the history surrounding it, too.

Thousands of years.

Thankfully, the vast majority of it probably involved the tree just sitting here, abandoned in an empty field. That would make going through and observing all the important parts a bit easier. Hopefully.

Regardless, Hector didn't intend to rush. As much as he wanted to get back to reality, he wasn't about to waste this opportunity. Rasalased seemed to have a habit of kicking him out of conversations prematurely, so perhaps Hector was a little more reluctant than he otherwise would be to let go of this treasure trove of historical details in front of him."

"2985 -- CCLIX.

Hell, for all he knew, this whole vision trip could be a one-time thing. Perhaps after the Forge was fully functional, he wouldn't be able to communicate with it directly like this anymore.

He wanted to think that was unlikely, but then again, there was at least a good chance that Abbas would be using the Forge around the clock.

And certainly, crafting items of potentially limitless value would take priority over future trips down memory lane like this.

So he took his time, wanting to get as much out of this vision as he could. Maybe that wasn't necessary, since the others were probably all learning way more than him, but eh. There was no harm in going the extra mile, he felt. That, and he was honestly just curious.

As thoughtful and careful as he was trying to be, however, he did not realize what he was getting himself into.

Chapter Two Hundred Fifty-Nine: 'The abiding rumble...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Abbas sat on the edge of the ancient bed, leaning forward with his hands folded in front of him. He rocked himself slightly back and forth as he waited, trying with some difficulty to have patience.

It had been hours already, and Hector had not returned to himself. The boy was just standing there, still as a statue with his hands pressed to the glass of the Forge.

The questions that had previously raced through his mind in an endless loop had finally settled down, giving way to little more than silent concern.

At first, the waiting had been a bother. Then quite obnoxious.

Now it was just worrisome.

He hoped with every fiber of his being that he had not unwittingly led the young Lord of Warrenhold to his doom. If his soul had become trapped or lost within the Forge... Abbas did not know what he would do."

"2985 -- CCLIX.

Hell, for all he knew, this whole vision trip could be a one-time thing. Perhaps after the Forge was fully functional, he wouldn't be able to communicate with it directly like this anymore.

He wanted to think that was unlikely, but then again, there was at least a good chance that Abbas would be using the Forge around the clock. And certainly, crafting items of potentially limitless value would take priority over future trips down memory lane like this.

So he took his time, wanting to get as much out of this vision as he could. Maybe that wasn't necessary, since the others were probably all learning way more than him, but eh. There was no harm in going the extra mile, he felt. That, and he was honestly just curious.

As thoughtful and careful as he was trying to be, however, he did not realize what he was getting himself into.

Chapter Two Hundred Fifty-Nine: 'The abiding rumble...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Abbas sat on the edge of the ancient bed, leaning forward with his hands folded in front of him. He rocked himself slightly back and forth as he waited, trying with some difficulty to have patience.

It had been hours already, and Hector had not returned to himself. The boy was just standing there, still as a statue with his hands pressed to the glass of the Forge.

The questions that had previously raced through his mind in an endless loop had finally settled down, giving way to little more than silent concern.

At first, the waiting had been a bother. Then quite obnoxious.

Now it was just worrisome.

He hoped with every fiber of his being that he had not unwittingly led the young Lord of Warrenhold to his doom. If his soul had become trapped or lost within the Forge... Abbas did not know what he would do."

"2986

Conventional wisdom would dictate that he should dive back into the Forge himself and try his damndest to retrieve Hector as quickly as possible, but that was not an option, at the moment.

He'd been shut out. By Rasalased, no less.

He couldn't even sense the flow of ardor within the Forge, anymore. And Rasalased had stopped talking to him, too. Whether that was because the Dry God no longer COULD talk to him or because he simply wished not to, Abbas did not know.

But the last thing that Rasalased had said to him was to ""sit and have patience.""

And Abbas was doing his best to listen to his revered ancestor.

But holy Oasis, it was growing more difficult by the minute.

He had not expected Rasalased to show up like that and completely throw a wrench into everything. If he'd known this was all going to happen, he never would have suggested that Hector touch the Forge in the first place.

Garovel, for his part, was shockingly calm. He was just hovering there next to Abbas and Worwal, waiting quietly. The expression on his ethereal, reptilian face had remained unchanged this whole time.

'Are you not concerned?' Worwal had asked him.

'Eh, not really,' said Garovel. 'I'm used to these sorts of things happening. This is just Hector being Hector.'

Abbas didn't know if he could really believe that. Reapers often liked to put up a veneer of self-certainty and confidence, in part to help put those around them at ease and in part, perhaps, to stroke their own egos. So maybe the reaper was just acting.

But if he was, then Abbas had to admit... Garovel was damn good at it.

And it made a degree of sense, as well. Abbas had known there was something strange about the young Lord Darksteel. Even if he wasn't as old as he pretended to be, that didn't mean he was weak or harmless."

"2987

But if Hector was fine and there was nothing to worry about, then what in the world was taking so long? Surely, Hector would not have been making him wait like this intentionally, so it could only have been Rasalased's doing.

Or the Forge's.

The fact that the Forge had a will of its own was no great revelation, of course. Abbas had known that it was at least half-sentient since the moment he first dove in to inspect its ardor.

But this was... unexpected, to put it mildly. Abbas had no prior experiences to rely upon here. The Earth Cruncher had never done anything even remotely similar to this. Capturing someone's soul and speaking to them directly for hours at a time?

Assuming that was really what was happening.

He couldn't imagine what else Rasalased or the Forge would be doing in there with Hector's soul. It had to be some sort of information exchange, right?

Abbas tried to use the time wisely and meditate or have Worwal read a few of the books that were left, but neither attempt panned out. He couldn't concentrate, and apparently neither could Worwal.

'In retrospect,' the reaper said privately and in Valgan, 'perhaps it was unwise to allow one of the Shards of the Dry God to come into contact with a Fusion Forge.'

When he put it like that, Abbas felt like a bit of an idiot. 'Agh... but it didn't come into contact with it. Not directly.'

'Yes, it had a human being serving as its connecting rod. Is that better or worse?'

Abbas stifled a sigh. Frankly, he'd forgotten that Hector was carrying a Shard around with him at all times. Among the many oddities about the boy, that had perhaps been the first one that Abbas had learned of. That, from a conversation with Asad back in Sair, which seemed somehow like a lifetime ago, now."

"2988

He had taken Asad at his word, of course, that this Hector Goffe of Atreya had somehow become bonded with one of the Shards and that it would be foolish and cruel to take the Shard away from him... but still. Perhaps on some level, Abbas had harbored doubts. If there hadn't been so many other pressing matters at the time, he may have even put up more of a fight and insisted that Hector remain in Sair with them while they studied this mysterious bond.

Looking back, he was quite glad that he'd been too preoccupied at the time.

Having actually heard Rasalased's voice himself now, any lingering feelings in that regard were well and truly crushed.

Hector Goffe was indeed a most suitable ""Shardkeeper,"" as Rasalased had laboriously explained.

Abbas rubbed his forehead. To think that he'd had a conversation with the Dry God... and that, furthermore, it had been such an absurd conversation.

Rasalased was not an easy person to talk to, Abbas had learned. And apparently, Hector had been doing this for a while now. What kind of saintly patience must that boy possess?

Even now, reflecting on it all, Abbas wasn't sure if he had learned anything truly novel or useful. Rasalased had showered him with strange compliments and vaguely ominous warnings.

""Be ever mindful,"" the Dry God had told him. ""Our horizon dims in the shadow of many perilous futures. Rest well but not easy.""

And that had been one of the more coherent things.

It should have been an absolute honor and privilege to be able to speak directly with Rasalased in such a manner, but honestly? Abbas was kind of hoping that it never happened again.

Maybe he was just tired, though. It had been a long and messy day."
"2989

Between that and all the talk about patience being ""not merely a virtue but a liberating necessity,"" about ""Young Hector"" being a ""budding Gartanas,"" and about ""time not being time,"" Abbas didn't know where his own mind was, right now. Perhaps the smartest thing to do would be to lay down on that ancient bed over there and have Worwal knock him out.

The thought was certainly tempting. Maybe the world would make sense again after he woke up.

Wishful thinking, most likely.

No, he wanted to hear what Hector had to say after he returned from his ""journey"" through the Forge. That was more important than his fatigue.

Ugh. He had so many questions, but they were all muddled together in his mind. If nothing else, he would have to begin studying--

Hmm?

What was that?

A light in the Forge. Within the glass orb, it was faint but there.

And it was sustaining itself, too. Not like before, when it had only flickered and sputtered.

Abbas stood up slowly, eyes unblinking as he took in the scene before him.

The Forge had reactivated.

--++--++--

Raul Blackburn sure hoped this was going to work.

It probably would, he kept telling himself. He just had to keep his head. To stay alert. With Invisibility as his disposal, the chance of failure here was virtually zero.

In theory.

The VMP couldn't possibly have any Invisibility-penetrating detection technology on their hands yet, right? This power was still too new. Abolish might have developed their own countermeasures for it already, but from all the intel he'd been gathering over the last several days, the VMP and Abolish were not directly working together in that way.

Phew.

If someone had told him a day ago that he would be single-handedly breaking into a heavily fortified compound belonging to the Vantalay Military Police, he would have told them they were insane.

This had not been part of the plan, to say the very least of things."
"2990

But then again, nothing had really gone the way it was supposed to ever since they arrived in this crazy land. Originally, they'd only been sent to gather information on the Sword of Unso and possibly retrieve it. But then the war broke out, and they were suddenly tasked with checking on the little town of Miro. Then his brothers were captured. Then reinforcements arrived to help him rescue them. Then a rather secretive group of strangers appeared and gave them aberration-harvested Invisibility rings.

And even after all the action they'd seen, even after recovering his brothers Adan and Esai, the stalemate over Miro had not changed.

That was why they had decided to adjust their tactics. The Blackburn Triplets had been tasked with gathering intel again while the rest of the group remained behind to hold Miro.

It was a risk, of course. The Lady Evangelina Stroud had not seemed terribly pleased with the idea, and Raul couldn't exactly fault her for it, either, considering two of them had gotten captured before. She had every reason to be worried about a repeat of that scenario.

But it was still the right move, Raul felt, and he was glad his elders had decided to go for it. The Triplets weren't all that useful in holding Miro. That was largely up to Leo and Cousin Melchor. The brothers' talents were better utilized this way.

And he didn't just feel that way because it had let him return to Ridgemark for a few days and enjoy a bit more of that luxury. That had certainly been a nice bonus, though, after camping under the stars almost every night and participating in pitched battles with a bunch of violent psychopaths.

Sadly, Ridgemark had proved more difficult to indulge in this time."
"2991

For one thing, just knowing that his kin were still stuck in Miro was kind of a downer. It was tough to relax even for a moment when he knew that he could've been working, instead. Time was precious, after all.

And for another thing, the city itself seemed to have changed. It had become significantly tenser, Raul thought. At first, he thought that the battle at Miro might somehow be responsible for this shift, but he soon learned otherwise.

It was the RPMP. The Ridgemark Private Military Police. They had begun openly clashing with the VMP near the city limits. And as a result, the RPMP's presence within the city had increased dramatically.

They were worried about spies and saboteurs.

Plus, there were both Vanguardian and Abolish forces in the city, too. They weren't fighting, but that was only because of the RPMP. If that grip loosened, then Ridgemark would almost certainly turn into a battleground, too.

All things considered, it was a nutty situation, Raul knew. Four different armies, all in such close proximity. Five, including the Rainlords. How the RPMP had managed to keep the peace this long, Raul had no idea. It was certainly impressive, though.

And to top it off, the city was still accepting tourists like everything was fine. Every casino Raul visited was packed with people, even more than he remembered.

It was not, however, merely due to his own skill as an intelligence gatherer that he was able to learn so much about the difficult situation in Ridgemark, at the moment. That had been part of it, of course, but he couldn't rightly ignore the more obvious reason.

The RPMP had made contact with him directly.

He didn't actually get complete confirmation that it was them, but it was the only thing that made any sense. Of the other three factions in the city, only Abolish might have been able to identify him at all, and even that was unlikely. He had almost never removed Invisibility during the fighting."

"2992

Plus, if Abolish were the ones to identify him, they wouldn't have sent someone to talk. They would've sent someone to either kill or capture him. Probably the latter. Then they could've used him as leverage against his brethren in Miro.

Not that he would have allowed that to happen, of course. He'd sooner destroy his own brain and be sent back to Warrenhold than let this mission become compromised in that way.

He knew that would most likely mean being unable to return to Vantalay, as his elders probably wouldn't green light a second trip here, considering the circumstances. But it would still be worth it, if it came down to that.

All that being said, Raul was still hoping to use this mission to prove himself as reliable to the elders. And to Lord Goffe.

He knew his brothers felt the same, too. After their time as Abolish captives, they'd been in rough shape. The only reason Abolish hadn't killed them, apparently, was because they weren't sure if Adan and Esai were actually servants or not. His brothers had played the vulnerability card--and quite well, apparently.

But that hadn't saved them from multiple daily beatings and worse.

Much worse.

Abolish had ripped their fingernails off, one by one. They'd branded their faces with cattle prods. They'd taken Adan's left ear, and Esai's right. They'd whipped them a half-dozen times and then flayed the skin off their backs. They'd threatened to kill Miroans in front of them. They'd poked out Esai's left eye and started pulling out Adan's teeth with pliers. And apparently, Abolish had been planning to slowly saw off their feet next, followed by their entire legs.

Raul had never seen his brothers in such terrible states. He'd wanted to send them back to Warrenhold, but they wouldn't hear of it.

""We're still breathing,"" said Esai. ""We can still help.""
"2993

He was concerned for them, but he'd also never been prouder of his brothers.

Truthfully, Raul wasn't entirely sure if he would've been able to endure such torture without cracking. It was tempting to think that, yeah, of course he would be able to withstand it. He was a servant, after all. The psychological threat of death or irreparable damage was all but non-existent.

But there was more to it than just that, he knew. The effects of that much pain on the body? Along with the sweet temptation to just tell the interrogators what they wanted to hear and let it all be over?

Plus, it wasn't just about endurance, either. It was also about performance. If his brothers had endured it too well, that might have tipped off their captors, too. They had to play the part of true non-servants.

Raul had a feeling that he would never really know whether or not he could handle such a situation until he was face to face with it.

But there was no doubt that his brothers had conducted themselves remarkably well. When their fellow captives from Miro discovered that the two of them were, in truth, a part of the rescuing force, the surprise on many of their haggard faces was unmistakable. They'd been convinced, too.

And they were full of praise for his brothers, as well. For Esai, in particular. He seemed to have bonded with the Miroans quite quickly, Raul noticed. A small family among them had apparently been the target of one of the crueller Abolish bastards, until Esai managed to draw attention away from them and onto himself. He'd even managed to slay the monster when battle first broke out by catching the reaper off guard.

That was the first time Esai had ever killed a reaper.

And Raul knew the strangeness of that feeling. His own first had been at Dunehall, which wasn't all that long ago."

"2994

Esai had been noticeably quieter since then. He was probably replaying things in his head over and over again, wondering if it could have gone differently.

Or perhaps just reveling in the accomplishment.

That was how it had been for Raul. A bit of both. Conflicting feelings.

He shouldn't feel good about taking a life. But it was well justified. Abolish had it coming. Absolutely.

Why should he feel bad or guilty about delivering justice? Someone had to.

But that line of thinking was a slippery slope, he knew. He had to keep a clear head about these things. All those stories about servants losing their minds after so many years--he was already starting to see why that might be the case.

Power really was a terrifying thing, wasn't it? And he didn't even have that much yet.

Perhaps that was why Cousin Melchor had always refused to lead House Blackburn. The man already had enough power and didn't want more.

If so, then Raul could admire that decision.

Regardless, none of that was on his mind at the moment. The only thing that concerned him right now was getting through this VMP installation without alerting anyone to his presence.

It made for quite the imposing sight, too, as he approached. Nestled between two cloud-tipped mountains, the compound was blocking the only passage forward for a hundred miles or more. There was no way he could climb those sheer cliffs without undead vigor or his alteration ability over friction--and the latter would involve creating about a hundred landslides and avalanches in order to reshape the terrain.

Which wouldn't be very stealthy of him. And would almost certainly kill any hapless bystanders in the area.

He thought about provoking a landslide nearby just to draw some of the personnel out of the fortress before sneaking through it, but eh, that would probably be more trouble than it was worth, he figured. And sure, this area seemed pretty desolate, but it would still be dangerous."
"2995

This was fine. With the aberration ring, he was able to just wait for the front gate to open and walk through. There was semi-regular traffic through here, due to this being the only road through the mountains.

Lo and behold, his patience paid off. Less than an hour of sitting next to the entrance was all it took for the huge metal gates to start creaking open.

A group of soldiers came out first, not yet allowing the line of waiting vehicles to pass through. They were going to check each and every one, Raul figured, but he didn't intend to hang around and watch. He stepped softly through the small opening in the gate and made his way inside.

Wow, the place was bigger than he expected. And there were even more soldiers around that he thought there would be, too. The VMP wasn't hurting for manpower, apparently.

Hmm. It wasn't a straight shot to the other side, apparently. The only reason he'd come here was because he wanted to use the pass through the mountains, but it looked like the layout of this installation was going to make that simple goal a pain in the ass.

Which was a bit strange, he felt. This gravel road was clearly meant to accommodate motor traffic, so why did they make it wind around so many buildings and go off in weird directions?

Ah, perhaps it was for security. The place was currently serving as a military checkpoint, so they probably didn't want people trying to blow through it at top speed. A labyrinthine design definitely made it more defensible.

Unfortunately, that meant Raul ended up wandering around for quite a while just to get his bearings. And with so many soldiers around, it only got more nerve-racking as the time dragged on. Sure, they couldn't see him, but they could still hear him. Or bump into him, if he wasn't careful."

"2996

As he tried to find his way through the compound, he overheard a surprising variety of languages. Valgan, Mohssian, Gishi, and even a bit of what sounded to him like Tharish.

Raul was only fluent in Mohssian and Valgan, but he knew a little Gishi, too. Along with Kotaka, Maricot, and Vaelish. If that was really Tharish he was hearing, then did that mean they were hosting foreign guests here? As far as he knew, Tharish wasn't even spoken on Eloa. It was an Ardoran language.

He hadn't come here to spy on the VMP, but he was suddenly growing curious. His current objective was merely to keep making his way north, but his overall purpose here in Vantalay was to gather information, so maybe it wouldn't hurt to listen a little harder for anything interesting. At least until he managed to find the exit, that was.

Most of the conversations were just the soldiers talking to each other, usually to complain. Hmm. Morale didn't seem very high here.

Maybe the war wasn't going well for their side.

The VMP was the primary armed force of the Vantalayan government. The VMP, therefore, was the main aggressor in the invasion of Vantalay's neighbor, Czacoa. Supposedly, Abolish was here to support them, but Raul had yet to see any actual evidence of that. So far, he'd only seen the bastards attempting to exploit the civilians in Miro.

Maybe things were different in northern Vantalay, closer to the war front with Czacoa. In the south, at least, he suspected that the reason Abolish wasn't moving to help the VMP was because of the Vanguard's presence in Ridgemark. If Abolish started giving obvious support, then the RPMP would be more likely to side with the Vanguard against them instead of merely remaining neutral."

"2997

It was also clear, however, that the RPMP really didn't want to side the Vanguard, if at all possible. Why else would they have decided to help the Rainlords run Abolish out of Miro? They were probably worried about inviting the Vanguard in and then never being able to get rid of them.

Like what had happened to Sair.

That was Raul's interpretation of events, anyway. But even after all the intel he'd gathered over the course of this mission, he was sure that he was still missing some of the big picture here.

So he couldn't help himself. When he happened upon a tall building marked ""Officer's Quarters,"" he decided to give it a closer look. He had to wait for the door to open, but that was no great issue. The facility was bustling with activity.

The conversations therein were a bit more interesting to him than the ones outside. There was talk of the war in here, of the progress being made. The officers' morale seemed a bit higher than that of the rank and file. Maybe that wasn't abnormal, though. Raul didn't have much experience with this sort of thing.

Arumoro did, however. Perhaps he would ask the reaper's opinion later, once he wasn't trying to concentrate so hard on listening to a half-dozen other conversations.

At length, he overheard one by the stairs that piqued his curiosity.

""--we don't depart soon, their situation will worsen,"" someone was saying in Mohssian. ""Graves could move against them at any time.""

""I disagree,"" said someone else. ""If he abandons Ridgemark, it would allow Abolish to join us there and overrun the RPMP. He wouldn't risk losing the entirety of the South to us.""

""You underestimate the capitalist swine. Between the Jailer, the Black Artisan, and the Linebreaker, they have more than enough power to hold Ridgemark without the Vanguard's help.""

"2998

""Don't be absurd,"" said the other voice. ""Their spirits are weak and corrupt, driven only by greed. They would stand no chance before even Whitehand alone, but there would also be Riev, Jorga, Mikas, the Killer, the Tiger, the Seeker, the--""

""Hmph. It is precisely that kind of overconfidence that worries me.""

Hmm. That was first time that Raul had actually managed to get some specific names or monikers. Apart from Graves and the Killer, he only recognized a couple of them.

The Seeker might've been referring to the Seeker of Ardora, an infamous ""treasure hunter"" of Abolish. The name sounded less menacing than it should have, which was probably by design. The guy had a reputation for procuring treasure by any means necessary, including but not limited to kidnapping and homicide.

If that was really who they were talking about, then Raul found that strange. The Triplets had come to Vantalay in search of a treasure of their own, the Sword of Unso, but it was already in Abolish's possession, specifically in the Killer of Krohin, Thaddeus Croll's possession. Did that mean the Seeker wanted it, too? That seemed unlikely.

But not impossible, Raul supposed. Trying to discern an Abolisher's motive for doing anything was perhaps a fool's errand. There could have been any number of unreasonable explanations for their actions.

The other one he'd heard of was the Linebreaker, but he could've sworn that nickname belonged to a Vanguardian who was famously gigantic. The name supposedly came from his ability to charge headlong into a defensive formation like a bull and still make it back alive. If he was working for the RPMP now, then it must have been a fairly recent change. Not more than a few years, probably.

In any event, it was decent intel. Maybe he should stick around here for a bit longer."

"2999

He kept eavesdropping for a while and heard similar discussions being held. Different perspectives on who should do what and how they should do it. The way some of these guys talked, they made it sound like if only they were the ones in charge, then the war would've already been won.

But one thing was consistent, at least: their hatred of the RPMP.

These VMP officers were believers in their cause--that was for sure. And the RPMP, being led by a small group of powerful companies in Ridgemark, represented the exact opposite of what these guys were supposedly fighting for.

Raul had already heard about the ideological divide between Vantalayan government and Ridgemark many times, but hearing it from this side was a bit different.

""Burns me up,"" said one officer among a small crowd eating at a table. ""Selfish bastards. And for what? To fill their coffers? Our brothers fight and die, sacrifice their lives for the future of our country, and those traitors in Ridgemark have the gall to claim that they're the ones fighting for the people?!""

""Aye,"" said the one next to him. ""They only care about money. Hallick's got it right. They're inhuman. No compassion in them. No sense of right or wrong. At this point, I wonder if they even have red blood in their veins.""

Graham Hallick was the Vantalayan Prime Minister. He was the one who'd been spearheading the effort to centralize almost everything in the country over the last few years. The banks, agriculture, entertainment--one industry at a time, every company in the country had been forced to employ a ""team of government liaisons"" who would ensure that ""the needs of the nation came before the needs of the company.""

And apparently, economic growth had been explosive. Until Ridgemark broke away, that was."

"3000

If he were to take a cold, detached stance as neutral third party, then Raul could empathize equally with both sides' perspectives. For the RPMP, they were just defending themselves against an oppressive government. And for the VMP, they were just trying to enforce the law.

Ideologically, though, it was a bit murkier for him. He didn't really have strong opinions either way regarding economic systems, nor did he harbor much love in his heart for large, money-grubbing corporations.

But at least they weren't working with Abolish or invading their neighboring nations. And unlike the rest of the country, Ridgemark was actually protecting its citizens from violent exploitation. On those points, actions spoke quite a bit louder than words, Raul felt.

These VMP officers seemed to think they were fighting for the sake of the people, but having seen what happened to Miro--and several other villages on the way here--Raul had to disagree.

Unlike Miro, most of them had already been abandoned. That might've implied that the VMP had successfully helped them evacuate, but Raul had seen the decimated homes, the overturned vehicles, the rotting corpses in the streets.

And the mass graves.

If he was feeling generous, then maybe he could argue that the VMP wasn't directly responsible for all that stuff, that Abolish was acting without their knowledge. But that didn't mean the VMP was free of blame, either.

And frankly, he wasn't feeling generous.

In fact, the more he listened to these officers talk, the more irritated he became. Did they really not know what was happening out there? Or were they just so wrapped up in their ideological war that they'd become blind to the atrocities being committed against their own countrymen?

If these had been Sairi soldiers, he would've been ashamed to even associate with them."

"3001

He had to maintain his composure, though. Getting riled up here was pointless. Finding useful intel was the only thing that mattered. If this place couldn't help in that regard, then he should just keep heading north.

It had been a long trip so far, walking cross-country on foot like this. His friction power let him move much more quickly over sufficiently level terrain, but Vantalay was so huge that it would still be a couple more days before he reached his destination, barring any unforeseen complications.

His actual objective for this journey was not merely to gain intel, however. It was to reach the town of Kristol, where the infamous Bridgewater Prison was located. According to his contact at the RPMP, that was where the man named ""John Wright"" was being held.

That whole situation had been a mess of its own to unravel. When the request came down from Lord Goffe himself to look for this Wright character, the Rainlords hadn't really known what to do about it. Apparently, Lord Goffe said that it wasn't a priority, but hey, it was an opportunity to go for bonus points. And the Blackburn Triplets loved bonus points.

So Raul decided to risk asking the RPMP about him. The guy's name wasn't actually John Wright, after all. It was Donald Elias. So using it wouldn't expose his Atreyan ties.

It might give the RPMP the impression that they were working with Intar, however, because apparently, John Wright was captured with a group of Intarian spies some fifteen years ago.

So yeah. A mess.

He'd gotten permission from his elders in Miro, though, so that was a plus. Unlike the last time, when the Triplets had sorta-kinda gone off without telling anyone, resulting in two of them getting captured, he had actual approval for his recklessness, now."

"3002

Which was pretty surprising, honestly. When he'd asked if he could go, he'd thought for sure that they would say no. But for whatever reason, they hadn't.

True, he'd technically only said that he wanted to go there in order to gather more information about this Atreyan spy, not to break him out single-handedly.

But that had been mostly bullshit, and they probably knew it. If it genuinely looked too difficult to bust him out, then yeah, Raul wouldn't risk it.

He had a feeling that it would look quite doable, though. Especially with Invisibility on his side.

All things considered, these rings were pretty ridiculous, but they did have their limitations. They couldn't cover nearly as much area as the living aberrations at Dunehall could. Those bastards had been able to cloak dozens of people each, whereas these rings could scarcely go beyond his own body. If he wasn't touching it, then he probably couldn't make it invisible, and if the object in question was large enough, touching it didn't matter.

That was one of the reasons he was making this trip on foot. Cloaking an entire car was too difficult, and even if it wasn't, the noise it made would still be too much of a problem when trying to make it through checkpoints like this one.

His primary concern, therefore, was not if he would be able to break the spy out of prison. Rather, it was how he would be able to get the guy all the way back to Ridgemark. Even for him, an undead servant, making this trip on foot was pretty rough. He wasn't sure how well a non-servant would be able to manage it, even with his help.

He could worry about that later, though."

"3003

He made his way up the nearby staircase, careful not to walk on the center of any of the wooden steps. The edges were less likely to make noise, he'd always thought, and he didn't want anyone hearing his footsteps. It helped that there were so many other people roaming around below, but he was still mindful of foot traffic on the higher floors.

It was quieter up here, which was both a good and bad thing. He didn't have to worry about bumping into anyone accidentally, but they would also hear him coming if he made any sounds at all.

Slow and steady, he thought.

He was looking for the largest quarters. He didn't know much about how the VMP laid out their buildings, but logic would dictate that the higher-ranking officers would be in the larger rooms.

He'd only planned to eavesdrop from the other side of closed doors, but on the top floor, he discovered a much more inviting prospect. One of the doors was ajar, and he spotted a group of people therein, all standing around a bed-ridden man.

Most of them seemed to be nurses or doctors, tending to him and fiddling with medical machinery. The man himself was only wearing an off-white gown, but there were three sharply dressed officers in front of him, all talking to him with obvious deference.

Two of them left just as Raul was settling in to listen by the door, making him curse his timing. The one remaining officer, however, said something that most certainly caught his interest.

""--my contact within the Vanguard."" The green-suited officer spoke Valgan with a deep, almost grinding voice. ""You recall the deal I mentioned a while back?""
"3004

""Oh, not this again,"" said the man in bed, also in Valgan. ""I told you before: they can't be trusted. Negotiating with them is pointless. As soon as they have our confidence, they will betray us in order to attack Abolish. This much should be obvious.""

""Ritter, just listen to me for a minute, will you? My contact is reliable. She wouldn't bring me this if it wasn't worth our time.""

The man sighed but didn't argue further.

""They're saying they can get Graves to pull his forces out of Ridgemark in exchange for a simple prisoner transfer.""

Raul blinked. Whoa. That was massively valuable intel, if true. It didn't sound like this Ritter fellow was going to go for it, though.

""Absurd. They expect us to believe that they would leave Vantalay entirely for the return of a few of their prisoners? Do we even have any of their men?""

""Ah, no, it would not be that kind of exchange, actually.""

""Hmm? What kind would it be, then?""

""They don't want prisoners of ours. They want to hand some of theirs over to us for safekeeping.""

""What? Why?""

""They're having operational difficulties, at the moment. Their forces are spread thin all over the continent. They're trying to free up manpower, no doubt. This would eliminate two birds with one stone. They could pull their troops out of Vantalay and also retask those prison guards as soldiers.""

""Hrm.""

""It's a great deal for us, Ritter. We should take it before they change their mind.""

""So eager. You truly have no reservations about it? It's highly irregular. Why would they trust us to look after their prisoners? Why not one of their allies?""

""Because they're afraid their allies might release them. And perhaps make it look like an accident, afterwards.""

""Why would they do that? Who are these prisoners?""

""The Rainlords of Sair.""

"3005 -- CCLX.

Chapter Two Hundred Sixty: 'O, wicked shifters...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

When Loren Lighteyes stepped off the boat, he was only too glad to finally have solid ground beneath him again. He would have much preferred to simply fly back to Eloa, but apparently, there were huge dogfights going on all across the skies of the Luthic, and even Abolish didn't want to risk transporting anyone by plane unless they were to serve as reinforcements.

Concealing themselves among civilian boats, however, was somehow not a problem. He'd even seen jets patrolling the shipping lanes. Each time he saw one, Loren had expected it to open open fire on their big, lumbering tanker, but that thankfully never happened.

What exactly the fighting was about, he still didn't quite know. Popular sentiment seemed to be that it was some kind of proxy conflict, related to the Vantalayan war effort. Perhaps Czacoa and its allies were trying to prevent Vantalay from bringing in support from overseas.

Loren didn't think that explained why the fighting spanned such a wide swath of the Luthic, though. It was the largest ocean in the world. If they were only concerned about the Vantalayan region, then why had Abolish shut down all aerial transports out of eastern Ardora?

In any case, it was an enormous hassle. And while he didn't hate the ocean quite as much as he used to as a child, he was still far from in love with it. Perhaps the gills that he had mutated onto his back would one day change his opinion in that regard, but if so, he had a feeling that it would require many, many years.

And it didn't help, of course, that those gills still needed some work. They weren't exactly his proudest effort. While they did technically allow his body to breathe underwater, they were horribly inefficient, and he would still drown eventually--after a few hours or so."

"3005 -- CCLX.

Chapter Two Hundred Sixty: 'O, wicked shifters...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

When Loren Lighteyes stepped off the boat, he was only too glad to finally have solid ground beneath him again. He would have much preferred to simply fly back to Eloa, but apparently, there were huge dogfights going on all across the skies of the Luthic, and even Abolish didn't want to risk transporting anyone by plane unless they were to serve as reinforcements.

Concealing themselves among civilian boats, however, was somehow not a problem. He'd even seen jets patrolling the shipping lanes. Each time he saw one, Loren had expected it to open open fire on their big, lumbering tanker, but that thankfully never happened.

What exactly the fighting was about, he still didn't quite know. Popular sentiment seemed to be that it was some kind of proxy conflict, related to the Vantalayan war effort. Perhaps Czacoa and its allies were trying to prevent Vantalay from bringing in support from overseas.

Loren didn't think that explained why the fighting spanned such a wide swath of the Luthic, though. It was the largest ocean in the world. If they were only concerned about the Vantalayan region, then why had Abolish shut down all aerial transports out of eastern Ardora?

In any case, it was an enormous hassle. And while he didn't hate the ocean quite as much as he used to as a child, he was still far from in love with it. Perhaps the gills that he had mutated onto his back would one day change his opinion in that regard, but if so, he had a feeling that it would require many, many years.

And it didn't help, of course, that those gills still needed some work. They weren't exactly his proudest effort. While they did technically allow his body to breathe underwater, they were horribly inefficient, and he would still drown eventually--after a few hours or so."

"3006

~~Valentine's Day Special - (page 1 of 8)~~

Moreover, servants didn't actually need to breathe underwater. Their brains didn't require oxygen. It was just a matter of comfort and convenience, really. Plus, his mutant predisposition was for birds, not fish. It was a pretty dumb mutation overall, and at times, he found himself regretting it.

Maybe he'd take another crack at refining it one day, though. His whole reason for even attempting it in the first place was to help him overcome his fear of the ocean, and he supposed in that sense, it had proved somewhat helpful.

A Vaelish boy afraid of the sea? It was an absurdity. Or should've been. If his people's culture hadn't been shredded nearly to the point of extinction.

Agh.

His heritage hadn't mattered for a long time. It was stupid to get sentimental about it.

But that was what the ocean did to him. Reminded him of the past, of life he barely remembered.

Just one more reason why he hated it so much.

This port town of Ritoro was a welcome sight, at least. He'd never visited Steccat before. He could see why the eastern Eloan coast was so praised for its beauty. Pale white sands filled the oceanic horizon, and scores of slender palm trees lined most of the buildings and sidewalks.

When departing from Eloa to Ardora before, he'd flown out of Vantalay, but with travel there having become so difficult, Steccat was apparently the next best option.

Most of this country was rich and well-guarded, and he'd always thought that Abolish's influence here was limited, but if they were able to waltz into it so easily, then maybe that wasn't the case.

Perhaps this was the Freeman Fellowship's influence. They were obviously far from normal Abolishers.

And he was now one of them. Or soon would be. He wasn't too clear on that point, yet. He'd technically accepted the invitation from the Gentleman of Palei, but there was probably some sort of induction ceremony that he had to go through first."

"3007

~~Valentine's Day Special - (page 2 of 8)~~

If nothing else, it soon became clear the Freeman had something going for them in this country. The vehicle that rolled up to receive them was a midnight black Revenant M77 Phasma. As far as limousines went, it was one of the most handsome models on the market--and a beast of a machine, besides. Its long, sleek hood was hiding over seven hundred horsepower, and its on-demand four-wheel drive was a rarity among such vehicles.

The reason he recognized it immediately was because it had a sports car sibling that he adored, the Revenant L90 Kingswraith. If he ever managed to strike it rich, that beauty would be one of his first big purchases for sure.

That wasn't likely, though. He'd learned how to drive from many combat-focused teachers and was experienced behind the wheel in such circumstances to boot, but he'd never actually owned a car before. It was a nice dream with little practicality. He simply traveled too much for Abolish.

Heh. If the Freemen could somehow change that, too, then he would become a member for life. Assuming Rezolo let him, that was.

He gazed out the window as they drove. The other Freemen were too busy talking to Zahi Rambata to bother him with questions, which Loren actually appreciated for once. He had plenty of experience ignoring Zahi's incessant motormouth. He did not have experience with being pleased by Zahi's company, however. That was a new feeling.

In terms of design, Ritoro looked like a pleasantly simple town. Long, straight roads in a clear grid framework. Not too many tall buildings. Hard to get lost in and therefore easy to escape from in a hurry.

That would also make it difficult to hide in, though. Big cities with confusing layouts had their own sorts of advantages, he knew.

The ride didn't last long. They soon pulled into the parking lot of a colorful building with unlit signs all over it, making them difficult to read.

A night club, he realized as they made their way inside--though it wasn't yet nighttime."

"3008

~~Valentine's Day Special - (page 3 of 8)~~

The place wasn't open, but it was still abuzz with activity. And Loren quickly realized why.

Dozens of large, ethereal geckos hovered in the air, unaffected by the club's low lighting.

Reapers.

'There are quite a few familiar faces in here,' said Rezolo in the echo of privacy.

Loren was already scanning the crowd for any signs of recognition. If these were all Freeman, then that was unlikely.

Zahi had already peeled off to go converse with one of the several groups that dotted the main room, and the trio of Freeman who'd brought him headed over to a corner, not waiting for him.

Loren found himself gravitating toward the bar area, instead. He wasn't a very heavy drinker, but there was a veritable buffet of snack foods that attracted him over. Hmm, did they have those little hot dogs wrapped in bread or whatever it was? Maybe some crackers with that white, lumpy shit on it?

Okay, so he wasn't exactly a foodie, but he knew what tasted good and what didn't.

A conversation in his ear caught his attention as he was looking over his prospects.

""Think he'll go for it?""

""No idea.""

""I thought he was all about achieving glory on the battlefield.""

""Can't believe everything you hear, I guess.""

""Hrm. I suppose if he wasn't receptive to the idea of joining us, then he wouldn't have showed up out of the blue like this.""

Loren's brow lowered as he stuffed his face. They weren't talking about him, were they? No, he'd only just arrived--and with an escort, too. Must've been referring to someone else.

He considered interjecting into the conversation to ask directly, but they answered his question without him having to.

""Having the Marauder of Calthos on our side would be a huge get.""

""Yeah, no shit.""

Loren paused mid-bite."

"3009

The Marauder was here?

Truth be told, there were very few Abolishers whom Loren harbored any kind of actual respect or admiration for. That was just the nature of things when working under so many violent lunatics. But Caster Egmond might have been an exception. Possibly. Loren had never actually met the guy, but there was one particular tale that had piqued Loren's interest.

It was a story from the Vaelish Civil War. He'd only heard about it secondhand from other Abolishers, but supposedly, the Marauder of Calthos had conducted himself differently from his peers during that conflict. When tasked with the annihilation of an entire city, Egmond had first gathered up all of the children therein, intending to have them join Abolish.

That alone was already enough to set him apart from his contemporaries, but when word came down from Vanderberk that they had no use for so many children, that they should simply be executed instead, Egmond had purportedly gone against orders and allowed the kids to escape.

At the time, Loren had never heard of anyone daring to go against Vanderberk's orders. That vile bastard always made sure that everyone did as he said, no matter how far out of his way he had to go. And he didn't take insubordination well.

The rest of the story was more well-known. Everybody heard about it when Vanderberk arrived at the city of Loya, looking to make an example of Caster Egmond. Whether that example was to humiliate him or to outright kill him, no one had been entirely sure, but either way, the resultant duel leveled the already-ruined city into dust.

And the Marauder barely came away with his life. If not for the sudden appearance of Jercash, Caster Egmond would have most certainly died. Or so the story went."

"3010

If that was all true, then it might make sense why the Freeman

Fellowship would be interested in recruiting him.

Loren had to wonder if that tale was really true, though. For all he knew, Egmond and Vanderberk could have fought for completely different reasons. But at the very least, he wouldn't mind meeting the Marauder and seeing for himself. As far as commanding officers went, Egmond sounded like one of the least terrible ones.

Not like Natia or Laredo or Itoya--or the Void forbid, fucking Vanderberk himself. Loren truly did not know what he would do if he were somehow transferred into one of that monster's sects. He'd been forced to work together with them before, and it was an absolute nightmare every time. How much more horrible would it be to work for them instead, he wondered?

Within the entirety of Abolish, those people really were the worst of the worst. Which was saying a lot.

Compared to past experiences, this club full of Freemen felt about as rowdy as a teenage slumber party.

Or what he imagined a slumber party to be like, anyway. He hadn't even finished elementary school before he'd had to start hunting wild animals with sticks and rocks just to fill his belly. But he'd seen movies. They were mostly realistic, right?

Man, these miniature hot dog things were good. He was starting to get thirsty, though. He didn't want to drink around a bunch of strangers, so he went for pitcher full of ice water at the end of the bar.

Another hand grabbed it at the same time as him, and he looked over to see that it belonged to a rather small man who was eyeing him right back.

""And here I thought I was the only one not drinking,"" the man said, letting him have the pitcher."

"3011

~~Valentine's Day Special - (page 6 of 8)~~

Loren's gaze lingered on him, however. He didn't recognize his face, but there was something... heavy about him. Something that Loren had felt before in the presence of extremely powerful servants.

And he'd heard that Caster Egmond was on the shorter side... but this couldn't actually be him, could it? Just sitting here at the bar by himself?

The short man tilted his head at him. ""Hmm. You're the one they call Lighteyes, are you not?""

Loren took a seat as he poured a glass for himself. ""I am. How'd you know?""

The man smiled. ""Lucky guess.""

Hmm. Really? That made Loren want to take a guess of his own. ""You... wouldn't happen to be Caster Egmond, would you?""

""Ah. How'd you know?""

""Must be our lucky day.""

""Heh."" Egmond took the pitcher and refilled his own glass.

Both men took a long swig.

""I'm surprised you've even heard of me,"" said Loren.

""It's a poor commander who doesn't pay attention to his men.""

Loren threw a glance at Rezolo, who was still by his side. He was quite certain that they'd never worked for Egmond, but from the way the guy had said that, he almost wanted to double check with the reaper. He decided against it, though.

""I don't think I've ever had the honor of serving under your command, sir.""

""My, you're very polite, aren't you?""

Loren certainly didn't want to come across otherwise. Not right now, at least.

Egmond gave Rezolo a look now, too. ""Found yourself a good one, you think?""

'He has his moments,' said Rezolo.

Wow. That might've been the most praise the reaper had ever given him.

'What brings you here, anyway?' the reaper asked.

Egmond took another swig. ""Good question. I guess you could say I'm a new man. And as such, I'm looking to make a few changes.""

"3012

~~Valentine's Day Special - (page 7 of 8)~~

'Changes that involve the Fellowship?' said Rezolo.

""Possibly,"" said Egmond. He looked around the clubroom for a moment before returning to his ice water for a sip. ""I'm in the market for new, reliable subordinates.""

Loren's interest was sufficiently piqued. He waited for Rezolo to ask another probing question, but when the reaper remained silent, he decided to jump in himself with a comment. ""Those are difficult to come by in Abolish.""

""Indeed.""

""You think the Fellowship has the kind of men you're looking for?""

""Well, I know they have different men, at the very least. They've been trying to entice me to join for years, but I've always been reluctant to take the plunge.""

""Why?""

Egmond paused for another swig. ""Truthfully? My reputation was everything to me. And joining the Freemen would have meant gambling with it. Some doors might open, others might close. I was, to put it nicely, a bit risk-averse in that regard.""

Hmm. Egmond made it sound like it had been entirely his own decision. Loren didn't see a reaper over his shoulder, and the man wasn't speaking in two voices, either. There was no telling if Egmond had even brought his reaper here. It would make sense, Loren supposed, if he'd come alone.

'And you're not like that anymore?' said Rezolo.

""As I said, I'm a new man.""

'I see. What sparked this sudden change in you, then?'

""Why do you ask?""

'Professional curiosity.'

Egmond set his drink down and looked at Rezolo, then at Loren. ""Join me and find out.""

Loren's eyes widened. He wanted to say yes straightaway, but he knew it wasn't that simple. Even Rezolo probably didn't have the final say on a decision like this.

'We've only just joined the Fellowship, ourselves,' the reaper explained.

""Is that supposed to be a problem?"" said Egmond.

'I'm not sure we'll have the latitude to choose our own assignments quite yet.'

""If I ask for you, they won't refuse me.""

"3013

~~Valentine's Day Special - (page 8 of 8)~~

'You're that interested in recruiting us?' said Rezolo.

""I'm interested in giving you a chance. If the feeling is not mutual, then by all means, stay where you are.""

'You really have changed. Where is Kalikos? I should like to speak with him.'

""Nowhere nearby. But I will be returning to him soon, if you wish to accompany me.""

Loren glanced at Rezolo. 'You know Egmond and his reaper personally?'

Rezolo ignored him. 'We would need to join you first, is what you are saying.'

""No. But it would be a rather long trip to make purely to have a conversation. And there would be a few detours.""

'Who else have you recruited?'

""Not a single soul. You two would be the first.""

'Ah.'

Silence arrived, threatening to kill the conversation there. Only the background chatter of the Freeman remained.

Shit. Loren had a feeling that Rezolo would refuse now. It was hard to know what the reaper was thinking, even after all these years together, but he didn't think the Rezolo would want to gamble like this. If the reaper was going to be convinced, then they needed to pull something more concrete out of Egmond.

""...Does this 'new you' have a particular goal in mind?"" asked Loren.

""Yes.""

Great.

Loren waited for elaboration, trying to have patience.

Thankfully, it did arrive. ""I've spent so long destroying things. Now there is something I would like to build.""

'Oh?' said Rezolo. 'What would that be?'

""A tower.""

-+-+--+

Hector stumbled back, and before he could process anything else, he was on the floor, trying to move and finding that he didn't have the strength.

His head was pounding, and he could scarcely hold onto a single thought. He was fairly sure that someone was talking, but that was about the extent of what his faculties were able to tell him.

That, and he was tired.

Fucking exhausted, actually. Holy shit."

"3014

Wow. In a secondary thought process, he was able to assess his own sorry state. How trashed his body felt. How clouded his thoughts were. How disorienting everything was. How flat this floor was. Hmm.

Beyond that, though, the thought process wasn't good for much else. The world was a gray blur around him.

Well, maybe that was okay. Maybe he just needed some sleep or something.

Or something? What did or something mean? What was comparable to sleep?

Nothing, probably. But it did feel kinda weird, because had he not been sleeping a moment ago? Where had his mind been? Hell, where was it now?

Confusing.

Come to think of it, he wasn't sure if he was actually awake, right now. His body and mind both felt sluggish enough that he could have been asleep. Maybe this was a dream.

Nah. He almost never had dreams. Oh, or maybe he just never remembered them?

Nah.

Maybe he was just stupid. Yeah, that seemed fairly likely.

His head was swimming with images. And feelings. Sensations.

""--ctor? Hector? Come on, Hector, look at me.""

Hector? Wait, he was named Hector. Whose voice was that? It didn't sound like his own.

""Say something, Hector. Just let us know you're all the way back. Then I'll let you sleep. As much as you want.""

Back? Back from where?

Oh, right.

That's where all these images were from. All these sensations.

The Forge.

He'd seen so much.

Too much, probably. All this information. All these memories. They weren't his. They didn't belong in his head.

Who knew a tree would have so much to tell him?

He wondered if he was even the same person, anymore. How long had he been in there? Maybe the voice would be able to tell him. If he could figure out how his mouth worked again.

Ugh, that seemed like a pretty tall order, right now."
"3015

Why was it so freaking difficult to concentrate? He had the blessing of Focus going for him, didn't he? Wasn't that supposed to help with shit like this?

Or was it? He couldn't remember.

He felt himself say something. He had no idea what it was, though. It sounded like he was speaking with a mouth full of cotton. Hopefully it made more sense to whoever was listening.

After that, he just kinda drifted for a while. Thoughts were too difficult to hold onto. His secondary thought process was a bit aware, but it was like being trapped in a murky, gray box. He could sense the box just fine, but that was about it.

He needed rest, probably.

Which was kinda weird, wasn't it? Was Garovel not around? The reaper could've relieved his fatigue in an instant, couldn't he?

Hmm, maybe he couldn't. Hector had never felt fatigue quite like this before.

His soul felt tired.

Maybe that made no sense. He wouldn't have even thought such a thing was possible. But that was the only way his half-conscious mind could describe it.

Eventually, he slept. Or was fairly sure that he did, at least.

It didn't feel normal. At all.

For Hector, sleeping was always just this warm, welcoming darkness. Thoughtless and comfortable. A blanket that wrapped itself around him completely.

But now, he saw things. Scenes. Unfolding before his eyes.

From the Forge's memories? That seemed likely. He couldn't hold onto any of them, though. Even as he watched them, they slipped through his mind like water through his fingers. He didn't have the awareness or strength or whatever was necessary in order to understand them.

It was just... different.

When he awoke, he was in a bed.

His bed.

The one in Warrenhold.

Uh-oh.

He sat up in a rush, looking around."
"3016

Well. This was definitely the master bedroom in the Tower of Night. Everything looked the same. Why in the world did they bring him all the way back here? There was a bed near the Forge, right? They could've just let him sleep there.

Hmm.

His head was surprisingly clear, he realized. He didn't feel groggy in the slightest. Almost like when Garovel made his fatigue disappear. Except he didn't see the reaper anywhere.

Which was the first thing he needed to check on.

'...Garovel?'

'Hector! You're awake! Finally!'

'How long was I out?'

'It's been almost a whole month now, I think.'

Hector's eyes widened. '...This is the part where you tell me you're just fuckin' with me, right?'

'Afraid not, pal.'

Aw, shit. He rolled out of bed. Well, at least he had clothes on. Holy god, he stank, though. And he was so fucking hungry. He wasn't sure his stomach had ever felt so incredibly empty before--which was saying a lot, because he had many examples to compare it against.

Other than that, however, he actually felt pretty good. Light on his feet. Not sluggish at all. Ready to go somewhere and do stuff.

The first destination should probably be the shower, he figured. He made his way over to the bathroom while Garovel kept talking.

'Half of that time, you spent just standing there in front of the Forge. The other half, you spent asleep. In a fucking soul-coma.'

'A soul-coma?'

'Yeah. Figured that was a good term for it, since I kept trying to wake you up. Unsuccessfully, that is. Which was really obnoxious, by the way. Please don't do that again.'

'Yeah, er, I'll try not to.'

'Y'know, at first, I wasn't worried at all. You do weird and dumb shit like this all the time, so I was fine with just waiting. But I gotta admit, after that second week rolled around, I was becoming slightly upset. Peeved. Miffed, you might say.'

'Uh... huh...''

"3017

'And also, congratulations on helping me invent a new term. Soul-comas weren't a thing until you came along and scared the shit out of everyone.'

Hector just showered in silence, unsure how to respond. The reaper sounded pretty upset, actually. Not necessarily with him so much as with the strangeness of the circumstances.

But maybe also with him. Kinda.

'And y'know, seeing as our souls are connected as per this whole reaper-servant situation we've got goin' on, you would think that something like a soul-coma would affect me along with you. But no. Apparently not. I've felt just peachy this whole time.'

Hector scratched his head at that as he applied shampoo. Oh hey. Yep. His hair had definitely grown a bit. 'Er... are you implying that you're upset about NOT being in a coma with me?'

'No. Maybe. A little bit.'

'Garovel, I'm touched. But that's stupid. Like, really stupid.'

'Yeah, well, maybe I'm just curious about what the Forge showed you.' A beat passed. 'And don't you dare tell me that it didn't show you anything or that you don't remember.'

Well, now, he was kinda tempted to say both of those things.

'You were standing in one place, motionless, for two weeks. And I've been waiting for some damn answers for another two weeks on top of that. So you better have some juicy-as-fuck details for me about what the hell happened back there.'

'Uh...'

'Hector...'

Frankly, he wasn't sure how to explain. Or if it was even possible to. What had the Forge shown him? What hadn't it shown him? There was enough information swimming around in his head right to fill a book. Or ten books. Or more, maybe.

Holy shit, he thought.

But it was all a mess. Disordered. And foggy, in places. Just concentrating on it was difficult, like trying to look through a dim window.

It wasn't supposed to be there, he was pretty sure."

"3018

'Listen, eh... can we talk about that later? I'm not really sure how to explain it all yet, and I feel like you should bring me up to speed on the past month, first.'

'Oh, I see how it is. You like leaving me in the dark, don't you?'

Hector's face flattened as he lathered himself in soap. 'Garovel.'

'Alright, alright. I mean. Yeah. There's. Some stuff. That I should probably tell you about. It might be kinda surprising, though. Just a tad bit.'

Hector waited. Recalling how many difficult situations he'd been worried about before his ""soul-coma,"" he tried to brace himself for bad news.

'Hey, are you sitting down? You're not, are you? You're too busy washing your junk.'

'Garovel, just tell me.'

'Okay, well, first off, the Rainlords found their captive brethren.'

His head twitched. 'What?!'

'They're in Vantalay.'

'You're shitting me. Wait, who's in Vantalay? Tell me everyone didn't just leave Warrenhold while I was out.'

'No, no, nobody's left yet. But they've definitely been thinking about it. A lot. It's practically all they've been talking about this past week.'

'Shit... so the other half of the Rainlords are being held captive in Vantalay, right now?'

'Mhmm. Apparently, one of the Triplets happened upon the intel while sneaking through a VMP base.'

It took Hector a second to piece all that information together. 'The VMP? I thought the VMP was working with Abolish. Why would they have intel on Vangaurdian prisoners from a totally different country?'

'They ARE working with Abolish. Mostly. It's a big ol' mess. It would appear that the Vanguard has made a secret deal with them to take custody of the captive Rainlords in exchange for pulling their forces out of Vantalay.'

Hector blinked. 'What the fuck kind of deal is that?! Wouldn't the VMP just hand them over to Abolish and be done with it?!'

'Supposedly, it's a temporary arrangement. The Vanguard would come back for them once the war is over and take custody again. But who knows how true that is?'

'Agh, fuck...'
"3019 -- CCLXI.

'It's good that you're awake now,' said Garovel, 'but I also have a feeling that one of the reasons the Rainlords haven't made their move yet is because they were waiting for you.'

'I kinda doubt that, Garovel.'

'Do you? Hmph, well, of course you do. Look, I'm not saying it's the only reason. They're definitely trying to pick their moment. They wouldn't tell you this in so many words, but I get the impression that they're terrified of running in half-cocked and letting even more people get captured.'

That was somewhat relieving to hear, at least.

'Obviously, it would be best if the team that we already have in Vantalay was able to free the other Houses without us needing to send any more reinforcements.'

'Would that even be possible?'

'That's what the Rainlords have been trying to figure out. It's a complicated situation with a lot of details that I need to tell you. Before we got too deep into it, I'm sure there other things you're curious about, hmm?'

He was right, Hector knew. 'The Forge. What's been happening with Abbas and the Forge?'

Garovel fell silent a moment. 'Heh.'

Hector paused, listening even more intently all of a sudden.

'It's up and running. Abbas has been working with it nonstop.'

Chapter Two Hundred Sixty-One: 'O, riving serpent...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Raul Blackburn had been busy.

The situation in Vantalay was more precarious than ever, but his determination to not let everyone down was stronger than ever, too.

The moment he'd heard that his captive kin would be coming here, everything had changed. His priorities. His strategy. His entire attitude toward this operation.

He was calm. Calmer than he'd ever felt in his life. His sense of purpose was so clear that all other worries had seemed to melt away."
"3019 -- CCLXI.

'It's good that you're awake now,' said Garovel, 'but I also have a feeling that one of the reasons the Rainlords haven't made their move yet is because they were waiting for you.'

'I kinda doubt that, Garovel.'

'Do you? Hmph, well, of course you do. Look, I'm not saying it's the only reason. They're definitely trying to pick their moment. They wouldn't tell you this in so many words, but I get the impression that they're terrified of running in half-cocked and letting even more people get captured.'

That was somewhat relieving to hear, at least.

'Obviously, it would be best if the team that we already have in Vantalay was able to free the other Houses without us needing to send any more reinforcements.'

'Would that even be possible?'

'That's what the Rainlords have been trying to figure out. It's a complicated situation with a lot of details that I need to tell you. Before we got too deep into it, I'm sure there other things you're curious about, hmm?'

He was right, Hector knew. 'The Forge. What's been happening with Abbas and the Forge?'

Garovel fell silent a moment. 'Heh.'

Hector paused, listening even more intently all of a sudden.

'It's up and running. Abbas has been working with it nonstop.'

Chapter Two Hundred Sixty-One: 'O, riving serpent...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Raul Blackburn had been busy.

The situation in Vantalay was more precarious than ever, but his determination to not let everyone down was stronger than ever, too.

The moment he'd heard that his captive kin would be coming here, everything had changed. His priorities. His strategy. His entire attitude toward this operation.

He was calm. Calmer than he'd ever felt in his life. His sense of purpose was so clear that all other worries had seemed to melt away."
"3020

Everything he did, every breath he took, meal he ate, moment he spent--it was all leading toward one thing, right now.

But it wasn't a straight path. He'd realized that very quickly. He couldn't just run in and try to break everyone out. Even if Cousin Melchor and the others were with him, that wouldn't be the right way to go.

It was an open question as to whether or not they currently had enough power in the country in order to overwhelm the VMP with brute force alone, but even supposing that they did, there was the much more pressing issue of getting everyone out of the country safely once they were free.

These Invisibility rings were profoundly useful, but they wouldn't be able to conceal hundreds of people. And once they made a big splash, the VMP would be all over them--and most likely Abolish, as well.

They had to be especially mindful of all the non-servants among the captives. The entirety of Houses Redwater, Zabat, Garza, Stroud, and Merlo were all there. Once their servants were free, they would be a huge help in a fight but not necessarily in matters of stealth.

Great care was required here. Any mistakes could mean the death of his kin.

That was why he had decided to break the Atreyan spy, Donald Elias, out of prison first.

In that regard, the timing couldn't have been better. Between the new prisoners they were importing and the intensifying siege on Ridgemark, the VMP had its hands completely full, right now. They didn't have their attention on Bridgewater Prison.

It had certainly looked imposing from the outside with its high walls and watchtowers. But as expected, it hadn't done much good against the power of Invisibility."

"3021

Now, Donald Elias was sitting across a campfire from him, deep in the Vantalayan wilderness.

It was actually kind of terrifying how easy it had been to break the guy out. Invisibility really was dangerous. Even with the ring's limitations, being able to just waltz into a hostile stronghold unchallenged was just insane.

The more time he spent with this Invisibility, the more impressed he was by the fact that Lord Goffe had apparently been able to fight off dozens of invisible enemies single-handedly back at Dunehall.

It made sense, though. He'd heard a rumor that Lord Goffe had unusually sharp senses--as if he had eyes in the back of his head, some said.

Raul could at least rest a bit easier knowing that Warrenhold wouldn't be caught off guard like Dunehall had. With Lord Goffe and all the Houses being well aware of the threat posed by aberrations with this type of power, he had confidence that anyone who tried that tactic on them a second time would be in for a rude awakening.

Unfortunately, the rest of the world wasn't like Warrenhold.

Donald, for his part, was a gray-bearded man with a deeply sunken gaze. His pallid face looked like it hadn't seen sunlight in ages, and he was so thin that he bordered on malnourished.

The man was sharp, though. When Raul had appeared in front of him, the guy hadn't made a fuss, asked any questions, or otherwise looked a gift horse in the mouth. He'd cooperated as easily as could be. But once they were a safe distance away from the prison, he'd been full of probing questions, not all of which Raul could answer.

The man was up to speed by now. For the most part. Raul hadn't explained that he was a Rainlord, only that he was an ally of Atreya, working under Lord Goffe.

Donald had no idea who that was, apparently, which Raul found surprising, but whatever."

"3022

Such details were unimportant, right now. The only thing that mattered was to free his kin. Raul had hoped that Donald would be able to help with that task, but he hadn't been holding his breath, either. The man was not a servant, and he'd been in prison for a decade and a half. After everything he'd been through, it would've been entirely reasonable of him to want no part of a second jailbreak. Raul was prepared to run him all the way back to Ridgemark on foot, if that's what the man had his heart set on.

But it wasn't.

""...Yeah, I can help you with your problem.""

""Really? I was hoping you would say that, but, ah... how, exactly?""

Donald regarded him for a long moment, the campfire flickering brightly in his attentive eyes. ""Would I be wrong in assuming that you're still relatively new to this business, son?""

Raul didn't answer, instead just tilting his head at him. What business was he referring to, exactly?

""Would you like some tips from an old hand?""

Oh. He was talking about spying, Raul realized. ""Ah... sure.""

""The key to any extended operation in a foreign country is acquiring local support,"" said Donald. ""Whether they know your true identity or not, never underestimate the importance of having someone nearby to rely on when things go all twisty on you. That's the only reason I've been able to survive all these years.""

""How do you mean?"" said Raul.

""I made myself an asset to a number of different groups around here. Not all of them are still around, but the ones that are have grown pretty powerful in their own right.""

That made Raul curious. ""How'd you make yourself an asset while imprisoned?""

"3023

""Well, for most of them, it didn't happen while I was in prison,"" said Donald. ""This was work that I did beforehand. Meeting folks. Making myself useful. Building friendships. Surely they taught you a thing or two about that, eh?""

He didn't know who ""they"" was supposed to be referring to, but yeah, Raul wanted to think that he did indeed know a little about those strategies.

""But yes, I did manage to finagle a few new allies for myself while behind bars."" Donald paused for a low laugh and rubbed his neck. ""Bridgewater is infamous for a reason. All told, the men in there could probably take over this country if they worked together. Not that I imagine they would.""

""Are you saying the VMP is right to be afraid of them?""

""From a strategic perspective? Without a doubt. Their collective influence would be unstoppable. But they're also leaderless, and half of them are true criminals, not just people with the wrong politics. If they were free to go where they wanted and do as they wished, I can't tell if they would manage to successfully organize themselves and overthrow the government or just destroy each other through infighting first. I hope the prisoners that you're after are different.""

""Oh, they are.""

""You really believe they can protect Atreya during this war?""

Raul had been a little surprised at first that Donald even knew about the continental war, but apparently even Bridgewater hadn't been able to keep that news from him. Good thing, too, because it seemed to be a key factor in motivating Donald to help him. ""I do, yes.""

Mr. Elias was still looking at him with a fair amount of skepticism, though. ""How can you be so sure? These prisoners are superhumans like yourself, I assume, but Atreya is so small and so far away from here. This Lord Goffe of yours has their allegiance, too?""

"3024

Raul frowned and scratched his head, knowing this would be difficult to explain without revealing his heritage as a Rainlord. Difficult, or just impossible, perhaps. Hmm.

Now seemed like a good time to resort to his tried and true strategy.

He gave the man a big smile. ""Well, to be honest, it's all kinda complicated, and I don't really understand it very well myself, dude! But I'm sure it'll work out! You'll see!""

Donald Elias just kind of stared at him, blinking dully.

Raul filled the silence with a hearty laugh. ""I've always found that it's best not to sweat the small stuff, ya feel me? Lord Goffe is a trustworthy man, which is pretty much all that matters at the end of the day, I think.""

""...That's a very laidback attitude for a spy,"" said Donald. Raul couldn't tell if that was doubt or disapproval on his face.

""Well, I'm still pretty new to this whole gig. Maybe that'll get beaten outta me eventually. I hope not, though. I feel like I'm being true to myself this way, y'know?""

""Mmhmm..."

Raul knew that he probably wasn't convincing the guy of much, right now. But that was okay. That was a job for his elders if they so decided it--or for the Atreyan Queen, maybe. He just wanted to avoid getting bogged down in unnecessary details, right now. ""Listen, bruh, I will vouch for these prisoners with my life, okay?"" He paused to suck air through his teeth. ""Plus, we, uh... we might kinda need their help in order to get outta the country safely, anyway.""

""Oh?""

""I mean, maybe we won't. Maybe we could just make a break for the border right now and skip across it, no problem, but, uh... things are real messy in this country, at the moment. Lotta dangerous jackholes runnin' around.""

"3025

""Jack... holes. I suppose that is one way of putting it, yes. And I would prefer not to walk back to Atreya on foot. Do you already have a better escape route in mind?""

Raul bobbed his head. ""Sorta. Ridgemark is the only place still letting civilian craft come and go freely, so it'd theoretically be our best option, but it's also where the fighting between the VMP, Abolish, and the RPMP is the strongest. Now that the Vanguard has pulled out of the country, I expect Ridgemark to be pretty dangerous.""

""Hence why more superhumans would come in handy,"" concluded Donald.

""Yup.""

The other man gazed into the campfire for a long moment and stroked his scraggly beard. ""Do you know where they're being held?""

""A place called Logden,"" said Raul.

""Ah... that's unfortunate.""

""How so?""

""I wasn't kept exclusively at Bridgewater all these years. Been transferred plenty of times. Spent a fair few of my years in Logden. Huge facility. Deep in the mountains. Beautiful vistas, though. I enjoyed my time there a little more, actually.""

""I'm not hearing the unfortunate part, dude.""

""The mountains make it extremely difficult to escape from. Heard about several guys who tried during my time there. All were caught, shot, or fell to their deaths. Mostly the latter, since they didn't have enough guards to watch everyone, but it seems like they won't have that problem this time. I was wondering why Bridgewater's security seemed to have lightened so much recently. Makes sense if they were being transferred over to Logden for the influx of new prisoners there.""

""A little climbing shouldn't be too much of a problem,"" said Raul, stretching the fingers of his right hand. Difficult terrain was something of a specialty of his, he felt. ""I'm more concerned about getting everyone out of the building safely. And quietly, if possible. There'll be normal people mixed in with the superhumans, and we need to keep them from getting shot at.""

"3026

""Mm,"" hummed Donald. ""And that's why you chose to spring me first, I take it? To see if I might be able to help you with that problem?""

""That, and it's a lot easier to spring one than three hundred. But like I said, if you don't know how to help, that's okay. I'll find a way to get you back to Atreya safely first. You don't need to feel compelled to come along just because I broke you out.""

""That's very kind of you.""

Eh. It wasn't really about kindness, actually. Raul just didn't want to give Donald any extra motive to betray him. If the man thought that the only way to get out of Vantalay quickly was to lie and give Raul the slip, then that would only cause problems.

Plus, he still wasn't entirely convinced that Donald would actually be able to help. So far, the guy hadn't really shared any concrete plans with him. Wasn't he supposed to be some kind of hyper competent spy? Well, Raul couldn't exactly blame him if he wasn't up for this. Fifteen years in prison had to have dulled his skills.

Raul kept his opinions to himself, though.

""...Are you hoping to ally with the RPMP?"" said Donald.

""To escape through Ridgemark you mean? Maybe.""

""Having so many superhumans on your side would be quite the bargaining chip during negotiations. If they're really fending off both the VMP and Abolish without the Vanguard's help, then they would probably be quite welcoming of your assistance.""

""That would mean getting mixed up in this civil war of theirs,"" said Raul. ""And potentially the continental war, too.""

""Indeed. Hence my curiosity.""

Ah. He wanted to know if they were going to drag Atreya into these foreign conflicts. It was certainly a reasonable concern."

"3027

""Well, that's not really up to me,"" said Raul, ""but I'm sure it wouldn't be our first choice. I only see that happening if we can't find any other way out of the country."" He paused for a moment, thinking. ""Or... if something else happens, I guess.""

""Hmm? Something else? Like what?""

""Ah..."" He didn't want to lie to the guy. Maybe that was a bad quality for a spy to have. But eh. ""How much do you know about the ongoing humanitarian crisis in this country?""

Donald's back straightened for a moment as he gazed across the campfire at him. Then he settled forward again. ""Not much, but I can guess.""

""Mm. Well, um. Dude. If we see something really horrific unfolding right before our eyes, it'll be difficult not to get involved, at least a little. That's just the kinda people we are.""

""I see...""

Raul had to wonder if he really did. Perhaps he should just admit that they were Rainlords already. Donald would probably understand right away, if he did. And he would almost definitely find out eventually.

Agh. Raul was torn.

But there were more important concerns, right now.

""Well, in any event, if we're to get all your friends out of Logden, then I have a few of different strategies for you.""

Oh? Raul was listening.

""Option one: we turn the guards against each other. That would create the conditions for a mass jailbreak. It wouldn't exactly be quiet, but it would give us tentative support from the other prisoners.""

""How in the world would we be able to make the guards turn on each other?"" said Raul.

""By stirring the pot among their factions.""

""Factions?""

""Mmhm. The guards aren't all VMP, and even the ones that are have subgroups of their own. Factions within factions, you could say. There's the Prison Guard's Union, the United Worker's Union, the Vantalay Law Enforcement Union, the Anti-Corruption League, the Red Dogs, the Hoppers, the Winders--""

""How do you know all this?""

"3028

The man breathed a short laugh and shrugged. ""I've had a lot of time to read and listen to people.""

Damn.

""Anyway, in order to stoke a violent confrontation between them at Logden, we would have to enact a two-step process. First, increase tension to new heights. Second, spark a related incident at the prison itself. All in all, preparing that first part would likely require a couple weeks, at least. And the second part would also require a bit of prep work, too. If it fizzles out and doesn't cause the kind of conflict we need, then the whole plan fails.""

Raul just kind of nodded along.

""So that's option one. Elements of it are flexible, but for most part, it's a big, loud prison break that'll conceal our involvement with pure chaos.""

""Right...""

""Option two: we somehow trick the guards into releasing everyone for us. Admittedly, this one sounds impossible to me. The only reason I mention it is because I've seen it done before, but circumstances were different, and it sounds like these prisoners are too high-profile for that to work. But if you've got an idea how to pull it off, then by all means, let me know.""

Raul gave a shrug. ""I dunno, dude.""

""Fair enough. Option three: we take it slow. Using that power of yours, we sneak everyone out, one at a time like you did with me. This'd obviously take a while, but it might just be the safest bet to avoid anyone getting injured.""

Hmm. ""Wouldn't they realize something was wrong when some of their prisoner start going missing?""

""Probably. But if they have no idea where they went, then the only thing they can do is beef up security to make sure no more escape. And that won't help them against an invisible man, now will it?""
"3029

""It'll make my job progressively harder,"" said Raul. ""And if Abolish is there, then they might have some means of detecting me through my invisibility."

"Ah..."

"If I thought I could sneak them all out on my own, then I wouldn't have gone for you first," said Raul. "No offense."

"None taken." The man stroked his beard again, then gave a nod. "Option four: we start a fire. Standard prison procedure is to evacuate the building in such an event, which would make it much easier to reach our targets and free them."

Interesting thought. Hmm.

"Downsides include potential danger to the captives, relatively small window of opportunity, and as you already mentioned, if Abolish is there, they might complicate things. Their superhumans may put out the fire too quickly and ruin everything."

It wasn't terribly different from the plan that the Triplets had come up with during their initial attack on Miro. Instead of a fire, though, they'd utilized landslides. Creating an emergency situation to disrupt the enemy's defenses was a perfectly rational strategy.

But it hadn't worked before, and he had a feeling that it wouldn't work now, either. Mostly for the reasons that Donald had just listed.

"Any other options?"

"Option five: we tunnel our way in. That's a favorite tactic of you superhumans, isn't it?"

Raul nodded. "You're not wrong, and for that reason, we usually have safeguards against that."

"Like what?"

"Underground detection networks," said Raul. "Sometimes that means guards. Sometimes it just means sensors. But if they brought in a bunch of extra manpower for this, then it's a fair bet that it'll be guards this time."

"Mm. Or both."

"Yeah."

"So you think Abolish will be waiting for us underground?"

""Probably."" There was also the issue of reapers sensing their souls while tunneling in, but he didn't want to bring them up, especially when it would be mitigated by the Invisibility ring. The less he had to tell Donald about the way that the power of 'superhumans' actually functioned, the better."

"3030

""Alright,"" said Donald. ""Option six: we draw manpower away from the prison.""

""How would we do that?""

""By applying pressure to the VMP elsewhere in the country. Somewhere that they are more vulnerable and might need to call in reinforcements. Relatively nearby, preferably.""

""Hmm. Could be helpful. I don't see it solving all our problems on its own, though.""

""Indeed. A hybrid plan may be best. But the more complicated the plan gets, the more difficult it will be to pull off with only the two of us.""

That was a damn good point, Raul felt. ""In that case... maybe we start with option three. Try to sneak a few key people out so that they can help us free everyone else.""

""That is what I was thinking as well, but I don't know your prisoner friends or what their abilities are like. Do you already have an idea of who you would like to start with?""

Now there was a tricky question. The temptation, of course, was to go for the most powerful servants among the captives. Octavia Redwater and Rayen Merlo. Without a doubt, both of those old ladies would prove invaluable here.

But the enemy would surely know that as well. Those two would be the most well-guarded, for sure. And even if he managed to free one of them, it would probably cause the biggest possible commotion.

Which was not what they wanted if this was going to turn into a slow, grueling operation. Keeping Logden in the dark about what was happening for as long as possible would be better.

In that vein, it might be best to free a non-servant first, someone who would have the lowest level of security around them. But who among the non-servants would actually be able to help them?"

"3031

Crap. This was where House Blackburn's isolation over the last thirty or so years was a real problem. When it came down to it, he actually didn't know his kin from the other Houses all the well. Who was the smartest? Who was the sneakiest? Who was the best under pressure? Who was the most creative, the most tech savvy, the most experienced in the field?

For House Blackburn, he could answer all of those questions.

Tch. He needed to consult Arumoro here. The reaper had taken part in the House's isolation just as much, but even if he couldn't tell Raul who to choose, he could at least talk to others in Warrenhold and figure something out.

But it was a start.

And over the next couple weeks, he and Donald would have plenty of time to make their preparations.

The elders were surprisingly reluctant to act. He'd expected them to rush in, to dispatch reinforcements immediately. He'd even been afraid that they would have Cousin Melchor and the others join him up north in order to lay siege to Logden Prison.

He wouldn't have minded the assistance, of course, but it would've become an enormous mess. And he wasn't yet convinced that such extreme actions would be necessary.

Perhaps he'd been able to convince Arumoro to share his opinion, and perhaps Arumoro had then been able to convince everyone else at Warrenhold.

But Raul kinda doubted it. At best, his opinion was merely one small factor among a multitude of others.

Because apparently, the situation in Miro was evolving.

The RPMP had made contact with Cousin Melchor's group again. And this time, they were seeking assistance outright. No more playing coy like before. They wanted help repelling the joint siege on Ridgemark from the VMP and Abolish."

"3032

It was a big ask. Cousin Melchor's group had a difficult decision to make. They didn't want to get involved any further with the war than they already were. If they began openly supporting the RPMP, then there was no telling how that might complicate things later.

But on the other hand, they were already locked in a stalemate against the Killer of Krohin and his men. In all the time that Raul had spent away from Miro, the ongoing siege there still hadn't made much progress, apparently. Raul wasn't sure if that was a testament to the Killer's wisdom or to his cowardice.

In open battle, Raul was sure that Leo and Cousin Melchor would be able to win the day, but would they ever get that chance again? It seemed increasingly unlikely.

So when he heard that they decided to take the RPMP up on their offer, Raul was anxious about the news but not terribly surprised.

With the RPMP's help, they could safely move the civilians out of Miro and over to Ridgemark, where they could be either protected or taken out of the country.

But it also meant that Raul couldn't expect much in the way of help on his end. With everyone else busy protecting Ridgemark from being overrun and probably razed to the ground, manpower was difficult to come by.

But not impossible, apparently.

Raul got word that his brothers were coming to him. Adan and Esai.

Which was news that brought a faint smile to his face. It hadn't even been that long since he'd seen them, but somehow, it felt like ages. He wasn't accustomed to being on his own for even this length of time. It would be a relief to have them around again."

"3033

This was all business, though. No time for screwing around or enjoying each other's company. The only reason they Adan and Esai were being given to him for this operation was because of how important it was. The elders knew that if he could free the rest of their people, then the siege of Ridgemark would not be nearly as difficult of a problem to deal with.

A lot was riding on his shoulders here. Arguably, everything was.

And he was under no illusions that everyone was pleased about this situation, about him being the one in such a critical position, right now. In a perfect world, it would be someone else here. Someone stronger. More experienced. More qualified.

But it wasn't. It was him.

And again, he was calm. He had to be. At times, he felt like the world was spiraling all around him, enveloping everything except him in pure chaos. Like he was in the eye of a hurricane. A very small eye. One misstep, and the wind might just carry him off into some distant horizon.

Unable to do anything. Unable to be useful.

He had to keep his head clear. More than anything, he had to.

Their preparations progressed smoothly. Donald Elias knew the area even better than Raul could've expected, and he had old contacts all over the place.

Most seemed pleasantly surprised to see him walk through their door, and hardly any of them used the same name for him. John, Caleb, Fred, Marcus--Raul wondered how the man was able to keep track of so many aliases. It seemed a bit risky to be using so many different ones all within the same country, but if they hadn't been burned over the last fifteen years, then the guy must've been doing something right."

"3034

Almost none of Donald's contacts had any idea that he'd been in prison. Only the ones who called him John seemed to know, and even they didn't know why. Donald didn't bullshit them, though. He just left key information out. The ones who called him John, he told them he'd escaped and needed supplies.

It apparently didn't matter that he had no money. More than once, they told him that he was good for it, that he could pay them back later--or that he didn't even have to, that they would be insulted if he tried.

Raul was in awe. When they were alone, he asked Donald how he was able to gain the trust of so many people, many of whom didn't look like they extended their trust very easily.

""You're thinking about it the wrong way,"" said Donald. ""When you've got years of friendship and correspondence under your belt, it's not about gaining their trust or tricking them. It's about being trustworthy. I didn't convince them to be my friends. They are my friends.""

""But what if you have to betray them, someday? What if it jeopardizes your mission, and you're forced to choose?""

""Questions like that will poison your mind, son. It'll infect your behavior, make you feel like you're lying even when you're just having a normal conversation. It's not that complicated. In fact, it's the simplest thing in the world. Don't psych yourself out.""

Half or more of that sounded like bullshit to Raul, but he supposed the man still had a decent point. Overthinking things wasn't going to help.

When his brothers finally made contact with them, the preparations were just about complete. The look on Donald's face when he saw the three of them standing together for the first time was just as enjoyable as Raul had expected. Donald asked if this was another of his superpowers, which made the Triplets laugh in unison.

That only seemed to make Donald more disturbed, however. Which also kinda made it funnier."

"3035 -- CCLXII.

Raul made sure to clarify the situation, eventually. But truth be told, once they'd settled back down, he was a little surprised that Donald could even tell that the three of them shared the same face-- particularly Adan, who was still missing his left eye. The boys hadn't made contact with their reapers yet, so their wounds from being tortured by Abolish at Miro hadn't regenerated yet.

His brothers were in good spirits about it, though. Adan kept saying that he was thinking about letting the eye stay gone.

""An eye patch would make me look more distinguished, don't you think?"" he'd said. ""Like a grizzled warrior.""

""You could wear an eye patch without actually giving up the eye, y'know,"" Esai told him.

""Bro. That'd make me feel like a giant douche.""

""You mean you don't feel like one already?""

As their preparations neared completion, the pressure was beginning to mount for the task they were undertaking. Their scouting efforts were the real point of alarm for Raul. As they'd feared, they could see reapers hovering all over Logden prison, which almost certainly meant that Abolish was indeed present here.

That, or the VMP had a lot servants of their own. Which wasn't out of the question, actually.

Either way, it was terrible news.

Even worse news arrived, however, right as he was readying himself for his first attempt to infiltrate the building.

'Raul,' came Arumoro's echoing voice. 'Be very careful. We just got word that Vanderberk is in Vantalay.'

Chapter Two Hundred Sixty-Two: 'As an archdemon digs...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Man, those tattoos were a tough nut to crack. Just flaying the skin off of the little Lion of the Desert's bones was not enough to nullify their effects. Physically, they were destroyed, but their soul-signature remained, bonded directly to the lad's soul."

"3035 -- CCLXII.

Raul made sure to clarify the situation, eventually. But truth be told, once they'd settled back down, he was a little surprised that Donald could even tell that the three of them shared the same face-- particularly Adan, who was still missing his left eye. The boys hadn't made contact with their reapers yet, so their wounds from being tortured by Abolish at Miro hadn't regenerated yet.

His brothers were in good spirits about it, though. Adan kept saying that he was thinking about letting the eye stay gone.

""An eye patch would make me look more distinguished, don't you think?"" he'd said. ""Like a grizzled warrior.""

""You could wear an eye patch without actually giving up the eye, y'know,"" Esai told him.

""Bro. That'd make me feel like a giant douche.""

""You mean you don't feel like one already?""

As their preparations neared completion, the pressure was beginning to mount for the task they were undertaking. Their scouting efforts were the real point of alarm for Raul. As they'd feared, they could see reapers hovering all over Logden prison, which almost certainly meant that Abolish was indeed present here.

That, or the VMP had a lot servants of their own. Which wasn't out of the question, actually.

Either way, it was terrible news.

Even worse news arrived, however, right as he was readying himself for his first attempt to infiltrate the building.

'Raul,' came Arumoro's echoing voice. 'Be very careful. We just got word that Vanderberk is in Vantalay.'

Chapter Two Hundred Sixty-Two: 'As an archdemon digs...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Man, those tattoos were a tough nut to crack. Just flaying the skin off of the little Lion of the Desert's bones was not enough to nullify their effects. Physically, they were destroyed, but their soul-signature remained, bonded directly to the lad's soul."

"3036

Frustrating though it was, it did make for an interesting puzzle. How many years had it been since he'd found a lock that he couldn't break? It was a fun exercise in its own way.

Qorvass sure wasn't cooperative, though. As was to be expected, he supposed. Several times, Morgunov had broken Asad's body down to more than little fleshy piles, and Qorvass kept trying to refuse regenerating him.

'I won't help you torture him,' the reaper told him.

No doubt, he was worried that Morgunov was just trying to drive the kid mad, and no amount of explaining could change that stubborn little mind, it seemed.

How did Qorvass not understand he was doing them a favor? They'd be able to contact their precious Rasalased once this was over. Surely, that was more valuable than any momentary discomfort.

And okay, yeah, maybe an entire month was a pretty long moment, but hey, time was relative. In fact, depending on who you talked to, time might not even be a real thing.

Qorvass didn't want to see reason, however, so Morgunov resorted to ol' reliable. The tactic that never failed.

Threatening to kill the other hostages if he didn't cooperate.

To the reaper's credit, he tried to remain strong even then, tried to play it off like the loss of all these Vanguardian generals and their reapers would be no big deal to him.

But Morgunov knew better, of course. Qorvass might've had the appearance of a broken clock, but he was no machine. Not even close. The reaper was a big softy when it came down to it. That was one of his more endearing traits, actually.

And sure enough, Qorvass caved not long after that. It helped that his boys had brought some more Sandlord hostages in, but only in terms of speeding things along. No way ol' Qorvy would've let the Vannies bite the big one so easily."

"3037

Morgunov was glad. He didn't have the heart to tell the reaper that it wouldn't have mattered, either way. If the emperor really wanted to, he could've just compelled Qorvass to do what he wanted through sheer force of will alone.

That would've been way less fun, though. He greatly enjoyed making others wrestle with moral decisions. He always felt like he was observing a primitive alien's thought process when he did that.

It was adorable the way they never seemed to understand how meaningless their ethical struggles were. And not just because he had the power to overturn any choice they made, either.

Morgunov was trying to be more careful with Asad's body now, though--like he had been at the beginning, before one of the Roberts had brought Qorvass to him. After having thought the reaper had escaped, that little present had been quite the pleasant surprise. Especially because Parsey Boy was still under the impression that Qorvass had gotten away.

He liked being able to keep another secret from him. That cunning monkey was fun to play with, but dangerous. But fun. But dangerous. But the danger was also what made him so fun. The longer Morgunov let him live, the more threatening Parson Miles would become. But the more fun, too.

Eheheh. It was a real pickle of a situation with that guy.

He could probably put it off for a few more years, at least. Or maybe just let him see how far he could go. Maybe he'd usurp ol' Sermey, one day. Wouldn't that be neat?

Morgunov wondered how Parson would've handled Qorvass' little dilemma. The lad had a callous streak, that was for sure. Learned from Overra and Iceheart, no doubt. Which was yet another of Morgunov's playthings, at the moment."

He hadn't had this many new toys in ages. He sometimes found it difficult to choose between them.

Lamont the Iceheart was undoubtedly the most deadly among his current captives, and so it was no surprise that Jercash had been messaging him constantly about it, telling him to at least kill Iceheart, if no one else.

But ol' Jerky didn't understand. Not everything was about military strategy. Sure, it would've been the wisest move as far as this continental war was concerned, but there was a bigger picture to think about. Test subjects like this weren't so easy to come by.

Lamont would be invaluable for limit testing the next upgrades for the Roberts. Morgunov planned to start with the Robert that had retrieved Qorvass. That was a deserving boy if ever there was one, eheh. Recovering a lost reaper was no minor feat. And for as long as Qorvass had been missing, that chase must've lasted for hours upon hours through solid rock. It wouldn't surprise him if the Robert had ended up tunneling all the way through to the Undercrust while following him.

The gap did leave a bit of a mystery, though. Theoretically, Qorvass could have contacted someone during that time. Not for long, obviously, if he was being chased, but it wasn't outside the realm of possibility.

Which meant that someone might have followed Qorvass and the Robert back here.

It was unlikely, of course. He'd personally canvassed the area a half-dozen times by now and found no such evidence, but still. He hated little, nagging possibilities like that.

Even he couldn't be entirely free of an emperor's paranoia, it seemed.

Agh. So irritating. He didn't want to share that quality with the others. He was different from them. He was the Mad Demon. He didn't let things like that bother him."

He should just relax. If a surprise arrived and tried to kill him, then that would just make things more interesting.

Rgh.

Only if he was fully prepared for surprises. Was he? That was the big question. He hated being unprepared. If he lost a fight, then sure, yeah, that'd be a big ol' pain. But if he lost it because he had overlooked something?

Now that was frustrating beyond measure.

He had to hold himself to a higher standard. The young ones were looking up to him, after all. Even the Vannie ones, he suspected. Just a teeny bit. They'd probably never admit to it, though.

He could tell that this war was going to be a big transitional period for both Abolish and the Vanguard. With so many Vannies currently at his mercy, the counterstroke would need to arrive soon. In fact, he was a little surprised that it hadn't happened already. Were they trying to lure him into a false sense of security, perhaps? Make him think that they no longer had the strength to reply after their loss at Uego?

Hmph. Nonsense.

Sermung. What were you up to?

Supposedly, Jercash had ""something"" that could keep the Crystal Titan busy, but to be quite blunt, Morgunov didn't believe the lad. Maybe in more peaceful times, whatever trick Jerky had up his sleeve would work, but now? With all these Vannies' lives at stake? With the Vanguard pressed as it was?

No. And Jercash had to know better than that.

Maybe this Project Blacksong of theirs would be their answer. But did they even know what they were doing with it, anymore? By all accounts, it had grown far beyond its initial premise and into a confused and tangled beast. Certainly, they couldn't expect to have kept it a secret from Abolish after all this time. He hoped it wasn't just another disappointing smokescreen, just another facade in the eternal war of disinformation between them."

"3040

Briefly, he'd thought that perhaps the Vannies had finally made their big move when he got word that Crowe had been killed. That had certainly come as a surprise. Crowe and Bloodeye had been pushing Abbas Saqqaf for days, if not weeks at that point, so Morgunov had thought them wise enough to not get caught off guard by him. He'd even been in a weakened state, thanks to an earlier tussle with the Roberts.

But no. The wily, little Sunboy led them right into a group of reinforcements.

Non-Vanguard reinforcements, apparently. And they made enough of a difference that Crowe and his reaper had been unable to escape.

Bloodeye was the only one present for the battle, and his report was spotty, at best. Not that Morgunov necessarily blamed him for that. Battles were chaotic. Even with a reaper's help, it was often tough to keep track of everything that was going on.

But Bloodeye and his reaper, Arzil, both seemed fairly certain that it was not the Sunsmith who struck the killing blow. They said it was some new young buck named Darksteel.

So Morgunov decided to read the kid's file. Unsurprisingly, there wasn't much there.

But there wasn't nothing.

This little Darksteel fella, Hector Something-or-other, had interfered with Abolish operations twice before, making this the lucky third.

The first instance had been a thwarted coup in the kid's apparent homeland, which was one of those tiny spits of land on the other side of Lorent that barely anyone ever bothered thinking about. All in all, a nuisance of an operation that probably hadn't mattered that much, either way.

But the second instance? That had been when Abbas Saqqaf managed to capture Ivan. And now this Darksteel had been present for the slaying of Crowe, too?

Morgunov disliked coincidences."

He knew from experience how dangerous new players on the board could be. Without a clear track record or reputation from which to judge, they could be hiding all manner of surprises.

The big fear, usually, was that it might be a so-called ""secret emperor's"" coming out party--that was, one of those folks who thought they could cower in the shadows for a few centuries and then just step out onto the world stage as one of his equals.

Nevermind the fact that true strength required so much more than just age. They never seemed to grasp that part, probably because their delusional reapers were too busy filling their heads with nonsense.

A coward could never be an emperor.

And Saqqaf was indeed a coward. Time would soon tell if this Darksteel was, too.

Bloodeye was out for revenge. He wanted Morgunov's blessing to go hunt Saqqaf and Darksteel down. Which was odd, because he and Crowe had hated each other's guts, as far as Morgunov recalled. Maybe they had built up a secret camaraderie over the years while he hadn't been looking, but Morgunov doubted it. More likely, Bloodeye just felt humiliated by their loss and wanted to save face.

Plus, if Bloodeye made it sound like he was doing it for Crowe's sake, then Crowe's men might be more receptive to the idea of following him as their new commander.

Eheh. If Bloodeye played his cards right, he might soon be able to stand alongside the likes of Vanderberk and Ivan.

Probably not Jercash or Gohvis, though. Those two seemed to be reaching new heights of their own now.

At last, the hierarchy of power between the strongest was slowly becoming clear again. Morgunov appreciated that. It had been ages since the last proper shakeup. It was important to keep everyone on their toes."

Even just a few years ago, there'd been no obvious winners among the top boys. Jercash, Gohvis, Gunther, Dunhouser, Ivan, Vanderberk. They certainly had their own opinions about who was stronger than whom, but as far as Morgunov was concerned, none of them had truly been tested for the last century.

The Battle at Lac'Vayce, for example, might've gotten plenty of attention around the world and been seen as a rip-roaring success for Abolish, resulting in over a million casualties, but what actual shift had taken place?

None. Lamont and Jackson versus Jercash, Ivan, and Gunther. And yet they'd all walked away unscathed in the end. Sermung had come in at the last minute and rendered the whole dialogue moot, as he was wont to do.

Which was why Morgunov had not been particularly impressed by their little achievement.

He never liked to play the role of party pooper, but still. It had become only too clear that, for some of his boys, this whole contest was nothing more than a numbers game. As long as they killed enough non-combatants, they felt like they'd won.

It was embarrassing, quite frankly.

To see them so happy like that, so content with their own mediocrity.

But that was the past. Gunther was now dead, and Ivan, still captured.

And Jercash was at last beginning to achieve his true potential.

The war front in Hoss was all down to him, and he was handling it well so far. He had to deal with three marshals simultaneously. Kane, Grant, and Carson.

And he'd already slain Carson.

Finally, some news to be proud of. Morgunov had begun feeling like the only one in Abolish who could actually do anything. It was nice to see that wasn't so.

Now if only Dozer would get off his wrinkly ass and start making headlines again."

"3043

Morgunov knew the Old Man was up to something. He'd sent a sizable chunk of his men to Ardora for some reason, which wasn't exactly a normal decision during a war that was exclusive to Eloa. Morgunov was greatly tempted to pop over to Ardora real quick, just to spite Dozer and crash whatever little party he had going.

It would probably turn into a huge mess and almost certainly jeopardize the war effort in the process--but it would also be lots of fun, he was pretty sure.

Eh, maybe later.

First, he was determined to solve this Asad problem.

If the tattoos were baked into the lad's soul, then the only way to remove them was via direct manipulation of the soul. Which, they were actively preventing. It was like a safe with the keys locked inside it.

A pretty damn good binding mechanism, all things considered. By any conventional standard, no one could undo it.

Except...

Asad was a servant. And every servant's soul had one key weakness.

Ironically, if he were a normal human, then the soul-binding would actually be more secure. It would probably even protect him from things like Domination, unless the aberration using it had evolved. And that was still debatable.

But no. These tattoos were a perfect lock, apart from one fatal flaw.

Qorvass. The reaper.

The problem with trying to prevent direct manipulation of the soul was that reapers were doing it all the time. It was kind of their whole thing, in fact. Even if the tattoos protected the soul from all other forms of manipulation, they had to allow Qorvass access, else none of Asad's undead powers would function.

But using Qorvass would be a real pain, Morgunov knew. And kinda dangerous. Messing with reaper souls was sketchy work. They were durable in many ways, and yet so flimsy in others. One slip up, and he'd kill Qorvass, rendering all the time and effort that he'd put into this whole thing wasted."

"3044

Moreover, in order to get to Asad's soul through Qorvass, he would need some specialized equipment. He wasn't even sure that anything he currently possessed would do the trick. He might just have to make something brand-spanking new. And doing that meant making a trip all the way back to his biggest, most secure workshop, where he kept the Clown Pit.

Ho-hum, ho-hum. Might be worth the bother, though. He hadn't created anything truly new with the Clown Pit ever since pausing development on the Roberts. All the items that he'd tried to make after that had failed tragically, thanks to those dang feldeaths and their unbelievable stubbornness.

He'd get his revenge on them, one day. Buncha jerks. Maybe he'd tame Exoltha, too, just to really show 'em who's boss. Break the Eternal Storm. Make the whole continent habitable again.

Eheh. He wondered what the world would think if he did that. Right now, they were terrified of him. Would something like that make them change their mind? Shower him with love and affection?

How hilarious would that be? And how much would it piss off Sermung?

That thought alone might make it worth doing.

People were so silly, sometimes. So flip-floppy. Worried about the funniest things. Good or evil. Right or wrong. Cats or dogs. Soup or salad. And then when something actually important happens, they forget all that philosophizing they just did and make entirely emotional decisions or just react without even thinking. Yesterday's villain could become today's savior at the drop of a hat.

Human beings. Hard to believe he was one of them.

Eheheh. More than once, he'd wondered about that little idea. Maybe he actually wasn't human, hmm? Wouldn't that be a neat discovery? He'd always felt so different, after all. It didn't seem so illogical that he could've been something else. Perhaps his memories of childhood were false! Perhaps he was an alien! Or a machine! Or an alien machine!"

"3045

Or maybe he was created by a future intelligence and sent back in time! In order to help bring that same intelligence to life! A future god that brings about its own creation!

Because what better definition of a god would there be than something that creates itself? A paradox, sure, but what was a paradox to a god?

That was his funnest theory, anyway. If it somehow turned out to be true, he'd be absolutely ecstatic. It wasn't impossible. But how many more centuries would he need in order to create a true god with his machines, he wondered?

Eheh. Maybe not even one, if this whole god-hunting business panned out the way he hoped.

But that was unlikely, he knew. Big things like that rarely ever went according to hopes or plans. That was no reason to get demoralized, though. No matter what happened, Morgunov was certain that he would be having a grand ol' time in the process.

Which was another thing that nobody seemed to understand.

It was about the journey, not the destination. Until you got to the destination. Then it was very much about the destination, at which point disappointment was practically inevitable. But that just made the journey even more important!

But yeah, these tattoos were a real toughie. He'd been trying various other strategies like aura and willpower to compel the soul into a more malleable state, but the tattoos were simply too strong.

He really would have to invent something new for this, Morgunov realized. Something that required the Clown Pit.

Meh. He supposed it was for the best. This makeshift workshop that he'd taken from the Sandlords was charming in its own way, but it wasn't the most conducive to his needs. And he was having to keep Qorvass at a separate location, since he might've been compromised during the time that Morgunov had lost track of him."

"3046

Yes, the wisest course of action was to move. Even if it was a pain. Taking all these captives across the continent would be quite the hassle. Sure, the Roberts would make it much easier than doing it himself, but still. Perhaps it would be best to just... thin the crowd a little, first.

It wasn't like he needed all of these Vannie generals, right? And they'd just become a thorn in his side the longer he left them alive, anyway.

Bah. It just seemed like such a waste of valuable resources. He'd planned to hold onto them all for years, if need be. He would've gotten around to experimenting on them, eventually. But making such a long trip with all of them would be strategically disadvantageous.

In fact, that might've been what the other Vannies were waiting for. He'd be much easier to attack while in transit and carrying so many prisoners. There was a fair chance that some of them might escape.

But surely, there had to be a way to quickly get some scientific use out of them. Something that he could take care of in a single afternoon, perhaps? He could have them fight the Roberts again, but he was pretty sure that would just end in another trouncing. Not much new data to be gathered there, if any.

And it might just give them hope of escape, too. Which'd be needlessly cruel.

Ah. But wait a minute. Of course.

There was that feature still to test, wasn't there? Yeah. The Robert Mk. VI's most recent addition.

Mk. I through V were all stable. Every piece of technology in their arsenals was now quite well-tested and reliable.

The Mk. VI, though, had a feature that he'd dubbed the Omnivore Drive. In theory, it could be his crowning achievement, greater perhaps than anything else he'd ever created.

He hadn't yet gotten it to function as it was intended, though."

"3047

Yep. That was the ticket, he decided.

He made his way over to the room that he'd been using for everyone. He hadn't wanted to just leave them all sitting there in the hangar with all that military ordnance and hardware lying around. He wasn't too worried about them using any of it to escape. He just wanted the option to play with that stuff himself.

Which he had, by the way.

He'd very much wanted to make it so that the Roberts were capable of transforming themselves into one of those fighter jets out there--or a close approximation of one of them, at least--but that was quite the tricky endeavor. It wasn't impossible, he thought, but it would require more time than he was willing to spare, right now.

Maybe he'd take a few of those jets with him when he left. He doubted the Sandlords of Calthos would mind. They weren't nearly as stingy as the Sandlords of Sair. Unlike the Hahls of the Golden Council, the Calthosi Sandlords knew their place and could surrender gracefully instead of scattering like cockroaches when things didn't go their way.

Though, admittedly, Morgunov did admire that Sairi grit. Just a bit. That Sunsmith would make for a fun addition to his servant collection, if he ever found the time to go after him. And the space to keep him.

These ones were more than sufficient for now, though.

He asked their reapers to begin regrowing their bodies from scratch. The chamber was relatively small, but also entirely mechanical. The only one who might stand a chance of breaking out of it was Iceheart, but Morgunov had a special container for him, elsewhere in the facility. Iceheart was still too valuable to waste on an experiment like this."

"3048

The reason the reapers needed to regrow their servants was two-fold. One, Morgunov hadn't wanted to bother feeding and caring for so many hostages. That was always the trouble with prisons and the like. And two, he'd already played with them a bit over the last month, and none of them had survived it particularly well. Or at all, really.

Apparently, a simple obstacle course was too much for them. Sure, he'd built it out of machines that could analyze their movement patterns, adjust positioning on the fly, and also shred their fleshy bodies into tiny pieces with thousands of soul-strengthened blades and lasers--but c'mon. What sense of accomplishment would they have gotten if he'd gone easy on them?

Plus, it had given him a pretty good measure of their comparative threat levels.

Parsey Boy had done quite well for himself, surviving for six whole minutes. The one who performed the best, however, was Redmond Jules. Which was a bit surprising, because despite carrying the rank of captain general just like Parson, Morgunov had never been particularly impressed by his exploits. Perhaps the lad just had never gotten the opportunity to really shine.

Some folk were like that, after all. Even at this level of strength. Slow and steady climbers. Not given to making big, flashy displays of power. And there was certainly logic in that, too. They would be better poised to take their opponents by surprise at a critical moment, which was no small advantage. It could save their dang life.

But it was just so boring. Strength was meant to be used. To be witnessed. Without grand spectacle, the world would be so much poorer.

Counter-intuitively, though, it made Morgunov want to keep Jules alive. To see what the boy was really made of. And to test out some other stuff on him. Mainly the latter, actually."

"3049

He might've needed to thin the herd a bit, but once he was back at his favorite workshop and able to use the Clown Pit again, he wanted to have plenty of test subjects at his disposal.

When was the last time he'd tried throwing a living person into the Pit? Decades, at least. Eheheh. Hadn't ended so well before, but practice made perfect, after all.

For here and now, though, the generals who'd performed the worst in his obstacle course would make for the best candidates. If they died--which, honestly, there wasn't really much "if" about it--then it would be no great loss.

And to his mind, those individuals were Captain Generals Melinda and Meris. While they technically hadn't had the worst times out of everyone, Morgunov also had to weigh their scores against their ranks. Lieutenant Generals Wes and Kehl, for example, had done the best within their tier, so even though they didn't outperform Melinda and Meris, it seemed a bit unfair to punish them for it.

And Morgunov was all about fairness. When he felt like it, anyway.

He told the corresponding reapers to begin regrowing their servants. He'd learned their names, but he couldn't be bothered to actually summon them into his mind. They were just reapers. Interchangeable, for the most part.

He did feel a teeny-weeny bit bad about having to kill them, though. While it was largely true that reapers had stopped piquing his interest a few centuries ago, he could still appreciate their rarity and utility.

At the end of the day, there were only a few hundred thousand reapers left in the world. And that number was dwindling all the time. Such as right now.

At this pace, how many of the little buggers would be left in another hundred years? Or two hundred?"

"3050

The subject of reaper extinction had been yet another area of interest for him at various points in his life. And he'd had his doubts about it, too. Reaper had a way of exaggerating their problems, of trying to elicit sympathy. Sometimes it helped them to acquire influence and power. Other times, it was just in hopes of receiving mercy.

Tricky devils, the lot of them.

Even now, their tricks were still somewhat effective on him, of all people. Just a bit. He was ever so slightly reluctant to actually take their lives. Reapers were a precious resource. So how much more convincing would their rhetoric be to those who weren't as enlightened as he?

A lot, was the answer.

The truth was, the world was almost certainly better off without more reapers in it. Sure, there was the ever present threat of feldeaths and the concerns over departed souls decaying endlessly into pure misery. But there were already quite a lot of feldeaths in the world. In fact, those stubborn jerks might actually be the ultimate end state of all life.

The supreme beings.

With regard to the geologic timescale, that was. It was hard to know for certain, of course, but feldeaths could very well be the destination that they were all headed toward, eventually. There wasn't even any real evidence that the ""ferrying"" of souls actually prevented new feldeaths from being born. It seemed to, but without knowing where all those souls were actually being ferried to, there was no way of knowing if the feldeaths weren't just yanking departed souls straight back into reality.

Morgunov didn't necessarily subscribe to that theory, himself, but he didn't entirely discount it, either. He was reasonably certain that departed souls were ferried into the Void.

But where did they go after that? Did they just stay there in the Void forever?

He doubted it."

"3051

More likely, they were eventually cycled back into the planet in the form of ardor through some as yet unknown process. And then, of course, that ardor would in turn give rise to new souls.

So in a sense, he believed in a kind of reincarnation. Or rather, he thought it was the most logical explanation for the way the world functioned.

Academically, not many agreed with him, though. There was currently no evidence to support the hypothesis that souls returned to Eleg in any form whatsoever or that ardor could transform into a soul. Both of those processes were still so mysterious that most of the credible ""scholars"" out there regarded them as hardly even worth thinking about.

Which was stupid, quite frankly. But alas, the scientific community had always been that way. Unable to make known their bolder theories. Afraid of destroying their reputations.

And not many of them wanted to be associated with any ideas that the Mad Demon agreed with. Eheheh. Idiots.

So many of them still seemed to believe that he cared even one iota about his own reputation, that they could do anything to seriously impact it. So what if he'd become the poster boy for fringe science and kooks over the last couple centuries? That was where all the fun was. And if anything, that was also the kind of company that he preferred to keep.

Many of his apprentices over the years had gone on to do remarkable work in their own right.

Well.

The ones that survived the apprenticeship, at least. Admittedly, he may have been a bit too hard on some of them.

But hey. Impressionable young minds needed to be met with resistance somehow. He couldn't very well allow them to go on thinking that the world was their oyster, just because they were kinda smart. That wasn't how things worked.

Also, some of them were jerks."

"3052

Ah, maybe he'd check up on some of the survivors, soon.

Heck, maybe he'd check up on some of those who didn't survive, too.

It never hurt to be extra sure of something like that. Historically speaking, servants and reapers had a pretty good track record when it came to faking their own deaths. Even to people like him.

Lozaro, for example, definitely should've been gone forever after being tossed through the Red Rift mere moments before its destruction. And yet somehow Morgunov had seen the guy, alive and well, a little under a century ago.

What a surprise that had been.

Unfortunately, Lozaro hadn't been in the mood to catch up at that time--and indeed, the slippery fellow had been running away from him ever since. Which was totally unnecessary, by the way. Morgunov had no intention of removing him from this plane of existence a second time. He just wanted to chat. Ask him what it was like on the other side. And how he found his way back. And maybe a few other things.

And there was also Yaki, one of the very few female apprentices he'd ever taken. His contemporaries at the time had told him that it was a mistake to allow a woman to study under him, but he'd always been quite pleased with her progress. Until, that was, she started trying to sell secrets to those Vanguardian vultures in the so-called ""Grand Scientific Initiative.""

Talk about a dagger to the heart.

So he'd vaporized her and her reaper--or rather, he thought he had, until he found her some six decades later, working out of an underground laboratory in Qenghis. Surprisingly, they'd been able to make peace and part on more amicable terms that time. Which was nice."

"3053

He'd asked her how she'd managed to survive the vaporization, and apparently, she'd rigged up an illusory double for her reaper, having anticipated that Morgunov might discover what they were up to and kill them.

Neat trick, for the time. Had to give her credit, but it wouldn't work on him these days.

And then, of course, there was ol' Hamish. Now there was a guy who'd pulled off a surprising escape. One of his brightest students ever, in retrospect. For the longest time, the lad's only real problem was his ego, but Morgunov had been sure to beat that out of him. True, it took a while, but Hamish eventually got the message.

And the kid's work in theoretical physics was truly something special. His ideas formed the foundation of the Red Rift that Lozaro got thrown into.

So it was a real bummer when he told Morgunov that he wanted to leave and go make a name for himself independently. And yeah, perhaps Morgunov had overreacted a bit, yelling at him like that. And threatening him. And all his loved ones.

But still, the lad hadn't been ready to strike out on his own yet. Just a few more decades wouldn't have been too much to ask. Plus, there'd been a big, messy war going on, and it just wasn't the right time.

Which was, presumably, why Hamish and his reaper decided to gamble everything on a battle with a feldeath.

In the ensuing chaos, Morgunov was sure that he saw them both get obliterated by an energy beam that was as wide as a building.

But apparently, the reaper just barely survived. And the feldeath that they'd antagonized was so bloody powerful that Morgunov hadn't been able to stick around and make sure that no traces of them remained."
"3054

All of that was merely to say that Morgunov, in the back of his mind, always had reason to believe that perhaps some of his ""dead"" students might one day reappear before him.

In an attempt to kill him, for example.

And in that regard, the most prominent candidate in his mind was one Damian Lofar.

That little trio had been in his thoughts quite a bit, recently. And it began with Damian--or more accurately, with that whole mess that went down at Bellvine. Damian was the entire reason that he'd even been there, after all. That was the memory that had reminded him of interest in acquiring a pet ""god,"" which in turn was what had motivated him to set off this whole continental war.

And then, coincidentally enough, who crossed his path next? Parsey Boy. And before any of the other Vannies got there, too.

That had to have been Germal's doing. Morgunov was convinced.

And if those two were back in action, then it somehow didn't seem beyond the realm of possibility that Damian might show up again, too.

Maybe that was just wishful thinking, though. Morgunov rarely ever regretted killing anyone, but little ol' Damian had been one of the few exceptions.

When Morgunov had first learned about Damian's power, about his control over a totally unknown force, he'd been ecstatic by the mystery it presented. It was exciting just thinking about what discoveries might be made by studying it. And as Damian had grown more powerful, that excitement had slowly but steadily increased along with him.

The boy could manipulate space, waves, and matter in ways that Morgunov had never quite seen before--certainly not all at once.

And gradually, Morgunov became convinced that Damian was the key to understanding the relationship between the three on a deeper level than ever before."

"3055

So it was a shame that the boy had lost his damn mind and forced Morgunov to put him down. Out of mercy, really. He'd been a danger to himself and everyone around him. In fact, it was like he'd wanted Morgunov to do it. Like he was just barely sane enough to realize what was wrong with him but not enough to do anything about it himself.

Tragic.

And even the lad's reaper had become irrational about it. Refused to release his soul. Didn't seem to believe that Damian was truly beyond saving at that point. Which was pretty nuts, since even Parsey Boy had agreed that he was too far gone.

But then, Parson had become a pretty cold and callous little bastard by that point, hadn't he?

Almost made Morgunov proud. He might not have ever technically been Morgunov's apprentice, but there was something akin to that kind of relationship between them.

A rare and unspoken understanding.

If only the kiddo could see the error of the Vanguard's ways. Morgunov was sure that they could've had a beautiful friendship, if not for that one sticking point.

As for Germal...

Well.

That thing had considerable protection. Dozer, Gohvis, the Beast of Ardora. If Morgunov wanted to mess around with it, he couldn't do so lightly.

All in due time, though. He couldn't very well let Germal get away with sending Parson to interrupt his plans. Sure, it had ended up being more fun as a result, but it was the principle of the thing.

Morgunov was the one who played games with people's lives, not the other way around.

Case in point.

These Vannie generals weren't doing so hot against the Mk. VI. Even working together, it was like watching a group of schoolkids taking on a heavyweight boxer."

"3056

He felt kinda bad, actually. He almost wanted to help 'em out. Revive some more helpers for 'em. Or maybe even jump in there and give 'em a hand, himself. That'd be funny, if only to see the looks on their faces.

And on any other occasion, he might've indulged such whims. But not today. Time was a factor, thanks to the question of whether or not Qorvass had managed to contact anyone.

Sadly, this was a no fun zone, at the moment.

So he had the Mk. VI get on with it.

The hulking metal body split apart down the middle, creating one massive pair of jaws. And out came a whirlwind of extra tentacles. The ones that were attached to the outside of its body became visually lost in the shuffle as the room filled with squirming machine parts.

Six Vanguardian generals at once were caught and bound, as were each of their reapers. They struggled vainly against the snaking metal, and some of them even managed to break through a few of the tentacles.

But it didn't matter, of course. Where one tentacle was severed, ten more were there to replace it. And even the broken ones were quickly wriggling their way back toward reattachment.

And then, the tentacles all retracted, and the Mk. VI devoured them.

In an instant, all the noise--the whirring and scraping, the muffled cries and scream--came to an abrupt an end.

Except the grinding. Deep in the bowels of the Mk. VI's bulbous body, those people were being diced up, crunched down, and digested.

Still, even that was surprisingly quiet. Morgunov would've expected that the mangling and mashing of six whole people would be a lot louder than this. Hmm. Perhaps the sheer density of the Mk. VI's overall design had caused it to become an unexpectedly effective sound dampener.

Neat!" "3057

He waited.

The Omnivore Drive should kick in soon. Its function was to break down any material given to it, analyze its molecular structure, and then attempt to integrate any power-producing components that it detects into its own design.

A kind of self-upgrading mechanism. Similar in concept to the way that certain worms could absorb the abilities of those that they ate. That was where he'd gotten the idea from, at least.

He kept watching, crossing his fingers as the Mk. VI kept churning and grinding. It was thinking. Processing. C'mon...!

The noises all stopped. The machine settled. The pulpy, liquefied remains of its victims began oozing out from its bottom, forming a big red puddle.

Hmm. Nothing, huh? Just another mess.

Dang it.

He couldn't be too disappointed, though. This was what he'd expected to happen. He would've been surprised if the Mk. VI had actually come up with anything. The problem, most likely, was that the system was still not able to figure out what a ""power-producing component"" actually was.

As he'd feared, the Mk. VI would require more than just molecular analysis in order to achieve that goal. First, he would have to figure out how to make a machine that was capable of analyzing soul power and ardor.

A tricky problem, that one. He'd been trying it for ages with no success.

Maybe he needed go all the way back to the drawing board with this one.

Oh well. Nothing to get discouraged about. Failure was just one more step on the stairway to success.

In the meantime, he had plenty of other things to occupy his attention.

Thinning the crowd by only six probably wasn't enough, though. He decided to let the Mk. VI grab a few more. It was a bit of a waste, knowing nothing would come of it, but oh well."

"3058 -- CCLXIII.

The trip to his favorite workshop would be a long one. It was all the way over in Ardora.

Jercash wouldn't be happy about him leaving Eloa, but eh. The sly boy didn't need his help. In fact, Morgunov might just have to start thinking of him as the sly man from now on.

Hmm.

Nope, that was too weird.

Still, he supposed he could at least send some extra assistance Jercash's way. It would be a pretty big downer if Jerky got overwhelmed by an uncharacteristically competent group of Vannies all of a sudden. A bit of insurance for his best boy wouldn't hurt.

Ooh, and maybe he could pay Dozer's forces a visit while he was in Ardora. It would be a little tough to make time for them, but his curiosity was sufficiently piqued to warrant the extra effort.

Now if only he could find the time to pay a visit to Exoltha, too. He wouldn't have minded going over there and giving Gohvis a swift kick in the butt for not helping out with the war effort. Germal might also be hiding out there, but Morgunov doubted it. That punk was probably runnin' around out there, gettin' up to all sorts of mischief.

Which Morgunov could respect, at least a little.

Didn't change the fact that he intended to do everything within his power to ruin that creepy little thing's day the next time they saw each other.

Chapter Two Hundred Sixty-Three: 'Bright steward, flash and burn...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Abbas couldn't even remember the last time he'd slept. Physical exhaustion just seemed like a way of life at this point. His body protested every movement he took, but he was barely even aware of it.

Mental exhaustion was not his problem. His mind was constantly racing. New ideas, old idea in a new context, new problems, old problems. This could be fixed. That could be attempted."

"3058 -- CCLXIII.

The trip to his favorite workshop would be a long one. It was all the way over in Ardora.

Jercash wouldn't be happy about him leaving Eloa, but eh. The sly boy didn't need his help. In fact, Morgunov might just have to start thinking of him as the sly man from now on.

Hmm.

Nope, that was too weird.

Still, he supposed he could at least send some extra assistance Jercash's way. It would be a pretty big downer if Jerky got overwhelmed by an uncharacteristically competent group of Vannies all of a sudden. A bit of insurance for his best boy wouldn't hurt.

Ooh, and maybe he could pay Dozer's forces a visit while he was in Ardora. It would be a little tough to make time for them, but his curiosity was sufficiently piqued to warrant the extra effort.

Now if only he could find the time to pay a visit to Exoltha, too. He wouldn't have minded going over there and giving Gohvis a swift kick in the butt for not helping out with the war effort. Germal might also be hiding out there, but Morgunov doubted it. That punk was probably runnin' around out there, gettin' up to all sorts of mischief.

Which Morgunov could respect, at least a little.

Didn't change the fact that he intended to do everything within his power to ruin that creepy little thing's day the next time they saw each other.

Chapter Two Hundred Sixty-Three: 'Bright steward, flash and burn...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Abbas couldn't even remember the last time he'd slept. Physical exhaustion just seemed like a way of life at this point. His body protested every movement he took, but he was barely even aware of it.

Mental exhaustion was not his problem. His mind was constantly racing. New ideas, old idea in a new context, new problems, old problems. This could be fixed. That could be attempted."

"3059

A working Fusion Forge at his disposal. It was truly magnificent.

There was so much to learn and do. The potential spurred him on. He'd have to rest at some point. Probably. But for now, he was entirely consumed.

And loving every minute of it.

In here, the outside world mattered so much less. He was still aware of the urgency of his tasks, of course--they were perhaps the largest aspect of his motivation. But it was a process. It couldn't really be rushed. Urgency had no real weight.

He'd had to test the Forge's capabilities, first and foremost. Barring an imminent attack from Abolish, nothing else could have possibly pried his attention away from this place.

It began with merely trying to fuse simple materials together. Small, molecular bonds. Could the Forge create water from hydrogen and oxygen, for example?

And the answer to that was yes, though it had taken a few tries for him to get the hang of it. But that was a relief. He'd had a feeling since the beginning that this Forge specialized in organics, so it would have been quite the problem if it couldn't even synthesize water. Sure, he could've just synthesized it himself--a trivial task for even a mildly experienced integration user--but it wouldn't have boded well for the Forge's more advanced capabilities.

Which he was finally beginning to get glimpses of.

The giant glass globe was apparently an all-purpose chamber. Everything happened in there. Collection, analysis, breakdown, fusion, refinement--and perhaps more that he hadn't yet discovered.

Even now, a month later and with a whole host of assistants at his beck and call, Abbas felt like he'd only scratched the surface of what this thing could do. Half the time, he didn't know whether he was frustrated or excited beyond words."

"3060

Thus far, his actual creations were quite modest things.

And yet, not at all. Depending on how one looked at them, they could have been regarded as remarkable accomplishments.

He made a plant. It was just a tiny sprout, but still. It was an organism. Life. Created from nothing but raw elements and his own imagination.

On a technical level, it was incredible. Not something an integration user could do unaided, certainly. But on a pragmatic level... maybe not so much. That tiny sprout wasn't about to help them retake their homeland from Abolish, now was it?

He knew he had to be patient, but it was difficult when there was so much at stake. This pressure that he felt weighing on him in the back of his mind--it was nothing new. He'd felt it for years. But never before had it been quite so intense.

A constant reminder of just how much everyone was relying on him.

Hence the lack of sleep.

Thankfully, he'd also been able to make other, non-organic things. The sprout was arguably the most impressive creation, but only as a proof of concept. The most useful creation thus far was undoubtedly the enhanced shield that he had crafted for Hector.

The Amir-9 prototype shield that Hector had gifted back to him at Warrenhold was the ideal material for testing the Forge in this early stage. It was sophisticated enough that unaided integration on it was unfeasible, but it was also easily replaceable if the testing process proved too stressful and destroyed it. The young Lord Goffe had a whole room full of them, and Abbas didn't hesitate to help himself. He was reasonably certain that Hector wouldn't mind.

As a result, he'd been able to develop the Amir-10 prototype. Though perhaps it was deserving of an entirely new naming scheme, now."

"3061

The Amir-9 had featured four vertical lines of tungsten carbide while the rest of it had been composed of steel and titanium. The Amir-10 now boasted four more lines that crossed those horizontally, creating a checkerboard effect.

It may have been wiser to simply replace everything with tungsten carbide due its remarkable strength, but Abbas believed that alternating the chosen materials might one prove helpful against violent chemical reactions. Hydroflouric acid, for example, would eat through tungsten carbide more quickly than it would through steel.

Plus, there was the weight to consider. The shield was already quite heavy, thanks to tungsten being so much heavier than steel. The titanium was meant to counterbalance that, as it was lighter than steel, so it was tricky change to make. While weight wasn't necessarily an issue for the superhuman strength of a servant in battle, there was still the matter of lugging the thing around outside of combat.

Abbas doubted that Hector would be able to annihilate and rematerialize the Amir-10 at will like he could with the Amir-9. In fact, a part of him didn't want Hector to even try. It was entirely possible that Hector might simply annihilate the part of the Amir-10 and then simply rematerialize an Amir-9 as normal, rendering all his hard work useless.

But admittedly, another part of him was curious to see what would happen. Theoretically, the Forge's transmutation of the Amir could have made it so that Hector was no longer capable of annihilating it at all. Fusion Forge's were unique in that ability, but it was impossible to be sure without testing the shield directly.

This exact problem was one of the major reasons why the use of materialized elements in construction was a historically contested subject. The idea that someone might materialize an enormous amount of something, sell it all off for a tidy profit, and then be able to go around sabotaging projects as they pleased--that had caused considerable problems in the past."

"3062

The worst instances, naturally, had come from Abolish. Instances of dematerializing elements that belonged to critical infrastructure. Power plants. Farming equipment. Water pumps. All bringing terrible consequences with relatively minor effort on the saboteur's part.

There were more terror-striking examples, too. Bringing down a skyscraper with people still inside had been a popular one when Abbas was a child.

And that was just Abolish. There were economically motivated saboteurs to worry about, too. More than once, someone had flooded the continental market with a precious metal. They'd made a killing on their initial sales, which drove down the price as supply shot up. Then they waited, and after a sufficiently inconspicuous amount of time had past, all that supply would begin to mysteriously disappear, which would drive the price back up again. And the cycle would repeat, to the detriment of millions of people.

The Vanguard and others had long since formed various watchdog organizations to help prevent such crises, but even to this day, it would occasionally still happen. It certainly didn't help that materialized elements were indistinguishable from naturally occurring ones.

Abbas recalled hearing about some of the more authoritarian members of the Vanguard who wanted all materialization users in the world to be placed on a registry. That way, if any element was suspected of being used to manipulate the market, they would know who to investigate. And of course, any materializer who did not register would be subject to criminal prosecution in an international court.

Some countries had even agreed, Jesbol and Melmoore being among the early adopters. And Intar had hotly debated it a number of times. Perhaps in the future, a comprehensive registry of Eloan materializers would come to fruition.

For his part, however, Abbas had no intention of going along with such an idea."

"3063

Not that it mattered very much at the moment. He wasn't ruling Sair, right now. He was barely ruling his own Hahl.

But still. As long as he lived, Sairi independence was a priority, and submitting his country's citizens to the will of any international court system--much less one presided over by the Vanguard--was not going to happen.

If anything, recent events had only made his feelings about that even stronger.

And besides, he didn't believe that such a registry would even work. In the long-term, all it would do is give the government another means of persecuting law-abiding citizens. Anyone crazy enough to abuse the continental market or conduct acts of terror was not going to be deterred by a simple list. The only thing that would stop maniacs like that was real, attentive watchmen. Actual detective work.

But politicians didn't want to hear that. Or they thought that the public didn't want to hear it. Either way, the outcome was the same.

Plus, as far as Abbas concerned, a registry like that would go entirely against the Vanguard's purported belief that it should not involve itself in politics. Increasingly, that seemed more and more like lip service than a deeply held ideal. He did not wish to contribute to that trend.

Regarding the Amir-10, however, he had managed to make additional improvements to it. Its self-repairing mechanism now worked more quickly. About fifty percent faster, in fact. Quite a shocking gain, he felt. Most likely, it was due not just to the Forge facilitating the process but also because it had been a few years since he and Haqq had last worked on the Amir-9. The progression in their skill was undoubtedly a factor.

Abbas had also wanted to reactivate the Amir-10 with the soul-enhancing property that the Amir-9 used to have, but that wasn't to be, apparently. Whatever Rasalased had done to the Amir-9 had well and truly removed that ability."

"3064

Technically, it would have been possible to just give the Amir-10 that property again simply by starting over from scratch, but that would have required months and months of work. There was an incredibly slow ""leeching and baking"" process that would need to be done in conjunction with his own soul, and he just couldn't spare that amount of time, right now.

It was disappointing, to be sure, and in order to help compensate for that loss, Abbas had decided to work extra hard and give the Amir-10 an entirely new feature.

A transforming property.

He'd gotten the idea from observing Morgunov's death machines, though this wasn't nearly as crazy. And still quite different, as well. Those were entire machines reorganizing themselves into different, still-operational designs. This was a reorganizing of the shield's physical structure, controlled by the wielder.

The greatest assistance in accomplishing this new development, however, was actually Garovel. One day, when Abbas allowed the reaper to observe his work and listen to his intentions, Garovel revealed that he and Hector had discovered an ancient item that was already capable of such a thing.

The Shifting Spear of Logante.

One of Hector's subordinates was holding onto it, and with a bit of polite asking, Abbas had been able to borrow it.

And what a boon it had been. The ""Spear"" could transform itself into a sword, an axe, a staff, a dagger, and perhaps others that had been lost to time. All via voice commands. Truly any incredible feat of craftsmanship.

Garovel mentioned that the weapon had failed to impress Hector, though. Which was not particularly surprising for a materialization user. Hector could simply use his own ability to achieve the same effects. But for Abbas' purposes, the Spear was ideal. A magnificent blueprint, of sorts."

"3065

It still amazed him, sometimes, the fact that integrators of old could have created such things. Going by conventional wisdom, the knowledge that integrators possessed should have progressed in the same manner that normal technological innovation did.

But it didn't.

And precisely why that was... remained unclear, even to a rather old integrator like Abbas.

There were various theories, of course. One of the biggest was that it was simply a problem with integrators themselves--that as a group, they tended to jealously guard their secrets, lest that knowledge be used against them one day. Or alternatively, because they were too self-absorbed with their inventing to bother with things like teaching.

That explanation seemed the most plausible to Abbas. Integrators were infamous for their various eccentricities. In fact, a part of him felt that he himself was far too boring to be one.

Perhaps he would become a better inventor if he went mad.

Another popular theory for why so much integration knowledge seemed to have been lost was that someone--an organization of some kind--was actively suppressing it. That was a bit too conspiratorial for Abbas' taste, but he'd met quite a few people who believed it over the years. The motive, they usually said, was to keep humanity itself in a kind of perpetual darkness. To prevent them from solving essential problems via technology.

Heh. And if that was true, then the conspirators must have been quite frustrated over the last few centuries. Comparatively speaking, technology had surged forward by leaps and bounds, thanks in no small part to the work of integrators. Abbas had little doubt it would continue this way, as well. The compounding nature of technological progression meant that--at least in theory--it would only accelerate over time."

"3066

But it still begged the question. How much knowledge had been lost over the many long years? And how much of it might yet be rediscovered?

He supposed that the Amir-10 was now an example of this.

Abbas was able to use the Forge to help him examine the Shifting Spear of Logante, and as a result, he discovered the key factor to its voice-activated transformation commands.

That being, a pseudo-consciousness.

The Spear held within it a kind of semi-aware cluster of soul power. On its own, it could do nothing, but when it connected with a living body, it gained a reactive property. In a sense, the soul of the wielder was like a switch that completed the circuit of the Spear's soul power.

Abbas had never seen a pseudo-consciousness quite like this one before, able to recognize and react to auditory stimuli. It was quite advanced. The tricky part was that the voice commands had to be stored somewhere in order for the Spear to recognize them in the first place.

But where would that be? The Spear didn't have a computer built into it like his powered armor did. It was just metal.

And that, perhaps, was the greatest revelation of all.

The information was being stored within the Spear's soul. Or its ""half-soul,"" such as it was. It wasn't alive. The pseudo-consciousness had a memory structure built into it for the purpose of holding the commands.

Abbas had no idea that such a thing was even possible. The ability to store data within a constructed pocket of soul power?

The implications were mind-boggling. With that alone, he could completely redesign his powered armor. And countless other inventions from over the years.

It was an overwhelming realization. Like he'd been overlooking something that should've been painfully obvious for the past fifty years. Or perhaps longer."

"3067

Of course souls could be used as memory. Reapers were living proof of it. Their immaculate memories were perhaps the best example imaginable. He had just never thought of that concept as comparable with more modern ideas of data storage.

Which was not to say that it had all been smooth sailing since having that epiphany.

He had not had an easy time trying to create a memory structure out of nothing but soul power. Even with the Spear as a blueprint, the task proved incredibly difficult. Several long sessions of meditative construction were required before even a glimmer of progress had been made with the Amir-10.

As a new prototype, he wanted its transformations to be simple yet still useful. He knew only too well about how easily a project could spiral out of control when pursuing an overly ambitious goal. Countless ""inventions"" from his youth had failed before even reaching the testing phase because of that very problem.

Brainstorming was arguably the most fun part, which was also why it was the most developmentally dangerous. Without the self-discipline to know when to stop fiddling with ideas and start actually getting the work done, an inventor was doomed to a career of disappointment.

So the Amir-10's transformations were primarily just in terms of size. Its default state was no different from the Amir-9, but it had three more variants--one smaller and two larger. Plus, there was an additional code word that would toggle a deeper curve in the face of the shield.

The smaller variant was primarily just to aid in portability, but it was limited by the fact that the weight of the shield would remain the same no matter what size it transformed into. The smallest variant was the thickest, while the larger ones were progressively thinner."

"3068

Abbas figured that if Hector's soul could not be enhanced directly by the shield, then the next best thing was to make it so the shield could protect his entire body--or one side of it, at least.

The curved variable was meant to help with that, as well. At the largest size with the curve toggled on, the Amir-10 would be like a half-cocoon, of sorts. Its thinner structure would also mean that it wasn't quite as durable as the smaller versions, but given Hector's deceptively young age, the protection that it provided would still be quite useful to him, Abbas felt.

The boy's comatose state had certainly been a cause for concern. Explaining the situation to the Rainlords had been a total mess.

Abbas could hardly believe how angry they'd gotten. More than once, it seemed like the situation would come to blows, which should've been the absolute last thing on any of their minds after everything else that had happened.

If not for Garovel's calming presence in that conversation, Abbas didn't know what would have happened. It was a marvel how the reaper could sound so self-certain when literally none of them knew what was going on.

But Abbas appreciated the assistance. Clearly, he had underestimated just how much the Rainlords cared for Hector. Which was doubly surprising, because he'd already thought they cared for him quite a bit.

What in the world was happening in this little corner of the world? In the domain of the young Lord Darksteel?

Even Abbas could feel himself being pulled in. He'd barely gotten to know the kid, and yet...

The notion that Hector might not wake up anytime soon... or ever...

Well, it was incredibly distressing. Perhaps a bit more than it should have been. Abbas would've been lying if he said that wasn't a major reason why he'd decided to work on the Amir-10 instead of some other project. He wanted to be able to present Hector with it when he woke up."

"3069

In any case, Abbas hoped to use this new understanding of pseudo-consciousness in future projects.

In fact, that might be the exact path he needed to follow in order to bring his dream of a new armored warrior class within the Sandlords into reality. He was very reluctant to get his hopes up too much, but at the same time, the burgeoning ideas in his mind were too tantalizing to the imagination.

The main problem with the prototype suit was that in order for it to be efficient, it needed to drill directly into the brain. Obviously, that wasn't viable for non-servants.

But if the suit could harbor this same kind of reactive pseudo-consciousness? Perhaps more than one, even? The amount of problems that might solve was...

Hmm.

Well, it was still too early to tell how far the idea would take him. He doubted that any single concept would make the dream achievable. But it was a step in the right direction. A big one, potentially.

The suit was a bit of a sensitive issue, though. It was the single most important weapon in his arsenal. In the event of another attack, Abbas needed the suit to be ready for deployment on a moment's notice. And as such, making any major changes to it would make that difficult.

But at the same time, anything he could do to further improve its systems might just be the difference between the survival and extinction of his Hahl.

Especially if the Mad Demon himself showed up.

That was Abbas' single greatest fear, right now. That Morgunov would invade Callum and then Lorent. Or worse, that he'd just skip through Callum entirely in order to attack them first.

Now that the suit was fully functional again, he was confident that it could handle anything short of an emperor.

Well. Mostly confident."

"3070

If Bloodeye dared to show his face here without Morgunov at his back, then Abbas would make sure that little monster never bothered anyone ever again. But Bloodeye probably knew better, which would explain why there had been no news of an invasion this past month.

Instead, it seemed that Abolish was trying to solidify its grip on Sair. The Vanguardian forces had apparently just lost Agquarey and were having to retreat ever farther back into the Wetlands.

By all accounts, that should not have happened. Field Marshal Jackson had supposedly survived the disaster at Uego, so in theory, he alone should have been able to hold off the Abolish advance in Morgunov's absence.

So something was very wrong. Either Morgunov was still in play, or Jackson wasn't. Even with the Rainlords' scouts reporting paying close attention to the conflict, there was just so much misinformation being thrown around.

It would certainly help if they had Sandlord scouts out there, too. But on the subject of reuniting the Hahls, no progress had been made at all. Abbas couldn't really spare the time to reach out to them himself, so he'd left it to his sons, but thus far, they had only received silence or even outright refusal in response.

Abbas didn't blame them for their fear.

This was his fault. As the de facto leader of the Golden Council and the most powerful servant among his kin, it was his responsibility to keep them all safe. If he was in their position, his faith in the Golden Council's ability to protect everyone would be shaken.

The Sandlords had not been ousted from the Drylands in over a millennia. Worwal had mentioned that fact to him multiple times now, and every other Hahl had reapers who had witnessed that time period first hand, too. They would be advising the respective leaders of each Hahl about what kind of situation this was.

About how everything was now in flux. Even the hierarchy of power within the Hahls."

"3071

Abbas didn't want to kid himself. His ""ascent"" within the Sandlords was still relatively recent. Even disregarding the leap in fame he'd gained after defeating Ivan, his leading influence on the Golden Council only went back a mere twenty years or so.

It was tough to pinpoint an exact moment when he'd become the ""strongest"" among his kin. The nature of his power compared to that of the others was a bit odd. Sure, he'd been the oldest Sandlord since Mahir Dagher died and the oldest servant in all of Sair since Bernardino Blackburn died, but age alone wasn't the determining factor. Increases in soul power had diminishing returns, after all.

Regardless, in the grand scheme of things, twenty years was nothing. The blood of the Sandlords of Sair went back nearly two thousand years--or more, depending on how one was measuring.

Some within the other Hahls would no doubt see this situation as an opportunity to establish an entirely new precedent. The weakness of Abbas Saqqaf had been made plain for all to see. If someone else managed to succeed where he had failed, then why should Sandlords not follow their new leadership?

The Golden Council itself could be restructured or even discarded totally.

Whoever managed to retake Sair first would have so much leverage over the others that they could do practically whatever they wanted. They could rule. And their children could rule.

In a way, they might see this situation as a gift of the gods.

But of course, actually retaking Sair--or even just the Drylands--was easy to fantasize about but not so much to accomplish. One had to go in prepared for a fight against the Mad Demon of Abolish. And how in the world was that to be done?

Abbas just hoped that none of the other Hahls were foolish enough to try and parley with that lunatic."

"3072

That was, perhaps, Abbas' next greatest fear, at the moment. If one of the other Hahls thought they could rule over the Sandlords at the Mad Demon's decree, then the resulting conflict would be just as bad as fighting Abolish directly. Or even worse.

That would, without a doubt, fracture the Hahls irreparably. There was no way in the black hells that Abbas would allow his children to ever be made subservient to the Mad Demon, and he was quite certain that several of his ruling kin felt precisely the same way. Hasan Duxan, Yusef Shihab.

And Asad Najir, of course, if he still counted.

Those men would sooner die than work for Morgunov. Abbas would've liked to say the same about the others, but...

These were trying times. When it came down to it, he honestly didn't know how the remaining four heads might react. Hamza Dagher, Navid Kattan, Tariq Haayen, Rahat Mateen. When so many lives were on the line? When so much power was waiting to be seized?

The War of the Three Sands had certainly proven that the loyalty among the Hahls was not above reproach. That conflict may have been long before his time, but Abbas didn't intend to ignore the lessons from it.

The last thing he wanted was to fight a war for the soul of his kin.

But if that was what had to be done, then he would not back down, either.

Freeing Asad would go a long way toward preventing that, he hoped. The man may have become something of a black sheep in recent years, but Lion of the Desert still meant something to his kin. Even if many of them today did not hold to the old ways very strongly, he suspected that most of them would still not wish to go against such a sacred figure in open war."

"3073

But of course, freeing Asad was borderline impossible at this time. It might be even more difficult than taking the whole of Sair back.

If it was to be at all doable, however, then Hector would be key. His connection to Rasalased might be the only way to even discover Asad's current location.

Just another reason why Abbas felt suddenly and inextricably bound to this young lord from Atreya.

He wasn't often given to dwelling on what the gods had in store for him or the world at large. Generally speaking, he saw no value in such questions. Whatever would be, would be. He preferred to focus on the material. On the scientific. On the things he had the power to affect.

But sometimes, when events were strange enough, his mind did wander into that realm. Sometimes, he felt like he might've caught a glimpse of what his ancestors called the Great Chain. The invisible bond of Fate. The guiding rope of the gods.

Back when Hector had let go of the Forge, after having been standing there motionless for two entire weeks and just before falling unconscious, the young man had said something that Abbas barely caught.

""Cocora's Candle welcomes you, disciple of the Fury.""

The amount of strange things within that statement had only seemed to grow the more he thought about it.

Despite how little sense it made, when Abbas checked, Cocora's Candle did indeed turn out to be the Forge's new name. That was the missing piece he'd needed in order to get it working.

In fact, it had nearly started up all on its own after that. Abbas had insisted on reexamining it several more times first, which turned out to be quite the wise decision, as he discovered several spots in which the flow of ardor needed repairing. Nothing too serious, thankfully, but still. Better to not to take unnecessary risks when dealing with a Fusion Forge."
"3074

But there was also the other part of what Hector had said. Disciple of the Fury.

Abbas had been thinking about what that meant over and over again.

Particularly that word. The Fury.

It stuck with him because he'd heard it used in that way once before, many years ago. One of his mentors, Dolf Rachman, had uttered it during one of his many barely-coherent rambles near the end of his life.

The very last time that Abbas had seen him, actually.

Dolf had always been half-crazy. It was part of his charm. And his genius. But on that particular occasion, ""half-"" had not been the word for it. Abbas remembered listening to him and thinking that the mentor he loved so dearly was all but gone.

""The life, the risk, the time, the shift. Displaced and distraught, the mind wanders and breaks. Words too meager, thoughts too thin, souls too fragile. Chaos cools against the Fury, the Fury. Chaos cools, and the Fury burns. It burns. It rages. It builds with anger and genius. Don't you see, Babo? The Fury is us. It's us. And right now, it is me. I am the Fury, Babo. I am the Fury, and the Fury is me.""

Babo had been Dolf's nickname for him. Abbas had hated it, but Dolf never stopped using it, and now, looking back on it all, he kind of missed it.

But that was beside the point, of course. As far as Abbas was aware, no one else had ever heard that conversation. Not even Worwal. Only he and Dolf had been there.

So how in the world could Hector have uttered those words? How could he have possibly known to call him a disciple of the Fury? How could even the Candle have known to call him that?"

"3075

It begged belief, quite frankly. Which was why, when he got the news that Hector was finally awake again, Abbas became quite distracted from his work. He needed to talk to him again.

He was so distracted, in fact, that he considered just leaving for Warrenhold. With his suit of armor, it would be a rather quick trip.

But no. He was quite certain that Hector would come to him--and soon. No doubt, the young man would want to check up on the Candle. And Abbas very much wanted him to see it in action, too. That couldn't be done from Warrenhold.

So he waited. And tried to stay on task. Tried to keep his eye from wandering over to the Amir-10 as he again wondered what Hector would think of it.

Not really an adequate gift, Abbas felt. For the man who had almost single-handedly saved his entire Hahl? No. But it was a start, he supposed.

But on the plus side, Abbas didn't have long to wait. Perhaps Hector had already been en route to the tree the time Abbas received word of him waking up, because scarcely two hours passed before the young Lord Goffe arrived. And after so much anticipation, Abbas was more than ready to receive him.

Surprisingly enough, though, it was just him and Garovel. Abbas would've expected a whole host of Rainlords to join him. Instead, Hector landed with only slightly more grace than he had on his last visit. The running crater he left in his wake wasn't quite as deep or long, and if he had broken or dislocated any bones this time, it wasn't obvious.

Abbas and his various assistants merely waited at the tree's entrance as he shuffled quickly over to them, not bothering to dematerialize his armor."

"3076 -- CCLXIV.

"It is a relief to see you up and moving again, Lord Goffe," Abbas called out. He already had the Amir-10 ready for him. "There is much I would like to show you. Progress has been--"

Hector waved his arms at him in manner that seemed almost dismissive. "No, no, listen, listen. Abbas." His footsteps became more certain as he drew closer, and it didn't appear like he was slowing down, either. The group had to part down the middle for him as he walked through the door and toward the Candle. "I have to show you how to use this thing."

Chapter Two Hundred Sixty-Four: 'Thy scrambled visage...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)Okay. Perhaps that had been the wrong thing to say. Hector supposed he couldn't blame Lord Abbas for giving a look like he was out of his mind.

Because. Well.

Maybe he was.

It was hard to explain. And probably too much hassle, right now. From everything Garovel had told him, time wasn't on their side.

There'd been so much to catch up on. Seeing the restoration of Warrenhold leap forward from when he last remembered it was a marvelous sight. They'd been working on the Bell Tower before, and now it was complete. They'd moved on to the Book Tower, which would probably be done soon, too, because it hadn't needed that much renovating in the first place.

And the Bank. Oh god, the Bank.

The pressure on Madame Carthrace had magnified dramatically over the past month. The influx of new clients had slowed, and without him around to give the go ahead, she'd been struggling with the decision of whether or not they should branch out into Lorent. Not to mention, rumors had apparently begun to circulate about where he was, which didn't exactly help build confidence with their investors."

"3076 -- CCLXIV.

""It is a relief to see you up and moving again, Lord Goffe,"" Abbas called out. He already had the Amir-10 ready for him. ""There is much I would like to show you. Progress has been--""

Hector waved his arms at him in manner that seemed almost dismissive . ""No, no, listen, listen. Abbas."" His footsteps became more certain as he drew closer, and it didn't appear like he was slowing down, either. The group had to part down the middle for him as he walked through the door and toward the Candle. ""I have to show you how to use this thing.""

Chapter Two Hundred Sixty-Four: 'Thy scrambled visage...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- (mobile link)Okay. Perhaps that had been the wrong thing to say. Hector supposed he couldn't blame Lord Abbas for giving a look like he was out of his mind.

Because. Well.

Maybe he was.

It was hard to explain. And probably too much hassle, right now. From everything Garovel had told him, time wasn't on their side.

There'd been so much to catch up on. Seeing the restoration of Warrenhold leap forward from when he last remembered it was a marvelous sight. They'd been working on the Bell Tower before, and now it was complete. They'd moved on to the Book Tower, which would probably be done soon, too, because it hadn't needed that much renovating in the first place.

And the Bank. Oh god, the Bank.

The pressure on Madame Carthrace had magnified dramatically over the past month. The influx of new clients had slowed, and without him around to give the go ahead, she'd been struggling with the decision of whether or not they should branch out into Lorent. Not to mention, rumors had apparently begun to circulate about where he was, which didn't exactly help build confidence with their investors."

"3077

That was why one of the first things he'd done was give her a call and tell her to move forward with the expansion. It wouldn't solve all of her problems for her, but it would give her some room to breathe, at least. And a quick, very public trip through Gray Rock would help with that other issue--which was why he'd dropped by City Hall and a few other places before heading all the way here.

That had caused quite the stir. Fortunately, there'd been camera crews already hanging out at some of those locations, and once they saw him, they seemed only too eager to drop whatever they were doing and start asking him questions. He hadn't actually answered very many of them--in truth, he'd only managed to say ""hello"" and ""yeah"" and ""I've gotta go"" a few times--but that was alright.

Hopefully. They got footage of him running off and flinging himself into the sky with his materialization, so that should've been proof enough that he wasn't some doppleganger or something. He wished he could've been more amiable and ""lordly,"" but those were fucking television cameras, goddammit. Some of them might've been broadcasting live. He supposed it was good enough that he hadn't made himself look like some kind of stupid asshole.

He hadn't, right? Ugh. He'd been trying not to think about that, but it was difficult.

He wasn't really sure what the public perception of him was like, these days. He hoped it was positive, but he could also understand if everybody thought he was just some fuckin' weirdo with scary powers. And just the idea of appearing on TV and having to actually talk in full, coherent sentences--agh, it was enough make his stomach feel like it was doing flips."

"3078

Regardless, he didn't expect all of the Bank's troubles to be solved in the handful of hours that it took him to do all that, but he figured that he could have a sit down with Amelia later, and they could go over everything in more detail then.

Because there was a lot other stuff to worry about, right now.

Like, for example, that damn war still going on. It would've been too much to expect for that whole mess to have sorted itself out while he was asleep, he supposed, but it sure would've been nice.

According to Garovel, the Vanguard had suffered another major loss. Field Marshal Carson had been killed by Jercash during the Kavian invasion of Hoss.

Which was a big surprise, to say the least. Garovel had discussed the matter with the other reapers at length, and no one had expected Jercash to pull off something like that. Apparently, he'd been alone against three marshals, and not only had he held his own, but he'd even managed to kill one of them.

Not exactly the most comforting news.

And hearing it reminded Hector of something Garovel had mentioned a while ago, back when he first heard about Abolish taking over Kavia.

Garovel said that the Vanuguard's loss at the time might be warning sign that something was wrong. That was when Abolish had been taking a beating, internationally, losing first in Atreya--albeit on a small scale--then in Horsht to Jackson, then again in Sair with Ivan's capture. The Vanguard was supposed to have had both momentum and the numerical advantage on their side at that time.

Boy, how the tide had changed since then. Now it was undoubtedly the Vanguard on the backfoot."

"3079

Garovel, however, seemed to think that there might be more to the Jercash story than what was being reported. According to his logic, even an emperor would struggle to take on three marshals simultaneously, so unless Jercash was suddenly emperor-class himself, there must have been some other factor at play there.

Most likely, Garovel said, Jercash had tricked them in some way. The guy was known as the Devil's Knife, after all. He had a reputation for catching people by surprise. And Garovel also suspected that Jercash was in the habit of taking credit for his subordinate's accomplishments, which would in turn suppress their notoriety and make their enemies misjudge their threat level.

'Normally, that's not really an option,' Garovel had told him. 'Abolish is full of greedy, glory-hungry maniacs who would sooner desert than allow their superiors to take their credit. Reapers included. But I've been gathering information on all the major players within Abolish for months now, and Jercash's followers are strangely devoid of mid- and high-tier threat. People like Bloodeye, for example. Jercash should have several guys like that working for him, but no one seems able to identify them.'

'So you think Jercash is able to control his men better?'

'That's one way of putting it. When it comes to Abolish, though, I'm not sure how much it could be about ""control."" His subordinates might just believe in him more than others. So they don't even mind if he gets the credit for everything. Like they're just THAT on board with what he's trying to do.'

'Hmm.'

"Whatever the case, it creates a huge problem for the Vanguard. He could have some insanely dangerous people working under him. Even if the Vanguard is able to pinpoint their exact abilities--materialization, alteration, whatever--it won't be that helpful if they can't gauge the current strength of said abilities. I guess what I'm saying is... Jercash could already have one or more marshal-level servants working under him, and if they're playing along with his game, then no one would even know it."

"3080

"Wouldn't the other two marshals who survived the fight be able to tell everyone if Jercash hadn't actually been the one to kill Carson?" asked Hector.

'In theory, sure,' said Garovel. 'But eh. I feel like there are any number of ways that Jercash could manipulate things. Could be that he's just controlling the flow of information out of the country better than the Vanguard is, right now. Or it could be that the support he gets from his followers is stealthy enough that even Kane and Grant weren't able to determine the whole truth of things. To them, it might've seemed like Jercash was the only one doing anything.'

'Hmm.'

'Like if Jercash was getting support from, oh say, a genius integrator, for example.'

'He already has Morgunov, doesn't he?'

'Oh, that's definitely a possibility, too. A likelihood, in fact. But I just meant that he could have a second integrator all his own. One that nobody even knows about yet. Integrators are a pretty sneaky bunch, after all.'

Garovel was basically talking about someone around Abbas' level, Hector knew. Maybe even higher.

And yeah. Someone like that helping out an already powerful monster like Jercash would make for a horrifying complement.

The more he heard about the war, the more terrifying it seemed to become. The potential consequences of it. The idea that the Vanguard might just lose the whole war--or more specifically, that Abolish would win it.

Frankly, after everything he'd seen and heard regarding the Vanguard's treatment of the Rainlords, Hector didn't have a whole lot of affection for it as an organization. He was sure that certain people within it, like Harper Norez, were great and deserving of admiration, but as far as the continental war was concerned, Hector wasn't so much rooting for the Vanguard as he was against Abolish."

"3081

He didn't even want to imagine a world in which Abolish was able to take over the entirety--or even the majority--of Eloa. If the current state of Sair was anything to go by, that would be absolutely catastrophic.

And now he had his fingers in two different war-related pies. Here, with a possible attack from Bloodeye on the way, and in Vantalay, where apparently fucking Vanderberk had just showed up.

That last bit of news had been quite unpleasant.

With the Rainlords sending even more people over to Vantalay, that place was primed for all sorts of mayhem. But if they were able to free their captive brethren, then Hector felt that, together, they might be able to handle someone like Vanderberk.

Maybe.

Agh.

The situation with the VMP and RPMP also muddled those waters a bit, but eh. The fact that there was another faction for each side kind of split the difference, Hector thought.

He'd wanted so badly to go with them to Vantalay--and to take Abbas, while he was at it--but the situation here was still too tenuous. Abbas needed to stay in case Abolish showed up and also to hone his skills with the Candle as fast as possible. Both of things were the topmost priorities, right now.

Ideally, Abbas would be able to pump out some kind powerful item that might give them the edge they needed in this war.

And Hector had the knowledge to assist with that last bit. Kinda. Probably. That was why he'd come here so quickly, after all.

""First, show me what you're currently able to do with it,"" said Hector.

Abbas and his team all just kept staring at him for a moment.

Then the Lord Saqqaf stepped closer and said, ""Do you think you are able to use the Candle yourself?""

"3082

Hector returned a confused look. ""What? No, it requires integration powers, You should know that, shouldn't you? Only integrators can harness the power of Fusion Forges.""

The others all exchanged looks with one another, reapers included.

""That is true,"" said Abbas. ""Though I am a bit surprised that you know that.""

Oh. Was that weird knowledge to have? Hmm. Yeah, Garovel had never told him that, had he?

""And I thought you might have become an exception to that rule,"" added Abbas.

Ah. Hmm. Man, what was up with those looks everyone was giving him? Was he acting crazy, right now? Were they worried about him? Was that what those expressions were? Worry? What did worry even look like, anyway?

Ugh, his mind was racing. It felt like every thought process was firing constantly. Moreover, he wasn't even sure how many processes there were, anymore. He recalled struggling with three, not so long ago. But he also recalled maintaining three fairly well, a bit later on.

Kinda. Hmm.

Were there four now? It sorta felt like four. Why was it so difficult to count them?

His head was everywhere. This definitely wasn't ideal. He'd been trying to organize his thinking throughout the trip here, but with so many different things to worry about, it was only too easy for a spare thought process to just pick something up and start going.

One of the processes was definitely more disorienting than the others, thought. Something about it. Was just. Off. Foggy and distant. And creeping into the others. Scratching for their attention, too. Trying to distract him totally.

It was the one that he'd assigned to the Candle's memories. The one trying to sift through and organize them.

A bit of an overwhelming endeavor, to say the least. That poor thought process. It was like assigning a worker ant to a mountain of quicksand. It was no wonder the others were struggling not to get sucked into that pit of information."

"3083

"Are you alright, Hector?" said Abbas, standing quite close to him now, right in front of the big glass orb.

Whoa. Hector hadn't even noticed most of those steps. His immediate memory of Abbas walking over here was like a slide show.

Okay. Maybe he was trying to do too much here. He decided to cut that one thought process some slack and abandon the organization effort for now.

Not that it was trivial to do so. The Candle's memories were their own brand of invasive. He had to "lock" them away in a kind of vault within his own mind, away from his conscious attention.

Thankfully, he knew of a mental technique that seemed perfect for the job--one that Emiliana Elroy had told him about. "Sto," she'd called it. A mental storage technique.

He'd tinkered with it a few times ever since she'd explained how it worked, but he'd never actually found a use for it. Until now, that was.

His head cleared up almost immediately. Which kinda surprised him, actually. Prepping Sto on the way here had been the right call, it seemed, even if it had made the flight a bit more turbulent at various points.

""Yeah, I'm fine. I just, er... have a lot to process."" Hector motioned toward the glass. ""Show me.""

Abbas still looked like he had about a dozen more questions for him, but he didn't say anything. Instead, he pulled a metal slab out from behind his back and handed it off to Hector.

Hector just kind of took it without even thinking. What even was this? Wait, a heater shield? With a checkerboard pattern? What the--?

The glass orb lit up with a soft glow.

Oh, Abbas was just going now. Hector paid close attention."
"3084

His entire reason for coming here was to watch how Abbas was handling the Candle, because he had a rather strong feeling that--even for someone as smart as the Sunsmith of Sair--this thing was a bit difficult to understand.

And Hector had seen its entire life. The memories might've been stuck in a weird, hazy vault right now, but in the short time that he'd been sifting through them, he'd been able to recall the single most important thing from his time spent within the Candle--what his overall goal had been, why he'd spent so damn long in there.

He'd wanted to understand the Candle's creation process as much as he possibly could. He'd watched and rewatched Agrian work with it countless times. He'd burned those scenes into his mind, trying to break down every conceivable thing he had witnessed.

He'd figured that he probably wouldn't get another chance to dive directly into the Candle's memories like that, so he'd decided to make the absolute most of the opportunity.

And boy had there been a lot. Even discounting all the time that the Candle had spent dormant--which was a fuckload, by the way--there had still been a ton of stuff to go through.

Agrian had used this thing precisely sixty-eight times. And Hector remembered them all.

Well, okay, a lot of those scenes were currently sitting in Sto, so if he wanted to go over them again with a fine-tooth comb, he'd have to open up that metaphorical vault, but he still retained the gist.

Not every single use of the Candle had resulted in a successful creation, and not every success was the final product. Many of them had just been for material synthesis, fusing things together for an item that wasn't fully realized until much later."

"3085

When all was said and done, though, Agrian created seven different artifacts with the Candle before it stopped working for him. Toward the end, it had been nothing but failures each time, and Agrian's frustration had been obvious. He got so mad, in fact, that the very last thing Hector saw him do was light a torch and hold it close to a dangling branch, like he was about to set the whole tree on fire.

For some reason, though, Agrian changed his mind and then just walked away, never to return.

Hector wasn't even sure if fire could destroy something as powerful as a Fusion Forge. Then again, if Agrian had soul-strengthened it, it probably would've done some damage.

Either way, Agrian's decision to abandon the Candle instead of destroying it was interesting. Hector had to wonder if it was out of some lingering sense of respect that the man had for the Candle's other creator.

To his profound disappointment, Hector had never been able to figure out what that original dude's name was. He would've very much liked to rename the Forge after him. He was quite certain that the Forge would have approved.

But Cocora's Candle would have to do. It seemed like the next best name to use, because after going back and observing the original guy's life more closely, Hector had eventually come to the conclusion that the dude was a devout follower of the Goddess of Light.

There were a few clues that gave it away. The reading materials, for one. Many of them had the iconic symbol of the Shining Sun emblazoned on their covers or spines. That was kind of Cocora's thing, even in the modern day. Plus, Hector spotted him praying on a fairly consistent basis--or, looking like he was praying, at least. It looked different from when the guy was meditating, anyway."

"3086

Hector's memory of actually renaming the Forge was a bit of a blur, however. He couldn't tell if that was because the memory was foggy like so many others or if the experience itself had simply been... blurry. He certainly recalled how fucking weird it had felt at the time.

His ability to communicate with the Forge directly had improved dramatically over the course of his stay, though he'd never been able to understand actual words from it like Rasalased could. It was just a matter of teaching the Forge to beep, pulse, or screech at him in increasingly sophisticated ways. By the end of their time together, he and the Forge had worked out quite the elaborate little code.

Now that he was out here again, Hector doubted he would ever be able to dive back into the Candle, but it had been nice while it lasted. Their code had been the key factor in allowing him to ""rewind"" and ""fast forward"" through all the memories as he pleased.

But again, the renaming... that was peculiar.

In retrospect, why had he even done that? Why had he even known that he could do it? Abbas had told him all about how important it was, about how naming it wrongly could ruin everything.

And yet, he'd just... done it. Like it wasn't that big of a deal. Like he shouldn't let Abbas handle it.

Why?

Because the Forge wanted him to.

Yeah. That was it, wasn't it?

In that particular moment, he'd come to know the Forge in a way that was inarticulable. For that briefest time, he'd felt as if... as if he was the Forge, and the Forge was him. There'd been no need to communicate anything. He could just... tell. What it felt. What it wanted.

Hmm. And the reverse had probably also been true, hadn't it? It could see everything about him.

All his private thoughts and shit.

Agh. Dang it."

"3087

Well, in any case, it was a relief to see the Candle actually up and running. Given everything that had happened, he would've been disappointed but not surprised if half or more of those memories had turned out to be part of some crazy fever dream.

But hmm.

Abbas was just standing there as he worked. The glass orb was lighting up nicely, sure, and he could see materials hovering into the center and swirling around, but the Candle was capable of so much more.

Hector tapped the Lord Saqqaf on the shoulder. ""Can you summon the roots up from underground?""

The glow faded away as Abbas turned to look at him. ""What do you mean?""

Crap. How to explain? He couldn't exactly show the man what he was talking about. He pointed at the stony base on which the giant orb rested. ""The roots of the tree can be summoned out from there and manipulated directly. Kinda like surgical tools, I guess. You can do very intricate work with them.""

Abbas eyed the Candle anew, looking it up and down.

Hector still had a lot more to say. ""Also, if you move around the big globe while you're working, you might be able to improve the quality of your products, too. I saw Agrian circling around it--and even climbing up all over like a spider monkey, sometimes. Whenever he did that, it seemed like he was able to achieve a much brighter 'flame' inside. Or 'glow.' Oh, and that's another thing. Can you create sparks and fire within the orb?""

Abbas blinked a couple times, scratching his cheek. ""Ah, n-no. Wait a moment. You're saying I should climb onto the orb itself?""

""Yeah.""

""But. Would that not be too dangerous? For the Candle, I mean? I do not wish to damage the glass.""

"3088

""Oh, you don't need to worry about that."" Hector rapped a knuckle against the orb. ""This thing is pretty durable. Actually, now that you mention it, I remember seeing Agrian punch the hell out of it a few times. I think that was more out of anger than, like, an advanced technique, though.""

""I... see,"" said Abbas.

Hector walked around to the side of the Candle that was nearest the door. ""One time, he actually hit it so hard that he cracked it. He was super pissed."" Hector looked for where said crack would have been but as expected, he couldn't pinpoint the exact location. ""Somewhere over here. It healed itself over time.""

""Ah. That is good to know...""

""But yeah, I wouldn't recommend being too rough with it. The Candle stopped working for Agrian after a while, and, er... I suspect that his poor treatment of it was a contributing factor.""

Abbas followed after him. ""Do you know if there were other factors?""

Ah. Tough question. He had to stop and think about that one. ""...I think so. It probably had something to do with how the Candle felt about him. As a person, I mean.""

""But it allowed him to use it in the beginning, did it not?""

""Yeah. It changed its mind about him over time.""

""I... did not think that a Forge could have such an advanced degree of sentience as that. You truly believe that it passed judgment on him? On a moral level?""

Man, there was a lot of context to explain. Hector didn't quite know where to begin. ""Uh, kinda...""

Agh. Talking. His old nemesis.

Abbas waited a moment for him, perhaps expecting elaboration, but when Hector's struggling took too long, he spoke up again. ""Well, we can discuss that later. There was something more pressing that I wished to ask you about.""

""Hmm?""

"3089

""When you first returned from your... trip within the Forge, you told me its new name, Cocora's Candle.""

Had he? Oh, maybe that would explain why Abbas was already able to use the Candle at all.

""But you also said something else,"" Abbas went on. ""You referred to me as 'disciple of the Fury.' Do you remember that?""

Hector had to stop and think about that one.

Uh.

Hmm.

""...Sort of?"" said Hector, squinting and scratching his brow. ""I remember saying something, but I think that, er... even at the time, I didn't know what was coming out of my mouth. I felt super weird."" He still kinda did, actually, but that was beside the point.

""I see. Do you have any idea what the phrase means? Disciple of the Fury?""

""Uh... well... no, I can't say I do.""

The Sunsmith's gaze grew abruptly more focused upon him. ""Are you sure?""

Hector didn't understand, but it seemed clear that the man was not asking this for shits and giggles. Something about this line of questioning was very important to him.

Maybe it was worth the hassle to clarify, then--or to attempt to, at least.

""Ah... actually, no, I'm not sure. I saw... a lot of stuff inside the Candle. Like, more than I even know what to do with. So I've kinda... locked some of it away, for now. In my head, I mean. In order to process it later."" Fuck, was any of this making sense?

Abbas' curiosity seemed piqued, and he returned a sidelong look.

""Locked away? Do you mean with a meditative technique?""

Hector was surprised that Abbas had picked up on that, but given the guy's age and station, it probably wasn't so strange for him to have such knowledge. ""Yeah. It's called Sto. Are you familiar with it?""

""You have mastered Sto?"" said Abbas."

"3090

Hector was starting to get accustomed to seeing that look of surprise on Abbas' face. ""Er. Well, I don't know if I'd go so far as to say I've mastered it, but, uh...""

""Hector..."" Abbas turned to look at the others in the room, their audience. Members of the man's own family.

They seemed to intuit that Abbas wanted some privacy and began exiting the hollow tree in single file. Even the reapers among them followed suit, save only Worwal and Garovel.

When everyone was gone, Abbas rounded on him again. ""Hector. I may not know the details of your life thus far, but I do have some idea of how young you truly are.""

Oh. Hmm.

""So how in the world have you learned Sto already?"" said Abbas.

Uhh. Ehh. It was a fair question, Hector supposed, but how the heck was he supposed to answer it? ""It's... hard to explain.""

""Try. Please.""

Hector reached inside his armor and retrieved his Shard of the Dry God. ""Er, well...""

""Surely you are not about to tell me that Rasalased 'taught' it to you,"" said Abbas, already sounding incredulous.

""N-no. But, uh. I mean, would that be so strange if he had?""

""Yes! It would!""

Ah. Yeah, maybe it would.

""Hector, Sto is an incredibly difficult thing to learn. It requires hundreds or even thousands of hours of meditative training. In my entire life, I have met very few people who could use it in non-trivial ways like what you just described. No matter how wise Rasalased may be, I do not think that he could have helped you overcome that problem by any conventional teaching method. You would still have to put in the hours.""

Mm. Well, Rasalased may not have taught it to him, but from the sound of things, the Dry God had definitely played a role in him being able to learn it so quickly. Hector had suspected as much, but this was quite the confirmation."

"3091

""Well, uh... technically speaking, I guess it was... Gohvis who taught it to me. Sorta.""

Abbas didn't even react this time. He just returned a flat stare.

Worwal picked up the slack for him. 'Gohvis taught it to you,' he said, his tone thick with doubt.

This was getting messy, Hector felt. Maybe he should've tried to explain about blessings first, instead, but that didn't seem like it would've been much easier.

Not to be outdone, Garovel decided to pitch in for his servant, too. 'You've heard about Emiliana Elroy, haven't you? How she was kidnapped by Gohvis?'

'Ah, yes.' Worwal's skeletal gaze settled slowly onto Hector. 'Qorvass did mention that. She was also bonded to Rasalased. And you and her are able to communicate through the Shards.'

""I remember now,"" said Abbas. ""That was why Asad decided to let you keep your Shard. As a means of maintaining contact with her. A favor for his friend Zeff as much as for you.'"

'And quite the extension of trust, as well,' added Worwal. 'He all but granted you the formal status of Shardkeeper.'

Asad. A background thought process lingered on him, reminding Hector of how worried about the guy he was. And with a whole month gone by now, too. He dreaded to even think about how Asad was faring in Morgunov's clutches, right now.

Fuck.

His main thought process, however, took note of the term Shardkeeper. That was the first time anyone other than Rasalased had said it to him. It made sense that Worwal would be familiar with it, of course, but Hector still found it a bit surprising.

And he kinda felt like Rasalased would disagree with the reaper on that point, too. Asad wasn't the one who could grant statuses like that. Even the whole Golden Council probably couldn't, as far as Rasalased was concerned.

Hector decided to keep that thought to himself, though."
"3092 -- CCLXV.

""So you mean to say that Gohvis instructed Emiliana Elroy in Sto, and she, in turn, instructed you?"" said Abbas.

""...More or less.""

""That still does not explain how you managed to master it in so short a time. Unless you are also telling me that you have spent hundreds of hours honing that particular technique in your meditations.""

Well, he'd definitely spent hundreds of hours meditating overall. That probably didn't count, though. ""It was more like... two or three hours, actually.""

""What? Impossible.""

Hector exhaled a breath, not wanting to get into it. He'd already told Abbas about so many different secrets that he'd been holding onto. It'd probably be fine to tell him about blessings, too...

But it also seemed like a pain in the ass to explain. And he was fairly certain that it would just provoke even more questions.

""Look, we're getting kinda sidetracked here,"" said Hector. ""You should stay focused on the Candle.""

Abbas gave him another look but didn't argue. ""You have more to tell me about its operation, I take it.""

""Yes, I do.""

Chapter Two Hundred Sixty-Five: 'O, slumbering Dragon...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

The timing of everything couldn't have been more awkward or more uncomfortable. The news that his brethren were being held captive in Vantalay, that there was finally a visible path to freeing them--that was incredible.

But then there was Hector's coma. And the threat of war coming to Atreya, to Warrenhold specifically.

Zeff Elroy was torn. Again.

It seemed like he always was, these days. It felt like he had a thousand reasons to leave, and a thousand reasons to stay. His captive kin. His still-missing children, Francisco and Gema. His best friend, Asad. But also his two youngest, Marcos and Ramira. His sister, Joana, and her children. And yes, even Hector."

"3092 -- CCLXV.

""So you mean to say that Gohvis instructed Emiliana Elroy in Sto, and she, in turn, instructed you?"" said Abbas.

""...More or less.""

""That still does not explain how you managed to master it in so short a time. Unless you are also telling me that you have spent hundreds of hours honing that particular technique in your meditations.""

Well, he'd definitely spent hundreds of hours meditating overall. That probably didn't count, though. ""It was more like... two or three hours, actually.""

""What? Impossible.""

Hector exhaled a breath, not wanting to get into it. He'd already told Abbas about so many different secrets that he'd been holding onto. It'd probably be fine to tell him about blessings, too...

But it also seemed like a pain in the ass to explain. And he was fairly certain that it would just provoke even more questions.

""Look, we're getting kinda sidetracked here,"" said Hector. ""You should stay focused on the Candle.""

Abbas gave him another look but didn't argue. ""You have more to tell me about its operation, I take it.""

""Yes, I do.""

Chapter Two Hundred Sixty-Five: 'O, slumbering Dragon...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

The timing of everything couldn't have been more awkward or more uncomfortable. The news that his brethren were being held captive in Vantalay, that there was finally a visible path to freeing them--that was incredible.

But then there was Hector's coma. And the threat of war coming to Atreya, to Warrenhold specifically.

Zeff Elroy was torn. Again.

It seemed like he always was, these days. It felt like he had a thousand reasons to leave, and a thousand reasons to stay. His captive kin. His still-missing children, Francisco and Gema. His best friend, Asad. But also his two youngest, Marcos and Ramira. His sister, Joana, and her children. And yes, even Hector."

"3093

He felt like he was needed everywhere and therefore letting someone important down no matter what he chose.

He felt like he was useless.

But he was also tired of agonizing over his decisions. After everything that had happened, maybe it didn't even matter which path he took. He was too old to be getting lost in his angst. One way or another, consequences would follow.

How he dealt with those consequences was what really mattered.

Irritatingly, he was reminded of his time working under Parson Miles. Zeff hated that bastard with every fiber of his being, but he still remembered when that wasn't so, when he actually thought the man to be a surprisingly wise teacher.

""Worry is a double-edged sword, Zeff. It'll help you prepare for the worst, but it'll also drive you crazy. At some point, you have let go and take decisive action, lest decisions be made for you.""

And as much as it pained him to admit, he had come to agree with that sentiment. One way or another, he had to do something. Waiting around for news was driving him mad.

The only other decisive action he could think to take... would be to take Marcos and Ramira and leave Warrenhold behind entirely. To go off on their own, far away from all this madness. To abandon the other Houses in order to take care of his own.

And that obviously wasn't going to happen.

But why? That's what he'd been forced to ask himself. Because his fellow Rainlords would hate him? Disown him?

No.

Because his kin were in need. It really was that simple, wasn't it?

So he'd made his decision. Maybe it was the wrong one. Maybe it would cause him no end of misery in the future. But at least he'd made it.

And that was why he was on his way to Vantalay, right now."

"3094

Marcos and Ramira were staying back at Warrenhold, where he hoped they would be safer.

He had to be a part of this push to save everyone. He had to. If he'd stayed behind, and then the rescue effort failed? If everyone died in some distant land while he sat on his hands?

He wouldn't know what to do. His soul might just break in half.

Assuming it hadn't already, that was.

As he gazed out the window of the plane, down through the scattered clouds and out across the Gulf of Emerson, he tried to keep his mind clear. To remain calm. And surprisingly, it was working. Maybe he was becoming accustomed to the stakes being this high. And years of meditation had to have had some benefit.

How they'd gotten their hands on this airplane, he still didn't entirely understand, but it wasn't the only one. Somehow, they'd cobbled together a small fleet of variously sized aircraft for this trip. He'd heard something about a group of Sebols who'd been squirreling them away in isolated locations all across Eloa, but he'd yet to inquire further.

The current plan was to land on an island to the south of Vantalay, and then have Dimas Sebolt carry everyone who couldn't carry themselves the rest of the way.

They'd gotten clearance from the Ridgemark Private Military Police to land in the city if they wanted, but they decided to take extra precautions. If the RPMP ended up betraying them, the airplanes would be an easy pressure point. Plus, the city limits were a war zone, which meant the city itself could become one at any moment, too.

This whole endeavor was an enormous risk. Everyone knew that. They'd dispatched almost all of their best warriors now, leaving Warrenhold with barely anyone left to defend it in the event of an attack.

Which was all the more reason why they had to succeed. No matter what."

"3095

'Ax,' said Zeff as he continued staring out the window.

'Yes?' The reaper was clinging to his shoulder. There'd been some contention over whether or not Axiolis should accompany him or stay behind to look after the kids, but they'd eventually reached the conclusion that Zeff needed to have access to pan-forma in the battle to come.

'Do you think... that everything that has happened to our family might be... some sort of divine punishment?'

The reaper was quiet for a time.

The question had come out of nowhere, it felt like. His mind had been largely clear until it just popped in there. Moreover, it had been years since he last talked to Axiolis seriously about anything spiritual. He'd been quite comfortable with his secular worldview, and even now, he didn't feel particularly different about it.

But...

Maybe he'd been thinking about it, on and off, for a while now. It would've made a kind of sense to him, he supposed. And perhaps, it would've explained the inexplicable. If only a little.

The reaper's slowness to answer surprised him, though. Axiolis had always been quite upfront about how he still believed in the old water god--and about how he didn't care if he ended up being the last one in the entire world who still held onto that faith. He always said that it was a travesty that the modern Rainlords had let go of their roots by allowing such old and cherished beliefs to slip away from them.

So he would've expected Ax to jump at that question, to tell him that yes, of course it was punishment--or whatever else. In a way, it might just vindicate everything that the reaper had been saying for years.

But Ax didn't do that. 'It is the eternal folly--and yet also the eternal responsibility--of man to struggle for an understanding of the divine,' the reaper said."

"3096

Zeff didn't avert his gaze from the window. 'What does that mean?'

'I don't know if Lhutw? is punishing us for turning away from Him,' said Ax. 'I doubt it, but I don't know. Either way, I believe there's a reason this is all happening to us. We are His favored people. Whether this was a direct punishment by His will or just one more trial in the long history of our kin, it makes little difference. In the end, He wants what is best for us. For everyone.'

'...That's a convenient way of looking at it, don't you think?' said Zeff. 'If it's punishment, it's for our own good. If it's just rotten luck, then it's a test of our resolve or purity or whatever else.'

'Perhaps. But it is also the correct way of conceptualizing problems. You fix nothing by lamenting your ill fate or cursing the Heavens for doing this to you. The only way forward is to think seriously about what you can change and then go after it like your entire world depends on it. Because sometimes, like right now, it does.'

Zeff made no response, just let the reaper's words stew there in his mind.

'And to that end, it's crucial that we figure out how to improve ourselves as servants of Lhutw?. I've thought our people have been going astray for ages now. So if you're asking whether I think we should turn to the old ways for answers, then I think you already know my response.'

Zeff did. '...What old ways do you have in mind, exactly?'

'Many. Mandatory military service for non-servant subjects. Building newer, stronger fortresses. The protection and nurturing of the madega trees.' The reaper paused for a sigh that sounded partly like a growl. 'We never should have allowed the Vanguard to occupy Rheinhal, where a madega had been transplanted. That was sacrilege.'"
"3097

Zeff had to think back. The madega at Rheinhal? He recalled seeing it, but only just. It had only been there during his very last visit to the fortress before the fighting broke out, when he and Ax had met with General Lawrence and Dergoz.

When the Vanguard's betrayal had become clear.

'...If I'm remembering correctly, that madega hadn't been at Rheinhal before the Vanguard moved in,' said Zeff.

'Yes, I think you're right. So they transplanted it themselves. Which is even worse. Only Rainlords should handle madegas--and even then, only when necessary.'

Zeff knew what he was getting at. Axiolis had taught him about this when he was younger.

Shortly after the mass slaughter of House Elroy, in fact.

Axiolis told him that, in ancient times, the people of the rain believed the madega trees carried within them the souls of their ancestors. As long as the madegas stood, the noble dead could remain in this world and watch over their children while still enjoying their well-earned eternal rest. Like windows from the afterlife, was how Ax had put it.

It had been a mild comfort at the time, thinking that his family might still be watching over him. He wasn't sure when he'd stopped believing that. Maybe he never really had in the first place.

How did one distinguish genuine belief from wishful thinking? Even all these years later, he couldn't tell.

Now that he was older, though, he felt able to take a longer view of things. He could look at that belief in a different way. Instead of just questioning whether its truth value was determinable, he wondered whether there was any utility in believing such a thing. From a communal perspective.

And he felt... as though there was. Perhaps."

"3098

If he were to truly believe that his ancestors were watching over him, that was obviously comforting during difficult times. But also, there was the notion that his ancestors might be judging his actions. What other reason would they have for observing?

They would want their honorable legacy to continue, would they not?

And he, therefore, should do everything in his power not to disappoint them.

He wondered if Mariana was there now, watching him. Would she disapprove of his recent decisions?

Heh.

Perhaps in the opposite manner to what he had previously been thinking. She probably would have wanted him to depart much earlier, to leave the children alone so that they could grow and mature without him smothering them all the time.

She'd been a rather cold woman, hadn't she? But that had also made her moments of warmth all the more special. And she had always shown him respect, especially in front of other people. She'd firmly believed that it was her job as his wife to always try to make him look dignified and respectable, both as a lord and as the father of her children.

God, he missed her. For so many reasons.

He sure could've used her help in maintaining that dignified facade, these days. With each passing day, he felt like he was turning into more of a barbarian. Having the kids around had allowed him to stifle that sentiment, but only sometimes. It was more like putting a lid on a boiling pot, instead of actually turning the heat down.

Which made him feel even worse.

Marcos and Ramira should have had more of a calming effect than that. He loved them with all his heart, didn't he? Was that not enough?

How many more ways could he fail as a father?"

"3099

He wondered what he was becoming. He felt like an entirely different man from even just six months ago. It was frightening to think about.

But it didn't feel wrong.

Which was perhaps the most terrifying thing about it. A strong part of him didn't want to remain the same. He'd obviously been too weak before. Change was much needed.

He just hoped he wasn't deluding himself. Was this what it felt like when all those other servants he'd heard about over the years suddenly snapped and went on their killing sprees? They probably thought their actions were well-justified all the way up until their reapers were forced to release their souls, didn't they?

He was on a thin rope. It used to be a narrow road. It had always been difficult to stay on the correct path, but now it felt like any slight misstep might just be the end.

And yet.

If this was all according to Lhutw?'s will, then perhaps there was a certain amount of relief to be found. Somewhere.

Truthfully, he'd never much cared for his title as the Water Dragon of Sair. The thought that he was somehow Lhutw?'s ""chosen one"" among all his kin--that had just never sat right with him. And it still didn't. The more he thought about it, the more he saw candidates who were far more worthy than he of such prestige. If his power was the result of divine intervention and not that of a random genetic lottery, then why him? Why not someone more competent? More stable? More...?

Fitting.

He supposed that was where the whole ""faith"" side of things came into the equation. Having faith that Lhutw? had put him on this path for good reason--that one day, in this life or the next, everything would make sense."

"3101

His mind drifted between each of his children for the full length of the flight.

Gema. Where in the world was she during all this? Could Parson have been telling the truth about her when he said that she was working for him? Zeff found it hard to believe anything that had come out of that man's mouth. But maybe it didn't even matter. Truthfully, he had no idea what he would say to her when he saw her again.

When he saw her again. Yes. Not if. When.

As for Francisco, well... at least Zeff would be able to recover him during this trip. Cisco had been taken away by the Vanguard, so he should theoretically still be with the other captives. Unless those Vanguardian bastards had separated them for some reason. Zeff was trying to temper his expectations, but it was difficult.

Marcos and Ramira might've been ""safe"" at Warrenhold, but that wasn't reason enough to stop worrying about them. He just had to keep reminding himself that as long as Hahl Saqqaf was so close by, they would be fine.

Hahl Saqqaf and also... Hector, he supposed.

Honestly, Zeff still couldn't really believe it. Even a month later. The news that Hector had not only rescued the Sunsmith's entire Hahl but also been the one to slay the Man of Crows...

And then he'd fallen into a damn coma while activating some kind of powerful forge for Abbas? What in lakefire was going on with that boy?

Zeff had gotten to talk to him briefly before leaving. The kid seemed in perfectly good health again, which wasn't so surprising for a servant, but still. It was confusing. Was there a term for being both proud of and worried about someone at the same time? If so, Zeff needed to learn it."

"3102

If nothing else, though, Zeff did have to give credit where credit was due. If the young Lord of Warrenhold was actually able to contribute in a fight between warriors as powerful as Bloodeye, the Man of Crows, and the Sunsmith, then perhaps... well, perhaps he could worry about Marcos and Ramira just a tiny bit less.

Hector had certainly proved that he would go above and beyond to protect not just them, but all Rainlords.

Which was another odd matter unto itself.

The way Zeff's brethren had been treating Hector. They'd grown so attached to him so quickly. Perhaps to an unhealthy degree, even.

When the Saqqafs informed everyone that Hector had fallen into some kind of strange coma, the others had not taken that news well.

In fairness, though, Zeff hadn't taken it so great, himself. He just wasn't accustomed to being one of the least angry people in the room. He'd certainly understood them being upset, but the last thing anyone needed right now was a fight between allies.

The Blackburns and Delagunas had gotten particularly riled up, which was especially surprising considering that those two Houses had largely been avoiding one another so as not to provoke a fight of their own. To see them actually finding common ground on something...

Well. It was its own kind of progress, Zeff supposed. Still strange, though.

He couldn't help wondering how the captive Rainlords were going to view their young Lord Darksteel once they were free. Zeff had a disquieting feeling that they wouldn't be well-pleased at the way everyone else fawned over the boy.

Historically, Rainlords didn't appreciate being told that they had to follow some foreigner. If they came to see him that way...

Bah.

A problem for a future day, Zeff supposed. Getting everyone out of Vantalay safely was the only thing he should've been worrying about now."

"3103

By the time they landed, Zeff was more than ready to go. Being alone with his thoughts was becoming something that he greatly disliked. Too much sitting around and contemplating was liable to drive him crazy.

Well. Crazier, he supposed.

The tropical climate on this island wasn't exactly what he was accustomed to. The thick, muggy air and blindingly bright sun didn't suit Rainlords at all. Frankly, he'd never understood the appeal of such places as tourist destinations. People thought this was beautiful and not just obnoxious? To his mind, the ideal weather was that of a bright but still overcast sky accompanied by a very faint drizzle, gentle enough that it felt more like a cool and pleasing mist against one's skin.

He'd learned that about himself as a young man during his travels with the Vanguard. He'd seen much of the world in that span of time, but nowhere had he ever found more desirable weather than at home. He'd quickly grown to miss it back then, and judging from this place here now, he soon would again.

The little island that they'd chosen to use was barely even capable of receiving their small fleet of aircraft. The tiny airfield was already over capacity before the last of them touched ground. Dimas Sebolt used his gravity manipulation in order safely move a few planes out of the way, parking them outside the simple chainlink fence that encircled the compound.

It was inconvenient, but the seclusion of this place was the important thing. If they'd chosen a large airport as their landing destination, then it would have complicated matters significantly with Vantalayan authorities.

At least, that was Zeff's understanding of it. He was no pilot.

The short trip to the mainland took a few more hours. It was hard not to be impressed by Dimas' ability to carry so many people through the air like this. The man was noticeably slower than when flying alone, but the sheer utility of his power was undeniable. He'd not been neglecting his training, it seemed."

"3104

Zeff could've carried himself--and been much faster, to boot--but the point here was stealth, and a giant jet stream of water soaring through the sky was perhaps not the best example of that.

Hector had apparently been developing a method of flying using materialized armor--which did admittedly pique Zeff's interest--but now wasn't the time to be experimenting, he felt. He'd have to poke the kid's brain the next time they saw each other.

So he let himself be just another of the young Lord Sebolt's passengers.

Only two others within their group elected not to do the same. There were various materializers and transfigurers who could achieve flight, but it almost always required great effort, risk, or bodily sacrifice. By and large, it was better to just let Dimas handle it, so those two exceptions were all the more notable.

Mario Delaguna and Isela Sebolt were among their younger warriors--not much older than Hector, in truth--but that didn't stop them from making a show of their abilities. In fact, perhaps that was why they were so clearly full of energy and ambition.

Mario was one of the few well-known integrators among the Rainlords, but his mild fame was generally due more to his eccentricity than his inventions. He'd apparently taken inspiration from Abbas Saqqaf's mechanized armor, because he'd created a flight suit for himself. It wasn't anywhere near as advanced, of course, and looked rather haphazard--more like a gliding wingsuit than a true, self-propelling machine--but to the lad's credit, he was at least managing to keep up with everyone.

Isela was less surprising to see. From the moment Zeff had heard that a young Sebolt girl had manifested an alteration ability over density, he'd expected her to one day make quite a name for herself."

"3105

From the look of it, though, she wasn't quite there yet. She was keeping pace with the group well enough, but Zeff could see her wobbling to and fro quite often. From what he'd heard of the girl, she'd experienced much difficulty learning to control her power in its nascent form--a common problem for servants but especially for alteration users.

But if they could keep her alive along enough, Isela might just become one of their strongest warriors.

That was nine-tenths of his job, Zeff knew. Buying time for the next generation.

A year ago, Zeff would've argued adamantly against bringing such promising youths with them on such a dangerous mission like this. Now, though? It pained him to admit, but... shielding them too greatly from these battles would not do them any favor in the long-term. They needed their opportunities to grow. And not just from emergence, either. The experience was just as important, if not more so.

He felt like he'd forgotten that, at some point. Perhaps because it was so easy to. As an immortal servant, the feeling that he would always be around to help and protect the young ones was quite strong. Servants never really expected to die, after all. And this centuries-long stalemate between Sermung, Dozer, Morgunov, and Sai-hee was probably also a contributing factor.

But he was a Rainlord. That type of thinking was particularly foolish for his kin. Their blood-soaked history was one of generational change. Even their most triumphant tales were often accompanied by the death of one or more of their greatest warriors from that era.

Sacrifice was what it meant to serve, after all.

Soon, the enormous towers of Ridgemark came into view, and Zeff could all but sense the tension heightening among his kin. Dimas took them higher, and as they drew closer, they began to see the battleground at the city limits in the distance. The RPMP vs the VMP and Abolish."

"3106

The individual combatants on the field weren't visible from this far away, but Zeff could make out the shapes of organized battalions on the hills there, along with the odd spark or explosion.

Zeff had heard that, in terms of sheer numbers, the RPMP was at a rather enormous disadvantage, with only about four thousand total members, the vast majority of which were not even servants. Plus, it was keeping many of said members away from the fight in order to maintain peace within the city.

Compared to the ten thousand or so that the VMP had reportedly brought, it was impressive how well the RPMP was managing the situation. Warfare wasn't all about numbers, of course, especially when servants were involved, but still. That was no trivial difference.

Dimas led the group to their rendezvous point, which happened to be one of the tallest buildings in Ridgemark, the Ruby 88 Hotel & Casino. The tower's owner was a man named Vino Vance, and as one of the primary benefactors of the RPMP, it had been he who brokered the deal with the Rainlords.

In exchange for aiding in the defense of Ridgemark, the RPMP agreed to help the Rainlords protect the Miroan refugees.

The RPMP had already held up their end of their bargain, at least in part. From what Zeff had heard, just getting the refugees to Ridgemark had been quite the undertaking. Thaddeus Croll, the Killer of Krohin, had ambushed their convoy along the way. Melchor's team had already been skirmishing with him for weeks, and they'd managed to keep him subdued even if they couldn't finish him off, but this time, Croll had reinforcements with him. Powerful ones.

Raga Marda and Jan Cross, a.k.a. the Demon's Tiger and the Whitehand, respectively."
"3107

Fortunately, the RPMP's own Kristof Raynor, the so-called Jailer of Ridgemark, had been there to back them up. Zeff had not heard of this Jailer before, but from the way the battle had been described to him, most of the Miroans would have perished if not for that man's presence.

And even though Zeff was not familiar with him, several of their reapers were. Izio! Dimas Sebolt's reaper, made sure to lead the charge in informing everyone about what an asset Raynor would be as an ally.

Apparently, the ""Jailer of Ridgemark"" was still a relatively new moniker, and Izio! had instead been more familiar with the man's exploits as an aberration hunter for the Vanguard. Raynor had supposedly been the first person to fight and survive against the most powerful aberration ever recorded, Abraham Maximilian--or Max the Merciless, as he had come to be known.

Octavia Redwater had used a sword made from his bones during the Siege of Rheinhal.

Where that weapon was now was anyone's guess. The Gargoyle of Korgum had no doubt taken possession of it, but there was no telling what she might've done with it. Zeff highly doubted that it would be with Octavia here in Vantalay.

Regarding Raynor, however, IzioI claimed that the man's efforts against Max had been instrumental in bringing to light just how dangerous the aberration was. Ultimately, of course, it had been Sermung who slew him, but without Raynor, IzioI said, the casualties could have climbed into the millions before Sermung ever even heard Max's name.

Naturally, though, learning about the man's past ties to the Vanguard had been some cause for concern--especially because Raynor wasn't even the only one. But Vance had given the Rainlords assurances that not only did the RPMP have no affiliation with the Vanguard but that several of their members, Raynor included, ""despise that organization with the passion of a thousand burning public school teachers.""
"3108

Zeff had to wonder if that passion had anything to do with why Field Marshal Graves had decided to pull out of Ridgemark.

That whole decision was still bothering him. It had worked out in the Rainlords' favor, of course, but did the Vanguard really think that abandoning Vantalay was a strategically wise course of action? If Abolish sunk its claws fully into Ridgemark and seized control over all its resources, that would spell disaster for this entire region. Vantalay would almost certainly succeed in its invasion of Czacoa, and the other neighboring countries would likely fall soon thereafter.

Abandoning Ridgemark meant abandoning this entire warfront.

Unless, that was, the Vanguard actually believed that the RPMP could handle it. Which Zeff very much doubted. The Vanguard wasn't exactly known for having faith in other groups.

More likely, Zeff thought, the decision was just an indication of how desperate the Vanguard was becoming. It was no secret that the war wasn't going their way. Perhaps they were thinking that they needed to take bold action in order to turn the tide before it was too late. A few of the reapers had theorized as much during their analyses back at Warrenhold.

But if that was really the logic behind the Vanguard's strategy, then Zeff was even more concerned. ""Bold action"" was basically just a euphemism for doing something incredibly risky and probably stupid. Moreover, it wasn't even necessary.

There was a lot more to winning a war than just ""turning the tide"" with a ""decisive battle."" Typically, when the scale of things grew this large, it wasn't at all clear whether or not a battle had truly been decisive until long after the fact--perhaps even after the war itself was over. Such terms were a luxury of historians, who had the benefit of hindsight."

"3109

No, if the Vanguard was going to win this war or ""turn the tide,"" it would most likely be through logistical adaptation. Proper, intelligent planning and reorganizing. And despite how much he hated the Vanguard, Zeff hoped those bastards still at least understood that much.

If the cowboys were running the show after the loss of so many top officers at Uego, then they were already doomed. The Vanguard itself might've been ancient, and Zeff was sure that it would endure no matter what kind of idiots took over, but that didn't mean it couldn't still lose the war and be sent into hiding for the next century.

Not to mention the millions upon millions of lives that would be lost all over Eloa.

Agh.

The fact that, even now after everything they'd put him and his kin through, he still had to root for the sons of bitches to win... that just made Zeff hate them even more.

The rooftop of the Ruby 88 was as luxurious as Zeff had ever seen. A kempt garden lined a gazebo, stone footpath, and hot tub. Palm trees and tall bushes shielded the area from the wind, as did a tall fence. If not for the military personnel standing around, armed to the teeth, Zeff might have thought they'd come to the wrong place.

There was plenty of space for them to land, but Dimas decided to set everyone down in a tight cluster regardless. With so many strangers around, it was probably for the best.

From the wall of black-clad soldiers arrived one larger than all the others, a man that could rival even Salvador Delaguna in terms of height and weight. A few of the Rainlords glanced over at Salvador, as if wondering if some unspoken challenge was about to be made between them.

Salvador, for his part, looked entirely unfazed."
"3110 -- CCLXVI.

""Welcome to Ridgemark,"" said the giant stranger in a soft voice that didn't quite match his bulk. ""Mr. Vance has been awaiting your arrival. If you like, you can follow me to meet with him right now, or you can take a few hours to rest from your trip first. Personally, I recommend the latter. I think you'll find the Ruby 88 to your liking, if you do.""

The Rainlords exchanged looks with one another. They hadn't come here for generosity or pleasantries, and the offer seemed doubly strange considering the fact that there was a battle raging only a few kilometers away, if that.

Zeff stepped forward to speak for everyone. ""We'll meet with Mr. Vance first, thank you.""

""Alright, then. Follow me, please."" The giant turned, and the wall of soldiers behind him parted again, this time staying open for the Rainlords to proceed through as well.

They soon reached a staircase flanked by an elevator and chose the prior, since there was no way an elevator would be able to carry all of them in a single trip.

As they were descending, Mevox, the reaper of Salvador, decided to speak up. 'You're the Linebreaker, aren't you?'

The large man kept descending until he reached the next intermediate landing, then turned around to look up at all of them again. ""I am. Heard of me, have you?""

'Only your moniker,' said Mevox. 'What's your real name, if you don't mind me asking?'

The giant waited a moment, perhaps wondering if he should answer that. ""...My name is Linus Maximilian.""

Chapter Two Hundred Sixty-Six: 'The breaker on the ridge...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Linus eyed the Rainlords, gauging their reactions. He wasn't in the habit of telling people his last name like that, mainly because it often prompted so many unpleasant responses, but he'd decided to make an impulsive exception here. Truthfully, these Rainlords intrigued him. They'd left the Vanguard, too, so perhaps they would understand him.

And from all he'd heard about them over the years, he highly doubted that they would be afraid of a mere name."

"3110 -- CCLXVI.

""Welcome to Ridgemark,"" said the giant stranger in a soft voice that didn't quite match his bulk. ""Mr. Vance has been awaiting your arrival. If you like, you can follow me to meet with him right now, or you can take a few hours to rest from your trip first. Personally, I recommend the latter. I think you'll find the Ruby 88 to your liking, if you do.""

The Rainlords exchanged looks with one another. They hadn't come here for generosity or pleasantries, and the offer seemed doubly strange considering the fact that there was a battle raging only a few kilometers away, if that.

Zeff stepped forward to speak for everyone. ""We'll meet with Mr. Vance first, thank you.""

""Alright, then. Follow me, please."" The giant turned, and the wall of soldiers behind him parted again, this time staying open for the Rainlords to proceed through as well.

They soon reached a staircase flanked by an elevator and chose the prior, since there was no way an elevator would be able to carry all of them in a single trip.

As they were descending, Mevox, the reaper of Salvador, decided to speak up. 'You're the Linebreaker, aren't you?'

The large man kept descending until he reached the next intermediate landing, then turned around to look up at all of them again. ""I am.

Heard of me, have you?""

'Only your moniker,' said Mevox. 'What's your real name, if you don't mind me asking?'

The giant waited a moment, perhaps wondering if he should answer that. ""...My name is Linus Maximilian.""

Chapter Two Hundred Sixty-Six: 'The breaker on the ridge...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Linus eyed the Rainlords, gauging their reactions. He wasn't in the habit of telling people his last name like that, mainly because it often prompted so many unpleasant responses, but he'd decided to make an impulsive exception here. Truthfully, these Rainlords intrigued him. They'd left the Vanguard, too, so perhaps they would understand him.

And from all he'd heard about them over the years, he highly doubted that they would be afraid of a mere name."

"3111

He could see the confusion and curiosity on their faces. But no shock or horror.

Good. He hadn't made a mistake, then. Wouldn't have been very good if he scared them off before they could be of any help.

He did expect some questions, though. Having the same last name as one of the most dangerous lunatics in modern history tended to provoke them.

'Well, it's good to meet you, Linus. My name's Mevox. And this big fella here is my servant, Salvador Delaguna.'

No probing questions, huh? Well, it was probably just a matter of time. ""Nice to meet you. All of you."" He kept going down stairs.

'You wouldn't happen to be related to Max the Merciless, would ya?' said Mevox.

There it was. ""Yeah,"" Linus said flatly. ""He was my nephew.""

'I see, I see,' said Mevox. 'And does that have anything to do with why you're no longer part of the Vanguard?'

""Sure does.""

'Is this a sensitive subject? Would you rather not be asked about it?'

""You aren't the first to ask. Won't the be last, either. Fire away, if you're so curious.""

'Sounds like you're very well-adjusted. But I don't wanna be nosy. Goes against my nature.'

Linus knew almost nothing about this Mevox, and yet somehow, he still knew that was a bold-faced lie. The snort from Salvador was a pretty affirmative clue, too.

'If I WERE to inquire further, though,' Mevox went on, 'I would probably want to know more about why you decided to work for this Vance fella. Guy like you? Can't just be about the payday, can it? Not that I'd think less of you, if it was.'

He exited the stairwell and entered a long corridor full of polished silver tiles and soft amber lighting. He stopped and turned to make sure that their guests were following.

To his eyes, the reapers were tall, gangly things--humanoid in shape but ethereally pale and far too slim. They had no mouths or noses, either, and their faces instead were full of extra eyes."

"3112

It didn't escape Linus' notice, however, that that this Mevox was a slightly different color than most reapers. A bit darker, not quite so pale. Over his many years, Linus had seen several other reapers like that, ones with some kind of clear visual differentiation.

And they always meant trouble.

But not always the bad kind.

It was just so strange, because it highlighted the fact that, technically speaking, almost all reapers looked identical to one another. He'd heard as much from other servants, as well. No one ever had trouble telling them apart, but when it came to actually describing their visual features, it was a lost cause. Usually.

""I'd be lying if I said the money didn't matter,"" said Linus. He started walking again as the Rainlords finished filing into the hallway. ""But Mr. Vance is an honorable man, doing important work here. This city would've been ransacked a hundred times over if not for him and his wealthy friends funding the RPMP.""

'Vantalay also wouldn't be in the middle of a civil war if not for them, no?'

""Hmph. Sure. But it would still be at war with its neighbors. You're not about to tell me that you've decided to switch sides, have you?""

'Not at all. Just playing a bit of devil's advocate. It's a healthy exercise. Keeps us reapers sharp in our old age.'

Linus didn't press the issue further. They arrived at the end of the hall, and he knocked once on the door way.

""Enter,"" came Mr. Vance's voice from the other side.

Linus led everyone in. There weren't enough places for everyone to sit, but the enormous office had plenty of space.

Mr. Vance wasn't at his desk. Instead, the man was by the large windows on the far wall, overlooking the Ruby 88's square-shaped central plaza. The man had a good view of all thirty-four stories from here, and this was far from the first time that Linus had seen him standing there."

"3113

""Thank you for coming,"" said Mr. Vance as he turned around. He was a man of quite advanced years, and it showed. Gray hair, gray mustache, hunched posture, wrinkled features. His right hand gripped a cane, and he was missing an eye. Even in that sharp suit of his, he never really looked to be in the best of health. There was a reason that his enemies had taken to calling him the Shriveled Donkey.

Mr. Vance just seemed to find the name amusing, though.

Linus, not so much.

One of the Rainlords in front began speaking, a raven-haired man with steel gray eyes and harsh features. Linus hadn't yet learned all of their faces, but he was fairly certain this was Zeff Elroy, the one they called the Water Dragon of Sair.

""How's the battle going?"" the man asked.

""There are good days and bad,"" said Mr. Vance, stepping slowly over to his desk. ""Thankfully, we were able to push Abolish out of the city before the VMP's reinforcements arrived to assist them. We've managed to keep the fighting away from any civilians.""

""If you're not asking us to head straight into combat, then you must feel that things are currently under control,"" said Elroy.

Mr. Vance gave a mild nod. ""Yes. I was thinking of keeping you here as a secondary force, in case they breach the city. But if you would prefer to head to the front lines, that could be arranged, too.""

""You are very accommodating,"" said Elroy.

""I understand that your situation is somewhat difficult at the moment,"" said Mr. Vance. ""You would prefer not to make too large of a splash here in Vantalay, no? I don't mind thinking of you as an ace up my sleeve, if you'll pardon the gambling analogy."" Elroy made no response."

"3114

""You would be honorary members of the RPMP,"" Mr. Vance went on, ""and as such, I would prepare a suitable stipend for the duration of your stay here. That, too, is negotiable if you would prefer some other form of payment. Something with less of a paper trail, perhaps?""

Still, the Rainlords persisted in silence.

Mr. Vance tilted his head at them. ""Well? I'm not getting any younger over here. Do you find those terms agreeable? If so, let us begin hashing out the details.""

""...No,"" said Elroy. ""We do not wish to prolong our time in Ridgemark any more than necessary.""

Mr. Vance leaned back in his chair. ""Oh? You have pressing business elsewhere?""

""You could say that.""

""If you are willing to share what it is, then perhaps I could provide assistance--or at least point you toward someone else who can.""

Elroy fell quiet again.

From his position beside Mr. Vance, Linus could see several of the Rainlords exchanging small glances with one another, particularly the reapers, as if they were conducting a silent conversation. Obviously, the reapers could speak telepathically with their own servants, but not with each other, so it made for a peculiar sight.

It made him wonder if perhaps Rainlord reapers actually could have private conversations. Heh. Maybe that was why they were such a tightly knit community.

More likely, though, they just understood each other incredibly well.

At length, Elroy spoke up again for everyone. ""Logden Prison. You know of it?""

Mr. Vance paused to think. ""Logden? Yes, I know of it. What is your interest in it?""

""We have people there. We want to get them out.""

Mr. Vance gave Linus a look.

Linus knew what he wanted. A tentative assessment. Would it be possible to help the Rainlords with such an endeavor? A simple nod or shake of his head was all Mr. Vance was looking for here."

"3115

Unfortunately, Linus couldn't give him either answer. Without knowing more about the nature of the operation that these Rainlords had in mind, he could not in good conscious commit to assisting them, even tentatively.

But it was still an interesting idea. He decided to give his boss a kind of uncertain half-nod.

Mr. Vance seemed to understand. ""We can help with that.""

Okay, maybe he hadn't understood. Shit.

Linus didn't get the chance to take Mr. Vance aside and explain, because Elroy spoke up again first.

""Ideally, we would be able to get them out before the battle here is decided.""

""Ah, do you think these people would be willing and able to aid in the defense of the city?""

""Absolutely,"" said Elroy.

""Excellent,"" said Mr. Vance with a smile.

Linus was clenching his jaw as Mr. Vance turned to look at him again.

The meeting didn't get much better for Linus from there. The discussion turned to one of logistics and intel-sharing with regard to the enemy. Several times, Linus wanted to interject and perhaps walk back their claim of support, but no clear opportunity for it ever arrived.

And frankly, it probably wouldn't matter. Whether intentionally or not, Mr. Vance had committed the RPMP--or his part of it, at least--to helping them. Trying to undo that commitment would just make him look weak and foolish.

Ugh.

As the meeting drew on, Linus found his mind already wandering to the more pressing issue of who the hell he could spare for this mission. Maybe he could convince Kristof or Daro to send someone from their divisions, instead. With the promise of future reinforcements on the table, one of them might agree.

Probably Daro, most likely. Kristof was already up to his eyeballs on the front line. Yeah. The more Linus thought about it, the more he felt like Kristof wouldn't want to spare even a single patrolman--not without a major concession on Linus' part, at least."

By the time the Rainlords left, Linus was in a foul mood. Mr. Vance must've been able to tell, because he asked him to stay and talk instead of escorting them to their rooms. Granted, that was grunt work, but still. If the Rainlords decided to go crazy and start attacking people, Linus might've been the only person in the building who could stop them.

"I want you go with them," Mr. Vance.

Linus didn't understand. Go with them? The man had just asked him to stay behind and talk. "What?"

"To Logden Prison," he clarified. "Take some men with you, if you want, but I want you to accompany the Rainlords personally."

Linus blinked. "Sir, what are you talking about? I couldn't possibly leave Ridgemark, right now. If the VMP breaches the city, this place would be all but defenseless. You'd be defenseless."

"I know."

He couldn't believe what he was hearing. Had the man lost his--?

Hmm.

Actually, no. On second thought, Linus could believe it just fine.

Vino Vance had been acting strange over the last few months. He'd been making decisions that he never would have a year ago, taking risks that he never would have.

Just last month, for instance, when that first group of Rainlords arrived, Vino had asked him to send a group to negotiate with them. This, when a Vanguardian field marshal had been only a stone's throw away from here. It had worked out for the best in the end, of course, but it could have easily turned into gigantic mess for a variety of reasons.

And there were subtler changes, too. Vino's appetite wasn't what it used to be. Linus barely ever saw him eating, anymore. It didn't help that Vino's natural appearance had always been rather pale and sickly, either."

Rather than feigning confusion or disbelief, Linus' expression settled, and he sat down in front of the man's desk. He let the silence linger for a while longer, finding it almost impossible to look him in the eye. Linus didn't want to inquire further. But at this point, he had no choice.

""...Talk to me, Vino. What's been going on with you, lately?""

Vino took his time answering. Perhaps he didn't want to have this conversation, either. ""I'm dying, Linus.""

The words washed over him like a sudden haze. His worst fear, realized in an instant. It wasn't painful. Not yet, at least. It was too sudden. Quick and precise like a knife.

It would hit him eventually, though. Linus had been through this type of thing many times before. His entire family was dead, after all, most from old age.

The impulsive part of him wanted to deny what he'd heard. Or rebel against it, at least. A man of Vino Vance's resources? They could almost certainly secure a reaper for him after he passed. And if not, Linus had plenty of contacts, as did his reaper, Dijara.

But it wasn't that simple, of course.

Linus had known Vino for ages, since long before he'd chosen to come work for him. Despite the professionalism that Linus tried to show in front of others, the truth of the matter was that Vino was his oldest and dearest friend.

When they first met, Linus was little better than a greenhorn in the Vanguard, and Vino was just a boy living in abject squalor here in Vantalay. Those horrific conditions had been a contributing factor to Vino's physical frailty throughout his life.

But he'd lived a long time, despite all that. Eighty-five years and counting.

Linus didn't yet have the heart to ask how much longer he had."

""You don't seem surprised,"" Vino observed.

Linus didn't know what the proper response here was. Was there one? Over a century of life experience, and he was still lost for words. He'd never been all that good with them in the first place. That was one of the reasons he enjoyed working under someone like Vino.

""I guess you figured it out awhile ago, eh? Always were sharper than you liked to let on.""

Linus still couldn't look at him. He wanted to tell Vino not to be stubborn, to become a servant. But he already knew Vino's feelings on the matter. The subject had come up many times before over the course of casual conversation.

This was anything but casual, though. Maybe he should try broaching it again. Couldn't hurt to try, right? What was there to lose?

Linus finally looked up at him. ""...I'm sure I could find a reaper for you, Vino.""

""I'm sure you could, old friend.""

That tone didn't sound like one of agreement. ""Is there time enough for it?""

""Probably.""

""...But you won't do it.""

""Come on, Linus. How many times have we talked about this?""

Something about Vino's tone annoyed him. ""As far as I'm concerned,"" said Linus, ""those were all warm up conversations for the one we're having right now. This is your life we're talking about, Vino.""

""Yes. My life. Not yours. Not some reaper's. Mine.""

""Is that really why you're being so stubborn? Because you don't like the idea of putting your life in someone else's hands?""

""Not at all. My life has been in your hands more times than I can even remember.""

""Then what is it, exactly? Why not give it a shot?""

""Linus, please. You think I want to be immortal in this body? I didn't want it when I was still young and... relatively virile, let's say. Why would I want it now that I'm an infirm old man?""

""Because you're about to die.""

"3119

Vino shook his head. ""I've lived my life the way I wanted. And I'll die the way I want, too. Though my fearful heart might waver, my mind does not. I refuse to act impulsively now.""

Linus sighed and stood up in order to step away from the desk.

""You're just being prideful and stubborn. Not courageous.""

""Maybe. But I've never thought pride was such a terrible thing.""

Agh.

He needed to try a different approach. An appeal to Vino's sense of responsibility, perhaps. ""Ridgemark needs you, Vino. Now more than ever. This war... it threatens everything you've built. Everything you love.""

Vino gave a noticeable pause. ""I'll admit, the timing could be better. I would've liked to go when things were more peaceful...""

Linus perked up a little, seeing an opening. ""Then we can do that. You could become a servant just until the war is over. Or for however long you deem fit. Who knows? You might be surprised how much you like it.""

Vino just looked at him, expressionless.

""The important thing is that you would be able to go out on your own terms. Whenever you want.""

Vino's gaze drifted to the side, somewhat.

Was that... a tinge of uncertainty that Linus saw? Maybe Vino could be convinced, after all.

Vino closed his eyes for a moment and took a long breath. ""Wouldn't that just be a delusion? This war may be the largest in a century, but it won't be the last. There will always been another excuse to prolong my departure.""

Well, yeah. That was kind of what Linus was hoping for here. He decided to keep that thought to himself, though. ""But it wouldn't be a fixed decision, Vino. You could change your mind at any time. Just give it a chance. Please.""

"3120

""No, Linus. There's no point. My mind is made up. I've already made peace with it. I hope you will, too.""

Irritated, Linus started walking back and forth across the room. ""Vino, this is absurd. You're giving up, and that's not like you. Not at all. Any number of things could happen in the time you have left. I don't know how long that is, but if you would just open yourself up to to the possibility that--""

""I have about three months left. Or so my doctor tells me.""

Linus stopped pacing, his back toward Vino. He didn't turn around. Something about that bit of information and the tone of Vino's voice made him feel like there was nothing at all that could be done--even though there most certainly was.

For a while, Linus just stood there, silent and stewing in his thoughts.

He was already feeling it, he suddenly realized. The death of his closest friend.

In the past, when he'd lost people, it usually took him a few days to process, to get to this point. But now...

It should've been the opposite, shouldn't it? After experiencing this so many times before, he should've built up some manner of tolerance to it.

But it wasn't like that at all. If anything, he felt worse than ever. More powerless than ever. More hopeless than ever.

More alone than ever.

He supposed it was a testament to just how much Vino meant to him. If he had the presence of mind for it, he might've tried to take solace in that thought a little more.

But he didn't. It passed through his mind like rain through a window screen and was gone.

And instead, a far stupider thought manifested in his mind, something that he already knew made no sense but that nonetheless felt so incredibly appropriate at the moment. ""Well, maybe I'll just let myself die along with you, then.""

"3121

Vino was quiet a moment. His next words came out very softly. ""If that's what you want, then I won't be able to stop you. But I'm hoping that you'll keep living for a while longer yet. Because I'm leaving everything to you.""

Linus turned to look at him again. ""What?""

""In my will, I mean,"" said Vino. ""You're getting everything.""

Linus was speechless.

""Do whatever you want with it all. Tear down the Ruby and turn it into a landfill, if that's what'll make you happy.""

At that comment, Linus' expression flattened a little. ""You know I'd never do something like that.""

A wry smile crept across Vino's wrinkled face. ""Yeah, I do. That's why I'm leaving it to you. I know you'll take care of everything--or do your best to, at least. And that's all I'm asking for.""

Linus just sighed again. The man already sounded so resigned to his fate, as if his own legacy hardly even mattered to him.

Or maybe he was just at peace with everything. Linus found it difficult to tell the difference between surrender and acceptance. One sounded a lot healthier than the other, but was there any actual nuance to speak of? He wasn't sure.

Maybe it didn't matter.

Heh. Maybe nothing did.

Dijara would have some choice words for him if she heard him say that. He wished she was here now, but it felt too late to call her over. He could talk to her later.

Perhaps Linus' silence was beginning to bother Vino, because the other man decided to pick the conversation back up again without waiting for him to respond. ""You're not really thinking about dying with me, are you?""

Honestly, he wasn't sure. He just turned away and rubbed his forehead.

""Linus. You still have so much to live for.""

The irony of listening to this man say that made Linus want to laugh in Vino's face--and maybe also punch him. He resisted both urges, though."

"3122

""I suppose you must think that sounds pretty hypocritical coming from me,"" said Vino.

Yeah, no shit.

""But Linus, listen. You're not like me. You're, what? Twice my age or so? And yet you don't look any older than the day I first met you."" Vino paused for a breathy laugh. ""You still have your health. Your youth. Even if I were to become undead like you, I couldn't reverse aging. I'd still be old and tired and full of chronic pain whenever my poor reaper wasn't around. But you? You could go out there and start a brand new family, if you wanted. And show them the world. Teach them all sorts of things. You're wiser than you give yourself credit for, my friend.""

""So you're telling me that if you could somehow reclaim your youth, you'd change your mind?"" said Linus.

At that, Vino hesitated. He looked like he wanted to say something but thought better of it and averted his gaze.

""Yeah, I thought not,"" said Linus.

""Look, we're not talking about me.""

""Yes, we are.""

""Linus. I'm just..." It was a rare instance where Vino seemed to struggle for his words. In all their time together, Linus hadn't seen this very often. Vino took the opportunity to sigh heavily before continuing. ""I'm just ready to move on. That's all.""

""To move on,"" echoed Linus dryly.

Vino gestured broadly around him. ""From this life. Or this world, maybe. I'm ready to see whatever comes next. Truthfully, I'm kind of excited about it.""

Linus just stared at him for a moment. Somehow, this wasn't surprising. Thinking back to all their conversations over the years, the topic of what happens after death had come up quite a number of times. ""...And what if there's nothing to discover?""

Vino all but rolled his eyes at him. ""You would ask that question of a dying man, you callous jerk. Would it kill you have some tact for a change? Honestly.""

Linus wasn't really in the mood to lighten things up with insults or banter. He just kept looking at his friend, waiting for an answer to his question."
"3123 -- CCLXVII.

Vino exhaled through his nose. ""I don't think there'll be nothing,"" said Vino, ""but if I'm wrong, then, well. At least I won't have to listen you saying 'I told you so.'""

Linus just shook his head. He couldn't understand how Vino could be so casual about it.

Though, at the same time, a small part of him had to admire the man, too. All these years, Vino had told him over and over again that he believed in an afterlife. Linus had never entirely thought that he was serious. He'd always sort of suspected that Vino might've just been posturing. Trying to convince himself as much as Linus.

But listening to him now?

Linus couldn't think that way anymore. Vino was really putting his money where his mouth was.

Chapter Two Hundred Sixty-Seven: 'Thy strongest bonds...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Warrenhold hadn't felt this empty in a while. With so many of the Rainlords having ventured off to join the fight in Vantalay, there was a certain tension in the air that Hector couldn't quite describe.

Maybe it was just him, though. The remaining Rainlords didn't let any nervousness show. Even with most of their warriors away, they managed to look quite calm and collected, like it was just business as usual.

But it wasn't, of course. No one knew that better than Hector.

The fight could come at any time, and more than ever, he wanted to be ready. The reconstruction effort had shifted, partly because half or more of their helpers had gone off to fight and partly because Hector felt that there were new architectural priorities to focus on.

Hector had been making more shields again. The storage room full of Amir-9 prototypes was a good start, but he needed more. He intended to line the whole castle with them--or at least the important choke points, if nothing else."

"3123 -- CCLXVII.

Vino exhaled through his nose. ""I don't think there'll be nothing,"" said Vino, ""but if I'm wrong, then, well. At least I won't have to listen you saying 'I told you so.'""

Linus just shook his head. He couldn't understand how Vino could be so casual about it.

Though, at the same time, a small part of him had to admire the man, too. All these years, Vino had told him over and over again that he believed in an afterlife. Linus had never entirely thought that he was serious. He'd always sort of suspected that Vino might've just been posturing. Trying to convince himself as much as Linus.

But listening to him now?

Linus couldn't think that way anymore. Vino was really putting his money where his mouth was.

Chapter Two Hundred Sixty-Seven: 'Thy strongest bonds...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Warrenhold hadn't felt this empty in a while. With so many of the Rainlords having ventured off to join the fight in Vantalay, there was a certain tension in the air that Hector couldn't quite describe.

Maybe it was just him, though. The remaining Rainlords didn't let any nervousness show. Even with most of their warriors away, they managed to look quite calm and collected, like it was just business as usual.

But it wasn't, of course. No one knew that better than Hector.

The fight could come at any time, and more than ever, he wanted to be ready. The reconstruction effort had shifted, partly because half or more of their helpers had gone off to fight and partly because Hector felt that there were new architectural priorities to focus on.

Hector had been making more shields again. The storage room full of Amir-9 prototypes was a good start, but he needed more. He intended to line the whole castle with them--or at least the important choke points, if nothing else."

"3124

The last time he'd done this was in the Undercrust, back when the Rainlords had used his shields in order to line the climate-controlled pods that were being used by the non-servants for the trip. It was still a pretty slow process, since he had to move each newly created shield out of his own sphere of influence before he could make another one, but he was doing it on his own now, more or less, whereas the Rainlords had assisted him before.

He'd created a kind of makeshift trebuchet to make things easier. He would materialize an Amir-9 onto one end of a long beam, then a giant boulder onto the opposite end. It had taken several attempts and refinements before getting a design that didn't just explode when the boulder hit it, but once he'd gotten it working, it was actually pretty fun.

The key, he found, was to materialize the boulder into a big receptacle that was very securely attached to the beam so that it didn't just fall down and snap the beam like a toothpick.

All in all, it actually looked quite a bit like historical trebuchets. Apart from the sling, perhaps. He couldn't materialize the rope or cloth that would be needed for that, and he also felt like the Amir-9's shape would make it get snagged in such an addition, anyway. Instead, he just made a simple, round launching platform for the heater shield to rest upon, and then bam. Off it went flying.

Roman Fullister was gracious enough to be helping him out on the distant receiving end, making sure that none of them got lost.

In a way, they were playing the world's most intense game of catch.

And to aid with communication, Voreese was hanging out with Hector while Garovel followed Roman around.

'How much farther do you think you could make it go?' said Voreese, eyeing their most recent shield as it sailed off into the sky."

"3125

Hector squinted, already unable to see it in the distance. Even the midday sun and clear weather didn't help. ""Farther? I'm wondering if we're not already sending it too far, as is.""

'Nonsense. Roman hasn't missed a single one yet. We gotta try harder. Give him something to think about.'

Hector gave her a look. ""You realize the whole point of him and Garovel being out there is to make sure that we don't lose any of these shields, right?""

'Yeah, but wouldn't it be kinda funny if they fucked up? I know I'd laugh.'

""It might not be so funny when one of my shields ends up on the black market.""

'Oh, c'mon. You think someone's gonna reverse engineer it something? The materials are what make it so valuable, not the craftsmanship. Nobody but you will be able to replicate it and sell it for loads of money. Which, by the way, is something you should think about doing.'

It had crossed his mind once or twice before. But the idea of selling these shields in bulk--whether on the black market or not--wasn't very comforting to him. He didn't like imagining what his shields might end up being used for or by whom.

Plus, he wasn't terribly confident in the legality of it. Selling materialized objects? Items that he could go around and annihilate at his own leisure? Seemed kinda like a scam, though he hadn't actually discussed the logistics of it with Garovel yet.

Voreese still seemed to think it was a good idea, though, so maybe there was something to it.

Eh. Maybe one day, he'd give it a more serious look. Right now, it didn't matter, because he needed every shield that he could make. He would need hundreds more--maybe even thousands--if he was going to enhance Warrenhold's defenses with them."

"3126

Hector allowed the trebuchet to reset its position, then materialized another Amir-9 onto the launching platform and sent it flying, too. He looked over at Voreese again, waiting on word from her.

'He got that one, too,' she said after a minute. 'Come on, Hector. Change it up. Throw him a curveball. Or a fastball. Or a speedball.'

""A speedball? I'm pretty sure that's a drug thing, not a baseball thing.""

'Look, I don't follow sports, okay? Just do something different. Give him a challenge. Think of it as training. For the both of you.'

""Training, huh?""

'Yeah.'

""Hmm..."" He scratched his cheek, thinking.

'Unless you don't think you can get one past Roman. If you're afraid of a little healthy competition, I understand. I won't think less of you. Much.'

Hector tilted his brow at her. ""You're barking up the wrong tree, Voreese. I'm not a competitive person. Like, at all.""

'Oh, so you ARE scared, then.'

He sent another shield flying, just the same as before. He waited for the contraption's metallic groaning and scraping to quiet down before answering her. ""Petrified.""

'Wow. Okay, then. That's fine. I won't try to pressure you or anything. I'm just surprised to hear that the great Lord of Warrenhold is secretly a little bitch, that's all. Don't worry--I won't tell anyone.'

Hector chortled and shook his head. ""You were better off trying to get me think of it as training. You were starting to convince me, but now I just wanna refuse on principle.""

'Ah, shit, really? Well, it WOULD be training. That's basically what all healthy competition boils down to. Hence the term 'healthy' being included.'

""Uh-huh.""

'Roman's getting really good at flying, but he could use an extra push. Something to really challenge him, y'know? Without actually endangering him. Or me, preferably. Think you could provide that?'
"3127

""Hmm. Maybe."" Hector held off on launching the next shield as he weighed his options. It might be kind of annoying if he ended up having to go hunt down a lost shield, but... maybe that would actually be a good exercise in an of itself.

First, he'd have to get a shield past Roman, though. And if this was suddenly a competition, then it wouldn't really be fair if just lobbed one on the opposite direction or something.

""Alright,"" said Hector. ""I'll step it up a notch. But you have to warn Roman that I'm about to go harder.""

'I do? Why? Wouldn't it be funnier as a surprise?'

""You're the one who specified 'healthy' competition.""

'Yeah, but the first one could just be a prank. The healthy part could come after.' She drew herself up a little, looking suddenly a bit haughty. 'And frankly, Hector, I don't think you'll be able to get one past him, even without warning. So I'm giving you the advantage.'

""Just warn him, please. It's only fair.""

'Ugh, fine.' She paused. 'There, he's been warned. Now hurry up. I'm not getting any younger over here.'

For a second, Hector just took her at her word, but then he decided to consult Garovel, who confirmed his suspicions. ""No, you didn't.""

'Wow, I can't believe you checked up on me. Where's the trust, man?'

""The same place the truth went, probably.""

'Okay, okay, I warned him. For real this time. Satisfied, you little party pooper?'

After consulting Garovel a second time, he was. He gave her a nod.

Regarding how to proceed, Hector had a few choices. Simply upping the scale of the trebuchet might do the trick, but it would require entirely new refinement of the contraption's structural integrity. Most likely, it would collapse in on itself or worse several times before he got all the ratios correct. And while that might make for a fun exercise, he wasn't convinced that it would be enough to get past Roman. Voreese did seem pretty confident in him, after all."

"3128

Of course, there was also the option of the orbital technique. He could simply coat the freshly materialized shield in iron and then launch it like he'd done so many times before. But that didn't seem like it would be very good practice. He already felt quite comfortable with that technique.

And frankly, he felt like that would be overdoing it. That technique, more or less, had been what killed the Beast of Lorent. While Hector didn't want to underestimate his good friend Roman, he also didn't want to turn the guy into a bunch of meaty chunks.

So he decided to try something new, something that had been rattling around in a brainstorming thought process for a little while now.

A heat-assisted pressurization chamber.

With the advent of his ability to manipulate temperature, Hector had been trying to think of less conventional ways that he might be able to make use of it. One of the things he learned when reading up on the physics of heat was that it could increase the pressure in a given system.

He couldn't exactly claim that his understanding of it was complete, but from what he'd been able to discern, higher temperatures caused particles to move faster, making them bump into each other and thereby increasing pressure when in a contained environment. That was why heat caused things to distort and expand.

And when he got to thinking about pressure, that started giving him other ideas. Because, for example, wasn't it possible for him to create a vacuum? Quite easily?

All he had to do was make a simple iron cube, then hollow out the middle. There would be no air inside."

"3129

A vacuum wasn't necessarily useful for his purposes here, but the mere idea that he could so trivially manipulate air pressure had been enough to get the gears turning in his head even more. Because for instance, what if he did the opposite? Instead of creating an airless chamber, what if he purposely captured air and began compressing it?

It seemed relatively simple to do. Just materialize an open box, then seal it off. From there, he could shrink the hollow space inside, causing the air molecules trapped within to be pressed closer and closer together.

Theoretically, he could do this as much as he wanted. The only problem, he thought, would be in how much air pressure the iron itself could withstand. At some point, the air pressure would likely grow too powerful for the chamber to contain, and his iron would tear itself apart with explosive force in order to release said air.

And therein lay the foundation of his idea. A compressed air explosion. If it worked, then he was pretty sure that he would be able to find all sorts of uses for such a technique in combat.

He wasn't entirely sure it would work that way, though. Thus far, he hadn't found the occasion to actually test it.

And now that he did, he was abruptly more concerned with Voreese's safety than with the experiment itself. He supposed she'd be fine as long as he didn't soul-empower anything, but that would also lessen the value of the experiment. In a real fight, he would almost certainly want to employ soul power.

Ah well. Maybe it was better to take things easier the first time, anyway.

He was already materializing an open iron chamber by the time his spare thought processes were finishing that internal debate. He needed it to be large enough to shoot an Amir-9 out of it, and since there was no soul power to threaten Voreese, he figured that he could go a bit overboard with the physical specifications."

"3130

He made it as big as a truck--a giant metal tube, propped up at an angle so that the open end was pointed up toward the sky in Roman's direction.

Then he grew the iron over the opening, sealing it shut. From there, he grew the iron walls slowly inward.

Simple enough.

He didn't really know when to stop, though. Without being able to actually see inside of the sealed chamber, he was working entirely in his head here, materializing based only on what he imagined the dimensions to be.

It was a massive tube. He'd made the iron quite thick. And up until the moment it was sealed, he'd been able to sense the exact shape from the inside using the Scarf of Amordiin. He just had to hold onto that memory, relative to slowly shrinking one in his imagination.

For this first test, he hadn't put the Amir-9 inside the tube, but a spare thought process began to wonder if perhaps he should. He was sure that it would be able to withstand just about any amount of pressure that he could create, but he didn't see much point to exposing the shield to it when he could just lay the Amir-9 over the sealed opening instead.

The idea was to let the pressure continue to build, then either weaken or just reopen the seal, allowing all of the air to escape in the desired direction. In this case, the sky.

But there was a problem.

He could feel it. With his materialization.

It was a difficult sensation to describe. He couldn't see inside the tube or know how much space was left, but he could feel that his materialization had stopped working.

He'd materialized so many different things before on so many different occasions, and he could just sort of... tell. There was a certain mental ""feedback"" that he got whenever he materialized something. A new kind of sense, perhaps. Like a quiet presence that should have been there but wasn't."

"3131

He'd never really given it much thought until now. It hadn't felt all that strange until it was no longer there.

Why wasn't it there? Had he ever felt this before?

Hmm. Maybe.

That time when Rasalased had reset his materialization--that had kind of felt like this. Sort of.

But this wasn't that. His ability hadn't reset.

There was something else.

This was more like... ah. Yeah. This was more like when he tried to materialize something into a solid object. It didn't work, because materialization couldn't accumulate within a physical space that was already occupied by something else.

That was one of the fundamentals of materialization. It was why he couldn't materialize an iron spike already in the ground, for example. He had to materialize it first, then puncture.

So was that what this was, then?

Hector circled around the tube as he contemplated, sizing his work up and down. Voreese was saying something, but he wasn't listening, even with a spare thought process. All of his mind was devoted to the problem in front of him.

He'd been thinking that he could just keep growing the iron inward, continually compressing the air therein to greater and greater extremes, but perhaps that had been foolish. Maybe once the pressure passed a high enough threshold, materialization within that space became impossible, no different than if it were a solid object.

Yeah, that would make sense, he supposed.

If so, then it kinda poked a giant hole in the viability of his experiment. The tensile strength of iron could be too high compared to the maximum compression that he could achieve with this technique.

Hmm. So no explosive decompression, then?

Dammit. That sucked.

Well. All hope wasn't lost just yet, Hector supposed.

He still hadn't integrated temperature into the equation yet. The plan had been for a heat-assisted pressurization chamber, after all."

"3132

From his research, he understood pressure and heat were linked. An increase in pressure corresponded with an increase in heat and vice versa. So what would happen if he used temperature manipulation to add even more heat to the system? What would happen if he began annihilating and replacing parts of the tube with molten iron?

Or near-molten, perhaps. If it were all gooey and soft and melting through the iron around it, then that probably wouldn't bode well for the project's overall structural integrity.

He'd have to be quick, too. Rapid annihilation and materialization was something that he'd practiced many times before, but never quite like this. If he was too slow or just chose his spots poorly, the iron walls might rupture.

He added some extra outer layers to the tube in order to help brace it, then he set to work.

The inner walls were replaced with heated iron. Emotional commands. Hot as he could imagine them without becoming molten in his mind.

From the outside, there was no visible change. The big tube of iron just lay there, unmoving. How much pressure would be required for it to shake or jostle?

He kept going. More replacements. More heat.

And to be on the safe side, he weakened the seal a bit more. If the walls did fail prematurely, he wanted it to be where the seal was. That way, it would at least explode in the intended direction. The Amir-9 was already position there, just waiting to be launched.

And still, there was no outward sign of movement.

The anticipation was getting to him a little. Just how big was this explosion going to be, exactly? Or was it even going to explode at all? The tensile strength of his iron wasn't too strong, still, was it?"

"3133

The longer this took, the more concerned he became. The pressure had to be building up in there. Maybe it still wasn't hot enough?

Molten iron, then?

Hmm.

Alright, fine, molten iron.

He started on another round of replacements, this time with as much heat as he could muster. He decided to weaken the seal a bit more, too. Maybe that would be enough. And he was already wearing a bit of armor but not much, so maybe he should--

The explosion came so fast and so loud that, even after waiting for it this whole time, Hector couldn't help being taken by surprise. The boom arrived and shot the Amir-9 into the air like a cannonball, and Hector, standing off to the side, was thrown off his feet. The whole tube lurched backward and skidded briefly across the barren field, tearing up dirt and rock as if starting to dig a trench.

Hector managed to catch himself before falling on his ass, at least, but his hearing was definitely gone, and his vision was taking a few seconds to come back into focus. He didn't need his ear drums to hear Voreese's voice in his head, though.

'Sweet, juggling titty twisters, Hector! I know said not to hold back, but damn! What did you even do just now?'

He tried to explain, but it was kinda difficult when he couldn't hear the words coming out of his own mouth. His whole head felt like it was filled with cotton or something. He decided instead to ask Garovel to come heal him, to which the reaper replied that he was already on his way.

Apparently, the blast had been so loud that Garovel had been able to hear it from where he was."

"3134

Voreese was still talking to him, but Hector just kind of motioned with his hands and she seemed to intuit what he was trying to say. While they waited, he took the opportunity to examine the aftermath of his iron cannon.

It was all contorted and bent out of shape. Molten goo was seeping out through visible fissures in the iron near the exit, and all the lingering steam looked like would've been sizzling quite loudly if he could hear it.

He annihilated his work in pieces, wanting to understand the internal damage a bit better instead of just dematerializing everything at once.

Garovel arrived first, phasing up through the ground and grabbing Hector's ankle to invoke the regeneration.

Not long afterward, Hector sensed Roman's approach with the Scarf, and then the man's voiced arrived from above. ""Excuse me, sir, but what the fuck was that shit?""

Hector pressed his lips together flatly, fighting back a smile as he turned to look. ""Are you okay? I hope, er--""

Roman's right arm was missing. It wasn't bleeding, though, having apparently been cauterized already. Voreese flew over to help him, and it soon began regrowing. His pale, sweaty face regained color, as well.

'He did warn you,' said Voreese publicly.

Garovel hovered over to Hector, saying nothing but eyeing the truck-sized iron tube nearby as molten goo spilled out of it, visibly distorting the area with a heat haze.

Roman's feet touched ground with a slight thud, and then Hector noticed the collection of shields hovering in behind him. They'd been at this all morning, so there were quite a few of them.

'You didn't miss that last one, did you?' asked Voreese.

Roman exhaled a ragged breath. ""No, I got it."" He waved his hand and brought one of the shields closer, into his left hand and held it up."
"3135

It took Hector a second to find the right words. ""Er. Sorry about that.""

""Don't be,"" said Roman, rolling his shoulder and stretching his neck. He was eyeing the spent cannon now, too. ""Would you say that was more powerful than that orbit-y technique of yours or less?""

Hector scratched his forehead. ""Uh... well, a few minutes ago, I would've said it was definitely less powerful, but now I'm not sure. I'd have to do some testing and refining, I think.""

"I see," said Roman. "Well, I'm up for taking another crack at it, if you don't mind. That made for some pretty intense practice."

Hector knew he was fine, but he still felt kinda bad.

And maybe Roman could tell as much from the expression on his face, because he said, "Is that pity I see? C'mon, this is no big--" He cut himself off, however, and his expression froze, eyes glancing at Voreese for moment before returning Hector. "...Oh, actually, agh, man, that really hurt, y'know? Damn." He dropped the Amir-9 he was holding in order to grab his right shoulder and present his bony, still-regenerating hand. "Ow. Gosh. Wow. Woe is me. This sure hurts."

Hector just cocked an eyebrow.

'Geez, Hector, that was pretty uncool,' said Voreese. 'How could you do that to Roman? So cruel, especially after all we've done for you, y'know? Man.'

Now Hector was just suspicious. He'd felt bad but not that bad. What were they playing at here?

'But y'know, if you'd like to make it up to us, we wouldn't mind getting maybe, perhaps, a nice little somethin'-somethin' from that Forge of yours. As like an apology gift.'

Ah.

Hector couldn't help but give a nodding laugh. "I suppose that could be arranged. Is there something specific that you have in mind?"

"3136

Roman and Voreese exchanged silent looks. From the combative expressions on their faces, they were probably arguing.

'Well, sure, I've got all sorts of ideas,' said Voreese, turning to Hector again, 'but it'd really depend on what the Sunsmith is able to pump out. We of course understand that it's a difficult and time-consuming process, full of nuance. At this stage, it'd be totally irrational to have our hearts set on any one thing in particular. Whatever you're able to provide us with would be perfectly--'

""She wants a compass,"" blurted Roman.

Voreese hissed at him.

Hector was mainly just confused, though. ""Why a compass?""

""A magical one,"" Roman went on. ""Not terribly unlike that Tuning Orb of Creamy Spaghetti you already have.""

'Karugetti,' said Voreese. 'The Tuning Orb of Karugetti. It's named after one of the most brilliant men who ever lived, you ignorant mouthbreather.'

""Whatever.""

'This is the first time we're hearing of your interest in the Orb,' said Garovel. 'Why didn't you mention it before? We wouldn't have given it to the Vantalay team if we knew you wanted it.'

'Eh, as long as someone's getting good use out of it, that's all that matters,' said Voreese. 'And besides, the Tuning Orb probably sucks. It wasn't actually invented by Karugetti himself. It was invented by Arkos, who was like Karugetti but shit. Karu-shitty.'

'Wasn't he Karugetti's apprentice?' said Garovel. 'He probably named it that to honor his master.'

'He should've honored him by not being such a lameass.'

'Do you have some sort of personal beef with Arkos? This isn't the first time you've ragged on him, as I recall.'

'I just think he's a bit overrated, is all. Dude's gotten all sorts of fame and fanfare over the years, while so many other great minds throughout history have gotten the shaft.'"

"3137

'His reputational success didn't necessarily come at the expense of others, you know. As far as I'm aware, he was never branded as an idea thief or anything like that.'

'Yeah, yeah, I'm sure he was a swell dude. Gave to the poor and rescued lost kittens in his spare time, probably. What a homie. I'm just tired of hearing his name all over the fuckin' place.'

'Hmm. I feel like you're disproportionately upset at this guy for some reason.'

'Pah. He's long dead, so who cares if I talk shit on him? Who am I hurting, huh? His reputation has enjoyed plenty of overblown adoration already. What, was he a personal friend of yours or something?'

'Well, no, but--'

'Then fuck 'im!'

'Those aren't the words of a well-adjusted individual, Voreese.'

'Am I supposed to give a shit about that?'

'Ideally, yeah, kinda.'

The reapers' conversation kept devolving for a while, and Hector waited for them to circle back around to the topic of that ""magic compass"" that Roman and Voreese wanted, but they never did.

Instead, the reapers went abruptly silent, and then Garovel said something that Hector was not at all expecting. 'Ravi Zaman is here.'

That certainly caught Hector's attention. Ravi had never visited Warrenhold before--or even Atreya as a whole, as far as Hector was aware. The fact that the man was suddenly dropping by like this, totally unannounced, was actually quite alarming, Hector felt. Ravi was an important political figure in Lorent with not very much spare time on his hands, and even though Hector was on good terms with him, the courteous thing to do would have been to make known several days in advance that he intended to visit.

And Ravi was nothing if not courteous.

So Hector couldn't imagine that the man was going to have pleasant news for them."

"3138 -- CCLXVIII.

Chapter Two Hundred Sixty-Eight: 'The approaching bloodstorm...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- (mobile link)

Indeed, Hector's hunch proved correct. The news had been just about the worst thing he could've possibly imagined, right now. Or close to it, at least.

Abolish was about to launch a major offensive into Lorent, apparently.

""I'm sorry we can't provide direct assistance,"" Ravi was saying. His reaper, Beldorix, hovered right behind him, his skeletal face looking somehow even more dour than it normally did. ""This warning is the best I can provide. I don't have the authority to go against Bloodeye's sect.""

'That right?' said Garovel. 'A member of the Freeman Fellowship lacks the freedom to do as he pleases? Bit of a misnomer, in that case, don't you think?'

Ravi returned a strained look but made no response.

'Look, if you're just scared to fight him, then fine,' said Garovel. 'I wouldn't even blame you. He's a scary son of a bitch. But you don't need to dress it up in political excuses. This isn't Riverton Hall.'

""Th-that's not what this is,"" said Ravi.

Hector had never seen the man look so disheveled before. His normally pristine suit and tie were scuffed and misaligned; his dark hair, untidy.

It certainly wasn't a comfort, seeing him this way. The man had never presented himself to Hector as anything less than confident and secure.

'If we raise a hand against Bloodeye and his men,' said Beldorix, 'it won't just be Ravi and I who reap the consequences. The entirety of the Fellowship would be threatened. Our status within Abolish is still greatly contested. We have countless peers who would like nothing more than to finally be given permission to treat us as enemy combatants. If we fight alongside you, we would be providing them with the excuse they need in order to do exactly that.'"

"3138 -- CCLXVIII.

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Indeed, Hector's hunch proved correct. The news had been just about the worst thing he could've possibly imagined, right now. Or close to it, at least.

Abolish was about to launch a major offensive into Lorent, apparently.

""I'm sorry we can't provide direct assistance,"" Ravi was saying. His reaper, Beldorix, hovered right behind him, his skeletal face looking somehow even more dour than it normally did. ""This warning is the best I can provide. I don't have the authority to go against Bloodeye's sect.""

'That right?' said Garovel. 'A member of the Freeman Fellowship lacks the freedom to do as he pleases? Bit of a misnomer, in that case, don't you think?'

Ravi returned a strained look but made no response.

'Look, if you're just scared to fight him, then fine,' said Garovel. 'I wouldn't even blame you. He's a scary son of a bitch. But you don't need to dress it up in political excuses. This isn't Riverton Hall.'

""Th-that's not what this is,"" said Ravi.

Hector had never seen the man look so disheveled before. His normally pristine suit and tie were scuffed and misaligned; his dark hair, untidy.

It certainly wasn't a comfort, seeing him this way. The man had never presented himself to Hector as anything less than confident and secure.

'If we raise a hand against Bloodeye and his men,' said Beldorix, 'it won't just be Ravi and I who reap the consequences. The entirety of the Fellowship would be threatened. Our status within Abolish is still greatly contested. We have countless peers who would like nothing more than to finally be given permission to treat us as enemy combatants. If we fight alongside you, we would be providing them with the excuse they need in order to do exactly that.'"

The timing couldn't possibly have been worse, Hector felt. It was so bad, in fact, that a part of him had to wonder if Bloodeye somehow knew about their current lack of manpower here at Warrenhold.

Most likely not, Hector decided, but it was still quite the troublesome and nagging thought.

'Well, thanks for the warning,' said Voreese. 'If that's all you've got for us, then you can go now.'

Beldorix gave her a look but said nothing. A silent exchange seemed to take place between him and Ravi, and then the two of them turned to leave.

Hector felt a little bad about how curt she was being, but he could also understand why Voreese was in a rush to get rid of them. If this attack was imminent, then there was no time to waste. They would need to begin strategizing immediately, and having two Abolishers present for that meeting wasn't necessarily a wise idea.

But he had one more question for them before they left. ""Have you told Mr. Rondel about this yet?""

Ravi and Beldorix both paused.

Carl Rondel was the Vanguardian advisor to the Lorentian President, much like Ravi was the Abolish advisor to him. Hector knew that there wasn't much love lost between these two men, but if the fate of Lorent was suddenly on the line here, then none of that should've mattered at the moment.

Right?

Ravi was hesitating quite a bit, though. ""...Not yet,"" he finally admitted.

""Ravi,"" said Hector, trying not to sound too disappointed in him.

""I will tell him as soon as I return to Riverton Hall.""

""Can't you just call him?"" said Roman.

""This is not information that can be shared over the phone,"" said

Ravi.

""Sure, but time is of the essence here,"" said Roman.

""Then I will go fast."" And without another word, Ravi grabbed his reaper and blasted off on a metallic platform, high into the sky. From there, he surged off into the distance within some kind of liquid jet stream."

"3140

It wasn't at the forefront of his thoughts at the moment, but Hector was impressed by Ravi's apparent skill with materialization. The ability to fly like that wasn't easy and required great mastery over velocity states and possibly also temperature states, depending on what his element was.

That alone wasn't enough information to truly judge from, of course, but if he had to hazard a guess, Hector would place the man somewhere around Zeff's strength tier.

After he was gone, everyone started back toward the door to the Entry Tower. It was a bit harder to locate these days, thanks to all of the iron buildings that Hector had been materializing as part of Warrenhold's aboveground ""decoy"" castle, but thanks to the Scarf of Amordiin, Hector had no trouble finding it.

Maybe that was why everyone was following so closely behind him. This decoy castle may still have been relatively small, but it was already something of a maze. One day, when his volume limit allowed, he wanted it to become a full blown labyrinth up here, but maybe that would be taking things a little too far.

'We have to call back the Rainlords immediately,' said Voreese.

'Can't,' said Garovel. 'Not the ones in Vantalay, at least. Their mission there is too important to them. They'll never agree to return until its complete.'

""First things first,"" said Hector. He was using an iron platform behind everyone in order to bring their collected pile of Amir-9s with them.

""We need the scouting team to confirm what Ravi told us.""

""You think he was lying?"" said Roman.

""No, but I've been wrong before,"" said Hector. ""And I don't want to walk into a trap.""

'You should probably also call Rondel yourself,' said Garovel. 'But give it a few hours and see if Ravi actually tells him first like he said he would.'

"3141

The reapers for the various teams around the world had their own floor in the Tower of Night. Generally, they just stayed there, reading books or watching television while they waited for updates from their deployed servants. They had a rotating group of young servants and even non-servants to do the channel surfing and page turning for them.

Hector checked in with the scouting team in Callum first.

""Any updates on Abolish's movements?"" he asked.

The lead reaper's name was Krigoth, partnered to Isaac Sebolt. It took him a moment to retrieve an answer for Hector. 'Everything's quiet. Why? Something wrong?' The entourage of visitors and urgency on their faces must have tipped the reaper off.

""We have it on good authority that they'll be launching an attack on Lorent soon,"" said Hector. ""We'd like confirmation on that, if possible.""

'I see,' said Krigoth gravely. 'Well, there's been no reported change. I'd like to say that we would have noticed any major troop movements, but if they're using Invisibility again, then I have to acknowledge the possibility that they could have slipped through Callum unnoticed.'

Hector was afraid of that possibility, too, but from what he understood, the Sandlords had come up with a few countermeasures to that tactic. And while Hector had been in his little coma, Hahl Saqqaf had been kind enough to share their tech with the Rainlords. Isaac's team shouldn't have been totally blind, but that was far from a guarantee.

They had to prepare for the worst, Hector knew.

Problem was, how to go about that? Lorent was huge. If Abolish slipped into the country, they could launch surprise attacks anywhere they pleased. It all depended on what their objective was. If they just wanted to terrorize the populace, that was one thing, but if they wanted another very public conquest like they'd done to Sair, then they might not care about stealth at all."

"3142

Perhaps the best strategy was to try and draw Abolish's attention to him, but that, too, could cause problems. Where exactly would he wish to draw their attention to? He didn't have a fortress in Lorent yet, and he certainly didn't want them to go anywhere near the Candle.

As that internal debate raged in a background thought process, Hector also remained focused on the conversation with Krigoth. ""Does Isaac's team have an eye on any Abolish encampments, right now?""

Krigoth took a moment to check. 'Yes. Three. And they're all still on the other side of the Callum-Sair border. But they're close. If they wanted to invade Callum, they could cross the border in under an hour and be halfway to Lorent in under a day.'

'Assuming those encampments are not decoys, that is,' said Garovel. 'Can Isaac's team see activity in them? Can they still identify specific combatants like Smith, Konig, or Toro? Or Bloodeye himself, ideally?'

'I'll have them check again,' said Krigoth. 'Give us some time.'

'Alright.'

Instead of just waiting around for Krigoth to get back to them with an answer, however, Hector moved on to the other rooms where the other teams' reapers were waiting.

""Call everyone back to Warrenhold,"" he told both groups. The reapers had questions, of course, but Voreese and Garovel were ready to field them in Hector's stead.

Those two teams had been dispatched to Qhenghis and Ardora, so the return trip wouldn't be very quick, especially with so much of Eloa at war now. When they'd first departed, the continent was still at peace, and air travel hadn't been so heavily monitored--or even outright banned--in so many locations.

But it was the right move, Hector felt. Everyone not in Vantalay needed to be here now. Treasure had to come second."

"3143

Hopefully, the progress they'd made with their respective hunts wouldn't be totally lost. With any luck, they would be able to pick up where they left off once this whole mess was sorted out.

Hmm. Sorted out? A spare thought process wondered about that sentiment. Wasn't it a bit assumptive on his part to think that way? So casually? This was a fucking war. The sovereignty of Lorent and probably also Atreya were on the line here, as were the lives of everyone in both countries.

And yet...

He was not afraid. He wasn't even all that worried, actually. He felt exceptionally calm.

He hoped he wasn't becoming arrogant. There was no reason to think that he could defeat Bloodeye in a normal fight. And for all they knew, Morgunov could show up, too. By all metrics, Hector should've been nervous as fuck, right now.

But he wasn't. His head was clear. Seemingly clear, at least.

He hardly felt like himself, though. Hell, he hardly even knew what ""himself"" was supposed to feel like.

All the crazy shit that he'd been through lately made this situation feel somehow smaller. Less terrifying. But it was that last trip through the Fusion Forge that had really messed with him. He wondered if he was even the same person, now.

Bloodeye. Also known as the Red Devil of Horsht. Full name: Neville Cornelius Roy. Born in Horsht 133 years ago. Regarded as one of the most dangerous men in the world.

How in the world had Hector learned all of that? He looked the guy up on the internet, only to discover those little details were indeed accurate.

There was so much information rolling around in his head now. Taken from the Candle itself. But it seemed incredibly strange that the Candle would know something like that despite having been half-broken and dormant for eons."

"3144

How could the Candle have even been aware of someone like Bloodeye? Sure, the guy had been around for a long time, but compared to the Candle, 133 years was nothing. As far as Hector could recall, Bloodeye had never personally visited the Candle, so where the hell did this information come from?

There was something about the nature of memory that he wasn't understanding here. Something about the nature of aura. The nature of souls and ardor, too, perhaps.

Well. That wasn't such a surprise, at least. There were tons of things that he didn't understand.

Regardless, the next thing on his to-do list was to inform Abbas Saqqaf of the news. A simple phone call probably would have done the trick, but because Ravi had chosen to come all the way out here to Warrenhold instead of doing that, Hector felt he should avoid phones, too.

Much of Hahl Saqqaf was already in Lorent, holed up at a few different locations, but thankfully, there were a handful of Saqqaf reapers hanging around here who could pass on a message.

After that, it was a matter of handing out Amir-9s for as many warriors to use as possible. Most of the stock that he'd been building up had gone into lining the castle walls--including that of the cavern in which Warrenhold stood--to help make the place even more difficult to break into, but obviously, that would only prove helpful if Abolish came here. He made sure that everyone coming to Lorent with him had a shield at their disposal, too.

As for who he actually intended to bring along, well... he'd hardly seen any of them in actual combat yet. All of the Rainlords' most seasoned warriors were in Vantalay at the moment, and even most of their intermediate warriors were abroad on missions. Which left him with a group that wasn't much older than himself.

His actual peers, in terms of age."

"3145

They certainly weren't looking at him like he was their peer, though. They were looking at him like he had all the answers, like he was above reproach or question.

The only outliers were Roman Fullister, Matteo Delaguna, Joana Cortes, Silvia Blackburn, and Nere Blackburn. For whatever reason, the Blackburns had decided not to take Nere with them to Vantalay, and with her being such an important figure in the family, Silvia had been chosen to stay behind and watch over her.

Joana, meanwhile, being the head of her own little House, had chosen to stay behind of her own volition. ""Someone should be here to look after the children,"" she'd said.

Ostensibly, she'd been referring to all of the children from all of the Houses, but Hector had a suspicion that she was doing this especially for Zeff and his kids. He was her brother, after all, and she must have known how worried he would be to leave them here.

A part of Hector was still surprised by the fact that Zeff had elected to join the Vantalay rescue team. After everything that man had been through? Leaving Marcos and Ramira here where he couldn't protect them must have been a tough call to make, even for the sake of the other Houses.

Man. If Zeff knew what was happening right now, the news that Hector had just received... it would tear him apart.

He absolutely could not let Zeff down here, Hector thought. Or any of the other Houses, for that matter. There were dozens of very young children here in Warrenhold now, their parents having all gone off to fight in a war and rescue their kin.

Hector was determined. No matter what happened, as long as he was still alive, nothing was going hurt these little Rainlords."

"3146

He made the call to Carl Rondel next. He was relieved to hear that Ravi had kept his word.

<""Yeah, I just heard,""> said Carl. <""I'm mobilizing my forces now. How long until you can get here?"">

""To Riverton, P.J.?"" said Hector. ""I'm not sure that's where I should be going.""

<""Hmm? You have somewhere else in mind?"">

""Not yet. But I doubt Abolish would hit the capital first. And if all our forces are consolidated there, then our response will be equally slow whenever they do show up.""

<""You planning to just sit on your ass in your castle, then?"">

More biting words as usual from Mr. Rondel. Hector almost wanted to retort immediately, but he caught himself.

He wasn't obligated to tell Mr. Rondel anything about his plans. And in fact, he didn't even trust the guy all that much. It might've been better to keep his own movements to himself. If Abolish somehow found out that Hector wasn't at Warrenhold and decided to attack it while he was gone...

Well, that was a worst-case scenario that needed to be avoided at all costs.

But he also didn't want to outright refuse to say anything, either. That'd be unnecessarily hostile towards a potential ally. Maybe a little white lie would be better, then. ""Yes,"" said Hector. ""For now, I'll continue to wait here and observe. If P.J. gets attacked, I promise I'll dispatch reinforcements immediately, but I expect the first place that needs help will be somewhere else.""

<""Hmph,""> was all Carl said.

Which was a bit surprising, actually. Hector had expected the man to give him a piece of his mind. ""Any word on extra reinforcements from your end? Like from Jackson?""

"3147

<""Hah! If there was, I wouldn't tell you,""> said Carl. <""It's far too early to be sharing privileged information like that with an outsider like you. We still don't even know if this attack is real. Zaman could be bullshitting us as part of some larger scheme. You shouldn't be so quick to trust that snake in the grass."">

Ah, that was more like it. ""How about reinforcements from a private security firm, then? Last I checked, the Lorentian Security Council was talking about rehiring Greenworth for exactly this reason. Did that deal ever get approved?""

<""No, but I've advised the President to push it through using his emergency war powers."">

""Think he'll listen?""

<""Doubt it. And even if he does, I don't think Greenworth will be too eager to work with Lorent again. With the war on, mercenary groups will have their pick of clients, right now. And the last time Greenworth was here, our damn media raked them over the coals, which hurt their reputation internationally, no doubt. Other firms won't find that type of treatment too appealing, either, I'm sure."">

Damn.

<""Still, if we manage to land a new contract, I'll be sure to let you know."">

Hmm. That almost sounded nice of him. ""Thanks.""

Carl didn't have much more to tell him after that. Hector asked about how many he had available to defend P.J. and what their relative levels of strength were, but no matter how diplomatically he tried to phrase it, the man wouldn't provide him with details.

Hector hoped that was just because Carl was a stingy bastard and not because the guy was afraid to admit how weak they were."

"3148

It was probably the latter, though. If Carl had that much power at his disposal, then he would have been able to take care of the Beast of Lorent all on his own. Sure, it was possible that the Vanguard had only very recently sent him more troops or something, but Hector doubted it.

It sure would've been nice if Jackson himself decided to show up to help, though. If the guy's reputation was anything to by, then Hector wouldn't mind meeting him. Plus, there weren't very many Rainlords around at the moment, so it might actually be safe to talk to him. Maybe.

The most recent rumors about Jackson weren't quite so pleasant, what with him supposedly having been gravely wounded by the Mad Demon, but that was a while ago. No matter what Morgunov's machines had done to him, Jackson had to have recovered by now.

...Right?

Hector tried not to linger on that particularly question too much. Hell, even if Jackson just sent some of his troops their way, that'd be great. The guy must've had tons of strong dudes working under him.

Eventually, Krigoth got back to him about Garovel's earlier question. Could the scouting team identify specific combatants in the enemy encampments?

'No,' was the reaper's unfortunate answer. 'Isaac's team has been looking for nearly an hour now, but none of the big names have appeared out in the open.'

'So the camps really could be decoys, then,' said Garovel. 'We have to assume that the major players are already on the move. Let's get everyone into the Tower of Night. It's the safest place for all non-combatants.'

Hector could only agree, and soon enough, everyone was moving. It was a bit overly cautious, he knew, since the attackers were almost certainly going to pop up in Lorent before Atreya, but if ever there was a time to be overly cautious, it was now. And besides, with so many people abroad, the Tower of Night had more than enough space. They wouldn't be cramped in here at all."

"3149

Food and water weren't concerns, either. Hector had been worried about the possibility of an attack ever since news of the war first broke, so he'd of course tasked Ms. Rogers with ensuring that they would have everything they needed in case anything happened. Hector checked on it just to be safe, but sure enough, he found the Tower of Night's storeroom filled to the rafters with non-perishable food and supplies. If they needed to, they'd be able to last months in here, no problem.

Assuming the walls weren't breached, that was.

Hector had to wonder how strong this nightrock really was. Thus far, he hadn't seen anyone actually break through it, despite multiple attempts from various Rainlords during construction, but that also wasn't quite the same thing as enduring an actual siege. Would Bloodeye or any of his men be able to break through?

Bloodeye had several notable names under his command. The biggest threats were Otto Konig, Banda Toro, Kyle Charge, Jonathan Smith, and Tomi Rika. They each had rather menacing monikers by which they were internationally infamous. On the bright side, though, Hector had plenty of intel on them, thanks to Hahl Saqqaf, the scouting efforts of Isaac's team, and also Gina.

Still, that was six big names right there. Any one of them could probably kill him in a one-on-one fight. Hector felt like the only reason he'd managed as well as he had in the fight against Bloodeye and the Man of Crows was because all his allies were around to help take the pressure off. He couldn't go into this with the same mindset.

The next fight would be far more dangerous, especially if Abbas didn't show up in time."

"3150

That was where his mind was at as he was prepping to leave. The current plan was to seal off the Tower of Night as tightly as possible, then make for the Candle and speak to Abbas directly in order to figure out their next move. It was a bit early, but Abbas might have some tools that would come in handy.

Plus, Hahl Saqqaf constituted the majority of their fighting force now, so they would probably want to rethink how everyone was distributed. Having some extra fighters here at Warrenhold would definitely help give Hector peace of mind when heading out to fight on the front line, which would presumably be somewhere in eastern Lorent.

As he'd just about finished packing a bag full of clothes, however, Hector's phone beeped at him. It had taken quite a bit of wizardry from Gina and her team of tech savvy people in order for cell phones to get reception so deep underground like this, but he was quite thankful for it now.

The message was from Pauline Gaolanet. When she'd asked him for his number, he'd been a little surprised that a Sparrow could even use a phone, but apparently, she was quite an active texter. And she didn't take too kindly to it when he was slow to respond, which he almost always was, especially when compared against her speed.

Usually, she sent him weird memes. Or a message about how bored she was. Or a new demand for the ""roost"" that he was making for her here at Warrenhold. Or just random personal questions.

But none of those were the case this time. Instead, it read: Hey, there's a bunch of invisible people hanging around outside your castle."

"3151 -- CCLXIX.

Chapter Two Hundred Sixty-Nine: 'O, defending lord...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector's brown eyes stuck on the message as he took a moment to process what he'd just read.

And then his body was moving. Without even thinking, he was already going somewhere. Where? Strange he had to ask himself that.

The Entry Tower, he realized. The tower that bottle-necked up to the surface.

He needed to warn everyone, though.

'Garovel,' he thought urgently, 'Abolish is already here.'

'What?!'

'I don't know who or how many, but they're here. Make sure everyone is in the Tower of Night.'

'Alright, but--'

Garovel had more questions, of course, none of which Hector had the answers for. He didn't want to just ignore the reaper, though, so he split his focus between that conversation and texting Pauline back.

How many? r u safe?

He waited impatiently for her response as he sprinted across the main courtyard, splitting his focus another time in order to catch whatever the Scarf of Amordiin could tell him about the space directly ahead of him. Empty so far.

He armored up, too. Full plate. Familiar and comfortable.

Her reply arrived.

27. Not including reapers. And yeah, I'm fine. I just got here, but they can't sense me. I'm in my roost. These guys aren't supposed to be here, I take it?

Twenty-fucking-seven? When had they arrived? If they'd been casing the place for a while, then Hector would have sensed them when he was up there earlier.

And if they were using Invisibility, then they must have been trying to be careful.

Goddammit. They were really already here in Atreya? Fuck. Agh. This was no time for incredulity. He had to focus on the problem in front of him. Explanations could come later.

prolly abolish. b careful

He didn't know how she managed to have such immaculate grammar when texting, but he wasn't about to try and match her when he had so much other shit to worry about."

"3151 -- CCLXIX.

Chapter Two Hundred Sixty-Nine: 'O, defending lord...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector's brown eyes stuck on the message as he took a moment to process what he'd just read.

And then his body was moving. Without even thinking, he was already going somewhere. Where? Strange he had to ask himself that.

The Entry Tower, he realized. The tower that bottle-necked up to the surface.

He needed to warn everyone, though.

'Garovel,' he thought urgently, 'Abolish is already here.'

'What?!'

'I don't know who or how many, but they're here. Make sure everyone is in the Tower of Night.'

'Alright, but--'

Garovel had more questions, of course, none of which Hector had the answers for. He didn't want to just ignore the reaper, though, so he split his focus between that conversation and texting Pauline back.

How many? r u safe?

He waited impatiently for her response as he sprinted across the main courtyard, splitting his focus another time in order to catch whatever the Scarf of Amordiin could tell him about the space directly ahead of him. Empty so far.

He armored up, too. Full plate. Familiar and comfortable.

Her reply arrived.

27. Not including reapers. And yeah, I'm fine. I just got here, but they can't sense me. I'm in my roost. These guys aren't supposed to be here, I take it?

Twenty-fucking-seven? When had they arrived? If they'd been casing the place for a while, then Hector would have sensed them when he was up there earlier.

And if they were using Invisibility, then they must have been trying to be careful.

Goddammit. They were really already here in Atreya? Fuck. Agh. This was no time for incredulity. He had to focus on the problem in front of him. Explanations could come later.

prolly abolish. b careful

He didn't know how she managed to have such immaculate grammar when texting, but he wasn't about to try and match her when he had so much other shit to worry about."

He reached the bottom of the Entry Tower and blitzed up the stairs, glad to see that every floor was already empty of people. It took a while to reach the top, and he probably could have been moving faster with creative use of materialization, but he wanted to be able to sense everything ahead of him beforehand.

Once he reached the big double doors that led out onto the surface, he stopped. They were still closed, but he didn't need to open them. They weren't airtight, so the Scarf could sense what was on other side just fine.

The area immediately around the entrance seemed to be clear. He concentrated, trying to sense as far away as possible.

Still nothing.

Hmm.

He decided to text Pauline again.

how close r they?

Her response was fast, as usual.

About a hundred meters or so.

Oh. That was pretty far. And with the decoy iron castle up there, he could probably exit the Entry Tower just fine without being detected.

He opened the doors and stepped out, pouring all of his focus into the Scarf. The wind wasn't all that strong, but it helped a little. He could sense the full shape of the decoy castle, small as it was. No one was that close by yet.

'They're east of your position,' came Pauline's telepathic voice.

Ah. She no longer felt the need to text, huh? Hector searched for her with the Scarf and soon found her. She was indeed in her roost, just as she'd said.

That was helpful. She might actually prove invaluable in this situation, Hector thought. Hell, she kinda already had.

He moved east as she said.

When he neared the edge of decoy castle, he began to sense it. A small crowd in the distance, just standing there.

No, wait. Some of them were inching closer."
"3153

They were being cautious. They didn't know what to expect.

Hmm. What to do here...?

In all likelihood, this was just a scouting party, maybe not even intending to attack Warrenhold and instead just trying to gather intel and report back. And with twenty-seven enemy combatants, the odds weren't exactly in his favor, either. Plus, if even one of Bloodeye's top guys was in that group, then a straight fight would probably not go well for him, Hector thought.

It might've been best to leave them alone and wait to see if they left of their own volition.

Agh. But they kept getting closer.

Obviously, he couldn't let them get inside Warrenhold and discover how empty it was. That would almost assuredly invite an attack from Bloodeye himself.

But then again, maybe that would be good in its own way, countered a spare thought process. Warrenhold was the most defensible position, after all. If Bloodeye was busy attacking Warrenhold, then he couldn't attack random, helpless citizens in Lorent.

Would it really be that simple, though? And what if these motherfuckers got inside Warrenhold and just started attacking shit instead of leaving to report back?

No.

Definitely couldn't take that risk.

Had to do something about them now. He put a few cubes into orbit around himself as he deliberated. Thanks to the decoy castle, he was already near his volume limit in this area, so if he wanted to do something huge, he'd have to annihilate some of it first. Perhaps small, sneaky attacks would be better here. At least until the enemy knew where he was.

'I could freeze them in their tracks, if you want,' came Pauline's voice again.

That was true, he supposed. Sparrows did have that power, didn't they? Could she really do that to all of them, though?"

"3154

Hmm. Well, even if she only got some of them, it would certainly help to thin their numbers out.

He didn't want to risk responding to her vocally, so he texted her instead.

how many can u get?

'Mmmmm... dunno,' she said. 'Hard to say. Odds are, some of them will be naturally resistant or even immune. And the more I freeze at once, the weaker the effect becomes. Soooo... if I had to guess, then I'd say, maybe... somewhere between ten and twenty?'

Holy fuck.

It was a risk, of course. If they became aware of her presence, that could create all sorts of problems. Hector didn't know Abolish's exact policy regarding Sparrows, but Hanton had belabored the general point enough for him to worry about what might happen if word of a Sparrow's nest in Atreya got out into the broader world.

If he allowed Pauline to get involved directly, he would be playing with fire.

But then again, Abolish was on his fucking doorstep. Probably. Technically, there was still a slight chance that these trespassers weren't with Abolish, in which case a lot of people might get hurt for no reason.

Agh.

He supposed he shouldn't play the Sparrow card just yet. He texted her his response.

only do it if they atk me

'Mm, okie dokie.'

In the heat of battle, it would be easier for her to conceal her abilities, Hector felt. Hell, the enemy might even think that he was the one doing it. Human psychics were a thing, too.

Wait, they were? Where had he learned that from?

Eh, didn't matter now.

Hector sensed someone behind him, coming up through the Entry Tower. Was that Joana? He wasn't familiar enough with her spatial outline to tell for certain just by the Scarf alone, but it seemed like her. She had a few others behind her, too. Oh, hey, that was Roman there.

Good."

"3155

The trespassers were still coming closer. Hector knew he'd have to make a decision sooner rather than later. Were they hostile? Were they not? If he gave them a chance to explain what they were doing here, he'd be giving up the element of surprise, which could lose him the fight. And by extension, all of Warrenhold. And all of Atreya. And Lorent, too, for that matter.

Yeah. Those stakes were a little too high.

Abolish or not, if these people didn't have ill intentions, then they shouldn't have been trying to sneak up on him like this.

Hector inched a bit closer without coming out from behind the last iron wall that stood in between himself and them. Technically, there was one more wall but it wasn't iron. It was Warrenhold's original wall, the old and dilapidated one made out of crumbling stone. In fact, once they passed that broken wall, they would officially be too close, Hector decided.

He put a few iron cubes into orbit around himself as he waited for them to cross that arbitrary line. He removed the Amir-10 from his back and fitted it over his left forearm.

It was a bit of a pain to carry the thing around with him all the time since he couldn't materialize it like he could with the Amir-9, but hopefully, he'd get used to having it there.

The first of the trespassers crossed the broken wall, Hector sensed.

Hmm.

Maybe he could test these fuckers before going all out. See how they reacted to a sudden noise behind them. A small clattering of iron pebbles.

Ah. The sound made them all stop and turn to look. The iron was already dematerialized, though. Nothing to see over there, guys.

They didn't immediately attack the noise, at least. That was something. Not much, but something. It meant they were calm. Not jumpy.

Experienced, most likely."

"3156

They were taking their sweet time before resuming their trek toward the decoy castle.

Hmm. Hector wondered if he might be able to make them paranoid enough to turn around and leave. That was supposed to be an issue with older servants, right? Paranoia.

What was the most unnerving thing he could think of?

Maybe a countdown. A sound like a ticking alarm clock, starting off slow and then getting progressively faster and faster. If they heard that shit, how would these guys react? They were still just standing there, waiting. Ah, no, he could sense their mouths moving, too, as they whispered to each other.

Before he could even ask the question of her, Pauline told him what they were saying.

'They're discussing whether or not they should abort their mission.'

Wait, what? Seriously? Just because of a tiny clattering of metal that they'd just heard?

'They're worried they might have sprung some sort of trap. A tripwire alarm. Or a... a ""reactive dust beacon."" What the heck does that mean?'

Mm. Hector actually had a pretty good idea what that was, but this wasn't the time to explain it to her. He texted her one more time.

r they saying nything that confirms they r abolish?

'Oh. Uh... no, I don't think so. One of them just called the guy at the front ""Banda,"" though. Does that help?'

It definitely did, and Hector's eyes widened. Banda Toro, the Raptor of Kortan, was one of Bloodeye's top men.

Shit.

Well, that was one problem solved. He almost preferred being uncertain, though.

If Bloodeye himself was 133 years old, then Hector guessed that his top guys would have to be pushing seventy, at least.

No one here at Warrenhold right now was that old. Nere Blackburn might've been the closest. Hector was fairly sure that she was somewhere around fifty. Maybe."

"3157

Better not to kick this hornet's nest unless he absolutely had to. If there was a chance that they could avoid a fight here altogether, then Hector needed to take it.

And to that end, he went with his countdown strategy. He materialized tiny clumps of iron in a wide radius around the Abolishers, letting them fall down and make more noise. He made sure to add little iron platforms below them as well, just to guarantee that the noise was crisp and loud. Wouldn't do if the clumps fell quietly into the dirt or one of Warrenhold's few patches of grass.

It was definitely catching their attention.

The clear, little tinks of metal moved around the group clockwise, drawing their looks each time. And once it made a full revolution, Hector added a second tink to each beat. Then a third. And a fourth.

The shift in their body language was obvious. Many of them were trembling as their heads darted to and fro.

They weren't doing anything about it yet, though.

That was fine. He could keep adding more, keep ramping up the noise. Garovel and the others had no doubt sent word to Abbas already. He might've had the numerical and age disadvantage, but a waiting game was in Hector's favor.

At length, however, after the tenth or so iteration, one of the Abolishers broke formation and bounded away from the group.

He was caught immediately and pinned against the ground by a lanky figure, the one who'd previously been at the front of the party. Was that Banda, Hector wondered?

Judging from the figure's mouth movements, more words were being exchanged, but Hector of course couldn't make out what was being said.

'You've successfully freaked 'em out,' said Pauline. 'Banda is threatening the one that tried to run away.'

"3158

This was good. And also not.

Hector liked knowing that these guys weren't impervious to fear-based tactics, but at the same time, it seemed like Banda Toro was going to make things difficult.

Hector could scare the hell out of them all day long, but if Banda was there to call his bluff every time, then what difference would it make? Eventually, the rest of them would catch on.

Unless Hector made good on some of this fear.

And perhaps he could do that.

They still didn't know that he could sense them. They didn't even realize that he was up here aboveground. And as Pauline had mentioned, they were worried about a ""reactive dust beacon.""

To Hector's mind, that could only be something like what he had seen from Leo in the Undercrust. A material that had been imbued with a reaction state. These Abolishers were scared that they had triggered some sort of reaction-state-based alarm system.

Obviously, he didn't know how to use reaction states, as they were an incredibly advanced materialization technique, but these intruders didn't know that. So what if he took that a step further, then?

Couldn't he create some pretty wild shit and disguise it as being part of a reaction state?

He could use the enemy's own battlefield expertise against them.

All those thoughts raced back and forth across multiple processes in his head, and Hector arrived quite quickly at the conclusion that, yeah, he liked that idea. It certainly sounded better than waiting around for them to make the next move.

He'd never had cause to create anything like an iron puppet before. From a purely practical standpoint, it just never made much sense. Anything that the puppet would do, he'd have to think quite hard about in order to accomplish via the rules of materialization in order to give the appearance that it was actually moving autonomously. In normal combat, it was far more efficient to simply launch attacks himself.

This was clearly not normal combat, however."

"3159

If he could make them believe that an iron puppet really was moving autonomously, as part of some incredibly elaborate reactive trap system, then that might just scare the living crap out of these motherfuckers. And theoretically, he'd be able to launch attacks with it, too, if necessary.

He materialized the puppet right in front of them, wanting its appearance to be obvious. For its design, he didn't have long to dwell on it, so he just based it on something he'd seen once before. A rock golem from the Undercrust. The one that he'd seen fighting a feldeath in Himmekel.

This iron golem wasn't nearly so huge, though. He made about twice the height of an average person, feeling that was more than enough. And he gave it molten globes for eyes, too, so that it would have a glowing, menacing stare.

All in all, it was just a big lump of iron, one that happened to look humanoid, if rather bulky and too tall.

Hector held his breath as he waited for Abolish's reaction. If they realized that it was essentially nothing more than a scarecrow, then this was going to get very messy very quickly.

Hector could sense Roman and the others moving up behind him, all carrying Amir-9s with them. He held a hand without turning around, wanting them to wait. They all seemed to understand.

The Abolishers, meanwhile, still weren't moving. Hector could sense that all their heads were pointed straight at the golem, watching it intently as they were perhaps wondered if it was about to attack them. But they weren't taking the initiative. They weren't attacking it first or backing off, either."

"3160

Were they still hoping that they hadn't been detected? Hector couldn't sense any of their mouths moving, and Pauline wasn't telling him anything new, so they probably weren't talking to each others.

Hmm.

Hector still had some room left with his volume limit. He could probably make another golem. Maybe even two or three more.

He decided to text Pauline again, first.

can u tell me which 1 is the aberration?

Normally, he would've just been able to rely on Garovel for picking aberrations out of a crowd, but that couldn't be done against Invisibility, which rendered them entirely undetectable to reapers.

Hector couldn't recall if he'd ever talked to either Pauline or her father about aberrations before, though. There was a fair chance that she wouldn't have any idea what he was talking about.

'The one on the far left,' she said. 'Can you sense him?'

Ah. Well, that was a relief.

The one on the far left, huh? The Scarf of Amordiin was describing a lanky figure with fluttering hair and a long knife in one hand.

Truth be told, Hector still wasn't entirely sure how Invisibility worked. Did the ""shadow"" of aberrations like this function in the same way that it did for others? Could they still wield it as a weapon? If so, then what was the point of that knife, then?

Regardless, the aberration was the easiest pressure point. If this turned into a fight, he would want to eliminate the Invisibility as quickly as possible in order to help everyone else see the enemy, too.

He still didn't want to strike the first blow yet, though. The ideal scenario here was to make them retreat."

"3161

And since they weren't budging, Hector went ahead and made a second golem. This one, he positioned on the left, close to the aberration. Ideally placed for launch a soul-infused barrage of iron spikes, if need be. Unless the aberration was really powerful--and Hector suspected that it wasn't--that would probably be an instant kill.

The Abolishers took immediate notice of the new golem, and this time, their formation shuddered noticeably. They clumped together a little more, backing slightly away from the second guardian.

Banda, whose aerial outline Hector had made sure memorize, moved through the small crowd and pulled the aberration into the middle.

Hmm. Damn.

Perhaps he'd just given up a valuable opportunity. The aberration would be much harder to kill now.

Bah. He made a third golem, this time on the right.

The group of Abolishers compacted further. They had to realize that they were almost surrounded now. There was only one direction remaining. The direction opposite of Warrenhold.

C'mon, you bastards. Leave. Get the fuck out of here, already.

Hector honestly didn't know if he would be able to win this fight. Conventional wisdom suggested that he stood no chance against someone as old as Banda, but at the same time, he felt like it wouldn't be impossible, either.

And perhaps that dangerous thinking. Perhaps that was the psychological problem of emergence that Garovel had told him about. The slow build up expectation reduced stress and therefore the likelihood of emergence.

Hector tried to remind himself that he had to be exceptionally careful here. His reputation was built on a mountain of lies and half-truths. If he started buying into it himself, that would very likely spell the end of everything."

"3162

Another one of the Abolishers bolted. Banda was there again to stop them, but two more followed suit this time and managed to break away from the group. Then another two, and another three, and then they were all just scattering.

Hector blinked to himself, hardly able to believe that his plan had actually worked. He could sense them fleeing. Twenty-seven enemy combatants, all running away. Wow.

Except.

Ah.

Not all. A few were returning.

Now Hector understood. Banda had thrown the aberration over his shoulder like a sack of potatoes while trying to keep the others pinned down. He'd probably wanted the aberration to keep as many people invisible as possible before they got too far away. Hector was fairly certain about that much regarding Invisibility, at least. It had a limited range, like a bubble.

Poor Banda. He didn't realize that he was wasting his time. If the guy wasn't an infamous, mass murdering psycho, Hector might've felt a little bad for him.

Banda only managed to round up thirteen others in the end, some by force and some who simply never left his side to begin with.

Hector had to be particularly mindful of those latter ones, he felt. Those men were loyal and unaffected by his intimidation tactics.

But the numbers had been thinned. Thirteen down from twenty-seven. Not bad.

'Banda's pissed,' said Pauline.

Yeah. Hector could guess as much just from his gait. The anger and intent was clear with each decisive step the man took toward Warrenhold. They started circling around the three golems that he'd erected earlier.

Okay. Hector felt like he'd done just about all he could with intimidation alone. There was probably no scaring off this Banda motherfucker. Things were about to get real bad.

But he had had one last tactic in mind."

"3163

He put an end to the ""alarm"" system that he'd been using with the little clumps of metal, and silence finally returned. Banda and his men took notice, pausing at the sudden change.

Hector made the three golems' heads snap-turn in unison--dematerializing then rematerializing in an instant. Little cubes full of molten iron began orbiting around their bodies, readying themselves to be launched.

Banda's group hesitated again, watching the golems for a long moment.

Perhaps Banda could tell that this wasn't an empty threat now. Even if the man didn't exactly know what he was looking at, the intent had to be quite clear, no?

Controlling the orbiting cubes at a distance was certainly more difficult than just making them orbit around his own body, but it helped that the golems were immobile. And that the cubes were small. They wouldn't pack nearly as much of a wallop as the most powerful version of this technique, but they would almost certainly be more than enough to shred through that aberration like tissue paper. And with the thinned crowd, Hector had a pretty good lock on the aberration's location.

If Banda still felt bold enough to keep walking forward, Hector would fire off a warning shot.

And wouldn't ya know it, Banda did exactly that.

At that first step, Hector fired off a molten cube right in front of Banda's face, exploding the rocky ground a few short meters away from the man.

Banda turned toward the sight of the explosion, perhaps to assess the damage done as the cloud of dust dissipated, then looked toward the golem that had fired the shot.

Hector made the missing cube regenerate as Banda watched.

And for a long time, no one moved."
"3164

Banda just stood there, staring, as did all his men.

A part of Hector wanted to walk out there and ask them what they were thinking, maybe try to add to the intimidation factor by showing up in person. But no. This was fine. The longer they waited, the more time Abbas would have to get here.

Then everything happened very quickly.

A glob of something hawked up through Banda's throat, and the man spat it out at the nearest golem with the force of a cannon. The flaming phlegm hit dead on and melted through the iron as if it were butter, but Hector still managed to launch three of the orbiting cubes from before the golem collapsed.

And from the other two, Hector launched everything at once, riddling the enemy group full of explosive holes.

The field instantly erupted into chaos. The thirteen enemy combatants scattered--or tried to, until half or more of them suddenly stopped moving. Frozen in place by a psychic assault from Pauline, as expected.

Hector was locked on the aberration, though. Banda had been shielding them with his body, but after that first barrage, the man had abandoned the effort, perhaps deciding that the Invisibility was not worth it since it clearly had not worked as intended.

The aberration went down immediately, torn to shred just as expected. And the Invisibility shattered.

Still, however, Hector motioned for everyone behind to stay. They could join the fight at any moment now, but he didn't want them to be put at risk until it was clearly necessary. He still had two golems remaining, and he was working on remaking the third.

Hector knew from Hahl Saqqaf's intel that Banda had the power of osmium transfiguration, capable of creating highly toxic and flammable compounds."

"3165

Given the man's age, that would probably be bad enough to deal with on its own, but considering what happened with Bloodeye's weird transforming powers, Hector had to expect some kind of nasty surprise with this guy, too.

An enormous smokescreen filled the area around Banda, a tactic that the man probably didn't realize would not help him against the Scarf of Amordiin. Hector could still sense the man's location within it just fine.

So Hector riddled him with holes. Or tried to, at least. They didn't entirely take, instead getting stuck partway through his body and oozing out molten iron like blood.

Still, that had probably surprised him. And perhaps Banda learned a lesson from it, too, because he vanished into his own smoke. Becoming his own smoke, Hector realized. Just like he had watched Xuan Sebolt do with the power of pan-rozum.

Only three of Banda's men were still moving, the rest having been caught by Pauline. They were going after the golems and getting quite close. Hector had no way of knowing who they were or how dangerously their abilities might be, but it didn't entirely matter, because the golems still shredded one of them to pieces before being brought down.

And by then, the golem that Banda had destroyed was already regrown and revving up more molten cubes. He started regenerating the downed two, in new locations this time, spread farther out.

All things considered, Hector didn't mind this state of affairs too much. Banda was definitely going to be a problem, but they'd whittled his forces down from twenty-seven to three, including Banda himself. And the bastards were stuck playing a deadly game of whack-a-mole that was clearly not in their favor."

"3166 -- CCLXX.

Hector decided to annihilate a bit more of his decoy castle on the opposite side to which the battle was taking place. With even more of his volume limit freed up, he could go to work on more golems. Instead of trying to make three at a time, he tried to make five.

And he succeeded. Soon enough, he had constant suppressing fire on the remaining three Abolishers, which became quickly became two.

At length, however, Banda had apparently had enough.

Bright flames engulfed the horizon with an explosive force that shook the earth and made the decoy castle quiver. The iron wall in front Hector shuddered visibly, and Hector's hearing was gone. He felt Garovel's hand grab his shoulder and the regenerative vigor course through him in that familiar way.

He had to text Pauline again, even while he reached out with the Scarf to try and sense what what remained of the battlefield.

fumes r toxic

He didn't really know how deadly Banda's osmium could be, but he certainly didn't want her to get caught up in it accidentally.

When he sensed Banda again, however, the man was different. No longer smoke, no longer man.

Indeed, just as Hector had feared, they were facing another monster.

Chapter Two Hundred Seventy: 'The Raptor of Kortan...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Banda was sick and tired of this shit. This was supposed to be an easy job. Simple reconnaissance. Go in with Invisibility, report back on what they found. All the men that Roy had foisted upon him? An unnecessary precaution, Banda had said. They'd only slow him down anyway, Banda had said. If anything, they'd just make the job more difficult, Banda had said.

And lo-and-fucking-behold, the situation had now devolved into a total clusterfuck."

"3166 -- CCLXX.

Hector decided to annihilate a bit more of his decoy castle on the opposite side to which the battle was taking place. With even more of his volume limit freed up, he could go to work on more golems. Instead of trying to make three at a time, he tried to make five.

And he succeeded. Soon enough, he had constant suppressing fire on the remaining three Abolishers, which became quickly became two.

At length, however, Banda had apparently had enough.

Bright flames engulfed the horizon with an explosive force that shook the earth and made the decoy castle quiver. The iron wall in front Hector shuddered visibly, and Hector's hearing was gone. He felt Garovel's hand grab his shoulder and the regenerative vigor course through him in that familiar way.

He had to text Pauline again, even while he reached out with the Scarf to try and sense what what remained of the battlefield.

fumes r toxic

He didn't really know how deadly Banda's osmium could be, but he certainly didn't want her to get caught up in it accidentally.

When he sensed Banda again, however, the man was different. No longer smoke, no longer man.

Indeed, just as Hector had feared, they were facing another monster.

Chapter Two Hundred Seventy: 'The Raptor of Kortan...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Banda was sick and tired of this shit. This was supposed to be an easy job. Simple reconnaissance. Go in with Invisibility, report back on what they found. All the men that Roy had foisted upon him? An unnecessary precaution, Banda had said. They'd only slow him down anyway, Banda had said. If anything, they'd just make the job more difficult, Banda had said.

And lo-and-fucking-behold, the situation had now devolved into a total clusterfuck."

"3167

Look at those dumb shits, just standing there like morons. What kind of men had Bloodeye chosen for--?

A chunk of metal, bigger than any of the previous ones, clobbered Banda in the face, sending him tumbling back in the air.

Agh, motherfucker. This shit was ridiculous. He so badly wanted to just cut his losses and leave already.

But he knew that if he reported back without having even set foot in this stupid fucking underground castle, then Roy would throw a goddamn hissy fit. Plus, he'd never hear the end of it, having lost so many men already.

He should've just ignored orders and come alone.

Another chunk of metal arrived, but this time, Banda was ready. He caught it in his massive jaw and gulped it down like so much popcorn. It didn't matter if it was materialized or not. It didn't even matter if the materializer was on the field. Once it entered his belly, it was his forever.

Another ingredient for the brew. They could always use more ingredients.

He still wasn't entirely accustomed to this form, truth be told. These scaly bodies with shifting flesh and fluctuating temperatures--they were difficult to control. It sometimes felt like it had a mind all its own, like it wanted to rebel against him.

He loved it, though.

The name Raptor truly fit him now. He wondered if he might be able to make it spawn some feathers for him, one day. These kinds of dinosaurs were supposed to have feathers, weren't they? And thanks to his smoke form in pan-rozum, he could already fly, so it only seemed appropriate.

Agh, that was the reaper half of his mind talking. Always far too pleased with himself. With everything. Really knew how to enjoy life, that one. Good for Grigozo. The dumb fuck."

"3168

Banda breathed deep. He inhaled and inhaled and inhaled and still kept inhaling. More air than was ever physically possible. His lungs bulged. His belly bulged. His entire body bloated up. And then he devoured it all.

More ingredients for the brew. Always good to collect. Never knew when it might come in handy. Especially for transfiguration.

That was the trouble with their kind, with transfigurers. They were limited by their own bodies. Never could bring their elements to the fullest use, since they didn't have access to everything that the elements could do.

Or so the tale had been spun.

For how long? Banda didn't know. Hardly mattered. But it made them underestimated. Which was good.

Sometimes. Not always. Because it also made them undervalued. Underappreciated.

Not by Bloodeye, though. And not by Jercash. They understood. They had the vision that others lacked.

Banda reached deep within, searching for something to use. That enormous air bubble that he'd just put in there could be combined with all manner of things. He could take a sliver of it right now, in fact, combine it with his osmium, and create a nice, classic mixture of osmium tetroxide. A staple of his arsenal since youth.

But made so much more potent in this form.

The leverage that this body granted him over his creations was so, so good. Anything he wanted, anything he could dream up--where was the limit? Hard to say, really.

He could strengthen or weaken bonds. He could enhance or slacken reactivity. He could increase or decrease density, even.

The laws of physics? They could suck a fat one.

And he just felt so... powerful. So strong. As if nothing in this world could stop him.

Finally. He could be free. To just enjoy himself."

"3169

Another chunk of metal came for him, and he caught this one, too. How silly. It tried to grow spikes and skewer him, but they just broke against his scales like sticks against stone. He devoured the metal. More for the brew, as ever.

What was this metal, anyway? Hmm. Tasted like. Iron? Yeah. Iron. Very flat. Could use some spice. Oh well, though. Everything was appreciated.

But what to do next? Hmm, hmm. Just flying around up here was so much fun.

Ah, he was becoming lethargic. This form. And pan-rozum. Together, they had strange effects on him. Made his mind wander a bit. Probably Grigozo's fault, really. The dumb fuck.

What was he doing?

Oh yeah, the mission. Dammit, this was just supposed to be scouting, and now he was fighting. Well, fighting was better in its own way, he supposed. Nothing to get too upset about.

He just needed to make his way inside the stupid underground castle, then report back on its layout. That was all. Simple, eh? Entrance was a bit difficult to find, though. What was that down there? A fucking maze?

Agh.

Hey, wait a minute. What was that smell?

His nostrils flared as he sniffed. Again and again. A familiar scent. Old and familiar. Hmm?

Ah, another chunk of metal. He caught it in his mouth. Oh, a big one. This would make a nice addition to--

It exploded into molten iron and splashed all over him.

Agh, fuck! It burned!

He spiraled through the air, trying to fling it off of him with an accelerating spin. An unintended whirlwind whipped up around him. Messy. Molten goo flying everywhere.

No, no, he just needed to focus on the cold. That was the correct way to handle this. Mind over matter. It would fill his body with icy goodness and battle the searing pain for him.

Yes. Yes, that was better.

Mmm, soothing. Hot and cold together. Nice and even. Complementary. A treat for the senses. Ahhh."

"3170

Yes. The sensations of this form were what he loved best about it. The deluge of extra information. And the malleability of those senses, too.

His sense of smell, for instance.

He may have primarily based his Chaos form on various different pterosaurs, which had not, in fact, had very good senses of smell, but he had been able to fix that little problem by borrowing additional information from the good ol' Tyrannosaurus Rex.

His form wasn't perfect, of course. That was only natural. It involved Chaos, after all. And it was still quite new to him, besides. The melting, distended shapes that emerged from within this body were to be expected. Reaching through Eleg's memory in order to distort reality was no minor feat. It had its consequences.

And Banda could feel them. The anguished souls of this world, lost and forgotten within the infinite river of Chaos. Within the Void. He could feel how badly they longed to seize this body from him, how badly they longed to be free.

Ahaha. Pathetic ants. They deserved all their misery and more. Every soul did. And they knew they deserved it, too. They had to know. The idea of innocence? A farce. Denial. Nothing more than insects trying to take comfort in their own inadequacy, to ignore their failures out of some misguided conception of "fairness."

To him, therefore, their torment did not feel like torment at all. It felt like joy beyond measure. This form, Lozaro's discovery, was an affirmation of everything Banda had already believed to be true in this world. He might just have to thank the crazy bastard the next time he visited Jercash.

Ugh. Banda supposed he should concentrate on the fight. Grigozo's half of the mind wanted to be flighty and relaxed, but they were wasting time. And this Darksteel bastard was clearly quite dangerous, wherever he was. If he actually showed up in person instead of letting his puppets do his dirty work for him, Banda might be in trouble."

"3171

Better to stop screwing around, then. He had to concentrate hard in order to bring Grigozo's mind under control.

Another iron assault arrived, and Banda decided to avoid this one instead of trying to devour it. As much as he like adding materials to the brew, that last meal had been a bit too spicy for his tastes.

His powerful wings allowed him a magnificent degree of control in the air, and the ability to become one with his own smoke made attacks trivial to dodge. If he couldn't get out of the way, he could instead just let it pass right through him.

Moreover, the smoke would make it easy to infiltrate the castle and have a quick look around. It would've helped even more if Grigozo's reaper senses could give him some advanced warning of what was down there, but unsurprisingly, the place was guarded against that. No doubt, Darksteel had someone constantly reinfusing it with soul power, assuming he wasn't doing it himself.

He just had to find the way in.

What the hell was up with these aboveground structures, anyway? If he hadn't been told ahead of time that Warrenhold was an underground castle, he probably would've mistaken these things for the main location.

Ah, but wait. There it was again. That smell. Old and familiar. With regard to whose memory, though? Banda's or Grigozo's?

Well, it must've been Banda's, of course. Grigozo was a reaper. He hadn't smelled anything in millennia. It was silly to even humor--

Banda stopped in midair, his slit-eyes widening suddenly as the realization struck him.

No. It was Grigozo's memory.

Of a wrobel.

He smelled a wrobel.

Madness. If he hadn't been using both pan-rozum and his Chaos form at the same time, he never would've picked up on it. Access to Grigozo's memories was necessary, as was this monstrous sense of smell from his elongated snout."

"3172

Regardless, a wrobel was a major problem.

He hadn't thought about them in many, many years. Or Grigozo hadn't, rather. But that smell. It brought everything back in an instant.

With the benefit of hindsight, Grigozo's encounter with wrobels had been a supremely rare event. It certainly hadn't felt that way at the time, though.

Being enslaved by them for half a century had left quite the lasting impression on the reaper. As a young, still-living man, Grigozo had been pulled from his family and into their thralldom. For years, the Sparrows used him for all manner of errands. Cooking for them. Washing their feathers. Cleaning up after them. Fetching items for them. Lying for them. Helping them hide from the rest of the world.

A hellish existence, with only fleeting moments of freedom here and there. Little glimpses of himself as he once was. Able to control his own body for a few precious minutes. Only to have it all ripped away from him again when the Sparrows realized their slip up.

In the end, Grigozo finally used one of those fleeting moments to stab himself in the heart with a kitchen knife.

He'd thought his nightmare done. And yet, it wasn't the end at all. Because he revived as a reaper. And his slavery continued, though the wrobels had to find new uses for him.

It wasn't until the eldest Sparrow in the nest eventually died of old age that Grigozo found his opportunity to truly escape. He fled into the ground. Down and down and down. All the way into the Undercrust.

Those memories came readily into Banda's mind, needing little to no time for him to process them. More than anything, they were instincts now. Emotions more than ideas.

And everything made sense."

"3173

He looked back toward the stupid lackeys that he'd brought. They weren't just a bunch of good-for-nothings. Well, okay, yes, they were. But on this occasion, it wasn't entirely their fault, at least. The Sparrow had gotten to them.

And he knew from Grigozo's own experiences that a Sparrow was capable of so much more.

He needed to neutralize that threat right now. In all likelihood, the Sparrow was trying to remain hidden despite involving itself in the battle, so it probably didn't yet realize that he knew it was here. Clearly, it didn't know that he could detect it by smell, else it would have undoubtedly blocked his mind from registering that little bit of information.

That was how their psychic powers worked. Direct mental manipulation to prevent all forms of detection.

Utter bastards.

He inhaled deeply through his giant, reptilian nostrils, searching for a direction. Yes. To his left. Far below. Somewhere among those annoying metal towers with their blinding glare from the late afternoon sun.

He moved in closer, avoiding more metal assaults with ease, letting them phase through his smokey form as he kept sniffing the air.

Ah. The bird was moving, wasn't it? Trying to keep its distance from him now. Did it think he was onto it? No, probably not. His sense of smell hadn't been blocked. If it realized, the bird would be able to disappear entirely.

Unless, that was, he resorted to an entirely different sense. One born of Chaos. One that was too dangerous to use all the time, because it came with the unfortunate effect of empowering the damned souls clawing at him from within.

Lozaro called this sense ""mementori."" It was, in short, the ability to detect auras--and with greater levels of aptitude, to decipher the memories hidden therein."

"3174

The trouble was, a skilled wrobel might still be able to conceal itself even from mementori, especially if it had experience fighting other wrobels.

But it wouldn't be quite so clear cut as with the other senses, either. With those, Sparrows had an indisputable advantage so long as they realized what senses needed to be blocked. Why they didn't simply block all senses all the time, he couldn't rightly say. Perhaps it was more taxing for them. Whatever the case, mementori was at least contestable for him. Even if the wrobel realized what he was doing and tried to block him, he would be able to fight back.

Because aura was everywhere. In all things. Around them. And complicated still further by time. The bird could try to conceal itself within one aura, but the disappearance from its memory would leave a noticeable trail. And plus, one aura would in turn impact those around it. The auras of the trees. Animals. Even in the atmosphere itself.

The cascading ripple effect would be difficult, if not impossible, to fully hide. Only the most powerful wrobels in history would be able to accomplish such a feat without flaw.

According to Grigozo's memories, that was. Banda hoped the reaper wasn't wrong about that as he took the plunge and activated mementori.

Immediately, his body began to burn. A consuming flame over the entirety of his being. Damned souls trying to tear his flesh apart from the inside, to claw their way to freedom, to seize his conduit away from his mind.

He suppressed them with vitriol. Raw anger. Old and long-tempered. Burning hotter than any of those wretched fools could. It required all of his and Grigozo's concentration. One had to maintain mementori, and the other had to remain aware of the environment around them, of the unfolding battle."

"3175

The entire area morphed within his mind. The auras filling the area, bumping into one another, clashing, blending, interacting with one another in countless indescribable ways.

And sure enough, there the Sparrow was. A blurry blob soaring through the air. Not even that far away, really. At this distance, if he just lunged for it at full speed, he might be able to catch the bird before it realized what was going on. That would be important. Sparrows were damned fast fliers, after all. This might turn into an obnoxious chase if he didn't end it straight away.

As he was about to make his move, however, his mementori shuddered. He sensed something down below, concealed among the metal towers.

A terrible aura.

What in the fuck was that?

Its form was certainly different from all the other auras in the area. It wasn't another wrobel. In fact, it kept following the bird, tracing the path with its own.

And it was reaching up toward him, too. Spiking up toward him, even. Poking holes into Banda's own aura like a rapier through wool.

One spike reached all the way to his body and pierced his chest. It didn't hurt, of course. It was just an aura.

But he definitely still felt something. The intent behind it. The underlying mind.

It was the presence of a courteous demon. Threatening him gently yet darkly. Wrapping its amorphous hands around his beating heart and squeezing ever so slightly. Just enough to let him know. What he would be facing. If he chose to proceed.

Never had he felt the like before.

Since acquiring mementori, Banda had experienced several overwhelming auras before. Among allies, there was Bloodeye, Lozaro, Jercash, Morgunov, and Dozer. Among enemies, the Surgeon Saint, Vernon, Kane, and Grant.

This was different from all of those. And yet frighteningly similar, also."
"3176

To Banda's mind, there were only two people who could have an aura like that. Either Darksteel or the Sunsmith. One of them was already here, he realized.

And from all reports, the Sunsmith was a very aggressive combatant, flying around in a suit of mechanized armor and attacking head on. This aura did not seem fitting to him. Darksteel, on the other hand, still had a general air of mystery surrounding him among Abolish's reports. Plus, there were the deadly traps that his men had succumbed to, as well.

This ominous aura had to be Darksteel, Banda thought. It just made more sense.

The most unsettling thing, however, was how the damned souls within him were reacting. Their thrashing and screaming stopped almost entirely. Their sudden unease was palpable. It was as if they had been nothing more than rowdy children at a dinner table, now becalmed and obediently eating upon the arrival of their stern father.

Madness.

These were tormented souls trapped within Chaos itself--the vicious embodiment of endless suffering. Malice incarnate, literally.

Or so he'd come to believe.

Why would they suddenly begin behaving this way? Was his understanding of these damned souls mistaken? Was there more to them than Lozaro had said?

In midair, Banda found himself hesitating.

What in the world was going on here? Darksteel was down there. Somewhere. Why wasn't he attacking? Even the lazy assaults from his puppets had ceased, Banda realized.

Yes, it had to be Darksteel, didn't it? He was more sure than ever, now. The Sunsmith wouldn't be pulling this shit, surely. Booby traps and mind games. Using Sparrows and auras to mess with their heads.

Was it all an illusion? Even the way the souls within him were reacting? Impossible."

"3177

As he hung there in the air, smoky wings flapping, Banda wasn't sure what to do, anymore.

Fear was not something that he had felt in many, many years, but the uncertainty in this situation was honestly terrifying. Banda had just celebrated his 141st birthday, and Grigozo was well over a thousand, but here and now? They felt like nothing more than ignorant children. Even with their blended minds working the problem together, it made no difference.

Ah, but no. The fear was mostly coming from Grigozo's end, wasn't it? Of course. That only made sense. Reapers tended to act far more courageous than they actually were. Deep down, most of them were cowards, Banda knew. The only reason they managed to keep their facades up as well as they did was because of their immense levels of knowledge and experience.

When they encountered something truly unknown, however--that was when their true characters revealed themselves.

Agh. What a damn hassle. Grigozo's mind was already a big enough pain in the ass without an infection of crippling terror.

He looked over the glimmering towers another time. He needed to think clearly.

At this point, it was beyond obvious that the mission was a failure. They had yet to gather any intel about Warrenhold's layout. And Darksteel himself was down there, just waiting for him to make a move. To overextend. To make a mistake.

No.

The intelligent thing to do now was to pull back and report the failure. It would sting, of course, and he'd no doubt have to deal with all sorts of shit from his more insufferable peers, but that was the correct move.

Because then they could prepare for a real fight. Not whatever this mess had turned into."

"3178

A real fight. Yes. Something proper and orderly. Yes. Intelligently conceived and thought-through. Yes. As Jercash would want, surely. Yes.

Yes...

No.

The Chaos in him burned. Rebelled.

Not the beings born of Chaos. Those had been quieted by Darksteel's aura.

No. The Chaos within him. His half of the mind. The Chaos that had always been there, since his earliest days. Silent and furious. At the world. At, perhaps, even existence itself.

That part of him still had a say in things. As much as he wanted to be rational, to break the mold set by his many obnoxious contemporaries in Abolish, Banda Toro still had to face up to his own nature. The nameless judge within himself.

The divine font of the Void, some called it.

Wouldn't it be a shame to flee now? Before even getting so much as a look at this Darksteel? Wouldn't doing that actually empower Darksteel more, in some ways? His reputation? Wouldn't it be contributing to his growing mystique as that of yet another bogeyman to Abolish?

Surely, they didn't need another one of those.

That's right. There were reasons to stay and fight. Fairly intelligent and rational ones, even. Yes. That was how the Chaos functioned. It might have been fueled by emotion primarily, but emotion was highly motivating to all sorts of ends, wasn't it? Rationalization could certainly be one of those ends. Motivated thinking was still thinking.

Heh.

The Raptor of Kortan was a mess. A ferocious, distorted mess. But that, of course, came with the territory when accepting Chaos so literally into one's flesh. Lozaro had warned them all of this.

""Chaos takes no sides,"" he'd said. ""Or rather, you might say, it takes all sides. It will work both for and against you, if you let it. It will twist your mind. Put you at war with yourself--even whilst it empowers you against your foes with abilities that even I am only beginning to understand. That is why you must will it into submission, first.""

He was losing control here. That was what all these conflicting thoughts meant, Banda suddenly realized. It was not unlike pan-rozum in that way. He had to maintain focus. Control.

He had to eradicate indecision.

Yes.

That was a poison in this form.

Nothing for it, then. He could delay no longer. To fight or to flee? Which would it be?

He made his choice."

"3179 -- CCLXXI.

Chapter Two Hundred Seventy-One: 'Beware the Doormen...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector sensed a change immediately. He couldn't tell why or how. It wasn't his eyes that alerted him. Nor the Scarf. By all accounts, Banda was just sitting up there in the air, flapping his smoky wings and biding his time.

But there was something very off. Hector could just feel it in his mind and in his gut. Banda was suddenly different, somehow. Not in any visible way.

Was it aura? He might've asked Pauline if there'd been time for it.

Unfortunately, there wasn't.

Up to now, Hector had been hoping against hope that the guy would just fucking leave already. It hadn't looked likely at first, but with the way that Banda had been edging farther and farther away from Warrenhold, Hector had slowly been starting to believe that all these silly tricks and mind games might've actually been working on this monster. Slowly but surely, perhaps.

This new feeling changed all that. And when the Raptor of Kortan loosed such a thunderous, inhuman cry that the iron walls of the decoy castle shuddered, Hector knew for certain that he was right.

This fight was not yet done.

Banda surged back downward, an arrow-like cloud of smoke and flesh, coming straight toward him this time.

Hector still hadn't revealed himself, but that probably didn't matter at this point, did it? Banda could sense him, couldn't he? There was something in the Raptor's disposition or aura that made that so obvious.

Banda was coming for him. The intent might as well have been a shimmering blade for how apparent it was.

Alright.

The very thing that Hector had been trying to avoid this whole time was now happening. He couldn't stop it, anymore.

So he had to face it. There was no choice.

A direct fight with an enemy that he was not at all a match for. An enemy that he stood no chance against, quite frankly.

There were other ideas in the back of his mind. Of course there were. He could try to buy time. Maybe Abbas would show up and save him. Word should have gotten to the Sunsmith by now, surely. It wasn't impossible.

Hector wasn't rejecting that plan totally. It sounded pretty great, honestly.

But there was something else at play, too. These auras, he supposed it was. His and Banda's. They were throwing a wrench into everything. He didn't understand them, but he knew they were affecting him. Threatening him. Trying to consume him."

"3179 -- CCLXXI.

Chapter Two Hundred Seventy-One: 'Beware the Doormen...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector sensed a change immediately. He couldn't tell why or how. It wasn't his eyes that alerted him. Nor the Scarf. By all accounts, Banda was just sitting up there in the air, flapping his smoky wings and biding his time.

But there was something very off. Hector could just feel it in his mind and in his gut. Banda was suddenly different, somehow. Not in any visible way.

Was it aura? He might've asked Pauline if there'd been time for it.

Unfortunately, there wasn't.

Up to now, Hector had been hoping against hope that the guy would just fucking leave already. It hadn't looked likely at first, but with the way that Banda had been edging farther and farther away from Warrenhold, Hector had slowly been starting to believe that all these silly tricks and mind games might've actually been working on this monster. Slowly but surely, perhaps.

This new feeling changed all that. And when the Raptor of Kortan loosed such a thunderous, inhuman cry that the iron walls of the decoy castle shuddered, Hector knew for certain that he was right.

This fight was not yet done.

Banda surged back downward, an arrow-like cloud of smoke and flesh, coming straight toward him this time.

Hector still hadn't revealed himself, but that probably didn't matter at this point, did it? Banda could sense him, couldn't he? There was something in the Raptor's disposition or aura that made that so obvious.

Banda was coming for him. The intent might as well have been a shimmering blade for how apparent it was.

Alright.

The very thing that Hector had been trying to avoid this whole time was now happening. He couldn't stop it, anymore.

So he had to face it. There was no choice.

A direct fight with an enemy that he was not at all a match for. An enemy that he stood no chance against, quite frankly.

There were other ideas in the back of his mind. Of course there were. He could try to buy time. Maybe Abbas would show up and save him. Word should have gotten to the Sunsmith by now, surely. It wasn't impossible.

Hector wasn't rejecting that plan totally. It sounded pretty great, honestly.

But there was something else at play, too. These auras, he supposed it was. His and Banda's. They were throwing a wrench into everything. He didn't understand them, but he knew they were affecting him. Threatening him. Trying to consume him."

"3180

Even his own aura was not harmless. It wanted to respond to the heat and fury that he sensed from Banda. It wanted to influence his thoughts, to urge him into a direct fight with the Raptor of Kortan as a challenger to be met.

Which was absurd. They were not equals. Not in the least.

But there was something so moving in it. So motivating. And convincing, too.

Because if he ran, if he stalled, if he failed to meet Banda's challenge head on, then Banda would know.

Everything would be laid bare. The aura would give it away. How true and feeble the deception had been all this time. And then Banda would really attack Warrenhold. That wicked red smoke would go down into the Entry Tower and search all throughout the fortress, learning its shape and its secrets, devouring any of the defenseless residents that it could find. Sure, they should've all been gathered in the Tower of Night by now, and yeah, maybe its nightrock walls would be able to offer some protection against such an infiltration, but still.

That was no guarantee. Not at all. That was a hope and a prayer, at best.

In many ways, this flash of a feeling was impossible to articulate. The auras made it so.

Instead, Hector merely felt that he needed to be more than even he himself thought he could be, right now. He needed to be the thing that Banda's aura was searching for. Testing for.

He needed to be Darksteel.

There was no avoiding it. Banda Toro would know if he tried. And then, not long after, Bloodeye would know. So even if Banda left them alone, the next assault would come very swiftly--and be much, much worse than this.

At best, it would be a true siege. At worst, a total slaughter.

Yes. Hector felt certain of these things. Beyond certain, even. As if he had lived through such experiences before.

And so, to everyone else, it probably made little sense, what he was about to do. There was no opportunity to explain his thought process to them. Hell, even if there had been, he probably wouldn't have been able to. So he didn't try. He just turned back to the others behind him, to Roman Fullister and Joana Cortes."

"3181

"I need you all to stay here," said Hector. "If he makes it past me, retreat into the Entry Tower and bury the entrance as best you can."

"What're you--?"

"Abbas will be here soon," said Hector. "Just hold out until then."

'Hector, wait a--' Garovel tried to say.

Hector clapped an iron orb around the reaper. 'I'm really sorry,' he told him. He caught the orb with both hands and then tossed it over to Roman. "Take care of him for me, please."

More words were said in response. Some of them quite upset, from the sound of it. But Hector had already tuned them all out. Maybe that was a stupid thing to do. It was certainly rude, at least. But he had to. The auras demanded his full attention.

Banda Toro demanded it.

The man would not be dissuaded from this fight, Hector knew. He was coming for Darksteel, and nothing was going to get in his way.

In full armor, with his still-rather-haphazard ability to fly, Hector leapt away from the ground and soared up to meet him there in the sky.

For a moment, it crossed his mind that, perhaps, Banda would want to talk to him first. And Hector wouldn't have minded. It would've meant more time for Abbas to show up.

But no. That notion was destroyed as he grew closer to Banda's aura. The heat in it. The hostility and viciousness. It didn't want to talk. Not with words, anyway. It did want a dialogue, of sorts, yes. It wanted to know him through his actions.

And on some level, Hector could appreciate that. It was absolutely horrible for him, but he could appreciate it.

He decided to open with a volley of iron javelins. The first word of the conversation. It wouldn't do much, he knew, but he intended to put a little twist on it.

He made them icy cold, and when they pierced the red smoke of Banda's body, he added an instant molten coating to them. The sudden extreme temperature difference made them explode.

It wasn't doing any actual damage, Hector knew, but it was a way of testing the waters and dispersing some of the smoke. Pockets of Banda's red form burst apart, though not for long.

The return fire from Banda was far more deadly.

A giant, dagger-toothed maw formed out of the smoke, and from it, a white hot pillar of fire shot out like a laser beam."

"3182

Hector barely got out of the way in time--and even that wasn't quite enough. The flame didn't actually touch him, but it still melted most of his breastplate. He could feel his chest burning as he rushed to annihilate and rematerialize the front plate.

His flight was chaotic. He didn't yet have the kind of well-practiced control that he needed to be fighting a battle in the sky like this. But he did have the power. The speed.

That would have to do.

He didn't hold back in his movements. Subtle and nuanced went out the window. When he needed to go right, he surged right. When he needed to go left, he burst left.

His body could barely take it. He could feel bones cracking with each explosive turn. He could feel blood pooling quickly to one side of his head and limbs before violently shifting to a different side. It would've certainly been enough to make him sick and disoriented to the point of delirium, if he hadn't been so focused.

On the fight. On Banda.

The Raptor's smoking form was so difficult to keep track of at this range. It moved so strangely and unpredictably. The Scarf of Amordiin helped, but not as much as usual. Air currents could pass right through Banda's body with only the faintest whiff of information being sent back to Hector's mind.

He had to pay closer attention than ever before. He couldn't let some little puff of red smoke sneak up on him, lest it turn suddenly into a blade through his helmet.

But it wasn't like all the other red smoke in front of him could just be ignored, either. Snapping maws and thrashing claws kept materializing from the smoke, lurching at him in a flurry of ceaseless attacks as the smoke billowed after him.

And the ranged attacks, too. Some of the mouths mixed in more beams of white fire, each one threatening to end him in an instant.

Hector had the Amir-10, though--the new version of Haqq's shield that Abbas had gifted him. The beams broke upon it like water upon rock, splashing out in all directions around him.

Still, this was far from an ideal situation. He had to hit back--and hard, too. As hard as possible.

But his most powerful technique would prove useless here, Hector felt. Orbiting cubes launched at high speeds would just pass right through Banda's smoke-based body. Soul-empowering them wouldn't matter, either, he was pretty sure."

"3183

That was why he'd opened with those exploding javelins. As a proof of concept, they'd been successful. Explosive force could indeed displace the smoke. Now he needed to scale up the intensity. Would've certainly helped if he'd ever practiced this technique before, but oh well. Learning mid-combat was something he'd been doing since day one, it felt like.

Rather than trying to disperse the smoke with one big burst, he went with a flurry. More javelins. Dozens of them, flying all at once, followed by an immediate second and third wave.

Molten coatings for all of them as soon as they touched the smoke.

A stream of explosions, bursting the smoke apart in clusters, not unlike bubbles in boiling water.

It wasn't doing much, Hector saw. Banda was still plowing through it all, chasing after him relentlessly.

But it wasn't doing nothing, either. He followed up with fourth and fifth waves, and he could see the smoke dispersing more and more. Momentarily, he saw what he'd been waiting for.

A few whiffs of red, isolated from the rest of the smoke--and seemingly not of Banda's own volition this time.

Hector pounced on the opportunity, clapping thick iron orbs around the separated smoke.

This was how he'd defeated the worm in the Undercrust. Cutting it up into manageable chunks. Maybe Banda would--

No.

This was wrong, he realized. In the back of his mind, he could sense it with the Scarf. The volume of smoke wasn't like that of a worm. It was changing constantly, growing and shrinking as it pleased, whipping towards him, then slinking back to try to flank him.

Banda was in pan-rozum. Which meant he had access to materialization, too. His smoke couldn't run out until he reached his volume limit, which was probably gargantuan.

This wasn't going to work. Hector knew that much. Hell, the whole fight had obviously been hopeless from the start, but if he didn't think of something different to try, then Banda Toro was going to kill him soon.

And then everyone else, too.

And worse still, emergence wouldn't help. Even if he did achieve it again, what difference would it make? More powerful materialization wasn't the answer when he couldn't even touch this guy.

The problem was a fundamental one.

In background thought processes, while he concentrated on evading each deadly attack, these thoughts were stewing."

"3184

He cycled through all of his previous tactics and techniques, searching for anything that seemed useful. Nothing was really sticking in his mind, though. Bullets went right through the smoke. Coating didn't work on gases. Boxes were pointless. Walls would be torn through like tissue paper.

But they could still obstruct Banda's vision.

Maybe that would buy him some extra time to think, at least.

He went to work materializing giant slabs of iron between him and Banda. He made sure to soul-empower them as well, to aid with the blocking of reaper sight as well. It wouldn't be perfect for the latter unless he completely sealed himself in, which he obviously didn't want to do, but if it could just disorient Banda a little, then that would be enough. Hector just wanted to press the sensory advantage that the Scarf of Amordiin provided.

The chase grew even crazier. Hector had to be constantly aware of Banda's position relative to him and his own falling iron walls. He couldn't spare the time to worry about dematerializing them before they crashed down to the ground. They weren't directly over the decoy castle, so it should've been fine.

It didn't take Hector long to realize that these walls weren't doing much. Even his low expectations for them were not being met. The Raptor wasn't getting disoriented at all, even when Hector started trying to curve the walls to provide more cover for himself. Banda billowed and weaved around each one, only bothering to punch through on occasion.

And then Hector realized why.

Banda always saw the shortest path to Hector. Whether it meant breaking the wall or going around it, Banda knew.

He could sense Hector some other way, couldn't he? Through his aura, probably. Obscuring his vision didn't matter, did it?

Agh.

Hector's mind raced for another solution as Banda kept the chase up. Aura felt like his only hope now, but that might've just been because it was still so mysterious to him. That hope was created by uncertainty, not by any sort of clear plan or idea.

Shit. It was about all he had, though.

There was definitely more to this aura stuff. He knew that much, at least. It was the ""product of his entire self."" That was what Rasalased had said.

Which meant--wait a minute. That meant that emergence actually would help, didn't it? Because emergence affected his materialization, and his materialization affected his aura. So technically...

A man-sized claw came for him, and Hector only just slipped out of the way. The wind it left in its wake was enough to rattle his armor."
"3185

These attacks from Banda were certainly dangerous, but Hector couldn't help thinking there was something off about them, too. They were so straightforward. Not creative or sneaky at all. Banda wasn't throwing any feints at him or trying to distract him. The Raptor was just barreling headlong toward him like a rabid animal. Ferocious, perhaps, but mindless.

And yet, that didn't seem quite right, either. This feeling in his gut was telling Hector something else.

Banda wasn't mindless. That's what was so strange here.

Despite all appearances to the contrary, Banda was still in control of himself. Still thinking. Still rational.

Still testing him.

Banda wanted a clash. A direct conversation. For now, at least. He wasn't trying to kill him at any cost yet. He wanted to get to know Hector better, first.

This had to be the weirdest fucking thing that Hector had ever felt. He didn't even know if he should trust it. Reading his opponent's intent? Was this because of his own aura or Banda's? Perhaps all auras were like this.

Whatever the case, he had to come to a decision. He'd flown up here to have a ""conversation"" with Banda, but did this game of chase qualify as that? Were he and Banda learning about each other?

Somewhat. Definitely somewhat. Could Banda read his intent in the same way? Hector had a feeling that he could.

Which meant that the Raptor could perhaps sense his uncertainty. His hesitation. His struggle for solutions.

But not his fear.

No, not that. Because there was nothing to read. Hector was not afraid of this asshole. He was angry at him.

And learning more about Banda like this, about that calm mind beneath the storm of furious red...

It actually pissed Hector off more. Being able to sense that there was a real, thinking human being in there, that it wasn't just some crazed, psychotic animal devoid of all emotion and humanity fighting him right now--that made Hector begin to genuinely hate Banda.

Because Banda was choosing to do this. The Raptor of Kortan wasn't ruled by instinct and indulgence. Those things were there, of course--Hector could sense them, too. But the sentient control was stronger. Banda knew exactly what he was doing.

And to be honest, as much as it bothered him, things were probably better off this way. The apparent curiosity in Banda's aura was definitely making him hold back, which in turn was giving Hector time.

But Hector still had to answer. Banda was posing questions to him now.

Can you do anything to me? What are you really made of? How dangerous are you, Darksteel?

Hector could all but hear these things."
"3186

This was not a test he was prepared for. He'd known that when he decided to fly up here. But there was even more to the insanity of the situation than just that.

Because he already had a rather strong idea of how outclassed he was here. Thanks to Melchor Blackburn and the late Xuan Sebolt. And also Zeff, later on.

Hector had already witnessed a powerful smoke-based warrior in action once before. He'd had quite the front row seat, in fact. Xuan's fight with Melchor at the Blackburn fortress known as Marshrock had certainly been something to behold. And when Melchor gained the upper hand, Hector had been the one to carry and protect Xuan from him in order to give Xuan much needed time to recover.

That was the first time Hector had seen precisely how terrifying the gap in strength between servants could be. Melchor and Xuan were each one the deciding factor between victory and defeat for their side. Everything in that battle had revolved around them, around their clash.

And of course, in that fight Hector had further witnessed Xuan being nearly defeated by Melchor. So he knew now that smoke warriors could be defeated. They weren't simply invulnerable, thankfully.

How Melchor had done it, though, was the difficult part.

To Hector's eyes, the crippling blow from Melchor had appeared as essentially just a giant explosion. It pierced the smoke at its heart and then burst apart, dispersing it everywhere.

Not unlike the exploding javelins that Hector had been testing here. Just a lot more powerful.

However, Hector knew now that Melchor's technique on that occasion had involved more than making a really big boom.

Because he'd asked Melchor about it once, when the man happened to show up during one of his training sessions with Zeff.

""Ah, yeah, that was a pretty advanced little trick,"" Melchor had told him. ""Smoke can be very troublesome to deal with. You can't just punch it. And if your opponent has enough control over the form, soul power won't do anything, either. Because they can manipulate their body around your attacks at will. So what you do is concentrate your soul power into a single attack and strike at the enemy's most vulnerable point with something that can disrupt their form. Such as an explosion. Because they can't warp their body around that kind of attack. It's omnidirectional.""

But after he'd left, Zeff had more to add.

""First, you have to be able to sense soul power,"" the Lord Elroy had said. ""Without that, you won't be able to tell where your opponent's most vulnerable point even is.""

"3187

Zeff had gone on to lecture him about the importance of being able to intelligently evaluate one's opponent and determine whether victory or escape was the appropriate course of action. Which had been a very wise and important thing to bring up, of course.

If Zeff were able to read Hector's thoughts right now, the man probably would've been very disappointed in him.

Because escape wasn't even a consideration.

This was Warrenhold. It wasn't a place that you needed to escape from. It was a place you could escape to.

And there were dozens of non-combatants down there. They needed to be protected.

And right now, the so-called Lord Darksteel needed to come through for them.

In his mind, none of these thoughts were fully formed or articulated. They were just gut feelings at best, underlining every racing thought that passed through his head as he narrowly dodged or blocked every devastating blow from Banda Toro.

Hector knew that he needed to come up with something. And this aura shit was so overwhelming. As the fight drew out, he could feel it all the more intensely. In his mind. In his body. Everywhere.

Consuming everything around him. A suffocating and invigorating blanket.

It was a contradiction unto itself. Like struggling ferociously against an angry sea, yet also being able to breathe the very waters of that same sea, taking strength from the crashing waves even as they tried to batter him into pieces.

And in a different way, it was also familiar. When he'd talked to Rasalased and when he'd gone into the Candle--those experiences were both similar to this, albeit not entirely.

This felt more like a blend of those times with how he normally felt.

Like things were only half real, right now. Like reality itself was questionable but still present. Asleep and awake at the same time.

And Hector searched.

He didn't know for what. A solution to all his problems? Or to just this fight? For something helpful, at least.

There was definitely something here. In the middle of this fury. This storm. He could sense so many fleeting things. There was a fireworks show beneath everything else. A storm beneath the storm. It was there.

He just couldn't. Quite. Touch it.

But maybe he could see it. Just. Barely. In a way.

Banda's intent was part of it. The man's aura wasn't trying to hide that at all. If anything, it was like it wanted to be seen. To be acknowledged.

To be challenged. Yes, of course it did."

"3188

Banda was telegraphing everything--and not just with his movements. His aura, his intent, they made it clear as day.

The attack was coming from his right this time. He moved out the way with more time to spare than usual. The next cluster of long, red claws came faster, but Hector avoided those, too. With a second or two to spare, even.

Which felt like a lifetime in the middle of this fight.

Good. Great, even.

But this wasn't what he needed. He'd already been able to sense Banda's movements well enough with the Scarf and his own two eyes. This added an extra layer to things, sure--gave him some breathing room--but what he really needed was to find that point of vulnerability that Melchor mentioned.

If souls gave that information away, then aura probably could, too. Souls were a component of aura, after all.

He just had to concentrate. To look. To feel.

Melchor's attack had pierced Xuan's smoke at the center. Hector was looking as hard as he could, but he couldn't see, feel, or otherwise sense anything special at the center of Banda's smoke. Hell, it was hard enough to even tell where the center was most of the time. The way Banda's form shifted constantly in its pursuit. How was he even supposed to--

No, wait.

A glimpse. A glimmer. Hector thought he saw it. For a split second amid the chaos, just before taking another huge laser beam with the Amir-10, he thought that maybe it was there. As thousands of sparks and gushing flames jumped off his shield, Hector waited for another chance to see.

Yeah.

The fire dissipated around him. Banda was coming from the left, as subtle as a train, and Hector propelled himself out of the way. By now, he could feel multiple broken bones throughout his body from all this ""flight."" It was more like flinging himself through the air than actually flying, but that didn't matter. It was the furthest thing from his mind, right now.

Because he saw the center. The point around which all of Banda's smoke shifted and morphed. It wasn't always the actual center. That was the tricky thing about it.

It seemed to Hector that Banda's smoke was like a rubber band, and the center--the mind, perhaps--was like a nail around which the rubber band stretched and spun itself. At times, the nail was the farthest edge; at others, it was the closest part of the smoke to him.

In fact, it was coming closer more often than not.

Which made sense, Hector realized. Because Banda wanted him to do something. Dared him to.

So he did."

"3189

He'd already ""loaded"" up an onslaught of orbiting cubes in his mind for this. All tiny, no bigger than golf balls. All icy to the core. All soul-empowered.

From behind his shield, Hector thrust his gauntleted hand toward the perceived center of Banda's smoke, and the barrage of frozen iron bullets flew forth as if they were being shot out of a minigun with the trigger taped down. Sustained, not stopping.

They pierced the smoke with no trouble, but of course that wasn't the goal. The molten coatings that made the bullets start exploding was.

Frankly, he knew he didn't have enough control to add coatings to every single bullet that he fired. They were way too many moving way too fast. But that was okay. He just needed to get most of them. And the gushing heat from the new iron would cause other, nearby bullets to explode anyway, even without coatings of their own.

And he didn't hold the power back at all. The bullets were as cold as he could possibly make them, and the coatings were as hot as he could possibly make them. The explosions might not have been huge like Melchor's against Xuan had been, but they didn't let up and piled on top of each other.

The result, therefore, was a continuous stream of white-hot fireworks tearing through Banda's red smoke and dispersing it with ease. Hector whipped the stream to and fro as he flew, cutting huge swaths through the smoke even as it slowed its pursuit of him.

He saw no reason to let up. He just kept going, trying to disperse as much of it as he could as quickly as he could.

Steam and black smoke mixed with the red, creating havoc in the storm and rendering it utterly impossible for Hector to tell where Banda's ""center"" was any longer.

He wasn't about to stop and try to reassess, though. The constant stream of explosions was certainly taxing on his mind, requiring two entire thought processes, but that didn't matter. As long as he could still see red, the bullets weren't going to stop flying.

He couldn't even tell if it was really working, but that didn't matter, either. Not yet, anyway. Because if it was working, he might not get a second chance to take Banda by surprise as he suspected that he had. He needed to go all the way here, providing no breathing room for this son of a bitch."

"3190

The next shift came suddenly enough that Hector barely had time to sense it. Through all the smoke and chaos and ear-splitting explosions, the change in Banda Toro's aura was almost lost on him.

No more curiosity. Just anger. But in a professional way, somehow. Respectfully furious, perhaps.

The next flurry of attacks were nothing like the last ones. They came from all sides, multiples jaws and slashing claws flying at him at once. And too fast. No way to get out unscathed, even as Hector saw them coming a split second before.

""Kabura!"" said Hector.

The Amir-10 responded. In an instant, it was as tall as he was and wider. It completely covered his left side as he flung himself out of the coming onslaught's path.

But it was also thinner now, too. Multiple claws dug into it, leaving streaks and poking holes large enough to see through. It did its job, though. For his left side, at least.

His right side took all the slashing and tearing with nothing more than his iron armor for protection. The Raptor's fangs tore through that like tissue and drew a geyser of blood out of Hector.

A long, streaking trail of red followed Hector as he pushed himself to fly faster, but it wasn't just smoke this time. The blood wasn't stopping, he saw. A third of his torso was missing, and his right arm was shredded and twitching.

He still had feeling in it, though. Boy, did he still have feeling in it. He probably would've screamed in agony if he wasn't concentrating so hard on not getting killed.

Because Banda was pursuing. Another heat laser came for him. He sensed it in time to block it with the shield, but the Amir-10 was still thinner and needed time to regenerate. Fire poured through the holes, widening some of them and melting chunks of his armor.

He kept flying, just focusing on not getting disoriented. He'd been forced to let up his attack in order to get away, but he still knew where Banda was. The Scarf and aura together made it obvious. Plus, Banda wasn't as smoky as before. The guy had solidified more of himself, which thankfully made it easier to--

There were three of him now.

Hector sensed it just as a cluster of red spears flew toward him. He managed to avoid them, but they exploded and sent him veering off his intended course."

"3191

Hector struggled to stabilize. No time to think. Three Bandas were coming for him, he knew. Where were they all? He could still sense two but not the third.

He couldn't dwell on it. Had to act. If they were solid enough for him to sense this clearly, they would be more vulnerable to bombardment. He loaded up more cubes in his mind as twin assaults of lasers and exploding javelins pressed him down closer to the ground. He needed to keep track of his altitude on top of everything else.

More processing. More thinking. More concentration.

Ah. There was the third. Circling around to flank him. Not as solid as the other two. Much smokier. Harder to sense that way. Smart. Hector almost hadn't--

Oh shit, there was a fourth on the other side.

He needed distance. Speed. Couldn't let himself get surrounded. Even a few extra seconds would be useful for the Amir-10 to repair itself.

""Sagir!"" said Hector.

And the Amir-10 shrunk back down to its usual size. The holes in it were now smaller as well. The regenerating factor was supposed to be faster than the Amir-9 version, and Hector had no doubt that it was, but goddamn if it didn't still feel like a lifetime was transpiring in the middle of this fight.

Hector swerved out of the way of another slew of lasers, one of which he caught with the shield, making it bounce off and hit into the thin canopy of trees below. One of the poor trees took the full force of it and burst apart, setting the others around it aflame as splintered wood splashed up toward Hector.

A thought struck him, and he didn't hesitate. He dove down lower, into the trees. They wouldn't provide much cover, but some was still better than none. And the forest wasn't too dense. Even going as fast as he was, he didn't worry about crashing.

He wanted to press his sensory advantage--assuming he did indeed have one. If trees made it even slightly more difficult for Banda to keep track of him with his aura sense or whatever the fuck he was using, then that would be enough.

Aha, and the Banda clones were lagging behind now. Not losing track of him, necessarily, but definitely a bit slower to follow.

And he was getting another idea now.

Clones, huh?

Hector couldn't match that trick, but maybe he could pull off a bootleg

As he flew through the trees, he materialized a second copy of his own armor and dumped it behind him, making sure to empower it with his soul. It was just a rough decoy, not at all intricate or accurate, but it didn't need to impress. It only needed to distract. Even if for a split second, that would be enough. Because he intended to make more.

Making them move probably would've helped, but that felt like too much. His attention was already so divided, and he hadn't devoted any serious practice time to armored puppetry. And he didn't have time to mull it over now, either. The decisions were just flying. He had to trust his gut.

He dropped off more rough lumps of armor, all vaguely Hector-shaped, and kept going. The majority of his attention had to remain on the Bandas. Four of them. Still pursuing. Farther behind, sure, but not far enough for his liking.

And this forest wasn't that big, either. Gray Rock wasn't exactly known for its greenery.

Without warning, a massive bed of red spikes shot up from the ground, and Hector barely blocked it in time with the shield. Instead of being completely skewered, he was sent tumbling skyward, back above the canopy again.

Fuck. They were closing in again. All four at once. More attacks trying to smother him.

Still reeling, he didn't bother trying to stabilize again. He just launched himself in the opposite direction and loosed as many molten cubes behind him as he could. They were haphazard and inaccurate, but they just needed to provide some cover for him. To give Banda something to think about.

And he had plenty to spare. Even as he fired, he didn't stop loading new ones up.

These were bigger than the minigun-style bullets he'd shot earlier, but he wasn't trying to make them explode to disperse smoke. In that sense, at least, they were easier to process and churn out.

But something was wrong. Agh. Another laser had clipped his leg. Half of it was gone.

That wasn't the problem, though. That was just a nuisance. Another distraction. No, he had to concentrate. The real problem was that those decoy armors hadn't worked at all. Banda hadn't gotten distracted even a tiny bit.

Another background thought process tried to create itself and search for an answer, even as his mind was already pressed so hard between flight, counterattacking with bombardment, and managing all of his sensory input. Three entire thought processes, each operating with maximum urgency, was already pushing it. A fourth on top of all that, even at a lower intensity, was definitely beyond his limit.

But he needed that answer.

And thankfully, it didn't take him long to realize."

"3193

Even with soul-empowerment, the decoy armors probably hadn't worked for the same reason that the walls from earlier hadn't. Because Banda wasn't just using vision and soul sense in order to track him.

It was aura, almost certainly. The armors had soul power added to them but not aura, and Banda could sense the difference.

So if he wanted such a tactic to work, he'd have to start pressing his aura into his work, as well.

If only he knew how to do that. Or if it was even possible to begin with. Pauline would probably know.

Agh, they were getting close to the city. To civilians. He couldn't keep going this way with Banda hot on his heels.

He swooped right, gradual and curving, aiming to turn back toward Warrenhold.

Red smoke began to materialize ahead of him in large pockets. They were simple enough to avoid, but they were getting closer each time.

Hector understood. Banda was trying to predict where he would be and materialize a deadly cloud right on top of him.

He had to mix up his movements, then. Be unpredictable. Flying in a straight line wasn't smart, but zigzagging everywhere also meant that the four clones chasing after him could catch up more easily. If they just flew straight, they'd have less distance to travel, comparatively.

Not good. His own chaotic movements made it even harder for him to aim his counterattacks. And he very much needed to be more precise with those, not less. It seemed like Banda was barely hindered by the flurry of molten cubes.

Time to change it up, then. No more flurry. Just concentrate and aim. The Amir-10 was mostly regenerated now, so he could take this risk. The closest clone was the best target.

Hector focused. Zeroed in on what the Scarf and Banda's aura were telling him.

The laser beams, exploding javelins, and angry red clouds grew suddenly more furious during the few seconds he eased up on his counterattack. Hector had to spin around and fly backwards so that he could protect himself with the Amir-10.

But he had it. The clone was clear.

He loosed a molten cube right at it, as fast he could make it fly.

It clobbered the clone through the torso. Smoke and fire exploded on impact.

That looked good, but Hector didn't get the opportunity to assess the aftermath, because there were still three more clones to go. He focused on the next closest target as he readied another cube.

But the clones were changing up their tactics now, too. Serpentine movements. Making it harder to aim.

So they were wary of eating another attack like the last one, then. That was good, but this sure wasn't. Damn clones were weaving into each other's flight paths, trying to disorient him even more."

"3194

Hector took aim again while flying backwards. He used precious seconds to focus in on the next clone. More attacks flew in his direction, enough so that he had to change course. With the Scarf, he could just barely sense the deadly red clouds ahead and avoid them.

He loosed another molten cube, but this time he missed. It sailed right passed the intended clone, and he grit his teeth in frustration. He didn't get even a brief reprieve from Banda's assault. If anything, Banda went harder. More lasers, more explosions, more gas.

And more clones. There were four Bandas again.

That wasn't good for his morale. Now it felt like he wasn't even making progress. Like everything he'd done up to now was pointless.

He put it out of his mind, though. How he felt about that didn't matter. Only the fight did. Only protecting Warrenhold.

He could feel Banda's aura more strongly than ever now. Its anger. Its domineering pressure. Its hunger.

Banda didn't just want to win the fight. He wanted to break Hector's spirit. Or put a different way, he wanted his aura to win over Hector's aura.

It was like a thousand invisible hands, all trying to strangle him or hold him. Trying to will him into giving up before the fight was even done.

He'd felt this before. Multiple times, in fact, and not just from Banda. So it didn't bother him.

But it was also more intense than he'd ever felt it before, too. The heat of the battle made it so. Banda's aura was growing feverish. Uncontrolled.

Animalistic.

And before his very eyes, Hector could see that same feeling making itself into a reality. Banda's clones were each shifting more solidly into that chaotic form from earlier, that dinosaur-looking thing. Their movements were becoming more unpredictable, too, as if instinct was taking over.

They weren't thinking and planning, anymore. Not strategizing. Just reacting. Just pursuing. Just trying to satisfy their appetite.

Perhaps these developments could've been good for Hector. If Banda wasn't thinking, then surely it would be easier to outsmart him.

But this deep into the fight, when he was already struggling to not be swarmed and overwhelmed, this might've been the worst possible thing to happen.

Because Banda was getting faster. The clones--the literal raptors--were getting closer. Hector had at least been able to keep ahead of them before with his barely-controlled flying ability, but now that wasn't the case. He could already tell.

Sooner or later, they were going to catch him."

"3195

He had to do something. That much was obvious.

But his mind was already being stretched beyond its limit as he tried to keep track of everything. That much was also obvious, just from instinct alone. It was this tenuous feeling in his head, like his own grip on himself--on his Focus, perhaps--was slipping. If he continued trying to push even further, would it all collapse? Would his Focus break apart? Lose track of everything? Or just destroy his mind entirely?

There was no way to know. But it was a terrifying sensation, as if he were standing at the cusp of a bridge that led into a wall of complete black. A veil into something wholly unknown or even unknowable.

Beyond here, there was no knowledge for, nor hope of, a capacity to return. If he took another step forward, anything could happen to him. He could be changed horrifically forever. He could simply disappear. Be swallowed whole by oblivion.

He didn't fear Banda. He didn't fear the battle. He certainly didn't fear death.

But he did fear this. Whatever it was.

In his head, everything seemed to slow to a crawl as he deliberated. Even his own thoughts felt sluggish, just barely faster than everything else going on around him.

Just barely enough to make a decision.

This fear. It seemed built-in. Part of the deal. He couldn't take that step without acknowledging it. Without accepting it. Ignoring it or trying not to feel it--those things were somehow out of the question.

And a million questions wanted to be asked at once.

Where did this bridge lead? Was this another form of emergence? Was this Focus? Domain? Both? Something else? The Candle's influence? Would he be changed? For the better? For the worse? Did it even matter? Did he have any choice at all?

But he didn't have the mind for any of these questions. Not enough space or awareness left. He only had enough to decide.

And of course he had to do it. The raptors were closing in, practically chomping at his heels. If this meant an opportunity to keep fighting, to protect Warrenhold and Atreya and everyone else, then he had to push onward.

He felt it begin to form. A fifth thread in his mind. A fifth thought process. The first for flight, the second for managing his senses, the third for counterattacking, the fourth for decision-making. And this was the fifth."

"3196

For a moment, everything was suddenly clearer. And slower again, too. But this time, his thoughts didn't feel so sluggish, as if he could step out of the chaos of the battle and assess the entire situation anew, utilizing all of the information being provided to and expended by the other four thought processes.

An extra, heightened layer of both awareness and decision-making combined into one: that is what this seemed to be.

He could think. He was still being overwhelmed, but he could think. What did he need here?

The fifth process could be freed up for another layer of counterattacking, too. But what would that accomplish? What manner of counterattack would help him here? Banda was swarming him.

No. He didn't need an extra attack. He just needed to make his current attacks more precise. He needed them to actually hit and get the raptors off his ass.

So that's what the fifth process went towards. Aiming.

A raptor's claw scraped his shield and gouged out of a chunk of his leg armor. A beam of pure heat followed immediately, barely bouncing off the shield and searing the tip of his helmet. He had to clench his eyes shut in the desperate hope that they wouldn't be burned out of his skull.

But he had a lock. With the Scarf and aura combined, he didn't need his eyes. Plus, it helped that the closest raptor was very close.

The molten cube hit dead center, and the clone exploded into smoke and dropped away from him. Hector didn't hesitate to follow up, either. A second cube, a third. Both already locked on to the second and third raptors.

They hit, though neither was as clean as the first. The second was caught in the raptor's side, tearing a chunk out and leaving a trail of crimson smoke behind, but the monster was still flying. Still chasing. And the third was even better off.

Because it had actually swallowed the cube.

Granted, that raptor didn't look like it was enjoying itself after its meal as it thrashed and vomited up glowing iron, but it still wasn't slowing its pursuit very much at all.

And there was also the fourth, of course. That one was farther back but catching up quickly now.

Hector was tempted to let loose another flurry of cubes again, but no. Precision was the key here. While it might've been a stretch to say that this strategy was truly working, it was definitely doing something. Keeping the bastards off him, at least. Giving him much needed space. He just had to--

The world shuddered. Every thought process flickered at once, blacking out his entire mind for a second."

"3197 -- CCLXXII.

Hector found himself falling and scrambled to catch himself. The flight in his armor had faltered. Reorienting it took precious seconds that he didn't have.

Everything was off. His aim. His senses. His concentration.

His Focus.

And the raptors were closing in again. He'd only staggered for a moment, but that was more than they'd needed.

He tried to lash out, to throw anything he could their way, to buy himself time.

But the world shuddered again. Black. For what felt like even longer this time.

And then he was just tumbling downward. Plummeting. Had he taken another hit? Couldn't even tell. Two raptors were right there in his face.

He saw one of their massive jaws open up and stretch wide enough to swallow him whole. Rows of dagger-sized teeth lined its mouth, and a whirlwind was already sucking him in as Banda inhaled.

And Hector realized that it was too late. The fight was over.

He didn't accept it. He didn't give in. A million thoughts, emotions, and memories flashed through his mind, none of which he could hold onto, in part because he wanted to reject them. Right now, in this terrible instant, he wanted to reject everything.

Because he knew he'd lost.

Chapter Two Hundred Seventy-Two: 'The onlooking Blaze...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

These days, there were a lot of things that didn't make sense to Roman Fullister. Particularly about Hector. In fact, he'd almost given up hope of ever feeling like he would have a true grasp of what was going on with that kid, anymore. The sudden leaps in power and influence? The changes in Hector's general disposition and apparent knowledge base? And the leadership he'd been exhibiting with all these Rainlords?

It was all an ever-expanding enigma.

But what exactly was happening here and now, Roman wondered? He'd done as Hector had told them and returned to the Entry Tower, but with every second that passed, Roman questioned himself and his situation more and more.

He did trust in Hector's judgment, but still... as he thought back to that moment when the young Lord Darksteel had told them what to do, Roman realized that he hadn't questioned Hector's words or decisions at all. Even Voreese wasn't putting up a stink while they waited in here, which was more than a little odd, to say the least.

As he looked over their small group another time, he came to the conclusion that this wasn't right. Even if Hector himself was right, this wasn't. Even if this was the smartest play right now--to wait for Abbas Saqqaf to show up--Roman couldn't just keep sitting in here while Hector was out there fighting, alone."
"3197 -- CCLXXII.

Hector found himself falling and scrambled to catch himself. The flight in his armor had faltered. Reorienting it took precious seconds that he didn't have.

Everything was off. His aim. His senses. His concentration.

His Focus.

And the raptors were closing in again. He'd only staggered for a moment, but that was more than they'd needed.

He tried to lash out, to throw anything he could their way, to buy himself time.

But the world shuddered again. Black. For what felt like even longer this time.

And then he was just tumbling downward. Plummeting. Had he taken another hit? Couldn't even tell. Two raptors were right there in his face.

He saw one of their massive jaws open up and stretch wide enough to swallow him whole. Rows of dagger-sized teeth lined its mouth, and a whirlwind was already sucking him in as Banda inhaled.

And Hector realized that it was too late. The fight was over.

He didn't accept it. He didn't give in. A million thoughts, emotions, and memories flashed through his mind, none of which he could hold onto, in part because he wanted to reject them. Right now, in this terrible instant, he wanted to reject everything.

Because he knew he'd lost.

Chapter Two Hundred Seventy-Two: 'The onlooking Blaze...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

These days, there were a lot of things that didn't make sense to Roman Fullister. Particularly about Hector. In fact, he'd almost given up hope of ever feeling like he would have a true grasp of what was going on with that kid, anymore. The sudden leaps in power and influence? The changes in Hector's general disposition and apparent knowledge base? And the leadership he'd been exhibiting with all these Rainlords?

It was all an ever-expanding enigma.

But what exactly was happening here and now, Roman wondered? He'd done as Hector had told them and returned to the Entry Tower, but with every second that passed, Roman questioned himself and his situation more and more.

He did trust in Hector's judgment, but still... as he thought back to that moment when the young Lord Darksteel had told them what to do, Roman realized that he hadn't questioned Hector's words or decisions at all. Even Voreese wasn't putting up a stink while they waited in here, which was more than a little odd, to say the least.

As he looked over their small group another time, he came to the conclusion that this wasn't right. Even if Hector himself was right, this wasn't. Even if this was the smartest play right now--to wait for Abbas Saqqaf to show up--Roman couldn't just keep sitting in here while Hector was out there fighting, alone."

"3198

He'd already wasted enough time. Before the thought was even fully crystalized in his mind, Roman found himself moving for the exit.

"Mr. Fullister, what are you doing?" said Joana Cortes. "Lord Goffe told us to wait. We should trust his judgment, I think."

Roman turned to look at her. There was no doubt in her expression. No uncertainty. Just stern disapproval.

He didn't want to risk getting into an argument and so decided to fib a bit here. "I'm just going to check on things. If I'm not back in five minutes, please do as Hector said and bury the entrance."

She still looked ready to tell him off, but she merely gave him an admmissive nod.

Huh.

Well, in fairness, that did seem to be the resting face of all these Rainlords. Maybe he'd read her expression wrong.

He decided to hand Garovel's iron orb off to her, as well. The reaper was no doubt in a foul mood and would've preferred to come with him, but that wasn't the sort of risk that Roman wanted to take with someone else's reaper. Didn't feel right.

He proceeded outside, making sure to slide the hulking stone doors shut behind him.

Unfortunately, he realized a bit too late that Voreese had come with him. He gave her a disapproving look but said nothing more. This wasn't the time. And besides, her senses would probably be helpful here.

Because what the hell was even going on out here?

He could hear distant explosions, like an intermittent stream of fireworks, and he could feel the very air trembling now and then, too.

Voreese pointed him in the right direction with her little ethereal wing.

Roman started moving, but he didn't want to rush in headfirst. The goal here was to be helpful, not cause Hector problems by getting in the way. So he made use of the giant iron ""decoy"" castle that Hector had been working on in order stay out of the sight, following the labyrinthine walls in the direction that Voreese showed him.

It took longer than expected. Hector sure made this thing elaborate. And to think it wasn't even finished. Roman could've just hopped over the walls, but he was trying to be careful.

By the time he made it to the exit, he could feel the vibrations in the air more strongly than ever.

Due to the nature of his power, Roman had become a bit more sensitive to such things. He almost didn't need Voreese to guide him, now that he was thinking about it. The sound and vibrations together gave him a relatively clear picture of where the shit was hitting the fan."
"3199

The fight was still quite far away, though. It was definitely happening in the sky above the thin forest ahead, but with the naked eye, all Roman could make out was some specks zipping around and explosions going off.

And again, just rushing in there headfirst didn't seem like the wisest course of action.

'Can you tell who's winning?' thought Roman.

'Not really,' said Voreese privately. 'It's a mess up there. Hmm. Looks like Hector's being chased, though. Uhh. Oh, yeah. You should probably go--'

Roman never liked it when she suddenly cut herself off like that.

'He needs help!' she yelled, touching his arm briefly to invoke his undead strength. 'Go go go!'

It was time to stop hesitating, then.

Roman blasted away from the ground, cracking it with an instant thoom. He didn't hold himself back, going full speed straight away. His body could scarcely handle it as his bones creaked, muscles ached, and blood pooled in his feet. His passive soul defense wasn't quite up to par for this level of intensity, nor would it probably be for many years.

None of that mattered to him now, though. The only thing on his mind was getting to Hector in time.

'He just got eaten!' said Voreese. 'Swallowed whole! Get him out!'

What the fuck? Roman barely had time to process it, because he was already getting close enough to see for himself what was going on.

Not that it helped a whole lot.

There was the enemy. That crazy half-dinosaur looking motherfucker. But he looked even more fucked up than Roman expected.

The guy was twisting and turning over in the air, clutching his morphing head and letting out strained, agonized groans. And as if that wasn't confusing enough, he was shifting in and out between smoke, too. Dinosaur, then man, then smoke, then two at once--or all three, even.

It took Roman a second to regather his wits. He still had some distance left, and it looked like the guy was too busy with whatever existential crisis he was going through in order to notice him.

Lucky. Roman wasn't about to complain. He raised a hand to launch an attack, but another telepathic voice arrived first. One he'd heard before.

'Stop!' said Pauline Gaolanet. And her giant avian form melted out of the air next to him as her talons wrapped around his torso. 'You're too close!' She carried him back the way he'd just come, fast as an airplane."

"3200

""What're you--?!"" He didn't want to hurt her, but he also had to break free. Apparently, these bird feet of hers were pretty damn strong, so he had to put some oomph into it as he thrashed out of her grasp. One of the talons slashed his left arm open in the process, but at least he was flying under his own power again.

'Listen to me!' she yelled. 'Your mind will be shredded from this plane of existence if you go back there!'

Admittedly, that did make him stop and look at her. ""What are you talking about?!"

'It's their auras!' she said, only slightly more calmly. 'They're overlapping. Banda's aura is trying to fully suppress Hector's. Like digesting him. But, uh, I guess it's not going too well for him, because the guy's own aura is on the verge of imploding.'

None of that made sense to Roman. ""Is that good or bad?!"

'Both, maybe?! Mostly bad, though! If you try to get close again, you'll just get caught up in it whatever is about to happen to Banda. In fact, your aura added into the mix might even trigger his to implode! Which would kill all three of you! Or worse, probably!'

""You're not sounding very certain, right now!""

'Look, I don't know exactly what's happening, but I know auras aren't supposed to behave like this! I want to help, too, but we need to stay back until it's safe to approach!'

Roman just growled and looked back toward Banda. The guy was really thrashing up a storm, now.

And vomiting. A lot. And it was glowing, too. Bright orange. Was that Hector's iron? It dribbled out of Banda's mouth, then sputtered out for a second like a choking geyser, then went back to dribbling.

Banda clutched his stomach, which bulged and shrank in turns.

It seemed like a pretty good time to attack, Roman thought, but given everything the bird had just told him, he didn't want to risk it. But what if Banda just regained control? Was that not a much bigger risk?

Agh.

Banda looked his way, and Roman froze up. A sudden chill went all the way down his spine as he locked eyes with the guy from afar.

Even at this distance, Roman could tell. This motherfucker was no joke. Roman had known that, but now he could feel it. Too much so, in fact. It wasn't so different from those few moments when he'd caught a glimpse of Leo in a bad mood. But this was much worse. This was a pure, constant stream of pressure. Not just some little spike of irritation.

This was hatred. Genuine. And not afraid of showing itself. Wanting to show itself, even."

"3201

Roman wasn't about to back down, though. Not because of some evil fuck like this. He didn't care how terrifying the dude was. Hector needed his help.

Banda twitched and bulged again, sudden and violent, but this time he seemed to suppress it. And when his gaze came back to Roman, it was different. Less threatening, somehow.

Less sure.

What in the hell was happening? Was he seeing this wrong, or was Banda actually scared now? And if so, why?

The questions barely even formulated in Roman's mind before being cut off.

Because Banda bolted.

In the complete opposite direction, he started flying away at rocket speed, red smoke trailing behind him.

For the life of him, Roman couldn't understand. This fucking monster was fleeing?

The sheer shock of it made Roman slow to realize and respond. Whatever the reason for it, this was still absolutely horrible. The bastard had Hector in his clutches and was now getting away.

Roman gave chase. It made no sense, but he did.

'The fuck is going on up there?' came Voreese's voice. 'Where the hell are you going?'

'Bastard's running,' said Roman, trying to stay focused on the chase. The guy was damn fast. Even pushing for max speed, Banda was still pulling away from him.

'And you're actually following?' said Voreese. 'What exactly are you thinking you can accomplish?'

'...I don't know,' Roman admitted.

There arrived a long silence.

The sound of the wind roaring in his ears consumed his mind. Mostly because he didn't want to think too much, right now. He already knew how stupid this was. Thinking about it any deeper might just make him lose his nerve, which was something he desperately needed at the moment.

'...You can't win, Roman. That guy and the reinforcements that he's probably falling back to right now are out of our league.' Her usual haughty tone was nowhere to be found. Instead, she sounded soft and somber, as if she were trying to talk him away from the edge of a cliff.

'They sure are,' was all Roman had for her.

At that, Voreese needed another moment to respond. 'And you're going anyway, because it's Hector.'

'He already did the same for me.'

She gave a silent sigh. 'Yes, he did. But you must also know that he wouldn't want you to take this kind of risk for his sake. He would tell you to pull back. In fact, he DID tell you to pull back.'

'Yeah, well, if I always did what he wanted, I'd be his slave, not his friend.'"

"3202

'This is a really stupid thing to do, Roman.'

He couldn't really argue with that. 'Do you actually want me to stop?'

'...Yes. But I get it. Just promise me you'll try and be smart about your stupidity.'

'Heh. Uh, sure.' He wished he could feel as lighthearted about the situation as he did about this conversation. Banda was still shrinking from view. A couple more minutes like this, and Roman might not be able to see him at all, anymore.

'Hurry up, slowpoke.'

Talons wrapped around his torso, and Roman jolted forward, suddenly faster. The flesh on his face distorted as the wind screamed past him, and he was forced to either squint or shut his eyes completely.

He craned his neck up to try and get a look at Pauline, but it was difficult. He could see her wings, rigid and angled, not unlike those of a fighter jet as she carried him across the sky, higher and higher until they neared the clouds.

And soon, Roman realized that she was actually gaining on Banda. They were still keeping their distance, as she'd moved them much higher up, but it didn't seem like Banda was going to get away, now.

Damn. How fast was she going? It was hard to judge, but was this even faster than an airplane? It sure felt like it, but maybe that was just the enormous wind pressure playing tricks on him.

Either way, it was nice that he didn't have to concentrate so hard. He could just wait. And think about his next move.

Which maybe wasn't such a good thing, actually.

Because he had no idea what he was going to do.

--++--++--

For the tenth time today, Raul Blackburn crouch-walked down this long, stony corridor.

He kept pausing. Not out of hesitance or fear, but because he was being mindful of his footsteps. The acoustics throughout Logden Prison made it all but impossible to sneak around without making any noise. The brown-and-black floors were all concrete, as were many of the walls. Each footstep carried far and wide, and guards were everywhere, to boot.

So the trick, he'd decided, was to only move when others were moving--to mask his footsteps in those of the guards.

It had been working well so far. Progress was slow but steady. Thanks to this Invisibility ring, the operation to break out their captive brethren from this prison had not yet escalated into a fight.

Yet, being the key word there."

"3203

There was essentially zero doubt in Raul's mind that it was only a matter of time until things went pear-shaped. That was why he was trying so hard to be careful. The more warriors they could free, the better off they would be once the inevitable battle came.

That was the gist of the plan they'd come up with, anyway.

Simply put, there were far too many guards for nobody to notice so many prisoners going missing. With over four hundred Rainlords needing to be freed and only a handful of Invisibility rings at their disposal, this was an enormous undertaking.

Thankfully, the warriors were actually a bit easier to free than the civilians, because the warriors were mostly just frozen heads. The guards weren't nearly as attentive toward the cold storage rooms compared to all the cells with living people in them.

From their initial scouting of the compound, they'd discovered that an apparent pencil pusher was the primary custodian of cold storage. It was a bespectacled, rail-thin man by the name of Arino. Twice a day, first thing in the morning and the last thing at night, Arino would make a round through each of the cold rooms, check on every frozen captive, and tick the corresponding name off a very long list.

Tedious didn't even begin to describe that man's job. He seemed perfectly content with it, though. Never complaining, always formal and polite toward his coworkers.

Arino wouldn't be the problem. It was the dozens upon dozens of guards around him that would be.

Many of them were servants. In fact, Raul suspected that literally all of them were, but they had no means of confirming that. It could've just been that their reapers were elsewhere, tending to other matters.

That was the trouble with servants. They could pass for civilians easily enough. Raul had taken advantage of that fact himself before, but it sure didn't feel good to be on the other side, becoming sick with paranoia as he wondered who among all these sons of bitches was the most dangerous.

They had very little in the way of intel on the personnel within Logden Prison. He'd hoped that the Ridgemark Private Military Police would be able to help with that, but apparently, Logden was a trouble spot even for them. Activity here was constant, with guards being swapped out all the time. This place was closely linked with the Vantalayan Military Police and its many war fronts."

"3204

According to the RPMP, the VMP used this place as not just a prison but also as either a reward or punishment for the rank-and-file within their own forces. Being given a temporary post here could be considered a reward, since it meant getting away from the frontline fighting and enjoying the incredible mountain vistas, clean air, and decent food.

But it could also be considered a punishment, because certain jobs within the prison were terrible beyond words. Namely, cleaning the sewage system. Not only was it filthy, but it attracted the infamous Vantalayan dung beetles, which were as big as a man's fist and made horrible hissing noises when agitated. Not to mention, they had a tendency to bite. Hard. And such wounds were likely to become infected, of course.

Raul had firsthand knowledge of that, because he'd scouted those godforsaken tunnels already. It was only a minor point of weakness for the prison. There were still plenty of guards down there, mixed in with or even doubled up as part of the cleaning crew. Plus, it was a maze down there. Too easy to get lost. Raul knew the route himself quite well by now, but if he had to guide someone else, that would make things much more complicated.

They hadn't yet gotten around to sneaking out non-combatants, though. There had been much debate about whether it was better to go for them first or save them for last. On the one hand, going for the warriors first would allow for those same warriors to then provide assistance with the operation. But on the other hand, if a fight broke out, the non-combatants might be in more danger if they remained stuck in the prison.

At which point, the fight would become even more complicated.

But ultimately, that was what they had decided to go for. They needed the manpower. And going for the civilians first wouldn't guarantee their safety, either. In fact, a fight might be even more likely to break out.

The real trick, however, was getting to the captive reapers. Logden Prison had a special cell block for them, and the security in that area was far and away the strongest. The most notable guardsmen were stationed there.

The only upside was that gathering intel on those guards was made a bit easier, primarily because the normal guards loved to gossip about them, about the ""monsters of Cell Block Y.""

"3205

There'd been some skepticism at first about whether or not these ""so-called monsters"" were really that much of a threat. After all, what some random guardsmen considered to be monstrous was bound to be different from what Rainlords considered to be monstrous.

But they had been displeased to learn that there were indeed some quite infamous names stationed here, right now.

Niro Blatt was the one that Raul currently had eyes on as he proceeded down the corridor. The guy's cheekbones were sharp enough to cut with, and his beady gaze barely looked human as it passed over Raul's invisible form.

Blatt was mostly known for his habit of making grotesque examples out of his victims. Winning a battle was never enough for him, apparently. He had to put the losers on morbid display via crucifixion and flaying, only occasionally after they were already dead.

Not one to show mercy, in other words.

Raul wanted very much to take this opening and neutralize Blatt here and now. An ambush from behind--right to the neck--would probably do the trick.

But it was a gamble. And not just with his own life, either. If he somehow failed to kill the guy in an instant, then everything would go to hell immediately. Or if another guard rounded the corner at just the wrong time, the same could be said.

So he just watched as the murderous bastard passed him by.

Cell Block Y was absolutely massive. Stairs led up and down in a stadium-like formation, where in place of seats there were cells. Rows upon rows of cells. All tiny, no larger than dog kennels.

But they were all sealed tight. They had to be in order to hold reapers. Any opening would allow their massless bodies to squeeze through.

And with so many cells to choose from, the trouble was finding out where everyone had been placed.

That had been the first task of the infiltration team. They'd scoured the prison for intel regarding prisoner placement.

Thankfully, the wardens of this infernal place were quite good with their recordkeeping. It would've been very easy to get lazy with such things and not bother logging any names. The reapers themselves could also be quite stubborn about that, no doubt. If they gave their captors the silent treatment, then logging would become that much more difficult. And perhaps for that very reason, not everyone was accounted for in the logs they'd found.

Or at least, they hoped that was the reason."
"3206

Plus, there was the very real possibility that the Vanguard had simply not handed over all of their Rainlord prisoners. Raul certainly hoped that everyone would be recovered from this venture, but he and many of the others were trying to temper their expectations. It was already a miracle that they had managed to find any of their kin at all, let alone this quickly. They didn't want to get their hopes up too much.

Apart from the Lord Elroy, perhaps. Raul wasn't sure what to make of that man's state of mind during all this.

In the end, they'd decided that they would eventually free every single reaper they could find, Rainlord or not. It would be too easy to miss someone if they didn't. But before they could reach that point, they needed to be picky. Retrieving the reapers was only going to get harder and harder as time went on, until a full scale battle broke out, so they wanted to exploit the element of surprise for as long as they could.

Thus far, the first reapers to be recovered had been the ones with servants of mid-level strength. Which was helpful, of course, but the real prizes were Wen, Lonogren, and Jostomere. They were the reapers of Octavia Redwater, Rayen Merlo, and Santos Zabat, respectively. Those were the three most powerful Rainlords among those who'd been captured, and it was no coincidence they were each the head of their House.

As far as Raul knew, that had always been the way of things, historically speaking. Rainlords led by strength. It was a relatively rare occurrence for the defacto strongest member of a House to not become the leader.

That was just one more reason why Cousin Melchor was so strange.

Raul had asked the man about it, once. About why he'd repeatedly refused to step into that role.

""Everyone has their place, but not many want to acknowledge it. Too often, people are either overly ambitious or totally insecure. I am neither. I know my worth, exactly. I know what I can do for this family, and I know what I cannot. My role shall always be only to support and advise.""

Even after Ismael's passing, Melchor had again rejected the call.

And many within House Blackburn had not been happy about that. For his part, Raul just tried not to worry about it too much. If the great Cousin Melchor's role was only to support and advise, then Raul's role must've surely been to just do as he was told."

"3207

The nearby footsteps stopped, and so did Raul. With the cloak of his Invisibility ring the only thing keeping him safe here, he couldn't help feeling the anxiety well up as his heart started beating faster. He hated having to wait out in the open. At any moment, it felt like one the guards might just suddenly be able to see him.

When the footsteps returned, he started moving again. He had been trying to make his way downward, to the center of Cell Block Y. That was where the guards were the most heavily concentrated, which in turn implied that their most important prisoners were there.

It was terrifying, to be sure, but he'd prepared for this. Talking with Donald Elias before the operation had helped. The old guy had a way of saying what people needed to hear, Raul thought.

""To successfully tackle a job like this, you need to get a handle on your mindset,"" Donald had told him. ""It's fine to be scared. In fact, that'll help you. Fear will sharpen your senses. So if you feel it, don't suppress it. Lean into it. Use it to your advantage and heighten your concentration.""

Yeah. More guards meant more footsteps. He didn't have to stop. He could just go. All he had to worry about was not bumping into anyone, which was simple enough. Some of these staircases were quite narrow, though, so--

He hit something. It nearly knocked him off balance, and he had to catch himself on the wooden handrail, which trembled under his sudden weight.

He scrambled for understanding. What had he hit? He was looking all around, but he was sure there hadn't been anything there. He hadn't been careless. He'd been hyper focused on every guard around. How could--?

Another Invisibility user?

The realization made his feet move. Away from the staircase. Into an early offshoot of cells, not quite at the bottom of the block.

This wasn't right. He knew there were other Rainlords using Invisibility rings, but they'd coordinated beforehand. None of them should have been here, right now.

That had been one of the problems with the rings that they'd learned about quite early on. Not being able to see each other while wearing them. They'd made a point of working around that.

So who the hell had that been, just now? He hadn't imagined it."

"3208

He needed to calm down and reassess. The guards were all over the place. If he didn't stay vigilant, he'd bump into one of them, too.

It just didn't make sense. Were they employing invisible guardsmen, too? For what purpose, exactly? Or had that been someone else entirely? A third party?

An impossible coincidence, surely.

Raul narrowly avoided bumping into a guard, getting so unintentionally close that he caught a whiff of the guy's cologne.

He finally stopped walking to steady his breath and get his bearings.

He was near the center. He knew that much, at least. The row of cells in front of him were just sitting there, waiting for someone to open them. Rainlord reapers could be in any or all of them. What was this row number? Two? Yeah.

Thinking. Thinking.

According to the intel they'd gathered, two of their reapers should be here. At least two, that was. Wen, Lonogren, and Jostomere had not been logged, but they must have been in here somewhere. If not in row two, then they were probably in row one, down below.

With so many attentive eyes around, though, opening even just one of these cells was going to be difficult. It would also help if he had the keys, but he could probably make do without them.

Hmm. Yeah. As he inspected the sealed doors more closely, he found what he was looking for. Weak points. Not by conventional standards, maybe. But by his? Sure.

Those massive hinges with bolts on them? He could deal with those just fine. A bit of friction manipulation would probably allow him to just slide them right out of their slots like pulling hot dogs out of their packaging. And once the hinges were gone, the door could be cracked opened from the opposite side it was meant to. The lock would likely still prevent it from opening fully, but a crack was all a reaper would need.

That would draw a lot of attention, though. He needed to create a diversion first. But he also couldn't make it too distracting, or else it would alert the whole prison.

Something like a spill might suffice. Maybe a leaky pipe. He'd have to find a good--

""Watch it, fool!""

The sudden voice in Valgan cut through the low murmur of the guards like a knife, drawing his attention back in the direction he'd just come from.

""I didn't touch you! I swear!""

""Well, someone did! Who was it?! Fess up!""

"3209

Raul looked around again. This timing sure was convenient. Could the other Invisibility user be an ally?

Not likely, he decided. Even if it was, how could they have known to cause a distraction at just this moment?

He decided not to waste it, regardless. The cell right in front of him was the quickest and easiest candidate, so he went for it. There were four enormous hinges that he had to take care of. He gripped the topmost one with two fingers and concentrated. Just as he'd hoped, the bolt slid free with barely any effort, then he moved onto the second.

""This isn't funny! Reveal yourself! Whoever you are, touch me again, and I'll kill you!""

Man, that guy sure was sensitive about being touched. Raul did his best to stay on task, though. The third hinge came free.

""It was me.""

The new voice made Raul hesitate, because this time, it wasn't just a voice. It was a feeling, too.

A sudden, overwhelmingly oppressive presence.

And he turned in time to see a man melt into existence out of thin air. He wore sunglasses, flip fops, shorts, and a tropical shirt with barely any sleeves to cover his toned, tanned arms.

Everyone else was staring at him, too.

""Well?"" the man said, taking a step toward the guy who'd been yelling a moment ago. He poked him in the shoulder with one finger. ""You said you'd kill me, didn't you? Sounds like fun. Why don't you go ahead and try?""

From this angle, Raul could only see the profile of the newcomer's face, but combined with that notorious attire, this sinking feeling in his gut, and the images he'd seen of Abolish's top threats, it was enough. Raul knew exactly who that was over there.

That was Vanderberk. One of the most powerful and dangerous servants in the entire world.

Instantly, this situation was changed. The Rainlords had of course already known that Vanderberk was in Vantalay, but he wasn't supposed to be here, at Logden. According to their most recent intel, he was supposed to be on the eastern front, pressing the assault on Czacoa. Raul had heard that information only a day ago.

All of Cell Block Y had fallen dead silent. These guardsmen seemed to know who they were looking at, too.

The guy who'd just been yelling didn't say another word, choosing instead to shrink away from Vanderberk.

Vanderberk smiled. ""Heh. Smart man.""
"3210

It took Raul a bit longer of wide-eyed gawking to come to his senses. 'Vanderberk is in the prison,' he told his reaper, trying not to sound like he was shitting his pants. 'I have eyes on him, right now.'

'Get the hell out of there,' came Arumoro's response.

Raul couldn't think of a proper reply. He couldn't even will his legs to move. Hell, it was hard to even form a complete thought in his head. He just stood there with the fourth bolt in his invisible hand, listening like everyone else.

""Now that I have your attention,"" Vanderberk went on, ""I'd like you all to spread out and search the room very carefully for me. I believe there is a little rat scurrying around here. Invisible to the naked eye, like I was just now.""

Oh no.

""The first one to find this rat for me will be rewarded. Generously.""

'--listening to me?!' Arumoro was saying. 'Raul! Answer me! Are you still--?!'

'I'm okay,' he managed to say. He was still holding the bolt in his hand. Thankfully, it was also made invisible while in his grip. He decided to just pocket it. 'But he knows I'm here. He's having all the guards start searching for an invisible intruder.'

'Get out!'

'Not that simple. They're everywhere.' Quite literally, there was a man standing right behind him.

'Everyone is converging on your location. Cell Block Y, right?'

'No!' said Raul. His feet were finally moving again, though he wasn't sure where they were carrying him other than away from Vanderberk. 'That'll turn into a fight, and it's still too soon!'

'Just try to stay hidden until the others get there.'

He grit his teeth. He couldn't let Arumoro ignore him. 'Tell everyone to wait! I'm fine for now! I'll let you know if and when I need help!'

'Raul, don't be--'

'Everyone is riding on this! Don't screw it up just because you're worried about me! We both know I'm not that important! And stop distracting me, too! I have to focus!'

And thankfully, the reaper said nothing more. Raul had no idea if he would actually listen to him about the backup, though.

For some godforsaken reason, he found himself heading down the nearest staircase instead of up it, where the exit was. He was going to row one.

He didn't know why. He was just moving. Barely thinking. Which probably wasn't a good thing, but it was helping him stay calm, at least. Kind of.

He could see all the guards searching around now. Spreading out. Feeling around at the empty air. Hoping to just randomly bump into him, he supposed."
"3211

He stopped in front of the nearest cell. He craned his neck as a guard's hand hovered past his face. Raul could see some of the others resorting to using their powers, materializing clouds of smoke and dust. Fortunately, it seemed to be making matters worse for them, not better. All the extra crap in the air was conflicting with each other and confusing things further.

For now, at least.

Frankly, considering how many of them there were, the situation already seemed quite hopeless to Raul. He had a rather strong feeling that they were going to find him sooner or later. Probably sooner.

The reaper cells were an option. The only problem was how small they were. And how much attention it might draw if a cell door opened by itself.

But maybe he could use them to trick the guards. That was why he was already setting to work, loosening the hinges of this new cell door in front of him.

He didn't pull the bolts all the way free, though. He just wanted them primed for a sudden release. First, he stepped carefully away from the door and went to work on the next one over, still needing to dodge grasping hands.

Soon enough, the second door was primed, too, and he moved onto the third.

He had no idea how many he should go for. Planning at this stage wasn't really an option for him. He was just going. When the time felt right, he'd make all the bolts fall out at once.

He heard a commotion on the other side of the block, but the dust and clouds were so thick over there that they he couldn't tell what was going on. From the sound of the yelling, it seemed like a fight might've broken out.

For a moment, he thought it might've been his kin. But no, the dust soon dissipated, he saw instead that it was just a couple of arguing guards.

More dust arrived, this time right on top of him.

Not good. It was still pretty disorienting with so many others around, but still. They might actually be able to see him now.

He went prone. Flat on his belly, he resorted to crawling. Most of the guards were looking around at eye level or even above the cells, perhaps thinking he might be perched on top of one.

This position wasn't bad but still far from ideal. Spidering his way across the stony floor didn't make it any easier to avoid bumping into these damn guards. So many moving legs. It was just matter of time until--

He bumped into someone.

""Hey, what was that?!""

"3212

Raul didn't stop to take stock of the damage. Instead, he scrambled faster and then did something drastic in order to conceal his mistake.

He slapped his hand down on the floor and turned it into an almost frictionless plane. Everywhere within the bottom layer of the cell block--save right beneath himself--became more slippery than an ice rink.

Immediately, guards started toppling all around him, falling over themselves and each other, creating utter chaos out of an already hectic circumstance.

It definitely got the job done, though. Everyone was sufficiently distracted.

He took the opportunity find an isolated corner and, again using his ability, skitter straight up the wall.

This trick was always hell on his palms. The increased friction may have provided sticking power, but it did nothing to counterbalance the weight of his entire body yanking against his skin. Plus, he had to alternate the friction on and off quickly, else he'd either get stuck in place or start to fall.

Thankfully, he'd thought to wear gloves, which made the trick slightly more difficult but also painless. An entirely worthwhile trade off.

He scurried up on to the row of reaper cells and then perched there. The view was quite good of the mayhem he'd just created. It was like a scene out of a silent comedy, dozens of men bumbling into one another, struggling to find their footing and repeatedly being unable to.

The guards who were higher up in the block quickly took notice, but they didn't seem to know what was happening or what to do about it.

Raul couldn't help feeling quite pleased with his work, but he needed to keep moving while the distraction was still working. He saw a line up to the next row and decided to go for it.

'Status, Raul,' came Arumoro's voice.

'Still fine,' he said.

The reaper probably wanted to say more but didn't.

The distraction below was working wonders now. He considered doing it again on the second and third rows as he passed them, but his instinct was telling him that it would give his position away. He couldn't tell where Vanderberk was, but he had a feeling that the man had gone invisible again.

He reached the fourth row, and it seemed like his head was finally working right. He could see an exit. It wasn't far. He could reach it. And he was actually heading toward it, this time, instead of going in the wrong direction. That was certainly an improvement."

"3213

He scaled another wall up to row five, then six, had to pause in between some more befuddled guards, then kept pressing. Seven, eight.

And then he found himself stuck. Completely.

No matter how hard he flexed his muscles or tried to move, he couldn't. He just trembled ever so slightly in place.

""Tsk, tsk, so close."" It was Vanderberk's voice, only a meter or so away by the sound of it. Raul couldn't even turn his head to be sure. Not that it would've mattered much, because a few moments later, Vanderberk melted into view right in front of him. ""Neat little trick back there. Quite the annoying power you've got. Mind telling me your name?""

Even if he could have, Raul had no intention of answering that.

And at this point, he knew he should inform Arumoro that he'd been caught. Operationally speaking, it was the standard procedure.

But if he did that, he knew that his kin would come storming in here like a whirlwind, and utter chaos would ensure. He didn't know if they could take down Vanderberk. A part of him thought, yeah, maybe they could.

However, he wasn't worth taking that risk. He wasn't worth much of anything, really. Just a nameless fool who could barely ever do anything right.

Vanderberk blinked and snapped his fingers. ""Ah, right, sorry. Here.""

And Raul felt the pressure surrounding his jaw slacken. The rest of his body was still stuck fast, though.

He elected not to make use of his newfound freedom.

""Mm, the silent treatment, eh? That won't do. I like to play with my food, you know. I'm a bit famous for it, in fact. So come on. Play with me, and maybe you'll get to live a little longer. Not a bad trade, right?""

Well. Raul did like to talk. ""Shouldn't you be over in Ridgemark or Czacoa, right now?""

The man smiled. ""Oh? What makes you say that? Been listening to some misinformed little birdies, have we? Good to know my efforts weren't wasted, then.""

Hmm. Maybe a bit of goading would prove useful here. ""The Jailer of Ridgemark is going to tear your forces apart without you there to help them.""

""Tsk. Y'know, I was kinda hoping he would be HERE, actually. Would only make sense, right? The Jailer? In a jail? Guess that would've been TOO fitting, huh? Hehe. Unless you're just trying to trick me, and he actually IS here. That'd be a real treat.""

"3214

""Well, at least you're in good spirits about it,"" said Raul.

""What, you think I'd be some kind of sourpuss? Some kind of Negative Nancy? Never. Now why don't you go ahead and identify yourself for me, hmm? Undo your Invisibility and lemme get a good look at ya. Pretty please?""

Huh. So this guy couldn't actually see through the Invisibility? How had he been able to catch him, then? ""I would, but you see, I'm terribly shy. And ugly, besides. I'd hate to scar you with the shocking ghastliness of my visage.""

Vanderberk chuckled. ""What if I promise not to make fun of you, no matter how hideous you are?""

""Ah. A kind offer, but I don't think so.""

""Hehe. Unfortunately, I'm afraid I really must insist.""

""And I'm afraid I must insist right back. Counter-insist, if you will.""

""You're pretty funny for a Rainlord.""

At that remark, Raul had no words. His mind froze up. So the bastard already knew.

""I didn't think you people had a sense of humor. Every time I've encountered one of you in the past, you always came across as such wet blankets. Which maybe was appropriate, given your namesake, eh?""

Still, Raul didn't know what to say. Did Vanderberk really know who they were? Or was he just guessing? Either way, Raul didn't want to confirm or deny anything.

""Why so quiet all of a sudden, friend? You were so chatty a moment ago. Could it be that you didn't realize how much I knew about you?"

Hope I didn't say anything too off-putting.""

He had to respond, Raul knew. ""...You sure sound confident about your information.""

""I do, don't I? But then, I'm a confident guy. One of my better qualities, I'd say. Which is saying a lot, because I have many good ones.""

Damn. Raul wanted to at least learn something useful from this situation, but Vanderberk wasn't giving much away. ""What makes you think I'm a Rainlord?""

""Multiple things, not the least of which is the fact that my boys have been duking it out with you guys for weeks, now. You didn't think your skirmishes with Croll would go unreported, did you? You woulda needed to kill him during your first encounter for that to be the case. Oh, and there's also the small detail of a whole buncha Rainlords being held here as prisoners. Doesn't take a genius like me to connect those particular dots, though it does help.""

So he already knew about the prisoners, too.

Fuck."

"3215

""That doesn't make much sense to me,"" Raul tried. ""Guy like you? Don't you have more important things to do than worrying over a bunch of prisoners?""

Vanderberk's gaze turned away for a moment, looking all the way behind him at the cell block's exit before coming back to Raul. ""Must be a real tough situation for you all, huh? Believe it or not, I actually sympathize. Getting betrayed by the Vanguard like that? Hehe. First time? That's always the roughest, isn't it?""

Raul didn't know what he was listening to, but it wasn't quite as horrible as he'd been expecting. Yet. And that was somehow more worrying, in its own way.

""You wouldn't happen to be an authority figure among your kin, would you?""

Raul made no response.

Vanderberk gave a nod as if the silence was answer enough. "I suppose if you were, you'd be putting up more of a fight already." He snapped his fingers again. "Maybe this is for the best. Do you think you could pass along a message for me?"

Oh god. Still, Raul was unsure and chose to say nothing.

"I'll take that as a yes. Tell whoever's in charge that I'd like to negotiate. That I'm open to a ceasefire. And maybe even the release of your prisoners, if you play your cards right. No fighting necessary. You go ahead and tell them that."

Raul couldn't believe what he was hearing. This guy, Vanderberk of Abolish, was infamously known for his cruelty, malice, and just generally for being the biggest asshole on the face of Eleg. Arguably, even Morgunov himself was not as widely reviled as this man right here.

And yet, he wanted to talk about a ceasefire? When he already seemed to have so much of an advantage with all these prisoners at his disposal?

It made no sense.

But then, it was also not Raul's role to dwell on or decide these things.

'Um, Arumoro?'

'Yes?'

'I'm speaking with Vanderberk, right now, and he's saying that he wants to negotiate for a peaceful resolution.'

'I'm sorry, what?'

He had to reiterate. Even after the second time, the reaper still didn't seem like he quite understood, and Raul didn't blame him.

'...Okay, just, uh, give me a minute,' said Arumoro. 'I have to bring this to the others.'

'Take your time,' said Raul, sighing quietly through his nose."

"3216

At length, Vanderberk seemed to be growing impatient. ""Well? This silent treatment isn't my favorite thing in the world. Are you passing my message along or what?""

But even that, Raul did not wish to concede. In the quite likely event that this was all some kind of twisted bullshittery on Vanderberk's part, Raul didn't want to admit to anything. So instead, he decided to take a bit of initiative and ask, ""Why do you want to negotiate? That's quite atypical for Abolish.""

Vanderberk was sounding less jovial and more annoyed, however. ""Are you asking just to stall for time, or is that an actual question on behalf of your elders?""

""Maybe a little of both?""

The man returned a flat look.

Perhaps now was not the time for cheek. Raul couldn't entirely help himself, though. Not when he was already pretty much screwed here. Might as well try and have some fun with it, he thought. ""Look, dude, you're not exactly known for your sterling reputation. You really expect anyone to take you at your word when you say stuff like that?""

Vanderberk's gaze drifted over to a crowd of guardsmen who were beginning to gather, despite still looking quite confused. ""So you're refusing to negotiate, then?""

""I didn't say that,"" said Raul. ""But without some sort of logical explanation behind this sudden, uncharacteristic behavior from you, it'll be pretty difficult to negotiate in good faith, ya feel me?""

""Uncharacteristic?"" said Vanderberk. ""You don't know the first goddamn thing about me. All you know is what you've been told. You have no idea what's characteristic of me and what's not.""

""I s'pose there's truth to that, but I've heard some pretty horrible things about you. You tryin' to tell me they're not true?""

At that, Vanderberk paused and looked over Raul's invisible form again, perhaps searching for his eyes. ""Well. Who can say what's true, really? I mean, what even is truth, when you get down to it?""

Yeah, this guy was definitely full of shit.

Thankfully, Arumoro's silent instruction finally arrived. 'Ask him his terms.'

'There's no way we can trust anything this dude promises us.'

'We know. Just ask him. And try to be careful with your wording. You're speaking as the voice of all Rainlords, right now.'

Arumoro sure knew how to pile on the pressure. 'Okay...'

'If you're uncertain of anything, ask me first.'

'Right.' Somehow, Raul felt like he'd just been given the worst promotion in the world."

"3217 -- CCLXXIII.

Chapter Two Hudred Seventy-Three: 'When thy Domain holds true...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector hit the ground with a rolling thunk and then slid for a long while. He didn't have the presence of mind for much of anything. His thoughts were too clouded, too amorphous, like he was half-asleep and just on the verge of waking up.

Man, he was tired. A bed sure would've been nice, right about now. Yeah. A bed. Not whatever this was beneath him.

Whatever this was? Mm. Didn't feel like dirt. Not rock, either.

No, it felt metallic, actually. Hard and flat and instantly familiar. Extremely familiar, in fact.

Ugh.

He tried to find his hands and feet, and while he was reasonably sure that they were there, everything felt off. He reached out with the Scarf for some semblance of awareness, balance, or anything, really--but no. It told him nothing.

Which was beyond strange.

He couldn't breathe, either. His lungs were not pleased with him.

Panicking within his chest, they were struggling to make the rest of his body do the same. If he wasn't undead, he surely would've been freaking out already. It didn't take long for those same lungs to settle down, though.

As he suffocated to death, that was.

Hmm. His thoughts could settle on the peculiarity of that, at least.

At length, his palms found the ground and pressed flatly thereupon as he prepared to push himself up. Yeah. That was definitely metal under him. Moreover, it wasn't just any metal.

It was iron. Somehow, he could just tell. The feel of it. The presence of it. As if it belonged to him. But he didn't remember materializing it.

He sat up into a cross-legged position and looked around. He was not prepared for what he saw.

A vast, barren landscape lay before him in all directions, flat and shiny as far as the eye could see, beneath a pitch black sky, save for one blazingly bright source. So bright, in fact, that it had to be the sun. But how could the sun be up while the rest of the sky was so dark? What's more, the sun even appeared to be in the middle of setting, as well. How could it still be that bright when half or more of it was already below the horizon? He had to turn his back to it before his eyes could fully cease squinting.

Hector could see his skin cooking under its brutal rays, too. Good thing he was already dead and hadn't noticed that pain while he was suffocating. That was really going to sting later, though, no doubt.

He tried to focus, though it was difficult. What in the hell was going on, right now?"

"3217 -- CCLXXIII.

Chapter Two Hudred Seventy-Three: 'When thy Domain holds true...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector hit the ground with a rolling thunk and then slid for a long while. He didn't have the presence of mind for much of anything. His thoughts were too clouded, too amorphous, like he was half-asleep and just on the verge of waking up.

Man, he was tired. A bed sure would've been nice, right about now. Yeah. A bed. Not whatever this was beneath him.

Whatever this was? Mm. Didn't feel like dirt. Not rock, either.

No, it felt metallic, actually. Hard and flat and instantly familiar. Extremely familiar, in fact.

Ugh.

He tried to find his hands and feet, and while he was reasonably sure that they were there, everything felt off. He reached out with the Scarf for some semblance of awareness, balance, or anything, really--but no. It told him nothing.

Which was beyond strange.

He couldn't breathe, either. His lungs were not pleased with him. Panicking within his chest, they were struggling to make the rest of his body do the same. If he wasn't undead, he surely would've been freaking out already. It didn't take long for those same lungs to settle down, though.

As he suffocated to death, that was.

Hmm. His thoughts could settle on the peculiarity of that, at least.

At length, his palms found the ground and pressed flatly thereupon as he prepared to push himself up. Yeah. That was definitely metal under him. Moreover, it wasn't just any metal.

It was iron. Somehow, he could just tell. The feel of it. The presence of it. As if it belonged to him. But he didn't remember materializing it.

He sat up into a cross-legged position and looked around. He was not prepared for what he saw.

A vast, barren landscape lay before him in all directions, flat and shiny as far as the eye could see, beneath a pitch black sky, save for one blazingly bright source. So bright, in fact, that it had to be the sun. But how could the sun be up while the rest of the sky was so dark? What's more, the sun even appeared to be in the middle of setting, as well. How could it still be that bright when half or more of it was already below the horizon? He had to turn his back to it before his eyes could fully cease squinting.

Hector could see his skin cooking under its brutal rays, too. Good thing he was already dead and hadn't noticed that pain while he was suffocating. That was really going to sting later, though, no doubt.

He tried to focus, though it was difficult. What in the hell was going on, right now?"

"3218

He recalled being eaten. Devoured whole by the monstrous form of Banda Toro.

The sudden recollection hit him like a ton of bricks, and he became frantic. He had to get back. Warrenhold was unprotected. Banda was going to rip through it and kill everyone. He had to go back. Wherever the fuck this was didn't matter, right now. He just had to return.

It took him a while to settle down again. And when he finally did, it was mainly because he just didn't know what the hell to do.

No amount of freaking out about it was going to help his situation, it seemed. He was stuck.

He needed to think. Reassess.

So he'd been eaten. But this didn't exactly look like the inside of a stomach, now did it? And why was there no air, either?

He stood up and looked across the landscape another time, inspecting it more carefully this time, searching for signs of something or someone or... anything at all. Anything for his eyes to latch onto.

But there really was nothing, he soon realized.

It was just flat ground out there, all the way to the horizon.

Well.

Flat iron.

The ground was iron.

Why was the ground iron? And why did it feel like materialized iron?
Like his iron?

It was a supremely odd sensation. The familiarity was at once comforting and unsettling. There was SO much iron. Far more than his volume limit would ever allow him to materialize, surely. Even if he achieved emergence a dozen more times, he doubted he would ever be able to create this amount.

Did that mean he couldn't materialize any more of it in this place?
Because he was already capped out?

No harm in trying, he figured. Wasn't like he had any other leads to go on. He raised a hand and tried to summon a cube into it.

And for the second time, he was not prepared for what he saw. Not at all.

A cube did indeed appear, but not by materializing in his hand. Instead, a cube broke itself out of the flat ground in front of him and hovered over at a leisurely pace. As soon as his eyes locked onto it, though, it stopped dead in midair--or mid-space, rather.

It just floated there, suspended above the ground. Waiting.

On him?

For a while, Hector just kept staring at it, too confused to do or think anything else."

"3219

The cube had removed itself from the ground. It hadn't materialized. It had already been there.

His brain needed time to process that. His materialized iron hadn't materialized.

What in the world did that mean? If he wasn't materializing, then what was he doing?

Wait, was this a dream? He did feel pretty numb, though that was probably because he was already dead.

And wait a second. He'd been horrifically wounded in that fight with Banda, hadn't he? Entire limbs missing, as he recalled. But he was looking at them now, and here they were, already having regenerated. When had that happened, exactly?

So many questions.

And before he got too much further into dwelling on them, he figured that he should probably try to contact Garovel again. He was fairly certain that he tried earlier when he was freaking out, but he decided to try again anyway, now that he was calmer.

'Garovel? You there?'

He waited. And kept waiting.

'Garovel?'

No response arrived.

That wasn't good. It wasn't entirely unprecedented for him, however. He'd bumbled his way into pocket dimensions before.

With surprising frequency, now that he was thinking about it.

There was the Shards, the Candle, and then whatever that weird dream state was where he'd been able to talk to Rasalased. Either way, he was pretty sure that he hadn't been able to talk to Garovel in any of those, either.

Though, maybe he just hadn't tried? He couldn't remember.

Whatever this place was, it was definitely different from those other ones. For one thing, he could actually see stuff. With his actual eyeballs. Which felt dry as hell and like they might have been slowly boiling out of his head, but for the moment, at least, they were still working. He was again thankful for his numbness.

Regardless, the rules here were clearly quite strange. Materialization was strange. So strange, in fact, that he felt like he couldn't even call it materialization, anymore.

This felt more like telekinesis, Hector thought. Which was a peculiar thing to think, perhaps, because he wasn't even sure that he understood how telekinesis even worked, really. He'd only glimpsed it in action because of the wrobels.

Hmm. If he had to articulate his thoughts more fully to himself, then telekinesis was simply the ability to make objects move with psychic force. Like levitating a book or turning its pages, as he'd seen Hanton do.

But as he kept thinking about it, Hector wondered if that was really what was going on here. It seemed more than a little weird that he would've suddenly developed psychic powers for no apparent reason."
"3220

He wasn't just moving the iron around, either. He was breaking it away from the otherwise solid ground. Changing its shape. Its structure.

Could he still affect its temperature, too?

He gave the iron cube an emotional command, demanding it to become hot, and sure enough, it soon came alive with a fiery glow.

Wow.

Not only could he affect the temperature, he could do it in real time. He didn't have to pick a new chunk of iron to "materialize," first.

He continued messing around with the iron for a time, wanting to test various things.

This was just straight up manipulation, Hector decided after a while. Not iron materialization. Iron manipulation. He could move it all about as he pleased, change its shape or state of matter. He could even connect two separate chunks and have them blend seamlessly into one solid piece. That feat in particular was something that he'd only wished he could do with materialization.

He eventually started to wonder if there was anything he couldn't do to it here.

This was utterly ridiculous to him. The kind of power that he could wield in this place... it boggled his mind, quite frankly. So many options. So much potential. Overwhelmingly so.

In a weird way, perhaps the limitations of the real world were kind of helpful. The restriction allowed him to problem solve more easily. With this, it was like... he didn't even know where to begin. 'Paralyzed with choice,' was what they called this type of thing, wasn't it?

Crazy.

The thought also crossed his mind that this might be some type of super emergence, but he just couldn't convince himself of that. Emergence was only supposed to increase his volume limit and make difficult tasks easier. It wasn't supposed to add completely new features like this. Plus, he hadn't felt any kind of noticeable "response" from his iron like he usually did. And if this had been a "super" emergence, then surely the response should have been more pronounced than ever, no?

He stuck on those thoughts and questions for a while. Something in that line of reasoning was bothering him. Something that he felt like he was taking for granted.

The response. The emergent response.

He felt like he understood it, but... actually, that wasn't true at all, was it?

What really was "the response" that he felt during emergence, anyway? It came from his iron? Did he know that for sure? How? And if so, why? Why did it come from his iron?"

"3221

He ended up sitting down and mulling things over for a while. There were about a million things that he could concentrate on or worry about, right now, but he wanted to focus on only one or two at a time. Maybe if he could come to a better understanding of his iron, then he would also come to a better understanding of whatever the hell this place was. And how to get out of here, hopefully.

Yes. He was sure that the emergent response came from his iron. The more he thought back on those moments, the more certain he became. He remembered the feeling so vividly each time. Coursing through his whole body for a brilliant instant. A flash of realization amid an electric surge.

He'd always kind of assumed that, ultimately, the response came from within himself. That the emergent power had always been there and just needed to be brought forth. Or something along those lines.

But perhaps that was a wrong assumption. Or an oversimplification, at least. If this place was the true home of his iron, then maybe the response wasn't coming from within. Maybe it was coming from here.

From this world of iron.

Or maybe this world was within him? Now there was a confusing idea. Did this world of iron exist within his own mind? Or his soul? And if that was the case, then how had he ended up here? Trapped in his own head? What sense did that make?

Hmm. Well, if he was in a realm of his own making, then it would logically follow that he wasn't actually trapped here. He just had to figure out how to free himself.

Unless... this wasn't a world of his own making at all.

Perhaps, instead, this place had always existed, and materialization merely allowed him to tap into it. To borrow its strength.

That... was more believable to him, somehow. Moreso than being trapped in a pocket dimension of his own unconscious creation, at least.

He wanted to reach out to Rasalased, but when he opened his mouth, no words came out. Because there was no air, he remembered. Right. The sound of his voice had no medium through which to be carried.

It was weirdly easy to forget that.

He tried reaching out telepathically, instead. Still no luck, though.

Eh, maybe it was for the best. He had a feeling that Rasalased either wouldn't know much or would be his typically cryptic self. Though, in fairness, the Dry God did seem to be getting a bit better about that, recently."

"3222

He needed to gather his thoughts. What was his priority, right now?

Getting back to the real world? That did seem like the most important thing, but without having any idea of where to start working that problem, it did not strike him as a solvable one.

But hmm. How did he get here to begin with? By getting eaten? Did that even explain anything?

Well. Actually. Hmm.

Banda had obviously been able to eat way more than his own body weight. And as he recalled, Bloodeye was the same way. The guy had literally pulled missiles out of his stomach.

So... was this how they were doing it? Was this place their own, personal storage dimension or something?

That would explain things, but for one snag.

There was nothing here but iron. No missiles or acid or anything else.

Then, maybe... maybe instead, this was just one of many elemental worlds. And all the things they ate were broken down to said elements for the purpose of storage? Which would mean... that when they pulled things out of their stomach, those things were being reassembled from their base elements?

Huh. If that was the case, then maybe Banda could still yack him back up. In fact, that last part was almost certain to be true, Hector felt. He could've been mistaken about everything else, but Banda had to be able to retrieve him, just like those missiles from Bloodeye.

Problem was, Banda had control. If and when Hector ever returned, it would be at Banda's whim.

...Right?

Hmm. Could it be possible to force Banda to return him?

Looking around at the empty landscape one more time, he supposed there was no harm in trying. He just wished he could think up a better plan of action than trying to get himself puked back into reality.

So he set to work.

It was time to really test the limits of power in this place. If the goal was to make Banda barf, then the only thing to do was to start creating havoc here. He had no real reason to believe that Banda would actually be impacted by anything he did in this world of iron, but at this point, it felt like his only hope.

Hector brought all of his concentration to bear, wanting everything this world could give him. He aimed to lift the entire horizon. If it truly was iron all the way out there, then he intended to see it move.

And it did."

"3223

An earthquake arrived. An ironquake. And he felt everything shift, more violently than expected, as if the iron was eager to listen.

A mountain shot up in the distance, cracking the world apart and sending visible chunks of iron spiraling into the black sky like a volcanic eruption.

At the sight of all that, he fell on his ass and lost his concentration. He hadn't expected it to be so easy, and even the ground beneath him was still trembling for a long while after being allowed to set itself back down.

Hector was in awe.

Was his power really unlimited in this place? It sure felt like it.

He'd been so determined to create chaos only a moment ago, but now, as he lay there, feeling the lingering vibrations in the ground, he found himself questioning many things about his ability again.

If he wasn't more careful, he might accidentally kill himself.

Wait a minute.

...There was no way that would send him back to reality, right?

Agh. It might. But could he risk it? If it didn't work, then he'd really be fucked.

Yeah. That had to be reserved for his last resort, once he was all out of other ideas. For the moment, at least, he still had plenty more he wanted to try.

The main thing that was coming to his mind now was a result of his gaze falling upon his left hand.

His melting left hand.

That didn't seem good. All in all, he still felt perfectly fine and numb. But he wondered for how much longer. Would he eventually just dissolve into nothingness if he stayed here? He rubbed his chin and found it just as bad, able to feel his bare chin bone there. Kind of. The numbness made him slightly unsure, but it definitely didn't feel right.

He erected a quick iron barricade for protection against the still-setting sun's punishing rays. He doubted it would do very much, but it was better than nothing, he supposed.

There was another reason he'd looked at his left hand, though. A reason related to his ability.

With his left hand, he could materialize Haqq's shield, the Amir-9.

Up to now, he'd only been thinking about his iron, but he was suddenly very curious. How did the shield work in this place? Could he even summon it, still?

He tested it at once."

"3224

Something did indeed materialize. However, it was not a shield.

Instead, a blob appeared, dark and metallic in its sheen. It glooped onto the ground and began to slowly spread out like spilled pudding.

Very thick, black pudding.

...Huh.

That didn't seem right.

For a while, he just kind of stared at it, scratching his head and trying to understand what was happening. He crouched down for a closer look.

He was momentarily fearful that this black goop was not even his own material, that it was something else. It reminded him of not just the giant worms in the Undercrust but also those weird things he'd seen in his vision within the Candle. And maybe the Beast of Lorent, too.

But no. This wasn't any of those things, thankfully. The metallic shimmer was a very noticeable difference, for one thing.

And for another, he could just tell. He could sense it. As with his iron, it felt like it belonged to him. It had a familiarity to it.

Something was obviously wrong, though, if it was showing up like this. Why hadn't it materialized into its normal form?

In fact, this was doubly strange because he'd never even been able to make the metal of the Amir-9 into any other shape. But now he did it unintentionally?

Certainly, this place must have been the cause. How weird.

After a moment of deliberation, Hector wondered if perhaps his concentration was the issue. When it came to the Amir-9, he never had to think about it. At this point, the thing was so easy and immutable in his mind that it almost made itself, sometimes. Perhaps he'd just gotten it into his head that, because it couldn't even be changed, there was nothing even to think about.

In a way, he supposed the shield had come to feel more like an extension of his own body than an actual skill within materialization.

Hmm.

As he was about to annihilate the flattening blob and try again, however, he noticed something else.

The iron ground beneath the blob looked a little different. Maybe it was weird lighting or his own dissolving eyeballs, but it looked different.

Instead of annihilating the blob, he tried instead to move it around like he could with the iron here.

The blob just sloshed a little to the left and right, sluggish and not quite as he had imagined it to in his mind. But it had moved, at least.

Strange.

He tried again, more forceful this time, trying to push it far away from himself, to send it flying, even.

It hardly budged."
"3225

Disappointed, Hector decided to try other things. Temperature manipulation was the first on his list.

That proved flatly impossible. With the iron, he could make it glow white hot without even remaking it. But this goop just stayed pitch black. He supposed that made sense, though. He'd had a lot more trouble learning temperature manipulation back in the real world than he had with velocity states.

What about something easier, then?

Simple shapes.

He wanted it to become a box. He concentrated hard, envisioning the exact form in his mind.

And it took a little while, but it did it. The goop gathered itself up and turned itself into a box with sharp, pristine edges. The sheen was even more pronounced now with its perfectly flat sides.

Heh. Cool. Hector couldn't help feeling pleased with himself.

Then he noticed the ground again. The goop had compacted itself so much that the ground that had previously been beneath it was now much more visible.

And it was changed. Darker like the goop. At first, he'd thought it was just a shadow, but no, upon a more thorough inspection, the iron itself had indeed gotten darker.

Had the Amir-9's goop... infected it? Transformed it?

Hector wasn't sure what to think.

Could this be... a good thing?

He tried to move the darker iron and found it similarly difficult.

Equally difficult, in fact.

Just as with the goop, he could manipulate its shape, but not without effort. He made this one a pyramid.

Then his vision flickered.

Uh-oh.

His eyes still didn't hurt at all, but they were probably not going to last much longer. And without any idea of how to get out of here or to help them, he wanted to start panicking.

But he didn't.

This place, it had a weirdly comforting presence to it. All this iron, all his iron--it felt too warm and welcoming. And besides, he'd already panicked earlier. It hadn't achieved anything before, and it wouldn't do so now.

So instead, he just closed his eyes, as if to ready himself for the darkness. Maybe that would protect them. Maybe it wouldn't. Either way was fine.

He was calm.

He was concentrating.

He was reaching out, trying to listen to all of his senses. No air for sound. No tactile feeling for touch. No eyes for vision.

And yet he was not without faculty. He could still sense the iron all around him. And the black stuff, too, actually. It was similar, yet distinct."

"3226

It was almost like the world itself was speaking to him. Trying to tell him all about itself.

And he wanted to listen. Despite everything else going through his head, all the concerns about what was happening back in the real world or how he was ever going to get out of this place, his foremost thought right now was to listen.

If the iron wanted to talk, then he needed to let it.

It was just so difficult, though. Like a whisper that he couldn't quite make out or a picture that he couldn't quite comprehend, Hector kept struggling there in his mind.

Man, he sure wished he could breathe. Controlling his breath was one of the best ways of controlling his focus, so without it, he felt like a key ingredient was missing.

Nothing for it, though. He had to push through. Learn something new, perhaps. A previously untried method of training. Of meditation.

Yes. That was the correct mindset. This wasn't a problem. It was an opportunity. For growth.

And besides, he'd experienced similar things before. Disembodied forms where breathing wasn't a factor, either. The only thing that made this different was that he wasn't technically disembodied, this time.

In fact, that may have been the difficulty here. The bodily senses were a distraction, in their own way. Meditating in Rasalased's pocket dimension had actually been quite easy, compared to this.

Agh, he was getting distracted.

A clear mind would help him listen. Meditation wasn't always about having a clear mind, but in this instance, it most certainly was.

He felt himself sit down. A smooth and easy motion. Right next to the cube and pyramid. They were both there. He could feel their presence.

Waiting for attention from him.

But they were formless. They didn't really have minds of their own, desires of their own. He could tell that much for certain, now. It was more like... they were a detached part of himself.

He was beginning to understand. They didn't need commands. They just were. If he tried to treat them like his normal iron, it wouldn't work very well. Ever. It would be a slow, difficult process, not unlike how his own body required consistent effort and exercise in order to slowly and difficultly change.

And they needed to be close to him. He could tell that, too. It was imprinted into their very nature. The farther away they were, the weaker his connection to them would become."

"3227

Ah... this was a matter of Domain, wasn't it? It had to be.

He'd been struggling for what felt like ages trying to figure out what the power of Domain truly entailed. He'd already come to the conclusion that aura was a major factor in it, if not THE factor, but considering everything he'd learned about aura from Pauline Gaolanet, it seemed to him that there had to be more to it. She told him that everyone had an aura, so if Domain was supposed to be some kind of super special blessing from Malast, then it stood to reason that aura wasn't the only thing involved. Otherwise, Malast would've just called it aura.

Right?

Well, maybe not. Malast had been quite the cryptic asshole, not entirely unlike Rasalased in that regard, though he might've differed greatly in execution.

Whatever the case, it struck Hector as logical now that Domain might also have to do with proximity. With the area immediately around him. Perhaps that, too, was just another component or incarnation of aura, but he felt it would make sense if they were independent of one another, too.

Maybe he was splitting hairs here.

What mattered was this metal. He felt deeply within himself that he needed to give it a distinguishing name, now.

Zeff had mentioned this to him once or twice. The naming of techniques helped to codify them in one's mind, making them even easier to perform.

Could this darker metal be considered a technique? Debatable. Would giving it a name help, anyway? Probably, Hector felt.

Calling it ""darksteel"" was certainly a temptation. It would've been both fitting and pretty cool, he thought.

But it would also be confusing, too. He was Darksteel. Increasingly, that was what people were calling him. Whether it was because Darksteel Soldier was too much of a mouthful or because Darksteel just sounded a bit cooler, that was the name that appeared to be sticking to him.

So calling himself Darksteel and the metal darksteel wouldn't be a good idea.

Plus, it wasn't steel. Or at least, not only steel. It was, as he recalled, a complex blend of steel, titanium, and tungsten carbide.

Though, it may not have even been those things, anymore. It had appeared here as goop, after all. And it felt so similar to his normal iron, now. He couldn't be sure that this place hadn't altered it dramatically.

So rather than naming the material, maybe it would indeed be better to name the techniques that he created with it.

The armor that he created with it.

For that was what this stuff was most suited to, Hector felt."
"3228

Agh, he never felt very good at naming things. He supposed it didn't matter too much, though. This was just for himself, for his own ease of use when materializing. It wasn't like with the Candle, where picking a bad name might have negative consequences later.

...Or was it like that?

Oh fuck, now he was starting to worry. This place wasn't normal. This black metal wasn't normal. While he might've had a better sense of its nature, thanks to whatever the hell he was doing with his meditation right now, he still couldn't be entirely sure that something weird like that was out of the question.

Maybe he was overthinking. In fact, that was probably the case. He just needed to pick something that was fitting. And easy to remember. And short. It wouldn't do if he had to rattle off some long ass name in the middle of a fight.

Something like... Chaos? That was nice and short. Maybe not too fitting, though. The reason he'd thought of it was because the black stuff kinda seemed like it might be born from Chaos, like the Beast of Lorent supposedly had. So in that sense, it might've been fitting, but now that he was evaluating the name more... it seemed inappropriate for something that was supposed to protect him.

Hmm.

Well, maybe he could nail down the name later. There was still more to learn about the material itself, he felt. More to its nature.

It needed to be close to him. And it was strong. Difficult to move. Difficult to be moved. Stubborn, even.

Yeah. That was the word for it. Stubborn. It didn't want to give in to anyone or anything, even him. The only reason it made an exception for him at all was because...

Because it was him. Part of him.

Right.

He decided to make it move. To reshape both the pyramid and the cube.

He wanted to see if they could become goop again and ""infect"" more of the iron beneath them. It seemed as though, once they'd become solid, the infection had stopped spreading.

Maybe infection was the wrong term for it, though. That made it sound like a bad thing, and he was fairly sure that it wasn't. If it was increasing his volume limit with the Amir-9 metal like he hoped it was, then it would, in fact, be quite a good thing."

"3229

Even now, however, the metal was reluctant to listen to him. It melted back down, but only very slowly. Painfully slowly.

It was as if it had gotten too comfortable with its solid form and resented being made gooey again.

How weird. He had a sneaking suspicion that in the real world, it wouldn't listen to him at all. Maybe it was only malleable in this place.

Hmm. If that was the case, then he needed to make his time here count.

Which was a strange thing to think, he knew. He still had no real plan for escaping, other than causing a big ruckus.

But that was beside the point. He focused.

If he wanted it to become armor, then he needed to reshape it.

To reforge it.

Because that was what this process was starting to feel like. Difficult and slow, requiring full concentration. Thankfully, he could sense the full shape and volume of the goo in his mind now, giving him a clear, three-dimensional picture of it to work with. But actually making it do what he wanted was still so hard.

After a while, he managed to find a kind of rhythm. A grinding rhythm, but a rhythm, nonetheless.

He had to strain his mind, at max intensity, in short and sharp bursts. Not unlike hitting it with a hammer. With each pass, the goop barely budged at all, but that was enough. Because each time, it stayed. It didn't settle back into itself.

It seemed to be growing even more difficult over time, though. More rigid and unwilling to bend. Hector couldn't tell if that was because the metal itself was becoming more resistant to him or if he was just getting tired.

Ugh. This wasn't a normal exhaustion, either. He'd felt it before, many times. This was an almost purely mental exhaustion. His numb body still felt fine, even though it most certainly wasn't.

But he couldn't stop. Not yet. If he allowed himself to fall asleep in this realm, he had no idea if he would be able to wake up again. There was a better-than-fair chance that his body would just dissolve into nothingness, he felt.

And now he was being reminded of all the shit he'd been through before arriving here, too. That fight with Banda hadn't exactly been a relaxing experience, either.

He stayed determined. He had to finish this armor, no matter how difficult it became. He knew beyond doubt that he would have great need of it if he ever managed to get out of here."

"3230

As he worked, he lost track of time. His focus was exclusively on the task. Helmet. Gorget. Pauldrons. Breastplate. Each piece needed refinement upon refinement. Rerebraces. Couters. Gauntlets. Faulds. Tasset. It was a good thing he had already spent so much time working on his normal iron armor and all its variants. Culet. Cuisses. Poleyns. Greaves. Lames. He had a perfect image of every piece in his mind.

It was just a matter of passing over each one, again and again and again. Until they were all done.

And it needed to be perfect, Hector felt. He didn't know if he would get the opportunity to do this again. If he made a mistake now, it might just last forever.

No pressure, though, right?

At length, he finally began to feel like it was almost done. The shapes were all correct, at least. So with his eyes still closed, he set about trying to link them all together. And the best way to do that was put them on.

But after all that work, he was a bit worried that annihilating and rematerializing them onto his body would somehow go awry. What if they resisted even being dematerialized. Or what if they wouldn't rematerialize correctly?

Shit. No helping it, though. The entire goal was to be able to materialize the armor as needed. If that didn't work, then it was better to know now, he supposed.

He would've taken a nervous breath if he could.

He annihilated the gorget. That was the best place to start, he felt. Then he tried to rematerialize it around his neck.

It appeared. He felt it there. Exactly as intended.

Oh, thank fuck. That was one worry down.

He annihilated all the rest and began donning them, making to test all the links. And it was a good thing he did, because they needed fixing. At this point, his iron had become quite comfortable to wear and even quite easy to move in, and he intended for the same to be true with this stuff.

Every link, every connector, every interlocking piece was refined further. Until they were all perfect. They had to be. If they weren't, then both mobility and resilience would be compromised. Maybe in only minor ways, but if this suit was going to be the difference between life and death, then Hector didn't think anything about it right now could be considered minor."

"3231

So he spent even more time touching it up. And when he was finally satisfied with all of his practical concerns, he was left to consider his aesthetic ones. Should he add some embossed flourishes? Some tracing lines around the edges, maybe? A filigree ornamentation for the breastplate?

None of that felt particularly important, and given how goddamn stubborn the material had now become, even a simple flourish would likely take several extra passes in order to get right.

Ultimately, he decided against it. If he wanted to add fancy shit, he could try some other time. And if he couldn't work with it anymore once he got back to the real world, then so be it. He could always just add an extra layer of iron on top for that kind of thing.

So he finally allowed himself to relax. That was certainly tiring.

But he was wearing a full suit of armor now, and it sure was nice. It definitely wasn't vacuum sealed or anything like that, but when he sank to the ground and lay down on his back, Hector just started to feel... better.

Thus far, this place had felt like it was slowly sapping his strength, probably due to the combination of no oxygen and a deteriorating physical body. But now, in this armor, things were different. It would've been a stretch to say that he was recovering, but he at least felt stable. Comfortable.

Protected.

Then again, maybe that was just the afterglow of finishing a difficult project. The feeling of accomplishment sure was pleasant. He wanted to bask in it for a while longer.

He took a long, deep breath as he tried to regather his thoughts. He needed to get back to--

Wait a minute, what?

His eyes opened, but there was nothing to see. Only blackness. He took another breath, now even more confused.

The Scarf of Armordiin. He'd been wearing it the whole time he'd been here, but he'd nearly forgotten about it, since it wasn't giving him any information.

Until now.

He could sense it. A pocket of air enveloped him, a bubble no bigger than a closet. When had that happened? His ears popped, too, intensely though not painfully.

This wasn't the work of his armor, right? That would make no sense. And the bubble went beyond the suit, so--

'Pardon me,' arrived an unfamiliar voice. 'This atmosphere is helpful to you, no? If not, I can take it back.'

"3232 -- CCLXXIV.

Chapter Two Hundred Seventy-Four: 'O, twinkling Visitor...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

With breath in his lungs and air all around him for his voice to carry, Hector spoke his first question. ""Who are you?""

'A reasonable thing to ask, but perhaps we should both avoid answering that.'

What the--? Impulsively, Hector wanted to ask why, but then he took a moment to mull it over. This voice didn't wish to identify itself? Why might that be? One reason came immediately to mind.

Perhaps the voice belonged to someone with a lot of enemies, and they feared that Hector might unknowingly be one. So they were trying to be cautious in their approach.

Maybe.

He could still press a little more before just assuming that, he supposed. ""Why? It's impolite not to introduce yourself, you know.""

'Rudeness is the least of your concerns, I should think. Unless I am mistaken and you came to be in this place intentionally?'

""Well, let's just say I'm wary of strangers no matter where I go."" It didn't help that he still couldn't see. As far as the Scarf was telling him, there were no physical bodies other than himself within this air bubble, so where exactly was this voice coming from? It felt very familiar to a reaper's voice in the way that it spoke directly into his mind, but it wasn't quite the same, either.

It felt more like a Sparrow's telepathic voice, though he wasn't sure.

'Fair. Then can we at least agree that neither of us here is looking for a fight?'

""I never do look for fights,"" said Hector, ""but they always seem to look for me.""

'Hah. A problem I know well. Tell me, is this your first time in a Lower Realm?'

Is that what these things were called? Hmm. Hector didn't see any benefit in answering his question, though.

Wait, his? Yeah. The voice seemed masculine, somehow.

At his persistent silence, the voice continued on, 'Well, if it IS your first time, then allow me to proffer advice. As a general rule, anyone you meet in these places is not to be trifled with. I do not know your heart, but if it is that of a prankster or wicked man, then you should first be aware that any enemy you decide to make here will be no minor adversary.'

Huh. Sounded like Hector's guess had been right on the money.

""Thanks for the warning.""

"3232 -- CCLXXIV.

Chapter Two Hundred Seventy-Four: 'O, twinkling Visitor...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

With breath in his lungs and air all around him for his voice to carry, Hector spoke his first question. ""Who are you?""

'A reasonable thing to ask, but perhaps we should both avoid answering that.'

What the--? Impulsively, Hector wanted to ask why, but then he took a moment to mull it over. This voice didn't wish to identify itself? Why might that be? One reason came immediately to mind.

Perhaps the voice belonged to someone with a lot of enemies, and they feared that Hector might unknowingly be one. So they were trying to be cautious in their approach.

Maybe.

He could still press a little more before just assuming that, he supposed. ""Why? It's impolite not to introduce yourself, you know.""

'Rudeness is the least of your concerns, I should think. Unless I am mistaken and you came to be in this place intentionally?'

""Well, let's just say I'm wary of strangers no matter where I go."" It didn't help that he still couldn't see. As far as the Scarf was telling him, there were no physical bodies other than himself within this air bubble, so where exactly was this voice coming from? It felt very familiar to a reaper's voice in the way that it spoke directly into his mind, but it wasn't quite the same, either.

It felt more like a Sparrow's telepathic voice, though he wasn't sure.

'Fair. Then can we at least agree that neither of us here is looking for a fight?'

""I never do look for fights,"" said Hector, ""but they always seem to look for me.""

'Hah. A problem I know well. Tell me, is this your first time in a Lower Realm?'

Is that what these things were called? Hmm. Hector didn't see any benefit in answering his question, though.

Wait, his? Yeah. The voice seemed masculine, somehow.

At his persistent silence, the voice continued on, 'Well, if it IS your first time, then allow me to proffer advice. As a general rule, anyone you meet in these places is not to be trifled with. I do not know your heart, but if it is that of a prankster or wicked man, then you should first be aware that any enemy you decide to make here will be no minor adversary.'

Huh. Sounded like Hector's guess had been right on the money.

""Thanks for the warning.""

"3233

'You are welcome. But you did not answer my first question. This atmosphere is helpful to you, no?'

What a strange thing to ask. ""Why are you so curious about that? Are you not human?""

'Yes, I'm human, but I wasn't sure that YOU were. And I didn't want to assume. Some traversers of these realms actually quite dislike atmosphere. And if that were the case, I wanted you to know that it was not an act of hostility on my part but an attempt to provide aid.'

What the hell? He was gaining new questions to ask by the second. ""How did you make this atmosphere, by the way?""

'Oh, I have my tricks. I'm afraid that's all I'm comfortable saying on that particular subject.'

Uh-huh. ""Okay, then who's the last person or... entity that you've met here?""

'You're being quite pushy, now. I have questions of my own that I would have you answer, first.'

Maybe that was a fair point. Hector felt like he should relax a little. ""Sorry. I wasn't trying to be mean. I'm just... kinda confused about what's happening, right now.""

'So it really IS your first time here, then.'

He supposed he could admit that much, at least. ""Yeah."" He paused, rethinking. ""Well, actually. Maybe not. But probably.""

'Now I am the confused one.'

""I guess what I'm saying is... I've had similar experiences to this before. But not the same, I think.""

'Interesting. Might I ask how you came to find yourself here?'

Hector had to think about that for a moment. The answer that came to mind was going to sound stupid, but. Eh. Whatever. ""...I got eaten by a dinosaur.""

'P-pardon me?'

""Well, technically, I guess it was only half-dinosaur.""

'That doesn't make your explanation any more sensible to me.'

Hector bobbed his head. ""I'm just telling you what happened. If I had a more sensible explanation, I would've given it.""

'Are dinosaurs... or half-dinosaurs common where you come from?'

""Not at all,"" said Hector. ""They're supposed to be extinct.""

'Ah. A shame. I would've liked to learn of a new realm in which dinosaurs still existed.'

""Well, the one I met was a real asshole. But like I said, he was only half-dinosaur.""

'And so, after being eaten by this creature, you found yourself here?'

""That's right.""

'...Now that I am thinking about it, I find that quite believable. And very worrying.'

""Oh? You know something about the dinosaur men?""

'Perhaps. I've not heard them described with such... curt terminology before, nor have I encountered them myself yet, but yes, I think I might know something of them.'

"3234

""Anything you could tell me about them would be appreciated,"" said Hector. ""I have a feeling that I'll be encountering them again, relatively soon."" Assuming he ever made it out of this place, that was. But he could ask about that next, he figured.

The voice took a moment to answer him, perhaps debating how much he wanted to say. 'I have heard talk of a recent... breakthrough among a certain group of transfigurers. Supposedly, they have been able to achieve some truly monstrous forms, akin to, as you mentioned, dinosaurs.'

He'd heard talk, huh? Hector doubted that the guy would tell him where from, but decided to ask, anyway. ""Where'd you hear that?""

'I'm afraid that might be revealing too much about myself.'

Well, at least he was straightforward about his refusal to answer. ""Do you know if they have any weaknesses?""

'I do not. If I did, you can be assured that I would tell you.'

Oh? ""So you're not on their side, then?""

And the voice paused again, probably thinking. '...No, I am not. Nor would it seem are you. We might have more in common than we realized.'

""Maybe so."" Hector was still wary of growing too trustful, though. And before he started asking riskier questions, he wanted to get some fundamental stuff out of the way. ""But first, can you tell me what this place actually is? You called it a Lower Realm?""

'Yes. Or a Foundational World, as some call it. A place where only a single element resides. A building block of the world of the living. The world that, I suspect, you and I both come from.'

Hmm. ""Does that mean there are Higher Realms, too?""

'I believe so, though I have yet to visit any of them personally. And I pray I never do, as should you.'

""Why?""

'Hyper time dilation,' said the voice. 'In the Lower Realms, time passes more slowly. MUCH more slowly. This factor alone can be of great benefit, though as I expect you've already realized, merely existing in these places puts a great strain on you. I would advise you to leave as soon as you are able.'

""Yeah, I wanted to ask you about that next, but go on. Are you about to tell me that the Higher Realms are the opposite?""

'Indeed. Time passes far more quickly. So if you are ever unlucky enough to find yourself there, it may well be the end of everything you currently know and love by the time you return. Hence why I have never had a strong desire to visit, though I admit they do intrigue me greatly.'

Holy shit."

"3235

'I speak, by the way, in terms relative to the normal world. If you were to visit a Higher Realm, you would not suddenly age fifty years in a day. I mean to say that after having spent a day in a Higher Realm, many months or even years might pass by the time you return home.'

""How do you know that if you've never visited one yourself?"" said Hector.

'Because I've known some who have. And also, as I said before, I have my tricks.'

Right. Sounded like this guy wasn't going to give him any more details, but it was at least nice to know that he wasn't losing tons of time while stuck in this place. He supposed in the back of his mind, he'd had a feeling that was the case. His first encounter with Rasalased had worked the same way, so it made sense.

'Now allow me to ask another question of you.'

""It's only fair, I guess. Go ahead. But since you're being a little cagey, then I reserve the right to be the same way.""

'Fair, indeed. I want to know if you have met a man with a big scar over his right eye.'

Hector had to think about that. He'd met a lot of different people, especially recently. Ravi Zaman came to mind, though he didn't quite fit the description. ""I've only met a man with a scar on the right side of his face. It's not over the eye.""

'I see.'

""Who is he? What's his name?"" Hector fully expected for these questions not to get answered, but the voice surprised him.

'Some call him the Godslayer.'

""Wow,"" said Hector. ""Now that's a nickname. I've never heard it before, though. Sorry.""

'That's alright. It was a shot in the dark. I would've been shocked if you knew him.'

""This Godslayer guy is an important friend of yours, I take it?""

'Yes.'

""With a name like that, he sounds pretty strong.""

'Quite.'

Hmm. Hector still had other questions he wanted to ask, but his curiosity about the current topic had been piqued. ""Is this guy lost or something?""

'That is debatable.'

Seemed like the voice was being stingy with the details again. Hector decided to push a bit more. ""How would it be debatable? Either he's lost or he's not.""

'It doesn't matter. Allow me to ask a different question.'

""Okay...?""

'Are you a member of Abolish?'

"3236

Hector paused. Truthfully, he'd been about to ask the same thing. Either that, or the Vanguard. He wasn't sure which one he would've asked after first. ""...No, I'm not. Are you?""

'No. But are you being truthful? It is okay if you are a member. It will not prompt me to attack you, if that is what you are thinking. I promise.'

""Yes, I'm being truthful. Are you?""

'Heh. Yes. In fact, I am quite the opposite of Abolish.'

Hector had a feeling. ""So you're with the Vanguard, then?""

'I am. Is that a problem for you?'

That was a loaded question with many ways of being answered.

Hector decided to keep things simple, though. Much like this guy here, he wasn't trying to make enemies for no reason. ""Not at all. Do you know Harper Norez?""

'As a matter of fact, I do. Charming fellow. With a good heart.'

""I can only agree. I consider him a friend.""

'That is heartening to hear. Might you be willing to tell me your name, now?'

Agh. That was a tough one. All things considered, it would probably be fine to say that much. It was only his name. But still, Hector was hesitant. He knew only too well that the Vanguard was not wholly good and trustworthy.

He decided to risk it. ""I'll tell you my name first, if you promise to tell me yours after.""

'A fair exchange. Very well.'

Hector didn't mind going first, because this way, if the guy reneged on his promise, then he would still learn something about the man's character. Namely, that he couldn't be trusted to keep his word. And that would be a much more valuable piece of information to have. ""My name is Hector.""

'Mine is Xander. Nice to meet you.'

""Same."" The gears in Hector's brain started turning as soon as he heard that. Xander? Xander... A Vanguardian named Xander.

It was familiar, though he wasn't sure where he'd heard it from. He recalled Garovel telling him about some of the Vanguard higher-ups. The most famous among them. Maybe it had been then. Because now he was recalling.

""...You're the Magician of Light,"" said Hector. ""The keeper of the Golden Hour.""

The Golden Hour was a Fusion Forge, one of the most coveted objects on the planet, just like Cocora's Candle. On second thought, maybe it was Abbas who'd told him about the Magician.

Or... maybe this was knowledge that the Candle itself had imparted to him. Somehow, his uncertainty made Hector feel like that might actually be the most likely explanation. Which was a little worrying, in its own way."

"3237

'Oh, come now. You don't know that for sure. Maybe I'm a different Xander. It's a common enough name, I should think.'

""That was one of the least convincing things I've ever heard,"" said Hector.

Xander gave a mild laugh. 'Yes, well, I suppose I have never been known for my ability to persuade or deceive. Hence why I prefer to either be quite direct or simply say nothing at all.'

Hector could certainly respect that mentality.

'You are not a Vanguardian yourself, are you?' said Xander.

""No.""

'And yet you recently fought one of Abolish's deadliest warriors.'

""Banda Toro."" Hector felt like he could be a bit more forthcoming, now. ""You know of him? He's one of Bloodeye's men.""

'Ah, indeed. Then this is confirmation of the rumors I have been hearing. Lozaro has made a significant breakthrough in his research. That is most unwelcome news.'

Hector had to pause at that bit of intel. ""Lozaro? I've heard that name before, too.""

'Oh? That is surprising. He's typically quite the stealthy operator. I presume you did not hear that name in the most pleasant of contexts, no?'

""Definitely not. I mean, uh... I guess I could be mistaken, but... I'm pretty sure he brought a... monstrosity into the world that terrorized Lorent and devoured dozens of innocent people.""

'Yes, that sounds like him, alright. Never one to let the risk of enormous collateral damage or devastation to the general populace get in the way of his sick curiosity.'

A part of Hector expected Xander to glean more from what he'd just referenced. The Beast of Lorent had been an infamous enough problem that it wouldn't be surprising if some of the top Vanguardians had heard of it.

If he knew anything, however, he was deciding to keep it to himself, for now. 'How, exactly, did you hear the name Lozaro? That man has been a menace upon the world for more years than I care to remember, but very few have ever managed to learn of him.'

""Ah... that's a long story. And I'm not sure how to explain it, quite frankly.""

'That is fine, but please, I would be grateful for any clues you could share with me regarding Lozaro's current whereabouts.'

The apparent earnestness of the man's request caught Hector a little off guard. ""Are you hunting him down yourself?""

'I would leave this very moment, if I knew where to go.'

"3238

Wow. Hector scratched his head absently, having forgotten about the armor in the way. ""Uh... I'd tell you more if I could. All I heard was a name, and it was in reference to something that took place, I think, a century ago. So... not exactly current.""

'I see. That is unfortunate but not terribly surprising. And this was in Lorent, you said?'

""...That's right."" Egh. Had he just made a huge mistake in sharing that detail?

'Could you direct me toward where you heard it, exactly? Or show me, perhaps?'

Oh shit. ""Well, it was... um..."" Agh, how to word this? ""Okay, I said it was a long story, right? But I guess if we skip to the end, then, uh... I heard the name from the mouth of a... weird, inhuman, monster-thing.""

Xander took a pause at that. 'Ah... the same aforementioned monstrosity?'

""Yeah...""

'It could speak, huh?'

""Yeah. Though, half or more of the things it said didn't make much sense.""

'I can imagine. Was there anything else that it said regarding Lozaro, specifically?'

He had to think back. ""I don't think so. Just that Lozaro summoned it into the world."" There were also the horrific experiments that he'd borne personal witness to in that vision he'd seen with Pauline, but Hector wasn't sure if that whole mess was worth going into, right now. Plus, he didn't even know how to begin explaining that shit.

'Unfortunate. And this creature is now dead, I assume?' said Xander.

""Yeah.""

'You slew it yourself?'

""I... did, yeah.""

'That sounds like quite the heroic effort.'

Hector didn't know what to say to that.

'In any case, thank you for the information,' said Xander. 'If you ever happen upon more regarding Lozaro, I would be most keen to learn it from you as soon as possible.'

Whoa. ""Uh. How would I get in contact with you again?""

There arrived another pause. 'There are various ways. Before we get into that, however, perhaps we should discuss getting you back into the real world, hmm? Or do you already know your way back?'

""I wouldn't say no to your help.""

'An interestingly vague answer.'

""Heh, you would know.""

'Aha, yes, I would. I suppose you have options, then. The easiest method, as far as I am able to tell, is to bring you straight to me. But frankly, I hardly know you, and that would be an enormous extension of trust on my part, which I'm not altogether comfortable with.'

""Uh, okay...""

"3239

'Another method, though more tedious and difficult, would be for you to locate a point of geographic resonance within your current realm and open a portal yourself. Do you know how to do that?'

Say what? ""Uh... no, I don't. But I have heard that term before. A point of geographic resonance?""

'That's right.' But Xander did not elaborate. Perhaps he was trying not to share too much sensitive information again.

Whatever the case, it was not very helpful.

Hector thought of an important question, though. ""Would that allow me to get back to my home quickly? Or would it just poop me out at some other random point of geographic resonance in the normal world?""

'It would not be random. Well. Maybe a little. Or a lot, depending on how good your control is, I suppose.'

His control of what, exactly? Aura? It kinda felt like Xander was dancing around that word now, and Hector didn't know if he should say it first. ""I'd rather not risk that, if possible. I need to get back home and protect it from Bloodeye's men.""

'Are you sure that rushing back into the fight is wise?'

""Maybe not, but I can't just back down now. There are a lot of civilians there.""

'You said that Banda Toro was the one who ate you, yes? What's to stop him from simply doing it again?'

Hector had to bob his head a little. ""Good question. Hopefully, I nail down an answer before it comes to that."" He had a rather strong feeling that this new armor would help, but he didn't see much point in bringing that up now.

'I admire your resolve, at least.'

""I was thinking that, y'know, since Banda was my ticket here, then he might also be my ticket back?"" It wasn't exactly a question, but he asked it like one.

'Ticket back, you say? In what manner?'

""I mean, er... you might think this sounds stupid, but I was wondering if I could, like... make Banda puke me back out. Since he ate me, right?""

Xander fell silent.

Hector got the hint. ""...You do think that sounds stupid, don't you?""

'Stupidity and unconventional thinking are often mistaken for one another. Without knowing more about how the abilities of these so-called ""dinosaur men"" function, I can only speculate about the possibilities.'

Hector smacked his lips. ""You're not actually saying no, I'm noticing...""

"3240

Xander ignored him. 'There are also your own abilities to take into consideration. When you were initially eaten, for example, your body should have been broken down into its base elements, but that clearly did not happen, as you are still a whole, sentient being. Could you explain to me why that is the case?'

He almost just shrugged and said no. But he actually had a guess. And he supposed he couldn't put off asking about this, anymore. ""...Do you know anything about aura?""

Xander took his time responding. '...I do, indeed. And that would explain some things.'

It would? Hector would've liked to hear that, but he felt like he was already treading on sensitive ground with this subject. If he made it obvious that he was still quite ignorant about aura, then maybe Xander would be less inclined to speak about it. For operational security or whatever. The Vanguard was like that, wasn't it? Especially because Sparrows and auras were closely related topics.

Maybe he should just come right out and say that he knows about Sparrows, too. Hector was virtually certain that the Magician of Light would know about them. Whether the man would actually share anything was another matter.

He decided against bringing them up. He didn't want to start fielding questions about why he knew about them. That would begin to feel like a betrayal of Pauline and Hanton's expectations.

'Are you familiar with wrobels?'

Welp.

Hector had to take a moment to process that question. It threw a rather large wrench into the turning gears of his mind.

It seemed like Xander didn't even need him to admit it, however. 'The fact that you are not immediately asking me what I am talking about is answer enough, I think.'

Fuck. Hector thought about trying to just outright lie his way through this, but considering how straightforward Xander had been with him thus far, that seemed wrong. And there was the fact that he couldn't think of a lie that sounded in any way believable.

So he elected to say nothing.

'Your silence is both understandable and admirable. They are magnificent creatures in need of protection and secrecy. I have been entirely truthful with you, so I hope you will believe me when I say that I am a friend to all wrobels. Even the surly, unlikable ones.'

Hmm. The guy said earlier that he wasn't good at being persuasive, but here and now, Hector was quite tempted to take him at his word."
"3241

'Still, you stay silent,' said Xander. 'Perhaps that is wise. I ask to be told a secret that may not be yours to tell, after all. I ask because I have a feeling that it may be a point of commonality and building trust between us.'

""...You say they need secrecy, and yet you're the one bringing them up.""

'Yes. I am taking a bit of a risk on you, Hector. Know that I would not do this if we were meeting elsewhere and if I did not have very strong reason to believe you when you claim to be anti-Abolish. Those two factors together create a compelling case for allyship between us, in my opinion.'

Hmm. Maybe this guy knew more about him than he'd thus far let on. Again, it wouldn't be a huge surprise if he'd heard about that mess in Lorent, already.

The Magician of Light did seem like an incredibly good friend to have, at least in theory. Plus, there was the fact that the guy had knowledge of and experience with Fusion Forges.

But Hector didn't want to be too eager here, either. ""Didn't you ask me if I was a member of Abolish? And then say that it would be okay if I was? Now you're saying my anti-Abolish stance is super important.""

'I did say that. And it would indeed have been okay. I would not have attacked you, just as I promised. But I would also not have considered you a potential ally, either. Any bridge made between the Vanguard and Abolish can only be so wide, if you take my meaning.'

Hector supposed he could understand that. ""Alright, then let me ask you something else.""

'Go ahead.'

If the two of them were to be taking risks now, then this next question would certainly qualify. ""How is the war going, from your perspective?""

And again, Xander fell silent.

Hector didn't balk, though. He just let it linger, wanting to give the man ample time to think about his answer.

'...You ask much of me with that question.'

""Maybe so,"" said Hector. ""But you seem like an honest guy with a good view of things. I want your opinion.""

'A ""good view,"" you say. How am I to interpret that, I wonder? A morally agreeable view? Or merely a view from an elevated position?'

""Mm, maybe a little bit of both?""

"3242

Xander gave him a mild laugh at that. 'The war is a difficult subject, as I'm sure you know. To speak details of it with you would be... an entirely different level of risk, I think.'

""Operational security,"" said Hector. ""I get it. But I also think we're on the same side here. And... well. There might be a thing or two that I could tell you about, if you're willing to do the same for me.""

'An exchange of intel, hmm? What is it that you think I do not already know about?'

A number of things, probably. Considering all the information that he'd been gathering from the deployed teams of Rainlords around the world, there was a decent chance that Hector had a fair few bargaining chips at his disposal, right now. The trick was figuring out which ones they were.

""Well, I can't just reveal my cards straight away. Is there anything in particular that you'd like to know about?""

'No, no. That is not how this works. I'm afraid I must insist that you go first. I will provide no hints.'

Dang.

There were certain things that Hector was determined not to talk about, no matter what. Sparrows, the Rainlords, the Candle, the Shards, Rasalased, and probably also the Sandlords.

The only reason he was at all considering that last one was because they were still technically allied with the Vanguard. But he very much doubted that Abbas would want him revealing anything of his kin to Xander here, considering everything Hector had heard Abbas say about them.

He supposed he'd already given the barest hint that he knew about the existence of Sparrows, but he also hadn't actually confirmed anything yet, either. And they didn't seem relevant to the war, anyway. And hell, Xander almost certainly knew more about them than he did, so there was no bargaining power there to begin with.

He could, however, think of one thing that might be worthy. There was a good chance that Xander already knew about it, though. "'I assume you've heard about Morgunov's robotic nightmares by now, yeah?'"

'Indeed. That is far from a secret.'

""I've heard that Jackson was severely wounded at Uego.""

'I can make no comment on that.'

""Didn't think you would,"" said Hector. ""But has the cause of his wounds been determined yet?""

'That is a leading question, and I still cannot comment.'

Oh shit. ""Ah, sorry. What I mean to say is, if he is wounded and having trouble regenerating, then I know the cause.""

Xander made no response. Perhaps he was waiting for more."

"3243

As Hector mulled over his next words, he realized that he didn't actually want to hold this information back from Xander. In the off chance that the Vanguard didn't already know it, then they would certainly need to. It would've been a real dick move on his part to keep this to himself.

""Morgunov is using nanoscopic machines that can sabotage a servant's ability to regenerate,"" said Hector. ""And probably more.""

Still, Xander persisted in silence.

Hector decided to just keep waiting, though. He'd said what was needed. There was no point in psyching himself out now.

Eventually, the Magician did speak up again. '...Where did you come by this information?'

""I can't tell you that.""

'You sure? I already have a pretty solid guess, I think.'

Hector didn't want to read too much into that. "'Guessing is fine. But just as you said before, I can make no comment on that.'"

'I see,' was all Xander said.

Hector still didn't know if Xander had known about the nanobots already, and Xander probably intended to keep it that way. But considering how privileged the information might be, there was a chance that Xander was still impressed that Hector even had access to it in the first place. Which could bode well for this conversation going forward.

Hopefully. Hector was trying to be optimistic, for a change.

Eh, maybe it didn't suit him.

""So?"" said Hector. ""What's your opinion on the war?""

The Magician again took his time before answering. '...It is a disaster on nearly all fronts,' he said. 'And if you happen to speak with any members of Abolish on the matter, I would have you tell them precisely that, as well.'

Hector's head reared back a little as he processed that. ""Excuse me?""

'Hector Goffe of Atreya,' said Xander. 'I have found your file. It's a bit light, considering the means by which I've come to meet you.'

Aw, shit. This was all about to bite him on the ass, wasn't it?

'You've encountered hostile Abolish forces multiple times, it would seem. I believe you are not lying when you say that you are fighting them now.'

Well, that was good, at least.

'But you are also on friendly terms with the Abolisher known as Ravi Zaman of the Freeman Fellowship.'

Uh-oh. Hector could hazard a guess as to how that intel had ended up in his file. Goddammit, Carl."

"3244

'Care to comment on that?' said Xander. 'Or rebuke these claims?'

Hector didn't see much point in lying, especially because a different strategy came to mind. ""Actually, I'd like to ask you about Ravi Zaman. Do you have a file on him, too?""

'Mm, perhaps.'

""As far as I've been able to tell, Ravi seems like a pretty decent guy, but because of his ties to Abolish, I've been reluctant to place much trust in him. If you could tell me about his past or... anything, really, then that would be a huge help.""

'I am at least aware that this Freeman Fellowship is supposedly more peaceful than the rest of Abolish,' said Xander.

""So I've heard,"" said Hector. ""I'm not sure whether I buy that or not, though. It could just be a tactic to gain favor and then ultimately backstab people.""

'Indeed. Abolish has been known to do precisely that on many occasions throughout history. I would be exceptionally cautious around such a man, were I you.'

""I mean, he's also an important diplomatic figure in Lorent. Being mean to him for no reason would only cause problems, in my opinion. Which is something that Carl Rondel, your Vanguardian liaison in Lorent, doesn't seem to agree on. That guy's a real piece of work, by the way.""

Xander was quiet again, perhaps looking for the requested file.

Hmm. Maybe this was the real reason the Magician had been so intermittently quiet during this conversation. Instead of thinking super carefully about his responses, maybe he'd just been hunting down reports or whatever.

Hector had to wonder where the hell this guy actually was. If he had access to physical reports, then did that mean Xander was still in the real world? But what sense would that make? Didn't he say that there was some kind of massive time differential?

Hector wanted to ask about that, but he wanted answers about Ravi more, if he could get them. That man had been an enigma for long enough in Hector's mind.

At length, Xander spoke up again. 'Ravi Zaman of Palei. Let's see here... It seems he has been active within Abolish for at least twenty years. He participated in the Korgum-Dozer war, the Vaelish Civil War, and minor skirmishes in Ardora and Qenghis.'

""A bit vague,"" said Hector. ""Has he done any specifically terrible things? Any crimes against humanity?""

'If he has, they are not listed here.'

"3245

Damn. Hector had been hoping for more than that. But then again, perhaps this was informative in itself. If Ravi really was a decent guy, then his deeds probably wouldn't be recorded, would they? Especially by the Vanguard, who weren't looking to write down praise for good behavior on Abolish's side.

'Ah, here's something,' said Xander. 'It would appear that Zaman has a history of collecting ransoms.'

Or maybe not. ""Say what?""

'After a battle at Demarkis, he ransomed five Vanguardian reapers that had been captured. After another at Ninoway, he ransomed three. At Carmino, he ransomed six. At Larudo, he ransomed ten. And a few more, elsewhere.'

Huh. Ransoms, eh? Of enemy reapers? Hector couldn't really see that as such a terrible thing to do when it came to war, especially when the alternative was to just kill them. Obviously, it would be different if he'd been kidnapping and ransoming random civilians.

It did make him curious, though. He needed to be careful how he phrased his next question, lest it come across as something that only someone very young and inexperienced would ask. ""How often has Abolish been ransoming your reapers in recent years?""

'Not often at all, as it so happens.'

""The practice goes through periods of flux, doesn't it?"" That was more of an educated guess than a knowledgeable comment, but

Hector tried to sound like he knew what he was talking about.

'Indeed. It is generally a good metric by which to measure the overall ruthlessness of the current regime.'

Which was to say that Morgunov and Dozer--or at least their subordinates--were currently quite ruthless, by historical standards. Not that Hector was terribly surprised by that, but it did put things into a slightly different perspective.

""I suppose that speaks well of Ravi's character, then. If only a little.""

'Yes. Only a little, as you say. Because perhaps his greed simply outweighs his bloodlust.'

""In the old days, that wouldn't be considered greedy at all,"" said Hector. ""That was just how warriors made their wealth."" Where had that come from?

'Hmph. I'm not sure if that change in sentiment has been for the better or worse. On the one hand, it can prolong conflicts by letting the enemy rebuild their strength, but on the other, a good ransom will help you rebuild your own depleted forces more quickly. And despite how rare the practice has become, the conflict between the Vanguard and Abolish doesn't seem to be having any trouble prolonging itself.'"
"3246

""Are you saying that you'd like the practice of ransoming to make a comeback?"" said Hector.

'I do not know. Maybe. The problem is that so many of our enemies desire genocide. On a moral level, I feel it is difficult to justify a ransom when the captive in question might very well go on to kill thousands more civilians in the future. But that type of thinking, too, leads down a dangerous path of escalation and extremism.'

""You seem surprisingly moderate,"" said Hector. ""For such a high-ranking member of the Vanguard, I would've expected you to be... firmer in your convictions.""

'Is that disappointment I hear in your tone?'

""Not in the least. If anything, it's a relief to know that you're thinking deeply about these things instead of just assuming you're always justified in everything that you do.'"

'I feel as though you may be alluding to one or more of my peers.'

Was he? Well, maybe he was. That hadn't been his intention, but now that he was thinking about it, he'd heard quite a bit about the extremist side of the Vanguard from Garovel and many of the reapers within the Rainlords. Hell, some of those reapers probably could've been considered fairly extremist themselves, still.

He didn't dare bring up the Rainlords, though. "'I worry about extremism within the Vanguard. You're supposed to be paragons of virtue that the whole world can look to and admire. I understand that's a big responsibility for you--and a tough balance to maintain--but when you stop trying to live up to that ideal, we all suffer for it. Everyone.'"

Okay, this didn't feel quite right. And yet, it also did. It felt exactly right, somehow. Half of these words seemed like they shouldn't have even been coming out of his mouth, but in his heart, they didn't feel wrong at all.

It was confusing--but also not.

'I agree with you in principle,' said Xander, 'but if I may take the counter position for the sake of argument, then I feel that even extremism has its place. At times, extremism is the only thing that can move the cultural needle in any direction. The passion that it summons out of people, the calls to action--these are things that moderates like us struggle to achieve. For better or for worse, it is not moderates who enact change in the world. But we are the ones who end up trying to find a new equilibrium once the extremists have finally settled down or been dealt with.'"

"3247

"'You think that extremism is a necessary evil in the world?'" said Hector.

'Necessary? Maybe not. But I think on the grand scale, its influence isn't always a bad thing.'

Hmm. Hector hadn't thought about it like that before. But it at least made sense that a leading member of the Vanguard would view it that way, he thought. Xander probably had lots of comrades-in-arms who were much more extreme in their views than he. If he couldn't tolerate their opinions, then he likely would've left the Vanguard a long time ago.

He wondered what Harper Norez might say on this particular subject.

They'd gotten quite sidetracked, though. ""Alright, well... why do you want me to tell Abolish that the war is going terribly for you?""

'Because by all appearances, it is. If that can make them overconfident, then we would be foolish not to take advantage of the opportunity.'

""So you've got a plan, then.""

'Everyone has plans, don't they?'

He supposed that was true. But this guy was being evasive again. In the end, Hector didn't really expect Xander to share anything of real substance with him regarding the war. He decided to keep trying a little more, though. ""Do you think Intar will join the fighting?""

'As a matter of fact, I do.'

Whoa. That was surprisingly candid--and also a totally contrary opinion to what he'd heard previously. ""Really? Why?""

'Unless the war ends abruptly and soon, then Intar's entry is inevitable, I think. In all likelihood, the pressure in Sair will grow too great to ignore.'

""But Intar is politically deadlocked and very anti-war culturally, at the moment.""

'Every modern country is anti-war culturally,' said Xander. 'Aside, perhaps, from those led by Abolish, but even in those places, a strong argument could be made that they--the civilians, at least--are more anti-war than anywhere else in the world. They just can't say so publicly. Living under military dictatorships can have that effect on you.'

'No, Intar's hand will be forced, sooner or later. Steccat, too, if the Vantalayan warfront doesn't improve. I am not saying that things will be smooth sailing or that they won't get significantly worse before they begin to get better, but in the long run, this is a losing war for Abolish. It is plain to see even from the most uninformed perspective that the actions taken by the aggressing nations are unjust.'

Wow. That was definitely one way of looking at things. ""...You're very optimistic.""

Xander laughed mildly again. 'That is what polite people say when they do not wish to call me naive.'

"3248

""Maybe I'm just pessimistic by nature. I hope you're right, though."" And before he missed the conversational opening, Hector wanted to make sure he pounced on the next subject. ""You mentioned Vantalay, too. You really think Steccat will step in over there?""

'I think it's quite possible, yes. But then again, Vantalay is dealing with a lot, right now. I believe that corner of the war is the most volatile, at the moment. Anything could happen.'

Hmm. Hector wished he could ask something more specific, but this was also extremely sensitive territory for him. There was absolutely no way that he could allow his ties to the Rainlords to be revealed. No matter how much the Magician was growing on him, that would be a bridge too far.

So he left it at that.

And Xander was the one to pose the next question. 'How is it that you ended up fighting Banda Toro, by the way?'

Ah. Hector had been wondering if that was going to come up. While his connection to the Rainlords couldn't be revealed, perhaps it would be okay to reveal his one to the Sandlords. Even Atreyan royalty had ties to them, so it wasn't like there was no precedent for it, either.

But Hector was still hesitant. This wasn't just his secret to share, he felt. If only he could've consulted Abbas, right now.

""At this point, it's hard to know exactly what they were thinking,"" said Hector. ""They are Abolish, after all. But as far as I was able to tell, they were on some sort of scouting mission, and a fight probably wasn't supposed to break out. But it did, anyway.""

'I see. Why would they be scouting Atreya, of all places?'

Hector had a pretty strong guess, obviously, so he didn't want to lie and say that he had no idea. He decided to just keep his mouth shut.

'Strange. Do you think you can handle Bloodeye's men once you get back there?'

That was the million to a question, now wasn't it? Hector honestly didn't know. A part of him wanted to feign confidence, but he just couldn't bring that out of himself at the moment, especially after everything he'd already admitted earlier. "'I'm not sure...'"

'Do you want the Vanguard's assistance?'

Oh shit. Uhhh. "'Er... can you even spare the men?'"

'No, quite frankly. Nor can I make any promises. But if your need is dire, then I can at least attempt to send someone to your aid.'

"3249

Hector had to think. What a fucking conundrum he was facing, all of sudden.

On the one hand, the Vanguard getting involved could prove quite problematic where the Rainlords were concerned. Warrenhold was supposed to be a safe place, away from the Vanguard's influence.

But on the other hand, if Bloodeye and his men stormed into Atreya, it wouldn't just be Hector and Warrenhold at risk. The entire populace could very easily become subject to the same horrific reality that was already happening to Sair.

Hundreds of thousands, if not millions, of helpless civilians being slaughtered at Abolish's whim. Hunted down in the street. Homes invaded, looted, and burned.

Ugh. When he thought about it like that, it seemed like no choice at all. Hector couldn't gamble with the lives of so many, just because he was afraid of a complicated situation once the dust settled. There was too much at stake here. Maybe if he hadn't already gotten his ass handed to him by Banda Toro, he would be thinking differently right now, but there was no way he could simply ignore this.

""If you're offering help, then I won't refuse it,"" said Hector. ""But from the sound of it, I shouldn't hold my breath.""

'Sadly, yes, that is the case,' said Xander. 'We are already being stretched beyond our limit. I do not know if anyone will be able to help you, but I will ask.' And there was a pause. 'Actually, if you would like to plead your case yourself, then I could bring you to me so that you may do so.'

Hector might've blinked if his eyes weren't already shut. ""Didn't you say that you didn't want to bring me to you? That it would be too big of a risk?""

'Yes. But if you wish it, I am willing to take that gamble for the sake of saving your country. Either way, an enormous risk is being taken. If given a choice, I would rather choose the one that banks on you being the honorable friend that you currently appear to be.'

Wow. Hector had to admit that he was flattered. Xander didn't seem like the kind of the guy to say a thing like that without genuinely meaning it. But he still couldn't say yes here. ""Thank you, but I can't spend that kind of time away from home, right now. I need to get back as soon as possible. I feel like I've already wasted too much time in this place, as it is.""

"3250

'I understand. In that case, let us discuss how you might return more quickly. Tell me more of your encounter with Banda Toro. What were his abilities like? And please be specific.'

""Alright, uh. So he could transform into one of those flying dinosaurs. Like a pteradactyl or pteranodon, maybe. Oh, and his body could shift and stretch into a more T-rex-like head, too. And he could swallow attacks whole, just gulp down huge chunks of molten metal without much difficulty. In fact, uh... with the benefit of hindsight, I'd say that a lot of his power revolved around his ability to eat things.""

'Yes, that makes sense. What else?'

""Ah... well, I also fought Bloodeye not too long ago, and I saw him pull a live cruise missile out of his mouth. And it was definitely soul-strengthened.""

'A live missile...'

""He used it in the fight. It was stupidly powerful. I don't recall Banda doing anything quite that crazy, but I've got a feeling that he could have, if he'd wanted to. Their abilities seemed identical, though I assume Bloodeye is stronger overall.""

'Perhaps that ability requires significant preparation. You said that you thought Banda was on a scouting mission, no? That a fight was not supposed to break out?'

""Yeah.""

'It could have been the case, then, that he did not fully prepare himself for said fight. Meaning he would be even more dangerous if he did.'

Not the most comforting thought in the world, to be sure. ""Do you think if he swallowed something else, I'd be able to see it arrive here?"" Ignoring the fact that he was currently blind, of course.

'Not likely. And if you did somehow see something, it would have been reduced to its base elements, unlike you.'

Hector didn't want get off topic again, but he just had to ask something else now. ""Is this, uh, realm or whatever--is it shared between everyone? Or is this like my own personal realm where only my element resides?""

'That is something I have been trying to discover for quite a while now. Testing the material in these realms for some unique, identifiable feature has proven incredibly difficult. I still have a few ideas left for experimentation, but I've not been able to find the time, as of late. It seems there is always a more pressing matter or idea that steals my attention.'

Dang."

"3251 -- CCLXXV.

""Well, in any case, I don't know if there's much you can do help me just yet,"" said Hector. ""I'm gonna try to force myself back through Banda's stomach, first. If that doesn't work, then maybe I'll take you up on your offer.""

'How do you intend to ""force"" yourself back?'

Hector took a deep breath as he began to regather his focus on his materialization. Being able to breathe again might improve his concentration now, he hoped. ""I guess I'll figure that out, right now.""

'There is more I would tell you. Specifically, regarding how to get into contact with me again after you return.'

""Keep talking while I work, then.""

And the world of iron began to tremble once more.

Chapter Two Hundred Seventy-Five: 'O, boiling Brew...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Banda Toro felt like absolute shit. His stomach had never ached so badly before.

And it made no kind of sense. None whatsoever.

In the middle of pan-rozum like this, he should have been unable to feel pain. The numbing factor provided by his reaper should have been built into his very being.

Yet this pain was undeniable. It was struggle enough just to maintain pan-rozum through it, to maintain his presence of mind. If not for Grigozo's help, they would have separated by now. The Chaos form was certainly unsustainable in this state. The threat posed by the damned souls within him would prove too great.

Hell, even now, he could still feel them. Perhaps that was the true source of this pain. In fact, perhaps that was the only explanation. The pain could not be physical in nature, surely. It had to be metaphysical. Imaginary.

But how, then, to escape it?

That was what Grigozo was thinking. Somehow, the reaper's mind was able to remain largely clear, even while Banda's own mind burned with agony.

This had to be Darksteel's doing. It defied explanation, but it had to be.

The pain erupted almost instantly upon devouring that bastard. That was obviously no coincidence, but then did that mean Darksteel was struggling to get out? Still fighting from within the brew?

Impossible. Utterly impossible.

He wanted to use mementori again in order to perhaps discern something new, but he didn't dare risk it in this state. The Chaos form was too volatile now. And there was a pursuer. That much, Grigozo could still sense. Someone was giving chase."

"3251 -- CCLXXV.

""Well, in any case, I don't know if there's much you can do help me just yet,"" said Hector. ""I'm gonna try to force myself back through Banda's stomach, first. If that doesn't work, then maybe I'll take you up on your offer.""

'How do you intend to ""force"" yourself back?'

Hector took a deep breath as he began to regather his focus on his materialization. Being able to breathe again might improve his concentration now, he hoped. ""I guess I'll figure that out, right now.""

'There is more I would tell you. Specifically, regarding how to get into contact with me again after you return.'

""Keep talking while I work, then.""

And the world of iron began to tremble once more.

Chapter Two Hundred Seventy-Five: 'O, boiling Brew...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Banda Toro felt like absolute shit. His stomach had never ached so badly before.

And it made no kind of sense. None whatsoever.

In the middle of pan-rozum like this, he should have been unable to feel pain. The numbing factor provided by his reaper should have been built into his very being.

Yet this pain was undeniable. It was struggle enough just to maintain pan-rozum through it, to maintain his presence of mind. If not for Grigozo's help, they would have separated by now. The Chaos form was certainly unsustainable in this state. The threat posed by the damned souls within him would prove too great.

Hell, even now, he could still feel them. Perhaps that was the true source of this pain. In fact, perhaps that was the only explanation. The pain could not be physical in nature, surely. It had to be metaphysical. Imaginary.

But how, then, to escape it?

That was what Grigozo was thinking. Somehow, the reaper's mind was able to remain largely clear, even while Banda's own mind burned with agony.

This had to be Darksteel's doing. It defied explanation, but it had to be. The pain erupted almost instantly upon devouring that bastard. That was obviously no coincidence, but then did that mean Darksteel was struggling to get out? Still fighting from within the brew?

Impossible. Utterly impossible.

He wanted to use mementori again in order to perhaps discern something new, but he didn't dare risk it in this state. The Chaos form was too volatile now. And there was a pursuer. That much, Grigozo could still sense. Someone was giving chase."

"3252

Banda could only care so much about that, though. He had to get back to the encampment. To Bloodeye and their reinforcements. It was the only hope for a reprieve, right now, and even that was questionable.

Problem was, they were quite far. In Callum. He would have to fly all the way across Lorent in order to get there. They did have a couple of smaller encampments in Lorent, too, but those were only harboring one or two servants each. Not enough to provide him a proper place to rest, especially when being pursued.

Worse still, he feared deeply that a visit to Lozaro would be required, which would be a much longer trek all the way over to another continent. But if this pain didn't alleviate once he and Grigozo separated, then that would be the only course of action left. The more time passed, the more tempted he was to simply separate right away and let the chips fall where they may.

He just. Had to. Hold on.

His face was caked with sweat, even as the wind howled past him and tried to dry it out, even as he shifted between his solid and gaseous forms in order to reset the moisture. It simply wouldn't go away, goddammit. He wanted so badly to resolve it with mind over matter. Years upon years of meditative training and experience--it all felt so worthless, right now.

And then it hit him.

A shooting pain in his gut that made him stop flying and double over in the air, clutching his abdomen as he writhed in agony.

This was too much. Far worse than before. He could feel it in his head now. In his mind. His soul, even.

He used his anger again. Tried to force it back down. Suppress it violently.

But it didn't help. It wouldn't listen to him. It wouldn't be ignored.

The Chaos form activated against his will.

The most dreaded scenario to his mind. The loss of control over his own body. He could feel the damned souls clawing against his flesh now, tearing at him from the inside, demanding to be let free.

Then it was his stomach again. No longer painful. Suddenly, there was relief from that. But not from something else.

Something there.

It didn't hurt, anymore, but he could feel the physicality of it now. Forcing open his stomach, his throat, and then his mouth."

"3253

What came forth first was a dark hand. A gauntlet. Then the arm. It bent down and gripped Banda's shoulder, as if needing the leverage to pull the rest of Darksteel free.

Banda could only watch as this armored figure emerged. He felt paralyzed in this moment, unable to make his own body listen to him.

It was a slow, horrible process. It was less like vomiting and more like Darksteel was peeling Banda's bloated, distorted form off of him. Removing a skin-tight suit in mid-air.

Halfway through it, Banda could no longer keep up his flight. His pterosaur wings bent out of shape and locked up, making him start to fall gradually, then sink like a stone.

By the time they neared the ground, Darksteel was free again. But Banda was also more in control, more aware of what was happening.

Banda Toro hit the dirt hard enough to leave an explosive crater.

But he wasn't altogether bothered by that.

Flat on his back as he looked up at the armored figure floating above, Banda Toro had regained enough of his senses that he was now primarily just... annoyed.

Extremely annoyed, as a matter of fact.

This Darksteel was proving to be a real son of a bitch. Sure, Banda had not possessed this Chaos form for very long, but never before had someone he'd devoured been able to climb their way back out of his brew.

What kind of power did a man have to possess in order to be capable of resisting digestion? Was this guy just that much of a stubborn bastard?

For a time, Banda just lay there, looking up at Darksteel. That armor had looked a little different at first--darker and shinier--but now it looked the same as before, if a bit bulkier.

Curious.

Either way, the fight was about to be back on. That much was obvious. Banda was prepared from the moment he hit the dirt, but he decided to wait. If Darksteel had anything to say to him, Banda intended to hear him out. And if Darksteel just attacked instead, that was fine, too.

At length, though, Banda's curiosity began to get the better of him.

""How was it inside my stomach?!"" he shouted up at him.

Darksteel didn't answer, the rude bastard.

Banda growled, which turned into a snarl as he transformed again. He hoped that pursuer showed up soon so that he could kill both of them at the same time."

"3254

A cluster of molten iron flew toward him, but Banda was ready for it. He flipped out of the way, swirling up into the air as his wings expanded out and gained strength again. A surge of heat built up in his gut, preparing to spew a white hot laser at Darksteel in retaliation while perhaps devouring more iron chunks with an open mouth, too. He fully expected the iron to keep swarming him as he moved, following him up into the sky like machine gun fire.

Instead, he saw too late that Darksteel had chosen to close the gap and was now right in his face. The armored man crashed into him, elbow deep into Banda's scaly stomach, sending him shooting back down to the ground, bouncing and skidding across the dirt again.

The heat laser choked and died in his throat, burning and dribbling out of the sides of his mouth as Banda struggled to find his breath again.

What had just happened? Darksteel had changed tactics on him. He wanted to get up close and personal now? What, he wasn't afraid of being eaten again? Agh, why would he be? Damn him.

Banda didn't need long to rebound. He flung himself back up into the air and activated mementori again. That was a risk, as always, but he was in control again. He could suppress the damned souls. And he needed the extra sensory advantage, right now.

His body burned, but he didn't lose focus. Where was Darksteel? Where had he gone? He had to be--

Above. Banda sensed him at the last moment and narrowly avoided another pummeling. He lashed out with hand-sized claws, and the blow landed cleanly.

But it stopped. Bits of armor seemed to fly off, but the claws didn't pierce, didn't cut. What the--?

Darksteel went for the gut again, this time with a materialized blade. It didn't break through his scales, strangely enough, but the spot was still a bit sore, so it didn't exactly feel like acupuncture, either.

Banda resorted to his gaseous form. Darksteel wanted to fight up close? That was fine. He'd smother him with acidic red mist and burn him out of that little armored shell until the metal was all that remained.

Rage fueled him. Made his attacks hit harder. His acid more potent. His smoke more oppressive.

Until an explosion burst through his concentration, as if hitting him directly in his mind. The smoke faltered and lagged while he battled his own disorientation."

"3255

Darksteel slipped away. Banda could tell that much. He needed to focus on mementori in order to locate him again. Where was he?

Agh, what was this? It was like a fog. He could certainly sense Darksteel's aura, but it was unclear. Messy.

Concealed? Hiding itself? Those were the only things he could discern of its nature, right now. It didn't want him to know it. It wanted him uncertain.

And again, Banda barely sensed the next attack coming before it was too late. A full body tackle, it still clipped him in the shoulder and sent him spinning lower. He struggled to regain his bearings. Mementori wasn't as helpful as it was supposed to be. He turned to Grigozo's ability to sense souls, instead, but that was just as bad, if not even worse.

Frustrating. Fine. He'd have to rely on smell. His snout elongated as he demanded it of his Chaos form. With this, at least--

Darksteel slammed into his back with full force. Banda rocketed forward against his will, and he tried to look back, only to notice a shadow above him, instead.

An iron meteor was there. Too enormous for Banda to even process in the split second that he had to stare at it blotting out his view of the sky.

It fell upon him.

On impact, he lost all awareness. All ability to think or reason. It didn't hurt. There was no pain. Instead, it was like he blinked out of existence for a few moments and touched oblivion.

The meteor crashed to earth with all the power of a bomb. From his vantage point, Banda had no concept of how big it might have been, but he could certainly feel his body being shredded to pieces. And by the time he regained full awareness again, he could only see pitch blackness around him.

He'd been drilled so deep into the ground that he could hardly tell which direction was up, anymore. A mountain of rubble lay on top of him, pinning him down, all but telling him to give up. To simply stay down here. To admit defeat, even.

His body, however, was still regenerating. It may have been torn to pieces, but apparently, enough of it was still intact for him to remain conscious.

He decided to take his time.

After that last attack, Banda felt like he needed to reevaluate some things. Maybe everything, actually.

What in the fuck was happening here?"
"3256

He could feel Grigozo's cowardice creeping to the fore, seeping into his reasoning.

Was he actually considering abandoning the fight, right now?
Disbanding pan-rozum and letting the reaper flee underground?

No. Absurd.

Darksteel had surprised him, sure, but this fight was far from lost. And besides, splitting up now was not traditionally considered a wise strategic move. There were too many ways for high threat warriors to chase an escaping reaper down and kill or capture them.

In fact, according to Bloodeye, that was precisely how Darksteel had managed to kill the Man of Crows.

Banda wasn't going to let Grigozo make the same mistake.

None of these thoughts were fully articulated in Banda's mind. They were flashing sensations, at best. Instinctual feelings. He didn't have the luxury of time to mull things over as much as he wanted. Confused as he was, he still knew that he had to be decisive and quick in his thinking here.

Especially when he felt the ground and rubble all around him begin to tremble.

Darksteel wasn't going to just let him sit down here and regenerate, it seemed.

The gaseous form was the only solution to Banda's mind. It allowed him to squeeze through the gaps in the rock and escape out into multiple directions at once.

He had to be careful here, though. In this depleted state, he didn't have much smoke to pull from, and he ran the risk of spreading himself too thin--quite literally.

That was the biggest danger when it came to learning and maintaining gas forms with pan-rozum. The gas had to be rigidly controlled with one's mind. It was already trying to spread itself apart and disperse by its own physical properties. If you let the gas thin out too much, then the pan-rozum merge would collapse and exhaust both the reaper and servant simultaneously.

Thankfully, he could add more smoke to himself through the materialization component of pan-rozum, but that also put more strain on the form--and was only a bandage on the problem, besides. The materialized smoke wasn't truly part of him, after all. Regeneration was still preferable.

But that was also an issue. In the gaseous form, regeneration was halted. He needed to get out of it as soon as possible in order to let the healing continue. Which was a risk, too, of course.

He made it aboveground with multiple different whiffs of red smoke. He rushed to reconvene them but sensed another attack coming and had to disperse again."

"3257

Controlling more than one whiff of smoke at a time was a difficult trick, but Banda had plenty of experience doing it, thanks especially to the cloning technique. Learning how to pull that off made this feel much easier by comparison.

Darksteel was still all over him, though. No doubt, the bastard knew that he'd gained the advantage and didn't want to give it up. Banda had four separate clouds of smoke that all wanted to regather, but Darksteel wasn't making that easy. The first and second ones were being shredded and dispersed by iron bullets while the third was being chased down by Darksteel himself.

But the fourth was largely free. With it, Banda could navigate the battle and soak up stray puffs that were otherwise on the verge of vanishing.

It was mayhem. Furious and constant over multiple minutes. Darksteel was trying to box the clouds, while Banda was trying to melt or puncture his way through each interfering bit of iron.

And it quickly became clear that Darksteel himself was a much bigger problem. These clusters of iron being materialized and flung around--Banda could deal with those. But that armored body was different. It shrugged off materialized osmium spikes and acid. It resisted coatings to slow its movement down.

And worst of all, it always seemed to know where to find Banda's core. His mind. That had to be the reason Darksteel was pursuing the third whiff so persistently. The son of a bitch just knew.

Banda managed to outlast the onslaught, though. The fourth whiff finally regathered enough mass to mount a proper counterattack, something that would at least get Darksteel to stop hounding him for a moment.

A mouth formed in the fourth cloud, and from it, a heat laser surged forth. Banda made sure to shoot from Darksteel's blindside, too, aiming for center mass.

As expected, Darksteel was still able to dodge in time, though not without leaving a scorch mark across his breastplate. That was fine. It gave Banda the time he needed.

The third merged with the fourth, and now he had more than enough mass again. His gangly wings sprouted back out as the gaseous form gave way almost fully to the Chaos form again.

He immediately went for more heat lasers. Three at once, shot from three different mouths grown out of his face, shoulder, and chest.

And now, it would be Banda's turn to chase."

"3258

Finally, he could swing things back in his favor. With the lasers alone, the amount of pressure he could place upon Darksteel would be more than enough to--

Hold on.

Darksteel dodged two, but the last one hit cleanly. And yet it didn't cut a hole through him like a bullet through gelatin. It bounced off him. Splashed off, really, reducing the heat laser to more of a molten ooze that geysered away from him.

Banda needed a second to process what had just happened; and so, too, apparently, did Darksteel. For a moment, they both hovered there in midair, confused and trying to reassess.

Darksteel was the first to start moving again, so even though Banda would've liked more time to think through the logical ramifications of what this meant for the rest of this fight, he didn't get it. He had to react.

Because Darksteel was torpedoing straight toward him again. Unafraid.

There would be no chase this time, it seemed.

Acid and claws were his instinctual answer. If the lasers weren't going to work, then he needed to eat away at that armor until it was weakened enough to break through, which his claws would be able to do.

In theory. He didn't have the luxury of thinking about it more than that.

Darksteel cannonballed straight into him, but Banda was ready with a gaseous evasion. Darksteel passed through harmlessly enough and took a gob of searing acid to the back.

It didn't slow him down. He did a pinpoint turn and rocketed back, this time too close and too fast to react to.

Banda got his bell rung. An armored knee collided with his temple. It was certainly enough to leave him disoriented. He tried in vain to swing with a flurry of transfigured arms and claws. They all whiffed as he lost track of Darksteel for a second or two.

That was too long.

By the time he sensed his opponent again, his wings were being shredded to pieces by that damn cluster-fire technique of Darksteel's. If Banda had noticed a moment later, it would've been his head that got shredded, not his wings.

He surged downward, embracing the sudden freefall and resorting to more of his gaseous form in order to press for even more speed. He didn't technically need his wings in order to fly, after all. Pan-rozum could accomplish it, too, albeit with more difficulty."

"3259

He needed distance. Darksteel was following--and not letting up with that attack, either. Banda could feel pieces of his solid self being chipped away, as well as his gaseous self being dispersed under the flurry of iron bullets.

Agh. Distance wasn't going to work, either. Darksteel could keep up with him too easily.

His options were becoming very limited now. He was being pushed harder than he had in a very long time. If he'd had the presence of mind for it, he might've even been pleased. This was the very reason why he'd been so curious to test Darksteel in the first place. He'd wanted to see just how threatening this mystery man really was.

In this moment, however, Banda Toro was not pleased at all. Perhaps that was because of Grigozo's emotions spoiling things. The reaper wanted to flee. To panic, even. Banda could sense it.

The full Chaos form was the answer here. Banda hadn't used it much yet. In this fight, he'd only faintly touched it just before devouring Darksteel. The immediate agony thereafter had pulled him back out of it.

Should he really use it again, though? There wasn't time to debate.

He went for it.

No, he didn't. It was too dangerous now. They could lose control. It wasn't worth--

Yes, he did. Banda forced Grigozo down and assumed full control. He had to. The reaper didn't understand.

And immediately, his body came alight with new fury. Burning. Angry. Screaming.

The damned souls were there again, more violent than ever. And Banda's mind--it slowed, as did the whole world around him. He could hardly think. Hardly form complete ideas.

But he could see.

He could smell.

He could sense it all.

And he was hungry.

Beautifully hungry.

This state of being was its own brand of wonderful. Distinct and glorious. Pure.

Everything was simple.

Hunt. Eat.

This meal was fighting back, though. A series of blades flew at him. Banda avoided most, ignored the rest. The only thing that mattered was reaching his prey. Hunting. Eating.

His huge maw bit down. Found its prey. Crunch.

Rrgh. Not the right crunch. Crunch was supposed to be more satisfying. Supposed to feel bones snapping. Supposed to taste blood gushing out.

Something burned. In his mouth.

He ignored it. Clawed at the meal, instead. It needed to stop wriggling. It needed to give him the satisfying crunch. He thrashed his head, too. That was the best trick. Whip his neck around. Disorient. Break bones."

"3260 -- CCLXXVI.

It wouldn't stop moving, though. Meal was tough. Needed to be softened up more.

Vomit would do it. Flaming acid.

Mrgh. Something wrong. Stomach hurt. More than normal. Where claw go? One missing.

He bit down harder. Wanted crunch. Rrgh. No crunch. Why no crunch? Mouth hurt. Why hurt? Why not numb? No sense making.

Rrgh! Frustrating! Bite and thrash! Meal not stop moving!

Agh! Rrgh... Ooh...?

Spinning. Not right. World stretching. No sky. No ground.

NO! ENOUGH OF THIS MADNESS!

Grigozo?

Darkness.

Chapter Two Hundred Seventy-Six: 'The victor's dilemma...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector couldn't stop panting. Or sweating. Or questioning how he was still able to move, considering how absolutely awful he felt, right now.

But the fight seemed to be over. Finally.

Fucking finally.

Even now, staring at the gray, smoldering husk of Banda's twisted, dinosaur-like form as he lay there on the ground, Hector was hesitant to believe that this dude was actually, truly dead.

It had happened rather suddenly, after all.

It was nice to be on the ground again, at least. For a brief period of time, Hector had started to feel like he was getting the hang of aerial combat, but he sure hadn't been feeling very good about himself toward the end there.

What an insane mess that had turned into. He was already reliving it and still not really understanding what the fuck went on back there.

Banda Toro just went nuts.

Quite literally, apparently.

'So?' said the amorphous blob of a reaper in front of him. 'Do you... accept my surrender? I've released his soul, as you can see.'

At least one of Hector's thought processes was in a total daze.

The enemy reaper had given up. Just like that. He'd melted out of Banda's body and started shouting at Hector, begging for his life. For mercy.

After all that craziness. Some of the most demented shit Hector had ever witnessed--which was saying a lot, at this point.

And this was how it was ending.

Hector had to think about this one. He didn't want to throw out a dumb answer and then have to go back on his word later after realizing just how dumb it had been.

But at the very least, he could tell that the reaper wasn't lying.

He could sense it. Banda's aura. Or the lack thereof, rather.

Banda Toro was no more. The giant corpse in front of him was empty.

And yet, that wasn't enough. Hector wanted to be more than sure. This aura thing was still new to him. He didn't want to have too much confidence in it. So he'd already called Garovel over.

But it was probably going to take the reaper a while to get here."
"3260 -- CCLXXVI.

It wouldn't stop moving, though. Meal was tough. Needed to be softened up more.

Vomit would do it. Flaming acid.

Mrgh. Something wrong. Stomach hurt. More than normal. Where claw go? One missing.

He bit down harder. Wanted crunch. Rrgh. No crunch. Why no crunch? Mouth hurt. Why hurt? Why not numb? No sense making.

Rrgh! Frustrating! Bite and thrash! Meal not stop moving!

Agh! Rrgh... Ooh...?

Spinning. Not right. World stretching. No sky. No ground.

NO! ENOUGH OF THIS MADNESS!

Grigozo?

Darkness.

Chapter Two Hundred Seventy-Six: 'The victor's dilemma...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector couldn't stop panting. Or sweating. Or questioning how he was still able to move, considering how absolutely awful he felt, right now.

But the fight seemed to be over. Finally.

Fucking finally.

Even now, staring at the gray, smoldering husk of Banda's twisted, dinosaur-like form as he lay there on the ground, Hector was hesitant to believe that this dude was actually, truly dead.

It had happened rather suddenly, after all.

It was nice to be on the ground again, at least. For a brief period of time, Hector had started to feel like he was getting the hang of aerial combat, but he sure hadn't been feeling very good about himself toward the end there.

What an insane mess that had turned into. He was already reliving it and still not really understanding what the fuck went on back there.

Banda Toro just went nuts.

Quite literally, apparently.

'So?' said the amorphous blob of a reaper in front of him. 'Do you... accept my surrender? I've released his soul, as you can see.'

At least one of Hector's thought processes was in a total daze.

The enemy reaper had given up. Just like that. He'd melted out of Banda's body and started shouting at Hector, begging for his life. For mercy.

After all that craziness. Some of the most demented shit Hector had ever witnessed--which was saying a lot, at this point.

And this was how it was ending.

Hector had to think about this one. He didn't want to throw out a dumb answer and then have to go back on his word later after realizing just how dumb it had been.

But at the very least, he could tell that the reaper wasn't lying.

He could sense it. Banda's aura. Or the lack thereof, rather.

Banda Toro was no more. The giant corpse in front of him was empty.

And yet, that wasn't enough. Hector wanted to be more than sure. This aura thing was still new to him. He didn't want to have too much confidence in it. So he'd already called Garovel over.

But it was probably going to take the reaper a while to get here."
"3261

There was, however, someone else already present. Hector only just now noticed the figure descending slowly from the sky over yonder. And even though he couldn't yet make out who it was with his eyes--which admittedly weren't working so well, at the moment--he could still tell who it was. Kind of.

He supposed it was aura again, but he'd never actually sensed Roman's aura before. Not like this, at least.

It felt more like an educated guess than actual knowledge. That warmth. That concern. That curiosity. Not to mention, the ability to fly? Yeah, that seemed like Roman. Hector waved him closer, since he seemed hesitant.

And indeed, Roman's approach sped up, and the man landed softly at his side. ""H-Hector? You... ah..."" His gaze went toward the reaper, and he said nothing more, perhaps not wanting to let something slip.

Hector appreciated that, but at this point, he wasn't sure it would've even mattered all that much. ""I'm okay,"" he said tiredly. It was a statement to himself as much as it was to Roman. He just had to hold it together for a little while longer. ""This guy says he wants to surrender.""

""I, uh... I see.""

'Yes. My name is Grigozo, and I am throwing myself upon your mercy. Please, I beg you. Spare my life. I will do you no harm.'

Roman scratched his temple, looking arguably even more uncertain than Hector felt. ""Just like that, eh? If the roles were reversed, would you have been merciful to us?""

'If it had been up to me, then yes, I would have. Perhaps you will not believe that, but it is the truth. But I will admit that you would likely not have been spared, regardless of my feelings. My relationship with my servant was... not like the relationships that you enjoy, I suspect.'

Roman gave Hector a sidelong glance. The expression on his face looked at first doubtful, then perhaps just worried about Hector again.

Hmm. Did he really look that bad, right now? Well, he sure felt like it, so it wouldn't be that surprising. Was his neck broken? And maybe his spine, too? Agh, he didn't want to think about it. Better to focus on the conversation.

""Are you telling us that you were just a hapless victim this whole time?"" said Hector. ""That Banda Toro was the only one who meant us harm?""

"3262

'No,' said Grigozo. 'I will make no such excuses for my involvement. Though I was an unwilling participant for many years, it would be both naive and disrespectful to claim total innocence. In fact, if I were so innocent, then it would not be mercy on your part to spare me. It would simply be the right thing to do. Mercy, I feel, is a thing that can only be rightly granted to someone who has transgressed, as I have. So please, have mercy upon me, Lord Darksteel.'

Roman gave an audible sniff. ""When the fighting stops, all of a sudden you're a philosopher, huh?""

'I would not refuse such a flattering label,' said Grigozo. 'Though, the truth may in fact be that I am simply attempting to continue talking in the hope that my death will be prolonged even just one second more. I cannot claim to be in the most cogent of mind states, currently. Perhaps I am being foolish, but I cannot seem to stop talking. Is there anything you would ask of me? I assure you that I will be entirely honest, if only to increase my odds of survival by the barest margin.'

Holy shit.

'Please, anything you wish to know is fair game. Hold nothing back. Regarding me? Banda? Abolish? I will speak of whatever you wish. Nothing is off limits.'

Well, more info on Abolish certainly wouldn't hurt, Hector supposed. One thing in particular came to mind, actually. ""What can you tell me of Lozaro?""

'Ah. You know of him already. Yes, that is indeed a wicked man if ever there was one. I have met him several times, though our most recent encounters have been far more memorable--and not for pleasant reasons. Are you perhaps curious about the monstrous Chaos form that Banda took during the fight? I could tell you quite a bit about that, too, if you are interested. Though, admittedly, it is still rather mysterious to me in many ways, as well. Perhaps I should not overpromise. Ah--'

Grigozo sounded strangely calm and articulate, despite how much he seemed to be floundering. The reaper's fear was still apparent, but Hector found it curious, nonetheless. He wondered what this reaper was like when he wasn't scared shitless.

'Lozaro, yes? You were asking about Lozaro. Indeed, I can tell you about him. But is there anything in particular that you would like to know? I, ah, seem to be having trouble summoning any specific piece of information to mind on my own, at the moment. If you would be so kind as to point me toward a point of interest, then I am sure I could--'

He was just going to keep going until someone butted in, wasn't he?"
"3263

""Do you know Lozaro's current whereabouts?"" said Hector.

'Yes,' said Grigozo. 'Or at least, I know where he is most likely to be found. If you are to seek him out, however, then I would advise you to be exceptionally cautious in your approach. He is a man that has been on the run for many years from not only the Vanguard but also the Mad Demon himself. Lozaro is a man paranoid beyond measure. Any sign that something is amiss, and he will flee--and be quite difficult to pursue, I suspect.'

""So?"" said Roman. ""Where is this guy, then?""

'If you accept my surrender, and give me your word that you will not kill me, then I will happily tell you.'

""Uh-huh..."" Roman gave Hector another look. He seemed like he had plenty of questions for Hector, too, but now obviously wasn't the time for them.

Hector still wanted to wait for Garovel's input before formally accepting, but... he was already feeling quite certain that he wasn't going to kill a defenseless, surrendering reaper. That just seemed flatly too cruel.

He decided to ask one more thing first, though.

""If I were to ransom you to someone, would you rather they were with the Vanguard or Abolish?""

At that, Grigozo seemed to finally struggle with finding his words.

Hector just waited, though.

'That... seems a loaded question to me.'

""Why?""

'You ask me to choose between certain death and a life of torment.'

""You really think the Vanguard would kill you when you have so much valuable information you could share with them?""

'Yes. If I were lucky, they would milk me for all I was worth and then put me to the sword. If I were unlucky, then I would be given over to one of the many malevolent idiots that infest their ranks, and they would simply skip to the end. Either way, it is not something I would choose.'

'Hector,' arrived Garovel's private voice.

Ah. Hector searched for the reaper's presence and found it, though it was still fairly far away. 'Garovel, I think I'm just going to accept his surrender.'

There came a pause. No doubt, Garovel was not pleased with being left out of the fight again and wanted to give him a piece of his mind, but the reaper stayed on topic. 'You sure about that?'

'Yeah. We can keep him prisoner, can't we?'

'We can. What's his name, though?'

'Grigozo.'

'...Alright, that's fine for now.'"

"3264

There was a certain degree of reluctance in Garovel's voice, and Hector couldn't exactly blame him. It was hard to cut Abolish any sort of slack. Maybe this was more than Grigozo deserved.

""Well, you can relax a little,"" said Hector. ""We accept your surrender.""

Garovel hovered up behind Hector's shoulder. 'Hello there, Grigozo. My name is Garovel, reaper to Lord Darksteel here.'

Hector could feel Garovel trying to find an opening in his armor, presumably to invoke the regeneration and numbing vigor, but the reaper was apparently having difficulty. Which was a bit strange. But after a couple moments, Hector just dematerialized his right pauldron.

Oh god, that felt better. And he could see clearly again, too. With his actual eyeballs. He'd almost forgotten that was even possible.

And to his mild surprise, Grigozo's blurry, blobby form didn't become much crisper like everything else in sight did. Perhaps it was the after effects of pan-rozum. Or maybe from releasing Banda's soul? Hector had never seen a reaper do that before, now that he was thinking about it.

In his foremost thought process, however, Hector had to confirm something with Garovel. 'Banda's soul isn't there anymore, right?'

'Yeah, it's gone. Ugh.'

Banda's leftover husk was now much clearer as well, and Hector could understand the reaper's disgust. The smoking, distorted corpse was even more grotesque than he expected it to be. The skin was already an ashen gray and beginning to flake off.

'Y-you...' Grigozo's form shuddered visibly, though Hector wasn't sure why. 'You were not even using pan-rozum during that fight?'

Oh.

Uh.

Hmm.

Garovel chose to skip past that question, which was probably the right thing to do. 'You're not looking so good. I think we'll let you get some rest before we continue with the questioning. Unless, of course, there is something particularly pressing that you feel we should know right away. Such as another imminent attack, perhaps? Being forthright with that information would go a long way with us.'

'I... ah...' Apparently, Grigozo needed a few more moments to answer. 'I... could be mistaken, of course, as Bloodeye's mind is at times even a mystery to Bloodeye himself, I think. But with that being said, I believe that Bloodeye will not risk another attack on you any time soon. Truthfully, he should not have even bothered with this first attempt in sending Banda. When we do not report back, he will likely realize that this continued pursuit is not worth the resource expenditure.'" Hector had to wonder if that was really true. Sure would've been nice if it was, but his natural pessimism made it all but impossible to believe it. And while he didn't know much about Bloodeye, the guy didn't seem like the type to let things go. ""You really think he'll give up just like that? I was under the impression that he wants the Sunsmith's head really badly.'"

"3265

'Oh, he does,' said Grigozo. 'You are certainly not mistaken about that. But even with the victory at Uego, the situation in Sair is still tenuous. If that country slips away from Abolish's grasp, much of the blame will fall upon him. A loss here, to you, will not likely affect his reputation much, but a loss there would be devastating.'

Hmm. When he put it like that, Hector was abruptly tempted to march over there and start raising hell. If most of the Rainlords weren't still in Vantalay, then he would've been more than just tempted.

The conversation didn't last much longer from there, as Grigozo's tone began to quickly sound more haggard and less focused. Perhaps the reaper was just faking it in order to persuade them to let him rest, but judging by Grigozo's visibly trembling form, Hector doubted it. He didn't have trouble believing that the exhaustion was simply catching up to the reaper now that the question of his immediate survival had been answered.

And so, they headed back to Warrenhold.

Banda Toro's ashen husk was not left behind, either. Maybe it wasn't appropriate to take his body with them, but leaving him there in the middle of an open field seemed pretty weird, too. Whether or not they would grant him a proper burial was also a lingering question in Hector's mind, but at the very least, he figured that some of their people might want to study his remains in order to learn more about this mysterious ""Chaos form,"" as Grigozo called it.

He expected Garovel to finally give him a piece of his mind on the way back, but the reaper merely remained quiet the whole time. Granted, it wasn't actually that far, so maybe Garovel was just waiting until they had more time and privacy.

But there was quite a bit to do before they would have that, it seemed.

Because Hahl Saqqaf had arrived in force while he was away. A couple of Abbas' sons met up with them before they even landed and began asking about the situation, as well as everyone's condition. Hector could sense Pauline lingering nearby, too."

"3266

Raheem Saqqaf was Abbas' eldest son. His square jawline might've at first given the impression that he was a stern, no-nonsense type of man, but Hector had come to know that he was actually quite tender-hearted, which perhaps explained the softness in his eyes--and why he was the first one to approach and ask after Hector's well-being.

Hector was still struggling to learn all the other names. Abbas had so many sons and grandsons that it was hard to keep track. He was glad they were all here, though, because it meant that Warrenhold had ample protection while he'd been away.

When he finally met up with Abbas himself, the man of course had questions for him, but Hector just wanted to know that everyone was safe, first.

""They are, indeed,"" said the Sunsmith as they arrived in the East Hall, the largest chamber in the Entry Tower. The man was in his own armor, which was quite a bit bulkier than Hector's, making it more of a task to navigate these narrow staircases. He made do, though. ""All have been accounted for. And it would seem you have already taken care of the battle for us. I feel a bit silly now for worrying so much.""

Hector exhaled a heavy breath. ""I'd say you were worried just the right amount. That fight was no picnic.""

""Ah... in that case, I apologize for not arriving more swiftly."" Abbas had been in turns eyeing the boxed-up husk and also Hector himself. ""New armor? When and where did you come by this?""

""That's, uh... I'm not entirely sure how to answer that, actually..."" Hector took a seat at a large table, and everyone else began following suit, save Abbas. He heard his poor chair groan under his sudden weight, then he decided he might be better off standing, after all.

Which apparently made everyone uncertain about whether they should sit or stand back up to, too.

Aw, shit. Uh. ""Er, no, please sit, everyone."" The awkwardness permeated the room, but they listened.

Hector removed his helmet. He had a little trouble getting it off at first, but it came free. He didn't want to just dematerialize it, in the hopefully off-chance that he wouldn't be able to rematerialize it again. He planned to have Abbas examine it later, but first things needed to come first. He looked toward Badat Saqqaf, the youngest of Abbas' great grandsons--or, probably the youngest, Hector thought. ""Would you mind running to the Tower of Night and telling everyone it's safe to come out?""

The fully-robed boy gave a furious nod and bolted off, disappearing down the staircase on the far side of the room."

"3267

A few at the table were staring at him with wide-eyes, Hector noticed.

'You're covered in blood,' said Garovel privately.

Ah. That made more sense.

This new armor had certainly done its job better than Hector ever could have hoped for, but even so, if he hadn't been undead, he likely would've ended up no more than canned meat by the time that fight had concluded.

But he could worry about that later.

Hector held up the iron box holding the captured reaper. ""This is Grigozo. He was the reaper to Banda Toro, whose empty husk is over there."" He motioned toward the much larger box behind him. ""Grigozo has surrendered and offered to tell us all he knows of Abolish or anything else. I was thinking of letting Hahl Saqqaf take the first crack at him, while I get some rest.""

Raheem perked up on the other side of the table. ""A generous offer, Lord. Thank you.""

Something tickled the back of Hector's mind, though. A thought or feeling that he couldn't quite recall but that still prompted him to say something more. ""He is still my prisoner, however. I will be upset if I find out later that he has been mistreated. Is that clear?""

Raheem settled back down a little, then looked toward Abbas.

""It is,"" said the Sunsmith, his expression unreadable beneath his armor.

""I'm sure Grigozo is still exhausted from the fight himself, so if he needs time to rest, then that's fine. I think we can afford to have some patience, now.""

""Very well,"" said Abbas. ""And why have you brought Banda's body back with you?""

""In case someone wanted to study it,"" said Hector. ""Your hahl is free to take first crack at that, too. In fact, now may be your best chance while most of the Rainlords are away.""

""Hmm."" Abbas took a step toward Banda. ""This fellow was like Bloodeye, yes?""

""Yeah. I figured that might interest you.""

""Interest may be a strong word. But if nothing else, I suppose I should take a look at his remains so that we might be better prepared to fight more of their ilk.""

Hector looked toward Raheem again. ""Would you mind taking Grigozo off my hands?""

""Not at all, Lord."" Raheem stood and came over to do exactly so.

""Where am I to take him?""

""The West Hall in the Star Tower should be fine. You can introduce him to Ericoros, if you want, but have some other reapers present, please.""

The man returned a firm nod. ""As you say, Lord."" And he was off."
"3268

It felt more than a little strange to have a man who was probably three times his age or more being so polite to him, but Hector tried not to let it bother him. There were more pressing matters in the moment.

With Grigozo out of the way, he could talk more freely to Abbas. ""I'd also like you to take a look at this for me,"" he said, handing his helmet over to the Sunsmith.

Abbas took it, though not without hesitation. ""Why? You do not already know what it is?""

""I... have an idea, but I'm not sure.""

""Is it not simply an alternate isotope of your normal iron?""

At that, Hector had to pause. He supposed that was technically possible, too. Isotopes hadn't even crossed his mind. That was something he'd been planning to put more effort into practicing, but there were always so many other things competing for his attention. Plus, he wasn't sure how useful it would even be, at this point. ""...Actually, I think it might be composed of the same material as the Amir-9.""

""Excuse me?!"" said Abbas.

'What the fuck?' added Garovel privately.

'I've got a lot to tell you later,' thought Hector.

'Sounds like it.'

Abbas pulled him aside, though still not out of earshot of the others. ""How in the world could that possibly be?!""

Hector could sense the other Saqqafs leaning over the table, straining to hear. ""It's... uh... kind of hard to explain.""

""Hector. I'm beginning to notice a pattern with you...""

""What do you mean?""

Rather than answering, the armored man merely sighed.

""Oh, and there's a possibility that someone from the Vanguard might show up here in Atreya, soon.""

""What?!""

""They'll be looking for me, not you. But if you're concerned about them discovering your whereabouts, you should probably be extra cautious around here--at least until I tell you otherwise. I have to get in contact with the Magician of Light, first.""

""The Magician of--?!""

'Hector, what the fuck are you talking about?'

Okay, maybe he was info-dumping a little too hard on them here. He scratched his head, trying to rethink his approach. ""Look, everything's fine. I just... might've... slipped through a dimensional portal or something during my fight with Banda. And then some... weird shit happened, and, uh...""

""Oh!"" said Roman, who was suddenly standing there next to him.

""When you got eaten! So that's how you were able to claw your way back out, then? Because of some weird shit?""

""Uh...""

"3269

The conversation didn't get much better from there. Multiple times, Hector had to struggle for the right words, reiterate points, and even start over to try and explain things chronologically.

He told them about the fight, about the lower realm of pure iron, about the creation of the new armor, and about his encounter with the Magician. Then about the fight again thereafter. That part seemed to create the most confusion, somehow. Probably because he sucked so bad at explaining.

But eventually, everyone seemed to understand. For the most part. Either that, or they simply grew too tired of trying to figure out what he was saying. They all had other things to be doing, after all.

They all went their separate ways, save Hector and Garovel, who headed over to his room in the Tower of Night so that he could get some sleep.

As they made their way across the high bridge that connected the Tower of Day to the Tower of Night, Hector couldn't help feeling like the reaper was being suspiciously quiet. He wasn't sure if he wanted to say anything yet, though.

The view, at least, was quite incredible from the tall, paneless windows along the bridge. All the little lanterns that now outlined each of the eight great towers and central courtyard below created a kind of starlit look to the giant cavern, as if the whole night sky had somehow been captured and brought down here.

Perhaps Garovel was too enraptured by the sight to say anything, at the moment.

Hector highly doubted it, though.

As they neared his room, however, the reaper finally spoke up, albeit privately.

'We need to have a serious conversation, Hector.'

He'd been getting that impression, as well. 'About you being left out of fights?'

'Yes. This can't continue.'

Hector exhaled a heavy breath and started up the final staircase to his room. 'Garovel...'

'Hear me out. I get it. You just want to protect me. And I appreciate that. I know it comes from a place of good intent. But I also can't just sit on the sidelines and let you go out there, alone. And yes, things have worked out well enough for you so far, but I'm sure that you yourself will admit that a lot of that has come down to either luck or things beyond your own control.'

Hector reached the top of the stairs and stopped. He could tell how important this was to Garovel, so he didn't want to just brush the reaper off.

But at the same time, he didn't know if Garovel knew how important this was to him. How important he was to him."

"3270

'There was no way I could bring you with me on this fight, Garovel. Not when I was so uncertain that I would even be able to DO anything. Exposing you to that kind of danger would've been pointless.'

'The point, my dear friend, is so that I could have helped you. Hector, I realize that you want to keep me safe, but you must also realize that I want to keep you safe, as well. And I can't do that if you keep pushing me away like this.'

Hector finished the journey to his bedroom and closed the door behind him. He flipped the light on and found it just as he'd left it. More space than he would probably ever need. His armor continued to clink as he went straight for his bed and sat down.

He didn't start taking off his armor yet, though. He just looked up at the reaper there.

At his best friend.

'Garovel, I don't...' Agh. How was he supposed to put this? He scratched his brow. 'Look. I'm happy that you care about me so much that you're willing to risk your own life in order to protect me. But... you also don't need to act like I am as important to you as you are to me.'

The reaper's skull reared back a little. 'What are you talking about? ""Act like?"" I'm not acting. You ARE that important to me, Hector. Do you not realize--?'

'No. It's okay. I'm not saying that to be mean. But let's be honest here. I'm just one of... twenty-two servants that you've had, right? So you've been through this song and dance before. Plenty of times.'

'Hector, that doesn't--'

'Listen! It's okay, Garovel! It really is!' Hector almost wanted to laugh. The reaper truly didn't get it, did he? 'I'm not saying that you think of me as just some tool to be used and thrown away or anything like that. Okay? I understand that you're concerned about me. But it's not the same from my end, Garovel. Not even close. To me, you are... you are more important than anything. I mean, you... you saved me.' He shook his head and laughed faintly. 'And I don't just mean with the whole undead thing, either. I mean... when I had no one, I had you.'

Garovel made no response.

'And you're still there for me. You haven't stopped being there for me this whole time. So to say that I'm as important to you as you are to me... well, that's just not true. Because it can't be. The impact I've had on your life doesn't even compare to the impact you've had on mine. Understand? Garovel, if something ever happened to you, like if you were to get captured by Abolish or something, then I... I don't know what I would do.'"

"3271

'Wow,' was all Garovel said.

Hector just waited, though. He didn't know how to follow up after saying all that.

Garovel seemed to be having trouble, too. 'Okay, well, um... I really wasn't expecting you to pour your heart out to me like that, Hector. I'm quite uncertain what to say now. How dare you say all of those nice things. You know I don't take sincere compliments well. You have to layer them with sarcasm or insults. Or sarcastic insults.'

'Oh, is that how it is?' said Hector. 'Well, maybe if you weren't so stupid, then you would've understood all of that stuff already and saved me the trouble of saying in the first place.'

'Yeah, okay, that's more like it. Thanks.'

'You're welcome.' Hector lay back on his bed. He still hadn't taken his armor off, save the helmet, which was with Abbas now. He didn't much feel like moving, was the problem. Taking this off was going to be a pain. Or perhaps even impossible.

'...I really mean that much to you, huh?' said Garovel. 'You sure you're not just saying that because the reality of the situation is that keeping me out of combat is the pragmatic thing to do?'

Hector arched his head up to look at the reaper again. 'Of course not. Although, that IS true. If I get killed, it's barely an issue. If you do, we're both fucked. I get that you want to contribute and be helpful, but you already are, Garovel. In so many other ways.'

'Mrgh.'

Hector cocked an eyebrow. 'Did you just growl at me?'

'Maybe. Y'know, it's really unfair when you make your case from both a rational and an emotional standpoint. How the hell am I supposed argue against that, huh? This is bullshit.'

Hector just laughed.

'Alright, you little jerk. Fine. I'll trust your judgment and stop causing a fuss when you run off all by yourself from now on. But I do think we need to train together more. In the event that I'm forced into the fight, it's best if we're prepared for it.'

'I can agree with that.'

'And besides, I'm increasingly coming to believe that the safest place I could possibly be is right there by your side.'

At that, he had to sit up again. 'I'd... like for that to be true, but I don't think I'm there yet, Garovel.'

"3272

'Of course you don't,' said Garovel. 'But c'mon, now. You just brought down Banda Toro in single combat. Frankly, you had no right winning that. And yet you did.'

'Well, eh... I mean, I didn't really win, though. His reaper released him before the fight could be decided, so--'

'Oh no, no, no. You're not going to get away with doing this again. You always try to pull this shit. Everyone else sees what you did and realizes that it's amazing, but then you constantly find things to nitpick so that you can continue to feel all self-conscious and unworthy of all the praise you've just earned. Nice try, buddy, but not this time.'

'I... uh...'

'Yeah, that's right. You've got nothin' to say, because you know that I'm right and that you're wrong. Just take the win, Hector.'

This seemed like one of those things that Garovel was going to harp on and never let go, for some reason. And while Hector appreciated the reaper's fervor, he didn't feel like getting sucked into some kind of back-and-forth silliness, right now.

Maybe later.

'Alright, Garovel, whatever you say.' He started working on getting his armor off, starting with the gauntlets. They were being stingy, though, as if they were glued to him.

It didn't take long for Garovel comment. 'What're you doing?'

'Trying to get this stuff off.' Agh. Goddammit.

'Just dematerialize it.'

He kept struggling with the first gauntlet. 'This armor is brand new and super weird. I'm kinda worried that if I dematerialize it, I might not be able to rematerialize it.'

'You already rematerialized it, though.'

Hector paused. 'What? No, I didn't.'

'Yeah, pal, you did. When I invoked the healing, back when you were still talking to Grigozo. You dematerialized that shoulder piece there to let me touch you, then immediately rematerialized it thereafter.'

Hector paused again. And kept pausing.

'...Did you really forget?'

Hector puffed up his cheeks as he recalled. Then he exhaled through his mouth. Dammit, the reaper was right.

'Wow,' Garovel went on. 'I know you have the flawed memory of a filthy corporeal being, but goddamn, Hector. That was like twenty minutes ago.'

He dematerialized most of the armor at once. His clothes were shredded, save only the Scarf. 'Why is it that whenever I start to feel kind of smart, I always end up doing something that reminds me I'm actually a big dumbass?'

The reaper chortled. 'Does that really keep happening to you?'

'It sure feels like it!'

'Maybe it's the universe's way of keeping you humble.'"
"3273

'Weren't you just telling me that I need to be more self-confident or some shit?' said Hector.

'That was different.'

'How was it different?'

'It just was. Stop questioning me.'

Hector snickered and shook his head. He rematerialized one of his gauntlets, just to make sure that he could. Yep. Worked just fine. That was a relief, at least.

He yawned. Man, he was exhausted.

And it was more than just his body, he realized. He'd felt this way before. It felt like his soul was tired. Or maybe his aura? Or neither? He had no idea how else to describe this sensation, whatever it was. He just knew he needed to sleep.

He lay back down after dematerializing the last of bits of armor on him. He could change his shredded clothes later.

Right as his head hit the pillow, however, his eyes eased open and stayed that way.

Because he remembered something else that he'd forgotten.

Multiple somethings, as a matter of fact. All assaulting his mind at once.

Fuck.

He sighed and sat back up. It was going to be a while before he was allowed to get some sleep, he knew.

He looked for his phone. It was there on the night stand next to his bed.

He called Carl Rondel, the Vanguardian advisor to the President of Lorent.

Thankfully, the man picked immediately. <""Yes? Any updates for me?"">

""My home was attacked by some of Bloodeye's scouts,"" said Hector. ""But it's been taken care of. What about you? Any news for me?""

<""They attacked Warrenhold?!"">

""Yeah, but we're all good, now. No casualties.""

<""But there's been no other attacks reported! Why would they skip all the way to your fortress in Atreya without invading Lorent first?"">

That was indeed a good question, Hector felt. ""It was a scouting party,"" he reiterated. ""Could be that they're still uncertain about whether they should invade Lorent or not.""

<""Then Zaman's information was off. The fool said a major offensive into Lorent was imminent."">

""It'd be nice if he was wrong, but it's a bit early to be feeling relieved. You're sure there's been no other activity?""

<""I'm certain. I have men stationed in almost every city in the country, providing constant updates and check-ins. If an attack is launched, I will know of it in minutes, one way or another."">

Hmm. Maybe Carl had more people working for him than Hector thought. ""Alright, well, call me if something develops, and I'll provide support however I can.""

"3274

<""Very well, then. But who was it that attacked you, exactly? Did you get their names?"">

""Banda Toro was their leader.""

There arrived a rustling sound. <""You fought Banda Toro?!"">

""Yeah."" Briefly, Hector considered mentioning the Magician of Light, too. It might be fun to hear Carl's reaction to that. He decided against it, though. He didn't know if Xander would appreciate having his name thrown around for shits and giggles. ""He brought a party of twenty-seven.""

<""Twen--?!"">

Not all of them had escaped or been killed. Some, Pauline had managed to capture with her psychic powers. What to do with them, Hector still had to decide. Thankfully, Warrenhold was not lacking space for prisoners, and he would likely have plenty more time to mull his decision over. Joana Cortes had taken point on handling them. He'd have to talk to her soon.

As for this conversation, however, Hector wasn't totally comfortable telling all of the details to Carl--specifically, the fact that he had captured Banda Toro's reaper. He knew only too well now that Carl was reporting on him back to his superiors in the Vanguard.

He could still tell Carl one more thing, though. ""Banda Toro is dead.""

<""You... you slew the Raptor of Kortan?"">

Egh. Technically, no. But he didn't want Carl to ask about the reaper. So he decided to ignore the question and move on. ""With their scouting mission a failure, I'm not sure what Bloodeye's next move will be. If he doesn't invade Lorent soon, then he may not do it at all, now.""

<""Ah... yes, perhaps. His attention is no doubt divided numerous ways. But a scouting party of twenty-seven seems quite a large commitment of resources. Were they all servants?"">

""...I'm not sure,"" Hector admitted. The thought that some of them might have been normal human beings hadn't even entered his mind, but he supposed it was possible.

He felt a bit worse about shredding some of them to pieces with iron.

And considering it was Abolish, could some of them have been forced into that mission against their will?

Maybe he would ask Grigozo about that later.

Those were all thoughts for background thought processes, though.

""You should talk to Ravi again. Ask him for an update from whoever his source is.""

Carl groaned. <""Fine."">

The Vanguardian had a few more questions for him, but Hector couldn't provide any answers. They soon ended their call, and Hector moved on to his next task.

Finding Pauline."

"3275

He also needed to update the Queen, of course, but checking up on Pauline's well-being was more pressing, he felt. While he was fairly sure that the Sparrow hadn't gotten hurt during the fight, he wanted to be certain. Plus, there were a few other things he needed to talk to her about.

The trek was annoyingly long, though. All the way back down the Tower of Night, across the courtyard. But before he could make it back to the Entry Tower, however, the Saqqafs found him again.

""You are not resting?"" said Abbas.

""I was going to, but I forgot to take care of some things,"" he said.
""Did you need something?""

""I wasn't going to bother you, but while you're here--"" Abbas was still armored up, and he showed both of his empty hands to Hector, which was momentarily confusing. ""--the helmet you gave me to examine has disappeared.""

What? Oh. That was strange. Had he done that accidentally when he dematerialized the rest of the armor? He rematerialized it into his hand and offered it again. ""Huh. Sorry about that.""

Abbas took it, then held up an armored finger. ""One moment, please."" Then he leapt away from the ground, rocketing up toward the distant cavern ceiling, reaching all the way to the place where the Tower of Night met the gray stalactites. He hovered there for a second, then came quickly back down and landed in exactly the same spot.

Hector noticed instantly. The dark helmet was no longer in his hands.

""Yes,"" said Abbas. ""You did not do that, I assume? It appears to be dematerializing on its own once it is beyond a certain proximity to you.""

Oh.

Hmm.

""This material is clearly quite different from your normal iron,"" said Abbas. ""It even breaks the conventional rules of materialization.""

Hector scratched his temple. ""Well, that's good to know, at least. I guess I won't be making any spare copies of my armor, then.""

""It would seem so. And if I am to study this material, you must remain close to me.""

Dang. ""Then I suppose we'll do that later. The other things I have to do right now can't wait.""

""I thought you might say that,"" said Abbas. He nodded to someone behind him, then waved them closer. ""In that case, Haqq will follow you around and perform preliminary examinations on it for us.""

And Hector blinked as Haqq Najir stepped forward."

Haqq Najir, of course, was a man that he had met before, back at the Golden Fort in Sair. He was also the brother of Asad Najir. And in their last meeting, Haqq had not been particularly nice.

Hector had known that Haqq was with Hahl Saqqaf's entourage this whole time, but he had yet to actually have a face-to-face with the man again. Which seemed strange, considering how prominent of a figure Haqq was within the Sandlords. And Hector had been wanting to talk to him, too, if only to see how the man was handling the news of his brother's capture at Uego.

But Hector had just been so busy. And seeking Haqq out hadn't seemed that important.

Here and now, Haqq Najir was looking rather haggard--not very much like the busy, attentive man of science that he had before.

Perhaps that wasn't so surprising, though. His escape from Sair had no doubt been a harrowing one. In fact, the look on his bespectacled face reminded Hector of Salvador Delaguna, a man who had lost many family members recently.

Thinking about all that, it was hard to keep the concern from his voice, but he tried. ""Hello again, Lord Haqq,"" said Hector, offering a handshake.

It took the man a few moments to shake it and meet Hector's gaze. ""Hello, Lord Goffe..."

Hector felt like he should say something more, but nothing came to mind. And a brief silence arrived.

Abbas seized the opening. ""Well, it would seem that I am not needed in the defense of Warrenhold,"" he said, ""so if it is all the same to you Lord Goffe, I shall simply leave a couple of my sons here with you and then return to Lorent. There is more work that I would see done. Perhaps you could call me when you are prepared for the examination?""

Hector gave the man an affirmative nod. ""Alright.""

And since he was already heading in that direction, Hector ventured with them back up through the Entry Tower and saw them off.

Apparently, they'd brought a helicopter, though not all of them needed to use it.

Only a handful of Saqqafs remained behind, along with Haqq Najir.

Hector bid the others to go back down into the castle and make themselves at home, but Haqq stayed with him, as per his assignment.

Then it was just Hector, Haqq, and Garovel.

'...Where is your reaper?' asked Garovel."

"3277

""Sazandara has been captured,"" said Haqq.

Hector's eyes widened a little. That was news to him. ""Do you know where she is being held?""

Haqq shook his head. And after a moment, he seemed to realize something. ""Ah, but I should clarify. She was not captured by Abolish, which is a small mercy, I suppose.""

'If not by Abolish, then who?' said Garovel.

""Hahl Mateen."" Haqq's weary gaze became briefly sterner as the name left his lips. ""She was visiting them when word of the invasion arrived. A perfectly amicable meeting between old friends. Until that news changed everything. The Mateens went into hiding and took her with them, as their prisoner.""

A glum silence filled the air until Garovel's soft voice broke it. 'They must not want her feeding you information regarding their whereabouts.'

""That is what she surmised, as well,"" said Haqq.

Damn. Hector knew the relations between the Hahls were bad, right now, but taking prisoners? That spoke of an extreme degree of paranoia. Or even malicious intent, maybe. If they wanted bargaining chips for future negotiations, then reapers made for pretty strong ones.

""But at least I know they will not harm her."" The man sighed. ""Unlike my brother...""

Agh. Hector felt for him. He wished there was some way of helping Asad. Knowing that he was in Morgunov's clutches couldn't have been much more comforting than news that he'd been killed. ""Rasalased told me that he thinks Asad will make it through this.""

Okay, maybe Rasalased hadn't used those exact words, but that had been the general sentiment that Hector had inferred.

Haqq didn't look particularly comforted, however.

Hector decided to drop the subject.

Before they got any closer to Pauline's nest, Hector suddenly thought better of having Haqq present for this. He doubted that she would appreciate being introduced to more strangers.

Well, her father wouldn't appreciate it, at least. She'd probably be delighted, now that he was thinking about it.

Either way, Hector asked Haqq to return to the castle, too. The man protested, though not hard, and then was off.

Pauline's nest was in the center of the decoy castle, at the top of an iron tower. He planned to provide her with a better one, eventually, but thus far, she'd seemed largely satisfied with it.

Thankfully, he could already sense her there via the Scarf of Amordiin.

But she was not alone. Which alarmed him.

Hector sensed the outlines of many other people surrounding her."
"3278

He clapped the dark armor back on and launched himself all the way up to her nest with a single, precise platform. The power behind the platform had to be just right in order for him to stick his landing with any kind of grace, but unfortunately, he didn't yet have enough experience using platforms while wearing this new armor.

He undershot it and just barely managed to grab the ledge before falling back down. He needed the aid of a hovering platform in order to pull himself over fully.

Dammit, said a background thought process. That was dumb. This armor was way heavier, so of course a move like that would be harder. He should've just raised a platform up like an elevator instead of trying to be all quick and flashy like a cool guy.

Pauline was invisible, as were all the people around her, but Hector could sense that she was staring at him now.

Well, that was embarrassing.

The invisibility melted away as she presumably realized there was no need for it.

And Hector could see the situation more clearly. The people surrounding her were rather odd-looking. They were still moving, though only just--and quite stiltedly, too. And their eyes--they were about as empty as could be. As if the lights were on but nobody was home.

'And here we have the Lord Goffe,' said Pauline. 'Wave hello, everyone!'

They all waved in perfect unison, though their movements were not smooth or natural-looking at all.

Hector began to get the picture ""...What are you doing?"" he said with a sigh.

'Oh, just killing time while I await some dashing hero to come check on me and make sure I'm not dead. What took you so long, huh? I get bored easily, you know.'

""I can see that...""

'Heh. Just thought I'd have some fun with our prisoners. I haven't played with humans like this since I was just a little chick.' Her feathers bristled for a moment. 'Because it's unethical to do on normal people, I mean. I didn't know any better back then. Hadn't yet developed into the mature and charming beacon of moral virtue that I am today.'

Hector abruptly felt stupid for having worried.

'Nice armor you got there, by the way,' she went on. 'Making a new fashion statement? Quite dark and scary. Oh, is it to intimidate your enemies? You should add some horns in that case. Or like an evil face, maybe."

"3279 -- CCLXXVII.

Casual though she sounded, Hector had to take pause at what she was doing here. It looked harmless enough, he supposed, but this was also the first time he was seeing a Sparrow using their mind powers to manipulate a person's body. ""Is that... just your normal telekinesis?"" he asked. ""Or are you actually manipulating their brains in order to make their limbs move?"" Perhaps that was a distinction without a difference, but to him, the latter seemed far scarier than the former.

Pauline tilted her head at him, taking a moment to deliberate. 'It's telekinesis. I don't think taking over the brain in such a way is even possible.'

Hector doubted that. Not her word but her opinion. Impossible? Unlikely. Such a power was far too similar to that of Geoffrey Rofal. Maybe he was mistaken and aberration abilities were not really comparable, but he had a feeling that there weren't many things that were truly impossible in this world.

Chapter Two Hundred Seventy-Seven: 'O, pernicious Weasel...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Boy, these Vantalayans were a real mess. Both politically and psychologically, they were all over the place. Saying one thing, doing the opposite. Arguing over minutiae and trivialities for hours. Perceiving slights left and right. Reading the absolute worst into every single person who didn't share their heady opinions about how their government should function.

Vanderberk found them hilarious.

So easy to provoke. One little word, one little idea floated in their direction--that was all it took to set some of these people off.

He had to give them credit, though. They weren't cowards. They spoke their minds, even to their bosses. Even to their bosses' bosses.

Even to him.

Granted, the latter was none too smart on their part, but Vanderberk could respect it. Not enough to let the ones who annoyed him live, but he could respect it. He made sure they were properly buried afterward, at least. Courage deserved some kind of reward, after all.

This whole war front was quite the shit show. The Vantalayan borders were a constant battleground in both the east and west. Vantalay, alone, was fighting four separate nations in this war. Lyste in the west, and Naos, Yena Maria, and Czacoa in the east. Thankfully, those last three were tiny countries with scarcely enough independent military power to take down a few violent smugglers, let alone the Vantalayan Armed Forces."

"3279 -- CCLXXVII.

Casual though she sounded, Hector had to take pause at what she was doing here. It looked harmless enough, he supposed, but this was also the first time he was seeing a Sparrow using their mind powers to manipulate a person's body. ""Is that... just your normal telekinesis?"" he asked. ""Or are you actually manipulating their brains in order to make their limbs move?"" Perhaps that was a distinction without a difference, but to him, the latter seemed far scarier than the former.

Pauline tilted her head at him, taking a moment to deliberate. 'It's telekinesis. I don't think taking over the brain in such a way is even possible.'

Hector doubted that. Not her word but her opinion. Impossible? Unlikely. Such a power was far too similar to that of Geoffrey Rofal. Maybe he was mistaken and aberration abilities were not really comparable, but he had a feeling that there weren't many things that were truly impossible in this world.

Chapter Two Hundred Seventy-Seven: 'O, pernicious Weasel...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Boy, these Vantalayans were a real mess. Both politically and psychologically, they were all over the place. Saying one thing, doing the opposite. Arguing over minutiae and trivialities for hours. Perceiving slights left and right. Reading the absolute worst into every single person who didn't share their heady opinions about how their government should function.

Vanderberk found them hilarious.

So easy to provoke. One little word, one little idea floated in their direction--that was all it took to set some of these people off.

He had to give them credit, though. They weren't cowards. They spoke their minds, even to their bosses. Even to their bosses' bosses.

Even to him.

Granted, the latter was none too smart on their part, but Vanderberk could respect it. Not enough to let the ones who annoyed him live, but he could respect it. He made sure they were properly buried afterward, at least. Courage deserved some kind of reward, after all.

This whole war front was quite the shit show. The Vantalayan borders were a constant battleground in both the east and west. Vantalay, alone, was fighting four separate nations in this war. Lyste in the west, and Naos, Yena Maria, and Czacoa in the east. Thankfully, those last three were tiny countries with scarcely enough independent military power to take down a few violent smugglers, let alone the Vantalayan Armed Forces."

"3280

But they had support. From the Vanguard, most obviously, but also from other, quieter sources, Vanderberk knew. Possibly Intar, if the rumors were true, though he didn't know if he believed them. Steccat seemed much more likely to his mind, though he doubted he would ever find proof of that. Those elitist Steccacti pricks were as secretive as they were insufferable, but they had to know that if Vantalay won this war, it wouldn't be good for them in the long term. It would probably just be a matter of a few years until these gutsy Vantalayans decided to launch another invasion north.

And Void willing, Vanderberk would be there for that war, too.

Why Steccat hadn't joined in on the action already, he could probably guess. Sai-hee was rumored to have a vice grip on that country's political landscape, and she hated getting directly involved in war unless someone forced her hand.

Not the best policy, he felt. But what did he know? She was the empress, not him. She probably had other reasons, too.

Other excuses, heh.

And then, of course, there were these Rainlords.

A bigger thorn in his side, he had not experienced in some time. They were entirely unpredictable to his mind, right now: the big wild card in this mess at the edge of the continent.

And in fact, there was an argument to be made that their decisions here could determine the course of the entire war. If the Vantalayan conflict found a decisive victor soon, the winner would then have considerable resources to send to the other fronts.

With Calthos on the verge of complete conquest and Kavia also doing well, help from Vantalay could quite easily push one or even both of those conflicts over the edge in Abolish's favor.

A decisive victory here might very well mean a decisive victory in three out of the five main fronts.

That was the best case scenario, though. Vanderberk knew better than to put all his eggs in that basket. Things rarely went so smoothly. And heck, even if they did, Steccat and Intar would be quite unlikely to standby at that point. Their hands would be forced.

Which, in its own way, would be enough for Abolish. Stirring up a war that involved all three of the Eloan superpowers? That was just about the best thing they could've hoped for, even if the tide then turned against them."

"3281

And even that was debatable. Even with Melmoore, Intar, and Steccat all teaming up against them, Vanderberk didn't think that Abolish would stand no chance, especially if the bosses decided to get more intimately involved in the war again. Heck, such a development might be exactly what was needed in order to prompt them into direct action.

Man, it sure would've been nice if Dozer stepped in, at least. Morgunov had already accomplished more than everyone else combined, so Vanderberk didn't expect him to come back and help out. No doubt, the Mad Demon would be profoundly disappointed in him if Vanderberk thought otherwise.

Morgunov had started this war for them. It was their turn to make him proud.

Dozer, though? Increasingly, Vanderberk didn't know what the others saw in the old man. He couldn't even remember the last time he'd seen or heard of Dozer achieving anything of significance. It was always just idle chatter. Talk of things that would likely never come to pass. Meetings that went nowhere and pushed nothing forward.

Vanderberk had sent word to him in Ardora, asking for his assistance here in Vantalay, but there had of course been no response. Not even a refusal. Just silence. The disrespect in that was palpable.

The Living Void, they called him. As if he were an incarnation of the Void itself, the all-powerful god that every true heart within Abolish loved and revered. Supposedly.

Vanderberk didn't want to doubt him. Didn't want to hate him. He'd admired Dozer since he was himself just a boy. And being able to meet him had been one of the most amazing experiences of his life.

But these days, he couldn't help feeling like all that praise over all those years might've just been undeserved. Compared to Morgunov, Dozer was... unimpressive.

Maybe it was a good sign that he felt this way, though. Maybe it meant that he was beginning to reach that dizzy height himself, and so the others who stood upon their own mountaintops had ceased looking so far away from him.

Heh. Arrogance, many would call that. Of course they would. He supposed he would just have to show them otherwise.

These Rainlords would be a good start, one way or another. Whether they decided to take him up on his offer or foolishly fight him, it was a winning play here for him. With that bastard Graves having already left Ridgemark, there was now no one in this country who could stand against him."

According to his spies and scouts, Graves was off to the Kavia-Hoss front, which was certainly not good news for Jercash, but Vanderberk had already sent word warning him. And even if he hadn't, Jercash probably would've been just fine. The Devil's Knife had a way of coming out on top despite all appearances to the contrary. No doubt, it had much to do with the powerful following he had cultivated for himself.

Now there was a man that Vanderberk felt he could still learn from. If he was being brutally honest with himself, the ability to inspire loyalty was something he'd always struggled with. Abolish's central goals of rampant destruction and genocide made that quite difficult in this modern world. How Jercash managed to pull it off as well as he did, Vanderberk very much wanted to know. The man made it seem so effortless and was always evasive when asked about it directly.

Clever bastard. He didn't want Vanderberk using his tricks to amass a force that could rival his own when the time eventually came for new leadership to take the reins of Abolish.

And in Vanderberk's mind, such a time was soon to arrive. At long last. The first Continental War had proved a similar catalyst. Morgunov and Dozer had hardly budged, of course, but the shake ups everywhere else had been tremendous. In fact, that war had been when Vanderberk first began to distinguish himself as a rising star within the ranks.

Now he was leading. Now he was the one looking for rising stars within his men.

But of course, that was dangerous, too. For some of his men, their concept of career advancement was slaying their superiors and seizing control for themselves. Vanderberk knew he had to be exceedingly cautious, especially because he was the newest and therefore the least respected among the Abolish high command. He would undoubtedly be perceived as the softest target, when compared against the likes of Jercash and Gohvis.

That was, in large part, why he had to be the most ruthless.

If he wasn't proactive in rooting out backstabbers, if he didn't temper his subordinates' ambitions with fear, they would come for him first.

Here in Vantalay, there were several such dangerous candidates. Thaddeus Croll, Raga Marda, Jan Cross. And others, of course. In some sense, they were bigger threats in this conflict than the enemy was."

"3283

The most danger was when boredom took hold, when the enemy was too weak to even demand consideration. Thankfully, between the RPMP and the Rainlords, there were still a few famed opponents left who could keep his men occupied with their pursuit of glory. Darktide, Evangelina Stroud, the Water Dragon of Sair, the Jailer of Ridgemark, the Linebreaker, the Black Artisan. And a couple others whom had yet to be concretely identified.

Vanderberk rolled his neck while he waited patiently, a smile on his face and his feet up on the warden's desk as he also enjoyed the comfort of the warden's soft, velvety chair. The warden himself was standing on the other side of the room, arguing with his vice-warden over something, making yet another amusing fuss that Vanderberk had ceased paying attention to.

Marda was standing next to them and would soon handle whatever their conflict was, if they didn't handle it themselves. The Demon's Tiger was not given to speaking very often, but when he did, he was not one to be ignored, refused, or even argued with.

The little Rainlord young'un sat in the corner of the warden's office, observing silently. Not that he had much choice, of course. Vanderberk had no intention of letting him move a single muscle until this upcoming meeting was finished.

The Rainlords were certainly taking their sweet time getting back to him. No doubt, they were torn about making any sort of deal with him. This was where his infamy became more of a liability than an aid, but he wasn't too concerned, either way. If they couldn't bring themselves to bargain, then he'd be only too happy to make an example out of them, instead. And not just to the rest of Vantalay but also to his own men. It had been a while since he'd last made a big show of things. Wouldn't hurt to give them another reminder of why they should continue to fear him.

Of course, that wouldn't be ideal. The entire reason he was even making the Rainlords an offer in the first place was because getting them out of here with no further difficulty would afford him much more flexibility and resources for bringing this Vantalayan conflict to a swift conclusion, Ridgemark in particular.

Apparently, the RPMP was proving quite the stubborn group of rebels. Vanderberk had yet to encounter any of their three top warriors himself, but according to his men, they were the primary obstacles in the conquest of Ridgemark."

"3284

The argument between the wardens reached a suddenly heightened pitch, prompting Vanderberk to start paying attention again.

""There must be recompense!"" said the vice-warden in Valgan. ""The prisoner must be made an example of for all to see! Cell Block Y will not settle for anything less! They are already our most volatile guards! If we do nothing to soothe their anger, this problem will worsen!""

Recompense? For what? Oh, were they upset at his treatment of them, Vanderberk wondered? Fragile little egos for fragile little men. A tale as old as time. But wait. Who then was this prisoner they wanted to punish?

""Such a request is improper and unwise!"" said the warden. ""Cease your blustering! There is a bigger picture here!"" He turned to Vanderberk. ""Forgive my vice-warden, sir. He speaks out of turn and knows not the level of respect that you and anyone in your custody deserves.""

Oh, were they talking about the Rainlord kid over there? Vanderberk snickered. They wanted to make an example out of him?

Ah, that was right, wasn't it? The kid did make all of their veteran guardsmen look like fools, after all.

Idiots. Throwing a fit after the fact wasn't making them look any better. But perhaps the vice-warden was exaggerating their frustration. Middle management had a tendency to behave that way. Professing to do something for the sake of those below them, when in reality those below them couldn't have given less of a shit.

No telling. Vanderberk saw Marda eyeing him, silently waiting for permission. Vanderberk gave him a nod.

The vice-warden spoke up again, but he didn't even make it through his first word before Raga Marda's thick hand found his neck. The vice-warden clutched at the hand, vainly trying to free himself as Marda dragged him out of the office and out of Vanderberk's sight.

This was far from the first time that Marda had handled things in such a way. Honestly, Vanderberk wasn't even sure what the Tiger did with all the people he'd dragged off like that over the years. At first, Vanderberk had thought he was just throwing them out like a typical bouncer, but he'd recently heard some rumors from the men that Marda was actually chopping them up and eating them. Or flaying alive. Or collecting their brains in jars as gifts for Morgunov. Or all of the above, perhaps.

Vanderberk might have to ask him about that later."

"3285

The warden rattled off a few more apologies and then shuffled out of the room. Hopefully, he didn't intend to follow the Tiger and try to get his vice-warden back, otherwise Logden Prison would be needing two new leaders come the morrow.

With everyone but the Rainkid gone, it seemed the entertainment was over for now. Vanderberk exhaled a sigh and eyed the briefcase by his side. He did still have plenty of reports to go over, so he supposed he should take advantage of the down time while it lasted. He usually hated paperwork, but recently, the reports had gotten more interesting, thanks to the war. Being able to get updates on how things were progressing across the continent made all the reading a bit less dry.

Let's see here...

This first one was about Czacoa. Ah. Risto and Voss had broken through the enemy lines? Finally. Oh, but wait, they'd been pushed back. Shit. So much for that. Who pushed them back? Looked like a man named... Harva Zon.

Hmm. Someone else to keep an eye on, he supposed.

The next report was from Melmoore. He prepared himself for bad news. They seemed to be struggling the hardest over there, which perhaps wasn't so surprising since none of their most powerful warriors had been sent to either of those two fronts--the logic being that they were few in number and shouldn't even have been needed, besides. Between Corrico invading from the south and Ostra invading from the north, Melmoore should have been among the easier conquests, even if it was one of the three so-called ""continental superpowers.""

At the outbreak of the war, there had been no prominent Vanguardians stationed there, other than the Surgeon Saint, and he didn't become famous because of his fighting ability.

But apparently, much like here in Vantalay, there were local warriors making an impact over there. And the Surgeon was being no pushover, himself. By now, he'd already decimated two major offensives into the country with little more than a handful of troops at his disposal. Plus, there'd been rumors of ghosts roaming around, haunting encampments, slaughtering men while they slept, and otherwise sowing terror among the ranks.

And indeed, this new report was not a welcome one, either. An informant had learned of a secret meeting to take place in two days between influential political leaders from both Corrico and Melmoore."
"3286

To Vanderberk's mind, a meeting such as that would only be for one reason. Preliminary peace negotiations. Most probably, for Corrico's eventual surrender. Things were going too well for Melmoore right now for it to be anything else.

Damn, it was too soon. He couldn't leave Vantalay yet. Perhaps he could send someone to bolster Corrico's forces, but who? Agh. He wanted to wait until Graves' name popped up again before committing any men to such an endeavor. There was a decent possibility that Graves was headed to Melmoore, and if so, then sending more men there would be a waste of resources unless Jercash was also sending some. Or Dozer, that old bastard.

Agh. If the Melmoorian invasion was to be salvaged, then something would have to be shaken loose soon, either here in Vantalay or one of the other fronts. Corrico surrendering so early would lead into Ostra being overwhelmed not long thereafter, and then the Vanguard would be able to divert even more men or resources to other trouble spots.

Such as Sair, where the next report came from. Bloodeye was still having difficulty pushing into the Wetlands, which was at once surprising and also not. The Vanguard presence in that country was so greatly diminished that the task should have been a simple one, but Bloodeye had been stuck for a while now, so the fact that there was no change could not be considered shocking.

The exact question of why was still a persistent one, though. According to various sources, they knew it wasn't Jackson leading the defense over there, at least not directly. So who was the one holding the Vanguard remnants together?

And what was this about a failed venture into Lorent? Banda Toro had been slain, too?

Everywhere they went, it seemed the same story was playing out. Local warriors causing headaches. It was hard to argue that Abolish's heavy focus on the Vanguard had made it all but blind to the many other threats in the world.

This was where Ivan's presence was sorely missed, Vanderberk felt. If he were still with them, then many of these lesser-known opponents would not have been able to take them by surprise. Jercash's replacements for the Salesman of Death could only do so much on such short notice.

As ever, many of these issues could in some way be traced back to Gohvis. If only he had listened to Vanderberk when they clashed and gone to retrieve Ivan. So much of this might have been avoided now."
"3287

But no. The Monster of the East was too isolated and self-obsessed to see anything of the big picture. Or he just flatly didn't care.

There were many people whom Vanderberk hated in this world, but there may have been none moreso than Gohvis. And not just because the Monster had humiliated him, either.

The lord of the mutants was immune to reason--and a bastard, besides. How much better would this war be going for Abolish if that lazy piece of shit had actually gotten involved? Even just a little?

Vanderberk knew the root of the problem. Gohvis didn't see any of them as comrades or even peers. He placed himself on the same level as Dozer and Morgunov--hell, maybe even higher. Such was his overblown ego. Vanderberk so badly would've liked to see one of the emperors humble that unruly lizard. And the more time that went by, the more likely it seemed that such a clash was inevitable. Vanderberk only hoped that he would be there when it happened.

A knock on the office door arrived, and Vanderberk looked up. ""Enter,"" he said in Valgan.

A vaguely familiar face appeared. One of runners, though Vanderberk couldn't recall the name. There was usually no point. Here in Abolish, runners didn't last long enough to warrant remembering. It was probably among the deadliest jobs in the world.

""For you, sir."" The runner placed a note on the desk, gave a quick bow, and then was off again, satchel bouncing against his waist as he sped away.

Wise to not stay. Maybe that one would survive longer than most. Bad news tended to bring out the worst in him and his men.

It was not bad news, however. Just an update from the Rainlords. They had suggested another location to meet.

There had been an annoying back-and-forth between him and them while they tried to agree on where best to discuss things further. Obviously, if he'd let them have their first, second, or third choice of location, he would have been giving them an advantage. And while he did not fear them, there was no telling what kind of wily stunt they might try to pull here. Supposedly, they were too honorable for that sort of thing, but they were also wounded and desperate, right now. In a way, that made them more dangerous than normal, not less. It made them unpredictable.

So he'd been refusing their suggested meeting places, and they had been doing the same."

"3288

It wasn't just an annoying game, though. Their suggested locations told him something of their general state of mind, as his probably did in return. His first two tries had been populated areas. A baseball stadium in downtown Logden. A public park in the nearby town of Karina.

Typically, public settings were supposed to give a sense of comfort for meetings that might otherwise be uneasy. A way of ensuring neither party got any ideas about making a scene.

But these Rainlords knew better, of course. He hadn't really expected them to agree. They would've been placing themselves at a tremendous disadvantage, what with their hearts that bled for civilians and so-called ""innocents.""

Still, though, it would've been funny if they'd agreed. Careless and stupid of them, but funny. And it had been a simple way of testing them. If they'd said yes to those, then clearly they hadn't brought their best and brightest to Vantalay.

Naturally, their suggestions were the opposite. Isolated areas, far away from people. Truthfully, any of them would've been fine. Vanderberk was just fucking with them because he could.

But the news from Melmoore was troubling enough that he supposed he should stop being a dick already and get on with it. They were suggesting a place called Dakinsalla.

Oddly enough, he was already familiar with the name. It belonged to a waterfall basin, relatively nearby but still nestled deep in the mountains, just like Logden itself was.

He'd been there before. It was a favored spot of one of Gohvis' mutant followers. A real weirdo named Lucanus. The guy probably wouldn't be too pleased to find the place utterly obliterated upon his eventual return.

But eh, fuck him.

Vanderberk went over to the Rainkid. ""Tell them I agree,"" he said, allowing the kid to move his head again. ""Dakinsalla is fine. Nod if they've gotten the message.""

And he waited.

The reason the Rainlords had sent him a letter instead of just using the kid to relay their suggestion was because Thaddeus had crushed the kid's windpipe yesterday. Vanderberk still wasn't sure why. He only knew that there'd been a conversation, and Thaddeus hadn't liked whatever the kid had to say to him.

Vanderberk had not been pleased. He nearly sent Thaddeus back to Ridgemark. If he didn't want the Killer with him during the meeting, then he absolutely would have."

"3289

Combined with the revelation that Thaddeus had also been breaking the Rainkid's fingers one at a time during an even earlier conversation, it had quickly become clear that Vanderberk should not allow Croll to be alone with this kid, anymore. Whether it was because the kid didn't know when to shut up or because Croll just hated the Rainlords after doing battle with them for weeks, Vanderberk didn't know. Maybe both.

At length, the kid did indeed return the nod Vanderberk had been looking for. Good. They could finally get this show on the road.

He sent word to his men and began preparing to leave immediately.

The fact that the negotiations were not going to take place within the prison itself also posed a certain level of risk. The prison had been his third suggested location, which they'd also intelligently refused. He could have insisted--and perhaps should have--but between the prison guards and his own men, Vanderberk had plenty of power to divide between here and the meeting place. If the Rainlords decided to try something hinky like staging a prison break while he was distracted with negotiations, they would find themselves overwhelmed in both places.

And he would of course be keeping men at both locations who could deal with any Invisibility users. The Rainlords had probably learned their lesson already about using Abolish's own tech against them, but if not, then that would make for a nice surprise, too.

As they made their way down the narrow mountain pass in a line of military vehicles, the late afternoon sun cut a picturesque image across the uneven landscape on the horizon. One might've thought that they would be able to see quite far into the distance when they were this high up, but no. The mountains here were so dense that the horizon was perhaps only two or three miles away.

The trip to Dakinsalla took longer than expected. The winding roads down and then back up the mountains made the journey thrice what it would've been if he'd just flown, but oh well. Not all of his men could fly, and the backup was necessary here.

He wasn't afraid of the Rainlords, but he didn't want to be overconfident, either. They could be a problem if they swarmed him while he was alone, especially since he was still lacking intel on some of them."

"3290

Only after a sudden break in the treeline did Dakinsalla come into view. From this low angle, the waterfall had the enormity of a skyscraper, and the roaring noise could already be heard over the sound of the vehicle's engine as they approached. It was even catching the sun just right and offering a pleasing rainbow for their arrival, which hardly seemed appropriate for these circumstances, but Vanderberk certainly didn't mind.

Everyone exited their vehicles.

Vanderberk was already in pan-rozum with his reaper, Elinox. He was in the habit of being exceptionally cautious with his reaper, even in the presence of his own men, whom he expected might try to assassinate him at any moment. Keeping Elinox close at all times was therefore a requirement. Usually, that meant tucking the reaper beneath his shirt like a concealed weapon.

Thankfully, Elinox had gotten accustomed to this strategy many years ago and rarely complained or even spoke up at all. Perhaps the reaper had even grown to enjoy hiding himself in plain sight and eavesdropping on many unsuspecting speakers.

The Rainlords, meanwhile, appeared not to have arrived yet, which was obviously suspicious. Vanderberk didn't intend to wait very long for them. The first thing he did was start making calls back to the prison. Marda, Cross, and then to the tower watchmen directly in order to be extra sure.

""If you see so much as a tree moving strangely, you call me and let me know,"" said Vanderberk.

""Yes, sir.""

If the Rainlords' strategy here really was as simple as trying to lure him away from the prison long enough to break their brethren free, then they were going to be sorely upset. While the trip here by car had taken a while, it would not take him long at all to fly back there in a fury and start raining hell down on them. He'd make sure to kill every single one of the hostages before the day was done.

But for now, all remained quiet. So Vanderberk decided to keep a cool head and give the Rainlords a few more minutes.

The natural beauty of this area might have been having a calming effect on him, too.

In terms of manmade structures, there wasn't much here to speak of. Only a modest viewing platform sat at the base of the river, though it did have a roof built over it to shield from the occasional mist of water that managed to make it this far. A little plaque sat in the center of it, describing the location's history."

"3291

In ancient times, the local people believed that Dakinsalla was a meeting place of people and spirits who were traveling between worlds. The exact spot where water hit water was said to be where one could easily break through into the afterlife, while the water and mist that splashed away allowed for spirits from the other side to arrive in this one.

Vanderberk couldn't help thinking that there was an obvious kernel of truth to that. If some fool decided to jump in there, seeking to find the afterlife, then he would indeed probably find it as the waters crushed and drowned him. Maybe these ancient people had a cruel sense of humor.

A part of him had been hoping to find Lucanus here. The extra bit of backup wouldn't have hurt. Hell, maybe he was here and Vanderberk just couldn't sense him. The man could conceal himself quite well in the wilderness, and as Vanderberk recalled, Lucanus had a leafy shelter around here that blended in impossibly well.

It didn't take long for Vanderberk to begin growing impatient. A few more minutes transpired, and still no Rainlords had appeared. He checked back with his men at the prison, and there was still no word of their appearance there, either. He kept reaching out with Elinox's senses, too, but there was nothing.

Eventually, he turned to the Rainkid. ""Are they en route?"" he said.

An odd look crossed the kid's face, and his gaze went between Vanderberk's men, lingering on Croll for a moment who was watching the boy like a hawk. The kid gave a nod, though it seemed uncertain by Vanderberk's assessment.

Ugh. He hated this waiting. ""Tell them if they don't get here soon, I'm leaving.""

Another nod, this one with slightly less trepidation behind it.

A few more minutes transpired with no change.

And perhaps he was struggling with the boredom, too, because Croll decided to strike up a conversation with Vanderberk while they had a bit of distance from the others. ""You sure it was wise to split us up like this?"" he asked.

""Maybe not, but the enemy poses little threat to us, either way. And if we continued to do nothing, then they would, too. A stalemate would not have been of benefit to us.""

""Why not? You afraid of what's happening elsewhere in this country? Or elsewhere in the war at large?""

"3292

Vanderberk had still been admiring the view and not looking at Croll directly, but something about those questions made his eyes shift over to the man. ""It's not your place to ask why, Killer.""

Croll met his gaze steadily, not shying away as so many others would when he looked at them.

This was unsurprising. The Killer of Krohin was a man of unusual intensity, even by Abolish's standards. He was unlikely to be intimidated by anyone, even emperors.

Vanderberk sent out an invisible wave of soul-empowered, pressurized helium. Combined with his reaper senses, the wave would tell him if there were any suspiciously empty spaces in the area.

Such as Rainlords cloaked with Invisibility, trying to sneak up on him while he was distracted.

But there was nothing. No one. Not on the ground, not in the air, not over the river.

""Keeping me in the dark won't benefit you in the long run,"" said Thaddeus. ""The more informed I am of your intentions, the better I can help you achieve them.""

No. This still wasn't right. Croll didn't make small talk. He didn't inquire about plans or idly speculate on things. He asked for orders or perhaps permission, then took action. Where was this change in behavior coming from? Had he done something? Was this conversation to stall for time?

Rather than answering, Vanderberk lifted his phone to call the prison again.

It fell apart in his hand, broken in two.

Vanderberk's eyes returned to the Killer, only to see the man sheathing his sword but not removing his hand from the hilt. ""You choose now to make your move against me?"" said Vanderberk. ""When our numbers across the continent are already so diminished?""

The Killer made no response.

And again thanks to Elinox's senses, Vanderberk could abruptly sense something wrong the other men he'd brought along for this meeting. They collapsed to the ground in unison, not moving.

How did Croll neutralize them all in an instant like that? One moment they'd been fine, and now they weren't. Stranger still, they didn't seem to be dead, and the Killer of Krohin certainly wasn't known for his ability to subdue his opponents without killing them. If he'd used his sword, they'd all be in the same state as his phone, right now.

For some reason, however, the Rainkid had been left untouched. The boy was just standing there by the nearest vehicle, still unable to move.

Had Croll intentionally spared him? Or had it actually been Vanderberk's own invisible prison that protected him?"

"3293

""What's your plan here, Killer? Surely you don't think you can defeat me alone."" Was he banking on the Rainlords showing up to help him?

A sharp pain arrived in his skull, so sudden and intense that he had to endure it for a few moments before using Elinox's power to numb it. Which provided Croll with an opening to attack.

The Killer lunged straight toward him, unsheathing his blade.

In a blink, Vanderberk was bisected in two, straight down the middle.

If he wasn't already in pan-rozum, that might have been a small problem. The blade flashed again, and Vanderberk raised a hand to catch Croll's sword arm with a helium prison. Croll would be able to resist it, Vanderberk knew, but it would still be enough to slow or even deflect the attack.

It did nothing, however. Croll's attack continued, unabated, and sliced Vanderberk diagonally from shoulder to hip.

What the hell?

Croll didn't let up. He kept slashing away.

More confused than upset, Vanderberk resorted to his full helium form in order to begin dodging more easily. The blade whiffed or passed through his gaseous body as Vanderberk focused on creating space between him and Croll while he reassessed.

Several things were wrong here. The world around him seemed to slow as he sorted through them all.

One. Croll had not only betrayed him but done it stupidly. Alone, the man stood no chance here, so where was his backup? Vanderberk couldn't sense anyone.

Two. Vanderberk couldn't stop or slow Croll's attacks, as if he wasn't even feeling the helium interruptions.

Three. Where had that sharp headache come from? A psychic assault? Croll had no such power, as far as Vanderberk knew.

Four. Croll's attacks were sloppy. Despite how much power was behind them and how fast they appeared, these slashes were actually quite slow, by Croll's standards. Rather than cutting him into two, the Killer of Krohin should have been able to dice a vulnerable Vanderberk into dozens of pieces in that same amount of time. Vanderberk had seen Croll's swordwork countless times before, so unless the man was holding back, this made little sense.

Five. The other incapacitated subordinates. What had happened to them? They weren't dead. If Croll had really attacked them, they would be.

That was enough. Vanderberk came back to reality, having a new test in mind for his opponent."

"3294

No more invisible helium attacks. This time, a quite visible wave of solid blades was the strategy.

When it came to materializable elements, helium was a bit of a problem child. Vanderberk had struggled with it fruitlessly for many, many years, thinking that he could use it the way so many other materializers used their elements. Even after learning pan-rozum, that old struggle had been renewed in some ways.

Helium was a noble gas. Inert. It did not react to other elements. He therefore couldn't use the transfiguration aspect of pan-rozum in order to combine his materialized helium with the elements in his own body to create explosions. A common trick for pan-rozum users, but unavailable to him.

Helium also did not freeze easily. Even at absolute zero, it would stubbornly remain a liquid unless one also applied an incredible degree of pressure to it.

Which was why these blades of solid helium were so difficult to make.

And why he tended to go overboard when doing so. He'd trained too hard for them to be useless.

A tidal wave of helium blades filled his vision, shredding the quaint wooden viewing platform he'd been standing on into millions of flying splinters as they swarmed Croll.

He hovered in the air, helium legs keeping him aloft while fragments of wood were swept away by the river's current below. And he watched the utter mayhem of his attack unfold. The chunk of forest behind Croll had all but exploded, shredded trees toppling over each other or simply bursting apart on impact. In the chaos of it, Vanderberk nearly lost track of Croll's soul signature.

When the dust and splinters began to settle, Vanderberk saw Croll more clearly again. The man had been skewered near a hundred times but was still standing. Barely.

""Enough of this game,"" said Vanderberk. ""The real Thaddeus Croll would have survived that with nary a scratch."" Well, maybe that was an exaggeration. Tough to say without testing the Killer more extensively. But this imposter wouldn't know any of that. ""Who are you?""

Croll merely remained standing there, so disfigured by the blades that he seemed perhaps unable to respond--or do anything else for that matter.

Shit. Vanderberk hoped he hadn't accidentally killed whoever this was already. He still wanted answers. And a lot of them.

Hmm. Trying to stall for time? They'd stopped him from calling the prison again, so he supposed if they were still alive, they would be forced to stop him from returning there, too."

"3295

He was still hesitating, though. He kept expecting someone else to appear as if from nowhere. An attack from just outside his peripheral vision or sensory range. This couldn't really be the extent of his opponent's resistance. Had they simply underestimated him that badly?

Well. Maybe they had. Certainly wouldn't be the first time.

Paranoia getting to him again. Agh. He shook his head, knowing he needed to move quickly. The prison was due south--and close. If he flew at top speed, it would be--

A surge of wind cut him in two. Vanderberk almost hadn't sensed it in time. His gaseous body melted back together easily, and he looked down at the fake Croll again, as that was the direction from which the attack had arrived.

Sure enough, Croll looked normal once more. No longer skewered or disfigured in the slightest. Where had all the blades gone?

""Stay and play with me a little longer, Weasel of the Wicked Sight."" It was still Croll's voice and Croll's face, but the words and expression were completely wrong now. The imposter seemed to be enjoying this.

Vanderberk, however, saw no merit in staying. The attack just now had been toothless. He bolted straight up into the sky, intent on ignoring any follow ups from the fake and heading straight back to Logden.

Then the entire world went dark.

He saw the land above his head, arching impossibly toward him, as if within a twisted mirror. It was illuminated as clearly as day, despite the sun having vanished. And Croll's face appeared before him, disembodied and far too large.

""I'm afraid I must insist,"" said the illusion. ""Stay.""

Psychic tricks, rather obviously. More advanced than he'd seen in a while. But still tricks, all the same.

He flew higher, aiming to punch through the illusory land. Vanderberk would not be disoriented so easily. He still remembered where to go.

When he touched the land, however, he bounced off of it and was sent falling, spiraling back down.

What the fuck was that? No. He hadn't bounced off. It had just seemed that way. The illusion and the timing. Something had hit him. Clobbered him, actually.

An attack that he hadn't been able to ignore. Finally.

Croll faces were all around him, now, bobbing in the air with mocking grins. That looked especially wrong. The real Croll probably didn't know how to smile."

"3296

"Alright," said Vanderberk, looking between all the different faces, "you've proven you're more than a mere illusionist. If you want to play, then why don't you begin by telling me who I'm dealing with?"

"Curious, are you?" said the face directly behind him.

"Too bad for you," said one to his right.

"Die in ignorance," said the one straight ahead of him.

The next attack came from behind. Vanderberk only sensed it via another pulse of invisible helium, empowered with his soul. It was an orb of some kind, moving at high speed. He avoided it simply enough, but when he looked to see what the thing actually was, he saw nothing. Regardless, he sent a blind assault of freezing helium in the direction it had come from, not expecting it accomplish anything.

His eyes were useless here. In fact, they were probably working against him. He closed them.

He chose to rely only on Elinox's soul sense, for now. With constant helium pulses going out all around him, he had a rather clear picture of the area in his mind.

Psychics could sabotage that sense, if they knew how, but they would still have trouble making gaps disappear. And that was how he was using it. He looked for where the soul power couldn't reach. Where holes appeared.

"What's the matter, Weasel?" came the voice again. It sounded less like Croll now, though maybe that, too, was a trick of the senses. "Not going to use that special ability of yours?"

Vanderberk ignored him. The gaps. He was looking for the gaps. Empty space would alert him to another attack, just like before. And then he could mount another counterattack based on its direction. He didn't yet need--

Something big smashed into him, sending him sailing through the air against his will. It was a heavy impact. Enough to pancake a younger servant. For him, though, it wasn't enough to disorient him. He could still think clearly even as he was busy regaining control.

This shouldn't have happened. The psychic had interfered with his ability to sense even the gaps within soul power? He was not aware of any living psychic who would be powerful enough to accomplish such a feat, save perhaps the Weaver--and he could be quite confident that she was not the culprit here.

No. According to Elinox's memories, only the ancient Kingsparrows would have been able to pull this off."

"3297

Clearly, whoever this was had been keeping their abilities secret for a long time. Which told Vanderberk that they were not merely intending to stall for time here.

They believed they would be able to kill him.

How many times was he going to be underestimated before people learned?

And if his opponent was so eager to see it, then Vanderberk supposed he should oblige.

The power he'd acquired in Qenghis all those years ago was not something he liked to use freely or often. Such recklessness would've only made the enemy's job of gathering intel on him that much easier.

Not to mention, it was dangerous to himself, as well. The minute he stopped respecting it, he would be consumed.

Perhaps this illusion-slinger would make that mistake. Perhaps they would believe that the things Vanderberk was showing them were mere illusions, too.

It would be an understandable error, if also a deadly one.

Despite its entirely strange and foreign nature, however, Vanderberk had come to learn that his helium was quite complementary to it. Even though helium was seemingly quite limited compared to other elements, he had discovered certain key uses in his youth that were still coming in handy with it to this day.

The ability to stealthily suffocate people had been quite the assassin's tool, back in the day. And of course, there were things like fire suppression and acidic immunity that often caught his more aggressive opponents by surprise.

More recently, though, there were the developments with pan-rozum. Since helium was invisible to the naked eye, that of course meant that he, too, could become invisible, not unlike an aberration.

His invisibility, however, was more refined in some ways. And quite necessary, for this next part.

He'd closed his eyes earlier in order to not become disoriented by the confusing, illusory mess that his opponent wanted him to see.

But now, he opened them again. And when he did, they were red as blood--and burning with ethereal fire.

In an instant, he brought all of his concentration to bear. The illusory world around him dissolved like ashes caught in a whirlwind, and for a brief time, he saw the normal world again. The green of the forest. The white of the waterfall. The Dakinsalla.

Then it was all replaced with black-and-white fire. With a million gangly, twisted arms reaching, grasping. With distorted eyes, searching. With bodies, headless and roaming.

With the Living Inferno."
"3298

Even now, with all the experience he'd acquired using this power, Vanderberk could not rightly say what exactly it was. He had a sense that the things within the Inferno were not as they appeared to be--not sentient beings with minds and wills of their own, at least.

But he knew for certain that they were not illusions, either. That was why his invisibility was so important when using it. If he did not conceal himself, then the Inferno would attempt to devour him, too.

Not that invisibility alone was enough to wholly avoid the Inferno's attention. It just wouldn't go after him while a more obvious target lay in front of it.

And while it might have been wrong to say that the mad, twisted forms that inhabited the Inferno were alive, the Inferno itself undoubtedly had a certain level of sentience. That was why he'd taken to calling it the Living Inferno, after all.

It always made its desires known to him. Its fury. Its hatred. But most importantly, its hunger.

Lozaro called them Devourers, the forms within the Inferno. And the name seemed apt.

""In a sense, you might think of your 'Inferno' as a single-celled organism,"" Lozaro had said. ""And the Devourers, are the constituent parts which allow it to function. Diverse though they may appear, they ultimately all serve one, singular purpose. To feed.""

""On what?"" he'd asked.

""Whatever you provide.""

He just had to be careful that he did not provide himself. For the Living Inferno was relentless. Until its hunger was sated, he would have a very hard time trying to deactivate it.

Here and now, though, Vanderberk was not yet worried. Perhaps the greatest utility of the Inferno was that it could sense things he could not. The Devourers would hunt his prey for him. Very likely, they would even kill his opponent on their own, but even if they didn't, then they would at least be able to point him in the right direction.

Because that was the real trouble with psychics. Their obnoxious tendency to hide. Rarely were they much of a threat once revealed. Most often, however, they did not work alone. He knew that it was therefore quite possible that he was, in truth, fighting multiple opponents, at the moment, and that the psychic was merely concealing the others.

He watched as the Inferno shuddered around him. Streams of Devourers swirled over to his right, their collective forms looking like rivers of mouths, arms, eyes, and teeth--among other barely distinguishable shapes.

He followed their lead."

"3299

The Devourers swirled with increasing fervor. They were nearing their target. Vanderberk needed to keep enough distance from them so that they didn't turn on him, but he also had to stay close enough to either see or sense the opponent when they finally revealed it for him.

When they began lunging, he knew that was the cue. He readied one of his most powerful techniques, the helium of his body beginning to bristle like needles with anticipation.

Before he could finally pinpoint where to attack, however, a flash of light cut through the sky, so bright and massive that it seemed to be rending the entirety of the Living Inferno in two.

The beam fell upon the collective of Devourers, making them howl and try to wriggle away--but they were stuck fast, as if being held in place by the light.

And then they began to change.

From their shifting forms that were little more than vague shapes and body parts... into something crystalline. And glowing, as if having absorbed the light into themselves. Legs and bodies became more obvious, more stable. Heads, too. Even faces, though they still did not look human.

And wings. Great crystal wings emerged from their backs.

Vanderberk looked on in disbelief.

The changed Devourers, if they could even be called that anymore, turned on the unchanged ones. They started slashing through them with their rocky, crystalline bodies--with claws and wings and horns and beaks. And their sunken eyes came alive with even more light, shining brilliantly as luminous boxes appeared around the unchanged Devourers, imprisoning them en masse.

Vanderberk was stunned on two fronts. The first because he had never seen something like this before, and the second because he could feel that the Living Inferno itself was shaken. Its desire was always made known to him, and right now, its desire was to flee. To panic.

And yet it was also asking him for permission. Never had the Inferno felt more timid. It was like it was hoping he would protect it. Rescue it, even.

Vanderberk shook the Inferno's fear off. He couldn't let it infect him. And he attacked.

The crystal Devourers had to be subdued. That much was obvious. In an instant, he imprisoned them with pressurized helium coatings. With their movements sealed, they would be much easier to deal with--but apparently not neutralized.

Their eyes still glowed--and they all turned toward him at once."
"3300

Vanderberk didn't wait to see what they were going to do. He increased the pressure on his helium coatings--as intense as he could muster.

Their crystalline bodies imploded and turned to dust, all of them at once.

That was one problem taken care of, at least, but Vanderberk was still unsettled. He didn't know how they had transformed. If the Devourers could be turned against each other like that, then his entire strategy here--

Another beam of light interrupted his train of thought, catching another group of Devourers and beginning the same process again.

No. Not the same, he soon realized.

Instead of each Devourer changing individually, their collective glow coalesced into one massive, winged creature.

A humongous avian monster of radiant crystal.

Vanderberk didn't hesitate to attack again, but in the back of his mind, he couldn't help hanging on the fact that they were turning to crystal.

Why crystal? Why? It couldn't be--no, if it was, then--

This couldn't be the work of the Crystal Titan, could it? Vanderberk didn't have the luxury of thinking it through. His instinct was telling him no. Sermung hadn't been seen at all during this war, so why would he show up here, of all places?

No, no, no. NO. It had to be a trick. The enemy was a powerful psychic. Playing mind games. Trying to get to him. Make him panic.

This damn crystal bird was resisting the coatings. He couldn't seal its movements. Freezing wasn't accomplishing much, either, other than making it slightly more brittle, perhaps.

He shot an invisible pillar of pressurized helium at it. And somehow, the fucking bird almost dodged it. Instead, it took the hit on the wing, which exploded on impact, sending crystal shards raining over the entire area.

A solid white beam erupted from its beak and eyes, coming straight for him.

He couldn't avoid it in time. Even in his gaseous form, it hit him clean, right in his invisible torso, sending him down and down, pummeling him into the ground.

His gaseous form flickered, and he scowled as he sat up. He paid no attention to the gigantic crater of vaporized rock and dirt around him. He was only concerned about the bird. Where had it gone? It was so huge and obnoxiously bright. How could it have disappeared?

Unless--could it have been an illusion, too? Agh, of course it could have. But the Devourers. They were real. The Inferno. What was it telling him? He needed to listen."

"3301 -- CCLXXVIII.

Behind.

Vanderberk could sense it himself now. Yes. The Inferno was afraid, but it knew something was there. Instead of pursuing on its own, it was giving its knowledge to him. Its extra senses.

What were these? Vanderberk couldn't have described them, even if he'd had the presence of mind to do so. This had never happened before.

Didn't matter, though. He knew enough.

He attacked. And learned more.

Chapter Two Hundred Seventy-Eight: 'Coddled sprout, be uprooted...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Raul sprinted across the surface of the river, not wanting to look back but knowing that he had to. Vanderberk seemed to have finally forgotten about him, but that hadn't improved his circumstances nearly as much as Raul might've hoped.

Whatever the hell was happening in this fight right now made absolutely no sense to him. His eyes could scarcely even comprehend what he was looking at. What were those hellish abominations flying around all over the place? Evil spirits? Literal demons? And the crystal monsters? What were those? Golems? Angels?

Nothing made sense.

But then, he'd been warned about this. By ""Croll,"" no less.

When Thaddeus Croll had first shown up at Logden, Raul had thought it anything but good. But that began to change when the man started speaking to him telepathically.

'Listen to me, young Rainlord. I am not Thaddeus Croll. This is a disguise to fool Vanderberk. You do not know me, but I am your ally. Here is my plan. Convey it to your kin for me.'

And over the next day, the fake Croll fed him information. Raul hadn't exactly enjoyed getting his windpipe crushed or his fingers broken, but he didn't get much choice in the matter. He would've certainly been willing to feed Vanderberk lies, but perhaps the imposter hadn't wanted to risk relying on him for that.

It had been a bold plan, though.

To isolate Vanderberk and kill him. Meanwhile, the Rainlords were supposed to sneak into the prison again and finally rescue everyone.

There would still be plenty of Abolish fighters back at Logden, of course, but with Vanderberk busy and the element of surprise on their side, it seemed doable.

Raul would've liked to ask the fake any number of different questions, but the crushed windpipe had occurred too soon into the encounter for that. No doubt, the imposter feared him saying something stupid.

He had gotten a few answers, though."

"3301 -- CCLXXVIII.

Behind.

Vanderberk could sense it himself now. Yes. The Inferno was afraid, but it knew something was there. Instead of pursuing on its own, it was giving its knowledge to him. Its extra senses.

What were these? Vanderberk couldn't have described them, even if he'd had the presence of mind to do so. This had never happened before.

Didn't matter, though. He knew enough.

He attacked. And learned more.

Chapter Two Hundred Seventy-Eight: 'Coddled sprout, be uprooted...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Raul sprinted across the surface of the river, not wanting to look back but knowing that he had to. Vanderberk seemed to have finally forgotten about him, but that hadn't improved his circumstances nearly as much as Raul might've hoped.

Whatever the hell was happening in this fight right now made absolutely no sense to him. His eyes could scarcely even comprehend what he was looking at. What were those hellish abominations flying around all over the place? Evil spirits? Literal demons? And the crystal monsters? What were those? Golems? Angels?

Nothing made sense.

But then, he'd been warned about this. By ""Croll,"" no less.

When Thaddeus Croll had first shown up at Logden, Raul had thought it anything but good. But that began to change when the man started speaking to him telepathically.

'Listen to me, young Rainlord. I am not Thaddeus Croll. This is a disguise to fool Vanderberk. You do not know me, but I am your ally. Here is my plan. Convey it to your kin for me.'

And over the next day, the fake Croll fed him information. Raul hadn't exactly enjoyed getting his windpipe crushed or his fingers broken, but he didn't get much choice in the matter. He would've certainly been willing to feed Vanderberk lies, but perhaps the imposter hadn't wanted to risk relying on him for that.

It had been a bold plan, though.

To isolate Vanderberk and kill him. Meanwhile, the Rainlords were supposed to sneak into the prison again and finally rescue everyone.

There would still be plenty of Abolish fighters back at Logden, of course, but with Vanderberk busy and the element of surprise on their side, it seemed doable.

Raul would've liked to ask the fake any number of different questions, but the crushed windpipe had occurred too soon into the encounter for that. No doubt, the imposter feared him saying something stupid.

He had gotten a few answers, though."

"3302

The questions that the fake had asked him had mostly been about whether the Rainlord elders had gotten the message, if they'd agreed to the plan, if they needed more prep time--that sort of thing. And without being able to move his head, Raul had only been able to use his eyes to answer. Up and down for yes, side to side for no. And on top of all that, the imposter had to be careful not to be seen spending too much time next to Raul, too, which was why much of the questioning had been conducted while ""Croll"" wasn't even in the same room.

How, exactly, the imposter had been able to discern Raul's answers when he wasn't even looking at him... well, that was just another layer to the mystery.

But there'd been one string of questions that proved somewhat telling. The elders had proved understandably reticent to trust this random stranger who'd appeared seemingly from nowhere, saying all the right things--and sounding a bit too good to be true, honestly.

And after a while, the imposter began to pick up on their trepidation, which led to an interesting exchange.

'Tell Darktide that he should ""grip the torch with both hands.""'

And when Raul relayed the stranger's message, Melchor Blackburn had wanted to know how the man knew what his father used to say to him when he was young.

'Bernardino Blackburn was a good friend of mine, once upon a time. Please trust that I bear you and your kin no ill will. When all of this is over, if we are still alive, I promise that I will tell you my name.'

That had certainly gotten the gears turning in Raul's head. If the guy really did have old, friendly ties with House Blackburn, then it was quite strange for him to not just drop his name straight away and earn their trust immediately.

But then again, if the mission went pear-shaped, the guy could've been worried about his identity being leaked to Abolish by newly captured Rainlords. Such as Raul, for example.

And then there was that name.

Melchor's father, Bernardino Blackburn. Raul had heard it many times before. It was an important one in regard to the history of their House--and beyond.

Lord Bernardino--or Granpa Dino, as Raul had heard others call him--had been the head of House Blackburn before Lord Ismael took over. Moreover, he'd been an internationally famous warrior.

In the Vanguard, no less."

"3303

Unfortunately, Raul had never had the honor of meeting him personally, but the tales of the man were legendary. During the Jungle Wars, Grandpa Dino had single-handedly liberated the city of Maridol in Melmoore from an infamous sect of Abolish. Not unlike what the Rainlords had recently done for Miro.

So this mysterious stranger claiming to be an old friend... could translate into any number of things. Obviously, with Grandpa Dino having lived such a long and crazy life, he would've made plenty of friends outside of the Vanguard, too. But the fact that this stranger was also working against Abolish made for some compelling evidence that whoever this was belonged to the Vanguard.

Plus, there was the nature of the plan to consider. Ambitious was one word for it. Insane, another. Because in the end, it boiled down to single combat with one of Abolish's most powerful warriors.

Who would this stranger have to be in order for such confidence to be justified?

A few famous names came to mind, certainly, but one in particular made more sense to him than the others. If he'd been able to, Raul would've guessed it in order to gauge the imposter's reaction.

Here and now, though, in the middle of all this otherworldly mayhem, the identity of the stranger was the furthest thing from Raul's mind. He was only concerned about trying to survive a bit longer.

These weird demons or whatever they were--they thankfully didn't seem too interested in him, but they weren't completely leaving him alone, either.

He'd seen some of them spewing fire, smoke, and acid in his direction. Back when he couldn't move, he would've definitely been smothered and killed, if not for an invisible barrier that made their attacks splash off harmlessly around him.

Raul could only guess that it was the stranger's doing. Why the man was bothering to protect him--a servant whose death here wouldn't even matter much--Raul couldn't rightly say, but he did appreciate it. Being boiled alive by acid would definitely not have been fun.

He wanted to contribute to the fight in some way, but his instinct was telling him that the more helpful thing to do would actually be to just get away. Making it so the stranger didn't have to worry about him anymore would probably be better than any ineffectual attack he might've been able to launch against Vanderberk.

So that's what he was trying to do now. Create distance."

"3304

The trouble was that this place had become so damn confusing. He sprinted across the surface of the river, but it felt like he wasn't getting anywhere. With the sky so dark, it was hard to tell where the river even ended. Plus, the hellspawn and crystal angels flying all over the place weren't helping him understand the situation any better.

A beam of light hit him, blinding him for several seconds and bringing him to a standstill. His legs sunk below the river's surface as his concentration faltered, but he caught himself with his arms and climbed back out.

He didn't get it. The light dissipated, and he felt fine. No change. He'd seen the way it transformed those demon things, but it apparently had no effect on him? Maybe it hadn't been intended to and had only struck him accidentally.

Ugh.

He felt so weird in this place. Sluggish. Heavy. And it was like... the space around him was distorted. Maybe that was the way the river never seemed to end.

He didn't know where to go.

But if he couldn't escape, then maybe observing the fight more closely was the smarter option. Contributing was probably still impossible, but he wouldn't know that for sure if he didn't pay attention.

It wasn't hard to tell where Vanderberk was, at least. The hellspawn were getting obliterated by the crystal beasts, and Vanderberk was the only thing countering them, punching through them like a man-sized cannonball or otherwise turning them to dust whenever they got close to him.

But they just kept coming. Hellspawn kept being born from seemingly nowhere, just appearing out of the thin, dark air. And rays of light kept converting them.

For a while, Raul was able to just stand there, watching it unfold. This spot down here on the river might've been a bit safer than he realized.

What an odd fight. It seemed a stalemate to him, at the moment. Neither side gaining any real ground.

How long could this go on for, he wondered?

The more he thought about it, the more he remembered various tales he'd heard of historic clashes between great warriors. In many of them, fights lasted days.

Having been in some pretty intense scuffles as a kid, he'd always thought those claims were exaggerated in order to sound more mythical or legendary.

But observing this fight here and now, he was starting to see how that kind of thing might happen."

"3305

Big battles were one thing. Battles between multitudes of people, all able to tag out and rest in order to continue fighting later. But single combat? How monstrous did such warriors have to be in order to continue on for such extended periods of time, alone?

But perhaps that was debatable here, too. Were these two truly alone? Vanderberk had his army of hellspawn, and the stranger, his countering army of crystal beasts.

Honestly, though, there were probably aspects to this fight that he wasn't even perceiving. It did seem odd that the stranger wasn't even showing himself, instead seeming to rely totally on his crystal minions.

Some of the light beams did chase or strike Vanderberk, but they didn't appear to do much to him, other than leave smoking trail behind.

Given everything else Raul had already seen, he had to imagine that the stranger was capable of yet more than this. Vanderberk, too, probably. So what were they waiting for? Some sort of opening to land a more decisive blow? Or maybe this was a battle of attrition? A competition of resources and endurance?

Whatever the case, as he continued to watch the fight draw out in this dark place, Raul Blackburn began to wonder if he was even in the real world, anymore.

--++--++--

<""So all is well, then?""> said the voice on the phone.

It felt a little weird to be hearing it with his ears this time, and it didn't quite match with the soundless one that he'd grown more familiar with before, but Hector supposed that was only natural.

In order to contact him, Xander had given him a phone number, four digit code, and also a pass phrase. The first voice on the phone had asked for the code, the second had asked for the phrase, and now, finally, he was apparently speaking with the man himself.

Hector had decided to use a burner phone for this call, just in case, though he didn't really think it would make much difference. If Xander wanted to find him, he probably wouldn't have a hard time doing so.

""I don't know about 'all' being well,"" said Hector, ""but yeah, Banda Toro was neutralized.""

<""That is quite good news, as I was unable to procure any aid for you."">

""Oh."" Welp. He supposed that was one less thing to worry about, at least. Though, it did feel kinda worrisome in a different way. ""You're that short on manpower, huh?""

"3306

<""Indeed. But it sounds like you have some free time on your hands now, eh? Care to pitch in?"">

Hector couldn't help exhaling half a laugh. "I don't think I should leave my home country, right now." He could see Garovel's skeletal face next to him, and the visible relief on it was almost enough to pull the rest of that laugh out of Hector.

"It was worth a shot," said Xander.

"If you need something that doesn't involve traveling, I might be able to help," said Hector.

"I'll keep that in mind, then."

"Oh, and uh, I found some information on your man, Lozaro."

There arrived a noticeable pause. "Truly? And so soon? Ah, from either Banda Toro or his reaper, it must be. I see. Which must also mean that you managed to neutralize them without killing them, no?"

Hector wasn't sure he liked how quickly this guy was able to connect dots. He wasn't about to confirm it, though. Even if he liked Xander, there was no point in giving the Vanguard any amount of justification to come here and try to take Grigozo into their custody. "My source will have to remain a secret, unfortunately. For now, at least."

"I see. Go on, then. What have you learned?"

Garovel had only just delivered the intel to him a few minutes prior, having gotten it from the Sandlords who were still questioning Grigozo. "Supposedly, he's in Ardora. There's a city called Vamor in the country of Targarith."

"I am familiar with it," said Xander. "Northeast of the vast Gettira Plains, as I recall. I shall head there soon."

"Are you sure that's wise?" said Hector. "You've got your hands full with the war, don't you? And my information could be wrong, you know."

"I will have an opening for such a trip shortly. And even if I did not, I would make time for it."

"From what I've heard, Lozaro is incredibly paranoid and will flee at the first sign of trouble."

"Oh, I am aware, but thank you for the warning. I'm afraid I must go now. Is there anything else you would tell me before I do?"

Hector sure hoped not, because he couldn't think of anything. ""No, that's it.""

<""Farewell then, my friend. Thank you for the information, and may fortune favor you in your next battle."">

And the guy hung up without waiting for a reply."
"3307

Hector pocketed the phone.

'The way that guy talks reminds me of a Sixth Age aristocrat,' said Garovel.

""Is that a bad thing?"" said Hector.

'I suppose not. Bit odd, though. Makes me wonder how old he is.'

""Why? You're old as shit, but you don't talk much different than I do.""

'Excuse me, but just because I do not pontificate with the eminent magnitude of my lexiconic mastery during my frequent bouts of loquacious glory does not mean that I am any less of an esteemed and erudite gentleman than someone like him.'

""...What?""

'Just 'cuz I don't talk funny don't mean I ain't smart.'

""Oh. But I mean, that was kinda my point, wasn't it? The way he talks isn't necessarily reflective of his age. Just like with you, right?""

'Yeah, okay, sure, but I'm also a reaper. We have a tendency to be a bit more adaptable when it comes to social and cultural changes in the world. Unlike you stubborn corporeals who get all worked up whenever the youngins invent a new word that you never used when you were their age.'

""...I don't know if I'm old enough to really appreciate this conversation.""

'New words are great! Language is a fascinating thing, and honestly, being able to observe its evolution firsthand over the ages has been one of the best parts about being a reaper, in my humble opinion.'

""I feel like all reapers must feel that way, considering how chatty you all are.""

'Pretty much,' said Garovel. 'Exceptions no doubt exist, but in general, I would say that in order for us to come to terms with the extremely strange nature of our own existence, we have to be able to take enjoyment in whatever ways we can. So even if we start out not giving a crap about things like conversation and culture, we'll eventually learn to love them. Or alternatively, get super fucking pissed off at all of existence as we know it.'

""Hmm. You talking about Abolish reapers, now?""

'Not all of them, but yeah. I'd argue that the origin of Abolish was probably reapers who simply could not find any way to cope with what we are.'

Hector felt like he'd heard Garovel talk about this before. And he hadn't understood it very well back then, how someone could reach a point where they wanted to destroy humanity or the world--or even all of existence.

But now, somehow, he could almost wrap his head around it.

Still seemed supremely stupid, of course, but it felt somewhat comprehensible, at least."

"3308

The problem, he was realizing, was that concept of ""hating existence."" It sounded simple enough at first, but he was starting to think that it wasn't at all. For one thing, how the hell could someone hate all of existence? What did existence ever do wrong? It was just an idea. A concept. What point was there in feeling that strongly about it?

But he had these memories now. This information. From the Candle, he was pretty sure. Plus his own memories, too, he supposed. He'd made plenty of those over the past year or so.

And they were telling him things. Reminding him of things. Stuff he'd experienced. Stuff he hadn't. Thankfully, he could at least differentiate them in that regard. His own life was much clearer in his mind. The others were foggier. Like dreams, maybe. And a bit less potent, as a result.

But they were certainly not without their impact. The Candle had seen so much. Through so many different eyes. So many different places.

And a lot of it, he knew, had been abject suffering. Just people in utter misery. Experiencing tragedy after tragedy. The kind that turned their entire world upside down.

It was so strange to dwell on. An ocean of ancient sensations. Not ideas, exactly. At least, not yet. Maybe in the future, he'd be able to pick up on specific thoughts like that, but at least for the time being, all he could remember were vague scenes painted with emotions.

A great sickness, for example. Death all around. Everywhere. A stench that seemed like it would never go away. And such heart-rending despair.

Hopelessness. Heartlessness. Hatred.

At what? He wasn't sure. Maybe everything.

That was just one way in which it almost made sense to him. One avenue down which someone could arrive at such a dark place.

It made him wonder if he could ever get there, himself. Be taken there. If everything he'd come to care about crumbled around him? Everyone?

It hurt to think about. But it seemed necessary, too. If he was to continue down this dangerous path, fighting people who might very well be enveloped in this exact type of thinking...

Yeah. It definitely seemed necessary to think about. And important. Even if he never found answers--which he expected he wouldn't--it still seemed important.

He was reminded of Ivan's words to him.

""Take a good, long look at the world and try to see things for how they really are.""

"3309

With so much of the Candle's information in his head now, Hector could understand that sentiment a little better. And while in some ways, that made him more sympathetic to Ivan's perspective, in other ways, it had the exact opposite effect.

If you've had such awful misery visited upon you, then how could you, with such personal and intimate knowledge of what it was like, go out into the world and seek to visit similar feelings upon others?

Where was the sense in that?

There wasn't any. Because at that point, it couldn't be about logic, anymore. Or even survival or glory, as some might suggest.

It could only be about power. And maybe malice, by extension.

A desire to inflict pain for pain's sake. Because inflicting pain could at least make you feel powerful for change, and after experiencing so much horror, perhaps you'd grown tired of only ever feeling weakness.

That part, he was still struggling to wrap his head around. It was so antithetical to everything that he was trying to accomplish.

And yet...

He might've liked to believe that the idea was entirely foreign to him, that he couldn't imagine being so utterly filled with frustration and hatred that those two things became the only driving impulses in his mind.

But he'd felt it before. Most certainly.

He didn't want to lie to himself.

And if a timid wimp like him could reach a point where he felt that way, then it wasn't difficult to imagine other, more naturally vigorous people going through the same thing.

Then again, maybe in his case, it had been the timid wimpiness which had ultimately led him down the path to that feeling.

Or maybe not.

Agh.

Why did the world have to be so confusing? With everything the Candle had showed him, things should've been starting to make more sense, right? But every time he began to feel like maybe life wasn't so complicated after all, something else would come along and make him question everything he thought he already knew.

After his call with Xander, he made sure to call the Queen next and update her on things. He tried to keep it brief, but she ended up wanting all of the details. Which was understandable, he supposed. Unfortunately for her, he only had so many to give, and she was left sounding rather dissatisfied by the time their call concluded.

After that, he could've finally gone to get some sleep. And he certainly felt like he needed it, but with all these thoughts still brewing in the back of his mind, he suddenly wanted to stay awake for a while longer.

So he decided to go check on Grigozo and Ericoros."

"3310

Along the way, Haqq Najir accompanied him once again. Hector materialized the helmet piece for him to examine, which the man proceeded to do so in silence.

Hector couldn't help growing curious what Haqq thought of it. No doubt, it was too soon to get a proper assessment, and given how quiet Haqq was being, Hector supposed he'd just have to wait.

Garovel, however, had apparently not been thinking the same thing. 'So?' he asked. 'What do you make of it?'

Haqq didn't bother looking up. ""Too early to tell,"" he said, which made Hector feel somewhat vindicated. Haqq held the helmet up to his ear and rapped a knuckle against the side.

Hector recalled him doing that before with iron. He'd thought it a bit odd back then, but here and now, it was making a lot more sense to him. At this point, Hector knew the sound that iron made quite well, and that was clearly not it. Too thick. Dulled. Barely ringing, despite its relative bell-shape.

Whatever that metal was, it was dense. Haqq knocked it again, and the result was of course the same. The sound didn't really carry. Like hitting a wall rather than a bell.

'C'mon, you must have SOME thoughts,' said Garovel.

Haqq ignored him and looked to Hector, instead. ""Make a copy of this out of iron for me,"" he said.

Hector did so. It appeared in his open palm, and he handed it off to the man.

Haqq put the other one under his arm like a football and then rapped his knuckle against the iron, listening closely again.

'Oh, so NOW you're interested in Hector's iron, eh? Why the change of heart?'

Hector gave the reaper a look. 'Garovel...'

'What?' said the reaper privately.

'Leave him alone.'

'Hmph. You forgive and forget things too easily, y'know that?'

Haqq banged the two helmets together, then held one up to each ear.

'There's no way that's actually giving him useful information,' said Garovel, thankfully still privately. 'He's just doing stuff to look busy.'

The trip over to the Star Tower was another long one. It was the tower that was technically the farthest away from the Entry Tower, but it at least helped that he didn't have to go all the way down into the courtyard first. In fact, the bridging walkways were the only way to enter the Star Tower, because the bottom half of it was still missing, so unlike all the others, it bore no entrance from the courtyard."

"3311

Up until recently, he'd been thinking of the Star Tower as the likely last target for the reconstruction. It being the tower in need of the most repair made it seem like the place that no one would be using for a very long time.

Then, apparently, Melchor Blackburn decided that he quite liked it in there, which in turn meant that Ericoros ended up being kept there most of the time, as well.

And now, despite Melchor having gone off to Vantalay, the Star Tower was still being used for Ericoros--and Grigozo, too.

This was what happened when he just went with the flow, Hector supposed.

Not that there seemed to be any harm in it. The Star Tower was actually quite a neat little spot, in its own right. It hung from the cavern ceiling like a gigantic version of all the stalactites around it, so compared to the other towers, it felt quite a bit different when looking down over the central plaza from one of its windows.

Just knowing that you were floating there, suspended so high above the ground, gave the place a rather unique vibe. Enough so, in fact, that Hector was starting to wonder if he should try to keep it this way. The tower could still be refurbished in every other way, of course, but the idea that they might just... not rebuild the bottom half was becoming more appealing to him.

Especially because it could also be considered an added element of security. According to Voreese, the original purpose of the Star Tower was imprisonment, which was, more or less, what they were starting to use it for now. So if it was eventually going to turn into a proper prison again, then would it not make sense for it to have one less exit from which prisoners could escape?

Weird to think about. Even just a few months ago, Hector never would've imagined himself thinking about the architecture of prisons. But the value of it in the future was looking undeniable. He needed to take this seriously, which meant he should probably study up more before making any big decisions.

One more thing on the to-do list.

Hopefully, it wouldn't end up being too important too soon. For now, the Star Tower was perfectly functional for their needs. They weren't keeping the reapers in cells but rather just in the tower's single largest chamber, which didn't have a name until Melchor and Orric had started calling it the Moonlight Hall."

"3312

Why they'd chosen ""Moonlight"" Hall instead of ""Starlight"" Hall, Hector still didn't quite understand, but the name appeared to be sticking for whatever reason. Maybe Starlight Hall would've been too on the nose.

The Moonlight Hall was an impressive room, though. While it didn't match the Grand Hall of the Night in terms of size, it did match it in terms of being composed entirely of nightrack. Every one of Warrenhold's eight great towers had at least one chamber of nightrack, and this was the Star Tower's.

Hector found a few more people here than he expected. More Saqqafs had decided to stay behind than Hector realized.

""Ah, Lord Goffe,"" said Abbas' eldest son, Raheem, upon seeing him. He was holding Grigozo in his right hand. ""I thought you would be resting a bit longer.""

""Probably should be,"" said Hector. ""What about you guys? You've been at this for a while, already. Not getting tired?""

""Oh, we're fine, Lord. Not to worry."" After a beat, however, Raheem seemed to intuit more from Hector's words. ""But perhaps we could use a break, if you would like to take over.""

""Alright. Go get something to eat, if you're hungry.""

""We will do that.""

Raheem handed the reaper off to him, then motioned for the other Saqqafs to follow, which they soon did.

Only two others remained behind. Carlos Sebolt and his reaper, Olijas.

Hector hadn't seen Carlos at all during the fight with Banda, but that was because he'd been the one assigned to keeping an eye on Ericoros after Melchor left. And Hector was grateful to him. The decision to stay here in Warrenhold when almost every other Rainlord servant was going off to fight one of the most important battles of their lives--that couldn't have been easy.

Carlos was giving him a look now as if waiting for instruction. Perhaps he was expecting Hector to send him away like the Saqqafs.

""If you want a break, too, then I can take over,"" said Hector.

Carlos glanced at Olijas, probably exchanging silent words. Neither said anything, however, and they both ended up looking uncertain.

Hector decided to elaborate. ""You're welcome to stay, though, if you prefer.""

Carlos gave a nod. ""We'll stay with you, Lord.""

Man, this lording business was a bit too nuanced for Hector's liking, sometimes. He appreciated everyone trying to read the room and infer what he was truly saying, but it could also make things a bit more difficult when he really was just saying what he meant."

"3313

Hector exchanged glances with his own reaper, wondering what Garovel might've been thinking. Now wasn't really the time to get into it, though. He took a seat at one of the large tables that filled the Moonlight Hall and rested his elbows on it while holding Grigozo out in front of him. Carlos took a chair to his left, holding Ericoros much the same.

""Any complaints about your treatment thus far?"" said Hector.

'No,' said Grigozo. He sounded more tired than before.

""Would you like more time to rest?""

'Yes, but ask your questions, first.'

""Alright,"" said Hector.

The Sandlords had been interrogating him for a few hours, asking the more generally useful things, such as what Grigozo knew about Abolish's operations all over the continent. From what Hector understood, Grigozo's information had been fairly juicy, though still limited.

Which wasn't too surprising. No doubt, the Abolish heads were concerned about precisely this type of situation: one of their most influential officers or reapers getting captured and spilling their guts. It would've been quite weird--and perhaps suspicious--if Grigozo could tell them anything they wanted to know.

Regardless, Hector figured that he could leave those sorts of inquiries to the others. Instead, he wanted to take a different approach. ""What do you know of the Freeman Fellowship?""

'Ah. Them. An intriguing group. I was interested in joining them at one point, but alas... ah... it did not work out.'

""Why?""

'Banda was... shall we say, not quite the kind of person who qualifies for an invitation from them.'

Hmm. ""It's invite only?""

'Yes. From what I've heard, they take their image and reputation extremely seriously. The last thing they want is one of their own members doing something that reflects poorly on the rest of them, especially when Abolish as a whole is already doing a perfectly good job of that for them.'

""You seem to think pretty highly of them,"" said Hector.

'I had high hopes for them, perhaps. Without being able to join them, however, I do not know if they truly live up to the ideal I've formulated in my mind. I suspect not, as is usually the case with hopes and ideals, but I've not yet seen or heard anything that proves otherwise.'

""Really?"" said Hector. ""You've never heard a single bad thing about the Fellowship?""

'I suppose it would depend on one's perspective, but no, I would not say that I have.' The reaper paused. 'Well. Then again, maybe there was one thing...'

"3314

""Which was?"" said Hector.

'As I said, their image is very important to them. But that might've been quite the understatement, if the rumors I heard are true. Supposedly, there was another sect that the Fellowship was feuding with. I know not what it was called--and perhaps nor does anyone else, now. Because the Freemen annihilated it to a man. Wiped it off the face of

Eleg.'

Hector cocked an eyebrow at that information, but not because it was all that hard to believe. Abolish in-fighting was easy enough to imagine. The ruthlessness that Grigozo was describing, however--that did seem a bit contrary to how the Freeman Fellowship portrayed itself.

'It was certainly a strange rumor of questionable veracity,' the reaper went on. 'Among the other sects of Abolish, the Freemen are not well respected. People talk badly and openly about them all the time. And as a result, there are many sects which you could describe as ""feuding"" with them. But to my knowledge, they never seek retribution or violence of any kind based on those things. Except, apparently, in this one, debatable instance.'

""Sounds like there's not much reason to believe it, then,"" said Hector.

'I would agree, if not for the fact that in this instance, the feuding had been of a different sort compared to the norm. The reason the Freemen are not respected is because they are viewed as weak and cowardly. Or disloyal to the greater cause of Abolish, perhaps. These things, I suspect, do not bother the Freemen. But in this case, the talk had been virtually the opposite: that they were not the gentle, peaceful creatures they claimed to be. That instead, they were two-faced, vile, backstabbing, and violent.' Grigozo allowed a beat to pass. 'I do not think they appreciated that.'

""...So you think that in order to prove they aren't a bunch of violent psychopaths, they decided to murder everyone who was saying that about them?""

'Yes. Hence my one bit of trepidation. I must admit, however, that for me, such a rumor being proved true would not have been a dealbreaker in the slightest. When compared against all of my other peers, I would have probably still considered them saints.'

Huh.

'Perhaps you would feel differently, though.'

Tough to say without more context, Hector felt. It was hard to blame anyone for killing members of Abolish when so many of them were evil sons of bitches.

It did make him a bit uneasy, however. If they weren't truly as peaceful as they appeared to be, then that was not something that he should just ignore."

"3315 -- CCLXXIX.

Chapter Two Hundred Seventy-Nine: 'The Reckoning at the demonic Pit...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Fire and lightning lashed up and around the enormous chamber, casting off sparks that were so numerous and deadly that any normal person would probably have been vaporized on contact. The entire building rumbled more violently with each new geyser of electrified flame.

This level of danger while working was not something he had experienced in quite some time. Even the most intensive bits of creation involving the Roberts had not gotten this bad. Hell, perhaps not since its own creation had he seen such fury from the Clown Pit.

In moments like this, even he was not invulnerable here. The forge had that much power. He had to be in pan-rozum just to handle it, just to keep things under control.

One slip up would spell the end for the poor little Lion and his reaper, who were both currently at the center of the inferno. They were probably screaming in agony, but it was all being drowned out by the Pit.

The Pit itself was a gigantic bowl embedded in the floor, big enough to park ten or more cars. Plenty of space to move about and work, to interact with the inferno, to calm or stoke it at particular points, to tweak the raging ardor that flowed and swirled through each spark and flicker.

Delicate, delicate work. Made even more so by the Pit's rage.

The real magic, though, happened at the very bottom of the bowl: the center, where the subjects were being held fast as much by their harnesses as by the whirlwind of ardor currently encapsulating them. Because beneath them, beneath that whirlwind, was the Eye of the Pit.

The pitch dark hole with no bottom, where all of the ardor in the Pit flowed both from and then back into. It was a rift, of sorts, and that was where the Pit truly lived. Where it felt. Where it learned.

Where it decided whether it would work for or against him during the creative process.

This time, unfortunately, it seemed to have chosen the latter. Not that he was terribly surprised.

It didn't much care for organics. Especially people. It tolerated him, sure, but anyone else? No. It wanted to render them inorganic. It wanted to reduce them to dust.

So Morgunov had a fight on his hands. And not an easy one, to be sure.

But, thankfully, it was one he'd had many times before."
"3315 -- CCLXXIX.

Chapter Two Hundred Seventy-Nine: 'The Reckoning at the demonic Pit...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Fire and lightning lashed up and around the enormous chamber, casting off sparks that were so numerous and deadly that any normal person would probably have been vaporized on contact. The entire building rumbled more violently with each new geyser of electrified flame.

This level of danger while working was not something he had experienced in quite some time. Even the most intensive bits of creation involving the Roberts had not gotten this bad. Hell, perhaps not since its own creation had he seen such fury from the Clown Pit.

In moments like this, even he was not invulnerable here. The forge had that much power. He had to be in pan-rozum just to handle it, just to keep things under control.

One slip up would spell the end for the poor little Lion and his reaper, who were both currently at the center of the inferno. They were probably screaming in agony, but it was all being drowned out by the Pit.

The Pit itself was a gigantic bowl embedded in the floor, big enough to park ten or more cars. Plenty of space to move about and work, to interact with the inferno, to calm or stoke it at particular points, to tweak the raging ardor that flowed and swirled through each spark and flicker.

Delicate, delicate work. Made even more so by the Pit's rage.

The real magic, though, happened at the very bottom of the bowl: the center, where the subjects were being held fast as much by their harnesses as by the whirlwind of ardor currently encapsulating them. Because beneath them, beneath that whirlwind, was the Eye of the Pit.

The pitch dark hole with no bottom, where all of the ardor in the Pit flowed both from and then back into. It was a rift, of sorts, and that was where the Pit truly lived. Where it felt. Where it learned.

Where it decided whether it would work for or against him during the creative process.

This time, unfortunately, it seemed to have chosen the latter. Not that he was terribly surprised.

It didn't much care for organics. Especially people. It tolerated him, sure, but anyone else? No. It wanted to render them inorganic. It wanted to reduce them to dust.

So Morgunov had a fight on his hands. And not an easy one, to be sure.

But, thankfully, it was one he'd had many times before."

"3316

The key was to not be straightforward in his approach. Trying to overpower the Pit during times like this was a fool's errand. It had pride, which he needed to respect, or else it would rebel and attempt to establish its dominance over him.

He'd made that mistake only once.

It had taken him a year to fully recover, because it had ripped Bool away from him like the cheese out of a ham sandwich--and then continually used the reaper against him as a hostage. Getting the Pit to trust him again had been one of the most difficult and obnoxious things he'd ever done. It involved a lot of gifts and even more negotiating--and finally, another fight in which Morgunov had been able to reassert his own dominance again, thanks to many, many preparations.

That same trick wouldn't work on him again, of course, but Morgunov did not wish to test the Pit's ingenuity. Just as he had grown and changed over the years, so had the Pit. In fact, because he had grown and changed, so had the Pit.

At this point, it was most certainly a reflection of himself, in many ways. Disrespecting it meant disrespecting himself.

And he hated being disrespected.

So no. While Morgunov might normally consider something like this a challenge to be overcome, the Clown Pit was different. Special. Deserving of his fear and admiration. But also counterbalanced against his own pride, lest the Pit see weakness and try to reestablish its dominance again.

A difficult balancing act, to be sure.

Here and now, he had to guide the forge's raging energy rather than oppose or smother it with his own. A gentle touch. This spark here. That bolt there. This flame over there.

Walking through the inferno like this, time was almost a non-factor. It slowed. Or bent, perhaps. Stretched. In accordance with his and the forge's unified wills.

He let the flow speak to him. The Pit was telling him a story. He needed but listen. He needed to hold truth. To understand.

A memory. No. A fear? Yes. A memory from the future, one might call it. Easy to mix up.

He saw a great pillar filling the sky, rising up into the clouds. Where had it come from? He looked toward the base. Its foundation. Down and down. So far down.

At length, he recognized the area. It was this same place, the area around the compound that housed this very workshop."

"3317

Ah.

Yes. A fear, indeed. The great pillar was of crystal. Of quartz, by Morgunov's estimation.

Interesting.

The Pit was afraid of the little Lion, was it? Or rather, of the dormant power that Morgunov was seeking to unlock. It had picked up on the danger here. Of course it had.

Such a warning was unnecessary, though. Morgunov would certainly be displeased if his favorite workshop ended up obliterated, but this was a risk that needed to be taken. The Dry God was his best lead on the whereabouts of the Primordials.

Plus, Morgunov just really wanted to talk to him. Thinking about all the crazy things the guy might be able to tell him was making him more excited by the moment.

He had to cull those feelings, though. Right now, the task at hand required the entirety of his focus.

Heh. Perhaps the forge knew that and was seeking to distract him. Wasn't gonna work, but what a cunning jerk, if so.

If anything, he was more certain than ever that he was on the right path. The power depicted in the vision could obviously not come from Asad Najir and Qorvass by themselves.

He was so close now.

The flow of ardor shifted. He could sense it. Yes. Smoother. More efficient. Good. Fewer sparks. Fewer goutts of fire. Fewer cracks of lightning. The guidance was working. Slow but steady.

The current goal was to create a perfect flow. Optimally efficient. No cracks or leaks.

That was usually the main sticking point with the Clown Pit, due to the way he'd designed it. The open air above the bowl was the cause. That was why forges typically had some type of central containment, so that situations like this--where the ardor ran wild and threatened the user directly--could be avoided.

But Morgunov had wanted to try something different with the Pit. Granted, it was still technically contained by the greater chamber that was the entire room, but that was more to protect it from the outside world than anything.

Truthfully, he hadn't even been sure it would work. So much open space ran counter to all of the core design principles that he'd learned from his mentors. Perhaps that was why he'd wanted so badly to pull it off. As proof of concept, at least to himself.

And indeed, the Pit had been a real problem child during its creation. With the ardor able to flow so freely, it could whip up such furious energy storms that it threatened even to destroy itself."

"3318

But in the end, he had gotten it to work. And that incredible power, while certainly dangerous, could also be considered a boon. Like a wild horse, it was just a matter of taming it.

Plus, it came with the added security of no one else in the world ever being capable of using the Clown Pit against him. It would immediately reject and obliterate anyone who dared try.

He breathed in deep, taking some of the ardor into his own body. This, too, was a supremely dangerous tactic, requiring a well-practiced hand with ardor manipulation and also the kind of bodily resilience that only an emperor possessed. But it was worth the effort, because it allowed him to become part of the flow itself, meaning that he could even more easily guide it.

It was almost like making the flow of ardor an extension of his own will.

It was exhilarating. Euphoric. A raw feeling of power and freedom. Of living energy. If he could've stayed like this indefinitely, he very well might have.

Every time he did this, he recalled the tales from his mentors. Tales of the great inventors of old, of how they had used this very same technique to tap into untold power from the planet itself. Exceeding beyond themselves, beyond their own genius, into a greater height of knowledge than was perhaps otherwise possible on this plane of existence.

He'd thought that such tales were exaggerated. And perhaps they were. But in moments like these, he could see at least a glimmer of truth in them.

He didn't know about tapping into any genius beyond his own. That part still seemed hyperbolic to him. He never felt like new ideas were coming to him here. But the drunken feeling of power? The sheer potential? And the creative spark to go forth and build more wonders?

Those were all there.

The storm was calming almost totally, now. And it was beautiful. The lightning was gone entirely, but the fire was still there, though it was now orderly. A nearly perfect stream, flowing in repeating, algorithmic patterns all around the bowl, creating a visible containment field around Asad and Qorvass.

Tears welled up in his eyes, wavering against the encircling whirlwind.

This always happened to him. He couldn't help it. Witnessing the majesty of any fusion forge at the peak of its ability never ceased to move his heart."

"3319

The purity before him. The brilliance. The wonder. It took him all the way back. Hundreds of years. To the few, fleeting instances of curious innocence from his childhood.

That's what this felt like to him. Curiosity incarnate. A glimpse into a Higher Realm, perhaps.

It was what he lived for.

The flow was truly perfect now. He went over it slowly, taking his time as he walked the full length of the bowl, observing every inch of the containment field in order to be certain.

The fiery glow needed to be just right. Not for any calculational reason. He simply needed it to be. It was a matter of achieving perfection. So much had just been risked, and so much might now be gained. Rare moments like these needed to be savored to the maximal extent. It would likely be quite some time before he had a good reason to push the Pit so hard.

There. A coruscating red-orange glow with just a hint gold in the middle of each flaming stream. They were not unlike ribbons, tied into a great sphere, shining and otherworldly in their luster.

Almost done, now. A thought which saddened him. But he knew he should not linger too much more. The Pit could handle the load just fine, but it would grow antsy with him if he stopped working.

As much as it had in common with him, in this way it differed immensely. It cared not for its own magnificence. It wanted only to make progress.

Morgunov's normally silver gaze was now burning with red and gold as his eyes fell upon Asad and Qorvass. They seemed to no longer be struggling. If they'd fallen unconscious, then that was a shame. The perfected containment field would actually be neutralizing any pain now. Even the imminent removal of the little Lion's tattoos would not hurt. Instead, it would feel akin to a simple sensation of peeling. And perhaps even be oddly satisfying, too.

Theoretically, anyway.

Morgunov raised his hand and set to work. From the top of the containment field, one stream grew downward, snaking a red-gold path toward Asad Najir.

When it made contact with his skin, the glow magnified for a moment into a brilliant flash, then engulfed the man's body entirely.

The tattoos resisted. They, too, were of a golden hue, though darker and more intense.

Morgunov had of course seen this before and been expecting it. Those buggers were stubborn, to be sure, and were no doubt intending to block his progress yet again.

But this time was different."

"3320

This time he could get at the flow of ardor within the tattoos themselves. Where before, their secrets had been thoroughly concealed, now he sensed them. Through Qorvass, the Pit gave him an inroad.

Fascinating.

This woven flow. The way it could flex and bend... was it reacting to his observation of it? Didn't like being seen this way, eh?

Ah.

It was a memory structure. A pseudo-consciousness. Even more sophisticated than he'd realized.

Masterful work.

Rare were the times when he could look on and marvel at the accomplishment of another integrator, especially with how old he'd gotten, how much he'd seen before.

These patterns were something else. How were they so efficient? They looked a bit sloppy, but the flow was not leaking in the slightest. No ardor being lost. As perfect as the flow he'd just created using the Pit.

It made no sense.

Efficiency was not a trivial issue. In fact, where inventions were concerned, the efficient flow of ardor was arguably the most important subject of all. Many integrators would spend a hundred years or more just trying to master that one thing--and still die before managing it.

But this. This was something special. A perfect flow that did not appear so? How could that be?

He was missing something. Some element of its composition must've still been concealed from him.

Damn! Such an enticing mystery! Here?! Now?! He didn't have the luxury of time on his side. He needed to remove them.

But this magnificent structure... it would be a shame to destroy it. A true shame. In fact, destroying it before uncovering the depth of its secrets would not only be a shame... but a crime, in Morgunov's mind.

An intellectual crime. Absolutely.

Yes. Abruptly, his priorities shifted. He could not allow these tattoos to be destroyed. Without a doubt, he had to, in some way, preserve them.

But how? Agh.

He racked his brain, thinking. Their flow's patterns were too complex to simply memorize with how little time he had. Well, then again, with the benefit of Bool's immaculate memory on his side, it might be possible.

But no. He had a better idea.

Rather than destroying them, the solution was to transfer them to a dummy body. Then he could study them at his leisure another time.

Or...

Or?

Or he could use his own body. Transfer them himself.

Eheheh... wouldn't that be astonishingly dangerous?

Why, yes. Yes, it would."

"3321

How scary. His better judgment was telling him not to do this. Which was a good thing, he supposed. Despite what the world thought of him, he must not have been totally mad. At least part of him still knew when he was thinking crazy thoughts.

And yet.

In the raging storm of his mind, his better judgment was not the prevailing wind. He could sense that much, too. In this fleeting moment, when his racing thoughts were bleeding into the swirling power of the fusion forge--with its emboldening, euphoric effects--Morgunov could tell that he was about to make a very unwise decision.

Because why shouldn't he, hmm? Was he not the Mad Demon of Abolish? The Maniac of Maludona? The Whackjob of Warway?

...The Lunatic of Lotorevo?

Yes. He had embraced such things long ago. Cowing in the face of danger now would be silly. Pointless. And a self-deception, besides.

Sure, this might well be one of those moments that historians liked to go on and on about, when a famed intellect finally went too far and ended up destroying itself. Hoisted by its own petard.

But such nattering ants would never understand, anyway. Cautionary tales? Playing it safe?

These were not how knowledge was accrued.

Morgunov breathed even more deeply than before--perhaps even more deeply than he ever had in his entire life, for that is how all of the ardor flowing into him made it feel. And with his mind, he seized control of the flow, both within himself and by extension, the flow all around him.

Like a fishing line, he reeled the flow in. More. More. More.

The flow within the tattoos was there. Part of the line. The part he was most interested in. Slowly, they peeled themselves off of Asad's body and followed along the stream toward Morgunov.

Such energy. Strength. Enough to make him sick.

No. He held. Had to.

Closer. Closer. Closer, still.

There. They were right there. Right in front of him. About to touch him.

He braced himself further. The first tattoo contacted his outstretched hand.

And the world went white.

But he was still aware. Still holding together. Not deterred. He couldn't see, but he could sense. The flow. The tattoos. The forge. Everything, actually.

The whole room. The whole building. The rocky land around it, and the crust of the planet below him, extending down, down, down."

"3322

So much information. The flow wanted him to see it all.

And impulsively, he wanted to let it. To absorb everything. But he knew better. He had to rein it in. He was in charge here, not it. He couldn't let it lead him by the nose, because it would try to take him everywhere and nowhere, which would disperse his mind and kill his soul. Bool's, too, if the reaper didn't realize what was happening and release him in time.

Not that the reaper even could when Morgunov was in full control like this. There would theoretically be a window--right at the end--in which Bool could pull it off, but the only way to know that for sure would be to test it. And doing that couldn't even be considered insane so much as just stupid.

So he solidified himself. His mind. Gathering his thoughts, emotions, sensations--his flow. He would not be repelled. The tattoos, glowing with a golden power, snaked their way up his arm and spread across his body.

Yes. That was better.

Now, maybe--

A distinctly feminine voice arrived.

""Malen'kiy Durak,"" it said.

And Morgunov stopped, frozen in place at the sound of those words. At their cadence. Their delivery.

So piercingly, hatefully familiar.

He'd not heard those words said that way since...

""As ever, you meddle where you should not,"" said the voice, now in Mohssian--or at least what sounded like it. And then again, in his old, native tongue, ""Malen'kiy Durak.""

And admittedly, it was difficult for him to maintain his composure.

Those words. Said in just that way.

No one should have known them. He never should have had to hear them again.

Because he had killed everyone who had ever spoken them to him in that manner.

Madly, his mind entertained the notion that this voice might actually belong to his mother. It was truly, utterly impossible. But in a single, trembling moment, he couldn't help himself, couldn't help the thought from entering his mind.

And then, hatred.

Hatred of a kind he had not felt in an Age.

It filled his mind.

Clouding his thoughts. Dispersing his reason.

Until he felt Bool there. Bringing him back. Returning his calm. Returning himself.

He breathed, finding clarity.

""That's a neat trick,"" said Morgunov, only just able to keep the anger out of his voice. ""Who are you? Where did you learn those words?""
"3323

""I learned them the same way you did,"" the voice said.

Morgunov tilted his head, trying to lean more into his curiosity than his frustration. His vision was returning, at least. The world of white was fading back into the Pit Chamber.

He soon noticed that something was amiss, however.

The Pit was no longer active. The containment field made of pure fire and ardor was gone, and the only glimpse of the golden glow was now all over his body.

Asad and Qorvass were still there, both strapped down and apparently unconscious. Good thing, too. The reaper might have been able to escape just now, while Morgunov was both blinded and distracted.

Strange. He hadn't told the Pit to power down. It could have decided to do that on its own, though, if it had determined that its job was done.

He didn't see any physical form for this voice, however. Not that he expected to.

First things first. He moved over to Qorvass in order to make sure the reaper was indeed secure.

Before he got there, the voice spoke up again. ""You wished to meet a god, did you not? A so-called Primordial?""

That made him pause. He didn't remove his gaze from Qorvass, though. This voice seemed to be coming from within the tattoos themselves, as he could feel the physical vibrations of sound carrying throughout his body.

Not telepathy, then. Which made sense. He built up his defenses against that long ago. He would've clocked a psychic intruder right away.

But then how did the voice learn those old words? And now these new questions? If the voice hadn't pulled the information out of his mind, then...?

""How did you know that?"" asked Morgunov.

""A dull question from a dull mind,"" said the voice. ""Ask something more intelligent.""

Hoo boy. Trying to annoy him, eh? Such tactics usually didn't affect him, but he had to admit, he was struggling. Whoever this was, she'd caught him off guard.

For the first time in a long while, Bool's mind was actually playing a significant role here. Keeping him balanced. He needed not to lose his cool.

""That won't work, little missy,"" said Morgunov. ""Deflect all you like, but one way or another, I'll find my answers. It'd be better for you in the long run if you just cooperated, otherwise I might get a bit vindictive later.""

"3324 -- CCLXXX.

""A threat from ignorance will do you no good, Little Fool.""

""Eheheh. Doesn't have the same impact on me when you say it in Mohssian."" His silver gaze shifted briefly to Asad, then returned to Qorvass. ""You wouldn't happen to be a relative of these two, now would you? Or a lingering remnant of such a person, perhaps? Hmm?""

""That is both correct and not. To explain would be an exercise in tedium, and I am sure you would still be no wiser by the end of it.""

""Oho, well, then. Perhaps you would be keener to tell me who you are in your own terms, then. Or who you want me to believe you are, at least. It's obvious enough that you're one of those tricky types. Prone to lying, no doubt.""

""Hmph. Little Fool. Again I say: you wished to meet a so-called Primordial, did you not?""

""Yeah-huh.""

""Then you should be rejoicing. For you have now done so.""

Chapter Two Hundred Eighty: 'Alas, siblings of the Current...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Morgunov blinked, then couldn't help snorting a laugh. ""You're tellin' me that you're a Primordial? Are you serious?""

""Indeed.""

His bullshit detector was practically exploding, but he kept it in check with another laugh, this time with more energy behind it. He was actually curious, now. ""Okay, then, little missy. I'll bite. Which Primordial are you claiming to be, huh?""

""It matters not. Your perception of us is so minuscule that my true name would either mean nothing to you or give you a completely false impression of your current situation. ""

""Mm. Not one of the famous ones, eh? Don't want to be embarrassed when you reveal your big, scary identity and I don't even recognize you. I get it. That actually makes your claim more believable to me.""

""As I said. Ignorance.""

""So what, are you like Cocora's ugly stepsister or something? The one nobody ever pays attention to? That's a shame. Jealousy is a difficult monster to tango with. I feel for you.""

A glow arrived in his peripheral vision, and Morgunov saw that it was coming from Asad. From his torso, more specifically.

""Sister,"" arrived another voice, this one more masculine. ""There is no need to be so rude. This repulsive man has done us a favor, has he not?""

""And who is this now?"" said Morgunov, growing more curious by the second.

""I am Rasalased. It is interesting to meet you, Young Demon of Abolish.""

"3324 -- CCLXXX.

""A threat from ignorance will do you no good, Little Fool.""

""Eheheh. Doesn't have the same impact on me when you say it in Mohssian."" His silver gaze shifted briefly to Asad, then returned to Qorvass. ""You wouldn't happen to be a relative of these two, now would you? Or a lingering remnant of such a person, perhaps? Hmm?""

""That is both correct and not. To explain would be an exercise in tedium, and I am sure you would still be no wiser by the end of it.""

""Oho, well, then. Perhaps you would be keener to tell me who you are in your own terms, then. Or who you want me to believe you are, at least. It's obvious enough that you're one of those tricky types. Prone to lying, no doubt.""

""Hmph. Little Fool. Again I say: you wished to meet a so-called Primordial, did you not?"

"Yeah-huh."

"Then you should be rejoicing. For you have now done so."

Chapter Two Hundred Eighty: 'Alas, siblings of the Current...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Morgunov blinked, then couldn't help snorting a laugh. "You're tellin' me that you're a Primordial? Are you serious?"

"Indeed."

His bullshit detector was practically exploding, but he kept it in check with another laugh, this time with more energy behind it. He was actually curious, now. "Okay, then, little missy. I'll bite. Which Primordial are you claiming to be, huh?"

"It matters not. Your perception of us is so minuscule that my true name would either mean nothing to you or give you a completely false impression of your current situation."

"Mm. Not one of the famous ones, eh? Don't want to be embarrassed when you reveal your big, scary identity and I don't even recognize you. I get it. That actually makes your claim more believable to me."

"As I said. Ignorance."

"So what, are you like Cocora's ugly stepsister or something? The one nobody ever pays attention to? That's a shame. Jealousy is a difficult monster to tango with. I feel for you."

A glow arrived in his peripheral vision, and Morgunov saw that it was coming from Asad. From his torso, more specifically.

"Sister," arrived another voice, this one more masculine. "There is no need to be so rude. This repulsive man has done us a favor, has he not?"

"And who is this now?" said Morgunov, growing more curious by the second.

""I am Rasalased. It is interesting to meet you, Young Demon of Abolish.""
"3325

"Ah, so it's you!" said Morgunov. "Finally! You sure are a hard fella to reach, y'know that?"

"Indeed, I do."

"I've got some questions for you, mister."

"And I, you."

"Oh? Intriguing. But uh, wait a minute here. This angry lady is really your sister?"

"No," she said.

"Yes," said Rasalased.

"Mmhmm. Cleared that right up," said Morgunov.

"We have a complex relationship," said Rasalased.

"I've got a few of those myself," said the emperor. "But as far as I know, you're not a Primordial, Mr. Salad. You're a few thousand years too young for that, are you not?"

"This is true," said Rasalased. "But kinship is a thing more deep and vast than all the oceans of the world combined."

"Ooh, okay. Sounds like a bit of wishful thinking on your part, but I can't say I hate it! Your starry-eyed musings were one of your more charming qualities in life, so I'm glad that hasn't left you after all these years!"

"Hmm? You speak as if you knew me personally."

"Do I?" He sorted through his thoughts. "Oh, that's right. My reaper met you a few times. Perhaps you remember. His name is Bool."

"Ah. The name is familiar. But also not. Perhaps I remember. Or perhaps I do not."

"Mmhmm, mmhmm. I know the feeling. Don't worry about it. Bool's a bit touchy when it comes to being forgotten, but I won't let him say anything mean to you. He can be a real drama king, sometimes. Really needs to learn how to relax."

"I am familiar with such difficulties."

"Ehehe." Morgunov couldn't help smiling. "Alright, well, I've gotta admit, despite how much I'd like to ask my questions, I'm pretty dang interested to hear what it is that you want to ask! Especially because I'd figured that you would be more openly arrogant and hostile, like your maybe-sister over here. Instead, you're seeming like quite the gentleman! Haven't called me an ignorant fool once, yet!"

"I have always felt that a modicum of politeness goes a long way, even when talking to barbaric mongrels such as yourself."

"Methinks you haven't quite nailed it, but boy, do I appreciate the sentiment! So go on, then! What did you want to ask me about, eh? I've gotta know what a god would want to consult little ol' me for!"

"You are letting me go first? I thank you. In truth, there are several. First, I would like to know what your plans are for the current Lion.""
"3326

"Aha. Concerned about him, are you? I suppose that's only natural." Morgunov paused. "Still a bit surprising, though, now that I'm thinking about it. I mean, do you really care about the little Lion? Or are you just going through the motions, 'cuz of your sense of duty?"

"Of course I care," said Rasalased. "Why would you say that?"

"Oh, c'mon. You're a god now, aren'tcha? You're above such base, mortal concerns, surely! Aren't you much more interested in the big picture, hmm? Things that we on this plane of existence can barely even glimpse, let alone comprehend?"

Rasalased made no response.

Oho? Had he unexpectedly hit the mark, Morgunov wondered? Truthfully, he'd just been saying stuff, rambling with whatever came into his head. Usually, when he did that, he discovered all sorts of new ways to piss people off.

Ehehe. Perhaps this “Dry God” was even more full of surprises than he’d hoped.

The still-nameless sister chimed in again. “You will not be harming Asad Najir any more than you already have, Little Fool.”

Morgunov giggled. “Ooh, that sounds like a threat. I admire your confidence. Unless it turns out to be arrogance, of course. Ehehe.”

This was music to his ears. Even though it was quite likely that this lady had simply been lying about being a Primordial in order to intimidate him, it would be absolutely perfect if she’d been telling the truth.

The fact was, he didn’t want a pet god like Rasalased. Someone amicable and courteous from the outset? No, no. He wanted someone mean. Someone egotistical.

Someone whose spirit he’d be able to take great joy in breaking.

Because after all, once that was done, courtesy and amicability could be taught. In fact, that’d probably be the most fun part.

She, however, did not immediately respond. Despite her rudeness, perhaps she still wanted to be careful with her words here.

Morgunov hoped not. That sounded boring.

Instead, Rasalased was the next to speak. “If you harm the Lion further, you will not find us cooperative with whatever it is that you want.”

“That’s one way of looking at it, sure,” said Morgunov, “but I could also pose the opposite perspective. If you don’t cooperate, then your sandy boy won’t be having a very good time in my custody.”

“Either way, the result is the same,” said Rasalased. “You must leave him be. In fact, releasing him and his reaper would be best.””

”3327

Morgunov smacked his lips. “I dunno... that’s a pretty big ask.” It wasn’t, really. At this point, he had no further use for Asad or Qorvass, but they didn't need to know that.

Plus, he always liked leaving the door open for a senseless murder. Never knew when something like that might come in handy. Hostages? Venting frustration? Silly experiments? There were all sorts of ways to make use of things that had otherwise outlived their usefulness. Who didn't love a bit of recycling?

"I do not believe it is," said the sister. "Now that you have met us, you have no need of them any longer."

Dang it. "You don't know that," said Morgunov. "I've got all sorts of needs. And besides, the mere fact that you two care about them so much means that they're useful to me as leverage. So if you want 'em safe or even free, then maybe we can come to an agreement of some sort. I'm a reasonable fellow, despite what you might've heard about me."

"More lies," she said. "You only keep your word when it is convenient for you. Your overconfidence in your own power makes you have no qualms about betraying others. Any agreement made with you would have no weight or sense behind it."

"So harsh. I'll have you know that I keep my word for plenty of other reasons besides mere convenience. For instance, sometimes it's just funny. To see the surprised looks on people's faces, I mean. And heck, other times I keep it because I'm real mad. Tell me, what is convenient about hunting someone to the ends of Eleg for decades? Hmm? The convenient thing to do would be to forgive and forget! But no. If I give my word that I'll kill someone, then I do it, no matter how long it takes!" He paused. "Unless, maybe, they come up with a really good apology. Then I might change my mind. But that's not going back on my word! That's making a new promise!"

"You lie even to yourself," she said. "Rationalization masked as reason. You cannot tell when others see through you, because you cannot even see through yourself."

"You're not very fun to talk to, y'know that?"

"A spoiled child never enjoys being scolded."

He sniffed. "What about you, Mr. Salad? What say you about striking a deal with me?"

“Unfortunately,” said Rasalased, “I believe my sister is right about you not being trustworthy.”

“Ouch!”

“However, if you were to fulfill your end of a bargain first, then your trustworthiness would be a non-factor.”

“Oh? Hmm. But that’d mean opening myself up to being easily betrayed by you, instead.”

“It would, yes,” said Rasalased. “But that is the price you must pay for being of such ill-repute. Perhaps if you had lived your life more forthrightly, then you would be able to enjoy the accompanying privileges.”

“Mm, I both resent and doubt that. People are way too untrusting in general for someone to be given the benefit of the doubt with any sort of regularity.” He gave a shrug. “But anyhow, lemme hear what else you wanted to ask. Sounds like there might be room to negotiate for Asad and Qorvass’ lives, depending on how the rest of this conversation goes.”

“Very well,” said the Dry God. “Next, I wish to ask about your experiences with other realms. Have you visited any of them?”

Morgunov pursed his lips, thinking. That was a tough one to answer, actually. “Visited? Uh... hmm. What counts as visiting? Because I’ve definitely done a bit of otherworldly traveling in my day, but such events for me have always been more... ‘out-of-body experiences’ than anything.”

“I see. So your corporeal form has always remained here, in this realm?”

“That’s right,” said Morgunov. “I know a guy who had a more involved experience like what you’re talking about, but sadly, he’s too terrified of me and keeps running away before I can have a proper conversation about it. Real slippery bugger, that one.”

“So you are saying that your experience is comparatively limited, then?”

"I suppose so. It's a subject I'm interested in, though. Just haven't gotten back around to researching it in a long while. I like to save certain things for later, know what I mean? Always gotta keep another project or two lined up, for whenever the current one finishes. Lemme tell ya, I absolutely hate having nothing interesting to do. Start to get a bit antsy and stir-crazy, which tends to make me lash out. In fact, Bool used to try and make me bored all the time 'cuz of that. He likes it when I go out and make trouble for folks. He hasn't attempted that in a while, though, probably because he knows that I've got too many backup projects in mind, right now. Lost cause for him, at the moment.""

"3329

"But you have visited other realms, at least through mental projection," said Rasalased.

"Yep," said Morgunov. "Perhaps it was even similar to what the two of you are doing right now. Where are your corporeal forms currently, hmm? Do you even have those, anymore? Or have you supposedly 'ascended beyond the need for them,' as some of the old stories claim?"

"Indeed, we left them behind long ago," said the sister.

"HMMMMMMMM," mused Morgunov. "I wonder about that. Certainly, it would be quite the convenient thing to make others believe, wouldn't it? This idea that you are now totally intangible beings, no longer vulnerable in physical ways. That way, you don't have to worry about some maniac getting it into his head that he might be able to hunt down your little, fleshy bodies and capture them. Or kill them. Or otherwise use them against you, eh?"

"Believe what you will. It matters not."

"Eheheh. So aloof!"

"Tell me," interjected Rasalased. "During your travels among other realms, did you ever hear of a place called Saharazeem?"

The Great Desert?

Interesting. Morgunov had to think back. It was true that he'd seen quite a lot of the realms beyond this one, particularly during that one time at Bellvine. But even now, a lot of the things he'd witnessed there were still jumbled or foggy, hardly better than nonsense.

He'd spent considerable time in the immediately following years trying to parse through all of that information, but he'd only had a modest degree of success with the effort. Largely, it had come down to simply journaling everything that he could remember and then trying to interpret patterns from the mess. Ideas, emotions, visions, sensations, names, and places.

It had seemed an endless ocean, at the time. The great and vast Void.

One of the most enjoyable experiences of his life, truth be told. But so confusing in retrospect, too. And above all, he despised being confused.

Mysteries were one thing. Discovering secrets, uncovering truth--those were wonderful. But merely being mixed up and dumbfounded? No. Absolutely not.

The name, at least, was familiar to him. He just needed to recall if it was from that time or if he'd simply read it somewhere.

Bool's assistance was appreciated here. Ehehe. The reaper hadn't felt this useful in eons. It reminded Morgunov of more innocent times, when he'd relied on the reaper for almost everything.

Ah, there it was.

Yes.

Saharazeem. It was from Bellvine."
"3330

It had been but a glimpse, but now, with the added context of Rasalased being interested in this place, perhaps that was enough to interpret more.

Hmm. There were a few emotions and sensations associated with the glimpse. Longing. Satisfaction. Hunger. Pride. But most of all, thirst.

And there was an image, too.

A vast, golden landscape--not only sand but great pillars, too.

Pillars of quartz, unless he was mistaken.

Quite similar to the great pillar that the Pit had only just showed him.

Ooh. Morgunov had to admit: that was a little worrisome. That vision had most certainly been a warning, and here he now was, seeing it again, only this time without the accompanying sense of urgency.

"Yes," Morgunov finally answered. "I have heard the name. What is your interest in it?" He had a fairly good guess, of course, but there was no point in jumping to conclusions when he could simply ask.

"I seek the arasaba," said the Dry God.

Morgunov blinked. "Oh! Your mythical lion beasts! You actually believe in them? Your descendants certainly didn't seem to, last I asked."

"It is not a question of belief. In the realms beyond, all can be made or unmade. The impossible made possible. But you must already know this, surely."

"Eheh. I know of the claim, yes. 'fraid I'm a bit of a skeptic on that front, though. Only the Void could possess the kind of infinite power you're describing. And the other realms are not of the Void."

"Some are," said Rasalased. "Those in which souls reside must belong to the Infinite Current, which in your interpretation would be an aspect of the Void, no?"

Now there was a term he hadn't heard in a while.

"The Infinite Current..." Morgunov stroked his thin beard as he thought it over.

The Void, supposedly, had many aspects to it. More than were even knowable, perhaps. More than were worth keeping track of, certainly. Such was to be expected when trying to conceptualize the infinite infinities of nonexistence.

But two of the more popular aspects were Chaos and the Infinite Current.

Chaos was supposed to be the nexus point of all creative thought, perhaps even of all creation itself. A theoretical domain of mayhem, madness, genius, and every conceivable idea.

It was also Morgunov's personal favorite aspect, as it so happened.

The Infinite Current, however, was something a bit different. The Great River of Souls, was another name for it."

"3331

It was supposed to be both the source and ultimate destination of all souls and ardor, which may have been one and the same thing. The Current was theorized to connect countless realms where life existed--and more. Many scholars throughout history believed that, wherever a reaper ferried a deceased soul to, the Current would eventually carry that same soul--or the energy that composed that soul, perhaps--back into this world.

An eternally recurring flow of imaginary power. Unfathomable in its strength and potential.

Morgunov, therefore, understood what Rasalased was getting at.

The ancient mythical beasts of the Sandlords could theoretically reside within a plane of nonexistence. And someone, therefore, might be able to ride the Infinite Current to such a place and meet or otherwise bear witness to them.

A truly ludicrous plan, filled with absurd danger. The Infinite Current, if it did indeed exist, would not be some leisurely route through scenic territory. The Current was supposed to be a force of literally unparalleled soul power and ardor. To endure through the Current, having your own soul constantly pummeled by such a force, while also attempting to guide your own path through it...?

Morgunov was not sure he could imagine a more impossible feat.

But perhaps that impossibility was precisely what made the plan worthy of a god's time.

He had to learn more.

"What do you want with the arasaba, exactly?" asked Morgunov.

"I believe they may be the progenitors of my kin," said Rasalased. "And if so, then I must learn more of them.”

“Ahhh,” said Morgunov. “You want their power.”

“Perhaps. Perhaps not.”

The emperor snorted, then laughed. “Yes, I’m sure your interest in them is purely academic. Just like me!”

“If the arasaba hold answers regarding the origins of my kin, then they may also hold answers regarding the origins of all mankind.”

Morgunov bobbed his head. “Could be. But is that really so mysterious to you? If your surly sister here is truly a Primordial like she claims, then she should have plenty of juicy answers about all sorts of things, no?”

“Even if that were so,” said Rasalased, “I would not want her to provide them. There comes a point where one should not rely on the knowledge and experiences of another in order to continue growing. One must seek the truth for oneself.”

At that, Morgunov couldn’t help smiling. “A man after my own heart.””
"3332

“And what of your plans?” asked Rasalased. “You wished to meet a Primordial, no? What will you do now that you have accomplished your goal?”

Morgunov tittered. “Still not sure I believe that I’ve really accomplished it. I need some type of confirmation that your big sis is really one of ‘em. Do either of you have a means of proving it?”

“If I did,” said the sister, “why would I bother providing it? Your satisfaction makes no difference to me.”

“Aw, c’mon. Don’t be stingy, now. You want the little Lion to keep on breathin’, don’tcha? I’d say that’s plenty reason to be cooperative.”

“You should be more concerned about your own breathing,” she said. “You act like you have full control over your circumstances, when you do not.”

Aha. Finally, they were getting down to it. Morgunov had been wondering when they would start to bare their fangs.

Since the beginning of the conversation, he'd been sending thoughts to his Roberts. He had hundreds of them scattered around the compound, patrolling the grounds, feeding him information via the network of biochips in his brain.

He'd been making more of the Roberts close in, surrounding the forge's chamber. By now, they were above, below, and all around, waiting to break through the ceiling, floors, and walls the instant he told them to.

"Well, if you're gonna talk big, I hope you've got some means of backing it up," said Morgunov. "I mean, I've allowed you to wrap yourself around me like an angry, little rope via these tattoos, so c'mon. If you think can do somethin' to me, then do somethin' already!"

"Let us not be--" tried Rasalased.

The world went white.

Crushing pressure arrived, all over his body but especially on his head. He could feel the intent behind. The desire to render him to dust. To put him in his place.

And it certainly hurt. Morgunov could not deny that. He sensed Bool wanting to numb his body, but he stayed the reaper's hand. Eheh. Just because he'd been letting the reaper pitch in for a change didn't meant that he was about to allow Bool to do whatever he wanted.

Because pain was an interesting thing. He didn't get to feel it very often, anymore. There'd been a time, of course, when he'd greatly feared pain and tried to avoid at all costs. But over the years, as he'd aged and aged, as boredom had started to become his fiercest enemy, he'd developed a certain nostalgic fondness for pain."

"3333

It was an important part of being human, he'd come to believe. Those rare few who couldn't feel it were missing out.

There was a popular sentiment that those who know pain are less inclined to inflict it upon others. And in Morgunov's experience, that was true.

But it was also true that such experiences granted one the knowledge of where things hurt most. And from there, malicious intent could truly run rampant.

Knowledge was a funny thing. So many people throughout history liked to espouse the enormous benefits of education, of a learned populace, of knowledge in all its many forms dispelling ignorance around the world. And yet, Morgunov had increasingly come to believe that knowledge was also a prerequisite for evil to exist.

You could not intentionally hurt someone if you didn't know where to strike.

And perhaps, in a similar vein, evil was a prerequisite for the advancement of knowledge. Because ultimately, more knowledge would bring about more evil.

That was all very reductionistic, of course, but it was fun to think in simplified terms, from time to time. And necessary, too. He'd seen many intelligent people get so lost in their own sophisticated ideas that they began to overlook the obvious. He didn't want to be like that.

Which was why this attack from this so-called Primordial was interesting to him. Such a simplistic approach. Inflicting pain. No doubt, it was meant to be a test. She wanted to see how well he could take it. And once she'd gathered that knowledge, she would likely try something more advanced.

Unfortunately for her, she'd chosen her first attempt poorly. While Morgunov wasn't entirely certain that his next trick was going to work on her in the same way that it had worked on numerous powerful psychics, he had a pretty strong feeling that she wasn't going to be having a very fun time, here in a second. He just wanted to enjoy the pain for a moment longer, first. Mmm.

Okay, that was enough.

He concentrated.

As with many things in this world, it was mind over matter. Honed control over many years of meditation. Naturally, he'd gotten quite bored of the typical meditations that reapers were always asking of their servants, so when he'd started looking into various ways that he could spice things up, he'd been quite the happy camper for many decades thereafter."

"3334

The thing about psychics was that they were frequently overconfident, likely because they associated their intellect with their psychic prowess--and there was perhaps nothing in the world more intoxicating to one's ego than the feeling of being intelligent.

But Morgunov had come to believe that intelligence and psychic abilities were, in fact, not directly related to one another. For example, psychics never seemed to realize that when they bridged their minds with his own, they were exposing themselves to a return signal.

And what was even worse for them, was that it was also possible to amplify said signal. Much like feedback from a microphone, the signal could be captured, made stronger, and then sent back to whence it came. That, in turn, would create a positive gain loop, amplifying the signal again and again, as fast as synapses could fire in the brain.

Of course, this was a bit dangerous on his end, too. The rapid amplification of the psychic signal would quickly feel like a splitting headache, soon followed by a knife in the brain, and then ultimately, a combusted skull. Unless, that was, the psychic realized what was happening and severed the link in time, which they usually did.

So it was a matter of the physical endurance of one's brain. And as a servant with ample passive soul defenses on his side, Morgunov was typically able to come out on top during such exchanges.

He couldn't be sure how this so-called Primordial lady would fare, but he intended to find out.

The reversal was a simple enough matter to execute. Well, simple after years of practice, at least. He merely had to empty his mind of all thoughts--admittedly not his strong suit--and then, while maintaining that emptiness, find the opening through which the signal was arriving.

He found it best to imagine the emptiness of his mind to be filling up with flammable gas. Then he could easily discover where the gas was coming from. A conceptual breach.

From there, he would imagine a spark, and the gas would ignite, blowing back through the hole.

Ah, it was already working. He could feel the headache coming on. Hoo boy, what a toughie.

This kind of pain was impossible to numb, too, for it was not merely physical. Bool's half of the mind would be feeling it just as much as his half, if not more, which was why the reaper didn't care for this technique."

"3335

As the pain escalated, he couldn't help acknowledging the risk. How well could she handle this? Better than he could? He was about to find out.

Agh. Even for him, this level of pain was a bit much. Not enjoyable. Disorienting. Excruciating, actually.

Then it was gone. His mind relaxed. Phew.

She'd relented.

"A quaint trick," said the sister. "But you will need to do better than that, Little Fool."

Huh. No effect? Unlikely. She wouldn't have canceled her attack if that were the case. She was just putting on a brave face, trying to maintain her ego.

Good. He didn't want this to be too--

Something else stole his attention. A sudden influx of intel from the Roberts on the western edge of the compound. They were engaged in battle autonomously.

Intruders.

"Ohoho!" said the sister, sounding suddenly quite pleased. "Finally noticed, have you?! The truth of the matter is that there is little I can do to you from this distant position. But a distraction was very much doable."

Irritating.

A violent tremor arrived, freeing dust from the ceiling. He had a decision to make. Did he really need to go handle these intruders himself? The Roberts could handle almost anything on their own. So who--?

"Apologies for the use of trickery," said Rasalased. "I do hope you do not die this day, Young Demon. There is more I would speak with you about."

"Perhaps you will find these new opponents entertaining," said the sister. "I suspect, however, that you already know enough about them to make you suitably nervous."

What was she--?

Two of the Roberts just went offline at once. And more information was arriving. So much incoming data. Tough to parse through it all like this. The Roberts were swarming. Gathering intel en masse. And attacking. They needed guidance, though. More advanced and specific orders.

Uh-oh. Some of the intruders had already penetrated quite deep into the facility. Nearing the Vanguardian captives.

Couldn't allow that, now could he? He started giving them new orders as he moved to personally intercept.

Who the heck had managed all this, anyway? Sure, he'd been distracted, but not for that long. This timing was quite suspicious.

And those silhouettes in the camera footage.

Ah.

One of them, at least, was very obvious. And from it, he could infer the others.

But the obvious one was the most problematic, he knew. He'd spent quite some time trying to learn more about that blasted creature after his encounter with it at Bellvine. Much of that battle had been hazy in his mind, but he'd remembered enough for it to leave a lasting impression on him.

It was that damn dog."
"3336 -- CCLXXXI.

Chapter Two Hundred Eighty-One: 'The opening of the dark chorus...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Loren Lighteyes tapped his foot against the stony floor, trying to have patience and not quite succeeding. Joining up with Caster Egmond's new sect within the Freeman Fellowship had certainly proved to be a roller coaster so far.

In just the last two weeks, they'd visited half a dozen Abolish strongholds--and it wasn't entirely clear why, either.

Obviously, Caster had plans, but he apparently wasn't yet keen to share the details of them. And while being kept in the dark was nothing new to Loren, he still didn't exactly love it.

Loren's reaper, Rezolo, seemed to think that it was some type of recruitment drive. With Loren being the first one to join up, it made sense that Caster would want to gather more followers.

But if that was what he was doing, then he sure had an odd way of going about it. Because Loren was still the only one following Caster around.

Maybe the Marauder of Calthos was just being picky. That was what Rezolo kept saying, at least.

And there was some logic in that, too, Loren supposed. Viable candidates for the Freeman Fellowship were few and far between within Abolish, and if Caster wanted to be even more strict beyond that, then Loren had a feeling that they might never find anyone else to join up at all.

But the main reason he didn't entirely buy Rezolo's interpretation of events was because Caster wasn't just going around and striking up conversations all the time. That was part of it, sure, but there were also times when the man simply stopped, closed his eyes, and stood still for a while.

It was almost like the man had just suddenly decided to start meditating out of nowhere. Loren had never known anyone to meditate standing up--and so randomly, too.

And when Loren asked him about it, Caster gave one of the strangest answers he'd ever heard.

"I am communing with the land," he'd said.

Loren had of course asked for elaboration, but he hadn't gotten it. Instead, Caster just promised that all would become clearer in time.

Pretty damn odd, this Marauder.

And then, of course, there were the arguments. Despite visiting so many Abolish strongholds, Caster wasn't exactly acting friendly towards their hosts. Sometimes, he seemed to enjoy antagonizing them. Other times, he clearly enjoyed it."

"3336 -- CCLXXXI.

Chapter Two Hundred Eighty-One: 'The opening of the dark chorus...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Loren Lighteyes tapped his foot against the stony floor, trying to have patience and not quite succeeding. Joining up with Caster Egmond's new sect within the Freeman Fellowship had certainly proved to be a roller coaster so far.

In just the last two weeks, they'd visited half a dozen Abolish strongholds--and it wasn't entirely clear why, either.

Obviously, Caster had plans, but he apparently wasn't yet keen to share the details of them. And while being kept in the dark was nothing new to Loren, he still didn't exactly love it.

Loren's reaper, Rezolo, seemed to think that it was some type of recruitment drive. With Loren being the first one to join up, it made sense that Caster would want to gather more followers.

But if that was what he was doing, then he sure had an odd way of going about it. Because Loren was still the only one following Caster around.

Maybe the Marauder of Calthos was just being picky. That was what Rezolo kept saying, at least.

And there was some logic in that, too, Loren supposed. Viable candidates for the Freeman Fellowship were few and far between within Abolish, and if Caster wanted to be even more strict beyond that, then Loren had a feeling that they might never find anyone else to join up at all.

But the main reason he didn't entirely buy Rezolo's interpretation of events was because Caster wasn't just going around and striking up conversations all the time. That was part of it, sure, but there were also times when the man simply stopped, closed his eyes, and stood still for a while.

It was almost like the man had just suddenly decided to start meditating out of nowhere. Loren had never known anyone to meditate standing up--and so randomly, too.

And when Loren asked him about it, Caster gave one of the strangest answers he'd ever heard.

"I am communing with the land," he'd said.

Loren had of course asked for elaboration, but he hadn't gotten it. Instead, Caster just promised that all would become clearer in time.

Pretty damn odd, this Marauder.

And then, of course, there were the arguments. Despite visiting so many Abolish strongholds, Caster wasn't exactly acting friendly towards their hosts. Sometimes, he seemed to enjoy antagonizing them. Other times, he clearly enjoyed it."

"3337

The two of them had gotten into more than a few scraps during this trip. And worse still, despite being the chief instigator, Caster was frequently fine with standing by and watching Loren do all the fighting.

"Just trying to get a measure of you, lad," he'd said. "I hope you're not planning on complaining. You need the experience."

Thankfully, Caster did step in whenever the situation began to look truly dire.

And while he had yet to see the Marauder ever get serious during a fight, it was now quite obvious to Loren that this man was far more powerful than he'd expected. And he'd already expected a lot.

The guy could lay opponents out without even moving a muscle. Somehow, he could just look at them, and they'd crumple like paper-- and not always in the same manner, either. Sometimes, they would just fall over and stay down, seemingly passed out cold.

Other times, it was less pretty.

One guy ended up looking as if almost every bone in his body had been snapped in two and folded together, like he'd been crammed into an invisible box. And for all Loren knew, maybe he had. Loren still wasn't sure how Caster's powers worked. Rezolo said that Caster was supposed to be a destruction user, but none of the stuff he'd seen so far had looked like destruction to Loren.

All in all, though, Loren couldn't say he was hating his time with the Marauder. This gig was definitely strange, but he knew from personal experience that there were far, far worse ones in Abolish.

It'd be nice if Caster could pick up the pace a bit, though.

This "communing with the land" business would've been a lot better if it didn't mean Loren had to stand around so much. And it was unpredictable, too. Caster could be done in a few minutes or a few hours.

On this occasion, it was the latter.

The man's reaper, Kalikos, was even stranger. Whenever Loren tried asking for elaboration or clarification on something from Kalikos, the reaper usually gave him some weird non-answer--or even a total non sequitur.

The oddest things that the reaper said, however, were the things that arrived out of nowhere, unprompted.

'I should like a puppy of my own, someday,' he said.

Loren's foot stopped tapping as he looked over at the reaper, hovering around the Marauder's short, motionless figure."

"3338

"'Twould be quite the hurdle, taking care of it while intangible,' Kalikos went on, 'but perhaps that would make it all the more worthwhile.'

Loren exchanged glances with Rezolo. They'd already discussed the other reaper's peculiarity at length. According to Rezolo, Kalikos wasn't like this the last time they'd spoken, some thirty years ago.

Which was worrying information. It would've been more comforting to know that Kalikos had always just been some kind of kook. Thinking about how or why he might've changed... well, Loren didn't like where his imagination wanted to go.

Rezolo, bless him, decided to take another crack at a conversation. 'Kalikos,' he said, which didn't even manage to draw the other reaper's gaze toward him. 'Do you know why Caster is so interested in visiting these strongholds?'

Loren resisted the urge to shake his head. That was a question they'd both asked before, but from Rezolo's intonation, it sounded like it was being asked for the first time. Perhaps Rezolo expected Kalikos to have no recollection of it ever having come up before and was therefore trying to be more gentle or subtle in his approach, despite any frustration that he might be feeling.

If so, then Loren could certainly relate.

Kalikos, however, appeared not to even hear him.

Loren had never seen a reaper in such a state. He had to wonder if it might be some kind of act. Reapers did have a tendency to be deceitful, sometimes for no other reason than to amuse themselves.

If it was an act, though, then it was a damn convincing one.

Rezolo gave a silent sigh, wrapped in the echo of privacy.

Loren was still debating whether he wanted to ask Caster directly about Kalikos' apparent condition. It seemed quite a rude and awkward subject to bring up, and while he liked Caster more than just about any other boss he'd ever had in Abolish, that didn't stop the man from still being rather terrifying, in his own way. They hadn't been working together long enough for Loren to really know how Caster would react to such questions. Even if Caster didn't fly off the handle and attack him, it could still cause other types of problems in their relationship.

Yeah. Better to just keep his head down and his mouth shut, for now. That was what Rezolo usually told him to do, anyway.

'Won't be here for much longer,' said Kalikos. 'Best to take it all in while you still can.'

"3339

Rezolo kept trying. 'What do you mean? Why won't we be here for much longer? Where is our next destination?'

'No, no,' said Kalikos. 'You do not see. The Great Song is soon to be sung. And as such, many of these places shall be rent to dust. No way to know which may survive. Too many souls with too much gravity. And so communion must be swift. If any of these grounds be suitable, then they may be worth defending.'

What in the world? 'You catch any of that?' asked Lighteyes.

'Uh, not really...' Rezolo hovered closer to Loren. 'But it sounds like we might be in for a fight soon.'

'Oh yeah? What else is new?'

'What is this Great Song you speak of?' asked Rezolo, publicly again.

'That is indeed the question,' said Kalikos. 'A turning point of the Age, perhaps. Or maybe just a footnote. Much is at stake, whatever the case. 'Tis a wonder that the self-proclaimed protectors of this realm have not already given up the gambit, considering how much they have lost--and how much more they may yet. Fools, I say. But brave ones, to be sure.'

Loren squinted, feeling almost like he understood some of that. "Are you... talking about about the Vanguard, right now?"

'To be a fool is a terrible thing. But to be a great fool--that may not be so bad. In fact, it may be necessary on the greater path. Judge them not too harshly, though they may deserve it. But if they be worthy, they will surely be able to endure such criticism, no? A curious matter.'

'Yeah, he lost me again,' said Loren.

Rezolo attached himself to his shoulder. 'Let's go do some scouting, shall we? I have a bad feeling.'

'Is it okay to leave Caster and Kalikos alone?' he asked. 'What if someone attacks the reaper while Caster is busy talking to the dirt or whatever?'

'I think they'll be fine. I doubt Caster is that deeply incapacitated. Come on, now. Go put those eyes of yours to good use.'

Loren made no further argument.

This fortress, as he understood it, was one of the older ones on Eloa. It had traded hands many times between the Vanguard and Abolish--and likely others, too."

"3340

The place had a peculiar layout to it, no doubt due to the work of many different architects over many different eras, but its most prominent feature had to be the labyrinthine walls that surrounded the inner keep. The outer walls were normal enough, but the inner ones were full of branching paths, dead ends, booby traps, and bored-looking guardsmen standing atop crenellated turrets.

Whatever medieval lord had commissioned this horrific maze must have been quite the paranoid bastard. Perhaps that was why this stronghold had come to be called the Rat's Nest.

Not a very flattering name for a place that boasted such impressive structures. True, it wasn't the most... aesthetically pleasing castle Loren had ever seen, what with its mismatched stones and bricks and woods and lamps. But that still struck him as a bit unfair to the builders. He doubted any of them would've chosen such a name.

Thankfully, the maze was much easier to navigate when you had keys to the multitude of doors and gates that went straight down the center of it. And at the moment, most of the gates were up, probably because the guardsmen or perhaps one of the head honchos around here hated having to constantly wait for them to be raised and lowered whenever coming or going from the keep.

If Loren shouted for the guards to lower those gates, he wondered if they would even listen to him. He hoped he wasn't going to find out.

He made for the outer walls, taking the first staircase that he could find to the top.

From up here, the view was certainly something.

The Rat's Nest was a fortress within the nation of Corrico. And Corrico was currently at war with Melmoore. Not more than three months ago, Corrico and Ostra had both declared war by invading Melmoore, but here and now, it was the Melmoorian forces that Loren could see all the way out there on the horizon, sprawled across a number of tented encampments.

Was that three separate battalions? No, four. A full brigade, most likely, commanded by a brigadier general. If they were marching, at this distance, it would likely be two full days before they made it here, but to Loren's eyes, there was not enough movement for that to be the case.

Yet.

None of this was news, of course. They'd known the circumstances of this place when choosing to come here, and from the sound of what Kalikos had just been rambling about, perhaps those circumstances were precisely why Caster had picked this place."

"3341

He searched for anything out of the ordinary. If a ground attack was truly imminent, then it would be obvious from this vantage point. That was one of the primary reasons why fortresses were built on mountains like this, after all.

But the age of this place did not do it any favors in the modern era. Naturally, an aerial assault was a very real possibility here, and in fact, it would almost certainly arrive first in order to soften the defenders up for the eventual siege. Long-range artillery was also quite likely, though he didn't see any at the moment, which was another sign an attack was not yet to occur.

He supposed a stealthy amphibious assault was still a possibility, though. There was a long river that snaked across the landscape, coming right up to the base of the mountain and wrapping partially around it before flowing into the eastern horizon. If he were the one tasked with leading a surprise attack, that was how he would approach it, but it still wouldn't be easy.

The Rat's Nest got its water from an underground well, deep in the heart of the mountain. If there was a path there from the river, it was not obvious and would therefore be quite narrow, making it easily defensible.

Assuming the defenders were actually guarding it, that was.

Maybe that was something he should look into while he still had the time.

‘Well?’ said Rezolo in the echo of privacy. ‘What do you see?’

‘Not much.’ His feet did start moving, however, back down the stairs. ‘Would they really mount an attack, now? What about those rumors of peace talks already going on?’

‘Unfortunately, they might just be rumors,’ said Rezolo, ‘but even if they’re not, talks do not equate to a ceasefire, much less a treaty. And if the Melmoorians are able to strike a major blow before anything is officially agreed upon, then that would certainly improve their bargaining power, now wouldn’t it?’

That was definitely not what he wanted to hear, right now, but he found it hard to disagree with the reaper’s perspective.

‘Where are you going?’ said Rezolo. ‘You only looked for a few minutes.’

‘I want to check something.’

The well, rather annoyingly, was back through the inner walls, on the other side the labyrinth. He kept a brisk pace as he returned, feeling increasingly uneasy the closer he got."

"3342

When he finally arrived, he stopped, suddenly rethinking. Supposing he actually did stumble upon a gaggle of attackers trying to sneak their way into the fortress, it would not go well for him all alone. Such a force would doubtless be composed of the enemy’s most elite soldiers.

Granted, this was the Melmoorian army and not the Vanguard, so maybe elite wouldn’t mean much, comparatively. But then again, the Vanguard might be sprinkled in among them.

He didn’t have any authority here, though. He couldn’t just order some guards to follow him. Caster could’ve, but he wasn’t--

“What’re you up to, Lighteyes?”

Loren just about jumped out of his skin before turning around and seeing Caster standing there. He needed a second to compose himself. "Sir, ah..."

"Not planning on doing anything stupid, I hope," said Caster. "I can't afford to lose my right-hand man, you know."

Right-hand man? Was that really what he was to him? That was a hell of a compliment, but Loren didn't know how much truth could be in it. He didn't feel like he'd been doing anything lately to deserve it. Or anything at all, for that matter. "I, uh... I just wanted to check for a route through the well. If this fortress has any weakness, it might be there." Wait, why had Caster said all that just now? Had he already known what Loren was planning to do?

"Interesting. I'll go with you."

Loren blinked but didn't get the chance to respond.

Despite what he'd said, Caster was already moving ahead, not waiting for him.

Loren followed. He'd only had a vague idea of where to go in the first place. The well was certainly wide enough for a man to be lowered down, but there should've also been a staircase in the nearby keep that led into some underground caverns, to which the well belonged.

Probably.

Whenever they visited a new fortress, he'd always seen Caster pouring over maps and blueprints. Loren had tried to look over them, too, but now that his knowledge was actually being somewhat tested, he was feeling unsure of himself.

They made their way down together, drawing glances from various guardsmen as they passed.

"You could ask for more men, sir," said Loren. "They'd listen to you."

"They'd just get in the way," said Caster. "It'll be a tight fit down there, I'm sure."

"3343

Loren admired his confidence but didn't share it. "Sir, if the enemy has sent someone to infiltrate, they won't be pushovers. Frederick himself could be among them."

"Doubtful," said Caster, "but if he is, that would be fortunate for us. I should like to speak with him."

Loren frowned. He supposed there was no point in arguing, but from everything he'd been hearing of these two Melmoorian warfronts, Captain General Fen Frederick of the Vanguard was most likely not someone that they would want to encounter. While there were definitely other men making names for themselves out here, the Surgeon Saint's reputation had risen the most.

Frederick was being attributed with the majority of Melmoore's success thus far. Whether that was actually the truth of things or not remained to be seen, but Lighteyes had seen and heard the fear that his name evoked in many of the men around here.

There was one particular story that had caught Loren's attention, too.

Supposedly, it happened in a place called Erimor, a little mountain town in southern Melmoore and one of the earliest conquests in Corrico's invasion. The town had quickly become a headquarters from which the Corricoans organized and coordinated their assaults on larger cities in the area. By all accounts, it had been a well-positioned, easily defensible location--and nicely hidden away, to boot. Even satellites couldn't spot it because of the way a certain mountainous cave arched over it.

The expectation had been that, even if their offensives failed or otherwise stalled, Erimor would allow their HQ to operate discreetly for quite a while, buying them plenty of extra time to regroup or implement various contingency plans.

And progress had been good. The invasion proceeded quite strongly.

At first.

Major cities were captured quickly--or just completely annihilated. The sphere of influence grew rapidly, with Erimor near the heart of it, well-protected on all sides.

Until Erimor went totally dark.

Word stopped arriving. No new orders. No new plans. No new intel. No new anything. And the cracks in the invasion began to form, until every new assault failed, either because they were too unorganized or the enemy too well-prepared.

The rumors were still uncertain about how Erimor had been taken back so suddenly, but it was popular sentiment that Frederick was responsible, that he'd snuck into the town with a small force--or even alone, as some told it--and done something to all of the Abolish reapers there."

"3344

What exactly that something was, the rumors had difficulty pinning down. Some said he'd captured them all and now had a dozen or more high-ranking reapers as hostages.

Others said it was far worse, that he didn't just capture them. They said he'd turned them. Brainwashed them. Enslaved their minds and made them release all of their servants, just like that.

And still others said that no, it was something that was arguably even more terrifying. He'd simply convinced them to join him. With mere words. Didn't even have to brainwash them.

All-in-all, it sounded rather unlikely to Loren--or at the very last, greatly exaggerated. For one thing, how in the world would anyone here in Abolish have learned about him doing something like that? If all the reapers turned traitor, and all the servants were released, then there would've been no one left to relay what happened.

And whenever Loren had pointed out such things to the various soldiers who were gossiping about it, they began sounding abruptly less certain and less fearful. But some also tried posing some iffy explanations. Maybe one or two reapers had escaped, they'd said. Maybe the Surgeon had let them get away precisely for this reason, because he wanted Abolish to know.

Whatever the truth actually was, all of the rumors seemed to agree that Frederick was in an almost unassailably advantageous position now.

That this war was already lost, even.

Regardless of how Frederick had managed to pull it off, if he really did have so many ex-Abolish reapers feeding him intel, then that would explain why every operation was a failure. Frederick knew what they were going to do before they did it. He knew their backup plans for their backup plans.

Needless to say, morale in this corner of the war was rather low. Over the course of Caster's little tour around the continent, Loren didn't think he'd ever seen it this bad.

The one saving grace, some said, was that the Surgeon Saint had a bleeding heart. A man renowned for his mercy. So if they were to lose, then at least they could be relatively certain that he would spare their lives.

That was why a lot the guardsmen and soldiers around here actually looked more bored than afraid. To many of them, the upcoming battles were already a foregone conclusion. It was just a waiting game, now."
"3345

As they made their way down, the flat stones of the fortress gradually receded into uneven, natural rock. Caster led them through one final door, and then they were just in a narrow, winding cave. There weren't even stairs anymore, despite the fact that they were still descending.

And an eerie quiet arrived, broken only by their echoing footsteps. Almost no light was making it down here, either, which wasn't a problem for Loren Lighteyes--and apparently not for Caster Egmond, either, judging by the way he just kept on moving forward without even slowing down.

Kalikos was following closely behind Caster, having not said a word this entire time. It almost made Loren want to ask him another question, just to hear what random smattering of ideas might spill out again.

At length, however, the cave widened into a much larger space, enough so that it nearly looked like a manmade chamber.

A thick beam of light from above made it clear where the well was located. It must've been around midday, too, with how strong that beam was.

Loren could see a wide pool of water farther down, along with various sunken paths through which it gently flowed.

Hmm. Apart from that, this place was a dead end. So he supposed if anyone was going to be sneaking in, it would have to be through one of those underwater holes. He wished he knew which of them, if any, led down to the base of the mountain. Hell, perhaps they all did.

"This should be far enough," said Caster, voice bouncing off the cave walls. "We'll wait here, for now."

"Wait for what, exactly?" said Loren. "To be attacked?" Didn't seem like much a plan.

Caster turned and looked at him for the first time in a while. "On the contrary, just the opposite."

"...What do you mean?"

"Twil be starting soon,' said Kalikos.

Rezolo was the one to ask the obvious question. 'What will?'

'The end of Abolish.'

Loren's eyes widened. He exchanged looks with Rezolo, who seemed equally bewildered.

"Perhaps," added Caster. "But perhaps not."

'You truly see them surviving this?' asked Kalikos.

"The ones here? Certainly not. But elsewhere? Many among them will be quite difficult to get rid of. You know that, Kal."

'Mm. Alas, you may be right. Wishful thinking may have gripped me.'

"Heh. Didn't think you were the type to take sides, anymore.'"

"3346

'You do not mean that, surely,' said Kalikos. 'It was by your design that I have become this way. Do not think I did not notice or have forgotten.'

Caster held up his hands defensively, though he was still laughing.

“Don’t be mad. You know we’re better off, now.”

And when Kalikos made no response, Rezolo took the opportunity to chime in. ‘You are truly rooting against Abolish in this war? Do you not still count yourselves as part of it?’

“We are Freemen now,” said Caster. “As are you, no?”

‘We are,’ said Rezolo, ‘but it’s my understanding that the Fellowship’s goal is to change Abolish from within, not annihilate it.’

“Yes,” said Caster. “But if our internal rivals were eliminated for us, then that task would be made quite a bit easier, wouldn’t you say? Or does that sound too cold to you?”

‘I suppose not,’ said Rezolo. ‘I’m just surprised. But either way, I doubt things will go smoothly for us. If our side does suffer losses as great as you are suggesting, then do you think the Vanguard will care to differentiate between Freemen and non-Freemen? If such a time indeed arrives, then I imagine they will be as ruthless as anyone in Abolish.’

‘Right you may be,’ said Kalikos. ‘Which is why we should preserve our strength. Manpower will be crucial in the days to come.’

Rezolo had no response for that, apparently.

Loren wanted to ask about who they planned on recruiting next, but a sudden tremor arrived, pulling trails of dust from the rocky ceiling.

“Looks like it’s begun,” said Caster, looking up. “We should be safe down here, though.”

Loren stared at him a moment. “...You came here in order to avoid the fighting?”

The small man returned a slight smile. “There’s nothing up there worth risking our lives for. In fact, we should probably just skedaddle. I hope you’re a strong swimmer.”

Loren’s mouth was open, but he didn’t know what to say. This wasn’t exactly what he’d been expecting from his fearless leader who also happened to be one of the most powerful servants he’d ever met.

Caster seemed amused by his reaction. “Are you disappointed, Lighteyes? I thought you were tired of me dragging you into fights all the time.”

Well, he was. But this was different. Or was it? Loren was confused.
“I... just... thought that the enemy might be down here...”
"3347 -- CCLXXXII.

‘No,’ said Kalikos “Tis an aerial bombardment.’

Another tremor arrived, as if to accentuate the reaper’s words.

“How do you know that?” said Loren.

‘There is much being spoken of, if one has the patience to listen,’ said Kalikos.

Loren frowned. “That... doesn’t answer my question.”

“We have our own lines of communication,” said Caster. “I’m afraid telling you any more than that would not be a kindness on our part. Some knowledge comes with strings attached, you see.”

The chamber shook again, this time with much more violent force, making Loren stumble. Entire boulders broke free from the walls and plunged into the pool below, splashing water all the way up to Loren’s feet.

The trembling slowed but didn’t stop, and the continuous groaning of the cave was more than a little unsettling.

“It appears we’ve dawdled too long, already. Let’s get the hell out of here, shall we?” And without waiting, the small man bounded over the ledge and cannonballed into the water with Kalikos in pursuit.

Loren just followed.

Chapter Two Hundred Eighty-Two: ‘Hark! O, dictator of the Empty...!’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

It had been another long day. Covered in dirt and grime, rotten flesh and blackened blood, he wiped his forehead and took a long, deep breath before finally taking a seat on the nearest tree stump. It was wide enough to fit ten men, at least. He rolled his shoulders as he looked around another time.

Felled trees of gargantuan proportions littered the horizon, splintered apart or wholly uprooted--or simply sliced clean through like the one he was currently sitting on.

The Jaskadan Forest wasn't looking too good, anymore. This portion of it. There was still plenty more left to go, though, east of here and north, as well. These rotting bastards were lucky the Ardoran continent was so vast.

Among the fallen trees lay also his fallen opponents. It took quite a bit for them to stay down. They weren't like normal servants--that was for certain. While they didn't appear to regenerate much at all, each one had the durability of a hundred-year-old servant, at a minimum.

Fire had seemed effective at first, but they appeared to have adapted, somehow. Freezing them never worked at all. Perhaps their rotten brains weren't even functional to begin with. Plus, they could move without need of their muscles, too, so the fight would continue long after a typical servant's body would have been rendered totally immobile."

"3347 -- CCLXXXII.

'No,' said Kalikos "Tis an aerial bombardment.'

Another tremor arrived, as if to accentuate the reaper's words.

"How do you know that?" said Loren.

'There is much being spoken of, if one has the patience to listen,' said Kalikos.

Loren frowned. "That... doesn't answer my question."

"We have our own lines of communication," said Caster. "I'm afraid telling you any more than that would not be a kindness on our part. Some knowledge comes with strings attached, you see."

The chamber shook again, this time with much more violent force, making Loren stumble. Entire boulders broke free from the walls and plunged into the pool below, splashing water all the way up to Loren's feet.

The trembling slowed but didn't stop, and the continuous groaning of the cave was more than a little unsettling.

"It appears we've dawdled too long, already. Let's get the hell out of here, shall we?" And without waiting, the small man bounded over the ledge and cannonballed into the water with Kalikos in pursuit.

Loren just followed.

Chapter Two Hundred Eighty-Two: 'Hark! O, dictator of the Empty...!'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

It had been another long day. Covered in dirt and grime, rotten flesh and blackened blood, he wiped his forehead and took a long, deep breath before finally taking a seat on the nearest tree stump. It was wide enough to fit ten men, at least. He rolled his shoulders as he looked around another time.

Felled trees of gargantuan proportions littered the horizon, splintered apart or wholly uprooted--or simply sliced clean through like the one he was currently sitting on.

The Jaskadan Forest wasn't looking too good, anymore. This portion of it. There was still plenty more left to go, though, east of here and north, as well. These rotting bastards were lucky the Ardoran continent was so vast.

Among the fallen trees lay also his fallen opponents. It took quite a bit for them to stay down. They weren't like normal servants--that was for certain. While they didn't appear to regenerate much at all, each one had the durability of a hundred-year-old servant, at a minimum.

Fire had seemed effective at first, but they appeared to have adapted, somehow. Freezing them never worked at all. Perhaps their rotten brains weren't even functional to begin with. Plus, they could move without need of their muscles, too, so the fight would continue long after a typical servant's body would have been rendered totally immobile."

"3348

He'd hoped that engaging them in battle would allow him to learn more about them, but months had transpired now, and beyond the minutiae, the only thing he felt like he'd truly come to understand was how annoying these stubborn bastards were.

These Mendocava, as they were called.

Despite having little to no regeneration, they still had a tendency to keep getting back up, anyway. Even headless, their bodies would continue on without them, which was perhaps the biggest difference between them and normal undead. If they had a point of control at all, it was clearly not the brain.

Even now, after all these battles, he still wasn't entirely sure what made some of them eventually stop rising again. Annihilating them entirely worked quite well, obviously, but aside from that, it was uncertain.

He'd had his men dissecting their corpses day and night since the fighting began, but once they'd stopped moving, they appeared to be nothing more than normal, decayed bodies. No trace of ardor or soul power left.

He wondered if they even had any sentience whatsoever. It seemed so, considering the fact that they were clearly trying to prevent him from going certain places, but maybe that was just an illusion of their puppeteer.

Whoever that was, he was going to take his sweet time when he finally found them. Even disregarding the necessity of an interrogation, a quick death would be far more than they deserved.

The sound of crunching footsteps drew his weathered gaze to the left, and he saw his man there.

"Are you alright, Master?" he asked in Valgan.

Ichiro Itoya was a man of visibly advanced years, though not as much as himself. The flecks of gray in Itoya's sharp mustache matched well with his piercing silver gaze. He was not a man given to expressing concern trivially, either, so the question he'd asked must've been prompted by quite the vile sight.

"I'm fine," he said in two voices, also in Valgan. "Despite appearances, they've yet to lay a finger on me." And he motioned to the dried viscera all over him. "This is just splashback."

"Of course, Master." Itoya had a fair bit of grime and gruel on him, too, mussing his normally pristine longcoat. "But you do look rather weary, sitting there like that. Perhaps they are not trying to win the war of the body but the one of the mind, hmm?"

"3349

"I'm not in the mood for your philosophizing, Ito."

"When are you ever, Master?"

A fair point, he supposed. He stood up and rolled his neck. "Any movement from the Dulvani?"

"Yes," said Itoya. "They appear to be evacuating."

"Smart. And a shame. It would have been interesting to fight them, too. With how secretive they are, I imagine they must have quite a few tricks up their sleeves."

"Would you like me to pursue them?"

He had to take a moment to think about that. On the one hand, Itoya was among his very best men and would no doubt see the job done to perfection, so long as precise instructions were given. But on the other hand, losing the manpower against the Mendocava would be more than just a nuisance.

Were the Dulvani worth it? Possibly. They could hold some of the answers he was looking for, but he doubted it. And even if they did, they would never willingly share them with him.

Not with the wicked one called Dozer.

In that vein, perhaps a different strategy was in order.

"No," said Dozer. "Send some of Germal's men, instead. We have a few here, don't we?"

"We do, Master. But I cannot recommend trusting them with such a task. They are often insubordinate or weak. Or both."

Unsurprising. Itoya got along with Germal about as well as water got along with oil, so any of the Liar's disciples were naturally going to incur a similar degree of ire.

But there was a reason why Dozer had allowed this so-called Freeman Fellowship to continue existing, despite all the hassle and infighting it provoked from many of the other sects. "Don't make me repeat myself, Ito."

"...Yes, Master." And perhaps the man could sense that he had overstepped, because he bowed and walked away without saying another word.

The Freeman. In many ways, they were the embodiment of what Abolish was frequently lacking. A delicate touch. The ability to see and appreciate nuance. And while it was certainly true that they were often too soft or hesitant for their own good, the rest of Abolish obviously made up for such weaknesses in spades.

If any of his men were going to get through to the Dulvani, it might be them. And if not, oh well. That was a problem for another day.

He looked up at the open blue sky and drank in the view. It was late enough in the day that he could already see some of the stars, even though the sun had not yet set."

"3350

Even after all these years, he could still look up and feel this same sense of awe. He didn't like to let the men see him like this, but in these silent moments of solitude, when it was just him and perhaps Engomat, he was able to relax just a bit and allow himself to feel that ancient feeling. The thing he'd felt ever since he was a child.

How long would he have to live in order to see his dream fulfilled? Or to see it even approached, for that matter?

Countless times, he'd wrestled with doubt. With impossibility. But countless more times, he'd persevered. He wasn't dead yet, much as the world might've wanted him to be.

And in more ways than one, perhaps.

Ah. He could see Adarius, already. That was unusual for this time of day on this side of the planet. Oh! Was that a comet?! What absurd luck!

Which one was it? He used Engomat to help rack in his brain, trying to recall the last time he'd read up on the subject. It was only a couple months ago.

Yes. He remembered reading that Aariah's Comet was supposed to be passing by soon. Wow. How could that have slipped his mind?

Incredible.

How long had it been since the last time he'd seen Aariah like this? He wasn't entirely sure, but it probably wasn't more than two hundred years. Aariah was a short-period comet, after all.

His mouth hung open a little as he marveled at it. Yes, now he did remember his last viewing.

It had been just before the Breaking.

Back then, he'd been unable to think of it as anything other than a herald of the gods: a fortuitous omen sent to bless his imminent foray into death or glory.

With the benefit of hindsight and an extra hundred and fifty-or-so years under his belt, Dozer had to look back on his younger self with a bit of disdain and disappointment. He'd truly thought of himself as the center of the universe in those days, hadn't he? A blessing from the cosmos? Laughable.

While the Breaking of Korgum had certainly left its mark on history and renewed fear of him throughout the world, in his mind it was nothing more than a pathetic failure. If only he'd been more patient. More methodical. Under him, Korgum would have become a far more beautiful nation in this modern age. Not like the cesspit it was now."

"3351

Part of him wanted to summon those old feelings again. There was something both freeing and invigorating in them. And they were still there, too. He could feel them in the back of his mind, daring him to indulge.

Seeing Ariaah again, now of all times--what if it wasn't a coincidence? What if it really was a herald of the gods? Now could be another turning point, a time to take bold action. Certainly, this little war of the idiots had set a rather tempting foundation.

He had of course sent many men to join in the fighting, in part because he knew what an obnoxious fuss they would make if he tried to forbid them. They would've whined incessantly or simply snuck off to join, anyway.

But no. Those feelings were wrong. The gods were wrong. Even if Ariaah really was a herald of their will, it didn't matter.

Only the Void's will mattered.

He'd known that back then, too--or thought he did, at least--but it had been so easy to stray. To get distracted. To become obsessed with other avenues of power.

Illusions, all.

Finally, after all these years, he felt more certain of his conviction than ever. No more wavering. No more humoring of morons.

This war would fade, like any other. He had no reason to involve himself or any more of his resources in it.

Unless, perhaps, Morgunov fell low enough to come begging him for help. That would be something to see.

Regardless, here on the other side of the world, he already had plenty of things to keep him busy.

The Mendocava were not in this place without cause. It was not an accident that his men had stumbled upon them in the Gettira Plains, nor was it a coincidence that the fighting had been carried all the way into the Jaskadan Forest.

This forest was as ancient as they came. Some academics even argued that this location might've been the true cradle of life for humanity, the place where they had evolved from mere apes into the much more deadly creatures that eventually went on to conquer most of the planet.

He didn't know if he believed that. The region of the Aruna River in central Ardora was the more traditionally recognized location for that theory, and Dozer was not like Morgunov. He did not buy into new academic ideas easily."

"3352

He did have to acknowledge, however, that this forest was no normal place. He'd visited many times before, and during each venture, it felt quite different from the last.

This forest... it was more alive than most. He'd come to believe that perhaps it really did have a will of its own, as the Dulvani claimed. Perhaps Jaskadan was a slumbering giant, and tearing through it like he and the Mendocava had been doing was going to wake it up.

He hoped so. It would certainly clear a few things up. And maybe this giant could answer a few questions, if it harbored any sort of communicable intellect.

In any case, the fact that the Mendocava had retreated here was interesting. As far as was known before, they had no connection to this place. The Gettira Plains, sure. That was the site of a great battle, one that had decided the fate of four civilizations of the ancient world. The Arakonyc, or Great Apocalypse, was its historical name.

While the true origins of the Mendocava were still disputed, it was now his view that they were enthralled as a result of that conflict. Instead of dying, a puppet master had enslaved them--or what remained of them, at least.

But if they saw Jaskadan as a place of refuge, then perhaps their master was here. Or perhaps... hmm.

He recalled a tale of this forest, one he'd heard when he was just a simple lad with nothing more to his name than the ragged tunic on his back and the treasured buskins on his feet.

He remembered it because it was the tale of a fallen star.

One quiet night, when there was no moon to be seen, a brilliant light fell from the heavens and landed in the heart of a budding forest. A man called Skapa saw it from afar. Being unable to resist its radiant allure, he ventured into the forest to find it.

As he trekked through the forest, however, he saw it growing and changing all around him. Where before it had seemed a small, quaint place, it became a dense, labyrinthine maze full of wondrous colors and sights that he could not describe.

Little creatures began to appear before him. Wisps or fairies, perhaps. And they began asking him questions, wanting to know all about him, who he was and why he had come."

"3353

At first, he answered everything he could, as their curiosity was matched only by his own, and he wished to know more of them, as well. In time, however, their questions became so incessant that he resorted instead to trying to make them laugh.

Within the clutches of the forest, the sun was often not visible at all, because the canopy of leaves overhead was so thick. And in the company of the wisps, Skapa lost track of the days, but he began to notice that he never seemed to grow tired or need sleep.

He began to suspect that the ethereal, hypnotic lights of the forest were having an effect upon him. He worried that, perhaps, this place was not the beautiful haven that it first appeared to be.

But he was enjoying himself, nonetheless. The wisps harbored many secrets, and they seemed to care for him.

They shared with him their visions, images from their minds of beautiful places they hoped to one day visit or return to. They shared with him their dreams, feelings from their hearts of things they hoped to one day do or accomplish. And perhaps most importantly of all, they shared with him their Pool of Stillness, a secluded body of water and nectar that invigorated him as he immersed himself in it.

The longer he spent within the forest, the more enraptured he could feel himself becoming. Increasingly, his life outside the forest seemed a distant memory, a thing of so little value compared to what he had discovered here that it was hardly even worth remembering.

And he was torn. In the back of his mind, his concerns were growing, the stubborn vestiges of his past self. But another part of him wanted to let go, to simply be.

Eventually, the wisps grew to love him so much that they deigned to share with him their greatest secret, the thing they treasured most of all.

It was the fallen star. The very thing that had led him into the forest in the first place.

When he saw it there, shining even more radiantly than anything else he had seen within the forest, he was reminded of his deep curiosity, of his thirst to learn more about the unknown. In this way, the star embodied everything he missed of his past self and revealed to him a dissatisfaction with the comfortable life that he had come to find here.

So he stole it and fled."

"3354

From there, the tale split into different tellings. Some were clearly meant to portray Skapa more sympathetically, and others very much not. Unfortunately, it was impossible to tell what the truth was, anymore, even with the benefit of reapers and their long memories.

The problem, Dozer thought, was that Skapa himself was simply too famous. At this point, he was more like a mythic hero than an actual person, because throughout the course of recorded history, he had been the center of many such tales, though admittedly the tale of Skapa and the Forest was likely the oldest.

It certainly didn't help that many storytellers seemed to have shoehorned Skapa into their fairy tales, most probably in an appeal to popularity or perhaps an attempt to give their story a greater sense of legitimacy.

Where this forest was concerned, however, many had long since come to the conclusion that the wisps from the tale were, in fact, the very same beings as the Dulvani.

And the Dulvani, rather unsurprisingly, hated that. They claimed to have no relation whatsoever--or that the tale itself was entirely fictional.

Dozer was obviously not the first treasure hunter to have come to this place, and the Dulvani had a reputation for being quite inhospitable to those seeking wealth from their forest. In fact, they were known to be utterly brutal in their isolationism. Certainly not the soft, friendly, fairy-like creatures that they were too frequently portrayed as in stories about them. He'd heard they would execute hapless travelers who cut down even a single tree for a campfire during the winter.

And looking at the sea of felled wood all around him, there was no doubt in his mind that they would now be holding a grudge against him for a very long time to come.

So be it, though.

He was not here for their forest, but if it continued to get in his way, he would continue to annihilate it. And besides, he'd left the trees as stumps. He hadn't uprooted or burned very many of them. He just needed clear sight.

That was the real nuisance of Jaskadan. The ardor that flowed through it, obfuscating everyone's senses and disorienting them--or even, at times, projecting hallucinations. After losing three decent soldiers to the forest, he'd decided that enough was enough. He didn't need the extra hassle when the Mendocava were already being plenty annoying on their own."

"3355

He would've liked to have a bit more time to himself, but matters needed to be taken care of. After this latest battle, he wanted to check up on their supplies back at camp. While he trusted Jari to handle logistics most of the time, it was still prudent to look on things himself regularly. A ship ran best when its captain made his presence known, after all. And of course there was still the matter of the research team. Hopefully, they would have--

The ground quaked under his feet as he was standing up. It was violent enough to kick up splintered debris all around him, though it did not make him stumble in the slightest.

He was instantly reminded of someone he loathed. This feeling was all too familiar.

Was she here? Had she chased him all the way across the Luthic Ocean? Surely not. She had much more pressing concerns on Eloa, at the moment.

But then again, he'd been thinking she might pop up for a while now, because her name had been conspicuously absent from most of the reports he'd read of the war. She should have been making ample trouble for his men over there, so the fact that she'd been quiet suggested that she was up to something. He'd thought maybe she would make a play on his country during all the chaos, maybe try to launch a counter invasion and finally end the stalemate while he was away.

He'd been hoping for that, actually. Such a move would almost certainly overextend her forces and make his eventual counter stroke that much more potent when he returned home.

He did not sense her yet, however, which was curious. If there was one thing about the Gargoyle of Korgum that he appreciated, it was that she tended not to bother concealing herself. It was likely too difficult for her, once she started making the ground rumble.

He leapt. His dirtied coat flapped wildly behind him as he arched high over the landscape, and he got a clear view of the distant horizon in all directions, save where the giants of Jaskadan still managed to touch the clouds and impede his sight.

His landing was soft, barely disturbing the dirt as his boots touched Eleg again. In a single bound, he'd made it all the way back to the encampment. Not such a difficult feat for him, despite how far today's battle had strayed from its origin point."

"3356

The encampment did not look as one might have expected. There were no tents or campfires to be seen, no gatherings of soldiers out in the open.

No, the encampments of the Living Void were different. He'd always preferred to travel in luxury. What was the point of being the most powerful conqueror the world had ever known if his entourage paled in comparison to those of the self-professed god-kings of the ancient world?

Here, they had mobile, multi-purpose buildings. Each one served as a miniature fortress unto itself, able to deploy men or vehicles on a moment's notice, while also providing the comfort of a palace for Dozer and his chosen leaders. The rank-and-file were not entirely left out, though. They were able to enjoy the fully stocked kitchens and refectories, as well the various training facilities.

It was important not to coddle the men, but it was equally important to give them a view of what they might one day be able to achieve, should they prove themselves worthy.

There were also immobile facilities in this camp, as well. And they were no primitive structures, either, despite being made almost entirely by materializers. The artistry in some of these buildings could've rivaled any of the ancient kingdoms of Qhenghis.

Their pristine and prestigious nature was in large part due to Natia. She always obsessed over decorations, regardless of how temporary their stay. Once upon time, he'd found that obsession rather obnoxious, but over the decades, he'd developed a fondness for her attentive eye, even if it did end up going to waste more often than not.

She was the first one to greet him upon his return, though he could see a few of the men running about, no doubt having been ordered into positions.

"Master," said Natia with a welcoming nod. As ever, her perfectly calm voice and demeanor betrayed nothing of her thoughts, and nary a speck of dust was to be found on her brown-and-green fatigues despite all the debris around.

Another apparent after shock arrived, prompting Dozer's next question. "What's the source of this rumbling?"

'Uncertain,' answered her reaper, Akama, who floated close behind her. To Dozer's eyes, she was a dog-sized, black lump with no eyes or ears to speak of--only an oval-shaped proboscis that sported rows of bloodied, smoldering teeth. 'But it seems to be originating from deeper into the forest, from the direction of Kara'kuun.'

"3357

Kara'kuun? If these tremors were coming from the Dulvani capital city, then perhaps he should change tactics here. He'd told Itoya to send a few men to negotiate with the Dulvani directly, but now he was thinking that he should go investigate this other matter himself, anyway.

Interesting.

He didn't like to act rashly, though. Increasing the number of scouts would be the more prudent thing to do.

Patience, then. As ever.

He'd heard that all his life, from reapers and mentors alike: that his patience was perhaps his greatest strength. How many enemies had he vanquished over the years simply by outlasting them? By waiting for them to make a mistake? By looking for an opening, no matter how long it took to find it?

Though, he'd heard the opposite, too: that he was too slow to act. Too scared of making a wrong step. Too cowardly for an emperor. Morgunov certainly liked to sing that tune. The man had an, at times, paradoxical obsession with the concept of cowardice. But then, that was just one more thing that made the Mad Demon live up to his moniker.

He instructed Natia and Akama to send more scouts to Kara'kuun, and then he retired to his chamber in the heart of the Obsidian Shell, the largest of the mobile fortresses in his entourage. Within its ridged walls slept enough non-nuclear firepower to raze an entire city in less than four hours--and without the need of a single superpowered individual.

There'd once been a time, not even that long ago by his estimation, when he'd thought that taking nuclear warheads along with him on these ventures was a good idea, but he'd since come to the conclusion that they were more trouble than they were worth. Containment and management alone made them logistical headaches, but on top of that, they were almost never needed--and even when they were, they attracted a prohibitively difficult amount of attention from the Vanguard.

Sermung did not often show himself, but the use of nuclear weapons was one thing that had almost always drawn him out. In some ways, that had been a useful tool, being able to both predict and manipulate the Titan's movements in certain ways.

But that song and dance had lost its luster by now. Eventually, Sermung grew wise to the strategy, and in retaliation, the man had seemingly made it his life's purpose to make Dozer regret it in a thousand other ways every time he deigned to use a nuke--until eventually, he'd all but bled Dozer dry. Now such weapons were precious rare for him and certainly not worth risking on lengthy field operations like this one."

"3358

It would've also been of great help if he could get his hands on a new source of nuclear material, natural or otherwise. All the ones he'd been relying on over the last half-century were now either mostly depleted or dead.

Assassinated, in many cases, actually.

For all their moral posturing, Sermung and the Vanguard seemed to have no qualms about murdering Dozer's materializing sources, no matter how innocent they might've been. He still remembered a time when they at least tried to spirit the sources away and hide them from him. Their persistent string of failures must've become too demoralizing.

Dozer had always wondered if it was Iceheart's policy which had changed things, as many claimed, or if that was merely a smokescreen to help prevent Sermung's all-important public image from becoming too tarnished.

Whatever the case, the Vanguard's secret division of assassins was the real problem. Naturally, they'd made many attempts on Dozer's life over the years, and they always tried to strike when he was at his most vulnerable.

Such as when he was in the comfort of his own chambers. Not unlike this very moment, when he was in the shower at his most defenseless, washing off the grime of a long day of battle.

Sometimes, the killing attempt came from intruders with admittedly impressive stealth. Other times, it came from traitors who'd been in his service for years.

It had been a while since the last attempt. He wondered which type it would be this time.

He stood directly under the showerhead, letting the searing hot water massage his face for a few minutes longer than he usually did. If his attackers were waiting for a window of opportunity, then perhaps they would think this was a good one. It certainly wouldn't have been the first of its kind.

At length, though, he shut the water off and looked around the black-and-gold tiled room, almost disappointed. With how hot he liked the water, there was plenty of steam to make visibility low, as well.

Fine.

He grabbed a towel and began drying himself off.

He knew that something was off tonight. It wasn't any kind of supernatural sense--or at least, he didn't think it was. Rather, it was just centuries of experience. Not something he could articulate.

The air? No. The stillness? No, not that, either.

There'd been a time, long ago now, when he'd thought this feeling was simply paranoia. And back then, maybe it had been. Hell, maybe it still was, to some extent. But now, he knew a bit better.

The difference.

Between a gut feeling.

And a long-tempered instinct."

"3359

Engomat's reaper senses weren't telling him anything. Of course they weren't. Even before the existence of aberration-spawned Invisibility, there had been various means by which assassins could avoid detection. It certainly hadn't helped, though. Dozer could've done without that little technological development from Morgunov's side.

Hell, despite all the breakthroughs they'd made, it seemed like half or more ended up being too much responsibility for them to handle. Of what use was some great new technology if it just ended up in the Vanguard's hands, anyway? He'd often pondered that question. If the Vanguard didn't have their own threatening inventors, Dozer would have ceased bothering with this hassle eons ago.

Maybe he would've even killed them all himself. Sometimes, he thought that maybe Engomat was right about the advancement of technology, that their mission would be better off without the extra "help."

If not for his dream, Dozer probably would've been convinced by the reaper a long time ago.

He proceeded back into the bedroom and began getting dressed. Despite his apparent age, he had quite the physique. In fact, that was in large part the reason why he'd wanted Engomat to let him age so much.

When he was younger, he'd cared not a whit for his own musculature, but by the time he'd hit a point when a servant might normally stop the aging process, he'd developed a new fascination with bodybuilding. And unfortunately, one could not build muscle while aging was halted by a reaper.

These days, he'd never felt healthier or stronger. Nonetheless, people still took to calling him "the Old Man," like he was somehow past his prime.

Maybe they'd stop calling him that if he took his shirt off in public more often.

Bah. Silliness. He had no use for it.

Whoever was about to attack him, he appreciated that they were at least allowing him to look dignified for the occasion. He'd already experienced too many fights in nothing but a towel--or even stark naked.

Perhaps these assailants had some sense of honor about them. That would be a nice change of pace, though he doubted it.

He went for the gray briefs and black Domingo slacks first. The latter had a fine silver trim down the sides, which was perhaps a bit opulent for battle attire, but he didn't mind. Domingo was a master of his craft who knew how to blend function and form perfectly."

"3360

If only he'd been able to convince Domingo to design military uniforms for him. What a colossal disappointment that meeting had been.

Ah well.

Even if the man hated him with a burning passion, Dozer did not intend to stop wearing his clothes. If anything, it made him want to keep buying them out of spite.

Next came the white button-down. He rolled up the sleeves and picked out a silky black tie. He forewent the jacket. Jaskadan was too warm for that.

Next should have been socks and dress shoes, but he wasn't in the mood. Oddly enough, he rather preferred the idea of sandals, at the moment. They weren't battle attire, either, but honestly, nothing really was. He'd most likely end up barefoot by the end of the fight, either way.

Then he was done. Fully dressed. But still no attack arrived. He eyed himself in the mirror, not really looking and instead just thinking. Waiting.

Curious. Did these assassins have cold feet? Or were they perhaps hoping for some sort of backup to arrive first?

Or was this all just in his head? Had he finally gone senile and lost his mind to paranoia, as so many were already proclaiming?

That might've been amusing, were it true. Made things simpler, perhaps.

Well.

He couldn't yet tell where they were, whether they were near or far, inside the room with him or out. He only knew that the threat was imminent. That a clash of souls was soon to occur.

But if they wanted to keep giving him time like this, then he supposed he would just have to force their hand. Unless they stopped him, he was going to go back outside and start giving new orders to his men. The attackers wouldn't want that, surely.

He made for the door.

Then he felt it. The presence. They were in the room with him now. Had they been there all along? He didn't think so, but he couldn't be sure. His eyes still couldn't see them, but he had a rough idea where they were. On the other side of the room, behind him.

He stopped and waited, still undecided about how he wanted to handle this.

Clearly, these assassins were not the usual sort. They'd waited for him. And even now, they still weren't attacking despite having every reason to. Perhaps they wanted to talk, first. If so, he intended to hear them out."

"3361 -- CCLXXXIII.

Such conversations were quite rare, these days. Not many within the Vanguard were both capable enough to seek him out and also willing enough to actually speak with him. It was usually one or the other.

However, he then sensed something he had not been expecting. At least, not here and now.

He sensed the assassin's full presence. Yes. Assassin. Singular. It was not a group, as was typically the case. It was only one man.

And it was an all too familiar one, at that.

He turned to see the enormous figure there, one with a profile so unique that it identified him instantly without need of any other information.

His supposed right-hand man. The Black Scourge. The Monster of the East.

Gohvis was here.

Chapter Two Hundred Eighty-Three: 'The Melody in Black...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

"...Why would you appear before me in this manner?" said Dozer. "You, of all people, should know how I would perceive it."

Gohvis made no response.

Dozer clenched his jaw. What was this, now?

The Scourge was admittedly not among those he'd been expecting to see, but it did make an unfortunate degree of sense.

For over two centuries, he and Gohvis had not been on the best of terms. The Scourge was a far cry from the little lost creature that Dozer had once rescued and decided to raise as his own child. Too much had happened. Those memories were of a different life entirely. Or maybe they'd grown distorted by time and nostalgia.

"...If you've come to kill me," said Dozer, "then why do you hesitate? I and many others taught you better than that, no?"

"I am still undecided," said Gohvis.

Dozer exhaled half a laugh through his nose. "At this late stage? It seems to me that you should have sorted through your feeling before showing yourself." But then, that had always been the lad's weakness, hadn't it? Ruled by emotion, no matter how hard he tried to protest otherwise.

Saying as much aloud would not have been productive, however.

"No," said Gohvis, rather unsurprisingly. "I am thinking that we may yet be able to find common ground again. Before it is too late."

Too late for whom, exactly? The lad had a knack for making veiled threats that were not so veiled. Pointing that out, too, would not have been productive. Dozer had to control himself."

"3361 -- CCLXXXIII.

Such conversations were quite rare, these days. Not many within the Vanguard were both capable enough to seek him out and also willing enough to actually speak with him. It was usually one or the other.

However, he then sensed something he had not been expecting. At least, not here and now.

He sensed the assassin's full presence. Yes. Assassin. Singular. It was not a group, as was typically the case. It was only one man.

And it was an all too familiar one, at that.

He turned to see the enormous figure there, one with a profile so unique that it identified him instantly without need of any other information.

His supposed right-hand man. The Black Scourge. The Monster of the East.

Gohvis was here.

Chapter Two Hundred Eighty-Three: 'The Melody in Black...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

"...Why would you appear before me in this manner?" said Dozer.
"You, of all people, should know how I would perceive it."

Gohvis made no response.

Dozer clenched his jaw. What was this, now?

The Scourge was admittedly not among those he'd been expecting to see, but it did make an unfortunate degree of sense.

For over two centuries, he and Gohvis had not been on the best of terms. The Scourge was a far cry from the little lost creature that Dozer had once rescued and decided to raise as his own child. Too much had happened. Those memories were of a different life entirely. Or maybe they'd grown distorted by time and nostalgia.

"...If you've come to kill me," said Dozer, "then why do you hesitate? I and many others taught you better than that, no?"

"I am still undecided," said Gohvis.

Dozer exhaled half a laugh through his nose. "At this late stage? It seems to me that you should have sorted through your feeling before showing yourself." But then, that had always been the lad's weakness, hadn't it? Ruled by emotion, no matter how hard he tried to protest otherwise.

Saying as much aloud would not have been productive, however.

"No," said Gohvis, rather unsurprisingly. "I am thinking that we may yet be able to find common ground again. Before it is too late."

Too late for whom, exactly? The lad had a knack for making veiled threats that were not so veiled. Pointing that out, too, would not have been productive. Dozer had to control himself."

"3362

After everything they'd been through together, it was somehow much more tempting to say the things that he knew would irritate.

Perhaps, deep down, some part of him had been wanting this day to come. Wanting to see if Gohvis would truly go this far.

But no. Reason needed to win out, today. Too much was at stake.

"Very well," said Dozer. He moved for the large chair by his sprawling bed and took a seat. "Speak your piece. I promise to listen in earnest."

For a time, Gohvis was again quiet, no doubt trying to choose his words carefully.

Dozer just waited for him.

"...I have seen what you are looking for in this place," said the Scourge. "I can help you find it. But in exchange, you must agree to help me achieve my goal, as well."

Dozer cocked an eyebrow. "What you've just described was our original arrangement, no? And were you not the one who first declared that our two dreams were incompatible with one another?"

"...Yes," said Gohvis. "But I have since discovered new information which has changed my mind."

Dozer rubbed his temple with one knuckle. "Well, now, that is interesting, because I've heard you say it so often and for so long that I think I might've come to believe it, myself. So please explain to me what this new information is."

"I would be happy to," said Gohvis, "but not in Engomat's presence."

Dozer scoffed. "You cannot be serious."

"Unfortunately, I am. Please, Father. Disengage your hyper-state, send Engomat away, and I will explain. And perhaps, when I do you no harm, you will finally realize beyond doubt that I am still loyal to you.”

“Hardly. You say all of that as if I would be entirely at your mercy without Engomat’s help.”

“No, Father. You are already at my mercy. You may not want to acknowledge it, but the truth is, my strength surpassed yours long ago.”

Dozer couldn’t help smiling a little. He had to admire the lad’s confidence, at least. “If that’s so, then why do you not simply force me to submit, then take the whole of Abolish for yourself?”

“Because that is a different matter altogether. I have never coveted your position. How many times must I say that before you finally believe me?”

“Words are cheap, son.”

“Then what of my actions? Never once have I moved against you.”

“Well, that is not exactly true, now is it?”

"3363

“I have only moved to protect what was mine,” said Gohvis. “That is not the same as moving against you.”

“Splitting hairs won’t help your case here,” said Dozer. “Taking responsibility for your actions might.”

The giant reptile shook his head. “Regardless, this is important, Father. I do not ask this of you lightly. I know how difficult it is for you to extend even a modicum of trust my way, at the moment, but in this matter, I must insist. Engomat cannot be privy to this information, at least until you’ve heard and processed it yourself. If you decide afterward that you wish to tell him everything I said, then that is fine. But you will need the option.”

“...Why?” said Dozer. “What possible reason could there be for that?”

“I am sorry, but if I explained any further while he can hear, it will likely defeat the purpose of secrecy.”

It was Dozer's turn to shake his head. "That is not good enough, son. You ask too much and offer too little."

Gohvis gave a heavy sigh, and for the first time, turned away from Dozer, pacing toward the far side of the room. He was so tall that his head nearly scraped one of the small, metal lamp fixtures that hung from the ceiling.

"To my mind, there are only two reasons you would ask such a thing of me," said Dozer. "The first is that you are simply lying and trying to make it easier to kill me. Which, amusingly, would not work even if I agreed to your terms, but seeing as you are clearly confident in your own ability, you must disagree with that assessment. Meaning that this explanation is indeed quite likely."

Dozer left space for Gohvis to respond, but the enormous dragon man said nothing, not even turning around to face him again.

"The second explanation," Dozer went on, "is that, somehow, you are being earnest, and you instead fear that if Engomat hears and understands whatever it is that you wish to say, he will then take some immediate, unpreventable, and irreversible action. Such as releasing my soul, perhaps? But what information would prompt him to do such a thing? And you must surely realize that while in a hyper-state, I am the one in foremost control. Have you forgotten that? Or is there some other action from him that you fear? If so, then I am having trouble imagining what it might be."

"3364

"It is nothing so conspiratorial as either of those things," said Gohvis, "but once I have explained, you will understand. So please, Father. If there is any amount of trust left within you, then let it be used here."

Dozer leveled his steely gaze at him. If this were anyone else, there would have been an obvious solution here. As a show of good faith, the traditional course of action would have been to exchange reapers with one another and then encase them both.

To put their lives in each other's hands, in other words.

It was a simple, ancient, and yet still quite effective method of creating a neutral environment for which negotiations such as this one could be conducted.

Problem was, Gohvis did not have a reaper.

Because the infamous Black Scourge was not a servant.

For quite some time, that particular subject had been an enduring mystery. For as long as Dozer had known him, Gohvis had always possessed the same powers as a servant with mutation. But a reaper never appeared.

At first, Dozer had thought that, surely, the reaper was just hiding--that Gohvis' independence was merely an elaborate illusion. Even after Gohvis demonstrated his ability to invoke the regeneration on his own, without needing to be touched by any reaper, it had still taken Dozer many more years before he fully, truly believed it.

But as strange and obnoxious as it sometimes was, it also undoubtedly had proved very advantageous over the years. Reapers were the primary point of weakness for servants, after all. Gohvis being able to regenerate without one meant that he may've well been a true immortal.

Perhaps the first in history, even.

It was hard to know that for sure, though. As far as Dozer was aware, Gohvis had never been completely obliterated--never vaporized or atomized, for instance--so there was no telling if he could regenerate himself from such a state unaided. And rather understandably, the lad was not keen to test that out, either, because by all conventional wisdom, it was very likely that, no, he wouldn't be able to.

But then again, he could still regenerate from having his brain destroyed, so it wasn't entirely out of the question.

For the longest time, the questions that Gohvis provoked from others had been incessant. Naturally, many of their comrades eventually noticed that something was strange with him, and explaining his exceptional nature to them was not something that was in any way advantageous to him."

"3365

That was why Gohvis had gone to great lengths, at a relatively young age, to acquire via mutation the power of telepathy. Because with it, he was able to speak in two simultaneous voices, one physical and one non-physical.

It certainly hadn't been perfect at first. But over time, he'd refined. And now, of course, he was of sufficient age that none questioned it, anymore. They all simply assumed--quite reasonably--that he existed in a perpetual hyper-state with his reaper.

These days, Dozer was one of only a handful in the entire world who knew this about him. Even Morgunov and Jercash didn't seem to know, though it was difficult to be certain of that. Those two both had their own ways of getting their hands on information that seemed otherwise unobtainable.

Just as Dozer himself did.

"If you truly wanted to have such a conversation with me," said the old man, "then this is not the way. And you know that."

Gohvis merely stood there, eyes as piercingly red as ever.

Then a thought struck him. "Or perhaps--hmm. Is this about the Dulvani? You did have a fondness for them, didn't you? If so, then cease your worrying. I have no plans to eradicate them." Unless they got in his way, of course, but Gohvis would already know that, too.

Still, the lad said nothing.

Mm. Hold on a minute... Yes, he would already know that, wouldn't he? So then...

"...You did come here for them, didn't you?" said Dozer, tilting his head. "Because you know that they have what I seek. Or some knowledge of it, at least."

"You are jumping to conclusions, Father. I'd not recommend doing that, today of all days."

Dozer squinted with one eye. "And what difference does the day make?"

"I'm not here for the woodfolk, Father. I'm here at the behest of the Vanguard. Of Sermung."

Dozer clenched his jaw. Invoking that name, here and now, was a deliberate insult. But he maintained his composure. After all, just as he knew what to say in order to get under his son's skin, the opposite was undoubtedly true, too.

"And today is the day of their counteroffensive," said Gohvis. Despite his words, he did not sound smug at all. Just flat and serious, as ever. "My job was merely to keep you busy. They didn't even ask me to kill you, though I'm sure they wanted to."

"3366

Interesting. The fact that Gohvis chose to reveal all of this instead of silently attacking him was curious. Surely, there were other things he could have said if it was only a matter of keeping him preoccupied.

"Why are you telling me this?"

"Because as I said, I am wondering if we might not still be able to find common ground again."

"You are not entirely certain you wish to betray me yet, is that it?"

"In essence. You are my father, after all."

"How tenderhearted of you."

"Mock me all you like. Even if you somehow overpower me and go to the aid of the others, today will not be a good day for Abolish. Unless, perhaps, you can convince me to remain by your side and help."

Ridiculous. But he supposed this conversation was a long time coming, one way or another. They'd both avoided it in so many different small ways.

And he could see the lad's stratagem here. Gohvis had waited until the stakes were high enough such that Dozer could not merely brush him off or deflect--or otherwise try to delay this talk until another occasion.

Either it happened now, or it didn't happen at all.

That still did not explain, however, why the lad had been so intent on not wanting Engomat to hear this conversation. That part remained highly suspect. If Gohvis had any sense, he would at least not want to fight him at full power. Or perhaps he thought he could simply kill Engomat the instant they separated.

Regardless, Dozer did have to admit that Gohvis had a fair bit of leverage here. The lad's assessment of the situation was not without its merit. A major counterstroke from the Vanguard had been likely to occur for a while now, so if today was indeed the day, then it was no great surprise.

But it was, also, not necessarily Dozer's problem.

"You know I have no plans to further involve myself in Morgunov's little war," he said. "Keeping me busy would not be necessary. I would not have gone to anyone's aid in the first place."

"Mm. I told the Vanguard as much, myself. They seemed not to believe me. Which was understandable, I suppose. Trusting my word in these circumstances would have been of great risk to them, with comparatively little benefit."

Indeed, his son did understand. No matter how great this offensive from the Vanguard turned out to be, it could ultimately be considered just another test for the men.

As ever, the worthy would endure."

"3367

There'd been a time, of course, when he'd thought differently. When he'd thought that every war--every battle, even--was critical. He'd thought that any point could be the turning one, for the better or worse.

It had been a man named Suresh who had ultimately changed his mind about that, a man who also happened to be one of the most fearsome individuals Dozer had ever personally known--and an unparalleled source of knowledge, besides.

"We have stepped beyond the threshold, Medan. The world watches us, always. And while many tremble at our slightest glance, many others do not. Instead, they seek to use us. To manipulate and force us to move. They see all that we have built, all that we have inherited, and they think that makes us vulnerable, because it gives us something to lose.

"But it doesn't. And they are fools. Because we are monoliths. We do not move by the world's will or provocation. We move when we decide, and everyone else must make way. Do not forget that, Medan, else you will soon find yourself dizzy at this new height of power.”

And indeed, Dozer had found that to be true. How many wars had there been since then? Too many to count, certainly. And they always felt like the most important thing in the world at the time. And in fairness to the people involved in them, perhaps they were.

But not to him.

No. He wasn't going to let himself get sucked into this nonsense that Morgunov had no doubt started on a whim. Even if the rest of world didn't see that obvious fact, he did.

“You surprise me, boy,” said Dozer. “Letting yourself get mixed up in the Demon's messes again. When you didn't budge from your library, I thought you'd finally learned your lesson.”

“This has nothing to do with him. And I think you know that.”

“No? Perhaps so. I thought you had a fondness for some of his men, at least. Betraying me means betraying them, as well. The rest of Abolish will not look kindly upon you as a traitor--or your followers. Are you prepared to risk their lives, as well?”

“Stop this. It is unlike you to speak of trivialities and pettiness. You are trying to throw out distractions, because you do not wish to discuss the real issue here.””

"3368

The real issue.

Ah.

Dozer remained quiet. The boy did have a point, though he still didn't want to admit it, even after all these years.

There was a particular incident that had caused the fallout between them, an incident that Dozer had been struggling to get past.

Maybe he really had gotten too old. Becoming too stuck in his ways. Unable to forgive and move on.

Eh, who was he kidding? He'd never been one for forgiveness.

"You still fault me for killing Suresh," said Gohvis.

"...Yes," said Dozer flatly.

And for a time, the lad just looked at him, a rare expression of surprise on his reptilian face. He'd not been expecting that, had he?

Hell, even Dozer himself hadn't. On any other occasion, he might've deflected or outright denied it.

The truth, that was.

It was supposed to be ancient history by now. How could anyone hold onto a singular grudge for so long?

But here and now, he wanted to acknowledge it. Finally. It was almost a relief--for him and his son both, seemingly.

The look on Gohvis' face melted gradually into one of somber exhaustion. The lad let out a deep sigh and sat down on the floor, wrapping his tail around and resting it on his own lap.

What now, he wondered?

This was what they called progress, he supposed. A step in the right direction, perhaps.

Or perhaps not.

"In killing him, more information was lost than in the sacking of Ethori. Or the destruction of Arkotesh. Do you understand? In that one act, you deprived me of incalculable value. Even if I were to annihilate your precious Erudia, the loss would not compare."

"Now you exaggerate."

"I do not. You simply did not realize the depths to which he was still useful to me."

"He was trying to kill you, Father."

"And he would have failed, son." Dozer almost laughed. "The more things change, the more they stay the same. Just as you thought me incapable of defending myself then, you still think that now. Only your reasoning has changed, it would seem."

“And you continue to not see my true worth,” said Gohvis. “I am now far more knowledgeable than Suresh ever was. Whatever plans you had for him, I can fulfill in his stead if you would but trust me.”

It was Dozer’s turn to sigh.”

”3369

“Tell me.” There was a rare tinge of anger in Gohvis’ voice now. “Long have I pondered these questions. Each time I have broached the subject in the past, you have evaded or deflected or denied me outright. So if you are finally ready to be candid with me, to acknowledge that it has not all been some insecure concoction of my own mind, then you must tell me the whole truth of it, Father. Have I not been a good son to you? What is the ultimate source of this distrust you have in me? It cannot merely be that man’s death, can it?”

And again, Dozer nearly laughed. He shook his head, instead, knowing all too well that his son would find such condescension nigh intolerable during a moment like this. If there was to be any hope of salvaging anything between the two of them, right now, then he had keep himself steady. He needed to not be indulgent. “...You freely admit to be working with the Vanguard, and yet you still wonder why I might distrust you?”

“No,” said Gohvis. “While that is what things have come to, I speak of before. In the past. I was never anything but loyal to you. Is it so strange that I should begin to consider other options when you have been so persistently impossible to please?”

Dozer bobbed his head. “It is not. I understand that part of you very well.” He took a moment to both measure his next words and also give his son a chance to respond again, but when Gohvis merely waited, he continued on. “And truthfully, on some level, I respect you for that decision. You are stepping out of my shadow, if only a little. Any halfway decent father should feel at least a modicum of pride in that.”

Gohvis just stared at him with those deathly red eyes of his. After the slight emotion they’d shown earlier, now they were back to being as impossible to read as usual.

He was waiting for more, Dozer knew. Because the main question had still not be addressed.

Why did he struggle to trust Gohvis as he had trusted Suresh? Suresh, a man who had even become openly hostile to him toward the end.

Why should his son be held in such comparably low esteem to a man such as that? Especially when the two were quite similar in many ways?

He had to admit. The boy's confusion was understandable.

And tragic, perhaps."

"3370

But that was the real trick of it, wasn't it? The real danger here.

Gohvis was his son.

But also not.

Not truly.

It was a game. A story they'd both agreed to tell each other, long ago.

And for his part, Dozer knew that he'd allowed himself to soften too much because of it. He'd let himself indulge in the fantasy of fatherhood, as he'd done many other times throughout his life.

Despite how much some of his followers might have protested otherwise, Dozer was under no illusion that he was some flawless being. Fatherhood had frequently been his weakness. No doubt, it stemmed from a place deep within his psyche that he would never truly be rid of.

Fostering abandoned youth. Helping the helpless to see the truth of this world.

These things, in retrospect, had always been of little practical utility to him and his empire. But so often, he couldn't resist the allure.

And Gohvis here... was arguably the pinnacle of that weakness.

From an outside perspective, it would undoubtedly seem nonsensical.

He supposed he owed the boy an explanation, at least.

“Son... the truth of the matter is that this concept of ‘trust’ you are referring to... is flawed.” Dozer scratched his brow as he eyed the lad carefully, watching his stony expression and half-expecting him to launch into an attack at any moment. “I might have outwardly ‘trusted’ Suresh, yes. I will not deny that. But you see...” He couldn’t help breaking for a brief laugh, now. “That was because I never actually liked him, son.”

Gohvis’ reptilian stare did not budge. “...What?”

Dozer shook his head, wondering if it was even possible for the boy to understand. “Trusting Suresh was easy. Trivial, even. Because I knew that doing so wouldn’t weaken me. I knew that he was a threat and that, ultimately, any ‘trust’ between us could only go so far. But with you, it is different. You are my son.”

At that, the giant black dragon man opened his mouth, but no words came out. Then he closed it again and merely looked confused.

“You,” Dozer continued slowly, “actually have the power to weaken me, if I allow it. Which is why I must not.”

Silence arrived.

Dozer waited.

Perhaps there’d been a better way to explain it, but Dozer couldn’t think of it, even as he continued to mull his words over in his mind.”
"3371 -- CCLXXXIV.

He wanted to say something more, maybe try to clarify a point or two, but nothing felt appropriate. Truthfully, everything he’d said was already far more than he’d ever intended. Hell, maybe he should try to take something back, instead.

Bah. No. Backtracking was unbecoming of an emperor, no matter the situation. And he’d said what he meant.

At length, however, Gohvis unwrapped himself from his tail and stood up.

“There is still much I must tell you,” the boy said. “That conversation without Engomat’s presence still needs to happen. But I suppose it can wait. For now, we really should go to the others’ aid before it is too late.”

Dozer blinked at him. It took a moment to fully understand. But even after he did, he decided to remain seated in his chair. “I already told you that I have no intention of involving myself in this war.”

“Unfortunately for you, you are already involved. Sanko is here, waiting to jump in and assist me in killing you, should I have needed it.”

“Mm. Yes, I thought I sensed her presence earlier. It must be hard for her to show even this much restraint. Shall we deal with her together, then? I should quite like to be rid of her once and for all, and with your help, the deed might finally become trivial.”

“No. I have no desire to kill her.”

Dozer nearly sighed again, resorting to a frown, instead. “You are either betraying me or betraying her. Which will it be?”

“A false choice. Think what you want, but I will move in accordance with my own dictations. Not yours or anyone else’s.”

Agh. The brat.

And yet, Dozer also couldn’t help smiling a little. Maybe it wasn’t just a story they’d been telling each other. Maybe the boy really was his son, after all.

Chapter Two Hundred Eighty-Four: ‘Rumblings in the distance...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

It had been another long day. Prince David of House Lumenbel was a guest in this country, but it increasingly felt as if that meant very little. The major political players within Intar seemed to view him as nothing more than a nuisance to be pushed off onto their assistants and secretaries. He’d been here for months now, and yet he’d still never gotten the opportunity to sit down and speak with any of the big names for more than five minutes at a time.”

"3371 -- CCLXXXIV.

He wanted to say something more, maybe try to clarify a point or two, but nothing felt appropriate. Truthfully, everything he'd said was already far more than he'd ever intended. Hell, maybe he should try to take something back, instead.

Bah. No. Backtracking was unbecoming of an emperor, no matter the situation. And he'd said what he meant.

At length, however, Gohvis unwrapped himself from his tail and stood up.

"There is still much I must tell you," the boy said. "That conversation without Engomat's presence still needs to happen. But I suppose it can wait. For now, we really should go to the others' aid before it is too late."

Dozer blinked at him. It took a moment to fully understand. But even after he did, he decided to remain seated in his chair. "I already told you that I have no intention of involving myself in this war."

"Unfortunately for you, you are already involved. Sanko is here, waiting to jump in and assist me in killing you, should I have needed it."

"Mm. Yes, I thought I sensed her presence earlier. It must be hard for her to show even this much restraint. Shall we deal with her together, then? I should quite like to be rid of her once and for all, and with your help, the deed might finally become trivial."

"No. I have no desire to kill her."

Dozer nearly sighed again, resorting to a frown, instead. "You are either betraying me or betraying her. Which will it be?"

"A false choice. Think what you want, but I will move in accordance with my own dictations. Not yours or anyone else's."

Agh. The brat.

And yet, Dozer also couldn't help smiling a little. Maybe it wasn't just a story they'd been telling each other. Maybe the boy really was his son, after all.

Chapter Two Hundred Eighty-Four: 'Rumblings in the distance...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

It had been another long day. Prince David of House Lumenbel was a guest in this country, but it increasingly felt as if that meant very little. The major political players within Intar seemed to view him as nothing more than a nuisance to be pushed off onto their assistants and secretaries. He'd been here for months now, and yet he'd still never gotten the opportunity to sit down and speak with any of the big names for more than five minutes at a time."

"3372

That had bothered him, at first--especially because it hadn't been that way during his previous visits here, back in his student days. When he'd merely been a foreign princeling with an amusing quip for every occasion, the big players had been more than happy to give him the time of day. To have him entertain their guests for them. And to try and mold him, too. To impress themselves upon an impressionable young mind.

But now that he was older and an official ambassador of Atreya, they were clearly less interested in him. More wary, perhaps. It didn't help that half or more of the people he'd been familiar with had been replaced, either. What an obnoxious system of governance. How was anyone expected to get anything done when they were constantly having to build new relationships after every election? And find new funding before each one? Even now, he almost found himself reluctant to get to know some of these people, seeing as any number of them could be gone within the next three years.

In that sense, perhaps their dismissiveness towards him was warranted. Perhaps they didn't want to bother building a rapport with him, either.

But again, that had only bothered him at first. The reason it didn't bother him anymore was because he'd learned to adjust the angle of his approach. And to see the reality of things, as well.

The terrible truth of the matter was that these supposed big shots didn't know what the hell they were talking about most of the time, anyway. They were elected to look like they did. It was the people behind them--sometimes even beneath them--who were actually thinking deeply about and trying to influence political policy here in Intar. The ones writing and proofreading speeches, the ones whispering in ears between meetings, the ones cutting checks during fundraisers--those were the ones he needed to pay more careful attention to.

Optics in this country were truly a fascinating thing. Obnoxious and tedious beyond measure, but fascinating, nonetheless. Since his arrival, he'd had to learn almost an entirely new skill set in order to even begin navigating the political landscape here with any sort of success.

And to that end, being foisted upon assistants and secretaries wasn't actually so bad. These were the overlooked, the barely thought about--despite the fact that they were present for so many important conversations, silently observing and learning.

Lending these hard-working young folks a friendly ear was therefore no trouble at all."

"3373

"This Senator Garvey sounds like a real piece of work," Prince David was saying. "I never would've guessed, judging from how well he presents himself in front of cameras."

"Yeah," said the young man on the other side of the table, slumped forward in his chair and nursing an iced coffee against his temple while he rested his eyes. "I've had nightmares, you know, where all I hear is his voice, yelling at me from every direction. Oh... man... I feel like it's going to happen again tonight, too..."

"Hence the coffee in spite of the late hour, hmm?"

"Yeah... I have to be up in a few hours, anyway, so maybe I'm better off just staying awake..."

David frowned at the poor kid. "Perhaps there is something I can do to help."

The kid didn't even look up at him. "That's nice of you to say, but I don't see how. I've just gotta tough it out for a few more... years, probably." He groaned.

"You could find a different senator to work for."

"You make it sound so easy. Without someone from the other senator's team to vouch for me, it's basically impossible. These jobs are hell, but that's only because the competition for them is so fierce. Honestly, I'm lucky to be here at all. At least, that's what they keep telling me..."

"If you could work for someone else, though, who would you pick?"

"...You mean out of anyone?"

"Mhmm."

The kid needed a moment to think about that, apparently. His name was Carlito Yavan, and while his current state might have seemed rather pathetic to any onlookers in this downtown bar, this young man right here was actually one of the most talented lobbyists David had ever seen. And not just when the kid was up there on the debate stage of the Congressional Hall, either.

Fortunately for Prince David, nobody else seemed to have noticed yet.

"...Well, I mean, the dream pick would obviously be Senator Jacobson. In five years' time, he'll be campaigning for the presidency--and probably winning, too, because both his policies and his team are rock solid. And of course, he's a great orator, which is a huge leg up over, uh... some of his likely competition. And on top of that, I hear he's actually a super nice guy, too, which is a bonus."

"3374

"Ah." This certainly wasn't the first time David was hearing that about Jacobson. It was always hard to know how true such rumors truly were, though. When it came to politicians, the ability to make friends was key, and when people thought you were nice, that task usually became easier.

It also made it easier to stab people in the back, perhaps even without them realizing it.

But Carlito's assessment carried a bit of weight to it, David felt. Perhaps it wasn't all nonsense, after all.

"You mention that last part as if it's not even that important to you," said David. "Surely, after the hell you have endured under Garvey, the general disposition of your new boss should be a higher priority to you.”

At that, Carlito sat back up in his chair and eyed David for a moment. “...Eh. At the end of the day, I’d still rather work for someone who can make a real difference in the world than someone who is just nice to me.”

Heh. Yeah. This kid was definitely going to become a big name around here, one day.

Carlito slumped back down again. “Of course, ideally I could have both...”

David took a sip of his iced tea. “As it so happens, I know someone on Jacobson’s team,” he said.

Carlito’s head popped up off the table, though he didn’t say anything.

“I could put in a good word for you, if you like,” said the prince.

The kid’s eyes widened, and he blinked at him. “Y-you could? I... but I...” Then his expression rediscovered its composure. “In exchange for what, exactly?”

Prince David gave him a flat smile. “Why would it need to be in exchange for anything?”

Carlito returned a look. “Because nothing in this world is free.”

“Well, now, that’s just not true. Why, just the other day I visited the grocery store over on Nara Street, and they were giving away free samples of these lovely little fudge cakes.”

Carlito still just looked at him.

“You’re a very jaded young man, you know that?”

“So I’ve been told.”

David smacked his lips and sipped from his drink another time. “That is something you’ll have to overcome, if you wish to make it much further in this business.”

“What do you mean?”

“Being jaded. Don’t get me wrong. It’s useful--and, in fact, necessary--to doubt people. To see through their lies or pick up on the subtext of what they might be saying. Sure. But the most important skill for a politician to have is the ability to make friends. And a lot of people will find that jaded disposition quite off-putting, if you don't keep it close to your chest.""

"3375

The kid made another face like he didn't understand--or didn't want to, perhaps. "Regardless, what do you want from me? It's obviously not nothing."

David exhaled a curt breath. "What I want from you, Mr. Yavan, is good policy."

"What?"

"I want the right people to be in the right places at the right time." He paused for another swig. Damn, this place made good tea for a bar. "Sometimes, being smart is enough. Or being hard-working is enough. But other times, it's not. Other times, someone just needs a little helping hand in order to reach their full potential. And one day, if you ever find yourself in a position where you can help others out in a similar manner, then I hope you will remember this. Because it really can make all the difference in the world."

Carlito was silent, just staring at him.

David could no longer tell what might be going through the young man's head. Ah well. Maybe the kid needed a moment to gather his thoughts. David's eye drifted across the bar, landing on the television hanging in the high corner behind the bartender.

There was some kind of breaking news footage there, but it only held his gaze for a split second before Carlito grabbed his attention again.

"I see. You make it sound nice, but really, you're not doing anything different from Intarian politicians. A favor now in exchange for a favor in the future." There was no disgust or disappointment in the kid's tone. He was merely stating it as if it were fact.

David bobbed his head admissively but still had to counter. "Yes and no. I do want us to be friendly in the future, of course, but strictly speaking, politicking in the manner you're describing is... generally not advisable, in my opinion. Doing someone a favor in exchange for some vague future promise is a good way to open oneself up to being backstabbed or otherwise let down, instead. No, I wouldn't do this for you if I didn't genuinely wish to help you or think that you deserved it."

The kid said something more, but David's attention had shifted back to the news footage. And stayed there.

Because what he read on the bottom scroll made his mind lose track of what they'd been talking about.

"Multiple Major Volcanoes Erupting Across War-Torn Eloa," it read."
"3376

The accompanying footage was split between three different screens, each showing giant columns of black or gray smoke filling the sky.

Young Mr. Yavan took notice as well. "Seems the world has nothing to offer but bad news, lately."

And David kept watching. It soon became clear there were at least three eruptions currently accounted for, one each in the nations of Kavia, Melmoore, and Vantalay.

Somehow, Prince David doubted that was a coincidence.

--++--++--

Of late, Hector had been dreaming more often. Almost every time he slept, in fact. And they were quite random, too.

But very real.

On this occasion, he saw the life of a simple farmer. Or what seemed to be one, at first. A man arrived on his land. A man of terrible power and influence. A man who'd brought an army with him. Because apparently, this was not the first visitation. The leader's subordinates had been pressuring the farmer for a while now without ever being able to make him budge.

There was fear in the army's ranks but not in the leader.

A long discussion was had. That comprised most of the dream, in fact.

“...To speak with such insolence, do you not know of me, farmer?”

“I do not. Nor do I care.”

“I am the new lord of your lands, farmer.”

“Congratulations. But I serve no lord other than the one who lives in my heart. If it is tribute you seek, you will have to look elsewhere.”

The lord laughed mightily. “I’ve not met a man as fearless as you in a long time! Or, perhaps, is it merely ignorance that makes you speak so?! Surely not! The army at my back must make your situation quite clear, no?! Or are you blind, as well?!”

“I see your army. Make sure they don’t trample my crops.”

Another mighty laugh. “If every man under me was as fearless as you, good sir, I’d have conquered the entire world by now.”

“Mm, but would you have conquered yourself?”

“Pardon? What do you mean?”

“To satiate one’s hunger, only a modest meal is needed.”

“Ah... you do not know my Hunger, then. For mine never seems to end.”

“I know of that well. The Hunger you speak of. That hunger is not of this world, and therefore nothing of this world can satisfy it, other than a corrected mind. A conquered mind.”

The lord was not laughing, anymore. Instead, he was listening carefully."

"3377

“Whatever mighty deeds you might perform, however many people might speak your name, whatever riches you might acquire, it will all become as valuable to you as dirt before long.” The farmer wasn’t even looking at him, now. Instead, he’d grabbed a shovel by a fencepost and started digging a hole in the ground by his cobble porch. “Until you have conquered yourself, you have conquered nothing at all.”

After that, the lord was quiet. For quite a long while, in fact. He and all his men merely stood there, watching the farmer dig.

“...What is your name, farmer?” asked the lord.

The farmer, however, did not answer.

The irritation on the lord’s face was apparent. “Please, tell me. My name is Unso. I should like to know your name before you enter my service.”

“Perhaps you are hard of hearing. I serve no lord but my own.”

“You will enter my service, or I will kill you where you stand. In either case, I must know your name, for ‘twould be a shame if your tombstone had to remain blank.”

And what followed was a light so blinding and persistent that Hector thought the dream to be over. But when it finally abated, the lord named Unso had been torn asunder, head removed from his shredded shoulders. On the end of the farmer’s shovel, a reaper was skewered, smoking and dying.

The army was already scattering. Some of them had fallen to the ground and were scrambling back to their feet, though it didn’t look like the farmer had done anything to them.

Once it was over, Hector was able to continue watching the scene for a bit longer. It reminded him of his time within the Candle, the way it could manipulate visions of the past for him. He tried to do that here, to rewind or fast forward, but there was no response. The scene was merely played out, allowing him to wander about and look at things.

He tried to look at the farmer’s face in greater detail, to get a true picture of who the guy might’ve been, but it didn’t seem possible. His awareness in this place was strange. Being half-asleep was likely the issue. He felt like he couldn’t fully concentrate. Couldn’t really absorb details.

It was only after he awoke that he truly began to process what he’d seen, and even then, he wasn’t entirely sure what to make of it.”

"3378

It seemed obvious, however, that these dreams were--in part, at least--the things that he'd partitioned off in his mind after his trip through the Candle. The most compelling evidence was simply that he'd never dreamt much before. The timing was too strange, otherwise. All the memories and information that the fusion forge had shown him must've now been manifesting themselves in this new way.

He felt like this was a good sign. A sign of progress. Perhaps this would be happening with increasing frequency as his mind continued to process everything. Or maybe a dream was even an indicator that a particular memory had completed its processing.

Weird to think of it like that. Shouldn't he have known for sure? It was his brain, after all.

In any case, Hector's main focus for the time being was still Grigozo and Ericoros. Now that there was no immediate threat to Warrenhold to worry about, those two captive reapers were the most pressing subjects to Hector's mind. Plus, the castle was still mostly empty as they waited on word from abroad--in particular, from Vantalay.

From the reports he'd received, Hector was keenly aware that the situation over there was at its most tenuous. The Rainlords had been fighting for weeks now in order to find and free their brethren, and now they were on the verge of pulling it off. Only the final assault on Logden Prison was standing in their way, and Hector hoped to hear good news soon.

It was tough not to worry, of course, but these were the Rainlords. When it came down to it, he had quite a bit of faith in them. He'd witnessed their strength firsthand.

They weren't going to let anything stand in their way.

He did wish he could've gone with them, though. And now that Warrenhold was seemingly safe, the temptation to fly to their aid was stronger than ever.

But until he received word that was truly dire, he intended to stay put. The Rainlords would be fine without him. Warrenhold wouldn't. And sure, while it seemed like Bloodeye wasn't going to launch another attack just yet, Hector didn't think it was worth risking everything on that hypothesis.

But this was definitely an illuminating experience in its own way. Decisions like this weren't trivial--that was for sure. And he could only imagine how many more like it he might have to make in the future."

"3379

Choosing where to go and who to help. How to allocate his limited time and power. These were becoming increasingly important things to think about, and he was starting to get the feeling that this was--in some small way--how the big, famous warriors and influential people throughout history must've felt.

No matter how good his intentions or how powerful he grew, there was only so much he could do at one time.

'But that's all the more reason why we have to keep going,' said Garovel privately. 'And to keep pushing, too. It's important to remember that, no matter how crazy things might get, there are plenty of other people out there who are trying to do the same things we are. Trying to protect the world. And yeah, maybe we might not all get along or agree with one another, but ultimately, there's still a certain level of solace to be taken in simply knowing that it's not all on our shoulders alone.'

'...Do you think Sermung feels that way?' asked Hector. 'I mean... if anyone has the weight of world on his shoulders, it has to be that guy, right?'

The reaper paused. 'I can't claim to know how the Crystal Titan thinks or what he ultimately believes, but I suspect it's different from what most might expect of him.'

'Why do you say that?'

'Well, take this war for example. We've been paying close attention to the news from all over the continent, even deploying scouts to collect our own information and corroborate others'. And yet we've heard neither hide nor hair of Sermung's whereabouts. Conventional wisdom would tell us that Sermung should've popped up by now, at least when Morgunov made his move on Sair. But no. He's still quiet.'

Hector had to bob his head a little. 'Yeah, I suppose that's true... Do you think he's... busy with something else? Or that he just, er...?'

‘...Or that he just doesn’t care?’ finished Garovel.

‘I didn’t want to put it quite like that, but... yeah. I mean, if he’s really like six hundred years old or whatever, then I guess I could understand if he’s gotten... disillusioned with keeping up the fight. I’m sure I’d be different, too, after living that long.’

‘You’ve hit on quite a popular subject throughout history,’ said Garovel. ‘And not just in regard to Sermung, either. Whenever there’s a definitive “strongest” in the world--and they’re not an evil son of a bitch--those types of questions start cropping up without fail.’

"3380

‘So you don’t think Sermung is like that, then?’

‘I do not,’ said Garovel. ‘But I do think he has a very different view of the world than the rest of us. And I also think he deserves a bit of slack, too, after all he’s done for humanity. It’s easy to forget that he doesn’t ACTUALLY have an obligation to anyone or anything. It’s no individual person’s responsibility to save the entire world, nor should it be. But people constantly act like we deserve his protection and power, like he owes us, when the reality is the opposite. If anything, WE owe HIM. And in times past, people in his position have made that exceedingly clear, demanding tribute as an overlord, for example. The fact that he doesn’t try to pull that stunt makes him saintly enough, as far as I’m concerned.’

‘...Wow,’ said Hector. ‘I knew you liked Sermung, but I didn’t realize quite how much. You’re like a super fan.’

‘Oh, I don’t know about that. I’ve just had this conversation many times before--and often with people who were much more argumentative than you. So I’ve developed strong opinions. Especially lately.’

‘Ah...’

‘I can only imagine how difficult it is to keep a level head when you’re in a position like his. And considering how long he’s been doing it for, I’m prepared to give him the benefit of the doubt. If he’s deciding to not get involved in this war, then he’s probably got a good reason.’

Hector hoped he was right, but he didn’t know if he shared the reaper’s point of view, either.

And at the risk of setting Garovel off again, he ended up broaching a similar subject with Grigozo and Ericoros later.

“What is Abolish’s general view of the war?” he asked. “Are they afraid of Sermung stepping in?”

‘I can only speculate what the higher ups have in mind,’ said Grigozo, ‘but I can say with relative certainty that the prevailing sense of morale has been high. Apart, perhaps, from the conflict in Melmoore. I heard that things were going quite poorly over there. But according to most reports, the men were optimistic about their chances of winning.’

Quite the difference from the Magician of Light’s assessment, Hector noted. But then, it only made sense that opposing sides would have opposing views.

‘As for Sermung himself,’ Grigozo went on, ‘there is always an underlying fear of him in everything that Abolish does. The men rarely speak of it, but it is there.’

"3381

‘That is no great surprise,’ said Ericoros, which surprised Hector. The reaper rarely chimed in, deigning usually to merely listen--at least while Hector was present, that was. ‘The emperors are all in a category of their own. Fear of them permeates every side of every conflict.’

‘Even among Sai-hee’s people?’ asked Garovel.

At that, Ericoros was quiet a moment, and Hector wondered if perhaps that had been too brazen of a question for the reaper’s liking. ‘...Yes,’ said Ericoros. ‘Exceptions no doubt exist, especially among the stupid, but for a certainty, there was always a subdued level of fear within our ranks. It would be arrogant and foolish to claim otherwise.’

Garovel merely bobbed his skull in acknowledgment.

Hector had a question for Ericoros now, too, though he wasn’t holding out hope that the reaper would actually answer it. “What is Sai-hee actually like?”

As expected, the reaper made no response.

Hector tried a slightly different angle. "I ask because Leo didn't have very nice things to say about her, but from what I understand, you don't feel the same way. I'd be interested to hear a more detailed opinion from someone who thinks highly of her."

Ericoros exhaled a nonexistent breath. 'I suppose that is fair...' He paused, perhaps to gather his thoughts. 'Sai-hee is... she is a very complex person. And it is true that my affection for her will likely never fade. She has a deep compassion for others that is difficult to fully articulate. Perhaps if you would consider Sermung to be a fatherly protector of the world, then Sai-hee might be thought of as a more motherly one. She is kind beyond measure and treats everyone like her children.'

Hmm. Well, he'd already heard a few counterpoints to that claim of kindness, at least. He didn't want to interject, though.

Garovel, however, apparently did not harbor the same reservations. 'Kindness, eh? I've never met her myself, so I'm not saying you're wrong, but the woman is known to have done some rather UNKIND things throughout the years. Her conflict with the Rainlords being just one example.'

'Ah, yes, the Richland affair,' said Ericoros. 'That was a horrible circumstance, yes, but it was not Sai-hee's doing. Rather, it was the fault of Ariana, who had always been impulsive and... "passionate," as some described her. "Emotionally unstable" might have been the more apt term, in my estimation.'

"3382

'Even if what you say is true,' said Garovel, 'that does not render Sai-hee without blame, no? A leader takes responsibility for her subordinates, especially in the eyes of the public. If this Ariana was such a loose cannon, then Sai-hee can at least be faulted for not dealing with her before the situation exploded into so many lost lives.'

'I do not mean to claim that Sai-hee is some perfect being who always makes the right decision,' said Ericoros. 'And your assessment is a fair one, even if there was considerably more nuance that is perhaps not worth getting into, right now. On the whole, I can certainly understand the Rainlords' perspective in that conflict.'

‘But with that being said,’ Ericoros went on, ‘the Lord Darksteel here asked about what she is like, not about what mistakes I think she may or may not have made in the past. When it comes down to it, I believe she is the best and most magnanimous of the current four emperors. But due to the other three, she is also constantly being put in impossible situations--situations, need I remind you, where she must take into account the safety of over two billion people who live under her protection.’

Garovel held up his skeletal hands defensively. ‘That’s completely fair. I’m not trying to say that she has it easy or that she could just snap her fingers and fix every problem in the world. I’m just trying to have a balanced view of things.’

‘I know that desire well,’ said Ericoros. His skeletal mouth twisted slightly and impossibly, looking a bit like a smile, which was a surprise to Hector. ‘You are trying to maintain neutrality. If anything, that makes me think that you would quite like Sai-hee, should you ever be fortunate enough to meet her.’

Garovel chortled. ‘I probably would. But then again, maybe that’s not saying much. I like most people. I’m full of love, me. Too understanding and benevolent for my own good, you know.’

Hector resisted the urge to roll his eyes, though he did smile. “Leo mentioned that she saved your hometown. Or that her people did, at least.”

‘Yes, and that is exactly what I mean when I say that she is the best of the emperors. While her goals may not be so lofty as “saving the world,” she nonetheless does more to protect innocent people than anyone else, in no small part because she fosters that same sense of stewardship and preservation in all of her followers.”

"3383

Hector could appreciate that--or the sentiment of it, at least. Previously, he’d thought that he and Garovel were more in line with the Vanguardian mission of proactively engaging the enemy, but after all they’d been through, he was starting to wonder if they might actually have more in common with the approach that Ericoros was describing.

Not that it always had to be one or the other. Context certainly made a difference, he felt.

‘At the risk of sounding like a contrarian,’ said Garovel, ‘I am not sure you can rightly say that she fosters those sentiments in ALL of her followers when we were just talking about how much of a problem Ariana was.’

‘Hmph. Yes, you are semantically correct. I should not have said all. But the broad point remains true. And I’m sure I do not even need to begin listing examples of how certain Vanguardians throughout history have not lived up to their purported ideals, either.’

‘No, you do not.’

The conversation continued on the same subject for a bit longer, with the reapers going back and forth but not really giving much ground or providing new details. Eventually, however, Garovel shifted topics with a new question, addressed to Grigozo.

‘Oh, by the way, I was meaning to ask, how old was Banda, exactly?’

‘One hundred and forty-one,’ said Grigozo. ‘Why do you ask?’

Hector’s eyes widened, and he blinked a couple times.

‘Just curious,’ said Garovel. ‘Do you know how old Bloodeye is, too?’

‘One hundred and seventy-six,’ said Grigozo.

Wait, what the fuck?

The reapers were still talking, but Hector had stopped listening. All of his thought processes were suddenly stuck on what he’d just heard.

Those ages.

Banda had been that fucking old?

But even more importantly...

Hector had thought he already knew how old Bloodeye was. One hundred and thirty-three. That was the information that he’d pulled out of the Candle. He still had no idea where the Candle had gotten that number from--and maybe he never would, either--but now that Grigozo was contradicting it...

What did this mean? Hold on. Didn't it mean... that...?

Oh god.

It meant that the Candle wasn't always accurate, didn't it?

So all the information that had been fed directly into his brain by the Forge...

He had to take it all with a grain of salt now, didn't he? It wasn't just some kind of magically perfect reservoir of indisputable knowledge, was it?

One of his hands slowly found his forehead as his gaze sunk to the nightrack floor.

Aw, fuck, dude..."

"3384

As he tried to come to grips with this earth-shattering revelation, the silent sound of Garovel's voice managed to regain his attention.

'What's the matter with you?' said the reaper, wrapped in the echo of privacy.

He didn't know how to explain, especially considering they were still in the middle of a different conversation. 'Egh... I'll tell you later.' And he tried to put it out of his mind--or at least into a background thought process.

But then he remembered that there was more to it than just the Candle being wrong. Naturally, when he'd first realized that details about Bloodeye already existed in his head, he'd made sure to double check that information against what was available on the internet. That, after all, was how he'd even come to conclusion that the knowledge had been from the Candle in the first place and not just some random, made-up bullshit that had come to him in a dream or something.

Of course, now that he was having more elaborate dreams involving historical figures, maybe his view of that latter part had also changed.

Ugh.

Why did this have to be so confusing, huh? Why couldn't more things just be magical and flawless? Sorting through all that information was already an enormous task, and now he had to factor in an extra possibility of error, too?

Hmm. Now that he was thinking about it, though, he supposed it was also possible that the Candle was right and that Grigozo was simply lying here, instead. Hector didn't see what reason the reaper would have for doing so, especially regarding such a seemingly minor subject; but hell, maybe there was more to it, somehow.

He decided to interject into the reapers' conversation in order to double check. "Ah--pardon me, but uh, regarding Bloodeye's age. You said he was one hundred and seventy-six, right?"

'Yes,' said Grigozo, sounding abruptly uncertain.

How to handle this question...? Ah. "I happened to read on the internet that Bloodeye was only one hundred and thirty-three. Is there some reason for the discrepancy here?"

There arrived a pause, and then the reaper gave a slight laugh. 'Are you serious?'

What? Hector made no response. He merely kept his face flat and his eyes steady.

Grigozo's mirth seemed to dissipate. 'Er--apologies. I would've thought it obvious that you should not trust publicly available information like that when it comes to highly ranked members of Abolish. Or the Vanguard, for that matter. Misinformation abounds. By design, no doubt.'"

"3385 -- CCLXXXV.

Hmm. Maybe that had made him sound dumb, but oh well. Hector wasn't about to try and argue that no, actually, he had really been trying to double check intel he'd gotten from the ancient, mythical Fusion Forge that he'd recently acquired.

He did still have another conversational line open to him, though. "Is there any way of corroborating the information that you're providing?" he asked. "I'm not entirely convinced that the internet is less trustworthy than a reaper who was trying to kill me a couple days ago. No offense.”

‘Aha. None taken.’ Grigozo paused. ‘Corroboration... With regard to their ages, the only method I could think of would be to... ask other reapers who might know. As you’re no doubt aware, age is a sensitive subject for many servants.’

Hector was indeed aware of that. Increasingly, it was clear that public perception of a warrior’s strength was almost as important as the strength itself--hell, maybe even more so, in some cases. Hector didn’t think that was quite what Grigozo was getting at here, though. Unlike in his own case, Banda and Bloodeye’s true ages, according to Grigozo here, were actually significantly older than the public knew.

In a situation like that, Hector supposed the only reasoning behind it would be to make enemies underestimate them. Certainly, that factor alone might make all the difference in the world when it came to a life-or-death battle.

But it still seemed a bit weird, maybe because it was so exactly opposite to the problem that he’d been struggling with for what felt like ages, now. Ultimately, he wondered what the superior strategy was. To be feared and respected? Or to be underestimated?

At the moment, he couldn’t even imagine reaching a point where the latter was an option for him.

The conversation continued for a while longer, but eventually, the main doors to the Moonlight Hall swung open, and the arrival of Carlos Sebolt brought things to an abrupt end.

The man was looking directly at Hector, though he spared a glance for the reapers who would overheard what he was about to say. “News, lord. From... abroad.”

Chapter Two Hundred Eighty-Five: ‘O, sudden encounter...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

It was a mess. As he knew it would be. As they all knew it would be. Once word arrived that Vanderberk wanted to “negotiate” with them, none of the Rainlords had been in doubt.

There could be no parley with such a man."
"3385 -- CCLXXXV.

Hmm. Maybe that had made him sound dumb, but oh well. Hector wasn't about to try and argue that no, actually, he had really been trying to double check intel he'd gotten from the ancient, mythical Fusion Forge that he'd recently acquired.

He did still have another conversational line open to him, though. "Is there any way of corroborating the information that you're providing?" he asked. "I'm not entirely convinced that the internet is less trustworthy than a reaper who was trying to kill me a couple days ago. No offense."

'Aha. None taken.' Grigozo paused. 'Corroboration... With regard to their ages, the only method I could think of would be to... ask other reapers who might know. As you're no doubt aware, age is a sensitive subject for many servants.'

Hector was indeed aware of that. Increasingly, it was clear that public perception of a warrior's strength was almost as important as the strength itself--hell, maybe even more so, in some cases. Hector didn't think that was quite what Grigozo was getting at here, though. Unlike in his own case, Banda and Bloodeye's true ages, according to Grigozo here, were actually significantly older than the public knew.

In a situation like that, Hector supposed the only reasoning behind it would be to make enemies underestimate them. Certainly, that factor alone might make all the difference in the world when it came to a life-or-death battle.

But it still seemed a bit weird, maybe because it was so exactly opposite to the problem that he'd been struggling with for what felt like ages, now. Ultimately, he wondered what the superior strategy was. To be feared and respected? Or to be underestimated?

At the moment, he couldn't even imagine reaching a point where the latter was an option for him.

The conversation continued for a while longer, but eventually, the main doors to the Moonlight Hall swung open, and the arrival of Carlos Sebolt brought things to an abrupt end.

The man was looking directly at Hector, though he spared a glance for the reapers who would overheard what he was about to say. "News, lord. From... abroad."

Chapter Two Hundred Eighty-Five: 'O, sudden encounter...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

It was a mess. As he knew it would be. As they all knew it would be. Once word arrived that Vanderberk wanted to "negotiate" with them, none of the Rainlords had been in doubt.

There could be no parley with such a man."
"3386

While certainly, on a purely pragmatic level, it would have been beneficial to them to do so, there was far more at play in these circumstances than pragmatism alone could account for.

Between all of their collective histories and that of their reapers, they had too much experience and knowledge of the Weasel's exploits. No matter how reasonably the man might have wanted to present himself now, Vanderberk was a mass murderer who gave orders to other mass murderers.

And not only that, he was known for doing so gleefully.

To say that such a person could not be trusted to keep his word would have been the understatement of the century. And even if, somehow, that were not a factor, there was also the basic moral component of it to consider.

"The rain fears not the torch."

Those were their words, even now after all they'd lost. No. Especially now.

More than ever, they knew that they could not bend here.

And so, it had not taken them long in order to decide on their plan of action.

They were going to fight.

The mission to retrieve all of their captive kin from Logden Prison had proceeded fairly well at first. There were roughly four hundred souls to account for, and considering how few of these Invisibility rings they had at their disposal, they made respectable progress the first day, retrieving almost fifty frozen heads from cold storage.

Fifty warriors who could contribute to the fight, in other words.

Everyone was nervous now, and Zeff Elroy was no exception. There were still so many non-servants in the prison. They were always going to be harder to free than a bunch of frozen heads, but now that Vanderberk was here and all the guardsmen were on the lookout for invisible infiltrators, the task was yet more daunting.

The potential for casualties here was very high.

Not to mention, part of Zeff's motivation for coming here was to recover his son, Francisco, who should have been among the frozen heads. But thus far, there was no sign of the boy or his reaper, Dennex.

At this point, Zeff was beginning to think that they might not even be here. And with how dangerous the situation was, he didn't know if that would be a disappointment or a comfort.

There was, however, one confusing piece of good news that arrived before the fighting broke out."

"3387

Apparently, they had an unknown ally in this venture.

Word arrived from the captured Raul Blackburn via his reaper, Arumoro. Someone had infiltrated Vanderberk's ranks--and not only that, they'd managed to disguise themselves as none other than Thaddeus Croll, the Killer of Krohin, who had been a problem for the Rainlords ever since the first team of them arrived here in Vantalay.

Quite the turn of events, to say the least. And naturally, Zeff and the others had not been keen to trust this new stroke of luck. Sure, maybe they were due for it after enduring so much misfortune in recent months, but still. This seemed far too good to be true.

And if they were talking about luck as a resource, then surely they'd already used up too much when Raul Blackburn stumbled upon the location of their captured brethren in the first place.

Interestingly, however, Zeff's own reaper, Axiolis, was noticeably quicker to trust this new development than the rest of them.

'You will no doubt think I am talking nonsense,' the reaper had told him in private, 'but this has always been the way of our people, even back in the days of the Armans, before the great invasion from the East. Tribulation comes calling, and it threatens to destroy us utterly. But then, whether through our own unbending resolve, divine providence, or some combination thereof, the tide begins to shift. Quite literally, on some occasions, heh.'

And while Zeff certainly still had his doubts, the reaper was at least partly proven right when word then arrived for Melchor Blackburn.

'Grip the torch with both hands.'

That one sentence from the Croll imposter had shifted things rather dramatically.

They were words that belonged to Bernardino Blackburn, a turn of phrase that the man had been particularly fond of, apparently. Zeff had never known the man personally, but Axiolis did--as did, of course, Melchor and his reaper, Orric.

That connection to Bernardino was no minor thing.

And it sparked considerable intrigue in their minds, too. In the entire world, there could not have been many people left alive--servant or reaper--who had known the man well enough to not only learn that phrase from him but also to understand its significance to the Rainlords as a whole.

The imposter then promised to reveal his identity to him once the battle was done, but by Zeff's estimation, Melchor already seemed to know who it was--or have a very good guess, at least."

"3388

Axiolis, too, seemed like he might know, but the reaper was being obnoxiously cagey about it.

'I can understand Melchor's reluctance to come out with it,' said Ax. 'Depending on who it is, their identity could become a distraction for us, which is one thing that we most certainly do not need, right now.'

Zeff could only partially agree with that, considering how much of a distraction the mystery already seemed to be to some of the others.

But whatever. Personally, he didn't care all that much. If Darktide trusted this imposter, then that was enough for him. At the moment, the only thing that mattered to him was getting everyone out of Logden as quickly and safely as possible.

And to that end, the freeing of the reapers was paramount. While certainly, all the frozen heads they'd retrieved were an important starting point, without the accompanying reapers, those fifty warriors couldn't be revived just yet. No doubt, they would be in for a rude awakening when they started being resurrected in the middle of the fight.

The plan also became clearer as the Rainlords gathered more intel on the guardsmen--as well as the other servants that Vanderberk had brought with him.

They'd confirmed the presence of Raga Marda, Jorga Dahno, Riev Moros, and Mikas Cross among Vanderberk's personal forces. The guardsmen were considerably less threatening by comparison, but the Rainlords were still quite wary of the ones named Longvin and Kortell.

Thankfully, Jan Cross and the Seeker were not here, having been confirmed to be leading the assault on Ridgemark. Those two would have complicated matters considerably.

But on the whole, despite how threatening many of these opponents were, Zeff actually quite liked their chances here. With the likes of Darktide, Leo, Evangelina Stroud, himself, Dimas Sebolt, Salvador Delaguna, Diego Redwater, and even the Linebreaker of Ridgemark on their side, he felt they were more than a match for the enemy.

Sure, the opponent had plenty of hostages, but the Rainlords could choose when and where to strike. While infiltration was obviously made more difficult with the enemy being aware of their Invisibility, it was still far from useless.

And so, their first assault was timed to be in conjunction with that of the imposter's attack on Vanderberk. While the biggest threat was busy, the Rainlords were going straight for Cell Block Y, where all of the reapers were being kept."

"3389

They'd decided to divide their efforts into two broad teams. One team's job was to rescue and shield the captives, and the other team's job was to neutralize enemy combatants.

Zeff had been quite tempted to choose the latter team. He certainly had enough pent up frustration to make the task a cathartic one. But in the end, he and Axiolis decided to take more of an intermediary role between the two teams. An overseer role, of sorts. Being a materialization user, his power lent itself well to both endeavors. He could easily shield others at range while simultaneously distracting opponents.

Not to mention, this middle ground was a way of keeping himself in check. If he were to fully let loose and go entirely on the offensive, it would endanger the reapers. While he might have been confident that he could control his ability with great precision, even he had to acknowledge that he was not in the most emotionally stable of mindsets, at the moment. And fighting emotionally was not what this mission called for.

Even with all his years of meditative training, all the time spent honing his mental discipline, reigning in his emotions was a struggle. The trick, Axiolis kept telling him, was to not think about himself. To think only of the others around him, of what they needed.

'You are a ghost on the battlefield. You do not exist. You do not matter. What matters is everything else. Everyone else. Our kin. Listen and see them. React and think only for them.'

Easier said than done, to say the least.

But Zeff Elroy, the Water Dragon of Sair, did his best.

Pan-forma helped immensely. Being able to rely on Axiolis' reaper senses to keep track of everyone made the chaos feel much less so.

Plus, his awareness of the relative strength levels at work here helped him to prioritize which areas he should pay the most attention to. He didn't, for example, have to worry about anyone in close proximity to Darktide. That man would take care of everyone around him.

The same could most likely be said for Evangelina and Dimas. Salvador and Diego were perhaps the most worrisome, but Leo and the Linebreaker were obviously the biggest wildcards here. While they were both potentially Melchor's equals or even stronger, without knowing them personally, Zeff could not bring himself to consider them reliable."

"3390

The opening of the assault was arguably the most important. While the enemy was still scrambling and disorganized, that was the moment where they could recover the most reapers with the last amount of interference.

And Dimas Sebolt took full advantage, Zeff noticed. The man's power of gravity alteration lent itself quite well to the purpose of carrying others, and with a bit of soul power, Dimas was quickly able to acquire more than twenty reapers by himself.

In fact, that was the signal for everyone else to begin the attack. Dozens of reaper cells burst open simultaneously, and then madness ensued.

Cell Block Y might've been a massive chamber, but in the middle of the fight, it became instantly cramped. The feeling that one wrong step might get one's head blown off gave the room an oppressive sensation that stifled movement, but Zeff pressed through, regardless, cutting guardsmen down left and right with discs of bladed ice.

That alone wasn't enough to keep most of them down, though, which was why he took to attaching a frozen coating to their remains--or if he could spare the extra effort, clapping boxes around them instead, filled with supercooled, pressure-manipulated water.

That alone was enough to keep most of them down. A moderately aged servant did not typically have the defenses needed to withstand this kind of quick-freeze attack on the brain.

Which was why Zeff took particular notice of the ones who were able to resist.

Vanderberk's men were not yet here, though they were doubtless soon to arrive, so the two he sensed who were already able to withstand his attack were most likely Longvin and Kortell.

Their intel had been able to discover what they both looked like, but here and now, amid the chaos, there was no discerning which was which. Not until they started using their abilities, at least.

Longvin was a light-wielder. And one capable of using pan-rozum, no less.

Those were never fun to deal with.

But it was a tremendous help to know that ahead of time. All of the Rainlords knew that they could not let that man do as he pleased, and so their collective efforts fell upon him as soon it was clear who he was.

A bright light flashed, almost certainly in an attempt to blind everyone and conduct a concealed counterattack on many of them in the blink of an eye. But even before the light receded, Zeff could already sense that the man had been set upon by at least six different materialization users, one being himself.

Not to mention, the Linebreaker was there, too, with his huge arm through all of that material, having already gotten ahold of Longvin, apparently."

"3391

In the next moment, Linus was gone, as was Longvin--both disappearing in a flash of light.

Truth be told, Zeff had been skeptical of bringing the Linebreaker with them. Regardless of the man's prowess, Zeff couldn't help be suspicious of just about any non-Rainlord in their party. Having Leo with them was bad enough already, and now this guy presented another potential point of betrayal.

But even so, it was impossible to ignore how useful the man might prove to be here.

Having such a powerful light-wielder of their own in this battle was a fantastic boon. As obnoxious as light-wielders were to deal with from the enemy, they certainly made for great backup as allies. And if they managed to free Rayen Merlo soon, then their potency would double.

In the moment, however, Zeff was thinking none of that. He was focused purely on the battle, on trying to keep track of everyone positions and movements. Who among his kin needed help? Who among the enemy needed to be dealt with?

Enemy reinforcements were soon to arrive, no doubt, so he had to be on the lookout for those, too. The chamber only had the one entrance, but that was no guarantee, Zeff knew. The enemy could arrive from anywhere.

And indeed, when an enormous tremor arrived, he was not surprised. It shook the entirety of Cell Block Y with enough force to cause a momentary cessation of the battle as everyone tried to collectively understand who or what the source of it was.

Before a clear answer could be discerned, the ceiling cracked open like an egg and got sucked up into the sky, revealing a vast blanket of dark clouds. Zeff could already see a half-dozen twisters out there, surrounding the compound and crackling visibly with lightning.

Was that from the battle with Vanderberk? Or enemy reinforcements? Maybe both?

Impossible to tell for certain, but the reinforcements, at least--those had indeed arrived.

Axiolis recognized three of their soul signatures, making the fourth one easy to guess. Riev, Jorga, and Mikas were all obvious, so the last was almost certainly Raga Marda.

And Riev was coming straight for him.

Zeff had been expecting as much. He had a history with Riev Moros, the Stalker of Agvehl. They'd clashed once before, in Lyste. It had been one of the most grueling one-on-one fights Zeff had ever experienced, and even though he'd technically come out victorious in the end, it hadn't felt that way, considering how much destruction the Stalker had wrought while still managing to escape."

"3392

The second he'd heard that Riev was here in Vantalay, he'd known that this would happen. He'd even gotten word, multiple times over the years, that Riev was itching for a rematch.

And if that was truly the case, then Zeff had to assume that the guy had gotten considerably stronger since then. No one would want to fight the same person a second time after having barely escaped with their life unless something had drastically changed.

Sure, the man could've just been a completely insane idiot--which was fairly likely, even--but the fact remained that Zeff still had to assume the worst.

He was not about to underestimate his enemy and be caught off guard as a result.

So he didn't hold back in the slightest. When he sensed Riev making a beeline for him, Zeff did two things: he sealed Riev in a giant block of ice, and he began cooking up one of his most powerful techniques, the Drillburst.

That was the name he'd finally settled on for it, despite Axiolis' insistence that it be called the "Water Bomb Drill."

It was the first time he'd bothered naming a technique in many years. All the ones he'd named previously had long since become trivially simple to perform, and so using their names was a needless extra step.

The Drillburst, however, would likely require a very long time before that was the case. It was a technique that previously needed to brew in his mind for several seconds before it could be used, but with the name, that time was cut in half. And by using his hands to create a concentrated orb of howling steam in front of him, the wait could be shortened further still.

And of course, pan-forma helped, as well.

That was the real reason why he considered this one of his most powerful techniques, now. The speed of it. While he could almost certainly pull off something even stronger with enough time, being able to fire off the Drillburst in less than two seconds meant that he could almost turn it into a barrage, already.

Which was what he did now.

Riev broke out of the ice block with obvious ease, but that was perfectly fine, because the Drillburst finished charging. The ball of steam in Zeff's hands vanished in an instant, and in the next, the thick, watery boom arrived right on top of Riev."

"3393

The man exploded into a cloud of blood, and the water that splashed outward from his position was stained a faint pink, drizzling the battleground.

Zeff was taken aback for a moment, having not expected that result.

That moment was too long, though. A blaze of soul-empowered gunfire caught him straight through the torso, tearing him open all the way up through his neck and threatening to detach his head.

Agh. How stupid. He couldn't help scolding himself even as he mounted a counterattack, materializing an icy spike in the apparent gunman's mouth and skewering him through the brain. The nameless man dropped instantly, and Zeff encased his entire corpse in ice.

Amateurish. Letting himself get distracted. And over something so trivial, too. If not for pan-forma aiding his regeneration, that might have been a far costlier mistake on his part. And with a clearer mind now, Zeff highly doubted that Riev was truly ended by that one attack, but it had bought him time to concentrate on someone else.

There were plenty of candidates to choose from, too. It seemed like more guards were funneling into the chamber now. Jorga, Mikas, and Marda were still the biggest threats, but the extra crowding certainly wasn't going to help.

He was much more mindful of the reapers being rescued, however. They were the priority. Anyone not threatening them could be ignored for a bit longer.

But Raga Marda was. The so-called Demon's Tiger of Abolish. With the aid of Axiolis' senses, Zeff could sense him already engaging with Diego Redwater and Dimas Sebolt both.

And it did not appear to be going well for them. In fairness, Dimas was doubtless more focused on shielding the reapers he'd just freed, but Diego had less of an excuse, having already lost both an arm and leg while accomplishing little more than scorching Marda's face and clothes.

The fight space was too cramped over there to resort to the Drillburst again. It would hit Diego and Dimas. But the Demon's Tiger was not someone he could afford to pull his punches on. According to their intel, this man was at least seventy years old, putting him on similar ground with General Lawrence--a fight which had not gone well for Zeff back at Rheinhal.

True, he'd made considerable leaps in power since then. But just how considerable? How much had he really grown?

One way or another, it was time to find out."

"3394

Every muscle in Zeff's right arm flexed in unison as he focused on it, making a boxing-glove-sized water jet surge forth from around his forearm and fist.

Typically, when it came to fighting much older servants who had far stronger passive soul defenses, Zeff was of the opinion that pinpoint strikes were the way to go. The magnified application of force on a smaller surface area was necessary in order to help overcome their armor-like flesh.

But of course, the problem with such small attacks was that, while they might've been able to pierce more easily, they still weren't likely to do much actual damage, especially to the undead. That was why he'd made this one fist-sized. A solid hit would do more than just puncture.

Zeff doubted Marda would let him get close enough for that, though, especially with how obvious his approach was. Raga Marda might not've been looking in his direction as he barreled through and bounded over various prison guards, but Zeff was quite confident that the man could sense him coming. Not to mention, the water jet was howling loud enough to draw plenty of extra attention, too, even over the battle's clamor.

This was by design. For one thing, he wanted to get Marda off of Diego, and for another, the jet was only half of the attack.

More than anything, attacks on servants needed to debilitate, at least for a moment, so that further pressure could be applied. And to that end, big and obvious water jets were not the best weapon. Too easy to avoid.

That was why the other half of the attack was a simple platform of ice, raised up instantly beneath the Tiger's feet.

It was one of the oldest tricks in the materializer's handbook, but there was a reason for that. Compared to most techniques, it was disproportionately effective for how easy it was to perform. Being able to make someone lose their footing whenever you wanted was quite frankly unfair.

Zeff's platform sent Marda airborne. As far as their intel was aware, Marda was a transfiguration user who frequently relied upon weapons and tools, so this was--

The man vanished in midair before Zeff could reach him. Zeff slashed at the empty space where he'd been, in case it was Invisibility, but the attack felt like it missed, meeting with no tangible resistance."
"3395

Axiolis' senses couldn't detect him, either. Maybe it was Invisibility and the bastard was just damn fast on top of that.

Zeff landed atop one of the reaper cells, both feet almost sliding off before he caught the cage's rounded edge with one hand. He could sense Diego back up and mostly regenerated, but without knowing where Marda went, it was hard--

A blow struck him from nowhere, sending him flying up through the open ceiling. He toppled over himself as he sailed through open air, and disorientation was trying to annihilate his concentration. If not for Axiolis, it would have succeeded. The reaper's senses could give him an almost disembodied picture of himself as he tumbled upward.

The wind was so furious and chaotic that it threatened to carry him away from the prison entirely. The invisible attack--presumably from Marda--hadn't even been that strong, relatively speaking. It was this damn sky that was doing all the work now, trying to toss him around like a rag doll.

He didn't have the presence of mind or the time to think it through, but instinctually, he felt that there was an underlying will behind this raging wind. Its fury seemed too focused and intense. But again, Axiolis' senses were telling him nothing of that.

Didn't matter, anyway.

The only thing that mattered to him here was not getting blown away. He absolutely could not allow himself to be removed from the battlefield where everyone else was still fighting, still in need of his protection.

So he killed the wind.

An oceanic torrent exploded outward in all direction, save that of the prison below. It shot up into the swirling clouds and washed them away like so much dust. For a lingering moment, a tidal wave blanketed the sky, undeterred by the cracks of lightning that it attracted.

And he surged back down toward Cell Block Y, chased by a rainstorm.

That was the ticket to finding Marda, he knew. He pressed his soul into his water and relied on Axiolis' senses once again. Even if the reaper couldn't detect an Invisibility user, he could certainly detect the gaps in the soul-infused rain. True, the mayhem of the battle made it more difficult, but with both of their minds focusing on it together, it was far from impossible.

There. Behind Diego. About to pounce.

Zeff put ice under his feet again, this time only to make him slip instead of launching him."

"3396

It did the trick. Raga Marda lost his footing, not enough to make him fall over, but enough for Zeff to fall down upon him with a one-handed, ice-fisted slam.

The floor cratered below the two of them as Raga Marda--still invisible--took the attack, and the nearby prison cells cracked open or even burst apart. The force was more than enough to shatter Zeff's hand and most of his arm, but pan-forma would render that a non-issue.

The Demon's Tiger, however, hardly budged.

Zeff had been aiming for the head, but the invisibility had made such precision all but impossible. It seemed to have caught him on the shoulder.

Marda twisted to counterattack, but Zeff was already following up with his other hand, this one bearing the same water drill that he'd attempted before.

Now it landed, though not without trading. Marda's hand or claw or whatever it was--it tore through Zeff's torso and sent him flying back amid a flurry of blood.

Marda didn't escape unscathed, either, though. A hole ripped through the Invisibility, along with Marda's chest, and the rest of the man became slowly visible again as the presumed aberration item's power melted off of him.

Zeff needed a moment to recover, but he could sense that the others were seizing the opportunity to swarm him. Diego, Dimas, Salvador, and a half-dozen others pelted him with explosions and gunfire, and when Marda tried to push through it all like smoke, Salvador was there to shoulder check him through the far wall, opening up yet another hole in Cell Block Y.

Not bad.

Zeff reassessed. Marda was obviously not down yet, but was anyone else struggling? He sensed a couple Rainlords near the exit, trying to carry reapers to safety. A materialized barricade of ice gave them some extra cover before the guard on their tail could reach them.

After a second, the guards barreled through the barricade, so Zeff made another one, this time with spikes launching out of it.

That worked much better.

Another tremor arrived, causing the battleground to pause again, this time with even more uncertainty, because the entire chamber was starting to crumble now.

Where was that coming from? Zeff searched for the source, but he wasn't sensing it. The storm from before was still trying to regather after he'd washed it away, so he doubted that was related.

Then, he didn't sense it, but he saw it.

Through the vacant ceiling, the night sky in the distance came alive with a red-orange glow."

"3397

Whatever that was, it was too far away for Axiolis' senses to pick up on it, but in that moment, Zeff still felt a tremendous and familiar unease. Like a whisper of something in his mind, an idea that wasn't quite there--or maybe a memory that half-forgotten.

And he must not have been alone in that feeling, because the battle came nearly to a stop as everyone watched the sky.

It took everything he had to tear himself away, to remind himself that whatever was going on out there, it didn't matter one bit when compared against the current mission.

In fact, this was a golden opportunity, he realized.

He set to work. With everyone standing so still and dumbfounded, it was suddenly quite easy to sense the fullness of the space around him. Every gap between souls, every break in the soul-infused prison cells--and every Rainlord reaper therein. Axiolis' memory made it easy to identify them all.

He raised a benevolent wave to grab as many as he could, boxing them each in little icy cube for their own protection. With the wave, he could carry all of them to safety, just so long as everyone else stayed so distracted.

There wasn't enough time. Already, he could tell that some of the enemies were returning to their senses. The sudden flood waters at their feet had no doubt grabbed their attention. And some of them were noticing the cubes, too.

Counter spikes solved that issue. The malevolent noticers were skewered through each of their skulls, save one, who was proving more tenacious.

Another quake arrived, the biggest yet, and even Zeff had to give pause again. He stayed on task, though. He could see in the corner of his eye that the sky was not just glowing, anymore. There was something blazingly bright there. But he had to keep everyone safe. He had to get them out of here.

Some of the other Rainlords had noticed his work, too, and begun helping. That was great, but this whole thing was hardly making any sense. Everyone getting so distracted in the first place. In the middle of a mission, no less? And not just any mission, but one of the most important they'd ever had?

This wasn't normal. True, the sky seemed to be on fire, but was that really--?

He saw it.

Not fire.

Lava. A tidal wave of lava. Heading their way."
"3398

Others were scrambling now. Friend and foe alike, seemingly. All moving either away from the approaching wall or toward it in an attempt to impede its path.

To throw up defenses before it killed them all.

Because it very likely would. The reapers might've been able to escape underground, but every non-servant here would perish--and the non-servants who didn't die could still end up trapped.

The thing about lava was that it very frequently came up from deep within the planet, where untold amounts of ardor--the so-called "planet force"--flowed freely, empowering it without the aid of any servant.

That was why even very old servants were known to fear volcanoes. Sure, one might get lucky if the erupting lava happened to not be infused with ardor, but in the event that it was, there was not much that could be done.

Because the ardor added strength. Weight. Impact. Resilience.

Could the lava be redirected? Could it be shielded against? Could it be slowed or cooled?

It all depended on the force behind the eruption. A sufficiently powerful one was a death sentence for all but the most powerful servants in the world--and even they might still have trouble.

If naturally occurring dangers could all be categorized, then volcanic eruptions would be in the same category as feldeaths.

Every servant here knew that, which was why the battle was suddenly forgotten, why everyone was suddenly on the same side, trying to stop that certain doom headed their way.

And Zeff was no different. As much as he'd been focused on getting the reapers out just now, he knew that he had to help, too. His power might've been the one best suited to saving them all, in fact.

That was no guarantee, though. Ardor was known to be more potent than soul power. Even an absolutely colossal amount of water might not do enough.

But he tried.

He bounded upward on a platform of ice, needing to get above the attacks and walls of all the other servants who were trying to help. He wanted to douse the entire oncoming wall in water, and he needed a clear path to do so.

He summoned all of his concentration to create a tidal wave. He even manipulated its pressure a bit so that he could lower its temperature without freezing it--a particularly difficult technique when involving such massive volume."

"3399

The two great waves of water and lava collided, making the entire horizon come alive with steaming explosions. The ground quaked again, though Zeff couldn't tell if it was being caused by the clash itself or by the same mysterious source from earlier.

He wasn't able to stay on his feet. That was the downside of using icy platforms. But it hardly mattered, because the quaking broke his platform apart, anyway, and he had to quickly to catch himself with aerial materializations, curving himself back up into the air like a bobsled making a vertical U-turn.

Then a hovering platform did the trick, though even that wasn't entirely stable. The lava wave was pushing through his water one, slowed but not stopped by the continuous steam eruptions.

Others were contributing, too. Melchor with gargantuan pillars of frozen mercury. Leo with powdery geysers of boron, creating huge goutts of green flame on contact with the lava.

Flashes of brilliant light punches holes through the lava--or attempted to, at least. Some broke through, only to be quickly filled back in, while others just seemed to be absorbed. All the water might've been playing a bit of havoc with that, too, but it was impossible to tell for sure amid the mayhem.

Even the guards were throwing everything they had at it. Material, explosions, liquids, countless freezing attacks.

Yet the lava neared, nonetheless.

It was clearly slowing, but would it stop before it reached the prison cells? It was already flowing over the outer walls, spilling forth like an angry orange landslide, smothering and devouring each building.

Zeff didn't stop. More water. More.

He hadn't hit his volume limit in a long time, but he hit it now. Not enough. He had to waste precious seconds dematerializing before he could make more tidal waves, each one feeling that much weaker than the last, since he was in such a rush and not able to ensure that he was dematerializing everything. When his materialized water was absorbed, it became significantly more difficult to find and remove.

The lava neared. And neared. And kept nearing, forcing the defenders at the front to retreat.

It reached Cell Block Y, reduced to a crawl but still not stopping. It gooped over the blown out ceiling and began to drip inside, setting the busted walls on fire and melting them down until they simply collapsed under the weight."

"3400

Many of the guards were simply fleeing now, having given up entirely. It made sense. It was simple self-preservation at this point.

But the Rainlords couldn't budge. They still had reapers trapped in here, not to mention the non-servants elsewhere in the compound.

They had to stop it. They could stop it. With. Just. A little. More. Effort.

Zeff saw kept pressing, kept dousing. Not letting up. From his overhead position, he could see almost everyone--their collective strength and work. Scores of servants, Rainlord and not, were all straining to push the creeping wall back. Many had even left the cell block entirely, having gone around the gargantuan lava mass to create street-sized trenches all along its flanks in an attempt to redirect its flow.

That seemed to be the work of destruction users, mostly.

The lava was still resistant to their efforts, though. The sheer mass and accompanying inertia, infused with an unknown quantity of hyper-potent ardor--it was almost like the lava had a will of its own. Like it did not wish to be moved by anything other than itself.

But even if that were the case, the Rainlords most certainly had a will to match it. They would not be moved, either. It may not have been at the forefront of his thinking, but Zeff could feel it instinctually, without a doubt.

Their collective intent. The Will of Lhutwë, perhaps. The Soul of the Rain.

It spurred him on. Resonated within his heart. Reminded of who he was. His duty. Of everyone he loved, of every single member of his kin here with him, right now.

And then, finally, mercifully, the wall of lava stopped. It still oozed around the rest of the compound, moving through dozens of freshly dug trenches, but the dripping down into Cell Block Y ceased, frozen in place.

He almost couldn't believe it, not enough to let himself feel any sort of relief, at least. And he obviously wasn't alone in that, because everyone kept trying to push the lava back even after it was clear that they had turned the tide. Perhaps everyone expected it to be suddenly reinvigorated by a new quake--a concern which would not have been without merit.

Either way, the work continued, and no one slackened their pace until the lava had fully retreated from the block and been diverted into the trenches.

Only then did Zeff allow himself to take a breath, to relax his exhausted mind and begin dematerializing without immediately rematerializing.

Then the sky split apart."

"3401

Lightning ripped through the air, illuminating the horizon and shaking the world with thunder. The wall of still-cooling lava shattered, creating red-orange geysers to either side of the cell block.

And Zeff saw a path of ruin below, a running crater that had been drilled through not just the lava but also the prison, ending just outside of Cell Block Y. A small mountain of disturbed rock and uprooted trees lay at the crater's edge, along with a smoldering, motionless lump.

Was that... a person?

Yes, it took him a moment, but Zeff could indeed sense a living soul at the end of that destroyed path. And it took him another moment to recognize who it was, because the soul was noticeably distorted.

That was Vanderberk down there. The infamous Weasel of Abolish. One of the most powerful servants in the entire world, rendered into a smote pile of flesh.

Was he dead? Zeff genuinely could not tell, even with Axiolis' reaper senses helping him.

Which was supremely strange.

What in the world had been done to him? It was like the man's very soul had been twisted into knots.

Agh. Distractions. Whatever the explanation, it didn't matter now. The only thing that mattered was freeing the rest of the reapers. Thankfully, the path that Vanderberk's body had carved through the cell block had not touched any of the remaining captives. Had that been intentional? Had their mysterious helper been able to--?

Another brilliant flash of light arrived, this time bringing with it a great, shining figure. A bird? An avian monstrosity of luminous crystal. Lightning crackled off of it and up into the sky, disappearing into dark clouds. When had those gotten there?

From atop his hovering platform, despite the fact that he'd been trying to avoid getting distracted only a moment ago, Zeff could only stare with wide eyes.

"Rainlords," came a great voice, seemingly from the giant bird. "Thank you for your help. Allow me to take care of the rest."

And what followed, Zeff could scarcely comprehend.

Scores of smaller lights sprang out from the bird, a sudden and almost silent display of fireworks, all arcing down toward the sundered battleground and raining down on everyone.

It was alarming, to be sure--and so fast that Zeff wasn't sure any of them could've responded to it even if they'd been prepared to.

But the light seemed harmless. For the Rainlords, at least."
"3402

For the guards, it was a different story. The light swirled around them--or sometimes skewered them--and wrapped them all up in radiant packages, rendering them unable to move, apart from only two who were still struggling.

Raga Marda and Mikas Cross.

Zeff could sense them both trying to break free--and nearly succeeding, too, if not for the Linebreaker suddenly being there to ensure their suppression.

"Take your kin and go, Rainlords," said their mysterious ally. "I will clean up here."

And abruptly, Zeff could sense Raul Blackburn arriving--or more specifically, being carried over to them on the crystalline wings of another bird. The young man was dropped off right next to Melchor, who's relief was visible.

There came a peaceable moment, as everyone was no doubt caught up in the same feelings of disbelief and uncertainty as Zeff.

Was the battle truly done? Just like that? Zeff struggled to reorient his mind.

Melchor was the first to break the strange silence, speaking up loudly enough for all to hear. "Archangel! Is that you?! It must be, yes?! Where have you been all these years?! Why did you disappear?!"

The luminous bird was quiet for a moment, then said, "I am sorry for all that you and your kin have been put through. But please know that not all within the Vanguard are against you. Some of--"

The sentence went unfinished as the great bird's head did a snap turn to the side, and then the light emanating from it grew suddenly bright enough to fill Zeff's vision, blinding him entirely.

And Zeff felt his whole body stop listening to him, as if being enveloped in a warm blanket and put forcibly yet gently to bed.

Almost.

His mind rebelled. Refused to fall unconscious.

The light did not yet fade, but Axiolis' senses still worked, so Zeff could tell what was happening to the battleground.

Everyone was being moved, shoved aside with urgency--and not for no reason, either.

Because yet another soul was arriving, and it would've barreled straight through the crowd of Rainlords on its way to its destination, which seemed to be Vanderberk's smoldering, questionable corpse.

Zeff's mind came alive with fury. With rage. It would not be brushed aside, put to bed like a child.

Because he recognized that new soul, and nothing in this world was going to prevent him from confronting it.

For that soul belonged to the man who had kidnapped his beloved daughter."

Chapter Two Hundred Eighty-Six: 'Mind of heaven, Mind of hell...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

It was mayhem. A torrent enveloped Zeff--a product of his own materialization and yet still almost involuntary. His rage was so complete and so blinding that he felt almost possessed. Moving without thinking. A mobile storm of water.

He went straight for Gohvis, sending a flurry of attacks ahead of him. Water drills. Spikes of ice. Blinding steam. Sudden platforms beneath the Monster's feet. And more that he didn't even have the awareness to articulate.

Everything. He just sent everything.

But it wasn't working. He could already tell. The drill hit ineffectually. The spikes bounced right off. The steam dissipated into nothing. Even the simple platforms of ice refused to materialize. Only harmless splashes of water appeared, wetting the ground around the dragon man's feet, instead.

Not that Zeff was terribly surprised by any of this.

Despite everything, the Lord Elroy still had enough awareness to know who he was up against. To know that this was certain to be a fruitless endeavor.

He simply couldn't control himself.

He went in with the Drillburst, aiming right at Gohvis' center of mass.

The Monster caught his fist and stopped him cold. And those impossibly red eyes found him, staring straight into his own. "Calm yourself, Water Dragon. You need not die, this day."

Zeff tried to pull his hand away, but it was stuck fast in the Monster's grip. He growled in frustration, trying to materialize more, but only sputters of water appeared around him, not at all as he intended.

"Return my daughter!" he yelled.

"In time," said Gohvis.

"Return her, Monster! Do not--!" The huge hand let him go, only to find his face instead, killing the words in his mouth. Truthfully, Zeff hadn't even known what he was going to say next. Incensed yelling was the only thing that came to mind.

"Calm yourself," said the Monster again, this time with a weight behind it.

A weight that, even in his current state, Zeff found somehow difficult to ignore. The words cut through the blind rage in his mind, not destroying it totally but still making a clear impression.

Zeff's flailing arms slowed, and he felt abruptly more in control of himself.

And the huge hand released him.

Zeff found his feet, blinking. He stood there, before the Monster of the East, still ready to attack again but at least no longer feeling the immediate, unignorable impulse to do so."

"3403-- CCLXXXVI.

Chapter Two Hundred Eighty-Six: 'Mind of heaven, Mind of hell...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

It was mayhem. A torrent enveloped Zeff--a product of his own materialization and yet still almost involuntary. His rage was so complete and so blinding that he felt almost possessed. Moving without thinking. A mobile storm of water.

He went straight for Gohvis, sending a flurry of attacks ahead of him. Water drills. Spikes of ice. Blinding steam. Sudden platforms beneath the Monster's feet. And more that he didn't even have the awareness to articulate.

Everything. He just sent everything.

But it wasn't working. He could already tell. The drill hit ineffectually. The spikes bounced right off. The steam dissipated into nothing. Even the simple platforms of ice refused to materialize. Only harmless splashes of water appeared, wetting the ground around the dragon man's feet, instead.

Not that Zeff was terribly surprised by any of this.

Despite everything, the Lord Elroy still had enough awareness to know who he was up against. To know that this was certain to be a fruitless endeavor.

He simply couldn't control himself.

He went in with the Drillburst, aiming right at Gohvis' center of mass.

The Monster caught his fist and stopped him cold. And those impossibly red eyes found him, staring straight into his own. "Calm yourself, Water Dragon. You need not die, this day."

Zeff tried to pull his hand away, but it was stuck fast in the Monster's grip. He growled in frustration, trying to materialize more, but only sputters of water appeared around him, not at all as he intended.

"Return my daughter!" he yelled.

"In time," said Gohvis.

"Return her, Monster! Do not--!" The huge hand let him go, only to find his face instead, killing the words in his mouth. Truthfully, Zeff hadn't even known what he was going to say next. Incensed yelling was the only thing that came to mind.

"Calm yourself," said the Monster again, this time with a weight behind it.

A weight that, even in his current state, Zeff found somehow difficult to ignore. The words cut through the blind rage in his mind, not destroying it totally but still making a clear impression.

Zeff's flailing arms slowed, and he felt abruptly more in control of himself.

And the huge hand released him.

Zeff found his feet, blinking. He stood there, before the Monster of the East, still ready to attack again but at least no longer feeling the immediate, unignorable impulse to do so."

"3404

"As unpredictable as ever," came a familiar voice, requiring another moment for Zeff to realize that it belonged to their mysterious ally. "A second ago, you may have killed him and half his kin, had I not intervened. And yet now you show mercy? What are you thinking, Scourge?"

"They would not have died," said Gohvis. He leveled his crimson gaze up at the distant bird. "You, however, exist with an unfortunate level of strength. If we are to clash here, restraint is not something I will be able to risk."

"Ah. I shall take that as a compliment, I think."

"You should take it as a warning," said Gohvis. "I have no desire to kill you, Graves. So do not force me to."

What? Zeff looked up at the bird anew. That was Field Marshal Graves up there?

The bird spared another glance for Zeff before returning to Gohvis. "If you have no desire to kill me, then why have you come? To save the Weasel? Of all people? Please tell me otherwise."

Gohvis made no response.

“Out of every single human being in the entire world, that man right there may, in fact, be the least deserving of your help. You must realize that, surely.”

Gohvis gave a slight nod. “You might be right.”

“Then cease this interference. Truth be told, I have no desire to kill you, either, Scourge.”

Gohvis sighed. “Unfortunately, he still has his uses. I cannot let you kill him.”

The light from the great bird diminished suddenly, and its radiant form shrunk down quickly into that of a normal human being.

Sharp jaw line. Feathery blond hair with a curly mustache. A face that was entirely unfamiliar to Zeff, as he had never met Field Marshal Graves before.

But that overcoat. Black and gold. It did indeed look like the kind that all the marshals wore.

Zeff could still hardly believe it, though. They had known that Graves was in Vantalay, heading up the Vanguardian defense against Abolish here, but by all reports, the man had done almost nothing before leaving the country entirely.

Supposedly, there’d been some sort of disagreement between Graves and the Ridgemark Private Military Police, of which the Linebreaker was a leading member.

And indeed, Zeff had thought it supremely odd that Graves would simply up and leave this country to fend for itself when so many innocent lives would obviously be at stake, but now... if he’d never truly left, then did that mean...? This had all been some kind of scheme?

Zeff’s gray eyes returned to the half-dead lump of flesh behind Gohvis.

Hmm."
"3405

“What in the world could a man like him be ‘useful’ for?” said Graves as he stepped closer to Zeff and Gohvis. His voice was soft and low, and his intonation was so mild that it sounded as if he might be physically incapable of getting angry.

“Organization,” said Gohvis. “His foremost utility is bureaucratic. As despised as he may be, Abolish has precious few who could replace him--and even fewer who would want to after they understand the breadth of his responsibility, especially now that Gunther and Dunhouser are gone.”

Graves paused for a dull blink. “I must confess that I was not expecting such a banal answer.”

“Well, there is also the matter of defense against Vanguardian aggression. Abolish does still have need of his strength, as well, I suppose.”

“Okay, now that explanation, I know you don’t believe,” said Graves.

Gohvis gave a hulking shrug. “I have no use for his strength, true. But... some within Abolish may yet.”

“...You’re really just saving him because you’re a lazy bastard, aren’t you? Don’t want to have any of his operations lumped onto your plate, hmm?”

A beat passed as the Monster of the East returned a blank expression. “Yes.”

Graves shook his head and sighed. “I can almost respect your honesty, at least...”

“Imagine if I was trying to kill your Magician.”

“Oh, come on, that’s not a fair comparison, and you know it.”

“No? Perhaps Eckard, then?”

“That man is quite literally your captive as we speak.”

“Mm? Truly? A bad example, then. I will concede that. But you still see my overall point, yes?”

Graves scratched his nose. “Oddly enough, I... do. That’s a rough one, buddy.”

Zeff didn’t know what he was hearing. His anger was mixed equally with confusion, now. These two warring juggernauts were sounding suddenly more like beleaguered middle managers who'd bumped into one another at a business conference.

"But if I can admit that much," said Graves, "then can you admit to sympathizing with the difficult position you're putting me in?"

Gohvis required a moment. "...I can, yes."

"Well, alright. Then maybe we can come to terms."

"Perhaps so."

What the hell? Zeff couldn't help taking another look around at all the devastation that still surrounded them in this conversation. Was he really the only one hearing this, right now?

Actually, it seemed so. It was a bit difficult to tell with all the rubble everywhere, but he didn't see, nor could he sense, any other conscious people here. Had Graves subdued everyone else?"

"3406

"Alright, how about this? You let me kill Vanderberk, and I'll give you the absolutely best secretary in the world. Someone so good that you'll never even have to touch any of the things that the Weasel was managing."

"What an offer," said Gohvis dryly. "You get to kill one of Abolish's top warriors and plant a spy within my ranks. I will have to think deeply about that one."

"Okay, fine. Let's say, I don't kill Vanderberk and instead just take him captive. Then we can negotiate for a prisoner exchange at a later date, hmm?"

Gohvis had to mull that over, apparently. "A more tempting offer, certainly. And yet something tells me that you would consider killing Vanderberk to be a greater prize than any Vanguardians whom might be returned to you."

Graves chortled. "A greater prize than Lamont? And more than a dozen generals?"

Gohvis' gaze narrowed. "Yes. Do not try to swindle me."

"Swindle you? Please. Of the two of us, I'm quite sure that I am the more trustworthy one."

"Mm. So trustworthy that you never show anyone your real face."

"That's not true, either. Plenty of people have seen my face."

"Any of them still alive?" said Gohvis.

"Definitely more than none."

Gohvis turned to Zeff. "Did you even know that this was Graves until I identified him for you?"

Zeff wasn't going to answer him, but Graves interjected, anyway.

"I would've revealed my identity to them once the fighting was over."

"How generous of you," said Gohvis.

"They need to know that the entirety of the Vanguard is not against them."

"Hmph. And where were you when your compatriots were backstabbing them in their homeland?"

Zeff could hardly believe what he was hearing. Never would he have expected the Monster of the East to be speaking up in their stead. Was this some sort of trick? Probably.

"As it so happened," said Graves, sounding abruptly annoyed, "I was quite busy dealing with some of your compatriots, Scourge."

"Of course. Ever the magnanimous defender of the innocent, aren't you?" Gohvis folded his arms. "Remind me again: how was it that so many of the Rainlords that you captured ended up here, in Vanderberk's clutches?"

At that, Graves was silent. His gaze lingered on Gohvis, and he tilted his head slightly.

Zeff hated to admit it, but the Monster had made a damn good point. And the Water Dragon of Sair had to say as much. "Answer his question."

"3407

Graves returned an irritated glare. "I could not be seen simply releasing them back into your custody. So, yes, I took advantage of the situation in order to spread Abolish thinner and isolate the Weasel. You may not appreciate being used like that, and I apologize for it, but please also understand that, here today, we have managed to finally eliminate one of the vilest men to ever walk the planet."

"Isn't that ever the Vanguardian's plea?" said Gohvis. "Just ends justify all else, no?"

But actually, truth be told, Zeff was finding himself more in agreement with Graves now. While he harbored no love for the Vanguard currently, the fact remained that he had himself been a member of that organization for almost thirty years--and not for no reason, either. Deep down, he still very much agreed with the theoretical aim of the Vanguard, and he knew how overwhelmingly important it was to bring down that mass murdering psychopath over there.

The only sticking point was that Vanderberk wasn't truly dead yet.

A point which Gohvis didn't hesitate to pick up on. "Nevermind the fact that you did not actually succeed in eliminating your target and have therefore endangered these Rainlords for no reason, even by your own biased metrics."

Graves squinted briefly, then smiled. "Things were so amicable between us a moment ago. I thought we might be able to get out of this without a fight, but you seem more intent on arguing than counteroffering. And on overplaying your hand, I'm afraid. Quite sloppy of you, old friend. A bit distracted, are we? Too much going on at once, even for you?"

Now Zeff was confused again. What was Graves talking about? Gohvis wasn't answering, either.

Before any coherent answer could be discerned, the scene before him exploded into a frenzy, and Zeff found himself relying on Axiolis' senses again in order to comprehend even part of what was suddenly happening.

Gohvis had moved. That much seemed clear, at least. He went for Vanderberk's body, perhaps in an attempt to grab it or shield it--or punt it out of the current time zone, maybe.

But Graves had responded.

Light filled Zeff's vision, and in his mind, he could sense great pillars of seemingly pure soul power shooting up out of the ground, one coming up from right below Vanderberk, caging him in and carrying him high up into the sky."

"3408

Gohvis rocketed up the pillar, running up the ninety-degree angle as if gravity were of no consequence to him, even while being battered by a storm of brilliant crystals along the way.

The other pillars grew out and spidered together, creating an interconnected network--an enormous dome over the whole area, but also one that bridged each of the pillars. And then Vanderberk's cage shot along one of the bridges toward a different pillar, then to another pillar, then still another, moving so rapidly that Axiolis' senses quickly lost track of it.

The Monster of the East did not, however, and it was somehow easier to follow his movements amid all the sensory chaos, perhaps because his soul was so profoundly different to everything else that surrounded him. Like a pitch black marble in a storming sea of pure light--one that seemed entirely unimpeded by the ferocious waves.

Gohvis zigged and zagged throughout the great dome, apparently undeterred by any of the visual noise or confusing stimuli popping all around him. He didn't even seem to be following the pillars at times, just zooming through open air on pure momentum, instead.

Zeff wanted to help, to contribute to this clash some way, but he couldn't even begin to imagine how he might do so.

Then another surge of light arrived, this time with real force behind it--enough to throw Zeff off his feet and send him sliding across crumbling rock. He didn't stop until he hit the wall of the prison, which was itself already half gone.

He needed a moment to regather his wits, and by the time he did, the situation had greatly changed.

Gohvis was stuck. A cage of light had trapped him, too, and was compressing against his flesh like a tightening net. And the same thing was happening to Vanderberk.

Zeff could sense the intensity of the strain. The cages were emanating more soul power than ever before, and the rest of the dome--pillars and all--were quickly diminishing, as if all of their power were being rerouted to this one, singular task of crushing the two Abolishers.

And Zeff was incredulous. Doubting his own senses.

Graves had gained the upper hand? Could this be true? Zeff could hear the Monster roaring now, but the ropes of light around him did not budge.

Where had Graves even gone? Zeff had lost him in the shuffle of all the frenzying soul power and leftover ardor from the lava.

Ah, no, there he was. Much clearer now. Most of the soul power in the area was flowing through him, and even--wait.

The ardor, too?"

"3409

That was beyond strange. Even Axiolis could not recall an instance of a servant being able to manipulate the flow of ardor in such a way. To be channeling it through themselves with so much intensity? And have it be blending with or even amplifying their own soul power?

This was unprece--

No.

Axiolis did remember now. In the ancient past, there indeed was a certain type of person who could do such a thing.

Person... or creature, perhaps.

It was a vague memory. Blurry and distorted. Which was itself an incredibly odd thing. Reaper memories were never like that, normally. Only very recently had it even resurfaced into his mind at all, as though it had been suppressed for eons before.

And Axiolis had not thought that was a coincidence. Given how muddy and uncertain the matter was in his mind, he'd been reluctant to broach the subject at all, even with Zeff. But he'd first noticed it after learning about the existence of Sparrows.

Or re-learning about them, perhaps.

The reaper had an uneasy feeling that he'd encountered such creatures before--and not in an amicable context.

And now, here, witnessing what Graves was doing, Axiolis' memories were giving him that same uneasy feeling again. Only much stronger, this time.

Enough so that Zeff could feel Axiolis wanting to intervene. In favor of Gohvis. A dreaded, irrational impulse to aid Emiliana's kidnapper, of all people.

But Zeff kept them steady. He had to. He'd never felt this kind of fear from Axiolis before. Even the reaper didn't seem to know the full source of it.

The struggle before them continued for an uncomfortably long time. The cages kept squeezing Gohvis and Vanderberk, digging slowly deeper into their flesh. Zeff couldn't understand what exactly was happening here. It seemed to him that Vanderberk, at least, should have been toast long ago, what with him already being on the verge of death, but maybe it wasn't the simple.

Then the lines of Vanderberk's cage began to glow more prominently than that of Gohvis.

And the light spread.

The soul power and ardor spread.

Across Vanderberk's flesh.

Into Vanderberk's flesh.

Until Vanderberk himself was glowing as bright as the cage.

And then, suddenly, Vanderberk just... popped.

Out of existence.

Gone. Leaving only fleeting specks of light and soul power behind.

And that disquieted feeling in Axiolis' mind grew stronger than ever before. The ancient memory that it was tied to grew abruptly clearer."
"3410

It came from a time when the world had been a very different place.

On the brink of absolute conquest.

By the dreaded Kingsparrows. The enemies of all humanity. A force so terrible that it united even the Vanguard and Abolish against it for nearly a century.

And Axiolis furthermore realized that this was not one memory. It was many. A whole lifetimes' worth, in fact.

It all came back to him in a rush. An overwhelming wave of recollection. Too much to process now, certainly.

And difficult though it was, Zeff did his best to suppress it. They could think through it all later. In this moment, his full attention needed to remain on the field of battle.

On the apparent demise of not only Vanderberk, but also the Monster of the East, too.

Zeff couldn't believe his eyes.

Gohvis could not break free of his cage. It took a while longer, but just as with Vanderberk, the lines of light graduated to a stage of slowly smothering him, until eventually, they enveloped him entirely.

And then he, too, disappeared. Vanished behind luminous particles.

The Water Dragon of Sair was dumbstruck.

He kept expecting one or both of them to suddenly reappear, to attack from some unseen angle at the edge of his vision.

But that didn't happen.

Graves, however, was still there.

But the land all around him had changed.

The mass of ardor-filled lava? Even the few trees and rocks that had managed to avoid being struck down or set alight?

In their places, only mounds of ash remained.

Even parts of the prison had been turned to dust, and Zeff was briefly frantic with the worry that some of his kin might have gotten caught up in whatever Graves had done, but he was soon relieved when none appeared to be missing. In fact, all the ash appeared to be distinctly around them, as if they had been deliberately avoided.

And the ash itself was something else. Something disturbingly strange. Axiolis could sense that about it, at least. It felt like a hole in the universe. No soul power or ardor to speak of, not even in trace amounts.

Before he could continue processing the unbelievable scene around him, Graves approached him, still in his seemingly human form while the ash made no noise under his boots.

"Be not alarmed," said the marshal. "The area is now safe."

Zeff had to struggle for his first question. "Did you... really kill them both?"

"3411

Graves paused for a smirk. "Would you be impressed if I said yes?"

Zeff did not answer. He merely returned his usual glare, though he couldn't quite keep the confusion out of it entirely.

Graves shook his head and sighed. "Gohvis is certainly not dead. Took me a minute to clock what he'd done, but that wasn't actually him. It was just a very powerful psychic projection. I suspect he has deployed one to each of the different war fronts in order to aid his allies... which would be absolutely disastrous for us, if I'm right."

A psychic projection? Ah. Zeff supposed a Sparrow would know all about that type of thing. He wasn't yet sure that he wanted to say as much aloud, though. Letting on that he knew didn't seem particularly beneficial, especially with Axiolis' new memories now stewing around in his mind, creating even more uncertainty about how trustworthy this marshal before him truly was.

He did have something in need of clarification, though. "And Vanderberk?" said Zeff. "Is he dead?"

A strained expression crossed the other man's face. "I'm... actually not sure about that. I think I got him, but... he had some very strange powers at his disposal. Even more strange than I'd heard--and I'd heard some pretty crazy things." He scratched his forehead, blinking. "I'm just glad it was me who ended up facing him and not one of the others. I don't know if any of them would've had as favorable of a matchup as I did."

Hmm. "What, exactly, did you do to him?"

Graves paused again and leveled a stare at Zeff. "Curious, are you? That's only natural. Unfortunately, I cannot explain. And furthermore, I would ask that you not speak of me to anyone. Secrecy has proved to be one of my greatest allies over the years. Spreading word of my abilities, even among those you trust, could eventually endanger not just me but everyone whom I might otherwise be able to protect. Meaning many innocent lives. You understand?"

Rather than answering immediately, Zeff looked over the dusted battlefield another time, and his gaze went to his many unconscious kin strewn about. Only now was it occurring to him how odd it was that he, alone, should still be conscious. Whatever Graves had done to them hadn't worked on him and Axiolis.

"Not to worry," said Graves. "They are all unhurt.""
"3412

"What did you do to them?" said Zeff.

One of Graves' eyebrows twitched. "...Do you truly not know?"

Zeff wasn't sure how to respond.

"Water Dragon," said Graves, raising his chin a little. "You know a thing or two about me, don't you?"

Zeff felt his skin suddenly bristling. A cold shiver down the length of his body.

He ignored it.

“What I know,” said Zeff slowly, “is that you’ve aided my kin here today. You have had the opportunity, multiple times now, to hurt us, and yet you have not. In fact, it seems to me that you have gone out of your way to protect us as best you can, despite quite difficult circumstances.”

Graves was quiet.

“You asked me to keep your secrets for you,” said Zeff. “I’ll do so gladly.”

A few more beats passed, and then a soft smile arrived on the other man’s face, twisting up his mustache. “...It would appear you have some secrets of your own.”

“I won’t deny it.”

“Heh. By the way, how was it that you came to learn that your kin were being held in Logden?”

“Why do you ask?”

“I was just wondering if a little bird might have passed it along.”

A little bird? That seemed almost too on the nose, Zeff thought. Unless... was he not talking about another Sparrow here? “That would’ve been nice,” he said. “I’m afraid it was pure chance, though. What little bird might you be talking about?”

“You know the one, surely.”

“I genuinely do not. And you saying that is only making me more curious.”

“Truly? Why, your daughter, of course. Gema Elroy.”

Zeff blinked. More than once. He fumbled for his next question. “You... ah... do you know where she is?”

Graves returned a quizzical look. “Do you not?”

“No, she... we... we had a falling out, and she’s been... ah...”

“...I see.” The man scratched his chin. “Well, I could put her in contact with you, if you like. Whatever transpired between you, I'm sure she would want to know that you are okay after everything that has happened."

Zeff was taken aback. "Yes, please! I would be eternally grateful!"

Graves seemed almost as surprised, himself. "Alright, well, uh, don't be too pleased with me just yet. It will take some time, what with everything going on, right now. Plus, she is... currently in the middle of something and will remain indisposed for quite a while yet."

"3413

"You seem shockingly well-informed about her, considering how new to the Vanguard she still is." It hadn't escaped Zeff's memory that Parson Miles once claimed that Gema was working for him. Every fiber of his being was now hoping that Graves here might contradict that and confirm that the bastard had been lying. "Has she been working under you directly?"

"Ah, no," said Graves. "I did meet the girl a couple of times, but I do not think she realized who I was."

"Hmm. Was that because you were in disguise?"

Graves just bobbed his head to the side rather than answering the question.

And something else occurred to Zeff. Their entire reason for deciding to trust this mysterious man in the first place was because he seemed to have some kind of personal connection with Bernardino Blackburn.

And moreover, Melchor had called him 'Archangel.'

But even according to Axiolis' knowledge, that was not a moniker associated with Graves. No, instead, the only moniker Ax knew of for Field Marshal Graves was the Pale Hawk.

And given everything that they had witnessed here today, both names seemed fairly apt in their own way.

"...What is your association with us?" said Zeff. "You knew Bernardino, obviously, but how does Darktide know you?"

"He doesn't know me."

"He called you Archangel."

"Yes, that was odd. I think he must have mistook me for someone else."

Zeff observed the man's expression carefully. It didn't look dismissive or callous, but then again, would such emotions even come through? If this guy really was a Sparrow, then the human image in front of him right now would've been an illusion. Graves could make its emotions look completely different to however he was actually feeling.

Or could he? Perhaps their projections didn't work that way.

Whatever the case, Zeff was suddenly quite suspicious. "...I don't believe you."

"That is your prerogative," said Graves. And he turned away. "In any event, things should be considerably easier to deal with here in Vantalay now. I'm sure the RPMP will still--"

"So if I go asking around about someone named Archangel in connection with one Field Marshal Graves, I won't discover anything interesting?" said Zeff.

"...As I said before, it would be a problem if you spoke to anyone of me. That context would not matter." The man still did not look back at him.

"3414

Zeff wanted to choose his next words carefully. "I already told you that I would keep your secrets. If you are lying for our sake, out of some sense or hope that it might protect us from your foes, there is no need. Especially when I am beginning to get the impression that the truth would be of much greater comfort."

"...What exactly are you implying, Water Dragon?"

Should he just come right out and say it? Hmm. Maybe so. "...Are you a Rainlord?" asked Zeff.

Graves made no response.

"It is either that," Zeff went on, "or you were a dear friend of the Blackburns, as Darktide seems to believe." In his head, he kept searching for some recognition of the name Archangel in Axiolis' memories. It felt like something was there, but he couldn't quite pinpoint it.

"Even if I were related to you, why would I admit it?" said Graves. "What good would that do, other than perhaps imperil your kin still further? You have worked within the Vanguard for many years yourself. You know our policies. Our ideas. You know the importance that we marshals must place upon our identities. Yet you ask me these questions as if you were plainly ignorant of such things."

It was certainly true that the marshals all took the secrets of their family history quite seriously, in large part because they knew that many within Abolish liked to make a sport of hunting down and killing any identifiable relatives or loved ones they might still have, regardless of how distant the relation might seem. And even among the marshals, Graves had always been known as the most mysterious, so it would come as no surprise to Zeff if this man took such secrets more seriously than anyone else he'd ever met.

But he still couldn't help wanting to know.

The Rainlords had lost so many of their kin over the years. And so many close friends, too, who might as well have been kin. The idea that one of them might have survived and been alive all this time... well, that was something that would've surely made his ancestors smile.

His ancestors. Yes.

He blinked.

Some years ago, back when he'd finally achieved his first hyper-state with Axiolis, it had been arguably the greatest day of his life. After having so much of his family taken from him when he was only fifteen years old, that moment of merging minds with his family's ancestral reaper had been... unparalleled in its importance."

"3415

He'd suddenly been able to look through and even almost experience the reaper's own memories about House Elroy, going back all the way to when they were still the Arman people.

Not to mention, it gave him a much clearer picture of what his more recent family had truly been like, too. His father. His mother. Uncles and cousins. It made him feel so much closer to them than he had even when they were still alive.

The only problem with it had been that it was unsustainable for long periods of time. The merge couldn't last long enough for Zeff to indulge in those memories nearly as much as he would have liked. It was much improved now, of course, but even all these years later, he could still occasionally discover something new about his ancestors from Axiolis' memories.

And one ancestor had become of particular interest to him, as of late. He'd been spending a fair bit of down time in pan-forma with Axiolis, trying to go through all that the reaper could remember of the man.

Agam Elroy.

Zeff had gotten a feeling, almost inexplicable in nature, that there was something to be discovered there, something that perhaps even Axiolis himself did not yet realize or fully recall.

Maybe it was because Sanko, the Gargoyle of Korgum, had mentioned his name just prior to their fight with her at Rheinhal. Maybe it was because Axiolis' memories regarding the man were so peculiar when compared to most of his other ancestors. Maybe it was something else entirely.

But here and now, in this Vanguardian marshal's presence, in this likely Kingsparrow's presence, Zeff's mind was returning to Agam for some reason.

Agam had been an uncle of Zeff's grandfather. Zeff had never met him, but Axiolis certainly had. The reaper had seen his entire life, from the moment of his birth, to the time when he was found dead in his great mansion that sat upon the waves of Lake Carria.

Even from a young age, Agam had shown signs of possessing an exceptionally eccentric mind--to the point that 'eccentric' perhaps no longer adequately described him, even.

His beleaguered parents once returned from a trip to find that all of the family's staff had quit and left the boy alone, because young Agam had filled their ancestral home with so many wild animals that a window could not be opened without one escaping."

"3416

Most notably, however, was what Agam had done in his role as the eldest of all his siblings. Each time, when a brother or sister was born, Agam did something that bordered on criminal or even psychotic, but the explanations that he provided for his actions afterwards always seemed to be too strange for either of those two labels to entirely stick.

For Zeff's great grandfather, the act had been kidnapping. One night, Agam stole the boy away while everyone else was asleep. One of the other reapers, Ozolos, noticed the kidnapping quickly but decided not to alert anyone, for that reaper had himself been quite the notorious oddball--and indeed, eventually became the one who resurrected Agam at the age of fourteen.

According to what Ozolos claimed to have witnessed that night, Agam had taken the newborn child out into a particularly intense rainstorm in order to "baptize him in the lifeblood of a lhugleoth so that his line will be forever strengthened."

Which was quite the incredible justification by an eleven-year-old boy, Axiolis had always thought.

Agam, of course, had been punished severely and never treated the same way again when children were present, except perhaps by Ozolos.

And as Agam grew older, the stories about him only continued to grow stranger.

Here and now, however, in the company of this marshal, Zeff found himself wanting to ask this person about him.

Especially because... these newly unlocked memories from Axiolis regarding Sparrows... were adding something to the mix. Something that neither of them could quite detect, as of yet. It made little sense, because those memories seemed to be from a time long before Agam had even been born, and yet...

There was a similar feeling embedded therein. Somewhere.

“...Did you once know a man named Agam Elroy?” said Zeff, still with two voices.

“You ignore my questions and ask that instead?” said Graves, finally turning to look at him again. “Just how much of an inconsiderate asshole are you, Water Dragon? Did you hear nothing I said?”

“Oh, I heard. I heard very well, in fact. But did you? It seems to me that you have not been listening to yourself.”

“What are you talking about?”

“‘Grip the torch with both hands.’ That’s what you said. And that’s what you should do, too.”

Graves made no response.

“We do not need your protection,” said Zeff. “We are the Rainlords of Sair. The blood of the Armans. If you know even one thing of my kin, then you should know that.””

"3417

For a time, the field marshal merely met his gaze evenly, not saying anything. Then a smile crossed his lips as his eyes eased briefly shut, and he shook his head. “Rainlords...”

Zeff waited for elaboration.

“If nothing else, I suppose I can be relieved that the unshakable pride of your clan remains intact. Whether it’s warranted or not has always been the real question, though.”

Zeff decided to push. “You did know Agam, didn’t you?”

Graves seemed to be weighing him anew. “...I did, yes. He and little Dino Blackburn were both good friends of mine. More than good, in fact. We found ourselves on a... quest, of sorts, once upon a time. An adventure that I shall never forget for as long as I live.”

Hmm. “That sounds like quite the tale.”

"Indeed."

"And yet I've never heard it before," said Zeff. "A grand adventure between the three of you would have been passed down among my kin for generations, I should think."

"Well, there was a reason for that, too. But perhaps enough time has passed that I can safely tell you of it. And with both of them gone, their heroism deserves to be remembered." He broke for a curt laugh. "Tell me something. Is that gallery of grand paintings at Red Lake Castle still standing?"

"...I hope so," said Zeff, thinking back to his own memories of that place. Of Octavia Redwater showing it to him for the first time. "But I do not know."

Graves' mirth diminished somewhat. "Well, in my estimation, this would be a tale worthy of a painting or two."

Part of Zeff's mind was staying on Octavia, though. Her reaper, Wen, should've been around here somewhere. All of his brethren were still strewn about the sundered battleground, unconscious. Of course, they were all undead or reapers, so they would be fine, but the impulse to begin taking them all back to their encampment was quite strong.

Unfortunately, the opportunity to speak so candidly with a field marshal was too rare to pass up.

Just a little longer, Zeff thought.

"You've been to Red Lake before, then," said Zeff.

"Oh yes. And I should like to visit again, once you recover it for your people."

Zeff blinked at the sudden optimism. "I'm sure that could be arranged. And you are right to assume that we will be able to recover it, but I am surprised to hear you having such faith in us."

"Heh."

"3418

What a strange man this was. The way he talked. The way he navigated around subjects instead of providing straight answers. And yet the way he was also quite warm. Not in a false manner, either. Or at least, Zeff didn't think so.

All at once, Zeff felt as though this man was some mad mixture of one of their greatest possible allies with an entity that they needed to be ever wary of, at all costs.

But perhaps it was too soon to be making such broad judgments.

Whatever the case, he wanted more information.

"So are you truly claiming to not be this 'Archangel' that Darktide thinks you are?" said Zeff. "Even if I don't bring up your name in the process, I will most definitely be asking him about that later, so you might as well tell me the truth."

Graves broke for a sigh, then shook his head again. "Fine. But don't go spreading this information around. And if you decide not to listen to me, then don't say I didn't warn you against it, either."

Zeff waited.

"Yes, I was once known as Archangel." He gave a mild shrug. "Bit of an overly grandiose name, I always thought, which I suppose is part of the reason I didn't mind giving it up. But yes, Melchor did meet me on a couple of occasions, when he was a child. When I became Graves, I left that name, and others, behind. For the safety of many innocent lives, you understand, not just you Rainlords."

"I see. So you are not a Rainlord yourself, then?"

"No," said the man with a laugh. "But knowing how deeply you lot care for one another, it is flattering that you were even humoring the idea."

"It would have explained why you are helping us so much."

"I am also helping myself, you know. Vanderberk has been my target for decades. Finally being able to put him down is more reward than all the treasure in the world."

"Perhaps, but there were other ways you might have gone about it. Ones that would've involved making sure that your Rainlord prisoners remained entirely out of our reach."

Graves bobbed his head to the side but said nothing.

“How did you learn of our presence here in Vantalay, by the way?” Had those bumbling Triplets let it slip when they first arrived, Zeff wondered? If so, then he supposed their incompetence was a good thing, in retrospect.”

"3419

Graves, however, paused for quite a while before answering. “...Trade secret, I’m afraid. That’s not the type of information I’d like spread around.”

Zeff’s eye twitched. More secrets, eh? He wasn’t exactly surprised, but something in the back of his mind was bothering him. Maybe he could still push. “That’s fine. No specifics, then. Just tell me when you noticed we were here.” Half of those words didn’t even feel like his own. Were they moreso Axiolis’? What was this disquieted feeling in his gut?

“Even that would be giving away too much, I think,” said Graves.

“Oh, come now,” said Zeff. “Surely not.”

“I’m afraid so.”

Zeff’s jaw tensed.

And he realized what was bothering him so much, perhaps with Axiolis’ help.

Because the reaper could recall a very clear timeline of events.

The when, in this case, was actually quite important.

When the Triplets first arrived, they’d all been alone and deeply concealed. In fact, they’d been chosen for their mission specifically because of how unknown they were to the outside world. So it was virtually inconceivable that the Vangaurd could’ve sniffed them out, unless the Triplets themselves had let it slip.

But if that had been the case, then there would’ve been no “trade secrets” for Graves to be implying were at play here. No reason to hide anything.

Then the Triplets went to Miro and learned of the situation there, which prompted the Rainlords to send a few reinforcements, who were admittedly more recognizable than the Triplets but still trying to remain stealthy. Apart from one sketchy encounter with the RPMP, that team made no contact with any of the other forces in Ridgemark at the time--certainly not the Vanguard.

Then the skirmishing at Miro took place and they wrested the town from Abolish's control. And since they hadn't been able to achieve a decisive victory over Thaddeus Croll of Abolish, the team had been forced on the defensive in order to protect the Miroan civilians that they'd just rescued.

And it was during that time when the Blackburn Triplets had been redeployed elsewhere. Since they were not necessary for the defense of Miro, they were tasked with gathering information again.

Which was when Raul Blackburn had discovered the all-important intel that their captive kin were to be given away by the Vanguard.

So for any of this to make sense, Graves had to have learned of their presence before then, right? If it was the marshal's intention all along that the Rainlords would discover the scheme and go rescue their kin, then he had to have known they were in the country before Raul discovered that intel.

And yet..."

"3420 -- CCLXXXVII.

If all of that was true, then why had Graves asked how they found out about the captives being transferred? If that was part of his plan from the beginning, then shouldn't he have already known that? Unless he'd been playing dumb. Or deployed multiple attempts to inform them without knowing which had succeeded?

Why had he brought up Gema, though? Zeff had gotten completely distracted by the mere mention of her name.

Perhaps that had been the point.

Agh.

Zeff didn't like this suspicion filling his mind, right now.

Maybe none of these questions mattered. Maybe Graves had simply found out about them via some leak in the RPMP. Maybe Zeff should've just been focusing on getting everyone out of this godforsaken place, already. Maybe he should stop worrying so much about tangential factors. The only real concern here was the preservation of his kin, after all.

And yet...

In the ensuing few moments, one new question did involuntarily crystallize into his mind.

“When, exactly, was it that you replaced Thaddeus Croll?”

That was the question. Was it possible that Graves had, in truth, been the one fighting the Rainlords at Miro? None of the Rainlords who'd fought Croll had ever done so before, so none of them would have noticed any suspicious changes--and even if they had, there would have been any number of other rationalizations to help explain such differences away.

Not to mention, it might better explain how Thaddeus Croll had been able to stand up to the likes of Leo, Darktide, Evangelina, and more with minimal backup of his own.

But Zeff held his tongue. Here and now, he decided to keep that question to himself.

Because what was there to be gained from asking it? At best, a reassuring explanation that assuaged Zeff's suspicions. At worst, a suddenly hostile field marshal who would either kill or capture everyone here.

That risk was most certainly not worth the reward.

And with that in mind, looking back on the rest of this conversation and the fight that preceded it, Zeff Elroy came to the abrupt conclusion that he should probably stop tempting fate today and just accept the easy victory that had presented itself.

Chapter Two Hundred Eighty-Seven: 'Resting Iron, breathing Steel...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

It was a relief to learn that the Rainlords would be returning soon. And a surprise, as well. From what Hector had previously understood of the situation over there, the Rainlords still needed to go to the aid of the RPMP in the defense of the city of Ridgemark, but apparently, they were quite confident that the battle would cause little delay now that they had recovered their lost brethren."

"3420 -- CCLXXXVII.

If all of that was true, then why had Graves asked how they found out about the captives being transferred? If that was part of his plan from the beginning, then shouldn't he have already known that? Unless he'd been playing dumb. Or deployed multiple attempts to inform them without knowing which had succeeded?

Why had he brought up Gema, though? Zeff had gotten completely distracted by the mere mention of her name.

Perhaps that had been the point.

Agh.

Zeff didn't like this suspicion filling his mind, right now.

Maybe none of these questions mattered. Maybe Graves had simply found out about them via some leak in the RPMP. Maybe Zeff should've just been focusing on getting everyone out of this godforsaken place, already. Maybe he should stop worrying so much about tangential factors. The only real concern here was the preservation of his kin, after all.

And yet...

In the ensuing few moments, one new question did involuntarily crystallize into his mind.

"When, exactly, was it that you replaced Thaddeus Croll?"

That was the question. Was it possible that Graves had, in truth, been the one fighting the Rainlords at Miro? None of the Rainlords who'd fought Croll had ever done so before, so none of them would have noticed any suspicious changes--and even if they had, there would have been any number of other rationalizations to help explain such differences away.

Not to mention, it might better explain how Thaddeus Croll had been able to stand up to the likes of Leo, Darktide, Evangelina, and more with minimal backup of his own.

But Zeff held his tongue. Here and now, he decided to keep that question to himself.

Because what was there to be gained from asking it? At best, a reassuring explanation that assuaged Zeff's suspicions. At worst, a suddenly hostile field marshal who would either kill or capture everyone here.

That risk was most certainly not worth the reward.

And with that in mind, looking back on the rest of this conversation and the fight that preceded it, Zeff Elroy came to the abrupt conclusion that he should probably stop tempting fate today and just accept the easy victory that had presented itself.

Chapter Two Hundred Eighty-Seven: 'Resting Iron, breathing Steel...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

It was a relief to learn that the Rainlords would be returning soon. And a surprise, as well. From what Hector had previously understood of the situation over there, the Rainlords still needed to go to the aid of the RPMP in the defense of the city of Ridgemark, but apparently, they were quite confident that the battle would cause little delay now that they had recovered their lost brethren."

"3421

Hector certainly had confidence in their abilities, but he hoped they weren't being overly optimistic with that prediction. Their opponents in that battle were the combined forces of the Vantalayan Military Police and Abolish. That didn't exactly seem like a trivial fight, unless he was missing something.

Which, maybe he was. The report had been relatively brief, all things considered. He would've liked more details, such as any casualties or if any big name Abolishers had shown up.

He wondered if perhaps they had left that stuff out because they didn't want him jumping on a plane and flying to their aid. Knowing how proud they all were, that seemed like something they might do.

He figured not, though. Most likely, they were just busy, and things were fine.

If, however, a more detailed report didn't arrive in the next twenty-four hours, he was going to be pressing those reapers for more information. The last thing he wanted to do, right now, was leave Warrenhold, but if the Rainlords needed help, he was damn sure going to provide it.

In the meantime, though, he was almost not sure what to do with himself. How long had it been since he'd had any actual downtime like this? With so many Rainlords abroad, Warrenhold was so quiet. He'd apparently gotten accustomed to all the hustle and bustle of their presence without realizing it.

Not that he was entirely without matters to attend to, of course. There was always something he could be working on, if he really wanted to. He could check in on the bank or the Gaolanets or the Candle or the crazy world news going around.

But none of that was so immediately pressing that it demanded his attention at all costs, which was a nice change of pace.

He decided to take some time for himself to meditate. He felt like he'd been neglecting that lately, despite the fact that it might now be more necessary than ever.

All this stuff going on his head. The blessing of Focus. The sea of now-questionable information from the Candle. Not to mention his own, deeply flawed psyche. Whatever else was happening in there, that shaky foundation probably wasn't helping much.

Yeah. Meditation was much needed, he felt.

It was strange, though, because with his multiple thought processes, he was actually able to meditate with one or even two processes, while still thinking about things. Which might've been a bad strategy. He wasn't yet sure how he felt about that."

"3422

The more he'd learned of meditation--both from personal experience and from reading up about the subject online--the more he'd come to think that it wasn't just this thing that he needed to do for the sake of improving his materialization ability.

It was important for the stillness that it could provide. The calm.

The world was so busy. So noisy and constantly moving. Constantly demanding his attention in some form or another. And his own mind, that was plenty busy, too. More than ever, as of late.

So it seemed to him that trying to multitask during his meditations was somewhat missing the point. And potentially counterproductive, even. After all, he'd never actually been able to feel whether or not the meditation was improving his skill with materialization.

Garovel said it did, and he trusted the reaper's word on that, of course, but the progression was only ever detectable after the fact, not during. And most of the time, even that was questionable, because what was really causing the increase in skill level? The meditation? Or the actual training that he was doing all the time?

And then there were these "altered states of consciousness" that Emiliana Elroy had told him about. They intrigued him quite a bit. When she taught him about "Sto," a so-called storage state of consciousness, he hadn't been able to come up with a good use for it, which made sense, since it seemed to be mainly designed for mutation users like her.

But later on, he'd found it to be quite useful indeed as a means of helping him compartmentalize all of the information that the Candle had poured into his head. Without the benefit of Sto, Hector felt like his mind would be an even more chaotic place than it already was, these days.

It was just such a curious concept. Altered states of consciousness. He wanted to ask Emiliana more about it and perhaps see if she'd learned a new one yet, but he also didn't want to bother her until the Rainlords returned. Then he could give her good news, too. Hopefully.

Maybe he'd ask Hanton or Pauline about it, instead. A sparrow's perspective might be interesting.

Here and now, though, he was content to simply indulge in the confines of his own meditative exercises. Increasingly, he was feeling like there was more yet to be discovered therein. About himself, perhaps. And beyond? Hard to say. What would that even mean, really?"

"3423

His meditations, therefore, had begun to feel a bit different. While he still wanted to keep to the core principle of clearing his mind, freeing himself of all distraction, Hector was also starting to feel himself... wandering a bit, in some sense.

He didn't know how else to describe it, exactly. If the purpose of his meditations was to create a vast, empty expanse within his mind, then it now felt like he was floating through the empty vastness. Exploring it, perhaps.

In search of something? Maybe so. But to what end? By design, there was nothing to discover. The point of the exercise was to make sure it stayed empty. So what point could there be in exploration?

That was an odd question. Why did there have to be a point in it? Couldn't the exploration itself just be... enjoyable on its own? The sensation of floating through his own mind was certainly... something. In fact, it might've been making it even easier to free himself of distractions.

It was like a new level of relaxation. So much so, in fact, that he sometimes had trouble telling if he was meditating or simply asleep.

And weirder still, he found himself feeling extra refreshed after such deep meditations. Almost like waking up from a full night's rest, despite only an hour or two having passed.

He read about some people being able to forego sleep almost entirely, in favor of deep meditation. It had seemed an exaggeration to him before, but maybe there was something to it, after all. If only a little. Even if his mind felt refreshed, he highly doubted that the rest of his body wouldn't still be dead tired after a heavy day of fighting or training, for example.

But hell, maybe this, too, could be considered one of those altered states of consciousness. A hyper resting state. Or something.

Eh, he was just making shit up at this point. Would've been neat, though. What might he call such a thing?

Re-Sto?

Ha. Probably not.

Aside from his meditations, there was also the matter of this new armor at his disposal. Haqq Najir had been following him around in order to study it and report back to Abbas, who was still in Lorent, working on the Candle.

Needless to say, Hector was quite curious what conclusions Haqq would arrive at; and yet at the same time, he also wasn't holding his breath. But not because he thought Haqq's skill was lacking.

Rather, there was just something... well, otherworldly about that armor. And he felt, in some strange way, that it might resist analysis."

"3424

And indeed, Hector's suspicions were thus far proving true. Despite how much Haqq Najir had been examining the different pieces of armor that Hector materialized for him, the man had not been able to tell him much.

"This metal defies explanation," said Haqq. "In many ways, it mimics the properties of your iron. Weight. Density. Electric and thermal conductivity. All almost identical. And yet its tensile strength seems to match, or even surpass, that of the metal that Abbas and I synthesized for the Amir-9 prototype."

"Surpass?" said Hector, doubtful. "What makes you think that?"

"I did say 'seems to,'" added Haqq. "That particular property is quite difficult to fully test. I would need more equipment to know that for certain."

"Okay, but what makes you think that could even be possible?" said Hector. "There's no reason to think that this armor could be any stronger than the Amir-9, is there?"

Haqq's nose twitched. "I took one of the many spare prototypes from your armory in order to compare and contrast it with these armor pieces. And by that, I mean I have been bashing them against one another for hours on end, among other crude tests. And while it was difficult to be certain, I thought I spotted the occasional scratch on the shield but not the armor.”

That was news to Hector. He didn’t know if he believed it, though. “Are you sure about that?”

“No,” said Haqq. “That is my point. More extreme testing methods are needed.”

“...Extreme in what way, exactly?”

“I will require a hydraulic press,” said Haqq. “And a hydraulic drill. And a plasma drill. And a laser cutter.” He paused. “And an ECM machine.”

“ECM?”

“Yes.”

“...What does ECM mean?”

“Electrochemical machining.”

“I...” Hector suddenly had a feeling that he knew where this was going. “And how much would one of these ECM machines cost, exactly?”

“In your Atreyan troas? I’m not sure.”

“And in your Sairi escaltos?” said Hector.

Haqq stared at him a moment. “...Can anyone truly put a price on science?”

Hector’s expression flattened. “I don’t think I’m that curious to know just how ‘mathematically’ tough my new armor is.”

“My heart weeps at your lack of academic curiosity, Lord Goffe.”

“From the sound of it, if your heart isn’t doing the weeping, then my bank account will be. Can you not use the Candle for these sorts of tests?”

"3425

Haqq gave a sideways nod. “Perhaps. But I do not wish to interrupt Abbas’ work with it.”

Hmm. That was thoughtful of him, Hector supposed. And bringing up Abbas made him abruptly curious about something else, too, so he took the opportunity to try to change the subject. "You've gotten the chance to study the Forge a bit, haven't you?"

"I have."

"What's your opinion of its capabilities?" said Hector.

"It's a Fusion Forge. Obviously, it's extremely powerful."

"Lord Abbas mentioned something about it having a 'gentle disposition.'"

"I wouldn't be able to confirm or deny that," said Haqq. "Your Candle is the first Forge I've had the opportunity of even examining, let alone working with. Where such vague ideas as 'disposition' are concerned, you will have to defer to the Sunsmith's expertise."

Hector had to hold back a chortle. Somehow, this man still managed to sound slightly arrogant even when admitting that he didn't know something. "What do you know of other Fusion Forges in the world?"

"A dangerous subject, that. Are you sure you wish me to tell you? Learning more about them could be something you come to regret."

"Hmm. You mean because the people who guard them are so aggressive in preventing the spread of relevant information?"

"...Yes. I suppose I should have expected you to already be aware of that." And he paused, eyeing Hector a moment. "In fact... why are you even asking me about this? To test my knowledge? I find that rather insulting, if so."

Hector didn't balk, though. It felt like he might finally be getting accustomed to people thinking he was far older and more knowledgeable about the world than he really was.

And admittedly, it did help to have all those historical memories from the Candle stewing around in his brain.

"Every person is an entire world of information, all on their own," said Hector. "No matter how old I get, I hope I never forget that. If I ever start treating other people like they have nothing to teach me, then... learning new things will become a lot more difficult. And rare. Don't you think?"

Haqq merely stared at him blankly.

Shit, maybe that had sounded dumb. Agh. Hector just tried to keep his composure as he waited for a response. It took a while to arrive.

“...I know of only six Fusion Forges in the entire world,” said Haqq.”
"3426

Six, eh? Hector had a feeling that there were more than that, though he couldn't be sure. The Candle seemed to have given him memories of many other Fusion Forges from over the eons, but without more time to sort through said memories and perhaps confirm their veracity, there was no telling which of those Forges might still exist in the modern day.

Apart from a few select ones, that was.

“The Golden Hour,” said Hector, blurting out the words without even thinking, “the Lantern of Doma, the Artisan's Anvil, the Clown Pit, the Red Rift, the Pool of Trenoy, the Silent Serpent.”

Haqq just looked at him.

Hector had to blink a couple times as he tried to process everything that had just come out of his own mouth.

“...Some of those names, I am familiar with,” said Haqq. “Others, not. The Clown Pit? That cannot truly be the name of a Fusion Forge, can it?”

Hector needed another moment to think about his response. Did he have actual details about that in his head? Where had all those names even come from, exactly? “I... think that is the name of Morgunov's Forge.”

Haqq's head reared back a little. “I suppose that would make sense. It sounds foolish enough to belong to him. But... how in the world did you discover that? I've not met anyone who could even confirm the existence of Morgunov's new Forge, let alone tell me its name.”

Ah.

Hmm.

Yeah, that probably wasn't the kind of information that Morgunov went spreading around, was it? Even a maniac like him probably wanted to keep any and all details of his Forge a secret.

So how had the Candle learned of it, then? Hell, how had it learned of any of the other Forges at all? It wasn't like it had traveled the world and visited them.

...Right?

Ugh. Hector was feeling a little woozy all of a sudden. It felt like his head had just been flooded with a little too much information at once, like a crack in a dam had formed.

He had to stop and concentrate before it worsened. Patch it up. Get it back under control.

Whew. Yeah. Sto. It was Sto. He could feel where it had started to fail. In fact, the visualization of a cracked dam seemed to be exactly right for assessing the problem. And thankfully, it was just as simple to fix it."

"3427

Or at least, it felt simple. With how strange this all was, he could only have so much confidence in his own perceptions.

"Are you alright?" said Haqq.

And Hector realized that he'd turned away from Haqq and was clutching his temple. "Yeah," he said, trying not to sound too disoriented. "I'm fine."

"Still feeling the aftermath of your battle the other day?"

Well, that wasn't untrue, so Hector decided to lean into that excuse. "It was a rough one."

Really, though, Haqq's guess wasn't entirely off the mark. There was one thing in particular that Hector couldn't forget about his fight with Banda Toro, just before getting eaten--arguably the reason he'd gotten eaten.

He'd pushed his mind too far. Tried to force out more thought processes. And his brain had blanked out on him.

True, he'd been pretty desperate at the time, but that didn't change the fact that it was a mistake that had nearly cost not only his own life but also the lives of everyone in Warrenhold.

And now there was this. Another worryingly weird thing happening with his mind.

The same mind that had been screwed with by two gods and a sentient super-tree.

Honestly, he'd been trying not to dwell on these facts too much, but it was becoming increasingly difficult.

What if his mind was becoming so twisted by all this crazy shit that it eventually just stopped functioning properly altogether? What if it just turned into a knotted mess of perpetual confusion?

When considering the long history of servants going mad, that was an especially troubling notion. And it was paired with another, which was perhaps equally troubling.

What if all this mind-tinkering was turning him into a completely different person? What if he ceased to be himself?

In some sense, that reminded him of what Malast had been trying to do. Offering him "godhood" at the expense of his identity. Maybe this was the same thing, just in a more roundabout way.

Obviously, though, he couldn't voice any of those concerns to Haqq here.

He felt the sudden urge to go meditate again. To take some time and regather his thought. He tried to excuse himself, but Haqq just kept following him and started steering the conversation back towards heavy machinery.

"If you're hellbent on frugality," the man said, "then perhaps you could use your considerable influence in this country to earn me access to the tools I need, free of charge."

"3428

Hector had a particular destination in mind for this next meditation session. He'd been experimenting with different spots lately, and his most recent one might've become his favorite yet. "No one is supposed to know you are here, remember?" said Hector. "And you're quite famous in your own right, aren't you?"

"So I'll be discreet," said Haqq. "A disguise and alias would be trivial to concoct."

"Sounds like a pain in the ass," said Hector, perhaps a little too bluntly.

"Ah, so you agree that purchasing the equipment for private use is the preferred way to go."

The conversation continued for the full length of their walk, and no matter how flatly Hector stated his refusal, Haqq remained perpetually optimistic that Hector would help him out, one way or another. Optimistic? Or insistent? Hector couldn't quite tell.

By the time they reached their destination, Hector wasn't even annoyed, anymore. If anything, he was actually somewhat amused by Haqq's persistence in playing dumb, like he somehow couldn't grasp the concept that Hector wasn't going to do what he wanted.

Thankfully, the sight of said destination provided another opportunity to change the subject.

It was Warrenhold's underground waterfall.

The noise here was something else. It was certainly loud, but surprisingly, not as loud as one might've expected. Even at this distance, they didn't yet have to shout in order to hear each other.

Hector suspected that was because of the way the caves in this immediate area were interconnected. The waterfall had one great cavern of its own--almost as massive as the one that encompassed the castle's main eight towers--but all around the waterfall were tunnels, even up on the ceiling. It seemed to him that they might've been funneling much of the sound away from the base of the waterfall, instead of simply creating one, big echo chamber like he'd originally expected.

Whatever the explanation, it had been a welcome surprise.

“Wow,” said Haqq, once the waterfall came into view. “That is quite something.”

“You haven’t been here yet?” said Hector.

“I have not.”

It was certainly a sight to behold, these days. Unlike when he’d initially found it, covered in total darkness, now the waterfall had large amber lamps lining it on both sides, bathing the entire massive chamber in warm light. And the waterfall itself rose to such a great height that it appeared almost like a vertical runway for aircraft to take off.

"3429

“I’ve been thinking this would be a good place to host visitors,” said Hector, “but it’d need a lot more work, first. And maybe part of me is worried about losing it as a prime meditation spot if people are constantly coming and going from here.”

“Meditation, eh?” said Haqq. “Never much cared for that. Don’t have the temperament for it. Mind is always too busy. Trying to force the calm just makes me bored, and boredom is one thing that my brain simply cannot abide.”

Hector found that curious. “That doesn’t sound right. If you’re feeling bored, then you’re not clearing your mind properly. You shouldn’t be feeling anything at all. Except maybe... peaceful. Or contentment. Which is the real point of it, I think.”

Haqq returned a dubious look. “The point is contentment, you say? Not the growth of your power?”

“I mean, that’s what reapers will tell you, sure. And it’s obviously a nice bonus, if true, but plenty of non-servants meditate, too, and they find value in it.”

“Mm. Sazandara has indeed tried to get me into meditation many times over the years. I was never able to stick with it.”

Hector scratched his nose. “I think that, too, is probably the wrong way of looking at it. You don’t necessarily have to stick with it in order to still get some use out of it.”

“No? I can hardly see how doing it only once or twice could prove beneficial. Isn’t the habit supposed to be what builds ‘mental discipline’ or what have you?”

“Well, yeah, there is that,” said Hector. “Building discipline would take time. But sometimes, I find that meditation is just... good for its own sake. To give yourself a bit of peace. Especially during times when... peace is otherwise difficult to come by. Know what I mean?”

Haqq met his gaze for a moment, then looked at the waterfall again. “Hmm.”

The man said nothing more as Hector moved closer to the waterfall and looked for a good spot. There were quite a few to choose from, as the rocks provided multiple ledges going up the full height of the cliff. Some were more eroded than others, though, so Hector had been trying to assess which ones would be easier or harder to meditate on, comparatively.

With Haqq looking like he was about to join him, Hector decided to go for the easiest he’d yet found.”
"3430

And indeed, Haqq was still following him, even as he approached the roaring water.

He kept the Scarf of Amordiin on but took his shirt off, folded it, and set it on a nearby rock. Haqq did the same, which was somehow still surprising to Hector.

Before fully plunging himself into the water, however, a thought struck him, and he turned back to Haqq one last time. Now he had to shout in order to be heard. “If you find the water too disruptive, tap me on the shoulder, and I’ll make a dome for you!”

Haqq returned a look of dissatisfaction, but he did nod.

Then they entered the waterfall.

It was cold as fuck.

And heavy on the head and shoulders, of course. It felt almost like stepping into an entirely different world, where even the laws of physics might've been altered.

Hector pushed toward the center of the ledge and took his spot. He could sense Haqq still there next to him, even as he sat down and started focusing on his breathing.

Having a meditation partner here made this feel a bit different, especially knowing that Haqq was inexperienced. It was hard not to worry about the guy a little, considering the very obvious fact that waterfall meditation was not exactly a beginner technique. The entire point of using a waterfall was to make it way harder, after all.

The extreme noise, pressure, temperature--everything was meant to disturb and distract, to make it that much more difficult to keep one's mind clear.

He couldn't help wondering if Haqq would even be willing to ask him for help. The guy seemed pretty damn prideful, though that wasn't exactly abnormal for a Sandlord.

Oh well, though.

He cleared his mind.

And the world fell away from him.

He loved this place. Indeed, the waterfall did make it much more challenging, but in a different way, it also allowed him to push even deeper into his own mind. Or rather, it forced him to, perhaps.

Tough to tell, really.

However, what he was able to discover this deep was not the perfect clarity that he was looking for. Or at least, not just that. Clarity was merely one of many pursuable options.

He felt as though he were standing in the middle of a great room with doors in all directions. Just how many were there? It seemed impossible to count them. Not because there were too many, necessarily. But because, perhaps, they didn't want to be counted. They refused it."

"3431

Hector took his time and tried to observe the doors, though they seemed to resist that effort, too.

But then again, this was his own mind, so maybe he was the one resisting? Hmm. Perhaps the knowledge that these doors didn't actually exist was to blame. It was like trying to study a dream in real-time. A bit of a fool's errand, maybe.

So he changed tactics. He stopped trying to observe them with his eyes--or whatever it was that passed for eyes in this heady place--and instead, he started trying to clear his mind again.

If this was his own mind, then everything he might want to know about it was already here. Right? So maybe it was just a matter of opening himself up to that information. Allowing him to "see" it. Or to understand it, at least.

Heh. To hold truth?

Maybe so.

Man, this was something. He didn't think he'd ever gone this deep into his meditation before. It certainly felt new enough. This place. These doors. What did he know of them?

No. That was wrong. He had to stop asking. Stop inquiring. Because he already had the answers. Hopefully.

Emptiness. Clarity. Peace.

Whoa. It felt like he was going yet deeper still.

But he wasn't. He hadn't gone anywhere. His body. His brain. His mind. The waterfall. The cold. The pressure. He could still feel it all. It wasn't a matter of desensitization.

Rather, it all just felt... less important. Not a priority.

Yeah.

The doors. There they were. Just standing there. Existing. But also not.

Yep.

That one over there. That door was a thread. A background thought process. So right now, it didn't lead anywhere, because he'd turned all those off. For clarity.

Yup.

Were all the other doors thought processes, too?

Agh. Wrong approach. Again. Stop asking.

He had to find his clarity again. The blank space.

There.

Mmhmm.

And the doors. They were still there. Still part of him. Still standing.

That one over there. That was Sto. Led straight to it. An enormous reservoir of ancient memories--or dreams--that didn't even belong to him. Yeah. That was where he'd shoved all that stuff.

Huh.

A thought bubbled up. A question trying to be asked.

He didn't let it, though. Whatever it was, it didn't matter. Not here, not now.

Right.

In this place, Hector was.

And there was nothing more to it.

He simply was."

"3432

So many doors. All standing. Waiting.

That one there. It led to his own memories. Stuff from his own life. Stuff he liked. Loved, even. Warmth and fondness all but radiated from the cracks in its frame.

Not like the door next to it. That one was more neutral. It had stuff that he remembered blankly. Stuff that had just gotten stuck in his mind for whatever reason. Catchy songs that he didn't even necessarily like. Information that he'd learned, sometimes through quite tedious means. Lots of school stuff in there, he felt.

Boring things. But not without their importance. A useful door to have, even if not a very fun one.

And then, there was the door next to that.

Oh, boy...

That door.

Yeah.

All the bad stuff was in there. Or most of it was, at the very least. Tough to believe that everything could've been in there. Maybe he was just being pessimistic, though. Overblowing his own past miseries.

Yeah, probably.

He did have a tendency of focusing on the negative. He always had. He might've liked to believe that he'd been able to turn that natural tendency into a useful tool, these days, but he didn't really know if that was the truth or just an excuse so that he didn't have to seriously contemplate trying to change it.

Even in this place, where he could be totally, brutally honest and blunt with himself, he didn't know which way the wind was blowing on that particular subject.

Hmm.

Well, that was okay.

The point here wasn't to come up with solutions to problems. It was to discover truths that, deep down, he already knew. If he genuinely didn't know something, then that was that.

Interesting, nonetheless.

These other doors.

Ah.

That one led to Garovel. Heh. Wow. How neat. Impulsively, he wanted to go through it and strike up a conversation. He knew it would work.

But no. He could do that whenever. It wasn't necessary here.

The one next to it, though...

That was Rasalased.

Holy crap. It was just right there. A door to the Dry God. Easy as could be to just walk through and have a chat.

That seemed wrong, considering how much he'd struggled to talk to the guy in the past.

But then again, it had been getting easier over time. And now... huh.

He was truly tempted now. But there was yet more to become aware of in this space, Hector felt. He'd have to remember this for later, though."
"3433

Agh. His thoughts were becoming too full again. Too present. Too self-aware, perhaps?

No. Questions were bad. Yes, exactly. He tried to move on. The next door. Where was it?

Agh. Again, wrong. Why was this so difficult? No!

Dammit.

He had to take a minute. Or several. Or many more than that, even. It took as long as it took, and being conscious of the time was counterproductive, he felt.

He found his center again. His clarity. And the doors. They were still there.

Everything was familiar, he realized. All the doors. They were all his. In various ways. Leading to different parts of himself. Even Rasalased and Garovel--they counted, too. They were part of him now.

It wasn't a question. He could simply tell. That was the truth.

Huh.

And yet.

There was one more door. Not like the others. Quite different, in fact. Not immediately knowable to him. Mysterious, somehow.

Strange. Uncertain.

And those qualities were begging for questions out of him. Yeah. That was the issue he'd run into. Trying to focus on that particular door was way harder. Just perceiving it made him want to ask about it.

No. Not just that.

The door itself had a desire. He could feel it. The questions weren't just trying to emerge from within himself. They were stemming from the door, too. From beyond it.

It wanted to know about him.

Unsettling.

Very much so.

Enough to threaten his clarity. As it had done before.

But this time, at least, he held on. Held together.

Held true.

Yes.

That door wanted something.

And he didn't know what that was.

Which meant... that the door... either didn't belong to him like the others did... or... it led somewhere within himself that he was still not aware of, even in this place.

One. Or the other.

Ah.

Indeed.

That was not even a door, he realized. It was a staircase. Leading down.

Deeper. Deeper. Down and down.

Without even realizing it, he was already taking it. Down the steps. Winding, spiraling, circling down into a vast darkness.

There was fear here. Terror, even. He could already feel it. Growing stronger, becoming part of the very environment.

It was a struggle now. Maintaining clarity. Harder than ever before. Because this fear was familiar. An old friend, of sorts. The kind that knew all his sore spots. The kind that might not have ever really been a friend in the first place."

"3434

These feelings. This space. Hector didn't know what to expect. There was a certain strangeness here, too. It felt at once like a place that was deeply personal to him and yet also entirely foreign.

A dread came over him. A desire to turn back. To stop searching.

He didn't listen to it. Couldn't. There was something here that he needed to find. But he couldn't tell if it was even something about himself or not. Some long, lost memory. Some kind of suppressed terror.

Or something entirely different. Something outside of himself.

Something that wanted in.

That thought gave him pause.

On the staircase, he stopped. He still couldn't see the bottom. Couldn't feel it yet. Maybe it didn't even have one. Maybe it would just continue down forever, until he drove himself mad.

Hmm.

That could be a danger, too, he supposed. Madness. It had been on his mind more and more, of late. With everything going on, everything messing with his thoughts, his memories, his sense of self.

Ah...

Wait a moment.

Yes. That was the real reason he'd been finding so much extra motivation to meditate, recently.

Madness. Or rather, his worry over it. His deepest, most horrified worry.

With all the new memories granted to him by the Forge, all the history that he had been able to bear witness to in such an immersive, intimate way--the problem of madness was now much more concerning to him than it ever was before. Certainly more than he'd ever let on.

More than he'd ever realized, even.

He stayed there on the staircase for a long while. He looked up and felt another surge of fear arrive as he still saw only darkness. The hole through which he had descended, it was gone.

No.

Not quite.

It was only just visible, he realized. The faintest glint of light remained up there. He had to strain to see it. To feel it. But it was still there.

Himself. Who he was.

Yes.

That was what this place was, he realized. There was indeed no bottom to this hole. To keep descending would be folly.

And yet, suddenly, as he began to feel so deeply that all of these things were the truth, there arrived something new. Despite so much oppressive fear, such overwhelming dread, there was now also... a certain... longing.

Curiosity.

A desire to learn more, in spite of everything.

A dark temptation.

And somehow... that feeling made Hector understand this place even better."

"3435

This descent. This dark allure. Tempting him downward. Just keep going, it told him. See what you find. After all, if there truly was no bottom, then that also meant that this was an infinite space. Which meant it held infinite possibilities, too.

Infinite potential.

That was what this place was.

Potential.

An endless expanse. Limited, perhaps, only by one's ability to perceive and comprehend it.

Right. In that respect, maybe everything he could ever want could be found here. If he just kept descending long enough, he could find it. Eventually.

Hence the temptation.

Hector understood. In part, at least.

The Void.

That thing he'd been hearing so much about. Learning so much about. The Candle knew of it, too. Intimately. And there were so many historical examples of men and women searching for it. Of them discovering it, even.

And then going mad.

Seduced by this very same allure.

But there was so much more to it than just that. Of course there was. This was the paradoxical infinity of non-existence. Imagination, distilled. Nothing about it was simple.

Because the allure wasn't just some deception, some trick to capture the unprepared or unintelligent. No. If anything, those things might've made the problem worse.

Much, much worse.

Because the allure had merit. Hector knew that much.

This place was powerful. And knowledgeable. It really was... everything. And nothing. All at once.

He could grow stronger here. He didn't yet know how, but he knew that he could. It was all but telling him so. And the truth, he could all but hold it in his hands. Or--maybe he could even do that, too.

Wow.

So many emotions were trying to seize hold of him now. Some more powerful than others. Fear. Ambition. Anger. Greed. Pity. Curiosity. Sadness. Wonder. Hatred.

Pain.

So compelling. So convincing. So legitimate.

But Hector was still. He remained. Still.

Seeing them all at once like this was... something else. A unique experience. Something to be... felt. But not indulged.

He took a step. Up.

It was time to head back, he decided.

But the stairs. They were no longer. His foot found nothing to push against, and abruptly, he was dangling. From a rope.

Well.

This was a problem.

The vast hole below him was now more prominent than ever. He could feel it even more ferociously than before. It had desires, too. It wanted to pull him in.

Or perhaps... that was just... every emotion manifesting itself against him at once. Their collective will rebelling against his own."

"3436

Hmm.

Interesting.

Despite the apparent peril of this situation, dangling above an eternal pit of non-existence, Hector remained calm. Unmoved.

The emotions were not going to win. He would not allow it. In this place, they were separate from himself. Unruly creations spawning haphazardly out of his mind, trying to wrest control away from him. Ferocious and demanding.

But they still belonged to him. And he still had to acknowledge them, too. Accept them. As part of himself. Pleasant or not, they were all part of him.

So in order to bring them back under control, Hector didn't want to "command" them--though he did feel that he could. He knew that he could, in fact. But that would be the wrong approach, he felt. Not true to himself--to both who he was and who he hoped to be.

The right move here... was to bring them closer. To let them in.

As much as they seemed to be scratching and gnawing at him--behaving not entirely unlike monsters born of chaos--Hector knew that they were still his. And that he was still in control. And that ultimately, they couldn't hurt him, despite all appearances to the contrary.

In some sense, it was like giving every turbulent emotion a big, warm, welcoming hug. Until they found their proper place within his mind again. Until they realized that they were where they were supposed to be.

It took a long time. Forever, seemingly. He had to allow himself to feel each emotion more deeply than perhaps ever before. He had to give them all the attention they deserved, like children.

But it also got gradually easier, too. With each one being brought home, being integrated, he felt... invigorated. Even more in control.

Heh.

This endless darkness. It wasn't so scary. But it also wasn't where he needed to be, right now.

Before he knew it, the rope from which he dangled was no longer binding him. Instead, he had it in his hands. And with a firm grip, hand over hand, he was climbing his way back out, toward that distant glimmer of light above.

It felt like moving at a snail's pace, at first. Like the light was not getting closer. Like it never would.

And he felt like he was being watched now, too. Watched and judged. From a million angles at once. A dark, invisible crowd all around him, rooting both for and against him.

But he didn't balk. And soon, the progress was clear. That light was growing nearer."

"3437 -- CCLXXXVIII.

Chapter Two Hundred Eighty-Eight: 'The Knife in the snow...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Ugh. What a splitting headache. How long had it been since he'd felt one this bad? He thought he'd overcome this problem long ago, but now, here it was again. Old and familiar pain. The kind that brought back memories along with it.

That made it the very worst kind of pain, as far as Jercash was concerned.

He rolled over, only then realizing that he was on the ground. And cold.

Damn cold. It took a minute for his vision to clear. Where the hell was he? The mountains?

What had happened? He tried to recall.

The last thing he remembered...

Ah.

The battle. Right.

Well, shit. That fight had taken place in Kandra, the capital city of Kavia. So if he'd ended up all the way out here, then it must not have gone very well.

Hmm. He remembered a volcano. Specifically, a volcanic eruption, blanketing the horizon. And he remembered--ah.

Gohvis, that wild bastard. Where'd he go? Showing up out of the blue like that and suddenly pitching in with the battle? It had been so out-of-character that it had actually, somehow, made Jercash more concerned about his situation, not less.

Yeah. That was it. The real last thing he remembered. Thinking that if Gohvis was deciding to pitch in, then things must've been even worse than he'd thought.

And he'd thought they were pretty bad.

This entire warfront had been left in Jercash's hands. And at first, it had been quite the endeavor. Jercash hadn't felt such unquestioned authority at his fingertips in quite some time--hell, maybe ever. With the benefit of hindsight, perhaps that feeling had gotten a bit intoxicating and made him a tad... overzealous.

Especially after he and his boys managed to slay one of the Vanguardian marshals.

Carson. What a self-righteous prick that guy had been.

The celebration after that victory had been the stuff of legends. A party in the capital city, quite literally dancing on the bastard's corpse, then parading it around the streets for all to see. The Kandran governor-general had not looked too pleased at the sight of Carson's smote body lying there, but Jercash and his men had made sure to correct that attitude of his.

No frowning allowed during a celebration. That was the Abolish way."
"3437 -- CCLXXXVIII.

Chapter Two Hundred Eighty-Eight: 'The Knife in the snow...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Ugh. What a splitting headache. How long had it been since he'd felt one this bad? He thought he'd overcome this problem long ago, but now, here it was again. Old and familiar pain. The kind that brought back memories along with it.

That made it the very worst kind of pain, as far as Jercash was concerned.

He rolled over, only then realizing that he was on the ground. And cold.

Damn cold. It took a minute for his vision to clear. Where the hell was he? The mountains?

What had happened? He tried to recall.

The last thing he remembered...

Ah.

The battle. Right.

Well, shit. That fight had taken place in Kandra, the capital city of Kavia. So if he'd ended up all the way out here, then it must not have gone very well.

Hmm. He remembered a volcano. Specifically, a volcanic eruption, blanketing the horizon. And he remembered--ah.

Gohvis, that wild bastard. Where'd he go? Showing up out of the blue like that and suddenly pitching in with the battle? It had been so out-of-character that it had actually, somehow, made Jercash more concerned about his situation, not less.

Yeah. That was it. The real last thing he remembered. Thinking that if Gohvis was deciding to pitch in, then things must've been even worse than he'd thought.

And he'd thought they were pretty bad.

This entire warfront had been left in Jercash's hands. And at first, it had been quite the endeavor. Jercash hadn't felt such unquestioned authority at his fingertips in quite some time--hell, maybe ever. With the benefit of hindsight, perhaps that feeling had gotten a bit intoxicating and made him a tad... overzealous.

Especially after he and his boys managed to slay one of the Vanguardian marshals.

Carson. What a self-righteous prick that guy had been.

The celebration after that victory had been the stuff of legends. A party in the capital city, quite literally dancing on the bastard's corpse, then parading it around the streets for all to see. The Kandran governor-general had not looked too pleased at the sight of Carson's smote body lying there, but Jercash and his men had made sure to correct that attitude of his.

No frowning allowed during a celebration. That was the Abolish way."
"3438

Man. How could it have all gone so wrong after that? Agh. Pride before the fall, he supposed.

Amateurish of him, really. Letting a little success go to his head like that.

Well. In fairness, killing a marshal when three of them were hounding him day and night was more than just a "little" success.

But still. No excuses.

"You're awake," came that familiar double-voice of the Black Scourge. "I was beginning to think Grant had done some kind of permanent damage to you."

Jercash didn't turn to look at him yet. He hadn't sensed Gohvis there a moment ago, but now he did, and he was not surprised. The jerk always did like to sneak up on people. Like a little kid, honestly.

A giant, draconic, little kid.

"Grant..." The name fell almost involuntarily out of Jercash's mouth. That was right, wasn't it? He'd gotten into a pitched battle with that son of a bitch, one that he'd felt like he was about to win. He'd manipulated the battlefield in order to create exactly that scenario, after all.

Truthfully, Carson's death had been more luck than strategy, Jercash felt. While he certainly didn't mind taking credit for it in front of the men and the general public, he and his top guys all knew the truth. It was a routine assassination attempt. The kind people at this level had to deal with all the time.

It wasn't actually supposed have to succeeded. It was just supposed to have bought Jercash time.

But then his assassins came back with wonderful news--and the physical proof of their success, to boot.

Jercash could not have been prouder.

The Little Assassins that Could. Led by the Bolt of Kavia. Or the Headhunter, as some had also started calling him. Or Karkash the Thunderbolt, as still others did.

Personally, Jercash preferred the latter, but he knew that these sorts of things tended to take on a life of their own. Whatever stuck, stuck.

He didn't yet know if the youngster was truly deserving of all the attention, though. Nor would he know for quite some time, he suspected. Unless he'd already gotten killed in the mayhem of the last battle, of course.

That was the way it worked with these meteoric upstarts. The ones that just exploded onto the scene, making big waves out of nowhere. Usually, it was just dumb luck that earned them that first wave, but time always told whether they could sustain themselves, eventually."
"3439

But at the very least, Jercash certainly had his eye on him now. Karkash had already made a solid first impression on him back in Kavia, when Jercash's men finally tracked his little group down.

Apparently, the kiddos were the ambitious sort. Which wasn't exactly abnormal, of course. If you weren't ambitious, you didn't have a place in Abolish as anything other than a slave--or something equivalent to one without the label.

But it was still a rare thing to see someone enacting such risky plans without much apparent firepower to back them up.

Karkash and his little buddy--Desmond or something--had gathered a ragtag bunch of maniacs in order to start targeting locations that prominent Vanguardians were known to have some connection to.

A common enough tactic, historically, but Jercash had admittedly not seen it used in a while. Mostly because the Vanguard had cracked down on it extremely hard the last time. These youngsters wouldn't remember that, of course, but that was no excuse for their reapers. It made him wonder if the sneaky buggers were concealing that tidbit of knowledge from them.

Part of him hoped so. It'd be amusing. Plus, he didn't want to open his big mouth and destroy their dreams. Abolish needed that type of eagerness.

And whaddya know? So far, they'd surprised him. If they kept this up, he'd have to promote them soon, regardless of their ages.

Not that they'd told him how young they really were. He could just tell. They had that air about them. That dark naivete.

And their auras weren't exactly up to snuff, either. But perhaps that was a different matter.

With the opening that their unexpected success in killing Carson had provided, Jercash's plans had been thrown off. With the benefit of hindsight, that was obvious, but at the time, he hadn't realized what a precarious situation he had been put in. That youthful eagerness had infected him, hadn't it?

Because naturally, with one of the three big names down, the other two would be looking for revenge, right? Which would make them overextend themselves, right? And of course, their overall might would be at its lowest since the war broke out, right? Therefore, the best course of action was to change tactics and start pushing forward in order to take advantage of a weakened, disorganized enemy.

Right?

Wrong, apparently."

"3440

Should've stuck with his initial game plan. Hit-and-run tactics combined with hostage-taking and purposely drawn-out negotiations. Along with a few of his special trump cards thrown in every now and then, of course. It had been slow progress, but it had been working.

Switching over to a more aggressive, ambush-focused strategy had not been the play, clearly.

Kane and Grant weren't fools, damn them. They'd closed ranks and done the complete opposite of what he'd hoped, apparently not bothered much at all by the death of their long-serving compatriot.

In retrospect, he supposed he should've known better. Heartless bastards, the lot of them. Truthfully, strange as it might've seemed, it was actually Abolish which was filled with soft-hearted, emotional thinkers. At least when it came to things like that.

The Vanguard didn't care about each other. The people they fought and died alongside. They only cared about the billions of planet-killing leeches who didn't give a single shit about them in return.

How absolutely ass-backward this world was.

"...So you rescued me?" said Jercash, turning to look at the dragon man.

"Yes," said Gohvis. "Though I'm surprised to hear you phrase it that way."

"Hmm? Why's that? Think I'm too proud to call a spade a spade?"

"...Yes."

"Hah! It pains me to learn even after all these years, you still don't know me better than that. I'm not one to scoff at a helping hand. Especially from an old friend."

"Mm."

"How'd you know to show up when you did? The tide turned so quickly that there was no way word could have reached you in time."

"I knew of their plan in advance."

Jercash's expression flattened, and he blinked dully. "Excuse me?"

"It was their long-simmering Project Blacksong. You must've heard something of it yourself by now, no?"

He had, but that was beside the point. "If you knew so much more about it ahead of time, then why didn't you warn us?"

The Monster was quiet a moment. "...I didn't feel like it."

Jercash's head reared back a little as he blinked a few more times. It was immediately obvious that Gohvis just didn't want to tell him the real reason, but that answer still left him baffled and offended all the same. He took a second to gather his thoughts as he sighed and rubbed his forehead with one hand."

"3441

"...You really don't make it easy to be your friend," said Jercash.

"You throw that word around as if it has merit," said Gohvis. "You know as well as I that we do not have the luxury of friends."

"Hmph. I know no such thing. The minute you start thinking that way is the minute that these long lives of ours start to seem like they might not be worth continuing. Friendship is a key component to retaining our sanity."

The Monster regarded him for another long moment. "...You honestly think you are still sane?"

From anyone else, that question might've sounded like a sarcastic taunt, but Gohvis' tone was one of genuine curiosity, so Jercash held back the biting retort that first came to mind in favor of something more serious. "Of course I do. It's the rest of the world that's mad."

"Mm. Or perhaps you were never sane in the first place and so have no basis from which to discern any difference."

"If that's the case, then there's no point fussing over it, now is there? I am how I've always been and clearly nothing will change that."

Jercash's gaze narrowed as he sized the other man up. "You, on the other hand, seem to be going through something... dare I say, transformative? Something that's making you behave quite strangely, at the very least."

The Monster made no response.

Jercash had to push. "What is going on in that head of yours? You went through a lot of trouble to help me out, and yet you're still acting so cagey."

"Abolish is on the verge of collapse," said Gohvis. "If I'd done nothing, the balance of power would have shifted enormously in the Vanguard's favor.”

Collapse, was it? Jercash might’ve heard a thing or two about that. He decided not to mention it yet, though, in part because Gohvis was not done.

“Your Mad Demon has his back against the wall as we speak,” said the Monster. “I went to his aid as well, but it is not looking good for him.”

Jercash’s brow twitched. “That’s news to me. Is it Sermung’s doing?”

“No. I cannot yet see all angles, but it is not him.”

That was somehow a relief and also not. For this entire war, he’d been waiting on word of Sermung’s movements to arrive. His greatest worry had been that the bastard would decide to show up here first in order to try and get a swift victory for his stooges so that they could move on to a different battlefield, but that had never happened.”

"3442

In fact, that was part of the reason he’d been so reluctant to commit his forces to any major offenses early on. He’d wanted to keep plenty of resources stocked up so that he could quickly pivot if and when Sermung showed up. He had some extra special tricks up his sleeve, reserved especially for the Crystal Titan, but if the jackass never showed himself, then what good were they? He was just saving up for a rainy day that never came.

Perhaps the jerk somehow knew. Perhaps his continued absence was intentional for exactly that reason.

With Sermung, it was impossible to know. That much, at least, was certainly intentional. Each of the emperors went to great lengths in order to prevent their actions from becoming predictable, save perhaps Morgunov, who just seemed to do it naturally.

“Who could possibly be giving Morgunov that much trouble if not Sermung?” said Jercash.

The Monster scoffed. “Truthfully? I think he may have brought it all upon himself. Though again, I am not sure.”

Well, that was... quite believable. “When you put it like that, it makes me not want to go help him.”

“You shouldn’t. You’d never reach him in time, anyway. At this point, either he survives or he doesn’t.”

“I could still do with a bit more detail, if you wouldn’t mind.”

“He’s been toying with ancient forces.”

“That’s nothing new.”

“Yes, but I think they may have found a way to toy with him back.”

“Oh?” Jercash connected the dots. “The Vanguard? You think one of these ancient forces has manipulated them against him?”

“Indeed. And by extension, against the rest of us, as well.”

“Ah... and what are these ‘forces,’ exactly?”

“Alas, I cannot tell. They are wary of my sight. Even from afar, they make great efforts to conceal themselves from me.”

His ‘sight,’ eh? Jercash had only rarely heard him mention that. No doubt, if he inquired further about it, Gohvis would refuse to elaborate, but over the long years, Jercash had been able to piece together a few clues about it.

It wasn’t aura sight--or at least, not just that. No, Jercash suspected that it was something more highly developed and powerful. Something that could see across great distances--and probably time, too.

And perhaps, even, into souls.

What that really meant, however, Jercash was not yet sure. Nor did he have any idea what the limitations of said ability might be. Clearly, the Monster was not all-knowing or all-seeing, but...

Perhaps that was the eventual goal."

"3443

Jercash paused for a deep breath as he thought about his next words. He'd largely been ignoring the magnificent snowscape that he and Gohvis were both standing in, but now he took a moment to appreciate it. These mountains. This biting wind. Cold and lifeless and terrible--but beautiful, nonetheless.

One of the perks of being so old. Being able to stand in brutal places like this, unbothered by the elements--and therefore, able to instead admire the natural wonder of the world that much more.

"Where did you bring me?" he decided to ask.

"The Ridoas."

Jercash had to stop and blink at that. The Ridoas were the most famous mountains in the world, due entirely to them being the home of the highest peak in the world, Mt. Vinayoaka.

They were also in Luugh, on the other side of the Hardwick Sea, over a thousand miles north of Kavia and Hoss.

"...Bit far to take me, don't you think?"

"We were being pursued. And you've been out for days, by the way."

Oh.

Oh no.

He groaned. "Still. If it was mountains to get lost in that you wanted, the Wares were right there next to us."

"I sent decoys there, too. Some of which are still being chased, even now."

Huh. Well, that was another thing that Jercash had already known about the Monster. His mastery over illusions. Hell, in all likelihood, the Gohvis in front of him probably wasn't the real one.

"What about my men? Do you know how many survived? Or where they are?"

"Yes, but now that you've brought that up, I am reminded of something that I must ask you, first."

"Shoot."

"What happened to Koh?"

"Hmm?" Jercash needed a second to think about that. "The dog?"

"Yes. I lent him and Germal to you when you visited my library, but I did not sense them among your forces during the battle."

"Uh..."

Huh.

That was a good question. What had happened to them? He was having trouble recalling.

In fact... when was the last time he'd seen them? Even that was hard to remember.

He'd gone through all that trouble to get them under his command, so he would've noticed if they'd just upped and disappeared.

Gohvis was right. They definitely hadn't been involved in that last battle. Hell, had they been there for any of the battles?"

"3444

"I... ah..."

"You cannot remember?"

"...No, I can't. The last thing I can recall about them is... prior to seizing control of Kavia."

"Oh," said Gohvis, sounding abruptly surprised. "So you won the Kavian civil war even without their help. Impressive."

Jercash returned a flat look. "I resent what you are implying, right now."

"It was a compliment."

"Sure it was."

"In any case, it seems they have been missing for quite some time, then. I thought perhaps they had disappeared just before your incursion into Hoss, but if it was before you even finished conquering Kavia, then..."

“Then what? Finish that sentence, please. Why are you suddenly so curious about them?”

“Does this timing not strike you as strange?” said Gohvis. “A bit too coincidental?”

Jercash saw what he was getting at.

“It has been many years since someone last tried,” said Gohvis. “Is it not about that time again?”

That time again...

Yeah, maybe it was.

This was the way with Abolish. It had almost slipped his mind altogether. Which was perhaps the whole idea behind waiting so long.

Minor coup attempts were a common enough thing. A weekly--or even daily--occurrence, at times.

But major attempts...

Well, those were considerably rarer, now weren't they? Izalog had made sure to teach him all about that long ago, when he'd begun to approach this tier of power and influence. And with the reaper's help, he'd gone even further and discovered some generational patterns, reaching a few new conclusions of his own about the nature of would-be Abolish usurpers.

Going back all the way to Abolish's inception, it occurred roughly every forty years. A major internal event.

Sometimes, it skipped a generation. Other times, it happened a bit early or late. But by and large, the pattern was consistent.

And that hadn't changed during Morgunov and Dozer's rule. Instead, the attempts had simply failed every time.

There were several reasons why he and the others were not trying to wrest power away from those two. For some of them, like Jercash, they just didn't think it was worth the risk. This position was already quite the lofty one--and in some ways, more desirable than the zenith.

For others, though, it was because, time and again, they'd personally seen what became of those who tried.

And then, of course, there were still others, like Gohvis, who were just total enigmas, perhaps too interested in their hobbies or obsessions to care about things like ruling.

But at this point, Jercash supposed that type of mindset was now a bit outdated."

"3445

Because who all was near the top, these days? Just him, Gohvis, and Vanderberk.

Which reminded him.

"Do you know Vanderberk's current status?"

"Dead," said Gohvis.

Well, fuck. "How?"

"The Hawk got to him."

Graves, huh? Damn that bastard.

Truthfully, a part of Jercash had been expecting this. It was only a few years ago that the Hawk had been hunting the Weasel down--and not being very subtle about it, either. Jercash had to go to great lengths in order to protect Vanderberk, which eventually deterred Graves. Or seemed to.

With the death of Gunther and Dunhouser earlier in the year, Jercash's plan had been to keep Vanderberk close to him while he taught him a few things. But with Morgunov starting this war out of nowhere, Jercash had been forced to let Vanderberk go off on his own.

He'd told the stubborn son of a bitch to head for one of the Melmoorian fronts, but did he listen? Of course not. He wasn't afraid of Graves. The idiot never got it through his thick head that Jercash had been protecting him during their previous encounters with the Hawk.

Agh.

So much effort wasted.

Not that this was the first time.

"I have a feeling that you will see Vanderberk again, however," said Gohvis. "So if you do, do not be fooled."

"Hmm? What do you mean?"

"Already, it appears that the Hawk is pretending not to have killed him. He even tried to convince me that he would just capture him, instead."

"Why would he do that?"

"Because he intends to make use of his corpse in some way. As some manner of puppet, perhaps."

Double fuck. "That's some of the worst news I've heard in a long time. Are you sure about that?"

"Moderately. It is an educated guess. You do know that Graves is an illusionist, yes?"

"No. I did not know that. I would've warned Vanderberk about that ahead of time, if I did."

"Ah. Mm."" A beat passed. ""Too bad."

Jercash shook his head and sighed. "Gohvis... while I'm grateful for all this sudden assistance, I also can't help noticing that it's just a bit late. Is there a particular reason why you're only telling me all of this now?"

"Yes."

And when the Monster offered no further elaboration, Jercash deduced the rest on his own. "But you're not going to tell me what it is."

"Yes.""

"3446

"You're the worst friend I've ever had, y'know that?" said Jercash.

"I highly doubt that," said Gohvis.

He was right again, of course, but Jercash wasn't about to give him the satisfaction of admitting it. He took a deep breath as he began to reassess their situation. "Alright, well, what are your plans moving forward? Do you intend to be more involved in this war now? Or is this it for you?"

"The tide has already shifted against us," said Gohvis. "I don't see much point in prolonging this conflict. We should pull all of our forces back and focus on recouping our losses."

That didn't exactly answer his questions, but Jercash was also not surprised by the Monster's opinion here. "You were never in favor of this war in the first place."

"Nor were you."

"True. But I'm also a very sore loser."

"You'll be much worse than sore if you pursue this much further. Neither Morgunov nor Dozer will come to our aid."

Jercash actually perked up at that. "Oh? 'Our,' you say? So you'll actually be sticking with me, then?"

"That depends. Will my staying incentivize you to do something stupid?"

Jercash barked a sudden laugh. Gohvis may have been playing coy, but he could tell that the dragon man had no intention of abandoning him here.

Finally, some good news after so much bad.

Jercash took a moment to regain his composure. "Well," he said, "what if I told you that I didn't plan on winning, any longer."

"Mm?"

"What if I just wanted to go and give the Vanguard one last kick in the testicles before calling it quits?"

Gohvis fell quiet for a time. "...Have you actually formulated a new plan of action, already? Or are you just saying that to amuse me?"

He laughed again, more faintly this time. "Oh, I've got something alright." More than just one thing, in truth, though he wasn't yet decided on which he wanted to go for.

"Elaborate."

Ah. He'd have to choose right away, it seemed.

Hmm.

Well, which one would Gohvis appreciate the most?

Oho. When he thought of it like that, the answer was abruptly obvious.

"When was the last time you met Lozaro?"

The Monster paused for a rare look of genuine surprise. "You have Lozaro?"

"That's right."

"For how long?"

He snickered. "The whole time. He came to me for protection straight away."

"3447

"Your boss will not be happy with you if he learns about this," said Gohvis.

"Eh, maybe," said Jercash. "But a part me think he'd be too excited to get angry with me. Either way, I'm not handing Lozaro over to him. Guy's too valuable."

"Why did he come to you for protection?"

"Heh. Well, it wasn't like he had many options. Couldn't exactly go to the Vanguard after all he'd done, and Sai-hee isn't particularly fond of him, either."

"That's not what I was getting at."

"Hmm? Oh, you meant why didn't he go to you!" Jercash broke for another laugh. "Don't be jealous, pal! I'm sure you were his next choice!"

"How puerile."

"That's rich, coming from you. Look, if you want people to approach you with these sorts of things, then you have to be more approachable. Get it? This whole scary-dragon thing you've got going on is cool 'n all, but it invariably has its costs, y'know?"

"...Are you blackmailing him?" said Gohvis.

"What? No. How would I even do that? Everyone already knows he's one of the evilest dudes in the world. And I'm pretty sure there's precisely nothing and no one that he loves in that cold, black heart of his. Hell, sometimes, I think he even hates the very knowledge that he spends so much time trying to amass, strange as that might sound."

"You're holding him prisoner, then."

"Excuse me, but I'm quite capable of acquiring new subordinates without resorting to such things. He's with me of his own free will, thank you very much."

"Hmph."

"Speaking of my subordinates, how many of them survived the battle? Tell me where they are, already."

Gohvis exhaled a deep breath and began trudging through the snow, heading in the direction of the nearest mountain slope. "I will take you to them."

Jercash just stood there and watched him for a second before following. "Y-you're not... you're not actually going to walk, right? At this snail's pace?"

"...I'm thinking about it."

"Wow. How is it that so many people have come to look at you as their new lord and savior? Do you think they'd have a change of heart if they learned that the real you is just a giant baby?"

"Do you think your followers would have a change of heart if they learned that the real you is just more lucky than smart?"

"That's not an insult. I'm incredibly smart, and yet I'm even more lucky than that! Where's the downside, huh?"

"I should've let them kill you."

"...A big, fat, dragon baby."

"Shut up."
"3448 -- CCLXXXIX.

Chapter Two Hundred Eighty-Nine: 'O, tempted Star...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

A small stack of papers slipped off the steel desk and splattered across the metal floor.

Jackson clutched his chest as the all-too-familiar pain shot through him anew. He grit his teeth and growled as he gripped the edge of the desk and tried not to fall out of his chair again. Flames whispered into life at the edge of his fingers, scoring the otherwise silvery metal.

Sudden and debilitating, that's what this pain was. And if he had Hyozen numb it for him, then something else would go wrong. A hand would stop listening to him. Or a leg. Or an eye.

By now, he knew what the cause was, but in those first days after the disaster at Uego, he thought the blasted Mad Demon might have genuinely cursed him, somehow.

At times, he wondered if a curse might have been preferable. Having his body infested with nanomachines that were apparently programmed to torture him for the rest of his life? That didn't seem like the more pleasant option.

He'd heard back from the Magician, who had managed to get his hands on various samples of Morgunov's work, and apparently, there were multiple different iterations of these damn nanobots in play around the world, at the moment.

"The ones that have a hold of you are the worst of the worst, by far," the Magician of Light had told him over a satellite call. "They're parasitizing not just your body but your soul, as well. That's why you can't just have Hyozen regrow your body from scratch and be rid of them. They will be regrown with you."

Jackson had been hoping for a solution from the Magician, but as of yet, all he'd gotten was an explanation. He tried not to let his disappointment with the man show too much on his face, but he probably hadn't succeeded. It was hard to even think straight, oftentimes, much less control his emotions.

Agh. Poor Xander. He didn't need Jackson piling more pressure on him, right now.

The Magician of Light had been having a rough go of it himself since the outbreak of this war--and indeed, since long before it started, too. Xander's success as a younger man had come back to haunt him, it seemed. When people started calling him the ""Brain of the Vanguard"" or the ""most brilliant integrator since Skapa,"" they probably didn't realize the enormity of the burden that they were placing upon the young genius' shoulders."

"3448 -- CCLXXXIX.

Chapter Two Hundred Eighty-Nine: 'O, tempted Star...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

A small stack of papers slipped off the steel desk and splattered across the metal floor.

Jackson clutched his chest as the all-too-familiar pain shot through him anew. He grit his teeth and growled as he gripped the edge of the desk and tried not to fall out of his chair again. Flames whispered into life at the edge of his fingers, scoring the otherwise silvery metal.

Sudden and debilitating, that's what this pain was. And if he had Hyozen numb it for him, then something else would go wrong. A hand would stop listening to him. Or a leg. Or an eye.

By now, he knew what the cause was, but in those first days after the disaster at Uego, he thought the blasted Mad Demon might have genuinely cursed him, somehow.

At times, he wondered if a curse might have been preferable. Having his body infested with nanomachines that were apparently programmed to torture him for the rest of his life? That didn't seem like the more pleasant option.

He'd heard back from the Magician, who had managed to get his hands on various samples of Morgunov's work, and apparently, there were multiple different iterations of these damn nanobots in play around the world, at the moment.

""The ones that have a hold of you are the worst of the worst, by far,"" the Magician of Light had told him over a satellite call. ""They're parasitizing not just your body but your soul, as well. That's why you can't just have Hyozen regrow your body from scratch and be rid of them. They will be regrown with you.""

Jackson had been hoping for a solution from the Magician, but as of yet, all he'd gotten was an explanation. He tried not to let his disappointment with the man show too much on his face, but he probably hadn't succeeded. It was hard to even think straight, oftentimes, much less control his emotions.

Agh. Poor Xander. He didn't need Jackson piling more pressure on him, right now.

The Magician of Light had been having a rough go of it himself since the outbreak of this war--and indeed, since long before it started, too. Xander's success as a younger man had come back to haunt him, it seemed. When people started calling him the ""Brain of the Vanguard"" or the ""most brilliant integrator since Skapa,"" they probably didn't realize the enormity of the burden that they were placing upon the young genius' shoulders."

"3449

Now, well over a century later, people didn't say those things anymore. Instead, they whispered behind the Magician's back. Jackson had heard them many times. Talking about what a disappointment their ""best and brightest"" was against the likes of the Mad Demon. Talking about how incompetent or arrogant he must be, despite almost certainly having never met him.

Jackson hated the idea that, in his own moment of weakness, he might have added fuel to the inferno of self-doubt that he knew brewed within Xander Ulsmith. He was supposed to be a source of inspiration and encouragement for Xander, not the opposite.

He pushed the pain back down. Or rather, his perception of it.

Mind over matter. The age-old trick.

He'd been through fifteen surgeries in the last few months. And the first ones, at least, had certainly helped. But now, they were starting to seem like a waste of time.

That was probably because the Surgeon Saint had conducted the first ones and then handed the project off to others once Jackson had begun to improve. Perhaps that man really was his best hope.

Jackson didn't blame him for stepping away, though. Fen Frederick had been instrumental to the Vanguard's success in Melmoore. Jackson couldn't justify keeping the man here in Intar for no other reason than his own personal convenience.

Plus, there was Project Blacksong to consider. Fen had his own involvement in that. And it was imminent.

Or had it already occurred?

Ugh.

His head throbbed again, despite his efforts.

Dammit. The slightest slip in concentration was enough to bring it back.

If this kept on indefinitely, he didn't know what he would do.

Well.

Then again...

That wasn't entirely true, now was it?

No, of course, the actual truth of the matter was that he already knew exactly what he needed to do.

He just didn't want to accept it.

"Stop," said Jackson through closed eyes and clenched teeth.

Still, he resisted. Of course he did. That was his nature. A part of what made him such a worthy vessel.

"Shut up."

No one was saying anything to him. No one but the silent voice in his head that he hated listening to, despite everything that it had given him.

“Given,” he echoed, his voice thick with resentment. “Everything you’ve ‘given’ me has come with a price. Don’t pretend otherwise.”

Well, that was one way of seeing things. The wrong way, but a way, nonetheless.”

"3450

Jackson just growled to the empty room around him. The pain was beginning to abate, but that might have been a result of his irritation more than anything else.

The voice in his head was not like that of a reaper. It was not distinct from himself. It was an inseparable part of him. And he knew it. He liked to pretend otherwise, to act as though these thoughts were not already his own, but deep down, he knew the truth. It was really just a matter of time until he finally gave in.

Or died.

In vain, most likely. Which would be a real shame, wouldn't it? When he absolutely had the power to make this problem go away.

To make all his problems go away.

Jackson clutched his forehead and tried to steady his breath, as if doing so would help steady his mind, too.

“Please,” he said, more weary than angry now. “Please, just give me peace...”

He already had peace, of course, so this made no sense. He was just being his own worst enemy, as often seemed to be the case.

Nonetheless, the part of him that knew better decided to relent. To let him return to his comfortable denial.

For a while longer, anyway.

When Jackson opened his eyes again, he saw that he had sunken all the way down to the floor without realizing it.

Agh.

How much time had he just lost? Hopefully not much. He checked his phone and was relieved to see that it had indeed only been a few minutes.

He took another deep breath and stood up.

Dull aches still lingered across his body, but at least his head felt clear again.

He found the papers that had fallen to the floor and took small comfort in the fact that he had not accidentally incinerated any of them, this time. That was something, at least. A bit of hope that perhaps he truly was regaining more and more control over himself as time went on.

It was hard to have too much confidence in that theory, though. Especially when those intrusive thoughts sometimes felt like they were growing stronger, too.

The intrusive thoughts of Avar, the so-called God of Fire.

Jackson had come to learn quite a lot about this new passenger of his. That was one of the reasons why he'd decided to come to Intar. The work of the archivers here rivaled even that of those in Luugh.

That, and he was on better terms with these ones."

"3451

Even these archivers might not be so forgiving, though, if he accidentally incinerated some of these priceless tomes. Hell, he might not even forgive himself if that happened.

But he'd needed to learn more about this Avar character. And about what it truly meant to become a "vessel" for a supposed Primordial.

Unfortunately, none of what he'd learned had made things any simpler. In a way, it might've been better if the stories about Avar had all been terrible, because at least that would have made everything clearer. But no. The tales were wildly varied. In some of them, Avar was a benevolent force for good--a warm, nurturing figure who went to great lengths in order to foster and protect those who'd found themselves in dire straits.

One such story told of how Avar bestowed the Secrets of Fire upon the Aruni--theorized by some to have been the first homo sapiens--teaching them how to wield it safely for warmth, cooking, and warding off deadly monsters. It told of how Avar quarreled with other gods, who thought him too enamored with humanity, too generous with his gifts and teaching.

But other stories were more brutal, telling woeful tales of destruction. Of Avar's flames becoming all-consuming, razing entire cities in a single night.

Such as the Tale of Vanwa. In it, Vanwa is a fishing village under siege from a larger village to the north. It is being raided constantly and having its goods stolen. And when Avar arrives--named Avarith in this story--he teaches the villagers of Vanwa to wield a magical form of fire so that they might defend themselves from their oppressors and protect what they rightfully own.

Which they do. And so Avarith departs, satisfied with the results.

But he returns many years later and discovers that Vanwa has become the oppressor. Where it was once a humble village, now it is a fortress town, possessed of a powerful military that uses the magic he gave them to subjugate its neighbors.

Incensed, he destroys Vanwa utterly, leaving not a single soul alive, not even the children.

And those were only the extreme examples. There were many others that fell somewhere inbetween, where Avar--or whatever the incarnation of him was being called--did not come across as good or bad, but rather just neutral.

It left Jackson feeling uncertain in all sorts of ways.

This business about "incarnations" was particularly curious, he felt."
"3452

From what he'd been able to learn--both from archived sources and from his passenger directly--each incarnation was a distinct entity. They all had their own views and personalities that set them apart from those that came before--perhaps even because of those that had come before.

Because Avar was the throughline that connected each new incarnation. According to him, he remembered all of his previous lives and therefore possessed their accumulated wisdom.

Wisdom which he was offering to share with Jackson.

The only problem being that Jackson, as he currently knew himself, would disappear into a newly merged entity. A new incarnation.

How, exactly, Avar had managed to get into his head in the first place, Jackson was still not entirely sure.

This voice speaking to him was certainly a new development, but truthfully, Jackson was beginning to wonder if Avar might not have been quite as “new” of a passenger as he’d first thought.

He wondered if, in fact, Avar might have been with him, silently, for a very long time already.

Perhaps since even before he’d met Hyozen and become a servant.

Because what had prompted Avar’s sudden arrival? The emergence at Jesbol? Why would that have done it? What sense did that make?

Not that things were making much sense, these days.

At the very least, it seemed clear that the emergence had been what brought this voice on. And these... memories. Ones that didn’t belong to him. Those hadn’t been there before, either.

It was to the point, even, where Jackson wasn’t always sure of what he was saying. Like only moments ago, when he told the voice that everything he’d been given had come with a price.

What price? What had he been given?

He felt like he knew the answers to those questions, and yet... he couldn’t quite put his finger on them. It was like he’d forgotten something but that it was also just on the tip of his tongue. If he could only remember.

Frustrating.

Meditation helped, though. He’d been neglecting that practice for years--decades, even--but he was suddenly finding it quite helpful again.

Calming. Relieving. Giving him a bit of the peace he was in such dire need of. If only for a little while.

Yes.

Yes, perhaps Avar had been with him for a very long time, indeed.

Because for as long as he could remember, Jackson had always felt a kind of second presence in his mind. Not a voice, of course, until now. Never anything so clear as that. Or so unsettling, either."

"3453

Rather, he'd always thought of it as what people meant when they talked about one's "conscience." A guiding principle, of sorts. Something that seemed to have a life of its own.

But if that were the case, then wouldn't that mean that Avar truly was a benevolent force? That Avar had been quietly helping him discern right from wrong his whole life?

Mm.

Wouldn't that be nice?

Jackson was too skeptical, though. The more he thought about it, the more he was realizing that the simple truth of the matter here was that he did not trust Avar. Judging from both the folk tales of the Fire God and from Avar's own admissions to him, it was clear that Avar's past incarnations were very flawed beings.

And sure, perhaps that had been the human half corrupting the godly half, but wasn't it equally possible that Avar himself was the problem? He was the only common denominator, after all.

And ultimately, that was why Jackson was so resistant. It wasn't just about holding onto his own sense of self. It was about ensuring that he did not become some new, tyrannical incarnation.

Because he knew that he could. That was absolutely possible. And he would've been an utter fool to think otherwise, to think he was too strong of character or noble of heart to ever allow himself to go down that path.

Hell, even without someone threatening to meld minds with him, the temptation to tyranny was plenty strong enough.

That was a lesson he'd thankfully learned relatively early in his career as a Vanguardian. Sermung had made sure to impress it upon him over the course of many lectures and elaborate field studies.

"Above all, we must refuse the call to conquer," said the Crystal Titan, once upon a time. "Down that road lies all manner of sweet songs and alluring rationalizations. Appeals to reason. Appeals to emotion. Appeals to ego. Appeals to simplicity. To tradition, even. But that is not us. We are defenders. We are the ones who stand against the conquerors and tell them that the world is not theirs. And if ever we forget that, then it will only be a matter of time until we become our own worst enemy."

Jackson believed that sentiment wholeheartedly. Believed in its importance. And in its reality.

Over the course of his life, there had been many times when he'd felt the exact "call" that Sermung had been referring to. The temptation to just... solve everything himself."

"3454

The complexity of the world was partially to blame for that, he felt. When things got messy. And tedious. And exhausting. That was when the temptation to "simplify" often arrived.

He didn't want to imagine how strong such temptations might be after becoming one with a "god."

His ego didn't need that kind of boost. It was hard enough to remain humble, already.

Though, his current circumstances were certainly helping in that regard. He hadn't felt this pathetic in quite some time.

While it was true that he'd never wanted to be a part of Project Blacksong, it was still tough being stuck here while everyone else was out there fighting so hard.

With so many of their leaders captured, it was impossible to deny the importance of Blacksong, right now. If things didn't go well... if they suffered another major loss here...

Not to worry.

Abolish was getting absolutely hammered, and not just by the Vanguard.

Jackson stopped and blinked again. Where had that thought come from? Avar?

Silliness. Still making a distinction when there was none. The information was already there. Available to him. If he would just allow himself to see--

Jackson cut the notion off with a shake of his head. Enough.

He returned to his papers. There were plenty to go through. Thankfully, even in his current state, he could still make himself useful.

And it was calming work, too. Perhaps because he'd never really grown out of those early years as an accountant. If anything, his passion for thorough record-keeping and organizational beauty had only ever seemed to grow stronger, much to the chagrin of many of his subordinates and contemporaries.

Where they all saw tedium and hassle, Jackson saw a slow, wonderful march toward perfection. So slow, perhaps, that it might not always make it there, but that was okay. Steady progress was itself satisfying.

For the life of him, he'd never been able to understand why so few others felt the way he did. So many of them wanted to skirt the rules, spend their time on "more important things," or otherwise avoid "busywork."

Meanwhile, this was what kept everyone accountable for their actions. And what kept everything operating.

Very few things were more important than that. In fact, maybe nothing was.

The logistics of this war were certainly nothing to take for granted. At the very least, he was glad for the opportunity to go over everything personally."

"3455

While he did trust the officers to do their jobs properly--especially since he'd appointed or promoted almost all of them himself--it was still good to take a hands-on approach with these sorts of things, from time to time. If he didn't, then he might begin to lose his touch.

And on this particular occasion, all this paperwork was helping to give him a better view of the war effort than perhaps anyone else in the world, right now.

Thus far, the war front in the best logistical position was clearly the defense of northern Melmoore against Ostra, though the southern defense against Corrico was a close second.

Most of the public credit for that seemed to be going to the Surgeon Saint, and judging from the books here, that wasn't undeserved.

In fact, most of these invoices had been signed by Fen personally. Jackson also noticed copies of numerous handwritten letters by the man, sprinkled among all the accounting records. Each one was providing detailed instructions to his men about where to go next, what to do, and how to do it. He gave information on enemy movements, their numbers, and their access to local resources.

Oil seemed to be of particular concern to Fen. And with good reason, of course. That region was famous for its oil reserves and mining operations, so keeping Abolish off of those deposits was an understandable priority.

It hadn't taken long for Jackson to begin questioning how Fen was acquiring his information. Usually, such impressive intel was an indication that Sparrows were being deployed, totally unimpeded by the enemy.

But Fen didn't have command over a team of Sparrows. Or not at first, anyway. Jackson had since sent him one, which indeed only improved things further.

And... maybe he'd also wanted that team to report back to him on Fen himself. To answer that important question about how the Saint was pulling off these not-so-minor miracles.

The answer, according to the team, was something quite unexpected.

Fen had somehow acquired for himself a privileged status within the Old Wardens.

A prestigious reaper enclave. In fact, the prestigious reaper enclave. The most famous one, to which many reapers in the world longed to become a part of.

And so Fen had been using this newfound status as leverage to turn enemy reapers away from Abolish with the promise that they could one day join."

"3456

Whether Fen could actually keep such a promise, Jackson was not sure. The Old Wardens were notorious throughout history for various reasons, not the least of which was their tendency to exile people from their community.

They were a curious bunch, to be sure. At various points, their reputation had gotten them into quite a bit of hot water, usually from excommunicated members looking to find a way back in or to simply take revenge.

Fairly recently, in fact, there'd been some confusion over whether or not they still existed. Rumors abounded that they'd been wiped out entirely, purportedly by some other enclave that they'd been feuding with for centuries.

None of that bad publicity ever seemed to impact their allure, though. Hell, it might've even helped it, in some ways.

Jackson couldn't say that he fully understood the appeal, but then, he'd never personally visited the Old Wardens and seen what all the fuss was about with his own eyes. He'd only heard about the supposed wonders that they kept all to themselves.

Libraries and debate parlors. Research institutes and theaters. Pools of ethereal water that even reapers could bathe in and enjoy. And countless guarded secrets that even exiled members had not been privy to.

Hyozen, for his part, was one of the reapers who was not particularly impressed.

'If even half of the things said about them are true,' the reaper had told him once, 'then their isolationism is the cruelest of insults to the rest of the world. Keeping such intellectual riches to themselves would serve no other purpose than to empower the few at the expense of the many.'

But then, Hyozen had also originated from a rival enclave, so his views weren't exactly surprising.

'Moreover,' the reaper had gone on, 'their exclusivity is extreme even by enclave standards. And whom does that serve? Not the world, certainly. The entire purpose of enclaves is to provide a safe environment for reaper families to nurture new generations in order to stave off our ever-dwindling numbers in the world at large. But if they never leave their enclave, then that purpose is moot.'

How Fen had managed to earn his way into their good graces, Jackson very much wanted to know. Assuming that was actually the truth, of course. Fen certainly wasn't the type to lie, but it was still rather hard to believe.

If it was a lie, though, then whatever house of cards that man had been building over there wasn't likely to last for much longer.

Which would at least be interesting to see, Jackson supposed. He just hoped it wouldn't be because of how disastrous it ended up."

"3457

Regardless, that was a problem for another day. The other war fronts were in greater need of attention.

The defense of Hoss had started out horrifically, of course. The death of Carson was a blow that would not soon be forgotten, even if Kane and Grant seemed to have gotten things back under control. With Jercash's forces routed, it was possible that not only Hoss had been saved but also Kavia, as well.

Jackson was hesitant about that conclusion, however.

Jercash had been in Kavia for months. By all reports, he and his men had had free reign in the capital, doing whatever the hell they pleased.

While it was possible that all they'd done during that time was celebrate their victory, Jackson had known Jercash for quite some time, now. And that man was not one to let an opportunity go to waste.

For that reason, Jackson had been taking an extra interest over there, keeping in constant contact with not only Kane and Grant but also many of their men.

The two of them didn't always appreciate that. And he understood why, of course. Especially lately. His peers didn't want him acting like their superior and ordering their men around.

Oddly enough, though, his poor condition seemed to be helping in that regard. He noticed the two of them behaving more empathetically toward him, if only a little. They probably realized that he wasn't about to usurp or upstage anyone while he was in this state.

Hmm. Or maybe they were just worried about him. As much as they butted heads, it was sometimes easy to forget that they were all still the oldest of friends, when it came down to it.

How odd.

The Vantalayan war fronts were all sorts of curious. While he couldn't say that Graves had mishandled things over there, it was certainly a mess and a half to keep track of. And it didn't help that, out of all the marshals, Graves was the worst about keeping up with proper documentation.

Jackson had chastised him countless times and appointed dozens of secretaries and accountants over the years to help him manage everything, but it never seemed to do much good. Jackson didn't think he'd ever met someone so disorganized. How that man's divisions managed to get anything done at all, Jackson still did not know."

"3458

But from what sparse reporting Graves' men had given, Vantalay seemed to be largely secured now. Abolish was on the backfoot after Graves routed Vanderberk's forces. Apparently, the Weasel himself managed to escape, thanks to the last-second intervention of Gohvis.

As ever, the Monster's movements were a surprise. Jackson never could figure out when that son of a bitch would actually do something. He'd been dormant for so long that it seemed like the rest of the world had all but forgotten about him.

And now he was making international headlines again, though most of the news outlets apparently didn't know that he was the reason behind all the volcanic eruptions.

It pained Jackson all the more to be on the sidelines, right now. He had to wonder if that had factored into the Monster's reasoning.

Probably. Morgunov must have told him something about it. Or perhaps he'd just known. In that obnoxious way of his.

Jackson knew he needed to stop dwelling on it. Whenever he allowed himself to think about Gohvis, he again felt that temptation welling up. That inner voice telling him to let it all go. To just embrace Avar's power and go set the world to rights.

Mrgh.

Bastard.

Of all the times to reemerge. They were long overdue for another fight.

No. He had to calm himself.

The war front in Sair was the worst off, and that was of course due to his own failure. His attempts to restructure things in the defense of the Wetlands had not gone over terribly well. They just didn't have enough men left who could lead in the field. Without that, it was all the more difficult to strike that already tough balance of protecting civilian lives and also communication and supply lines.

Honestly, it was a wonder that Sair wasn't already conquered. Apart from a few minor victories here and there, the remaining Vanguard forces had been in constant retreat. Jackson didn't understand why Bloodeye hadn't been pushing harder. It was like he was distracted.

Perhaps with the Sandlords? Reports about them were scant in detail, but it did seem unlikely that they would have been entirely defeated so quickly. They might have been giving him hell as best they could, still.

If only the scouts could make contact with them. Even just being able to confirm their survival would mean so much, right now."

"3459

The Sandlords had such a long and turbulent history. The idea that they might have been snuffed out as a result of his own inability to keep them safe...

Ugh.

He was being irrational again. Thinking the weight of the world rested squarely upon his shoulders. How silly. When it was obviously much more complicated than that.

And yet, also not. Because really, if he was so curious about their whereabouts, he could simply begin asking the right questions.

What?

Yes. The right questions. Of the world.

No.

Of Avar.

He growled.

His stubbornness wasn't doing anyone any favors, least of all the innocent civilians that he so wished to protect. If he was true to his convictions, then--

A knock at the metal door arrived, pulling him out of his own head.

"What is it?" he said loudly, trying to keep his voice steady.

"Sir, ah--Senator Jacobson is here to see you."

He blinked. Jacobson? Out of the blue? Well, there was no point in thinking about it. While he might've been past the stage where he was afraid of accidentally harming those around him, he was still in no state to be hosting civilian guests. "Tell him I'm sorry but that I'm not taking visitors at this time."

"Ah--he's, er--very insistent, sir..."

He rubbed his forehead. Well, maybe it would be okay. "What does he want?"

"...‘To discuss foreign policy,’ he says."

Oh boy.

This was hardly the first time that a political leader had come knocking at his door, and there'd been various points in his life where he'd grown quite comfortable in the presence of such people.

It had been a while, though. Even disregarding his questionable mental state, he still felt a bit rusty.

But that name. Jacobson, huh? It was hard to keep track of all these Intarian senators, especially when so many of them didn't keep their positions for more than a few years, so the fact that he actually recognized this one was saying something.

He took a deep breath. "Alright, show him in."

"Yes, sir."

Maybe he was being an idiot. Or maybe this would be exactly the kind of distraction he needed, right now. He honestly couldn't tell.

When the door opened, a middle-aged man in a sharp suit walked through while smiling graciously at Delilah, Jackson's secretary, who closed the door behind him."

"3460

"Thank you for seeing me on such short notice," said the senator, offering a handshake. "I know how busy you folk are."

Jackson didn't forget his manners and shook it.

You 'folk,' was it? These days, all of the politicians were well-acquainted with the Vanguard, but Jackson was not in the habit of meeting with any of them personally. He typically left that sort of thing to his men.

Most of those men were currently quite busy fighting a war or being held prisoner, though.

"It's a bit strange for you to be dropping by unannounced like this, no?" said Jackson.

The man gave an airy laugh. "Strange is one word for it, I suppose. Persistent would be another. I've been trying to arrange a meeting with you for months. These last two weeks, I've resorted to coming here almost every single day in hopes of bumping into you."

That was news to Jackson. "Is that so? My secretary never mentioned that."

"Really? I'm sure she must have seen me. And taken my team's calls."

"Mm," hummed Jackson. "Perhaps I should have a talk with her after this." And maybe give her a raise.

"Ah, no--don't be too harsh on her on my account," said Jacobson. "I'm sure it just slipped her mind."

Jackson gave a laugh of his own. "Gracious of you." He welcomed the man over to his desk so that they could both sit down.

What an old and familiar feeling. This stilted politeness. Appearances, appearances. Worry, worry, ever weary.

Politicians. He supposed he counted as one, himself.

Maybe he wasn't as rusty as he thought.

"She said you wanted to talk foreign policy," said Jackson.

"Ah--straight to the point, then. I appreciate that. Yes, sir, I did indeed wish to discuss the matter of this so-called Second Continental War going on, among other things."

"Sounds like a long conversation."

"Might be, might be. Although--well, ah, actually--how familiar are you with Intar's official position regarding the war?"

He had to think a moment. It seemed rather obvious, so he was wondering if there was something he was missing. "Officially, you are neutral, yes?"

"Yes, but... everyone also knows that we are not truly so, since we are still providing considerable aid to one side. And the pressure has been mounting to make some sort of... formal announcement regarding our stance, one way or another."

"Okay."

At that, Jacobson hesitated.

But Jackson just waited. He did not see how any of this was relevant to him, nor did he wish to try and read into the other man's intentions, just yet."

"3461

Jacobson took a deliberate breath and shook his head, then offered another smile. "Perhaps I already seem like I am beating around the bush. Allow me to be quite blunt with you, then, Master Jackson. Ultimately, what I am getting at... is that I believe public support for your war would be much easier to achieve if the Vanguard took on a more visible role in the eyes of the people."

"Visible," Jackson echoed flatly.

"Yes," the senator went on. "And believe me, sir. I know how my words must sound, especially to one so old as yourself. The prattling of a pampered ignoramus. Or the badgering of an attention-seeking opportunist, perhaps. I know these labels and views of me well. But, sir, the only thing I want is to help bring this continental war to a swift conclusion before it grows any worse."

How noble. "There have been times in the past when we have taken on such a role as you are suggesting," said Jackson.

"Oh, I am aware, sir. The history of your legendary group has been of great interest to me since I was a child."

"Then perhaps you are also aware of the reasons why we no longer do so."

"I am aware of various arguments, yes. As I am also aware of counters to those arguments. Which I would like to provide, if you would be so kind as to hear me out."

Oh, boy. Here we go. He had to hold back a sigh. "I feel as though I might be able to save us both quite a bit of time here by simply telling you 'no.'"

"Saving time, sure. Saving lives, though? That is the more pressing matter, surely."

"With respect, Senator, if you think it is that simple of a dichotomy, then you are even more ignorant than I feared."

"Hah. Not simple, no. Not at all. But important, nonetheless. I understand your trepidation completely, sir. You do not wish to become an appendage of some bloated empire again, to have your reputation strangled and tarnished by some bureaucratic contract."

"Well, in the past, it was more of an autocratic contract that gave us trouble, but yes, that is one of the major issues."

"Ah, indeed, indeed. But I am not here to try and 'bring you into the fold,' as it were. No, I think the Vanguard is just fine where it is. Independent of any government. Beholden to none but itself. What I am offering, sir, is simply attention. Eyes. On this war of yours."
"3462

Jackson's brow tilted a little. "Disregarding for a moment how that might needlessly complicate all of our lives... why do you want this? What do you stand to gain from shining a light on our operations?"

"Me?" said Jacobson, pausing a moment as if he had genuinely not even considered that question, which must've surely been a facade. "Well... um... hmm. I suppose if things go smoothly, like I am hoping they will, then the credit for it all might be traced back to me, but that's really neither here nor there. Especially because one should never assume that things will go smoothly. In fact, this may very well blow up in my face and cause me no end of political trouble."

Now Jackson was truly confused. "I'm even less certain of your motives, now. Which is not something I can abide, Senator."

Jacobson held up both hands and bowed his head a little. "I understand. Fair is fair. But I am not sure how to explain my motives here without coming across as an over-eager, self-righteous fool. Or a liar. So..." He scratched his chin. "I suppose I should just stop trying and let you think what you will."

Jackson just waited.

"This war of yours," the man went on, "it's a rare one. A truly... just one. That's not something that can often be said. The world is messy, and typically, there are many reasonable arguments to be found on both sides of any given conflict. Or at least, that's the modern way of thinking that we Intarians have bought into."

Ah. Finally, Jackson was starting to get the picture.

"If we could show the people the truth of this fight, of the brave men and women involved in it, and of the justness of your cause, then I think popular sentiment about Intarian neutrality could begin to shift in favor of intervention. And then we could bring things to a swift conclusion. For the sake of all Eloa."

Jackson's gaze drifted away from the other man, but he still nodded with a degree of understanding. Truthfully, such an offer was not something he should refuse, regardless of how he might feel about the circumstances of its arrival. Whether Jacobson was being truthful about his intentions or not almost didn't matter, if it meant that full Intarian backing was on the table.

The only thing giving him pause was the fact that it was already a bit late in the game for this kind of thing. Would such support be necessary? Hell, would it even arrive in time?"

"3463

Of course, there was also the matter of having some sort of media entourage following his men around the battlefield. Unless the senator had some other strategy in mind. Jackson supposed he needed clarification on that point before anything else.

"How, exactly, would you intend to go about 'showing the truth of this fight' to your people?" he asked.

“Oh, I had various ideas in mind. Camera crews, for one. They would be key in capturing what is really going on out there. And I think enlisting the help of a number of skilled documentarians would be quite helpful, as well. Someone needs to not just see what is happening but also piece it all together into a coherent message. And thirdly, I would ask that you appoint someone to become the new face of your organization. Or perhaps more than one person. A small team of public representatives who can regularly meet with average citizens and answer questions. Do television appearances and so forth. Might you have someone like that in mind already? Individuals who handle themselves well under spotlight and scrutiny?”

Indeed, several names came readily to mind. He was not about to bring them up so quickly, though. “And what if you go through all this trouble, set all these things in motion, only for the war to suddenly end, a week from now? Or even tomorrow, hypothetically?”

Jacobson broke for a laugh. “Well, that would hardly be cause for disappointment, now would it? Such a quick resolution to the hostilities? Why, a celebration would be in order, I should think! In which case, what better way to go about it than to give very public credit where credit is due?”

Ah.

Yeah.

This fellow was definitely a politician alright.

The man paused for another mild laugh before continuing on. “Forgive me if I am presuming overmuch, but I am getting the strange impression that you, sir, do not fully realize just how curious the general public is about you and your people. But surely, I must be mistaken, yes? I can only imagine the countless offers you must have gotten over the years from the folks out of Bellvine or Windreach to make motion pictures out of various legendary Vanguardian exploits. I always thought it curious how there weren’t more of such things. Have you been turning them down? If so, then I must say, that is a shame.””
"3464

Boy, this guy sure could talk. “We’ve had a bit of trouble with that in the past, as well. Our policy has typically been one of flat refusal.”

“Aha, I see. What kind of trouble did you have, if you don’t mind me asking?”

“The misinformation kind,” said Jackson. “Filmmakers often have an unfortunate lack of care when it comes to depictions of the truth. Providing entertainment has too often been the only thing important to them. Which is fine, when dealing with entirely fictional stories, but not when it comes to representing my men to millions or even billions of people.”

“I understand completely. You are protective of your comrades. As any good commander should be. But I can assure you that I hold nothing but the highest esteem for you and your men. There would certainly be no unfavorable portrayals on my watch.”

Jackson cocked an eyebrow. “Excessively generous depictions can cause their own sorts of problems, too,” he said. “Some men might appreciate a bit of friendly embellishment, but others will not. Which can hurt morale. Matters of jealousy and so forth. Not to mention, if your intention is to inform the general public, then hero worship and comforting lies should not be part of such an endeavor.”

The senator’s eyes were now widened, just a bit, though he was still smiling. “It seems your past experiences with the media industry have left a lasting impression on you.”

“That is one way of putting it. I am not sure it is worth all the trouble.”

“Oh, no, please, don’t say that. It is absolutely criminal that the Vanguard is not more widely beloved here in Intar. Something must be done about that.”

“Mm.”

“Have you not found this relationship between your organization and the Intarian government to be a bit... sad and pathetic?”

Strong words. Jackson elected not to respond yet.

“A bit parasitic, even?” said Jacobson. “You do all the work, keep the world safe, and get none of the credit. Or not nearly enough, at least.”

“We don’t do this for adoration.”

“Of course you don’t. And that speaks volumes of your character. But tell me. Does it not slowly breed resentment among your ranks, when your men are so regularly putting their lives on the line, only to then see my government, for example, sitting back and doing basically nothing? Sitting on its rather plump bottom while you're putting out fires all over the world?"

"3465 -- CCXC.

Well. Jackson couldn't entirely refute the other man's point there. If he was still being considerate of troop morale, then the apparent laziness of various governments around the world had always been a rather persistent point of contention within the Vanguard.

But it was also somewhat beside the point.

And right now, the only words going through his mind were the ones that belonged to the man he respected most in this world.

"...It is not the responsibility of others to take up this cause that we have ourselves volunteered for," said Jackson. "To think otherwise is but one more path to dishonor, corruption, and self-destruction. And we certainly do not need more of those."

At that, Senator Jacobson made no response. He merely stared back steadily at Jackson for so long that Jackson began to think that he may have accidentally killed the entire conversation.

Until, at length, another smile began to grow into the senator's face, and a starry look appeared in his eyes. "I knew you were the real deal."

Jackson's expression flattened as he began to get the distinct and somewhat terrifying impression that, no matter what else he said here, this man in front of him was never, ever going to give up.

Chapter Two Hundred Ninety: 'Intimation of an augured luster...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector had to take his time. After that last bout of meditation, he barely felt like himself, in some ways. And yet in others, he felt more like himself than ever before.

Was this what they called clarity? Heh. Enlightenment, even?

Ha.

Ha ha.

Wouldn't that be funny? If he'd achieved enlightenment in a cave under a waterfall?

No. He was reasonably certain that wasn't the case. How could he have achieved enlightenment when he didn't even know what that meant, really? It was more of a buzzword than anything, wasn't it? An old-timey buzzword, perhaps.

Eh, whatever.

All he knew was that he was feeling good. Not necessarily about himself or... the current state of the world, for that matter, but rather... just in general.

He felt... comfortable, somehow.

Which was a little concerning, in its own way. All this crazy meditating wasn't making him too mellowed out, was it?

Now there was a thought he'd never expected to have. Where had all that anxiety gone? It was still in there somewhere. He knew it was. Or at least, he dared not hope that it was truly gone for good."
"3465 -- CCXC.

Well. Jackson couldn't entirely refute the other man's point there. If he was still being considerate of troop morale, then the apparent laziness of various governments around the world had always been a rather persistent point of contention within the Vanguard.

But it was also somewhat beside the point.

And right now, the only words going through his mind were the ones that belonged to the man he respected most in this world.

"...It is not the responsibility of others to take up this cause that we have ourselves volunteered for," said Jackson. "To think otherwise is but one more path to dishonor, corruption, and self-destruction. And we certainly do not need more of those."

At that, Senator Jacobson made no response. He merely stared back steadily at Jackson for so long that Jackson began to think that he may have accidentally killed the entire conversation.

Until, at length, another smile began to grow into the senator's face, and a starry look appeared in his eyes. "I knew you were the real deal."

Jackson's expression flattened as he began to get the distinct and somewhat terrifying impression that, no matter what else he said here, this man in front of him was never, ever going to give up.

Chapter Two Hundred Ninety: 'Intimation of an augured luster...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector had to take his time. After that last bout of meditation, he barely felt like himself, in some ways. And yet in others, he felt more like himself than ever before.

Was this what they called clarity? Heh. Enlightenment, even?

Ha.

Ha ha.

Wouldn't that be funny? If he'd achieved enlightenment in a cave under a waterfall?

No. He was reasonably certain that wasn't the case. How could he have achieved enlightenment when he didn't even know what that meant, really? It was more of a buzzword than anything, wasn't it? An old-timey buzzword, perhaps.

Eh, whatever.

All he knew was that he was feeling good. Not necessarily about himself or... the current state of the world, for that matter, but rather... just in general.

He felt... comfortable, somehow.

Which was a little concerning, in its own way. All this crazy meditating wasn't making him too mellowed out, was it?

Now there was a thought he'd never expected to have. Where had all that anxiety gone? It was still in there somewhere. He knew it was. Or at least, he dared not hope that it was truly gone for good."

"3466

Yeah. Hector was reasonably confident that it would rear its head up again, eventually.

Which wasn't... necessarily a terrible thing, either. It was part of him, too. That anxiety. He'd come to understand that much. And on some level, it probably had its uses. Keeping him... alert, at the very least.

Mmhmm. And as nice as this current feeling of contentment or "centeredness" was, he didn't think that he wanted to feel this way all the time. It seemed wrong, somehow. Unfitting.

And now he was confusing himself. How had he managed to make himself uncomfortable with how comfortable he was? This had to be some kind of new level of stupidity on his part. Maybe that was the real accomplishment of all his meditating. Improving on how much of a dumbass he could be, when he really put it his mind to it.

Well, at least he was starting to feel more like himself again.

The next few days remained rather quiet around Warrenhold. Which was a blessed change of pace.

Everyone was waiting on word from Vantalay--word which arrived via the reapers every morning, afternoon, and night. Apparently, the battle for Ridgemark was going quite well, even if it was taking a while. No new casualties. The city limits had nearly been breached when the Rainlords joined the fight, but now they had been thoroughly secured, and the combined forces of Abolish and the VMP were being continually pushed farther and farther back.

There was even talk of taking the fight beyond Ridgemark and going all the way over to Czacoa in order to try and catch the invading Vantalayan forces over there with their pants down. And maybe bring that entire warfront to a swift conclusion.

Mercifully, though, that was still just talk. After communicating to them about the attack on Warrenhold, the Rainlords seemed equally eager to get back here.

He wondered what would happen when they did. Even just from the reports that the reapers were providing, he could tell that the Rainlords' overall energy had shifted dramatically.

Which was only natural, of course, now that they'd recovered all their lost kin. They'd scored an incredible victory over there.

A historic one, really. The kind that would probably be spoken of for generations among them. Like the victory at Magarabad, when the Redwater Twins struck down the Sawtooth General, one of the Mohssian Empire's most reviled and bloodthirsty leaders. Or the victory at Denowa, when one Cassius Merlo, the Water Dragon of his time, led a group of Rainlords in the defense of a small island in the Luthic Ocean that had come under attack for its strategic importance by the forces of a young Dozer and a monster of a man called Suresh."

"3467

It was a bit strange to think that so many more of them would be returning here to Warrenhold. So many new Rainlords whom he'd never even met.

Very strange, indeed.

He couldn't help wondering what they would think of him. He was aware that he'd garnered a bit of a... weird reputation among the Rainlords, so how were all these new people going to view him?

A little nerve-wracking. He was almost dreading their return.

But only almost. That was just a loose thought. A distraction. He still had plenty of important things to be devoting his attention to here at Warrenhold.

While it was true that most of the warrior Rainlords were away, there were many non-combatants here to talk to. It sometimes didn't feel that way, since apparently the warriors were the rowdiest bunch, but he wanted to think of this as an opportunity to get to know some of them better.

Like the Blackburns. Particularly, Nere Blackburn. Her late husband, Ismael Blackburn, had been killed by the Salesman of Death at Dunehall--a death which Hector had personally witnessed in all its cruelty.

And despite Nere being positioned as the new head of her House, the leadership role had instead fallen upon the shoulders of Horatio Blackburn.

From everything Hector had seen and heard, Nere had not been doing so well ever since, which was obviously understandable.

Her reaper, though, name of Sentsia, was a different story. It made for an odd dichotomy whenever Hector saw the two of them. Sentsia leading the way, being talkative with others--jovial, even--while Nere followed wordlessly behind, shoulders slumped, gaze drifting about. It was hard to tell if the woman was even listening to any of the conversations that she was overhearing.

He wanted to say something to her, but each time he'd had the opportunity, it just didn't feel right. Or he couldn't think of what to say.

Sentsia, of course, was easy enough to talk to, like most reapers, but Hector felt repeatedly stuck trying to break the ice with that poor woman.

And so he began to think that, perhaps, words were not what was in order. Instead, maybe a real, tangible gesture would be better.

So in his free time, and with the assistance of some of the other Blackburns, he'd been working on a gift, of sorts. It wasn't specifically for Nere, as he hoped many of the Rainlords would be able to get some use out of it, but he did want her to be the first to see it.

With a small host of Blackburns behind him, including Nere and Sentsia, he pushed open the door to the first fully restored shrine within Warrenhold."

"3468

It was a modestly-sized chamber, by Warrenhold's standards. Maybe twenty or so people could fit in here without feeling cramped, and the old rainbow tiling had been cleaned up and refurbished entirely. No more cracks or fissures. Now they had a polished sheen to them.

The rainbow color had been relegated to only one wall, however. After having thought about it for a while, Hector came to the conclusion that maybe some of the folks interested in shrines as places of spiritual peace or meditation might not love having such a “loud” display of color surrounding them on all sides. Maybe, instead, they would want some plain walls that they could decorate as they pleased.

But for this particular shrine, he’d been focusing his research on the Rainlords and their history, not just their old religious views. It was his understanding that many of them were no longer spiritual in the slightest, so he wanted this to serve as a place of historical value to them, as well.

Hopefully.

So there was a table full of candles and bowls for burning incense. There were chairs and floor mats and tall poles for advanced meditative exercises. And there was also a large water basin in the center of the room with a long-necked, brass faucet curving around the top of it, releasing a slow, timed drop of water every three hundred seconds.

That last one, according to a few of the reapers, was an ancient fixture of their Luthic religion, meant to represent how Lhutwë, the God of All Water, created every single drop that had ever or would ever exist.

And it looked pretty cool, Hector thought. So he was glad to see a few of the Blackburns’ faces light up when they saw it there, especially some of the reapers who’d told him about it but not seen it yet.

Sentsia was all praise and laughter, which Hector was glad to see, but Nere, unfortunately, remained the same. Still with that somber, glazed-over look in her eyes as she silently took in the view.

Hector couldn’t be too disappointed. He understood.

But there was still one more thing to be revealed. He’d saved it for last because he’d thought it would make for the best surprise, and yet, now that he was about to pull the tarps away, he found himself suddenly hesitating as he wondered if this wasn’t about to go horribly wrong, somehow."

"3469

With one last look at the awaiting Blackburns, Hector put the notion out of his mind and began pulling the tarps down from the room's far corner.

What was revealed was a gargantuan cabinet with a few small statues and plaques dotting its shelves.

"I know it's still a bit empty-looking," said Hector preemptively, "but I thought I should leave plenty of space for you and the other Houses to add in whatever you like."

The statues were made of polished stone. He'd had them commissioned from a sculptor on the other side of the city.

Every single person who'd lost their life at Dunehall was either named here on a plaque or given a statue.

And Ismael Blackburn was there in the center.

Hector hadn't known him long, but it only felt appropriate to honor him like this.

He'd thought about just materializing all the statues out of his iron, and indeed, he'd even gone ahead and done so as a form of practice, but it ended up proving rather laborious, trying to capture the perfect likenesses of actual people, especially in a miniaturized form. While he was sure that he could've gotten it right eventually, he came to the conclusion that they probably shouldn't be composed of iron, anyway.

In the admittedly quite likely event that he someday got himself into another dire life-and-death situation here at Warrenhold, he figured that he didn't want to have anything delicate here taking up space within his volume limit. He could very easily imagine a situation in which he needed to start annihilating iron indiscriminately in order to free up volume quickly, and he didn't want the extra concern of trying not to accidentally annihilate what was supposed to be a precious fixture of historical importance.

Plus, he supposed it just felt a bit more impactful, this way. Even if there was still a degree of skill involved in the process, using materialization was kinda cheating, wasn't it? There was something meaningful about having this kind of thing done properly by a professional.

Eh, but then again, maybe if he'd had more free time on his hands to get it perfect, he would've gone for it, anyway. Because there was definitely something meaningful in doing it all himself, too.

If only.

The reaction from the Blackburns was definitely something, though. The smiles on their faces. The tears in their eyes. The solemn nods--of approval, hopefully--as they approached and looked more closely.

Yeah. That alone made this more than worth the effort."

"3470

He tried not to stare at the Lady Nere, but it was hard not to pay extra attention to her reaction, since she was the one he was most concerned about.

And he could see her slowly gravitating toward the cabinet with that somber gaze of hers.

'This is magnificently thoughtful of you, Lord Goffe,' Sentsia was saying over his shoulder. 'Words can hardly express how much this will mean to not just House Blackburn but to all of our kin. In fact, perhaps we should...' She trailed off as she presumably began to notice Nere as well.

Along with everyone else.

The small crowd parted for her as she moved toward the Ismael statue, eventually reaching for it with both hands. She picked it up gingerly and brought it closer to her face.

The statue was about equal in size to her head, and the sharp suit that Ismael was dressed in had been replicated from a photo that Hector had been given. As far as he'd been able to tell, the features of the man's face had been recreated fantastically well.

And perhaps the lady thought so, too, because she soon began to cry. And slump to the ground.

The Blackburns closed in around her again, putting hands on her shoulders or trying to help her back to her feet.

But then her crying turned to sobbing, and she was abruptly not so quiet any longer. The shrine started to fill with the choked sounds of strained voice and disjointed breathing.

Then she started moving again, trying to wriggle away from her family members, who were now attempting to help her a bit more forcefully onto her feet.

She shouted something incomprehensible and threw herself away from the others, all but collapsing at Hector's feet.

He knelt down to help her up himself, but she pushed him back and scrambled away, still with the statue in her clutches.

Her cries were more like wails now as she fled the room and disappeared from sight.

Sentsia was the first to give chase, but the other Blackburns were not far behind, leaving Hector there flat on his ass, alone but for Garovel hovering next to him.

'Well, that could've gone better,' said the reaper.

'Fuck,' said Hector, picking himself up off the floor. 'Now, I... I'm not even sure what I was expecting to happen.'

'You were expecting she would be happy, I imagine, no? Or perhaps sad but in a still-mostly-happy sort of way, hmm?'

'Yeah, but, I mean... ugh, I don't know. I feel like an idiot.'

"3471

'Don't beat yourself up too much,' said Garovel privately. 'And most importantly, don't let this experience dissuade you from doing things like this in the future. It's impossible to know how someone is going to react, but that doesn't mean you should stop trying to do nice things for them.'

He supposed the reaper had a point. And it was still true that the rest of the Blackburns seemed to like it. He just hoped he hadn't made things worse, somehow.

He'd have to check in on them later.

In the meantime, there were more things to see to. He could've started showing off the shrine to the other Houses, but after that disaster, he wasn't much in the mood for it. Maybe he'd ask Ms. Rogers to do it for him. Or just wait until the rest of the Rainlords got back from Vantalay.

He had a mountain of mail to go through. That was one thing that Ms. Rogers had indeed been helping him with, but he wanted to handle some of it himself, at least. If nothing else, it was interesting to see all the random things people were sending.

There was food. Lots and lots of food. Cakes and pies and bread and cookies. Oh, and a big, insulated box full of frozen meats from a family farm out in Lorent. Apparently, they wanted him to pay them a visit and give him a tour. That was a new one.

Then there were the letters, of course. So many letters. But it was usually the handwritten ones that caught his eye. There was something about those that just seemed that much more important. Because the others often turned out to be veiled--or even not-so-veiled--solicitations from businesses or lords. They always wanted to set up some meeting or another to talk about some "opportunity" or another.

While it did feel a bit rude to ignore all of them, he just didn't have the time or inclination to think about such things, right now.

But yeah. The handwritten ones. Those always felt a bit more special, even though they occasionally turned out to be no different by the time he got halfway through the first paragraph. All the good ones made up for that nuisance, though.

A little boy had written to him. Age of seven, according to the kid's own declaration in the very first line. Apparently, he wanted to know how Hector had gotten so brave. And he wanted advice on how he could become braver himself.

Talk about hard questions."
"3472

He didn't want to lie to the kid or give him some generic platitudes that he didn't even necessarily believe himself, so he had to think about his answers to those questions for quite a bit longer than he probably should have, considering how much other stuff he had to do.

He found himself mulling his answers over and over while taking care of other business. And oftentimes, he realized that he wasn't even using a background thought process, either. He was just thinking about it normally while on autopilot going around Warrenhold.

In the end, this was what he decided to write back:
Dear Mr. Caleb Hammerwell,

Thank you for the letter. Your questions have given me a lot to think about. It seems to me that bravery is a funny thing. You say that I'm brave as if it's an obvious fact, but I've never felt very brave at all. The things I've done that you might say were brave, I would instead argue that those were just things that had to be done. Because if I hadn't at least tried to do them, then something bad would have happened.

So I think that's my answer to your questions, Caleb. Don't worry about being brave. Just focus on figuring out what the right thing to do is-- and then doing it whenever you can. It might be really hard, sometimes, so don't worry too much if you mess up. A good friend of mine once told me that we shouldn't respond to failure with sadness. We should respond by becoming better, until our best is good enough to succeed.

Sorry if that wasn't the answer you were looking for. And congrats on turning seven.

Best wishes,
Hector Goffe

If only all the letters he received were like that. He wouldn't have minded writing up responses to them all day long.

Unfortunately, while there were some letters in a similarly innocent vein--such as one from a particularly precocious little girl asking him to marry her when she grew up--there were also some that left him with a bit of heartache after he finished reading them.

One little boy wanted him to come beat up some mean kids at his school. Another wanted him to bring the family cat back to life. And still another wanted him to make his mother stop drinking."

"3473

Hector wanted to respond to each and every one, but half the time, he wasn't even sure how. And there were so many. Dozens, already, from the just the past month or so. He had Ms. Rogers helping him sort through them all, but even with her assistance, he simply didn't have as much time to spend on this as he would've liked.

He considered maybe trying to organize a small team to aid with it. Like a proper mail room? Hmm. Which tower would that go in? Ah, the Book Tower, of course.

Going forward, it seemed like Warrenhold was only going to get busier and busier. He didn't even want to imagine how difficult this might become if or when the amount of real, heartfelt letters he was receiving in a single month began to climb into the hundreds. And when compounded by however much the spam and business letters might increase...

Yeah, a proper mail room might be a good idea, he decided. Come to think of it, he was pretty sure that Amelia Carthrace had set up a makeshift one right next to her office, but she wasn't staying here at Warrenhold nearly as much, as of late. She was quite busy managing the Darksteel National Bank from its pair of office buildings in downtown Gray Rock.

Which was a whole other thing to worry about. While he might've been content to just let her handle everything involving the Bank, Hector knew that it would probably bite him on the ass one day if he didn't continue making an effort to learn the trade, at least a little. He doubted he would ever become truly great at it, but hopefully, he could manage to avoid making a total fool of himself if he ever needed to show up to a board meeting on short notice or something.

And on the subject of expansion, the Bank was obviously key. For both Warrenhold and his new land in Lorent. That was a lot of heavy lifting, financially speaking, and the Bank was going to be carrying the brunt of it.

After discussing it more with the Madame Carthrace, they decided that they would indeed be branching out into Lorent with their operations, offering full services to all Lorentian citizens in Hector's southern Jagwa territory. The intent was to eventually expand to the rest of Lorent as well, but they didn't want to rush that when they knew that they were already on quite delicate footing here to begin with."

Given all that Queen Helen had said previously when Hector first broached the subject with her, it was clear that she wouldn't be terribly pleased by this news of their expansion. She had, in essence, expressed concern that his bank might grow too powerful too quickly, and while Hector found that understandable from her perspective, he also knew that he had to do what was right by the people that were depending on him.

And if they didn't expand into Lorent soon, then it wouldn't be a matter of simply "slowing" the Bank's growth. The Bank would begin to stagnate and even lose money, thanks to Atreyan regulations.

Or at least, that was his understanding of the situation. He did worry that perhaps these veteran bankers who were advising him were pulling the wool over his eyes, trying to make the situation seem more dire than it truly was so that he would be more agreeable about the expansion, but as far as he'd been able to tell, they were all being straight with him. He'd read the regulations himself. Learned about why they were implemented. And he'd consulted with several reapers and Rainlords who were knowledgeable about finances and politics.

This needed to be done. He was convinced. Even if it made the Queen unhappy with him.

The more time went on, the more Hector began to wonder what would happen if he and the Queen ever had a true falling out with one another. He felt like his relationship with her was probably the most important one that he had, politically speaking. And after all she'd been through, all she'd done for him, he hated the idea of allowing things to break down between them.

Was there something he could do to help ensure that they remained on good terms? There must've been, right? Yeah, of course there was. He just had to think about it.

He could feel a few ancient memories from the Candle bubbling up, wanting to assert their relevance to his current line of thinking.

Hmm.

A kingdom in decline. A class of warriors raised to nobility generations ago, now being disrespected daily in the king's court. Soon, the king himself begins to chip away at their political power, little by little. Near a decade transpires, and they are a shadow of their former glory, figureheads at best. Talk of civil war has been bandied about for years, and it finally becomes more than just talk, but it is far too late. They have not the influence nor the resources to succeed, and in the end, they are all beheaded.

But the war still cripples the kingdom. Makes it even more vulnerable than it already was. And another war soon breaks out as the neighboring king seeks to take advantage of the opportunity.

Conquest follows swiftly, and the kingdom in decline is a kingdom no longer.

Huh...

Well, that wasn't very comforting. And perhaps a little biased. Maybe one of these other memories would be better."

"3475

Hmm. A queen with an obsession. A desire to restore her religion as the most prominent one of her kingdom. She converts her husband at a young age, and he quarrels with the court priests throughout his reign. Many call her a witch, a demon, a manipulative hag, and when her husband dies of pneumonia, they blame her.

But she has her faith. Her own priests. And a foreign papacy supporting her. Together, they call forth a host of holy warriors. The crown would normally pass to the eldest son, but he was born by the previous queen, the excommunicated one, and so he has no love for her, nor her for him. If she allowed him to be crowned, he would have her beheaded at the earliest opportunity.

And so there is war. Her sacred army proves victorious.

And there is no leniency in her heart. As would have been done to her, so she does to her enemies.

...Man, what the fuck? That was even worse than the last one. And how many of these memories ended with beheadings?

"Ah... Lord Goffe?" arrived a feminine voice.

He looked up from his ribeye steak and creamed spinach in order to see a familiar young woman standing on the other side of the large table in the Tower of Night's refectory.

Selena Cortes was her name. Zeff's niece. He did not, however, see her reaper, Ojarea, with her.

Hector was aware that those two had been working through some relationship troubles, which was a rather worrisome problem to have between a reaper and servant. It made him all the more grateful for Garovel, and yet he also felt in some tangential way responsible for them, too. Being the Lord of Warrenhold, where they were currently living, he felt like he needed to keep an eye on them.

He'd mentioned their troubles to Zeff a while back, who had apparently taken the direct approach toward trying to help the two of them repair things. Zeff and his sister, Joana, had confronted Ojarea and eventually arranged for strict regimenting of the time the two were allowed to see each other. And from what Hector understood, the other heads and reapers of both Houses Elroy and Cortes had been speaking with Ojarea regularly as a form of therapeutic engagement.

Which was an interesting concept, Hector had thought. Reapers, being immortal and so knowledgeable of the world, did not seem like the easiest subjects for therapy, but he supposed if he anyone could pull it off, it would be another reaper."

"3476

All of that had to have been made even more difficult, however, due to the current circumstances. With Zeff and so many other prominent Rainlords abroad, Hector couldn't deny being a bit worried about Selena and Ojarea's progress.

So to see her coming up to him like this certainly made him curious. "H-hello, Miss Cortes," he said, setting his fork and knife down.

"Sorry to bother you while you're eating," she said, looking briefly like she was about to sit down across from him and then thinking better of it.

"...Is something the matter?" he asked. Wait, should he have invited her to sit? Probably. Dammit.

"Oh, no, I was just--er--" She looked around. A few of the other Rainlords were watching them now. "I'm sorry. Is this inappropriate? It is, isn't it? I'm sorry. I'll go now." And she was already turning to leave.

"Hold on a second," said Hector, more confused now than concerned. "Whatever it is, just sit down and tell me."

She stared at him for a moment, eyes big and gray. Then she glanced around again and finally sat down without saying anything.

Hector waited for her.

But she still remained quiet.

Umm.

What the hell was going on here?

Girls had always been rather impossible for him to understand, but he had to admit that Selena here was consistently proving to be the most confounding one he'd ever met. He still remembered her jubilant, irreverent attitude when he'd found her having mounted a giant gun on that underground train. Compared to how he'd found her shortly thereafter, panicking and crying while Ojarea yelled at her, Hector didn't know how to consolidate those two completely different versions of her in his mind.

Sure, maybe she'd just been full of bravado and hadn't realized how much danger she was putting herself in. In fact, that was almost certainly the case. But he also had to wonder if that part of her was still in there, somewhere. Thus far, he'd yet to see it again, but... did people really change so dramatically so quickly?

She'd snuck away from her family during a deadly train ride in a foreign land filled with bandits and monsters. She couldn't have been entirely ignorant of the danger, so that had definitely required some guts on her part.

Not that he actually wanted to see such recklessness from her again, of course. It just made him curious about her. About what kind of person she really was.

After all, he'd come to realize that he had some... different sides to himself, lurking within his mind. It only made sense that other people might have something similar going on, no?"

"3477

It seemed like Hector would have to be the one to revive the conversation, so he tried his best to think of something. Maybe he should've called Garovel over or just consulted him, but...

Hmm.

For some reason, he didn't want to. For some reason, that seemed like it would be somehow inappropriate. Or disrespectful to Selena, perhaps.

What a weird feeling.

"...Is it something that you're worried about?" tried Hector. "Or maybe something that you think I could help you with? Or... uh...?"

It took her few more moments, but she found her response. "I wanted your opinion."

Well, that was a start. "Okay. About what?"

"About... ah..." She was hesitating so much that Hector became worried that she wasn't going to finish her sentence again.

Man, was this what it had been like talking to him, not so long ago?

Wow.

She did manage to get the rest out, though. "About... your meal. The steak that you're eating. What do you think of it?"

The steak? That had not been what he was expecting. Though, he supposed he didn't even know what he'd been expecting. "Uh... why are you asking about that?" Then it clicked, and he blinked. "Did you cook this?"

Her eyes went a little wide, and then she nodded, meekly at first and then more vigorously. "Is it any good?"

Oh shit. He wasn't exactly a food connoisseur. In fact, he'd only recently acquired a taste for steak, so he didn't really have much to compare it against.

That didn't seem like a good answer to give, though. In fact, it seemed like it might've been among the worst ones.

"Er, um. Yeah. It's quite good, actually. I thought Lluís had cooked it, like the last few times."

A smile arrived on her face briefly before disappearing into a look of abrupt skepticism. "Are you telling the truth? Or are you just saying that to spare my feelings?"

"No, I--"

"I won't improve if you don't give me honest criticism, Lord. Then every steak I make for you in the future will taste like shit, and you'll have no one to blame but yourself, you know."

It was his turn to go a bit wide-eyed, and he couldn't help laughing. She certainly seemed to have a way of catching him off guard. "I am being honest," he said, still snickering.

Her eyes lit up again, but then she squinted at him. "Really? I don't know if I believe you. You seem like the 'too nice' type.'"

"3478

Hector laughed again. "I promise I'm telling the truth," he said. "But I will say that I'm not exactly a food critic, either. If you're looking to improve on your technique, then you should probably be consulting someone else."

"Oh, I think Lluís and Margot have that aspect of things covered for me," said Selena. "It's actually kinda crazy. They're so sweet and gentle and kind the rest of the time. An idyllic old married couple, you know? But then you get them to start teaching you about food, and they turn into the some of the strictest disciplinarians you'll ever meet."

"Wow, really? They always seem so laidback."

She paused again, blinking as she perhaps rethought what she had been saying. "N-not that I'm trying to get them in trouble or anything. I love them both and am terribly grateful to them. I'm just complaining for, uh--for fun, I guess."

Hector cocked an eyebrow, unable to conceal his smile. "For fun?"

“Yeah, you know? Talkin’ shit? So it’s no big deal. I just suddenly realized you might take me too seriously and go chew them out or something. And that’s the last thing I want. They really are too sweet for this world, when it comes down to it. They wouldn’t deserve that.”

“Okay, so first you were worried I’m too nice, and now you’re worried I’m too much of a hard ass?”

“Yeah, well, I’m still getting to know you, okay?”

“I feel like you might be too much of a worrywart,” said Hector.

“That’s quite rude. And not untrue. That’s actually something I’ve been trying to be better about, but it’s hard.”

Hector could relate. “Yeah, I’m... er, kinda the same way, honestly. It’s tough to not overthink things, sometimes.”

“Oh yeah?” said Selena. “But you always seem as cool as a cucumber. Are you telling me that deep down, you’re actually not cool or cucumber-like at all?”

“Heh, I’m afraid so...”

“Hmm. What would be the appropriate analogy for you, then? Warm as a trout?”

“What the--? Why a trout?”

“I dunno. I’m brainstorming.”

“Isn’t it supposed to, uh, start with the same letter? Like ‘cool as a cucumber’ does?”

“Oh, right, right. Maybe, then, um, warm as a wolverine?”

“Are wolverines warm?”

“Probably. They live outdoors with all that fur.”

“I’m pretty sure they can still get cold, though.”

“Warm as a waterfall.”

“Those aren’t really warm, either.”

“Warm as a warm waterfall.”

“You just used the word warm twice.”

“Warm as a warm spring.”

“You did it again!”

“Warm as a war with wizards.”

“I don’t even know what to say about that one.”

“No, hey, that one makes sense! Wizards cast fireballs, right? So it really would be warm! And it’s fun to say!”

“I’ve forgotten why we even started talking about this in the first place.””

"3479

Selena giggled but didn’t spout off another iteration, though perhaps not for a lack of trying. Judging from her expression, she was still thinking.

Hector had a feeling that this would keep going for quite a while if he didn’t change the subject first. “Have you had something to eat yet, yourself?” he asked.

That seemed to catch her by surprise. “Er, um, no...”

“Then why don’t you go grab something from the kitchen and join me?” said Hector. “Or you could have some of my steak, if you want.”

“What? No, I couldn’t possibly--I mean, I made that for you. It’d be weird if I--um--I don’t know if--that’s just--I mean, honestly, how could you even--?”

Hmm. Had that been a weird suggestion on his part? Maybe it was. She certainly seemed flustered by it for some reason.

He didn’t really get it. “Do you want some of my spinach, then?”

She took an abrupt break from her fumbling. “...I hate spinach.”

Hector couldn’t help snickering again. “It’s not for everyone, I guess.

It's pretty healthy, though, I think."

"If it wants me to eat it, then maybe it shouldn't taste like a bag full of lawn mower shavings."

"I'm not sure it wants anything. It's spinach."

"I'm more of a carnivore," she said.

"Oh, so you do want the steak." He started cutting her off a portion.

"No, I--agh, if I want one, I'll make one later! You just sit there and eat! I swear if you keep trying to give that to me, I'll start to think you were lying before about it being good! That you're just trying to find an excuse so you don't have to finish it!"

Man, she sure was getting animated again. It was really strange how she could waffle back and forth between being so reserved and being so full of energy.

He was mainly just amused, though, and he did indeed go back to eating quietly as he waited for her to settle down.

Once she did, another bit of silence descended upon the table, though it felt decidedly less awkward than before. Instead, it felt more like they were both waiting for the other to make some sort of move so that they could try to counter it.

Or at least, that was Hector's feeling, anyway. He smiled as he chewed.

"...Warm as a woolly mammoth," said Selena.

Oh, goddammit."

"3480 -- CCXCI.

Chapter Two Hundred Ninety-One: 'Thy primordial glimmer...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Man, the Library sure felt quiet, lately.

Well. Quieter, he supposed. It wasn't like it had ever been particularly noisy to begin with it. At least, not in the conventional sense.

But there was definitely something different about it now, Ibai Blackburn thought. And it probably had to do with Gohvis, the Keeper of the Library, not being here for the first time that Ibai had seen.

He'd been trying to figure out the exact nature of the difference ever since Gohvis left, but it was difficult. What was a giant, sentient Library supposed to feel like, anyway?

Maybe it was apprehensive without its master around to protect it? Or maybe it was actually feeling uncertainty with the bit of freedom that it now had? Gohvis certainly had an oppressive presence when he was around, though most of his mutant followers didn't seem to feel that way.

Gohvis had taken several of them with him, Ibai noticed, so that doubtless contributed to the quietude, as well. The refectory was emptier, as were the recreational rooms.

But it was really all the book rooms that made Ibai so curious.

So his current objective with his writing was to hopefully, somehow, gain some sort of clue about the curious puzzle that was this ancient Library of Erudition.

He'd been trying for a while now, writing original stories so that he might gift them to the Library and thereby gain its affection, and his first work had been a rip-roaring success.

Probably.

Okay, yeah, it was a little hard to tell if the Library had actually been pleased or not, but it definitely felt less hostile towards him, he thought. Why, just the other day, when he took a book off the shelf and started walking away with it, the Library waited nearly ten whole seconds before trying to kill him with a serpentine stream of ardor-infused, razor-sharp papers.

A few months ago, it would've only been five seconds. Progress!

So with this current story that he was writing, he was thinking that perhaps the narrative should in some way be related to his objective with the Library. Metaphorically, that was.

He'd decided to make it about two guys who were struggling to get to know and trust each other during a period of civil unrest under a despotic regime, where trusting one another carried even more risk than usual.

And he was just. About. Done. Putting the finishing touches on it.

Yeah.

In the end, true friendship won the day. The two men became lifelong buddies and took down the evil dictator oppressing the land.

Perfect."

"3480 -- CCXCI.

Chapter Two Hundred Ninety-One: 'Thy primordial glimmer...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Man, the Library sure felt quiet, lately.

Well. Quieter, he supposed. It wasn't like it had ever been particularly noisy to begin with it. At least, not in the conventional sense.

But there was definitely something different about it now, Ibai Blackburn thought. And it probably had to do with Gohvis, the Keeper of the Library, not being here for the first time that Ibai had seen.

He'd been trying to figure out the exact nature of the difference ever since Gohvis left, but it was difficult. What was a giant, sentient Library supposed to feel like, anyway?

Maybe it was apprehensive without its master around to protect it? Or maybe it was actually feeling uncertainty with the bit of freedom that it now had? Gohvis certainly had an oppressive presence when he was around, though most of his mutant followers didn't seem to feel that way.

Gohvis had taken several of them with him, Ibai noticed, so that doubtless contributed to the quietude, as well. The refectory was emptier, as were the recreational rooms.

But it was really all the book rooms that made Ibai so curious.

So his current objective with his writing was to hopefully, somehow, gain some sort of clue about the curious puzzle that was this ancient Library of Erudition.

He'd been trying for a while now, writing original stories so that he might gift them to the Library and thereby gain its affection, and his first work had been a rip-roaring success.

Probably.

Okay, yeah, it was a little hard to tell if the Library had actually been pleased or not, but it definitely felt less hostile towards him, he thought. Why, just the other day, when he took a book off the shelf and started walking away with it, the Library waited nearly ten whole seconds before trying to kill him with a serpentine stream of ardor-infused, razor-sharp papers.

A few months ago, it would've only been five seconds. Progress!

So with this current story that he was writing, he was thinking that perhaps the narrative should in some way be related to his objective with the Library. Metaphorically, that was.

He'd decided to make it about two guys who were struggling to get to know and trust each other during a period of civil unrest under a despotic regime, where trusting one another carried even more risk than usual.

And he was just. About. Done. Putting the finishing touches on it.

Yeah.

In the end, true friendship won the day. The two men became lifelong buddies and took down the evil dictator oppressing the land.

Perfect."

"3481

Ibai exhaled a deep breath and leaned back in his chair. He stretched his arms and rolled his neck. Whew.

He'd lost track of time again, hadn't he? Well, at least he wasn't feeling so utterly famished that he could barely walk. He'd gotten an earful from Chergoa and Emiliana after that one.

But the book was done. His next gift for the Library. Impulsively, he wanted to hand it over right away, but then he thought that maybe he should wait until his proofreader returned so that he could put the extra-finishing touches on it.

Hmm. Tough call. Making him antsy.

Either way, it was time for a break, he supposed. And thinking about Chergoa and Emiliana just now had made him want to go check on the two of them.

Emiliana in particular.

She'd been in a peculiar state, recently. Just before leaving, Gohvis had taught her some type of new meditative technique, and now, the entire time he'd been away, she hadn't budged from that same spot in the center of the Library's main room, right next to Arkos' Great Globe of Eleg.

Sure enough, when he arrived, she was still there, just the same as he'd last seen her. Yesterday? Two days ago? He wasn't sure.

He'd frequently seen Chergoa hanging around her as well, and indeed, she was here this time, too.

'Hey,' said the reaper upon seeing him.

"Hiya." With his new book under his arm, he approached the young woman both curiously and cautiously. It was weird. He didn't want to disturb her training, but at the same time, it had been so long that it was hard not to worry about her condition. She was looking decidedly quite pale and slim. "Any change?" he asked.

'None that I've been able to see,' said Chergoa. 'Apart from the obvious.'

The obvious being her weight and complexion, Ibai knew. "Wow. It's been over a week now, hasn't it?"

'Going on two, actually.'

Really? Huh. "And you still can't rouse her out of it?"

'Sure can't,' said Chergoa with a sigh.

"Hmm. Do you think...? Um." He was hesitant to utter his next question, despite having thought it several times already, but it seemed to him that they were reaching a point where they shouldn't ignore the possibility. "Do you think, perhaps, that this isn't actually a form of training, like Gohvis said?"

'The thought has crossed my mind, yes.'
"3482

Of course it had. She was the thoughtful, worrisome type, wasn't she? Yep. "What should we do?"

'I don't know,' said Chergoa. 'Doesn't seem like there's much that we can, except wait for the grumpy dragon to show up again and reverse whatever he's done.'

Hmm. Ibai wondered if that was really true. Sure, it seemed like it was, but... hmm.

With all this knowledge around here, all this incredible power being hoarded by this sentient Library, there was almost certainly something that could be done.

It was just a matter of finding out how.

But of course, that would mean reading a lot of books. Like, a prohibitively silly amount of books. Which would probably take so long that, yeah, it would just be faster to wait for Gohvis to return, instead.

Plus, if there was, hypothetically, only one book within the entire Library that held the solution to Emiliana's current predicament, then that meant it was quite possible he could spend the rest of his life reading books and still never find it. That was how many there were to go through, between all the different rooms.

Though, hopefully, there would be more than just one book that had the answer in it. Surely, there would be at least a handful of them, right?

Maybe.

Interesting to think about, nonetheless. Especially because he knew that there were still hidden areas within the Library that he had not yet been able to explore, areas that were probably being hidden--as in, purposely--by the Library itself.

He'd discussed this very subject with Emiliana a few times. She told him about how Gohvis had taken her through a hidden passageway in order to meet a funny squid-lady called the Weaver.

That story had actually piqued his curiosity so much that he decided to go on a quest to find and talk to her himself. He'd already been having plenty of fun exploring the Library without any particular goal in mind at all, so the notion that there were extra-hidden secrets to be uncovered had only served to increase his motivation and enjoyment that much more.

And he hadn't told anyone about this yet, but he'd actually succeeded in finding her.

Quite easily, as it so happened. She had apparently been able to figure out that he was looking for her and had therefore started talking to him telepathically in order to guide him directly to her.

'What is it that you want from me?' was the first thing she'd asked upon seeing him.

"Iunno!" he'd told her with a big shrug and a bigger smile."
"3483

'You are a curious creature, aren't you?' she'd said.

"Is that a compliment? Because it sounds like a compliment! If so, then thank you!"

'It is, yes. But you know what they say about curiosity, don't you?'

"That it's the foundation for all human advancement?"

At that, the Weaver giggled. 'Why are you aberrations all so amusing? Is it somehow baked into your very nature?'

"Ooh, so you've met other aberrations, huh?"

'Indeed. Though, typically, I look upon them from afar. Meetings are not my strong suit, after all.'

“Well, I’m glad you’re making an exception for me, then. It’s a pleasure to meet you, Ms. Weaver.”

‘The pleasure is mine. I must say, however, that you are far more polite and personable than most aberrations. In fact, now that I am thinking more deeply about it, I find it quite strange how you are not entirely bored out of your skull while stuck within the confines of the Library.’

“Why would I be bored? There’s so much to do here! So much to learn!”

‘Is that so? I was under the impression that aberrations did not find reading to be very fun. And fun is the only thing that you care about, is it not?’

Ibai scratched his chin. “Well, I wouldn’t say the only thing, but... yeah, maybe, sorta. Fun is what makes life worth living, isn’t it?”

‘Now there is a question for the ages. I do not know if I can agree, however. I think there must surely be more meaning in life than indulging in pleasurable activity.’

“Oh, of course, of course! But the ‘meaning’ of life is a slightly different matter, I’d say.”

‘Would you? I would not. On the subject of what makes life “worth living,” I would say that “meaning” is what matters most of all. If your life consists of nothing but meaningless amusements, then would that not begin to ring hollow after a while? Would you not be deprived of a greater, deeper sense of fulfillment?’

Ibai crossed his arms and smiled, having to chew on that a little. He decided to take a seat on the cold floor, as well. It was a bit wet and sticky, but he didn’t mind. “Those are all fair points,” he said. “But I’d also argue that without fun, life would surely become a slog. A rote, tiresome experience devoid of any spark or magic. Moreover, I think that it’s wrong to reduce fun down to this idea of ‘pleasurable activity.’ Because fun is also dependent on one’s mindset, no? What I find fun might be quite different from what you find fun, eh?”

"3484

'I fail to see a difference,' said the Weaver. 'Whether you find something fun or I find it fun is irrelevant, because the question already concerns only what is relative to us, individually. What the "pleasurable activity" actually entails is immaterial, so long as it is established as being both fun and meaningless. One's mindset would not change that.'

"No, but that's what I'm getting at," said Ibai. "The 'meaninglessness' of an activity is not something that can be established. In fact, I think I can make a rather strong argument that fun, in itself, might very well create meaning. All on its own."

'Go on, then. Make your strong argument.'

He giggled. "Okay, well, uh! Here goes! Hmm!" He took a few moments to gather his thoughts and figure out where to begin. "So if the hypothesis here is that 'fun generates meaning,' then we should first establish what constitutes fun and what constitutes meaning. In which case, I put forth the definition that 'fun,' ultimately, is a sense of positivity that occurs in the brain as a direct result of observing or participating in an activity."

'Stop there. I see your game. That definition is too broad. It can apply to plenty of situations which cannot reasonably be considered fun.'

"Mm, you think so?"

'Yes. A "sense of positivity" is far too vague. By that definition, you could declare any fleeting sense of "hope" that one ever feels in the midst of a terrible circumstance to also be "fun," as well.'

"Yeah-huh? And what's wrong with that?"

'You cannot seriously claim that you are suddenly "having fun" when surrounded on all sides by misery, just because a brief period of "positivity" comes over you.'

"Sure I can! Just because it may only exist in a trace amount doesn't mean it's not there!" He bobbed his head. "But I will acknowledge that, sure, it might be inappropriate to describe the overall situation as a fun one. For that to occur, I think you'd have to pass beyond some sort of critical threshold for fun. Where the positivity overwhelms the negativity long enough to cement itself in the mind."

'But positivity could apply to any number of other feelings.'

“And I’m saying that fun is a component of all of those feelings, too. Because positivity is fun!”

‘Mmhmm. But what of negativity, then? Is that not sometimes fun, in its own way?’”

"3485

“Ah, hmm! That IS an interesting question, isn’t it?! Perhaps in instances like that, the negativity has a hidden element of positivity inside it! Which is the real source of the fun!”

‘How convenient for your argument.’

“Admittedly, I feel a little out of my depth on that one. While I’ve read about those types of feelings, I don’t know if I’ve ever actually experienced that sort of thing, myself. But it does fascinate me! I mean, when you think about it, you’re turning something bad into something good! Isn’t that cool?!”

‘I don’t know if that’s the best way of looking at it.’

“Mm? Why not?”

‘Because a “feeling” of positivity stemming from a negative source is not necessarily a good thing. In fact, it might be quite a terrible thing. For example, the feeling that a bully gets when victimizing someone. The sense of power and control, I mean. That may feel good for the bully, temporarily, but is it a good thing overall? I think not.’

Ibai nodded along. “Fair enough, fair enough. But we’ve also shifted points a bit here, I think. What you’re talking about is someone feeling good from doing a bad thing. What I was talking about was someone feeling good from also feeling bad. Like, say, when you feel really sad about something but then start to feel weirdly kinda good about it, too. Maybe in a self-pitying sense. Which, okay, sure, isn’t necessarily the best thing, either, but... hmm...”

‘I see. I can agree that wallowing in one’s own misery can have a strangely comforting sensation to it. That may even be the driving force behind why it can be difficult to pull oneself out of such states. Because on some level, it feels good to remain there.’

“Yeah!”

‘In which case, your thesis about positivity being good is proven wrong.’

“Oh.” A beat passed. “Whoa, hey, wait a minute. I didn’t say positivity is always good. I said it’s fun!”

‘Oh? Then are you declaring that fun is not always good?’

He was tempted to say yes immediately, but he took a moment to mull it over a bit more, first. Then he nodded again. “Yeah, I think so. Lots of fun things can end up being quite bad in various ways, right?”

For a time, the Weaver said nothing. She merely stared at him from her shadowy corner of the room.

Or at least, that was what it felt like she was doing. It was a little hard to tell if she even had eyeballs with which to stare."

"3486

After that, their conversation had drifted to other subjects as the Weaver began asking various questions about Ibai himself, inquiring into his personal history. She even demonstrated an interest in House Blackburn as a whole.

He hadn’t provided her all of the answers that she wanted, however. As much as he enjoyed getting to meet her for the first time, he decided to play things more mischievously. When it came down to it, he didn’t know if he should trust her with information about his family.

Plus, it was more fun this way. He could tease her with his answers and maybe even coax a few out of her, in exchange. She was quite the curious creature, after all. He wanted to know more about her personal history, too.

She hadn’t been forthcoming at all, though, and so that first encounter had ended with the two of them having not made much progress with one another.

But that was okay. It just gave him more reason to go and talk to her again. If they were going to build trust, then it would take time.

And heck, even if she never told him anything else about herself, she was still a wellspring of information about all manner of other subjects.

Such as the Library.

Which was why he decided to go and visit her again. He'd already asked her about Emiliana's meditative trance once before, and the Weaver had told him that she didn't know anything about it, but this time, Ibai intended to take a different approach.

Luckily, he'd already memorized the path back to her.

'Hello again,' she said.

"Hi," he said with his usual cheer, but he also decided to not waste time and just jump straight into his question. "Do you know of any other hidden areas within the Library? And I mean areas where, like, the extra special books are stored."

'Ah. Well, the answer to that is more complicated than you might expect.'

"How so?"

'Do I know of such areas? Yes, I do. Do I know how you can reach them? Maybe.'

"Aw, c'mon, don't tease me about this, too! This is more important than just simple curiosity on my part!"

'Alas, I am not teasing you. Rather, I genuinely am not sure if I can help you or not.'

"Oh."

'You're aware that the Library has a will of its own, yes?'

"Yeah-huh?"

'Then perhaps it will come as no surprise to you that if the Library does not wish for you to find something, then you will not find it.'

"3487

"HMMMMM." Ibai had to mull that notion over. "Well, now I'm torn, because that sounds like a fun puzzle to solve. Going against the Library? Unlocking its secrets despite its best efforts hide them? What a great game!" He bobbed his head to one side. "But on the other hand, might it actually be more fun to try and earn the Library's trust? I mean, I've been working that angle for a while already, so it would probably be faster to simply continue on like so, eh?"

'Not merely faster, but also possible. As I said, if it doesn't want you to find something, then you have no hope of finding it. The Library will forever conceal it from you.'

"Oh, quit that! Don't try and tempt me now! It won't work!"

'I am not trying to tempt you. I am merely warning that--'

"It won't work, I said!" And he broke for a short laugh. "If this were just matter of my own academic interest and desire to have a boatload of fun, then sure, you'd have tricked me down that first path like the super smart squid lady that you are--and I'd have been pleased as punch about it, too! But unfortunately, there's more at stake here than just that. Can't justify taking that kind of risk."

'Again, I was not trying to trick you--'

"My heart shan't waver! Don't worry about it! Though I may long for a puzzle to solve, I must stay the clearer course!"

'Alright, whatever.'

"Might you have any tips about how to get on the Library's good side?"

'None whatsoever.'

"Aww, shucks, really?"

'The Library is a capricious, ravenous, amoral monstrosity. I do not think it has the capacity to trust or love you or anyone else, even in the most minor of ways.'

Ibai pressed his lips together flatly. "Pretty harsh, bro."

'Do not call me that.'

"Sis?"

'Nor that.'

“Sibling? Oh, or?! Squidbling?!”

‘Ugh, what the--?’

“Look, you can’t be sayin’ stuff like that about the Library and still expect it to fall in love with you. I’m sure it can hear you. And words hurt, you know.”

‘What nonsense are you talking now?’

“In fact, you should probably apologize.”

‘For what? I merely spoke the truth.’

“Mmmmm, I dunno...”

‘Of course you do not know. You know nothing of this place, while I have been here for decades.’

“Okay, but even if what you said was true--or partially true, maybe--I’m sure there was still a nicer way you could have phrased it, right?”

‘You are beginning to annoy me.’”

"3488

“Am I?” said Ibai. “I apologize. Much like you should!”

‘You are getting sidetracked. Weren’t you saying that you had something important to do?’

“I did say that, yes! You’re a good listener!”

‘I presume it has to do with the Elroy girl’s current circumstances.’

“You’re good at presuming, too!”

‘You think the Library can help her?’

“That’s the hope. Dunno how plausible it is, though.”

‘Not at all, I’d wager.’

“Hmm? You just said it was possible, though, didn’t you?”

‘No. Winning its favor may be possible. Unlikely, perhaps, but possible. But acquiring its help for the girl? That is a different matter, unfortunately. ‘Tis is a fool’s errand, I’m afraid.’

“Dang. Why you gotta be such a downer about it, though?”

‘You told me of her current state before, remember? If the Master was truly the one to put her into that trance, then the Library will not help. He is its Keeper, and it will not go against him.’

“Yeah, but what if I ask it really nicely?”

‘Your jests belie your desperation. And while I sympathize with your plight, I think you would be better off not wasting your time on it. The Master has obviously taken an interest in her and will therefore not abandon her. Sooner or later, he will return and revive her, and given that she is undead, it does not matter how delayed his return might be. She will be fine, regardless.’

“All fair points,” said Ibai. “But I also can’t help thinking that maybe you’re overestimating how much the Library cares about Gohvis’ opinion. Didn’t you just get done saying how capricious it is? Even if he is its Keeper, does that really matter?”

‘I have never once seen it move against him.’

“Well, there’s a first time for everything. Plus, it wouldn’t even be going against him by aiding me. That’s a false dichotomy! It’s not like we’re sworn enemies or anything! I think Gohvis is a swell guy! Reads my books, you know! Very thoughtful, him!”

‘Uh-huh... Nothing I say will convince you to give up, will it?’

“Proly not. I like to think I’m open to having my mind changed, but sometimes, you’ve just gotta stand firm, don’t you think?”

‘Clearly, what I think doesn’t matter.’

“Aw, don’t be like that! Hey, what say I put in a good word for you once I’ve won the Library over, eh? Maybe help repair some of the bad blood between the two of you? Because there’s bad blood, right? I’m definitely sensing some bad blood.””

"3489

‘I have no desire to curry favor with a building,’ said the Weaver.

“Why not? What do you have against buildings?”

‘Enough silliness. If you are so determined to befriend the Library, then you will find no help from me.’

“Really? Not even a little bit?”

‘I do not know anything that would be of use to you.’

“Are you sure? What if you just don’t know that you know? They call those kinds of things unknown unknowns. Y’know?”

‘If that is so, then I would still have no way of detecting and then imparting said knowledge to you.’

“Unless I ask you the right questions! Triggering your deeply rooted, ancient wisdom!”

‘I’m not THAT old, I’ll have you know.’

“And yet you’re still so full of ancient wisdom! It’s all the more impressive when you look at it like that!”

‘Flattery is pointless and beneath you.’

“It’s not flattery if I’m just speaking the truth, is it?”

‘Yes, it still is. The intent is what matters.’

“Huh. Well, my intentions are entirely pure, so I’m pretty sure that I’m covered there, too.” And before she could give another sidetracking retort, he decided to push the conversation forward. “Anyway! Question time! It’ll be a fun game! You like games, don’t you? I sure do!”

‘Is that the first question? Because yes, I do happen to enjoy a good game, now and again.’

“Perfect! What a great start!”

‘Go on, then. See if you can uncover something within my mind that even I have forgotten about.’

“Okay! Hmm! Let’s see here... Now what would be a good subject to begin with...?"

'You have no idea? After all that bluster, I thought you had some sort of plan, but you really are just winging it, aren't you?'

"Oh, I know! The first time you arrived at the Library! How'd you come to be here, exactly?"

'Is this game just an excuse to ask me personal questions?'

"No! Of course not! Maybe a little!"

That earned a silent titter from her. 'I was brought here by the Master, of course. He wanted to provide a place for me to rest and recover after... a particularly trying ordeal.'

"Oh? Mysterious. What was the nature of this ordeal, hmm?"

'Let's keep these questions relevant to the Library itself, shall we?'

"Aww. But okay. In that case, how long ago was it that you arrived here?"

'Decades, as I already said.'

"Yeah, but how many decades, exactly?"

'Many.'

"So like seven?"

'I'm not that old!'

"Alright, but then stop saying things that make me think you are!"

'Look, the truth is, I do not quite recall how long it has been. Time... is a rather loose concept for me. I do not feel its passing as I once did.'

"...Sounds like something a really old person would say."

'Oh, shut up!'"

"3490

"Okay, okay, sorry. I'll stop calling you old. I can see how sensitive you are about the subject, which tells me that you might, for some reason, be lying to me about it, but I suppose that's neither here nor there. Let me ask something--"

'I'm not lying! I'm still young, damn you!'

Dang. He'd just been teasing her, but with all her protestations, now he was genuinely starting to believe that she was hundreds or even thousands of years old, somehow.

His big, toothy smile probably wouldn't have helped her mood very much, but thankfully, the room was too dark for her to see it.

'And wipe that shit-eating grin off your stupid face.'

Oh. Well, nevermind.

"Anywho! Next question! You're doing great so far, by the way! Very cooperative!"

She just returned a psychic grumble.

"Do you know of any other secret passageways, like the one that leads to this room here?"

'Sure. There's one that leads to an underground garden on the lower levels. And one to a bathing chamber, where certain historical figures were known to get up to all sorts of naughty hijinks.'

"Ooooh."

'If you visit that second one, however, then I would take great caution, were I you. The waters there have been neglected and stagnant for eons. It would not surprise me if they are rancid or even toxic.'

"Ewwwww. But neat! Any other cool spots to know about? Like, say, a secret inner sanctum full of secret, inner-sanctum-y reading materials?"

'Oh, of course.'

"Really?!"

'No! I already told that I don't know how to reach such areas! I would have directed you to them straight away if I did.'

"Ah."

‘You think I would’ve forgotten about something so important?’

“Well. I mean. I didn’t want to bring up your age again, but...”

‘I will turn your insufferable little mind into a Jesbolese knot if you keep this up.’

“Mmmmm. So what made you come to believe that the Library hides stuff from us, then? Was there a particular place that you’ve tried to find but just couldn’t?”

‘If you’re asking whether or not I’ve ever personally searched for this “inner sanctum” as you called it, then yes, I have. And to no avail, obviously.’

“And yet you’re still convinced that it exists?”

‘The Master has mentioned it. I believe he knows how to reach it. And others, most likely.’

“Makes sense, I guess. Where did you search, exactly?”

‘Everywhere. Every floor. Behind every wall. Beyond every brick. Between every nook and cranny.’

“Sounds a little exaggerated...”

"3491

‘You test my patience yet again. I assure you that I was entirely thorough. There must be some strange mechanism by which the Library can conceal its pathways. To my mind, the most likely reason is that it is able to shift walls and hallways or even entire rooms as it pleases.’

“Yeah, that sounds like something that this cheeky building might do.”

‘But that is only my guess. I fear there may be yet more to it. Some other component that I am unable to even imagine.’

Ibai stuck on that notion for a moment, rubbing his chin as he thought about it. “Some other component, huh? Interesting...”

‘Might you have some idea?’

“Oh, it’s too soon to say anything about that. Wild speculation can come later!”

‘That’s not really what I was getting at.’

“Do you know who built the Library of Erudia?”

‘Ah. Now that is a complicated subject. This place is as ancient as they come. ‘Tis a remnant of the many lost civilizations that once called Exoltha home.’

“Many? Not just one?”

‘Oh yes. It was a long-continued project, spanning generations and bringing together cultural figureheads from across this continent. Kings and queens, prophets and apostles, akhunds and mobads. Many were brought together in the shared pursuit of the preservation of knowledge.’

“Mm! That was a really big deal back in those days, wasn’t it? Because they’d had so much trouble with heretical book burnings and whatnot, right?”

‘Oh, indeed. You’re familiar with the history?’

“A tad.”

‘Yes, wars were fought over these matters. It was certainly no coincidence that brought all of these learned men together. Many would have needed little or no convincing about the importance of the undertaking, having personally witnessed barbaric hordes descending upon their beloved institutions of learning.’

Ibai just nodded along silently.

‘As for who, precisely, began the long venture of trying to build the Library: I believe that information has been lost to time. Too many others came to be involved in its creation over such a long period of time. And there are quite a number of fantastic tales surrounding the various stages of its construction, too. It may be an impervious fortress now, but that is only because many brave people sacrificed everything in order to protect it while it was still vulnerable.’

“I read a bit about that, not long ago,” said Ibai. “There were something like forty sieges on this place before it was finished.””

"3492

‘You read about it?’ said the Weaver. ‘When?’

He paused for a shrug. “A couple weeks ago, maybe? Can’t remember which book. There’ve been lots.”

‘Hmm. Unfortunate. If you could find that book again, I would be interested in reading it myself.’

“Oh, okay! Sure, I’ll definitely find it for you! Wow! I kinda figured that you’d already read all the books here ‘r something.”

‘That would be an impossible feat, surely.’

“Guess so, huh? Especially with some of ‘em being hidden ‘n all.”

‘Indeed.’

“But wait a tick. Where did you learn about the history of the Library, then? Not from one of the books here?”

‘No, I...’

Ibai waited for her to finish, but it seemed like she wasn’t going to.

“You keep trying to convince me you’re not super old, but if you didn’t read about it in a book, then are you sure you don’t just remember the history?”

‘It is a personal matter.’

“Yeah, that makes sense. Remembering stuff is very personal.”

‘No, I mean--ugh. You know what, you silly aberration? Fine. You’ve worn me down. If you must know the truth, I did read about it in a book, just not one from the Library of Erudition.’

“Ooooh. So you’re like a huge nerd, then! Always visiting libraries and stuff!” And he laughed.

For some reason, she made no response.

“Oh, but I don’t mean that in like a bad way or anything! I think I’m pretty nerdy myself. So we're like kindred spirits, is what I'm saying!"

'Uh... huh.'

"Anyway, you were saying? About the Library being built and protected by loads of cool and heroic people?"

'I'd finished my point, more or less. Unless there was something specific you wished to ask about.'

"Hmm-hmm. Um. Lemme see." Dang, this was a tough one.

He tried to focus. Which was not something that he attempted to do very often. Usually, he preferred to just let his mind go wherever it wanted. What was the point in trying to force his thoughts in a particular direction? Where was the fun? Where was the freedom?

But this was important. If he could just figure out a way to find the Library's secret stash of super cool books, then maybe he could figure out a way to help Emiliana.

So he decided not to just try. He decided to really try.

What questions could he ask the Weaver that might reveal some type of hidden clue?

"HMMMMMMMMMMMM..."

"3493

'...Are you alright?' said the Weaver. 'You look like you're in pain.'

He barely even heard her and certainly couldn't afford to formulate a response. He was busy. Thinking.

Because there was definitely something there. Something deep in his head.

Where? Exactly? Was it?

Something he'd read, maybe? Yeah...

In ancient times, places like this were even more difficult to build than they were today. Frequently, but not always, they were the work of brilliant servants--or brilliant architects who employed servants. Exceptions existed all around the world, grand buildings that had been the product of pure, normal human labor--such as the Great Cocoran Cathedral of Trenoy.

Yes. That was the ticket. Servants were not always part of the construction, but something else was. Every single time. The common denominator between the constructions of all these super-ancient structures.

They'd been built for the gods.

That was, perhaps, the greatest difference between the ancient world and modern day, Ibai thought. People back then revered the gods with an almost unfathomable passion, compared to today.

So this place must have been no different.

"...Which god was the Library of Erudia built in dedication to?" was what came out of his mouth.

'Oh, that's a tough question, but as it so happens, I do know the answer to it.'

"Cool!"

'As with most things regarding the Library, it is a complicated matter. But first, are you already aware of the Dáinnbolg's relevance to your question?'

He blinked. The Eternal Storm? The thing blanketing all of Exoltha and causing it to be the so-called 'dead continent?' His curiosity had just doubled at the mere mention of it. "No. What does that have to do with this?"

'Supposedly, the Dáinnbolg is the long-lingering work of Hada, the God of Storms and Wrath. Otherwise known as He Who Hates All Humanity.'

"Oh! Wow, really? That would make a lot of sense!"

'Supposedly, I said. There's no way to know for sure. In fact, perhaps Hada was merely blamed for it because of how sensible the idea SEEMED.'

"Ah. Hmm. That'd be a real bummer for him, eh?"

‘Regardless, the story goes that Hada was once the caretaker of Exoltha--and also the progenitor of its inhabitants.’

“Wait, really? He created people? Despite famously wanting all of us dead?”

‘Yes, it is a contradiction. Perhaps this story is false. Or perhaps this occurred before his hatred grew to be so strong. Or perhaps it is WHY it grew so strong. If only we could find him and ask him for clarification personally. Preferably without being instantly obliterated.’

"3494

“Huh,” said Ibai. “Makes me wonder what people made by such an angry guy would’ve been like.”

‘That’s a key part of the tale,’ she said. ‘As the story goes, they took after him. TOO much so, in fact. Rather than worshiping him, they hated and cursed him at every opportunity. Never built a single temple in his honor, apparently.’

Ibai bit his lip, holding in a laugh. “Yikes.”

‘They had a long and storied history of rebelling against their creator--trying to slay him, even. Until eventually, Hada grew fed up with them and began brewing the Dáinnbolg as a form of final punishment.’

“Ah. Hmm.”

‘But his people, just like him, were far too stubborn to roll over and die. So they set to work building as many new things as they could, trying to counter Hada’s unending wrath with invincible structures.’

“Oh! So the Library was one of those, then?”

‘Yes. But even among those exceptional structures, the Library was still quite special, because not only was it built as a form of rebellion against Hada, but it was also built in dedication to three other gods.’

“Say what?”

‘I already told you that many people came together to build this place, right?’

“Yeah-huh?”

‘Well, some of them were worshipers of other gods. And the “anti-worshipers” of Hada apparently didn’t mind.’

“Ooh.” He sucked some air in through his teeth. “Ouch. That’s gotta sting, if you’re Hada, right? Not only are your own people turning against you. They’re also going to your relatives? And your relatives aren’t saying no, either? Dang, dude.”

‘Quite. So you can see how this tale might have done little to soothe Hada’s hatred of us.’

“I’d be surprised if it didn’t make him hate us even more. I kinda feel bad for the guy, honestly.”

‘Well, I wouldn’t expend too much empathy on him, if I were you. I don’t think I’ve ever read or heard a single nice thing about Hada. In fact, if he is or ever was real, then I would argue that he was the single most colossal bastard to have ever existed.’

“Really? That’s pretty harsh.”

‘Know what the first cause was for his hatred of humanity? The thing that got the ball rolling?’

“No, what?”

‘He wanted to eat us. And when we fought back, he didn’t like it. And from there, the hatred just built and built.’

“Huh...”

‘Still empathizing with him?’

“Well, I mean, that’s just one example of a bad thing. And first impressions can be really awkward and unfortunate, y’know? Maybe later on, he could’ve--”

‘He had a preference for devouring children.’

Ibai’s face scrunched up."

"3495

‘And that’s just the tip of the iceberg, frankly. There are many, many terrible stories of Hada being absolutely horrible. I’m surprised you aren’t more familiar with them.’

Truthfully, he was. He just hadn’t wanted to jump to conclusions. Just because Hada might’ve been a big ol’ jerk a hundred times in a row didn’t mean he couldn’t still be a nice guy on that hundred and first time, right?

Ibai made the rare decision of keep that thought to himself. He had a rather strong feeling that the Weaver either wouldn’t understand or would try to argue with him. Or maybe both.

And they’d already gotten sidetracked quite a bit.

‘Welp. Alright, then. So who were these three other gods that the Library was dedicated to?’

‘Makirë, Ettol, and Xixa.’

He had to pause and think about those, trying to recall anything he might have ever read about them. “Xixa... is the Goddess of Secrets, yes?”

‘That’s right. If one were to believe in her, then it’d be reasonable to think that she would make great use of a place like this.’

‘Yeah. All the more reason to think that there are plenty of juicy secrets here, waiting to be uncovered.’

‘True enough. But Xixa was also known as the Goddess of Darkness and the Goddess of Beauty. So if you’re trying to read something into her supposed involvement, then perhaps you should take those monikers into account, too.’

“Hmm. ‘Kay. What about the other two, though? I’m not as familiar with them. In fact, I’m not sure I’ve ever heard of them, even.”

‘No? Perhaps that is not surprising. They are both rather odd and mysterious figures. Makirë was known as the Goddess of Wonder, Youth, and the Stars. Ettol was known as the God of Impulse, Deceit, and Rebirth. The stories about them are always quite strange.’

‘How so?’

‘Well, Makirë, for instance, is frequently depicted as an elderly woman with a very childish demeanor. She is regularly abrasive and even cruel--much how children can be. But her tales often involve helping people come to terms with some horrific truth--and then providing some manner of comfort or aid. I remember one story in which she appears before a man who is terminally ill. She makes him relive many important moments in his life, showing him his own ugliness and mistreatment of others, chastising him ruthlessly and tormenting him psychologically with impossible hypothetical quandaries. And yet in the end, she accepts his apologies, restores him to youthful vigor, and then takes him with her to visit a new world among the stars."

"3496

"Huh," mused Ibai, a smile reforming on his lips again. "Sounds like an interesting person to talk to!"

The Weaver tittered another time. 'You think so, do you? I do not know if I would agree, but I can at least say with confidence that I would enjoy listening to YOU speak to her.'

"Meeting new people is always fun," he said.

'I shan't try to rain on your parade. As for Ettol, I assume you are also curious about him?'

"Of course! What's his deal? God of Deceit, right? That doesn't sound very flattering."

'Yes. Most of the primordial gods are portrayed, at times, as both benevolent and malicious, depending on which story you are hearing or reading. But Ettol has, without a doubt, the wildest swings in portrayal out of any of them. In some tales, he tricks his victims into the cruelest of circumstances imaginable. I remember a story in which he appears in the dreams of a young, newlywed man, promising him riches, glory, and power if he would only leave his pregnant wife behind to pursue them.

'The young man does so, and over the course of his journey, the lad is cursed by a witch and turned into a cotton-eating weevil. The "riches" he earns are a field of cotton, so that he will never again go hungry. The "glory" he earns is that he becomes king of his fellow weevils. And the "power" he earns is immortality, which Ettol grants to him directly after appearing before him again and explaining the previous two “rewards.”

Ibai's smile diminished as he continued to listen with widening eyes.

‘In another story, however, Ettol appears in the dreams of a young woman who has a vile and cruel mother. He lays out a plan for her to take up a knife while the woman is out gathering wood for a fire, then plunge it into her heart after she falls asleep. But when the girl refuses, Ettol changes her mother's heart, filling it with love and kindness for her daughter so that the two may live happily thereafter.’

“I see...”

‘But those are just the stories where he plays the part of a trickster god. He frequently appears in the stories of other gods, albeit stealthily so. You may read one story about Lhutwë, for example, wherein a sea serpent is featured prominently and Ettol is never mentioned. But then you may find out in an entirely different story that Ettol was that sea serpent all along and that he was either helping Lhutwë or throwing a wrench into the Water God's scheme by aiding the involved humans. That is the type of god he is.”

"3497 -- CCXCII.

“Interesting,” said Ibai. “He doesn't sound too terrible, in that case. Apart from being a little judgmental. And manipulative.”

‘And unpredictable,’ said the Weaver. ‘Out of the all the primordial gods I've read about, he may be the one that I would fear the most.’

“Really? That doesn't seem right. Hada seems way scarier. At least Ettol would have a chance of being on your side.”

‘No, but that's the thing. Ettol would at first appear to be your friend. Maybe even someone you already know quite well. In fact, you may never even know he was there to begin with until he had already passed judgment on you. With Hada, at least you could see him coming and try to prepare yourself.’

Ibai bobbed his head. “I gotta say... I find it a little curious how he's also the God of Rebirth, along with Impulse and Deceit. Do you know how he got those names?”

‘I do not. But it appears to be a pattern with each of the Primordials.

They all have three monikers.'

"A trinity of power," observed Ibai.

She paused at that. 'I... yes. I hadn't thought of it that way, but yes, perhaps that is exactly right. Hmm.'

"I wonder what it really means to be a 'god.'"

'A good question, if ever there was one.'

"Mmhmm. Think I wanna go do some reading, now."

'Ah, okay. So was any of that helpful? If you're able to somehow figure out the Library's deepest, darkest secrets from just that bit of information, then I'd sure love to hear about how and why.'

"Oh, it was super helpful! Thank you!"

'Uh-huh. What do you plan to do now? After your next reading session, I mean.'

Another big grin split his face. "Simple! I'm gonna write a new book!"

Chapter Two Hundred Ninety-Two: 'The Dragons in the Rain...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

The battle was a foregone conclusion. Abolish and the VMP's forces were holding out for now, but it was only a matter of time. From this high vantage point among the rocky hills northeast of Ridgemark, Zeff Elroy could see most of the battlefield.

The allied Rainlord forces had managed to flank the enemy fairly well, though the geography of the area still left a rather clear route for them to retreat, whenever they decided to do so.

Perhaps the Rainlords could have done more to prevent that, to circle around and cut them off completely, but time had been a factor.

And of course, there was also the ancient consideration of honor on the battlefield. While Abolish may not have deserved it, the many thousands of non-servants within the VMP's army did."

"3497 -- CCXCII.

“Interesting,” said Ibai. “He doesn’t sound too terrible, in that case. Apart from being a little judgmental. And manipulative.”

‘And unpredictable,’ said the Weaver. ‘Out of the all the primordial gods I’ve read about, he may be the one that I would fear the most.’

“Really? That doesn’t seem right. Hada seems way scarier. At least Ettol would have a chance of being on your side.”

‘No, but that’s the thing. Ettol would at first appear to be your friend. Maybe even someone you already know quite well. In fact, you may never even know he was there to begin with until he had already passed judgment on you. With Hada, at least you could see him coming and try to prepare yourself.’

Ibai bobbed his head. “I gotta say... I find it a little curious how he’s also the God of Rebirth, along with Impulse and Deceit. Do you know how he got those names?”

‘I do not. But it appears to be a pattern with each of the Primordials. They all have three monikers.’

“A trinity of power,” observed Ibai.

She paused at that. ‘... yes. I hadn’t thought of it that way, but yes, perhaps that is exactly right. Hmm.’

“I wonder what it really means to be a ‘god.’”

‘A good question, if ever there was one.’

“Mmhmm. Think I wanna go do some reading, now.”

‘Ah, okay. So was any of that helpful? If you’re able to somehow figure out the Library’s deepest, darkest secrets from just that bit of information, then I’d sure love to hear about how and why.’

“Oh, it was super helpful! Thank you!”

‘Uh-huh. What do you plan to do now? After your next reading session, I mean.’

Another big grin split his face. “Simple! I’m gonna write a new book!”

Chapter Two Hundred Ninety-Two: 'The Dragons in the Rain...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

The battle was a foregone conclusion. Abolish and the VMP's forces were holding out for now, but it was only a matter of time. From this high vantage point among the rocky hills northeast of Ridgemark, Zeff Elroy could see most of the battlefield.

The allied Rainlord forces had managed to flank the enemy fairly well, though the geography of the area still left a rather clear route for them to retreat, whenever they decided to do so.

Perhaps the Rainlords could have done more to prevent that, to circle around and cut them off completely, but time had been a factor.

And of course, there was also the ancient consideration of honor on the battlefield. While Abolish may not have deserved it, the many thousands of non-servants within the VMP's army did."

"3498

Since time immemorial, the Rainlords had not been in the habit of massacring non-servant armies without leaving them the chance to retreat. They considered it dishonorable both as warriors and as servants. In fact, Rainlords who disregarded that unwritten rule were historically punished quite severely--even disowned as Rainlords, in certain extreme cases.

Their Arman ancestors had not been the same way, however.

That was one of the reasons why Rainlords had decided to distinguish themselves as such in the first place: to break away from the utter ruthlessness that the Armans had been known for while still trying to pay them homage for all that they accomplished.

Zeff sometimes wondered if that was a fruitless effort, though. Or a self-deceptive one, perhaps.

This barbarism that he felt in his heart. This anger. This desire to go forth and destroy his enemies. Maybe it was just in his blood. Maybe it always had been.

Maybe Parson Miles had been right about that much, at least.

Foolish thoughts.

He shook his head and took a deep breath before looking out across the vast horizon again.

He was torn in equal parts as he considered heading back out there to do battle. On one hand, it wasn't his turn. He was supposed to be taking rest. But on the other, he wasn't tired, and this bloodlust wasn't calming down.

But on the other other hand, that probably wasn't a good sign, was it?

He shouldn't indulge this feeling, now.

Discipline. Self-control. He needed these more than ever. He knew he did.

Because his son had not been here. Francisco had not been among his captured kin.

He'd come so far, done so much, and tried so hard to temper his expectations for fear of disappointment--and none of it had mattered.

The disappointment had been crushing, just the same.

Gema. Francisco. Emiliana.

Three of his five children. All missing. And in fact, Francisco was now the one whose whereabouts he knew the least about. Where in the world were you, boy? What had you gotten thrown into?

He wanted to have confidence in him. The boy was certainly tough for his age, but in some ways, that was worrisome, too. Cisco had always struggled to make friends. Or... perhaps it was that Cisco had never cared to make friends.

Zeff wasn't sure which. But either way, out there in the world, all on his own, Zeff might've felt more relief if Cisco were the friendlier sort. It was almost always better to make allies out of people who might otherwise be his enemies.

Zeff felt like he himself had taken far too long to learn that particular lesson. Hell, he still questioned whether he actually had or not.

Why did that boy have to take after him so much?

Damn it all."

"3499

A string of explosions sputtered across the battlefield in the distance. Diego's handiwork, perhaps?

Maybe not. Zeff was probably being too hopeful. Such an impressive attack might've been too much for the young "Red Hunter" to pull off, still. He'd heard that Diego had achieved emergence at Logden, but he'd yet to see him in action since then.

"I see that you are still a fan of venturing off on your own to brood," came a voice from behind him.

He just kept leaning on the metal wall that one of the other servants had materialized around their encampment. He didn't need to turn around to know that it was Octavia Redwater approaching. He wanted to respond, but a fitting retort wasn't coming to mind. Except, perhaps, one that would be needlessly rude.

And that was the last thing he wanted to be to someone whom he owed so much.

"You're not so different, after all, I think." Her tone had an old and familiar softness to it. Enough so that it briefly transported him back to his teenage years.

And despite his mood, he couldn't help smiling just a bit. "God, it's good to have you back, Octavia."

"Hoho! Thank you. You're more affectionate than I remember, though." She leaned over next to him and bumped into him purposely.

"Heh. Maybe I've finally learned to cherish what I have while I still have it."

"Doubt it."

He snorted. "Have the others been saying that I've changed?"

“Oh, I don’t know. I’m not one for gossip.”

“You are one for lying, though, apparently.”

“How hurtful.” She allowed a beat to pass. “Okay, fine, maybe I’ve been listening to a few rumors. But I had to! So much to catch up on, you know!”

“I do know, indeed. You’ve been sorely missed.”

“Aww.” She bumped him again. “From the sound of things, you’re really coming into your own as the Water Dragon of Sair.”

Now that, he did not believe at all, and he couldn’t stop himself from scoffing.

“What’s that sound for?”

“I’ve done nothing but fail ever since...” He shook his head and blinked slowly, trying to recall. “Lakefire, I’m not even sure how long it’s been, anymore.”

“Ah. The brooding, then. I see.”

He could already tell what she was getting at. And she wasn’t wrong, he knew. “I’m sorry. I should be happier with our great victory.””

"3500

“Don’t apologize, boy. You should feel whatever way you want, right now. It’s a difficult position you’re in. Whatever you have to do to cope, you go ahead and do it. All I ask is that you pick something that’s not self-destructive. And brooding, well... brooding is questionable on that front, I’m afraid, but you certainly could’ve picked a worse mechanism.”

Zeff made no response.

“Dwell on things too much? Drive yourself crazy. But at the same time, it’s healthier than going off and venting your frustrations via bloodlust. Or actual lust. Or, god forbid, by abusing the people you’re supposed to love. Next to all that stuff, brooding doesn’t seem so bad to me.”

“...Seen that all before, haven’t you?”

"I have. Along with even worse examples, if you can believe it. The kind of examples that are still too painful to even utter."

He had a vague idea of what she might've been referring to, but it would've been wrong to push, he felt.

She wasn't done talking, though. Her wrinkled hand found his face, and she made him turn to look her in the eye with that steady, steely gaze of hers that she rarely ever resorted to. "So if you need to brood, then brood. Just don't forget that we're all still here for you, too, my dear. And that the world isn't a completely dark place, much as it might sometimes feel like it."

His eyes eased shut, and he took her hand in his own. "Thank you."

And for a while, she just stood there with him in silence as they looked over the battlefield together.

"...Think I see rain on the horizon," she said.

He spotted the clouds she was talking about. Barely visible now, but quite dark. She was probably right.

"Y'know," she went on, "supposedly, our ancestors could tell the difference between a good storm and bad storm from two days away. Or more, even."

A good storm or a bad storm. An interesting distinction, but one that he and all other Rainlords were familiar with. A bad storm was the kind that brought nothing but destruction. The kind that did nothing but ruin or take lives.

A good storm, though? A good storm was the kind that cleaned the roads and swept all the stagnant water away. The kind that children could dance and play in without fear of being carried off by terrible winds or surging rivers.

"I wonder if I'm there yet," she said. "Got a feeling in my bones. Like this one will be a good storm."

"3501

Zeff smiled another time. "I hope you're right." Coming from anyone else, he wouldn't have believed it, but from her? Maybe she really did have that kind of power.

The sun waned in the sky. The day's hostilities would soon come to an end, unless some eager warriors out there were feeling bold or desperate enough to launch a night raid.

Which was possible.

By his estimation, the VMP's spirit was already broken, so the subset of Abolish forces were almost certainly at the end of their rope. Desperation might very well be on the menu tonight.

If they did launch an attack, though, it would be their last. Zeff would make sure of that.

"...So tell me more of this Lord Darksteel of Warrenhold that has been providing so much aid to us," said Octavia. "You have gotten to know him quite well, from what I hear."

"I suppose I have."

"So spill. There are quite a number of rumors circulating about him. What is your opinion of him?"

"My opinion..." Hmm. Why did that seem like such a hard thing to provide? "Umm..."

Octavia just waited for him.

Whenever it came to Hector, Zeff had this impulse to be... stricter than perhaps he should have. He knew this. For the boy's own good, that felt right and necessary.

Now was not the time for that, though. Octavia had only met him briefly back at Rheinhal, and her asking like this was probably more than mere curiosity. It was trust in Zeff's judgment.

If he said something overly harsh, she would take it to heart.

"...He has been a truer ally and friend to us than I could have possibly ever hoped for," said Zeff.

"Oh my."

"But if you tell him I said that, I'll deny it."

She laughed outright. "I see!"

Zeff just let her keep laughing.

“That is a relief, then,” she said. “I was a bit worried when I heard about just how much we’ve apparently gotten entangled with him, but if you think so highly of him, then there must be something to it. I know you don’t extend your trust very easily.”

Zeff had to wonder if she’d wanted to add an “anymore” to the end of that last statement. It was kind of her not to, but he was fully aware that his trust in the Vanguard was a very large part of the reason why any of them were in this situation in the first place.

But maybe he was just reading too much into her words."
"3502

“Tis quite a rare thing, though,” Octavia went on. “Finding such a stalwart supporter at a time like this. In the face of both the Vanguard and Abolish. I have made many foreign friends over the years, but I do not know if any of them would have stuck their neck out for us as much as this fellow has. Going by all I’ve heard about him so far, I can’t help thinking that he must be either an incredibly confident warrior or one of the biggest fools I’ve ever heard of.”

“He’s neither of those things,” said Zeff, lowering his voice somewhat. No one was around to overhear, but it still felt appropriate. “He’s something far more dangerous. To both his enemies and to himself.” He leveled a stare at the old woman. “He’s an astero. And easily the most powerful one I’ve ever seen. While also still being the youngest, too, I think.”

She pulled away from him a little, and her head reared back. “An astero...” She needed a few moments to chew on that thought, apparently. “How young?”

“I don’t know for sure. He and his reaper are understandably reluctant to say, but... that just makes me think that the number might be even lower than I first suspected. Which is terrifying, honestly.”

“What is your guess, then?”

He couldn’t help hesitating. “...I think he may be as young... or even younger than my own children.” And he watched her face. He could practically see the gears turning in her head.

“So not even twenty, then?”

“No. Well, yes. But I meant... younger than them as servants.”

She blinked at him. “Tell me you’re joking.”

He just shook his head.

“So you’re saying he’s... what, less than eight? Seven?”

“Honestly, I think he may even be less than five.”

“That’s not... that...” The thought went unfinished as her hand found her own forehead. “I heard he bested Banda Toro in single combat and captured his reaper. Banda Toro. Do you know who that is? That is someone I might struggle with!”

Zeff did indeed know. Those Blackburn Triplets hadn’t been able to shut up about it. Not that the reapers were much better.

And frankly, Zeff didn’t know if he believed it or not. Even if it was all completely true, knowing Hector as he did, there was probably still more to the story, somehow.

Octavia was still going, though. “--and that is just one of the absurd things that I have heard! Yet you are trying to tell me that he--?! That he’s--?!”

Zeff just waited for her. This was a strange sight, indeed. He wasn’t sure he’d ever seen this woman fumble over her words before.

Heh.”

"3503

She took a few more moments to regain her composure. “...What is with that look on your face, huh? Am I amusing you, hmm?”

“I won’t deny it. In fact, I might just have to thank Hector for letting me see a new side of the ever-calm Lady of the Red Lake.”

“Zeff... are you telling me the truth? This is not some twisted joke to get a rise out of me? Because if it is, then I will be relieved but still quite unhappy. I've never known you to lie for fun."

"It's no lie," said Zeff. "I've been training him extensively. In retrospect, his prowess was already impressive from the start, but there were still obvious gaps in his knowledge. Now, though...?"

"Now, what? He's changed that much in so short a time?"

"Yes and no. He's reached a point where it is difficult for me to gauge his true strength. Primarily because he has an annoying habit of holding back during training."

"That's not proof, then," said Octavia. "He could've been playing ignorant in the beginning. And the reason he holds back now is because he is still trying to conceal his true strength from you. Which would be wise of him."

Zeff chortled. "If he was pretending from the start, then he is an incredible actor. He even managed to fake having pathetically weak soul power."

"Ah..."

"Yes."

"I've... heard that's possible, too," said Octavia, though she sounded like even she didn't believe it.

"Well, regardless, you can come to your own conclusions when you meet him yourself."

She paused to exhale. "An astero to such an extreme degree..."

Her tone was making him curious. "I said he's the most powerful one I've ever seen, but what about you? How many asteros have you encountered in your life, Octavia?"

She took her time answering that one. "A fair few, I suppose. I'd guess maybe... two or three per decade. But what you're describing is... it's almost unheard of."

He stuck on that. "Almost?"

She shook her head. "I'm sure the reapers would know more. You must have discussed this matter with Axiolis by now, surely, no?"

"Of course."

"And what did he have to say?"

"Now that I'm thinking about it... surprisingly little. But it has also been a while since we talked about it, so perhaps I should bring it up again."

"Ugh."

"We have been quite busy, you know."

"You bring him over here, right now, young man. I want to talk to him."

Zeff snickered. "Okay." That was one order he was happy to follow. Listening to Octavia Redwater chew out one of the oldest reapers on the planet sounded like quite a good time to him."

"3504

It didn't take long for Axiolis to show up, nor did it take long for Octavia to start laying into him.

"Axiolis, you old secret-keeper! What's the matter with you?! How have you not been talking Zeff's ear off about this whole astero situation with our new friend?! I know you must have some rather strong opinions about it, and yet Zeff tells me you've said 'surprisingly little' about the matter! Explain yourself!"

'I'm glad to see you so spirited, Octavia.'

"Oh, thank you, darling. You know me. Can't keep me down for long."

'Heh.'

"Now answer my damn questions."

But apparently, the reaper was not going to be rushed. He took his time as he circled around the two of them, perhaps mulling over his next words. '...Could you ask something more specific? What exactly is it that you want me to tell you?'

"Hmph. Well, to begin with, how about the precedent for this whole thing? You must have seen countless asteros over the course of your life. Have you ever encountered a more extreme case than this one?"

‘...Not more extreme, no. But comparable, at least.’

Zeff perked up at that. “You never mentioned that.”

‘Mm. While I can understand your fascination with the subject, I am also... not so interested in discussing them anymore, myself.’

Octavia seemed to lose most of her fire. “Why?”

The reaper paused for a silent sigh. ‘Because never have I known their stories to progress happily. And their endings...’ Axiolis just shook his piscine head.

Zeff and Octavia were both quiet.

‘It is in their very nature, of course,’ said Ax. ‘Their shocking growth is due to their turbulent and terrible lives. But the world is vast, and eventually... well, eventually, what luck they have--if any--finally runs out.’

“You’re afraid, then,” said Octavia.

‘Absolutely, I am.’

Hmm. Zeff had to pick him up on that. “The rain fears not the torch, Ax.”

‘True. But it is not for myself or any of us that I am afraid, Zeff. Hector and Garovel are not of the rain.’

That was a fair point, Zeff supposed.

Octavia spoke next. “What else can you tell us about asteros? Is there some other... common denominator between them all? Besides their troubled lives, I mean?”

‘Oh, indeed. In fact, I would say that their troubled lives are--especially in the most extreme cases like this one--not merely a product of misfortune. In medical terms, one might call their lives... symptoms of the problem, not the cause.’”

"3505

“What’s the cause, then?” said Zeff.

‘Well, first of all, let me make one thing clear. Hector Goffe is not the astero here. The astero is Hector Goffe and Garovel together. That is one point that I think our people sometimes overlook or don’t realize. The reason asteros are so rare in the first place is because it’s not just one, singular madman coming into the world. God knows we have more than enough of those. No, it requires TWO madmen who find a kind of... perfect and terrible harmony with one another.’

“That’s an interesting way of putting it,” said Octavia. “So you are saying we should be just as mindful of this Garovel as well, then?”

‘Yes. That is, in my opinion, the true cause behind all asteros. The relationship between reaper and servant. They both have to be of precisely the right--or wrong--mindset. It doesn’t work if either one of them is normal. The reaper has too much power in the relationship, especially early on, for the servant to be the only deciding factor.’

Octavia smacked her lips. “Honestly, though, what is truly considered ‘normal,’ anyway? Isn’t that too muddy of a concept to work from?”

‘In this context? Normal means having a properly functioning sense of self-preservation.’

“Ah. Well, that makes things a little clearer, then...”

‘I can virtually guarantee you that Garovel places little to no value upon his own life. Otherwise, he never would have allowed his servant to get involved in so much danger at such a young age. And he certainly would not have allowed HIMSELF to get involved, either. Others might call him courageous--and be correct, depending on the circumstances--but to my mind, that is probably just the tip of the iceberg. And... seeing the growth that Hector has exhibited in the short time we’ve know him... mrrgh. They hide it well, but nonetheless, I am still made quite fearful of the true DEPTH of recklessness that must have brought the two of them this far.’

A brief silence arrived.

“I can certainly respect your point of view and even share in it,” said Octavia, “but at the same time... isn’t that a bit hypocritical, coming from a bunch of Rainlords?”

‘I don’t think so,’ said Axiolis. ‘If anything, I’d argue that makes us MORE qualified to say that, not less.’

She gave a faint laugh. "Right, because if WE think someone is crazy, then they must be truly mad. Is that it?"

'More or less. But also, I think it helps explain why our kin have become so enraptured with them so quickly. In many ways, they exemplify the pride and spirit of our people. It is a most... ancient feeling in us, I think. Instinctual. Essential. Tribal, even.'

"3506

Zeff had to admit, Ax was making a lot of sense. Enough, perhaps, that he was even starting to view Hector and Garovel in a new light. And perhaps the Rainlords as a whole, as well. Just a bit.

Hmm.

'Have you not felt it yourself, Zeff? In their presence? A kind of... gravitational pull, of sorts? I know I have.'

Zeff made no response. He had some idea of what the reaper was talking about, but he wasn't sure.

Octavia spoke up in his stead. "What do you mean by that? Gravitational pull?"

'I'm not entirely certain, myself. Despite everything I've said, and despite my trepidation about asteros in general, I am also of the belief that there is yet more to them.'

"To Hector and Garovel or to all asteros?"

'All of them. I gave you my opinion of what seems the most rational explanation for their existence. But I harbor other views, as well. Views which I'm sure you will be much less receptive to, being the godless heathens that you are.'

"Okay, Ax," said Octavia, taking a defensive and doubtful tone. "I had almost forgotten about this side of you. But I suppose if you're willing to share your crackpot religious views on the matter, then I am willing to listen."

'How kind of you.'

Zeff knew that the two of them were mostly exaggerating. Ax didn't really think they were heathens, nor did Octavia think that Ax was a crackpot. This was just their way of poking fun at one another and lightening the mood.

...Probably.

"Are you about to tell us that you think Lhutwë is somehow responsible for the existence of asteros?" asked Zeff.

'No, I don't think so,' said Ax. 'But many who have studied asteros over the eons have come to think that, perhaps, their suffering is... in some way the will of the gods. Various gods. In various Ardoran cultures, for instance, they have their own term for asteros. They call them "kridanaki," which means "playthings of the gods."' "

"And that's what you believe, too?" said Octavia.

'...A bit, yes. I'll admit that I am uncertain, at least. But I simply find it too difficult to believe that all of the misfortune that I have seen so many asteros endure over the ages can be chalked up entirely to... their own doing. The idea that some invisible force may be involved seems... possible to me. Likely, even.' "

"3507

A year ago, Axiolis would've been right about Zeff not being very receptive to that idea. But now?

Now he was much more tempted to agree with the reaper's perspective.

He decided to keep that thought to himself, though. It hardly mattered, either way.

The conversation continued on, with Octavia soon bringing over her own reaper, Wen, in order to get his opinion on things, as well.

Not much was learned, however. Wen was non-committal, neither agreeing nor disagreeing with Axiolis; and he didn't offer any information about asteros that hadn't already been discussed.

Until, that was, Zeff asked a particular question.

“Ax said that he knew of other asteros whose growth was at least comparable to Hector and Garovel’s. So tell me something. Were any of those people Rainlords?”

Ax and Wen were both quiet for a time, and they exchanged looks.

‘...There have been a few,’ said Wen. ‘But the one that comes immediately to mind... Axiolis? I have a feeling you are thinking the same?’

‘The first Water Dragon,’ said Ax. ‘Rhein Ricardo.’

Zeff took pause. That was a name he was intimately familiar with, of course. Among the long history of his kin, Rhein was arguably the single most important figure. The Redwater Twins were more famous internationally, especially in the modern day, but among the Rainlords themselves, it was hard to say if that was the case.

Certainly, though, no one else was more revered. Various reapers, such as Wen here, had known the Twins personally and therefore also had some... less than flattering things to say about them. The Twins, while beloved as heroes in their own right, were nonetheless still regarded as very flawed human men.

But Rhein Ricardo...

The stories about him were truly legendary.

Some said that was only because the tales were so old. There were just too few reapers left who had existed during Rhein’s time, they said. It was easier, therefore, for the man to maintain an almost deified status as the father of all true Rainlords of Sair.

They said that.

But Wen and Ax here had both been around during his time, Zeff knew.

Which was why Zeff couldn’t stop himself from feeling a certain type of urgency all of a sudden. “Careful,” he said, intensity in his tone. “That’s a heavy thing you’re implying, right now.”

‘We’re not implying anything,’ said Ax. ‘You asked a question, and we’re answering it. That’s all.’

Zeff stared at Ax intently.

The reaper, for his part, merely stared right back."
"3508

"Well, then," said Octavia with a distant look in her eyes. "That certainly... puts things into perspective, at least. I'm looking forward to meeting this young man and his reaper again."

The conversation didn't last much longer after that. With night coming on, Octavia went to go rest. Wen did not go with her, but he did venture off to go talk to someone else. Even Axiolis ended up leaving Zeff alone with thoughts again.

Long after they were gone, Zeff's mind still lingered on that last subject. He didn't know how to feel about it. While he didn't think that Ax was one to make such comparisons thoughtlessly, it still felt... like a strange decision on the reaper's part.

He was tempted to call Ax back over and try to hash things out, but he had no idea what he would say. This unease in the pit of his stomach had no words to accompany it.

Was he afraid of something here? Did he think that Axiolis had some sort of... intentions at play, now? Hying Hector up like that in front of Octavia? As if the boy even needed it, at this point.

Bah. But still. Rhein Ricardo was... an entirely different level of importance.

Some tales regarded him as an incarnation of Lhutwë himself. Others said, instead, that he had encountered Lhutwë and received the God of All Water's everlasting protection--for him and all his future kin.

They said that Rhein Ricardo was the very reason why the divine materialization ability of water even existed in the first place. And why it continued to propagate into the future through the bloodlines of the Rainlords.

And of course, there were the tales of how Rhein distinguished himself among the ancient Arman people during their countless clashes with the Lyzakks, eventually establishing an entirely new warrior class known as Rainlords, who went on, long after his death, to seize power over the local government when the old regimes proved too incompetent and corrupt.

The Mohssian Empire had not been terribly pleased about that, but it was still quite young at the time, and the heroic legacy of Rhein, still fresh in everyone's mind. So the Rainlords were able to negotiate a privileged status for themselves within the empire as a vassal group with unparalleled autonomy, so long as they recognized the emperor as their rightful ruler and fought in his name when he called for their banners."

"3509

That status quo lasted for nearly two thousand years, all the way up until the empire began slowly eroding that autonomy away from the Rainlords, as it had been doing with many other groups during that time period. And when the Mohssian emperor sent his new "Rain King" to rule over them, the bastard didn't last long before the Redwater Twins declared full independence by killing him in his own throne room.

Zeff, therefore, was supremely uncomfortable with comparisons being made--even tenuous ones--between Hector Goffe and Rhein Ricardo.

But... goddammit, he did have to admit that the legendary tales did have some... resemblance to what he knew Hector had been through.

What Zeff had himself been through, alongside the boy.

Ugh.

What a terrifying thought.

He rubbed his forehead and took a deep breath.

What was to become of his kin, now? Where were they going?

He'd heard plenty of loose talk, but the heads of all the Houses had yet to properly sit down and discuss it at length. Nor would they, Zeff figured, until they all returned to Warrenhold and fully reunited with everyone. Only then would each House have all of its most influential members present for such conversations.

But the temptation was certainly here, already. To Zeff's mind, there was really only one route forward. The recapture of their ancestral homeland.

That probably would not require much discussion, other than deciding how soon they should attempt it.

But afterwards? What then?

Zeff couldn't ignore this disturbing feeling in his stomach that things had already changed for his people in ways that could not be undone. That even after retaking Sair, the Rainlords would never again be the same.

Agh.

He was letting his mind wander too much. Letting the pre-battle anticipation get to him. An all too familiar feeling. He needed to--

"Water Dragon," came a dark voice.

One he recognized.

He turned to his left and saw a monolithic figure there next to him, barely recognizable as human in the encroaching darkness of the evening.

He should have been surprised. Shocked, even. And yet somehow, Zeff Elroy was not. For a few moments, he merely maintained a flat expression on his face as he sized up the mountainous man, feeling abruptly as though this was a meeting that he had been expecting all along.

"...Scourge," said Zeff. "I see you are indeed not dead, just as Graves said."

"Mm.""

"3510

"So you can just appear in front of whoever you want, wherever you want, is that it?" said Zeff.

The Monster made no response.

Unsurprising, Zeff supposed. Gohvis had no reason to explain how his powers worked. In fact, he had every reason not to. At his level, maintaining such secrets was no doubt quite important, whenever possible. And considering how little the world seemed to know of this man despite his age, Zeff had to think that Gohvis took his secret-keeping efforts quite seriously.

Meaning he should probably watch his words here.

Yes. Logically, he knew that.

But his logic was not entirely in control, right now.

“Graves told me something of your abilities,” he went on. “You are not truly here with me, are you?”

Still no answer.

Zeff did have a point that he was getting to, though. “Whatever trick that is... might you teach it to my daughter? So that she and I can speak directly like this?”

“A bold ask,” said Gohvis.

“That is what you are doing, isn’t it? Teaching her? Or am I mistaken?”

Gohvis paused briefly. “Where did you come by this impression? I do not recall telling you my intentions for her.”

It was Zeff’s turn not to say anything. He wasn’t about to tell the man that Hector had some kind of psychic link with Emiliana via the Shards of the Dry God.

“You are surprisingly calm, as well,” said Gohvis. “I thought you would give me a harder time here.”

“I probably should. And I probably will, if you don’t give me some assurances, at the very least.”

“Assurances, is it? That is doable. But I did not come here to speak with you of Emiliana, so perhaps we can find an accord between the two of us.”

Zeff cocked an eyebrow. “An accord? Regarding what?”

“Graves.”

Zeff’s jaw tightened. “What about Graves?”

“You can’t trust him, you know. He is using you and all your kin like pieces on a game board.”

“Yes, I remember you saying that before. But you are not exactly a paragon of trustworthiness yourself, Monster of the East.”

“Mm. Even so, I advise you not to get too deeply involved with him.”

Zeff hadn’t been planning on it, but the mere fact that Gohvis was apparently going so far out of his way just to tell him this... was making Zeff quite curious. “Why not?”

"3511

“Graves has a long history of backstabbing and betrayal,” said Gohvis. “Shall I list specific historical instances of it? We will be here for quite some time, and you will have no way of verifying my information, as he always goes to great lengths in order to cover his tracks. Even your reapers have probably only heard whispers about him, at most.”

“How narratively convenient for you,” said Zeff.

“Think so, do you? Tell me. What do you think would have happened if you had been rendered unconscious by Graves like the rest of your kin? Hmm? Think he would have come clean about everything, explained the whole situation to you?” Gohvis waited for him to say something, but Zeff merely remained quiet, so he continued on. “No, he would have swept it all under the rug. At best, he would have kept you completely in the dark about his presence. At worst, he would have not only recaptured all the prisoners you just freed but also captured the rest of you, as well.”

“Hypothetical situations are not going to convince me of anything,” said Zeff. “Why do you even care what happens here?”

“Why shouldn’t I? You are a noble people. I should not like to see your time cut short by yet another betrayal.”

“Ridiculous. You care nothing for us.”

“But I do. I’ve my own history with your kin, though I doubt you’ve heard much of it. If any.”

“Your doubt would be correct, then. I’ve heard nothing about any relation you have to us.” Well, that wasn’t entirely true, he knew. Parson Miles had mentioned something, but Zeff refused to trust those words.

Gohvis fell quiet for a time. “I have ties not just to your kin as a whole, but to House Elroy, in particular. To Agam Elroy, specifically.”

Zeff’s eyes widened.

Agam.

There that feeling was again. The feeling that there was something he was missing. Something right in front of his face, perhaps, that he simply couldn’t see.

“How did you know Agam?”

“He... raised me, you might say.”

What in the world? “Agam Elroy raised you? How could that possibly be true?”

“To be clear,” said Gohvis. “I am not a Rainlord. But when I was born, I was alone. I had nothing and no one. No parents. No kin of my own at all. And Agam, being the odd yet noble-hearted man that he was, decided to care for me.”

"3512

“Absurd,” said Zeff. “You claim you were essentially a son to him, and yet none else knew of your existence? If you were so close with Agam, then he would have made that clear.”

“And yet he did not. What does that tell you of his character?”

“Nothing. But it tells me that you have the character of a liar.”

“Mm. You are much like Gerard.”

Zeff stuck on that. The name of his father.

Gohvis just observed him for a few silent moments before continuing. “I appeared like this before him, as well.” A beat passed. “Well, not quite like this, I suppose. My projections were less refined. But it was similar enough. And he did not believe me, either. Nor did your grandfather, for that matter. The fiery, little Emilio. Now he was a belligerent one. I'm glad that you do not appear to have inherited his temper, at least."

Zeff was at a loss. Could any of that be true? He remembered searching Axiolis' memories of his father and grandfather both, but he didn't recall any mention of his father meeting the Monster of the East.

His grandfather, though...

There had been something, hadn't there? An encounter in Ardora that the man had only spoken of twice that Ax remembered, late into the man's life.

Emilio Elroy said that he'd fought the Black Scourge in a tomb beneath a mountain. He said that the Black Scourge had even tried to strike a bargain with him after spouting off a bunch of nonsense.

"...My father never mentioned meeting you," said Zeff.

"No? Ah. That is believable, now that I think of it. I believe our meeting was not long before his passing." Gohvis' tone shifted into one noticeably more somber. "Before everyone's passing, I should say."

Zeff made no response.

"Gerard and Emilio both had strong biases against me, thanks to the Vanguard," said Gohvis. "Now... I suppose I am hoping that, with all you have been through, you will not be seduced by that same allure."

"...If any of that is even remotely true, then why are you only appearing before me now? Why wait so many years? Why not show yourself to me when I was merely a child and far more impressionable?"

A low rumble arrived from the dragon man's chest. A laugh?
"Impressionable, you say? I observed you a bit during that time. You were not impressionable at all, in my estimation. You were more like... a little ball of righteous indignation. I do not think you would have been very receptive to me in the least."

"3513

“Hmph. So to make me more ‘receptive,’ you decided to kidnap my daughter in the midst of a terrible battle?” said Zeff bitterly. “A battle wherein you offered no aid to us, as well? Interesting strategy.”

“No aid? I seem to recall you having quite a bit of trouble with that little Marauder man until I removed him for you.”

“And Ivan? You had a nice and long conversation with him before disappearing. Do you know how many of my kin you could have saved that day with power like yours?”

Gohvis let that question linger, unanswered.

Zeff didn’t need a response, though. “Your words are insincere. Your intentions, muddy. You speak of Graves as if he is only out to manipulate me and my people--and perhaps that is true--but you do not strike me as any better. In fact, you are probably worse.”

“Mm. Probably? So you are not yet certain, then.”

Zeff scoffed.

"I will consider that progress," said Gohvis.

"You are surprisingly flippant. I'd heard the Monster was never anything other than dour and humorless."

He returned a slight nod. "It is true that, in the presence of fools and manipulators, my mood tends to worsen. But I do not think you are either of those things, Zeff Elroy."

"If only I could say the same about you."

Another rumble. Another laugh. "You do have some stones on you, don't you? Not many would dare to say such things to me, anymore. It is almost refreshing."

Never in his life would Zeff have imagined hearing the Monster of the East laughing so amicably in his presence. Or laughing at all, for that matter. He was at a loss for words now, quite frankly.

After a short time, Gohvis continued on. "I will not try to argue your points about me. In particular, if I am being perfectly honest with myself, I think there is some merit to the notion that I am too... insulated. That I am sometimes too concerned with my own goals and therefore blinded to other matters that might benefit from a modicum of my attention."

Again, those were not things he had been expecting to hear from this man, right now. Where in the world was this conversation going, he wondered?

"It may be a product of age," said Gohvis. "Perhaps you will notice the same thing, should you achieve similar years. Eventually, the world seems to... blend together, one might say. Many--or even all--problems that I encounter have begun to feel... recursive in nature. Chronic. To the point, perhaps, that addressing them is without purpose, because they will just keep reappearing, anyway.""

"3514

Zeff was far from understanding or convinced. "That all sounds like an excuse to me. And a weak one, at best."

"Again, I will not argue the point. Instead, I will simply make you an offer."

Zeff's brow furrowed, as if to brace himself for what he might be about to hear.

"Leave Graves and Vantalay behind," said Gohvis. "Bring all your kin and come with me. I will take all the Rainlords of Sair into my protection."

Lakefire.

Zeff made no response.

Gohvis kept pushing. "You wish to see your daughter, yes? With this, you can. I cannot yet allow her to leave, but I can bring you to her."

Still, Zeff said nothing. Goddammit. He turned away from the Monster to look over the evening battlefield in the distance again, taking a deep breath and then exhaling slowly.

"I understand if this is not something you can decide upon quickly, but I would urge you not to delay. The longer you remain with Graves, the more tenuous this deal becomes--for you and for me."

That, at least, brought immediate questions to Zeff's mind. "What do you mean? Why should Graves be a factor?"

"Because if he learns of my offer, he will seek to use it. To manipulate you against me. Or to some other end, perhaps."

"The two of you seemed to get along strangely well."

"Yes, in spite of myself, I do not hate him. But that is also part of his game, at times. He often presents himself as very agreeable. He thinks of the bigger picture, I suspect. Hoping to gain trust for some vital future use, perhaps. But when the time comes--and make no mistake, it will come--he will discard you like so much trash and think no less of himself for it."

"Hmph. So you know what goes on in his mind now, do you?"

"He and I have known each other for a very long time."

Zeff had no retort for that. He was still struggling with the offer Gohvis had just made. He needed time to think, but from the sound of it, the Monster did not want to give it to him. Or at least, the Monster wanted to put time-sensitive pressure on him.

Agh.

“...I cannot make such a decision for everyone,” said Zeff. “That is not my role.”

“But it should be, Water Dragon.”

At that, Zeff had to turn and look at him again. “That is not our way.”

“Not anymore, no.” And for a few moments, Gohvis merely met his gaze with those infernal red eyes. “But I understand. Consult your reapers and your kin. And try to keep Graves from overhearing, if you can.””

"3515 -- CCXCIII.

Zeff had to admit: the Monster was being oddly accommodating here. Considering how much leverage Gohvis had over him, holding his daughter captive, there was obviously quite a different approach that the man could have decided to take.

But then, maybe Gohvis was just trying to use the carrot before resorting to the stick.

Zeff didn't really want to find out, though it certainly would've clarified a few things about the mysterious character of this man in front of him. Was it worth pushing for, he wondered? To gain vital information?

No. Not yet, at least. Not before consulting Ax and the others.

And so, he found himself holding his tongue yet again. Probably the wiser course of action in the presence of these juggernauts.

Yet, somehow, he still couldn't help feeling disappointed in himself.

Chapter Two Hundred Ninety-Three: 'Considerations of yore...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

“...This is too generous, lord.”

“No, it isn’t. I broke your arm, officer. Truthfully, this isn’t even close to enough. If there’s something else you want from me, just say it, and I’ll try to make it happen.” Hector bobbed his head a little. “As long as it’s not too crazy.”

The uniformed police officer on the other side of the table just looked at the check in front of him. The man hadn’t said very much since arriving here at Warrenhold.

It had taken Hector quite a while to track this guy down, in part because he’d been so damn busy and kept forgetting about it. But once he’d finally remembered to tell Ms. Rogers about it, the task hadn’t taken very long at all.

This man here was Officer Fred Michaels of the Klein City Police Department. And he was the poor guy whom Hector had injured during that time period when virtually every member of law enforcement in Atreya had been hunting him down.

It had been a sloppy, frustrating mistake, and Hector had been wanting to make amends for it ever since.

Fred, however, wasn’t giving him much to go on, here. The man merely remained stone-faced throughout this whole meeting.

Hector could only imagine what might’ve been going through the guy’s head. When Ms. Rogers told him that she’d put in a request for Fred to come to Warrenhold, Hector had actually gotten a little upset with her. He’d intended to go to Klein himself, not make the officer come all the way here, but by the time he learned of the situation, it was too late. Fred was already on his way."

"3515 -- CCXCIII.

Zeff had to admit: the Monster was being oddly accommodating here. Considering how much leverage Gohvis had over him, holding his daughter captive, there was obviously quite a different approach that the man could have decided to take.

But then, maybe Gohvis was just trying to use the carrot before resorting to the stick.

Zepp didn't really want to find out, though it certainly would've clarified a few things about the mysterious character of this man in front of him. Was it worth pushing for, he wondered? To gain vital information?

No. Not yet, at least. Not before consulting Ax and the others.

And so, he found himself holding his tongue yet again. Probably the wiser course of action in the presence of these juggernauts.

Yet, somehow, he still couldn't help feeling disappointed in himself.

Chapter Two Hundred Ninety-Three: 'Considerations of yore...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

"...This is too generous, lord."

"No, it isn't. I broke your arm, officer. Truthfully, this isn't even close to enough. If there's something else you want from me, just say it, and I'll try to make it happen." Hector bobbed his head a little. "As long as it's not too crazy."

The uniformed police officer on the other side of the table just looked at the check in front of him. The man hadn't said very much since arriving here at Warrenhold.

It had taken Hector quite a while to track this guy down, in part because he'd been so damn busy and kept forgetting about it. But once he'd finally remembered to tell Ms. Rogers about it, the task hadn't taken very long at all.

This man here was Officer Fred Michaels of the Klein City Police Department. And he was the poor guy whom Hector had injured during that time period when virtually every member of law enforcement in Atreya had been hunting him down.

It had been a sloppy, frustrating mistake, and Hector had been wanting to make amends for it ever since.

Fred, however, wasn't giving him much to go on, here. The man merely remained stone-faced throughout this whole meeting.

Hector could only imagine what might've been going through the guy's head. When Ms. Rogers told him that she'd put in a request for Fred to come to Warrenhold, Hector had actually gotten a little upset with her. He'd intended to go to Klein himself, not make the officer come all the way here, but by the time he learned of the situation, it was too late. Fred was already on his way."

"3516

And now, here he was. Probably confused as hell.

Hector tried to think of something else to say, but nothing was coming to mind. Damn, this was getting awkward fast.

At length, Officer Michaels finally said something else. "Why are you bothering with this? Not that I'm not grateful, but... insurance already took care of my medical expenses, which weren't even comparable to what you're offering me here. You worried I'll sue you or something? Because frankly, I don't think I'd have much of a case. And even if I had, I'm not sure I would've been able to get this much out of you..."

There were a lot of ways that Hector could answer that. He took a few moments to think through them all before settling on the simplest one. "I just think it's the right thing to do."

Fred held his gaze steadily, saying nothing.

"I'm sorry for making you come all the way out here, by the way. I intended to visit you in Klein, but uh, some wires got crossed, I guess. And then you showed up before I could fix them."

"It's fine. Wanted some time away from the wife and kids, anyway."

Was that a joke? Probably. Hector decided to smile. "How are things over in Klein, by the way?"

"Uh... pretty normal, I'd say. Why do you ask?"

"No real reason. Guess I'm just curious about how people are doing across the country. What with the war and everything."

"Oh." Fred allowed a beat to pass. "Well, if you want a beat cop's opinion, then I'd say that people are scared, but not all that much more than usual. Foreign conflicts have always been terrifying to hear about. This one's just a bit closer than we'd like."

Understandable, Hector supposed. It wasn't so long ago that he'd felt similarly. Hearing about wars abroad felt unsettling but thankfully also quite distant. So when that distance began to shrink...

"Way I hear it," said Fred, "you've gotten involved with Lorent, which is even closer to the war than we are. You plannin' on sticking your neck out even further than that?"

What a question. Hector felt like he should be firm here. "Not at all. The exact opposite, actually. I feel like if I do something crazy, it might put Atreya at risk, which is the last thing I want."

"Ah. Big hero with big concerns, eh?"

Hector didn't know what to say to that."

"3517

"Hafta say," Fred went on, "it was a very strange feeling, seeing the kid that messed me up continue to make such crazy headlines, week in and week out. Didn't know what to make of it all. First, you were the biggest villain in the country, then the biggest hero, and now you're apparently the most powerful lord in Atreya, to boot, goin' around, givin' the other lords what for, showin' 'em who's boss with that new bank of yours."

Hector still didn't know what to say, but he felt like he couldn't let that last part go. "I don't think that's quite how it went down, sir..."

The man chuckled. "If you say so, lord. But from my perspective, you are an enigma and a half. Because despite all that, despite how much else you clearly have going on in your life, you decide to make time for me, of all people. A man who, apparently, was hunting you down unjustly, acting as nothing more than a stooge for some... foreign coup attempt, was it? I'm still not too sure I understand what went down in the capital last year."

Geez. For how quiet this guy was earlier, he sure was speaking his mind now, Hector thought.

"My point, lord, is that you have no reason to be doing this for me. And it's weirding me out. So thank you for your thoughtful generosity, but I don't think I can accept this money."

Hector blinked. "...Are you sure?"

Fred eyed the check one more time. "No. I'm not sure. But I try to listen to my gut whenever I'm on the verge of making potentially life-changing decisions, and right now, it's telling me that I shouldn't take this. Assuming you'll actually take no for an answer, lord."

Wow.

Um.

Damn.

"...If you're worried about there being some sort of string attached to this money," said Hector, "then I can assure you that there isn't. Genuinely, you can just take it and go, and I will never contact you again. I promise."

That seemed to give Fred pause again, though not for long. He shook his head. "Thank you, but my answer is still no, lord."

He blinked again. "...And you called me an enigma."

The man chortled. "Fair is fair, I suppose."

Hector had to ask one more time. "You're really, one hundred percent sure that you don't want to accept this?"

Fred sighed and scratched his brow. "Yeah..." He said it almost sadly, as if he was somehow exasperated with his own decision.

"3518

Well, Hector was at a bit of a loss now. He truly had not considered what to do if this guy had simply refused to take the money.

Huh.

"Sure is tempting, though," said Fred. "Wish I could accept, but I just can't. Frankly, lord, I don't think you owe me anything. Wouldn't feel right, taking this money."

"Hmm," hummed Hector, thinking. "Not even for the sake of the wife and kids that you just mentioned?”

“Eh, fuck ‘em. It’s my decision, not theirs.”

Hector couldn’t hold back a snort. “Are you being serious, right now, sir?”

“Mostly. In all the ways that matter, at least.”

“I’m not sure what to make of that. Are you a man of incredible integrity or just a terrible father?”

“What, I can’t be both?”

That pulled a laugh out of Hector, and he shook his head, not knowing how to respond.

“Look, I love my family, but we’re doing just fine, financially. This isn’t needed and would probably spoil the shit out of them, anyway. It’s hard enough to prevent my kids from turning into insufferable little brats, as is.”

“That is... definitely one way of looking at it, I suppose.”

“Okay, lord, y’know what? How would I explain where this money came from, hmm? Oh, the new Lord of Warrenhold decided to just up and gift it to me? No. I’m a cop. People will think I’m on the take and just lying about it. Badly.”

Well, that argument held a little more water, Hector felt. “Alright, uh... what if, instead of giving the money to you, I give it to someone else of your choosing? Or multiple someones, if you prefer.”

Fred’s head reared back as he took that into consideration.

“Maybe an organization?” pushed Hector. “A charity?”

“This got a lot more complicated, all of a sudden.”

“You don’t have to decide, right now. I’ll keep the money in reserve for whenever you make up your mind. Sound good?”

Fred stared at him for a moment, then exhaled a curt laugh. “You’re really something, y’know that?”

“You’re one to talk,” said Hector.

"I was trying to pay you a compliment."

"So was I."

Fred's gaze went to the table briefly, then he smiled and stood up, offering Hector a handshake. "Thank you for this. I'll take some time to think about it and get back to you."

Hector stood and took the handshake. "Alright, then."

"3519

They exited the aboveground building together, and Ms. Rogers appeared with a couple of Rainlords behind her. She didn't say anything, but Hector could infer that she meant to take the man off Hector's hands for him.

Hector decided against that, however. He walked with Fred back to the man's four-door sedan and watched the man drive away, though not before making sure that the guy had a means of getting in touch with him again. Rather than keeping Ms. Rogers as their go-between, Hector gave Fred his personal number.

He returned underground with Ms. Rogers and the Rainlords.

She was noticeably quiet, Hector felt. Usually, she wouldn't hesitate to use these walking periods to remind him of one thing or another, so the fact that she wasn't doing that now made him wonder what was going through her mind.

Truthfully, he was still a bit displeased with her, but he also didn't want to let one mistake override all the great work that she had done for him, either. That wouldn't be fair to her.

And things seemed to have worked out with Fred, anyway, so there was really no point in staying upset.

But before he let her off the hook, there was one thing he needed to double-check.

He asked the Rainlords to give them some privacy. One of them, Matteo Delaguna, was slower to acquiesce than the other, but not by much.

“Ms. Rogers,” he said once they were alone in a side room near the top of the Entry Tower. “Do you understand why I got upset with you about Fred?”

She was a bit slow to answer. “Because you felt that I had disrespected him. And by extension, since I was representing you, I made it appear as if you had disrespected him.”

“Okay, but do you understand why I thought it was disrespectful?”

“...Because you wanted to express your contrition to the man. If you had gone to him, it would have made for a clearer indication of your sincerity, as you would effectively be saying that his time and convenience were more important than your own.”

Huh. Well, that was pretty much spot on. As he should’ve expected, considering how sharp he knew Ms. Rogers to be.

But that also confused him a little. “That’s exactly right,” he said. “So... why did you have him come here?”

She paused again. “It was a mistake, lord. I can only apologize.””
"3520

Why was he getting the impression that she wasn’t being entirely honest with him here?

He supposed he was putting too much thought into it at this point. Better to let it go. “It’s okay, Ms. Rogers. I might’ve, uh... er... I think I might’ve been at fault, too.”

Her gaze twitched. “In what way?”

“By not being clearer from the start, I... put you in a bit of an awkward position, didn’t I?”

“No, lord, you did nothing wrong.”

“That’s kind of you to say, Ms. Rogers, but you don’t need to sugarcoat things for me. I’d rather you spoke your mind. I’m still new to this lording business, after all.”

At that, the Stewardess of Warrenhold was quiet.

Hector, finding that curious, decided to just wait for her. Perhaps she was thinking about what to say.

And indeed, that appeared to be so. "...In that case, lord, please forgive me if what I am about to say comes off as rude. I do not mean it that way."

Aha. He braced himself.

"It seems to me," she went on, "that, occasionally, you do not quite realize just how much more valuable your time is, compared to that of other people. I suspect this is because you are... humble in the extreme, to say the least. Which is an admirable thing, by and large, but there are also certain realities of your station that should not be ignored, both in terms of your own scheduling and in terms how others are to perceive you."

That was a lot to take in. Hector chose not to say anything right away, instead just mulling her words over. On impulse, he wanted to disagree, but this was someone whose opinion he held in high regard, so he didn't want to discard her thoughts here too quickly.

She returned the favor of giving him time to think. But after a while, she decided to say a bit more. "But to be clear, lord, I do indeed think that you did nothing wrong in this particular instance, especially now that I have have given it more thought. This was clearly a more important matter to you than I at first realized. I will be more careful in the future."

Hmm. Hector was starting to feel like an asshole. But he didn't quite know how, why, or what he might say or do to counteract that feeling, so he merely remained silent. Backpedaling didn't seem like the right call here, either.

Man.

He'd thought he was getting a little better at being a lord, but maybe he wasn't. Maybe he barely knew anything."

"3521

Not long afterward, the two of them went their separate ways, with Ms. Rogers returning to her office in the Tower of Night and Hector going to grab a bite to eat in the refectory. He spotted Garovel along the way, chatting with a few of the other reapers, as usual, but decided not to bother him.

Garovel soon found him on his own, though, and brought up a subject that the both of them had been meaning to find the time and opportunity to address for a while now.

The subject of Rathmore's Gate.

The Gate was a peculiar location, deep within the Carthrace Nature Reserve, where a large, seemingly natural rock formation resided. The first time he'd visited the place had been during a battle for Atreya's fate against a group of Abolish terrorists. The second time had been upon their return from the Undercrust, via some kind of still-not-understood teleportation mechanism and the newly ascended "god" Royo Raju. Or had that been Malast's doing? Hector couldn't quite recall.

Regardless, they had been wanting to return there and investigate the location again, but it was starting to seem like they would never find the time. Hell, even now, when things were starting to feel relatively calm again, Hector still found himself a bit reluctant to go.

But he supposed if he'd been able to justify a trip to Klein, then he could probably justify this, instead.

It helped that Atreya was such a small country. And that he could fly pretty damn fast now with his armor. He wouldn't need to be away from Warrenhold for all that long, and he could of course keep in constant contact with the castle's guards and scouts, not the least of which was one Pauline Gaolanet in her roost at the top of the tallest aboveground tower that Hector had materialized.

Plus, he didn't know if he was ever going to be completely free from concerns over an attack. Even if the war came to an end tomorrow, that didn't necessarily mean Atreya and Lorent were much safer. In fact, maybe that would make the Abolish remnants go looking for some softer targets that weren't being defended by the Vanguard.

Which was assuming that Abolish ended up on the losing side. The other possibility... Hector didn't even want to think about that.

So he decided, as ever, to think of this as another opportunity for training."

"3522

With Garovel on board, Hector was a bit reluctant to go too crazy with the flight practice. That last fight with Banda had been the absolute pinnacle of what he could currently achieve when it came to flying--and he was still feeling the after effects, even now. Aches and pains lingered from breaking every single bone in his body a dozen times over.

He wasn't sure the damage had ever been that extensive before. Thinking back, it was tough to compare. The fight with Harper Norez had been pretty damn bad, though. And the time he'd been blown to smithereens. And maybe the time he'd gotten dissected...

But no, this time still felt worse, somehow. Sure, he might've built his pain tolerance quite a bit since back then, but the intensity of the pain wasn't the issue. It was the stubbornness of it. He again found himself in a state of existence where it felt like he might never be pain-free again. Like all these dull aches were just a fact of life now.

Was this how old people felt all the time?

Goddamn did he sympathize.

Still, he tried to push himself a bit during the flight to the Carthrace Nature Reserve. It was good chance to test his actual comfort level, now that he had definitive experience with being incredibly uncomfortable.

He kept checking in on Garovel, who'd tucked himself into the armor, but the reaper just kept telling him that he was fine.

'Are you sure?' said Hector. 'I don't want to bank too hard to the right and accidentally knock you out cold. Or worse.'

'Relax already, you worry wart. As long as I'm attached to your body, I'm unaffected by physics.'

'...Is that really how it works? Kinda sounds like bullshit.'

'You think I'd bullshit you about something like that?'

'A little, yeah.'

'Wow, buddy. What the hell?'

‘Or you could just be honestly mistaken. I mean, you’re not exactly the most safety-conscious person I’ve ever met, Garovel.’

‘Okay, you’re the LAST person who can lecture me about that, Mr. Dimension-Hopping-Dinosaur-Wrestler. At least I’ve never needed to be puked out of a monster’s stomach before.’

‘...Wait, how’d you learn about the puking? I don’t think I mentioned that part.’

‘Roman told me.’

‘He saw that?’

‘He sure did. And judging from the way he described it to me, I think he might be scarred for life now, by the way.’

‘Aw, shit...’

"3523

‘You should do something nice for him,’ said Garovel. ‘Get him a present for being such a bro all the time.’

‘What kind of present can I get for one of the richest dudes in the country?’

‘Beats me. Put some thought into it. That’s the part they say counts, right?’

‘Real helpful, Garovel.’

In the end, he decided to trust the reaper’s judgment about being able to handle more intense flying maneuvers.

So he stepped it up, pushing for speed. He told Garovel not to render him numb, because he thought that pain might actually be the best way to gauge how much his own body was able to handle.

That nearly turned out to be a mistake. Rather than pain, he found instead that he was struggling not to pass out.

He was stubborn, though. In addition to no numbing, he also went without the undead vigor and regeneration, knowing that they would just leave him exhausted afterwards.

He didn't quite recall how much of that fight he'd done without those enhancements, but he did know that he'd endured the last part of it that way. Specifically, he remembered how much of a relief it was when Garovel invoked the regeneration once it was all over.

So he knew that he could do this. These movements were nowhere near as intense.

But why did it feel so much harder, then? Because the stakes were so much lower? Because he was less focused?

Agh.

Mind over matter, huh?

He hadn't expected the difference to be this dramatic, though. It made him wonder if he was remembering things wrong. He supposed training simply didn't compare to the real thing.

The flying practice wasn't meant to be fun, but as they sailed over the capital city of Sescoria, catching glimpses of famous buildings and landmarks, Hector couldn't help wanting to take in the view a little more.

He made sure to gain plenty of altitude, though. No sense in spooking people on the ground by flying too low.

When he saw Bosliat Palace, he knew they were making good time and decided to slow down a bit to admire it. The place looked completely different from above. Being able to see the entire breadth of the compound made him wonder how Warrenhold might look from this perspective, if it weren't underground.

Briefly, he considered popping in to say hi to the Queen, but she was probably busy. And besides, he felt like she might surprise him with some kind of new task or request.

So he pressed on, pushing for even more speed this time. It was about staying focused, Hector felt. Concentrating. Maintaining the flying armor wasn't enough. He had to press harder. Remind himself what he'd been able to do before. The urgency.

Sescoria quickly fell away into the horizon behind him, and soon enough, the vast forest of the Reserve came into view."

"3524

It wasn't quite as impressive as he remembered. From this high up, he could see most of the forest's edges in the distance.

But perhaps he was being unfair. After having spent considerable time in the great Imara Forest of Lorent, this place felt downright quaint. Hence why House Carthrace wanted to preserve it, he supposed, rather than letting it dwindle away into nothing. Lorent clearly didn't have such problems.

The Gate itself was quite easy to find, too. Not only was the Reserve smaller than he expected, but the battle that had taken place here had left a giant hole behind.

Which made him feel a little bit bad. He'd talked with a few different Carthraces now, not the least of which being Amelia, but the subject of their nature reserve and his involvement in its partial destruction had never come up.

He landed with a thick thud, not quite as graceful as he'd intended, feeling bolts of pain shoot up both legs as he barely managed to stay on his feet. Thankfully, he regained his composure quickly enough, which told him that he'd probably avoided injuring himself, at least.

The sundered battleground did seem to be recovering, he noticed. That was good. It looked like all the felled trees had been cleared away, too, leaving room for new sprouts to pop up all over the place. Or had those been planted by hand? Yeah, some of them must have been, if not all. A few were nearly as tall as he was already, and while he was no botanist, he was fairly sure that trees didn't grow that quickly.

Some pristine red flowers were blooming amid the tall grass, as well, making for quite a painterly view as he laid eyes on and finally approached Rathmore's Gate.

So this had the power of teleportation. In part, at least. Hector highly doubted that he and Garovel would be able to get it to work here and now. He wasn't even sure what they would do with it if they could.

But it did make him wonder if it might be capable of anything else. "So Rathmore named all these things after himself," said Hector, recalling what Garovel told him before, "but they actually existed long before he did, right?"

'Yep. Kind of a wily prick, that Rathmore.'

"And you knew him personally, you said."

'That's right.'

"Doesn't seem like you have many fond memories of the guy..."

'Actually, I do. It's just that I have some particularly horrible ones, as well. Horrible enough to ruin everything else.'

"Ah..."

"3525

'I mean, the guy was brilliant. I'm not contesting that. Even if he didn't actually create these things, he's still the only person in history who's ever been able to affect them in any way. And my interest in his Materials definitely stems from that fact, at least in part. I just feel it in my non-existent bones that these things must harbor some kind of incredible power or secret.'

"Well, this one was secretly a teleporter, so I guess your bones were right."

'Indeed.'

Hector circled around the base of the Gate, inspecting it. The formation was simple enough at a glance. Two big rocks, one almost twice the size of the other, similar in overall scale to a small office building. There hadn't been much opportunity to examine the Gate before, so Hector wanted to take his time now.

He recalled Garovel mentioning that Rathmore had marked all of his works with a certain type of etching. Hector had seen it firsthand back in Himmekel, during the treasure hunt that ultimately led them to Malast. The etching had been quite hard to spot, though, nearly invisible to the naked eye.

He looked for it now on the Gate, getting up close to the rock and squinting. He was a little afraid of touching it with his bare hands, even though it was almost certainly fine to do so. There was just a slight fear in the back of his mind that it might suddenly teleport him back down to the Undercrust--or to some totally random place, maybe.

He was fairly sure it didn't work like that, but still. A bit of caution wouldn't hurt, he figured.

If there were any etchings on these rocks, then he wasn't seeing them yet. It was quite hard to tell, though. He tried looking even closer.

'Hector,' came Garovel's voice. 'Over here.'

Hector ventured to where the reaper was pointing and found something entirely unexpected.

There was a flat object jutting out of the larger rock formation, about two-thirds of the way up to its peak. It had a golden sheen to it.

"What is that?"

Garovel was already up there, investigating. 'Um... hmm. Wait a second. This is... a mirror.'

Hector raised an iron platform for himself to join the reaper. Indeed, it was a moderately large mirror with a golden, jewel-encrusted panel. "What the heck? Why would Rathmore stick a random mirror into his Gate?"

'He didn't,' said Garovel. 'This wasn't here before.'"
"3526

"How could that be?" said Hector. "And how do you know?"

'How do I know? Because I was paying close attention, that's how. Rathmore's Materials are always of interest to me.' The reaper hovered around the mirror, inspecting the different sides of it. 'As for how it could be possible, well... the only explanation that I can think of is that the properties of the mirror interacted with the properties of the Gate, creating an unexpected result.'

Hmm. "But where did the mirror come from?"

'You don't recognize it? This is the same mirror that I had you grab during the middle of that worm fight, remember?'

Oh shit. Hector looked at it anew. The reaper was right.

'You thought you'd dropped it at some point during all the confusion, didn't you? You were quite bummed about it.'

"Yeah... I thought I'd lost another artifact of power, like with the Moon's Wrath. Or if not an artifact, then something that we probably could've sold for a lot of money, at least."

'Right. We never did figure out what kind of power it harbored, if any. But I think we can safely say now that there was indeed something more to it. Otherwise, it never would've gotten stuck on the Gate like this.'

"Huh..."

'In fact, this is... entirely unprecedented. In all the time I've been studying Rathmore's Materials, never have I seen anything or anyone modify one of them in any way, apart from Rathmore himself.'

Dang. "When you put it like that, this, uh... this seems like kind of a big deal."

'It is.' Garovel eyed Hector for a moment. 'Wow, buddy. All this time, I had no idea you were the most powerful integrator since Rathmore. Talk about impressive.'

"I--?" Hector's expression flattened. "Okay. First of all, I definitely didn't do this. And second--"

'You don't know that. Maybe it was your aura playing havoc with things.'

"No. I don't accept that. That's bullshit, Garovel."

The reaper laughed. 'You seem surprisingly confident about that.'

"I'm confident that you're trying to fuck with me."

'Heh, maybe. But we genuinely don't know what caused this. I'm just having fun speculating, right now.'

"Uh-huh. Anyway, how do get it out of there?"

‘Good question. I suspect that we simply can’t. It looks like it’s fused with the stone. But go ahead and try pulling on it, if you want. Maybe looks are deceiving. Maybe it’ll slide free, easy as can be.’”
"3527

Hector hesitated. “But what if... what if it gives me, like, a crazy vision or something when I touch it?”

‘Why would it do that?’

“I don’t know. Why did it fuse with the rock?”

‘Fair point.’ Garovel allowed a beat to pass. ‘Eh, but I’m sure it’ll be fine! Go on! Touch it! See if it does anything!’

“Garovel...”

‘What? Don’t chicken out on me now. Where are those massive iron balls of yours, all of a sudden?’

Hector sighed and chuckled at the same time. “You’re such an idiot, sometimes...”

‘Like reaper, like servant, my friend.’

“Fuuuck you...” Hector did lift his hand, though, readying himself to grab the edge of the mirror. It was probably safe enough, he figured.

He touched the golden paneling.

Nothing happened.

He gave it a second, just in case, but still nothing. So he grasped the edge of the mirror more firmly and gave it a tug.

It didn’t budge. Not even a little.

‘Put some elbow grease into it.’

“What if I break it?”

‘Eh, I’m sure it’ll be fine.’

“The more you say that, the less convinced I become.”

‘Alright, I’m mostly kidding this time. Don’t break it yet.’

“‘Yet?’”

‘Let’s just have a little look-see here...’ The reaper hovered nearer to it, looking at it from directly above now, straight into the reflection. ‘Hmm. Y’know what would’ve been a cool power for this thing to have? If it let me see myself in it.’

“Cool and useless.”

‘C’mon. Being cool is its own use.’

Hector decided to raise his iron platform a bit higher in order to join the reaper in looking into it. As one might’ve expected, he could indeed see himself in it.

Huh. So that was what his helmet and pauldrons looked like from the outside. Despite how much effort he’d put into making it, he hadn’t actually bothered to check what this new dark armor looked like in a mirror yet.

Pauline had mentioned that it looked scary, and... now he could see why she thought that. He hadn’t bothered to add any ornamentation to the helmet, because the material had simply been too difficult to work with, but it had still ended up with a T-shaped eye slit, thanks to the faceguard, and a smooth overall profile that fully concealed his neck, thanks to the way it interlocked seamlessly with the gorget.

And because of how dark it was, it made him look less like a person and more like a shadow."

"3528

‘Ooh, wait a minute,’ said Garovel. ‘What if this thing is a teleporter now like the Gate? Try sticking your hand through it. Watch it pass through the mirror like an open window.’

“You really think that’ll happen?”

‘Well, of course. It was my idea, and I’m never wrong, so yes, I’m sure it will.’

Hector bobbed his head and decided not to retort. "Alright, then. Here goes."

He pressed his gauntleted hand flatly against the reflection. And waited.

Nothing happened, still.

'You're obviously doing it wrong,' said Garovel.

"Oh, am I? How so?"

'Uh. Well. Your armor. You gotta use your bare hand, of course.'

"Okay, then." He dematerialized one gauntlet and repeated the same action.

It made no difference.

'Alright, it's useless. You can break it now.'

"I'm not gonna break it!"

'Oh, c'mon. It deserves it. Just look how smug it is. With its. Reflectiveness.'

"Even if it is useless, what would be the point in breaking it?"

'To make me feel better?'

"Garovel."

'I'm kidding again. Relax.'

"Are you, though? You sure this isn't one of those sarcastic confession-type things?"

'Maybe a little. Maybe I think that mirror is being a real prick, right now.'

"Okay, Garovel."

'I don't appreciate your tone, Hector.'

He decided to move on before the reaper dragged him down another conversational rabbit hole. "I wonder if whatever power the mirror had... got sucked out by the Gate 'r something."

‘That sounds possible. Hmm. Maybe even plausible.’

‘But why would it only affect the mirror and not anything else? The Shifting Spear of Logante had power in it, too, right? And it came through the Gate just fine. Not to mention the Scarf.’

‘Perhaps the nature of the mirror’s power was similar to that of the Gate. So they interacted with one another.’

‘So... maybe it’s actually the opposite of what you were saying. Maybe it was a teleporter, but now it’s not?’

‘Maybe. And if so, then... man, that bites. Bad luck on our part.’

‘I mean, at least we didn’t end up fused into the rock.’

‘I guess that’s true. Way to look on the bright side, Hector.’

“Hmm...”

‘Now what’re you thinking?’

‘I’m trying to remember the last time that I actually saw this thing,’ said Hector. “Because I feel like... I didn’t even have it with me when we went through the portal. Not that I knew we were going through a portal, at the time.”

"3529

‘What, so you’re saying you really DID lose track of it beforehand?’

“Um... maybe? Do you remember when I last had it?”

‘It was on the ground. Not technically in your possession, I suppose. You were carrying it in orbit around you until Malast, uh... gave you his “blessing.” Then you dropped it, along with everything else. When you came to, Malast gave you everything back... except the mirror. Hmm.’

‘Oh. Huh. You think he left it out on purpose?’

‘Tough to say. He might not have even known it was a special artifact. You had it encased in your iron the whole time, so perhaps he merely mistook it for debris or something.’

“Yeah, but he was a ‘god.’ And he, like, knew stuff.”

‘You have a real way with words, sometimes, Hector.’

“What I mean is, he would’ve known that it was special, wouldn’t he? Because he could just tell. With his weird god-powers or whatever.”

‘I’m inclined to agree with you. But remember, he was also a big idiot.’

“That’s, uh... hmm.”

‘And a bigger douche.’

“Wow, Garovel. Tell me how you really feel.”

‘I’m just saying we can’t assume much about what his intentions might’ve been. If we’re feeling less insulting in our choice of labels, then we would probably call a guy like that a “wildcard.”’

“Okay, well, even if he didn’t hold the mirror back intentionally, we’re still at least certain that I didn’t have it on me when we returned to Atreya, right? Which was the important point.”

‘I suppose so, yes. Which would mean... we REALLY have no idea how it ended up in the Gate.’

“Oh, maybe Malast sent it afterwards. Like, maybe he saw it on the floor and realized he’d forgotten something, sent it through on its own, and then it got stuck here.”

The reaper was quiet.

“What?” said Hector.

‘We didn’t have much time to get to know Malast, and yet... somehow, the scene you just described sounds incredibly likely to me. I can just imagine him fucking up like that.’

“Geez. Y’know, you’re ragging on him so much that it’s starting make me feel bad for him.”

‘Really? You’re the one who shit-talked him to his face, though.’

“I--well, that wasn’t--I mean... er...”

‘Yeah. There’s the Hector I know.’

Hector wasn't sure what to say now. And rather than continuing to struggle with that, he returned his attention to the mirror.

'You sure you don't want to break it?' said Garovel."
"3530

"Yes, I'm sure," said Hector. "Shut up with that, already."

'But what if breaking it unlocks its hidden power?'

"Why in the world would that do it?"

'Why wouldn't it? It'd be like breaking open a locked door.'

"Yeah, okay. Or it'd be like smashing a priceless vase."

'Y'know what? I bet you're not even strong enough to break it. I bet it's probably too powerful for you.'

Hector snorted. "You must be getting desperate, if you think that's gonna convince me."

'Ugh, damn you and your lack of pride. You're a lord now, you know. Your ego is supposed to be inflating every day.'

Hector ignored him, knowing they were going to get sidetracked again if he didn't.

In a background thought process, he'd been trying to sift through the memories of the Candle for anything about Rathmore's Gate or Rathmore's Materials--or even Rathmore himself. In truth, he'd been searching for a while, on and off for the past few days.

With all the things that the Candle had left him, it felt like there had to be something in there. Somewhere. Right? If these Materials were as old as Garovel said, then surely the Candle would've learned something about them as some point.

If only it was that simple.

Perhaps Hector was taking too long with his thoughts, because Garovel seemed to realize what he was up to.

‘Find something relevant in that head of yours?’ the reaper asked.

‘I’m trying, but... I don’t think so.’

‘Hmm. Nothing at all about Rathmore? He was pretty damn famous, so it would make sense if the Candle knew about him.’

“Unfortunately,” said Hector, “that’s not really how it works. The memories are... just, like, scenes in my head. And emotions, too. Those are able to come through. But names? And words? I can’t really use those like keywords for a search.”

‘No? That sucks.’

“Tell me about it,” said Hector. “I can sometimes remember... conversations. Sort of. But that’s about it. And they’re usually kinda... weird and muddy. Probably because they were taking place in a language that I don’t actually know.”

‘So you just need to search for someone mentioning Rathmore’s name.’

“You make it sound so simple...”

‘Maybe it is. Maybe you’re getting into your own head and overcomplicating things. Not that you would ever do such a thing, I’m sure.’”

"3531

Hector almost resented that. But the reaper probably had a point. “I think... the way it works is... I need to see something in order to search for it in my memories. Specifically, I mean. I’ve tried to search based on just ideas before, but the results I got back were always kinda... shitty and vague. Almost like the Candle itself was trying to figure out what I want. And not quite succeeding.”

‘So you’re saying the Candle is stupid.’

“I did not say that. Not at all.”

‘That’s what I heard.’

“I’m saying that words like ‘Rathmore’s Materials’ or whatever are not helpful. Maybe if I knew what they looked like, then I could find something relevant, but..."

'Well, the Gate's right here. Put those photoreceptors to use and get a good look. That's basically why we came all this way, isn't it?'

"I have been looking," said Hector, extending out his iron platform so that he could eye the Gate up and down again. "I'm just trying to..."

'No rush,' said Garovel. 'Take your time and think. You've got a lot in there, right? Soak in the view and think back. Hell, meditate if you have to.'

Hmm. Hector did as the reaper said, circling around the Gate to get a series of good looks in from all different angles, including from above and below. Maybe he couldn't search for someone mentioning the Gate, but perhaps it would show up in the background of a memory. If he could just learn to recognize its shape...

'Okay, but don't actually take that long. I'm getting bored over here.'

"You were being so helpful for a minute there..."

He concentrated. And yet also didn't. He wanted to find just the right headspace to occupy for this. He wanted to be loose and free. Moving through memories quickly and easily. Not lingering. Not getting bogged down in details. But he also wanted to have enough awareness so that he could actually detect the Gate if it appeared.

It was a balancing act, of sorts. A long and strange trek, speeding by countless memories like a passenger looking out the window of a train.

There was a temptation to simply... keep going. Because, also like a train, there was a certain rhythm to this. A certain... comfort. Passively observing the world. Observing history. Hmm.

Stop.

There.

He had to rewind a bit. Had to journey backwards. Not sure that he'd seen what he thought. Had to take his time, too. Look over each scene a bit more thoroughly.

But he found it.

Rathmore's Gate."

But the scene surrounding it was quite strange indeed. Instead of a simple forest, there was a tremendous formation of... something. Rock? Metal?

Both.

Almost like a massive, tangled web. It rose high into the air above, with dozens of metal spikes pointing downward at the Gate, looking almost like scorpion tails preparing to strike. But they were not moving. Nor did it seem like they ever would, Hector thought.

What was this? This giant structure didn't exist in the modern day. What had happened to it?

He observed the scene for a while, unsure if anything was even going to happen at all. No one was around. The structure seemed perfectly still.

Then, at length, a person stepped into view. Hector couldn't make out any details about them, as their face and body were a blur. They hovered around the base of the structure, perhaps examining things, until they eventually approached an apparent lever on the far western edge of the structure and pulled it with both hands.

The scene exploded with bright light, and it remained that way for so long that Hector began to think the memory had ended. When the light finally faded, however, Hector looked for some kind of change to the scene.

But he couldn't see a difference.

"Does this qualify as success?" came a voice from his right, and Hector turned to see a second blurry person approaching.

"No," said the first person, still by the lever, "but perhaps it will have to."

"Truly? You are finally putting an end to this nonsense?"

"For this monument, yes. But only because there are still so many others left."

“Bah. You gave me hope for a moment there. I ask again: what is the point in all this if no real results are achievable? Even if your theories are true, why bother with--”

“Cease your incessant whinging, woman. If you still do not understand, then I expect you never will.”

There was silence, until the second spoke again. “I did not expect to find you in such foul temper. You are normally so calm, even in failure.”

“Hmph. Perhaps that is why your insufferable attitude has gotten so out of hand. Because I have been too calm. Because I have allowed you to forget who I am.”

“You are my consort, and I am your Queen. You would do well to--”

“No, you ignorant wench. I am the Seer of the Distant Dawn. I am He Who Has Touched the Heavens. I am Rathmore of Andeyal.”
"3533 -- CCXCIV.

Chapter Two Hundred Ninety-Four: ‘O, Wonder! O, Threshold...!’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

The memory froze when Hector heard that. Had he frozen it himself? Yeah. He felt so. He wasn’t entirely sure how he’d done that, but it seemed true.

If this blurry figure in front of him was really Rathmore, then he wanted to take a minute and reexamine the scene.

Recontextualize it, actually.

This giant metal-and-rock formation all around the Gate...

Could it have been a Fusion Forge?

Hector knew that they could look like just about anything, so perhaps there was no telling for sure. But if it was, then that might explain, in part, why it no longer existed in the modern day. Forges were too highly sought after to be left alone. Someone would've either taken it or destroyed it.

Furthermore, it might also explain how Rathmore had been able to affect the supposedly un-affectable stone. If anything in the world could modify the unmodifiable, it would probably be a Fusion Forge, wouldn't it?

Hmm.

The more he looked at the enormous formation, the more he wondered about how it might have functioned. All those spiked points focusing on the Gate. Were they for channeling ardor, perhaps? Or extracting it, maybe? Dammit. Maybe if the scene hadn't gone white earlier, he would've gotten a clearer picture of things.

He found himself hovering higher, floating above the stony contraption in order to get a better idea of just how huge it really was. It extended out farther than he'd realized, seemingly embedded deep into the ground, making it difficult to tell where the natural rock ended and Forge-rock began.

Perhaps that was the point. The Candle had a similar design philosophy, didn't it? Built right into a tree. Made inseparable from it. In which case, it might've been better to think of the "natural" rock as still part of the forge. Like a root system.

And that lever. That was distinct. Hector looked for any other mechanical parts, but he couldn't find any. How could that be the only thing? Was there a vast network of cogwheels underground? Probably not. That sort of technology seemed a bit advanced for how long ago this must have taken place.

But then again...

Ancient integrators were no joke. Stasya Orlov, the creator of Warrenhold, had apparently invented locked door mechanisms long before the technology became commonplace. So maybe Rathmore had done something similar here."

"3533 -- CCXCIV.

Click to display entire chapter at once -- (mobile link)

The memory froze when Hector heard that. Had he frozen it himself? Yeah. He felt so. He wasn't entirely sure how he'd done that, but it seemed true.

If this blurry figure in front of him was really Rathmore, then he wanted to take a minute and reexamine the scene.

Recontextualize it, actually.

This giant metal-and-rock formation all around the Gate...

Could it have been a Fusion Forge?

Hector knew that they could look like just about anything, so perhaps there was no telling for sure. But if it was, then that might explain, in part, why it no longer existed in the modern day. Forges were too highly sought after to be left alone. Someone would've either taken it or destroyed it.

Furthermore, it might also explain how Rathmore had been able to affect the supposedly un-affectable stone. If anything in the world could modify the unmodifiable, it would probably be a Fusion Forge, wouldn't it?

Hmm.

The more he looked at the enormous formation, the more he wondered about how it might have functioned. All those spiked points focusing on the Gate. Were they for channeling ardor, perhaps? Or extracting it, maybe? Dammit. Maybe if the scene hadn't gone white earlier, he would've gotten a clearer picture of things.

He found himself hovering higher, floating above the stony contraption in order to get a better idea of just how huge it really was. It extended out farther than he'd realized, seemingly embedded deep into the ground, making it difficult to tell where the natural rock ended and Forge-rock began.

Perhaps that was the point. The Candle had a similar design philosophy, didn't it? Built right into a tree. Made inseparable from it. In which case, it might've been better to think of the "natural" rock as still part of the forge. Like a root system.

And that lever. That was distinct. Hector looked for any other mechanical parts, but he couldn't find any. How could that be the only thing? Was there a vast network of cogwheels underground? Probably not. That sort of technology seemed a bit advanced for how long ago this must have taken place.

But then again...

Ancient integrators were no joke. Stasya Orlov, the creator of Warrenhold, had apparently invented locked door mechanisms long before the technology became commonplace. So maybe Rathmore had done something similar here."

"3534

At length, Hector decided that he wanted the memory to resume, but since he still wasn't sure how he'd managed to pause it in the first place, he didn't know how to make it continue. He floundered for a bit, searching up and down and all around him, as if he might perhaps find a hidden button somewhere that he could press.

Thankfully, though, it soon started back up on its own. Or had that been his doing, too? Yeah, it probably was, huh? He didn't see how anyone else could've been responsible for something that was occurring his very own mind. Other than maybe Rasalased. But he didn't sense the Dry God anywhere, right now.

The apparent queen was now quiet, perhaps thinking twice about saying something to further antagonize Rathmore. And Hector couldn't help feeling rather anxious for her. Rathmore didn't exactly seem like the nicest guy so far. He wasn't about to kill this woman, was he?

For a time, the blurry Rathmore seemed to just be staring at her, but eventually, he took a deep breath, rubbed his face with one hand, then exhaled a heavy sigh. "...Apologies, dearheart. I seem to have... overreacted."

"Tis unlike you to speak to me so."

"Yes, I... let emotion get the rule of me. I suppose I was more frustrated with my results than I realized. Please forgive me, Anicca."

"Hmm. I shall have to think on it."

“Anicca, please...”

“Tell me again why this monument confounds you so. I recall you mentioning before that you believe it to be some manner of gateway, yes?”

“Ah...” Rathmore turned away from her to look at the Gate again. “Belief has no bearing on it. It is a gateway. And so much more than that, as well. In truth, calling it a mere gateway may be doing it a disservice.”

“You know this how?”

“I can see it. The full breadth of its divine form and heavenly function. No doubt, when you think of a gateway, you think of a simple threshold which marks the passage of one area into another, but this monument... it can bend those areas as it pleases. It can make them overlap. Or distort. Twist them up and down. Turn them bright and beautiful. Or dark and ugly. Or perhaps something else entirely. Perhaps a ‘bridge’ might be a more apt term for it, in some sense. Ah, no, but even that will not do, naturally... what then... hrm...?”
"3535

Rathmore continued on, mumbling low enough that Hector couldn’t hear what he was saying.

After a short time, Anicca stepped closer to the Gate. “You are getting lost in your own musings again,” she said firmly. “Rein that wandering mind of yours in, please.”

Rathmore stopped and looked at her. Hector wished he could see the expression on the man’s blurry face. Given how wildly Rathmore’s mood had shifted, Hector wondered if he would get upset with her again or become even more timid.

Anicca left him an opening to respond, but when he didn’t, she spoke up again. “How will any of this help me to reclaim my birthright?” she said. “I’ve granted you the resources you asked for. I’ve bestowed titles and land to you. I’ve given you influence of your own within my court. And yet the years continue to draw on with no destination in sight. No path to my crown.”

"You have a crown."

"Not the crown of my mother. Not the one that was stolen from me."

Rathmore scoffed. "Even now, you cling to this idea of vengeance? After all we have built together?"

"What have we built? A palatable place to hide and die in? A little corner of the world to call mine, only because none else know to claim it? You speak of nothing. Empty lands and hollow words."

"And you speak of greed and ingratitude. What you have is more than most in the world, and yet it is not enough for you. Nor will it be, 'till you have brought ruin to it all and perhaps finally realized your own foolishness."

"Again, you speak out of turn."

"Because again, you push me when you should not. You do not make it easy to love you, dearheart."

Anicca said nothing.

"You say I speak of empty lands and hollow words? That is your old crown. Nykeir has made it so. There is nothing to reclaim. It has been too long. Your people will not rejoice upon your return. They did not fight for you. They did not weep at news of your death. They do not care. And why should they? You were little more than a babe, hardly out of your swaddling clothes."

She turned and walked over to Rathmore, right up to his face, and slapped him.

Rathmore just took it.

"Yours are craven words," she said, sounding not just bitter but almost tearful, too. "Repeating such lies. Why? Cruelty ill suits you."

"If you think that was cruelty, dearheart, then you truly have learned nothing of the world, even after all this time."

"3536

"You would ask me to forget what Nykeir has done to my family? That man deserves a slow, sunless death without mercy or hope.”

“Aye, that he does. But you do not deserve to waste your life in the miserable pursuit of him.”

At that, she turned away and made no response.

“At this point, ‘tis a matter of mere pragmatism. You must realize this, my dear. On some level, you must. You have acquired much of the influence that you might have once inherited, but Nykeir’s kingdom is no longer the fledgling power that it was when he conquered your home. He is among the most powerful men on the continent. Perhaps the world, even. There is no victory for you against him. And even if there was, there is no kingdom to reclaim. Better to focus on defending what you now have, rather than risking it all to take back what once was.”

After that, the memory fragmented--but it didn’t quite break down entirely. Hector could see that the conversation between the two was continuing. He just couldn’t make out what they were saying. It felt like there was more here. He thought he could sense it, somehow. But then everything seemed to speed up and fade away, disappearing into a fog.

Damn. He supposed that was still pretty informative, but he’d really felt like--

Wait a minute. No. There was something more here. Another memory. Linked to that one. How? By time? By the people?

He found it.

The scene that appeared before him one of utter devastation. Pillars of flame shot up into the air, roaring with such intensity that he could almost feel them. Red and orange filled his view, blanketing the Gate in its entirety.

So it was as he’d thought, then. He was convinced. That giant thing had indeed been a Fusion Forge, and this memory here was its destruction.

How had it happened, though? Why was the memory starting off like this? Shouldn’t it have begun earlier? With a bit of context or something? He tried rewinding, but it didn’t work. Whether that was because the memory itself was incomplete or because he simply wasn’t doing it right, Hector couldn’t quite tell.

Until he tried fast forwarding, instead. That worked like a charm. The flames raged higher and higher, seeming to reach all the way into the sky, before eventually beginning to dissipate. Hector had no concept of how long it might've taken. These couldn't have been normal flames, surely, if they'd been able to destroy a forge."

"3537

When the fire finally died all the way back down, it was as expected. Aside from the Gate itself, only mounds of ash remained, which were already beginning to blow away in the wind.

Disappointed, Hector thought this might already be the end of the memory. No new information to be gleaned.

Then two figures stepped into view, one of whom was stumbling forward, as if having been pushed.

They were both blurry, just as before, but he did not have long to wait in order to begin learning their identities.

"Rathmore, Rathmore, Rathmore," said the more composed one, sounding almost pitying. "See what has become of all your tireless work."

Rathmore had fallen to his hands and knees and was struggling to stand.

"The worst is to know that this could have been avoided," said the composed man, stepping closer. "If you had but listened. Accepted my terms. But no. You were in love, I suppose. And for that, I am possessed of a morsel of sympathy." He broke for a laugh. "Never have I known a fortress more impenetrable to the sieges of reason."

Finally on his feet again, Rathmore still wasn't answering. Instead, he'd begun sifting through the smoldering heap of dust, leaving fleeting clouds in his wake.

"Looking for something? I left nothing to find. Apart from that lone monolith. Quite the irritants, these Materials of yours. Or was it Tools? Which name was it again?"

Rathmore ignored him and just kept digging.

"You are wasting your time, my friend. I promise you that I was quite thorough. Ah, but perhaps you wonder how I am so certain. It is because I have already visited several of these other sites. This may be the first time you are present for it, but it is not my first time doing this. Hah. For a man heralded as a genius, these constructs of yours were all surprisingly similar in how primitive they were. Hardly even worth calling forges, in my view. I made sure to burn the heart and roots out of each and every one."

Rathmore's hands stopped moving, and he slumped down onto his knees again. "Why bring me here?"

"Aha. Glad am I that you have asked. Two reasons, truth be told. But they are... conflicting, now that I am thinking on it. Hmm." The man scratched his head. "Alas, perhaps you have made me somewhat unreasonable, myself."

"3538

"Have I?" said Rathmore, sounding mildly curious, though more haggard than anything. "So after all is said and done, you do value my opinion."

"Hah. Of course. I should think that obvious by now."

"The only obvious thing is that you take great joy in belittling me and my work."

"Oh? Perhaps so. But what should that matter, if you are the genius that everyone says you are? A truly great man would not be bothered by any of my playful jabs, surely."

Rathmore stepped toward the Gate. "When the most powerful man in the world makes it his life's mission to ruin my own, what is there to be done? Tell me, O, Nykeir the Great. In what ways have I erred in my dealings with you? What other paths might I have taken and when? Please, be quite specific."

"You are sounding rather bitter, my friend."

"And you are sounding rather predictable."

"Am I? What shall I say next, then?"

"Something either self-congratulatory or derisive of me, I'm sure."

Nykeir chortled. "I shall have to mix things up, then. I do so hate being predictable."

Rathmore placed his hand against the Gate, saying nothing.

"Here, allow me to administer a well-earned compliment. Of the two reasons I brought you to this place, one of them was to have you tell me what you know of these monoliths."

"In what capacity does that qualify as a compliment?"

"You do not see? Because I am wondering if you may know something that I do not! The most flattering of notions, no?"

"You sicken me, madman."

Nykeir scoffed. "Biting words--and wholly undeserved. Please, my friend. You must have learned something of these things during your time with them. Else you would not have been able to alter them as you have."

Rathmore turned to look at him again. "Yes," he said, suddenly confident. "I did learn of them. Many things, in truth. And that is knowledge you shall never possess."

"Oh, do not be so quick to say so. If you tell me, I shall let you live."

"You will let me live, regardless."

"Hmm-hmm, you believe so?"

"Yes. Because of the other reason you brought me here. I have realized what it is."

"Heh. Speak it, then."

"You want to watch me suffer. You brought me so that I would see my work undone. My time and energy, wasted. And at your hands, naturally."

Nykeir was silent for a few moments. Then somehow, Hector felt like he could see a smile appear on that blurry face of his. "I shan't deny it."

"3539

Rathmore breathed deeply and took a step closer. "Lucky am I that you have become such an arrogant, careless fool. Never could I have accomplished this when you were younger."

Nykeir straightened. "Accomplished what?"

"Curious, are you?" said Rathmore, raising one hand slowly, palm upwards. "Or merely frightened?"

The other man gave an audible sniff. "Go on, Seer. Stupefy me, then. Show me what your Heavenly Sight has seen."

"I can grant you but a glimpse. 'Twill be up to you to see anything beyond."

"Hmph."

Rathmore's hand tensed suddenly. "Now, Behold!"

Light gathered into his hand, then burst forth, shooting toward Nykeir and enveloping him.

It clashed against a wall of yellow flame, with Nykeir remaining comfortably in the center, apparently unbothered about being entirely consumed by fire.

"Tell me this is not all," said Nykeir, his voice distorting from behind the inferno, sounding lower and almost monstrous, as if the flames themselves might be speaking for him.

But indeed, that was not all. Because the light still enveloped the flames, and then bounded backward to the Gate, first touching the smaller rock, then connecting to the larger one. The beam stayed there, bright and strong, linking Rathmore to Nykeir, and Nykeir to the stones.

"Yigorosk!" said Rathmore.

And Hector blinked, in complete disbelief of what he was seeing.

A gargantuan tentacle shot out of the Gate, appearing from the shimmering line of light between two rocks and arcing over Rathmore's head to slam down on top of Nykeir.

The ground exploded from the impact, filling the area with a cloud of dirt and debris, and Hector had to wait for it to clear. When it did, he saw Nykeir still there, standing within the fire and light, a massive hole burned into the tentacle where it fell upon him.

From his body language, he seemed a bit confused but not terribly concerned. Then he started laughing. "What in the world is this?!" he said happily.

Rather than answering, the light from Rathmore's hand shone even more intensely, and the burned tentacle shivered and melted into a bluish ooze, which splashed over Nykeir, coating him entirely. The yellow flame and even the light surrounding it were both smothered.

And the tentacle reformed, yanking itself back through the Gate, whereupon it winked out of existence, taking all remaining traces of the light beam with it."

"3540

The scene went dead quiet after that, to the point that Hector wondered if that was the end. Everything in sight was silent and still, including Rathmore, who merely stood there, staring at the Gate through which Nykeir had just vanished.

Wait a minute. Had this guy just yelled "Yigorosk?" Hector hadn't forgotten that name. He still, unfortunately, remembered researching it. A yigorosk was supposed to be mythical creature, infamous for its ooze and tentacles, among other things.

But then... this memory would mean...

Ugh. Hector did not appreciate this kind of confirmation.

At length, Rathmore moved again. He tossed something up into the air and caught it again, then let out a small laugh.

Hector froze the memory there, wanting to get a better look at the object in his hand. Had he had it on him the whole time? Or had he pulled it out of the rubble earlier? Nykeir had seemed quite confident nothing could have survived the forge's destruction, so what could possibly have--

Ah. Hector recognized the object instantly. A small black pyramid with protrusions on some of its sides.

A Kag. A type of ancient key. He'd seen one just like it back in Himmekel.

Come to think of it, that Kag had been what brought them to the treasure they'd been seeking--and to Malast.

Huh.

Wow. Suddenly, this seemed like the most obvious thing in the world. Like he should have been looking for a Kag all along.

But hold on here. It wasn't that simple, was it? The Kag in Himmekel had actually been used like a proper key. Diego Redwater had slotted it into a monument--one not unlike the Gate here. But Rathmore, from what Hector had just seen, had not slotted this Kag into anything. Instead, the guy seemed to have just magically activated it in his hand.

That was quite a difference. Hmm.

He rewound the memory in order to check more closely on what Rathmore had been up to when he'd been digging. The man's blurry hands didn't make it easy, but eventually, Hector spotted it. A moment where Rathmore did indeed appear to pull something out of the debris.

Yes.

While the forge and everything else in the area had been annihilated, the Gate was not actually the lone survivor. The Kag had endured, too.

Damn. Did that mean these things were made out of the same stuff as the rest of Rathmore's Materials? Hell, they kinda looked like nightrock, now that Hector was thinking about it, which made him wonder if that was a coincidence."

"3541

In fact, given the relatively close proximity to Warrenhold, Hector began to further wonder if his castle might have some tangential relation to these monuments. Voreese might know more, given that she was Stasya Orlov's reaper, but from the way that Voreese had talked about her before, Hector had a feeling that the reaper wouldn't be able to provide many new details. It seemed like, even now, Stasya was still something of a mystery to Voreese.

And as he recalled, Stasya was herself a descendant of the Nykeirian people.

Which was a crazy thing to think about. This fucking prick that had been making Rathmore's life hell had been such an important historical figure? It felt hard to acknowledge that as even possible, let alone true.

According to Voreese, though, Stasya had not actually been born until after the collapse of the Nykeirian Empire. She'd been "a product of the Mohssian culture," as the reaper had put it.

Whew. He was feeling a little woozy, all of a sudden. Perhaps he needed a break from this weird-ass memory-diving. And so much the better, since it seemed like he'd reached the end of this memory, anyway.

He opened his eyes again, felt breath in his lungs again, felt his whole body again.

And felt even more woozy, actually, enough to make him stumble backward and fall on his ass.

'Hector!' came Garovel's voice.

Hector had to shake his head a few times before the ground beneath him finally stopped spinning. "Hey, Garovel..."

The reaper gave a silent sigh. 'Geez. You were gone for quite a while there, buddy. Startin' to make me worry you'd slipped into another soul coma. I was getting ready to just sit here like an asshole for two weeks, watching you.'

"Ah. Uh. Yeah, sorry about that..." He took his time climbing back to his feet, still feeling a bit drained, like he'd just gotten done with a full body workout. "How long was I out?"

'A few hours, I think.'

He straightened. "Hours?!"

'Yeah. Didn't feel like that for you, I take it?'

"No!"

‘Hmm. Did it feel shorter or longer?’

“I mean, uh--” He had to think about that for a second. “Shit. I only looked at, like, two memories...”

‘So shorter, then.’

“Ugh. I guess I should be more careful about doing that again in the future. I didn’t intend to spend so much time on this.”

‘Well, did you at least learn something new?’

Hector looked at the reaper. “I saw Rathmore.””
"3542

‘You did, huh?’ said Garovel. ‘Well, uh, that’s neat ‘n all, but still not technically anything new. I’ve already seen Rathmore.’

Hector cocked an eyebrow. “I mean, yeah, but that wasn’t really what I was--”

‘I’m just sayin’. I asked for a new thing, and you gave me an old thing. A been-there-done-that thing. Kinda disappointed in your weird new memory powers, honestly.’

“Garovel, there was more to it than just that.”

‘That’s good. Because I don’t see how just seeing Rathmore’s face would prove helpful at all.’

“...I actually didn’t see his face.”

‘Say what?’

“The memory was, er... I mean, for some reason, people in the memories were all blurry. Faces included.”

‘Wow, so after all that, you still don’t even know what he looks like?’

“Ah--yeah...”

‘Hah! Your new memory power sucks!’

“What the--?”

‘Garovel’s still on top, baby!’

Hector’s face went flat.

‘Go on, ask me something! See how well I can remember stuff!’

In spite of himself, Hector couldn’t help snickering. “You done?”

‘Not really. Feel like I could gloat for another ten minutes, if I needed to.’

“Can we skip that part? I did actually learn some useful things, I think.”

‘Oh, alright. Out with it, then. Astonish me.’

“Agh--don’t build it up like that. I don’t know if it’s that good!”

‘Okay, okay. My expectations are lowering with each passing second. As usual.’

“As usu--?! Fuck is that supposed to mean?!”

Eventually, they managed to actually discuss the subject in question.

‘Hmm,’ mused Garovel for a long moment. ‘So you saw Anicca and even Nykeir here, too. Interesting.’

“And the giant tentacle monster. Don’t forget that. Turns out that thing really existed, after all.”

‘Yeah, I know. I told you that when I first brought it up. What, you didn’t believe me?’

“I mean... not really, no.”

‘Wow. I’m hurt, Hector. Blindly believing everything I say is part of your sacred duty as a servant, you know.’

“Uh-huh...”

‘Gotta say, though. I wasn’t expecting to learn the truth about Nykeir’s sudden disappearance this way. So in the end, he got devoured by a Yigorosk... And a pretty gnarly one, from the sound of it.’

“Gnarly? Were they not all that powerful?”

‘Of course not. Nykeir was probably the strongest servant alive at that time. A normal Yigorosk shouldn’t have been able to touch him. Frankly, while I do find that son of bitch’s death hilarious and well-deserved, I also find this information rather terrifying. A Yigorosk that strong is, uh... not a pleasant thought, given everything else I know about them.’”

"3543

“Huh,” said Hector, feeling abruptly like he might need to elaborate. “But, uh... Nykeir seemed kinda amused by the giant tentacle. Like more amused than worried. He just... sort of stood there and took it. Then it gooped him up and yinked him away.”

““Gooped him up and yinked him away.” Once again, your word choice continues to impress.’

“Look, I don’t how else to describe it. It was really fucking weird-looking, man.”

‘No, no, I wasn’t saying I didn’t understand. If anything, I’d say you’ve painted quite the picture for me. I’m imagining it very clearly.’

“Oh. Well, good. But anyway, my point was that maybe the Yigorosk wasn’t actually that powerful. Y’know? Considering how unbothered he seemed when it happened? Maybe he survived. In... another dimension or something.”

‘Given everything else we’ve seen lately, I suppose that’s possible. But it’s also been well over two millennia since his disappearance. If he really did live through that, then he probably got killed some other way, else he would’ve almost certainly returned by now.’

“You sound confident about that. Did you... know him personally?”

Garovel allowed that question to breathe. ‘As a matter of fact, yes, I did.’

“Why’d you never mention that you knew an ancient emperor?”

‘Why should I have? He’s far from the only one I’ve ever encountered.’

“Really? How many past emperors have you met?”

‘Oh, I don’t know. A lot. You have to understand: things weren’t always like the stalemate that we have with our current four emperors. There’ve been many times throughout history when the term “emperor” barely even applied, because they were popping up like weeds and dropping like flies. And many, despite how fleeting their time was, still managed to leave quite an impact on the world. In fact, I suspect that was all some of them cared about. Going out with a bang.’

Hector thought a moment. “You’ve really known lots of emperors-class servants?”

‘Okay, first off, you’re making it sound a bit more grandiose than it really was. And secondly, it’s not like I was intimately familiar with them all during the height of their power. Most of them, I met when they were younger. Once they got all high-and-mighty, they were usually out of my reach.’

“Usually? But not always.”

‘...No, not always.’

“So you have known some at their strongest.”

‘Yes. And Nykeir, I’d say... hmm. I knew him when he was quite powerful but not at his strongest, probably.’

“And he didn’t leave a favorable impression, from the sound of it.”

‘He did not.’”

"3544

“That tracks with what I saw of him,” said Hector. “The way he talked to Rathmore was like...” And he paused, suddenly realizing what words were about to come out of his mouth and thinking twice about it.

‘Hmm? Like what?’

Hector remained quiet for a few moments longer as he thought back.

As he relived something that he didn’t want to.

“...The way Nykeir was acting reminded me of Geoffrey Rofal,” he finally said.

Garovel said nothing, perhaps expecting Hector to elaborate.

Hector decided to do so, realizing something else as well. "I guess... you weren't actually there for that part, were you?"

'What part?'

"At the end. My final encounter with him. He was different than before."

'You told me about it. I remember.'

Hmm? Oh, Garovel was talking about his father. How Geoffrey had stolen the man's body. Taunted him while wearing his father's face. Hector had of course told Garovel about that.

But that wasn't what he was talking about here. "No, it wasn't just... that. There was something else different."

'What do you mean?'

"Geoffrey's behavior. It was like... he wasn't just crazy, anymore. He was obsessed. With me. And the way Nykeir was talking to Rathmore... felt very similar."

'Ah. I see.' The reaper paused, hovering nearer the Gate. 'I know exactly what you're talking about. I may not have been present for either of the situations you're describing, but I've seen it many times before. That type of... truly malevolent, psychopathic obsession. And as a matter of fact, that's what happened to Rathmore in the end, too.'

Hector blinked. "He...? He turned out like Nykeir?"

'Well, without having actually witnessed what you did, I can't say for sure that they were the same, but from the sound of it, ah... yes.'

"But Rathmore seemed pretty reasonable in the memories. I mean... mostly."

'Oh yeah. For a while there, he was a great man. Noble of mind and heart. Level-headed and intelligent. Someone to look up to.'

"So what changed?"

'Lots of things. It was a slow process over many years, as it often is. But... it was terrible to watch unfold. And terrible to remember, still.' The reaper shook his skull solemnly. 'Not being as experienced in these things back then, I was in denial about it for much longer than I should have been. And his reaper--she was even worse than I was. Absolutely refused to see the truth of things, long after it should have been obvious.'

"...What finally convinced you that he was too far gone?"
"3545

'He joined Abolish,' said Garovel.

Hector's brow rose.

'Went on to do many horrific things after that, though the world seems to have forgotten much of it, just because he did some great things when he was younger. Really bothers me, that.'

Hector was almost afraid to ask, but he had to. "What, exactly... did he do that was so bad?"

Garovel looked up at the sky. 'He poisoned three countries. Contaminated their water. Created an awful disease and the worst acid rain I've ever witnessed. Killed millions in the span of a year or two.'

"Holy fuck..."

'Yeah.' The reaper paused. 'But I suppose, in fairness, I should mention that there is some contention over whether or not he was the one responsible for it. Part of the reason his crimes have been largely forgotten, I suspect, is because there was a lack of proof of culpability.'

"But you believe he did it?"

'I'd love to be proven wrong, but yes. I think I do.'

"How come?"

'Because I talked to him, near the end. And while he didn't explicitly confirm it, he was just... so pleased about the situation. And so insane. He talked about people who'd been dead for half a century as if they were right there next to him. Anicca, in particular. Her death... broke him, I think.'

Hector didn't know what to say. The pain in the reaper's voice was not something he'd heard many times before.

Garovel wasn't saying anything, either, and a heavy silence drew out.

After a while, Hector exhaled slowly and decided to change the subject, if only slightly. "...It's still crazy to me that Abolish has been around for that long," he said. "I mean, you're talking about, like, two thousand years ago, right?"

'Thereabouts.'

"And they've really been at war with the Vanguard the entire time?"

'More or less. There have been periods of peace between the two, here and there. And there have also been periods when one side seemed to achieve true victory over the other, only for the loser to reemerge years later and continue the fight.'

"Man..."

'The problem, I think, is that the two sides are more ideologically driven than anything. And ideas are very hard to kill. If not impossible. Even if you manage to wipe out everyone who thinks a certain way, someone brand new could be born who eventually arrives at those same ideas all on their own.'

"Hmm. But both sides kept the name the whole time? Like, every iteration of the Vanguard has always referred to itself as such? And Abolish, too? That seems a little weird."

"3546

'Technically, there's been some variation there, thanks to all the different languages that have arisen over the years, but by and large, yes, the two big names have remained the same. And that's because of us reapers, I think. We're not ones to let well-known names go to waste, especially when we see an opportunity to gain power and followers from them.'

"Still. You'd think some would try to branch off and establish their own groups, without all the baggage that comes with the old names, right?"

'Oh, of course. That's happened many times, too. And sometimes, those groups grow to be even larger than the Vanguard or Abolish for a while. We're just in a period of history right now where that is not currently the case. At the moment, the old names are the strongest again.'

"I see..."

'In any case, we've been here for a while now. We should probably head back to Warrenhold before the world explodes again.'

"You didn't hear my phone going off while I was out, did you?"

'No. Everything should still be fine.'

Hector took a small breath. "That's good, at least. Are you sure there isn't anything else you want to do while we're here? What about the that mirror?"

'Well, if you've changed your mind about breaking it, then I say we should take a chunk of it back with us. Otherwise, I don't see what else there is to accomplish here, right now. Unless, perhaps, you discovered some way to activate the Gate's teleportation capabilities while you were out and have neglected to mention it thus far.'

At that, Hector opened his mouth and hesitated. "Uh... a-actually..."

'No. Hector, there's no shot you learned something that important and forgot to tell me.'

"Hey, man, I was confused. And it's not like I figured everything out. I just saw Rathmore using a Kag to activate the Gate. That's all."

'Ooh. A Kag, eh? Interesting. Those are quite difficult to come by, in this day and age. And if there's only one Kag in the entire world that fits the Gate, then finding it sounds... rather impossible.'

"Hmm. Yeah."

'But perhaps we could ask Abbas to make a new one for us.'

"Oh! You really think he could do that?"

'Dunno. Worth asking, though. My understanding of Kags is admittedly a bit limited, but to my knowledge, they have quite a bit of variance to them, just like modern keys do.'

"Maybe even more so," said Hector, thinking back on what he'd seen Rathmore do with it."

‘Oh?’ said Garovel. ‘Saw something else?’

Before Hector could respond, however, his phone went off. He dematerialized some of his leg armor in order to fish it out of his pants and saw that it was Ms. Rogers calling. He answered it.

<“Lord, there is pressing news from Vantalay. The Rainlords would like to talk to you. Would you mind returning to--?”>

A rustling noise arrived, and then someone else was speaking.

<“We’ve received a very strange offer, Lord Goffe.”> That was Joana Cortes from the sound of it. <“And we would like your opinion.”>

Chapter Two Hundred Ninety-Five: ‘An archdemon’s pursuit...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Nibas clutched his head again, squinting hard as the unwelcome thoughts returned, setting his vision aflame and burning the inside of his skull. Confusion was trying to grip him again. He could feel it. Powerful and tempting. Ancient and inviting.

But he had anger on his side. He would not bend. He still remembered. He still had his walls. Still had himself.

“Morgunov,” came that familiar double-voice on his left. “Don’t forget. Use me as your anchor. The sound of my voice. Hold onto it. Don’t forget.”

Nibas was getting annoyed with him, too. “Stop reminding me. I remember just fine.”

“No, you don’t. You have to trust me, right now.”

“Why should I? You’re not even real! You’re just an illusion, like all the others!”

"Yes, but I'm not your illusion. I'm my own. And I've come to help you. Remember? You were in a bad spot until I bailed you out."

"I was having fun!"

"You were being killed."

"Which was fun!"

The voice sighed.

Nibas was still having trouble placing it. So familiar. Agh. "What's your name?"

"Gohvis. Remember."

"Ah! Gohvis! You came to help me?! No wonder I think you're an illusion! The real Gohvis would never do that!"

"You of all people should know that there is no such thing as 'never.'"

"Oho! True enough, I suppose!"

"Circumstances are too complicated, at the moment. Just keep listening to my voice. Trust that I am your ally here. You can still make it through this."

Nibas shook his head. Yes. Strangely enough, he knew the voice spoke true. They'd had this conversation before, hadn't they?

How troubling.

Where was he again? A large cave, quite clearly. He strained to recall further details.

Ah, yes. Not just any cave. It was one of his caves. A labyrinthine network that he'd carved out decades ago. No. Centuries? Yes, centuries.

Ehehe. Finally getting to use it, eh? Nice, nice.

Now where had he been going?"

"3547 -- CCXCV.

‘Oh?’ said Garovel. ‘Saw something else?’

Before Hector could respond, however, his phone went off. He dematerialized some of his leg armor in order to fish it out of his pants and saw that it was Ms. Rogers calling. He answered it.

<“Lord, there is pressing news from Vantalay. The Rainlords would like to talk to you. Would you mind returning to--?”>

A rustling noise arrived, and then someone else was speaking.

<“We’ve received a very strange offer, Lord Goffe.”> That was Joana Cortes from the sound of it. <“And we would like your opinion.”>

Chapter Two Hundred Ninety-Five: ‘An archdemon’s pursuit...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Nibas clutched his head again, squinting hard as the unwelcome thoughts returned, setting his vision aflame and burning the inside of his skull. Confusion was trying to grip him again. He could feel it. Powerful and tempting. Ancient and inviting.

But he had anger on his side. He would not bend. He still remembered. He still had his walls. Still had himself.

“Morgunov,” came that familiar double-voice on his left. “Don’t forget. Use me as your anchor. The sound of my voice. Hold onto it. Don’t forget.”

Nibas was getting annoyed with him, too. “Stop reminding me. I remember just fine.”

“No, you don’t. You have to trust me, right now.”

“Why should I? You’re not even real! You’re just an illusion, like all the others!”

“Yes, but I’m not your illusion. I’m my own. And I’ve come to help you. Remember? You were in a bad spot until I bailed you out.”

“I was having fun!”

"You were being killed."

"Which was fun!"

The voice sighed.

Nibas was still having trouble placing it. So familiar. Agh. "What's your name?"

"Gohvis. Remember."

"Ah! Gohvis! You came to help me?! No wonder I think you're an illusion! The real Gohvis would never do that!"

"You of all people should know that there is no such thing as 'never.'"

"Oho! True enough, I suppose!"

"Circumstances are too complicated, at the moment. Just keep listening to my voice. Trust that I am your ally here. You can still make it through this."

Nibas shook his head. Yes. Strangely enough, he knew the voice spoke true. They'd had this conversation before, hadn't they?

How troubling.

Where was he again? A large cave, quite clearly. He strained to recall further details.

Ah, yes. Not just any cave. It was one of his caves. A labyrinthine network that he'd carved out decades ago. No. Centuries? Yes, centuries.

Ehehe. Finally getting to use it, eh? Nice, nice.

Now where had he been going?"

"3548

Aha. He remembered.

Oh boy, did he remember!

There was an ancient workshop at the heart of this cave system. A workshop that had once belonged to one of the greatest integrators to ever live.

Karugetti the Wise.

In fact, as far as historically revered geniuses were concerned, it was just him and Skapa at the top.

Nibas dreamt of being in that same category, one day. Standing tall, shoulder to shoulder with those giants.

And to think that he'd stumbled upon one of their workshops. Granted, it hadn't exactly been in the best condition, but still. There'd been a massive crater in it where he suspected that a Fusion Forge once resided. He wanted to put a new one there, both to honor Karugetti and to see if, perhaps, he might be able to discover something interesting about that particular location. A man of Karugetti's stature probably hadn't chosen the site of his Fusion Forge randomly. Maybe there was something special about it.

Hmm.

So why hadn't he ever gotten around to doing that, then? Nibas paused to think. The weird dragon man was saying something again, but Nibas wasn't listening.

There'd definitely been a reason. He wouldn't have abandoned such an incredible place without cause, surely.

On second thought, maybe he would have. He was kind of an airheaded guy sometimes, wasn't he? Easily distracted with new and exciting projects. Too true, sadly. Too true.

No, but there had to have been a reason--

The shaking ground brought him back to reality, and he sensed the attack coming from above.

Tch! Interrupting his important thinking time!

The wolf's mouth barreled through the cave ceiling, coated in black and as massive as a whale's. Ready to devour him whole.

Morgunov jumped up and clobbered the beast with a right hook.

The wolf's teeth nicked his shoulder before it was sent flying into the far wall.

Morgunov landed with a heavy thud on both feet, cracking the ground below him as he flexed his gloved right hand, feeling the power and pain surging through it. That glove was the third generation of the Demon's Grip, and it had the ability to not just increase the muscle strength of his arm, but also the weight of his entire body, starting from the hand.

At its full strength, which was what he'd just used, that punch should've had enough force behind it to obliterate the wolf's entire body like a popped balloon, but he could already sense the damn dog getting back up again.

Morgunov scowled."
"3549

He wanted greatly to stay and show the beast what for, but he knew better. The battle that had taken place back at his workshop had illustrated that point for him.

It had not gone in his favor, to say the least. In fact, it had only gotten worse and worse as things drew out.

First, there was Rasalased's supposed sister hassling him via the new tattoos. Then there was the blasted dog, hunting him down incessantly. Then there was Germal, to boot--that mind flaying bastard.

And to top it off?

Damian Lofar had showed up, too. That one, Morgunov had actually been quite pleased about.

At first.

He'd been hoping that Damian might've somehow been alive all these years, but clearly, the lad had not been harboring similar feelings for his beloved mentor. The first thing the old boy had done was free Parson Miles. Along with the other captive Vanguardians.

And that was really when things began to go south. Iceheart and all those angry little generals joining the fight, even in their debilitated states, was not something that Morgunov had a good time dealing with.

Or had he?

No, that was wrong. He'd been having fun, hadn't he? A thrilling encounter with his life truly at risk for the first time in countless years.

Nibas had loved it.

Rgh. Morgunov shook his head as he ran. Tricks and confusion. Right now, he needed to focus. Maintain the link to the Roberts. Their numbers had been severely culled by now, but they were still one of the best remaining cards up his sleeve. How many could he sense? Twenty-three? Twenty-four.

Rough. Hopefully, more survived elsewhere, out of range.

He knew he'd have to be sneaky with them. The Vanguardians had grown wise enough to avoid them rather than fight, which was annoying, but it was the dog that was the biggest threat to his poor Roberts. That son of a bitch could just shrug off their attacks and bite through their tempered metal hulls as if they were made of meat.

In that respect, it was actually a good thing that the wolf was so obsessed with hunting him down. It meant that Morgunov didn't have to go out of his way in order to keep the animal's attention. He could more easily focus on having the Roberts harass the softer targets with guerrilla tactics."

"3550

Careful. Had to be careful. A single Mk. V could certainly help out in a big way, right now, but that would be risky, and there were too few Roberts left to be gambling with them.

For the moment, at least.

Needed to wait for his opening. The information the Roberts were relaying back to him was arguably even more valuable than their combat assistance. There were too many threatening opponents to worry about now. Being able to track all of their movements like this was exactly what he needed.

For now, he could just keep sprinting through the labyrinth. Might be a problem, though, if he forgot that path to Karugetti's workshop.

Yeah. Better play it safe, then. Partition that information off. Give it some extra mental security from the mind flayer.

He felt another bolt arrive. A surge of electric pain through the skull.

A distraction. Nothing more. Easy enough to ignore. Pain wasn't a problem. The tricks were. The subtle attacks. Those were what he had to pay attention to. The pain was meant to help those sleights of hand elude his notice.

Yes. There you were, Germal. Silent as a shadow, rifling through memories that didn't belong to you.

OUT!

The cavern trembled with the force of Morgunov's psychic purge. Rock and dust drizzled from the ceiling, threatening a cave-in, but he just kept going. It was the first time he'd caught even a glimpse of the Liar in there. He couldn't let the opportunity go to waste.

The trembling grew into a full earthquake, and then the cave-in was no longer just a threat. Truck-sized boulders crashed down all around him--even on top of him.

And still, he ignored them. It didn't matter if he ended up buried. He could dig his way out later.

Germal was all that mattered now. Morgunov had grip of a thread. A psychic line leading back to the slippery bugger. Just a few seconds more.

Ah, but now was precisely when the protector would--

Yes. The wolf's jaws came through the boulders with drilling force, and Morgunov had to stop and catch them with both hands, invoking the Grip's strength again. Thankfully, he had a glove for each hand.

Yet even still, it was barely enough power to keep that black maw from closing down on him. Morgunov was struggling. And he knew that he didn't have time for a stalemate here. A stalemate was as good as a loss when so many others were gunning for him."

"3551

Gohvis grabbed the dog by the scruff and pulled him off of Morgunov. Koh thrashed wildly in the Monster's grasp, jaws snapping at the dragon man's face until Gohvis flung the animal into the dark, distant reaches of the cave.

Morgunov was not grateful, however. "I don't need your help."

"Yes, you do."

There was a game afoot. Morgunov knew it. Gohvis didn't care about him. The Monster of the East had no reason to be here, right now. And Morgunov very much wanted to call him out on it. Tell him to stop pretending. To reveal what his true intentions were.

But there was no time for throwing accusations around. And while it was true that he didn't need Gohvis' help, what he really didn't need was Gohvis deciding to join sides with the attackers.

Unfortunately, Morgunov had a feeling that was going to happen sooner or later, regardless.

He kept running. The workshop. Had to get to the workshop. There was something there that would help. He knew that much. He just couldn't quite recall what it was. He must've remembered earlier, when deciding to head there. He just had to trust in his earlier self's judgment.

That was fine.

The Vanguardians were closing on his position again. The Roberts told him so.

Time to intercept, then. A couple of Mk. IIIs would be sufficient, he decided. Didn't want to use too many for this. That would reduce their collective observational prowess, which he very much needed.

The Mk. III Robert was ideal for this task for a couple of different reasons. The first was that it had the best ratio of durability and mobility. Not so weak that it could be easily knocked out by one of those Vannie generals, but also not so slow that it could be easily dodged, either. And the second reason was that it carried a particular invention in its arsenal that the Mk. Is and IIs didn't have access to.

An invention he'd dubbed the Bull Fighter.

Well, okay, Jercash had dubbed it that, but Morgunov had liked the name enough to keep using it.

The Bull Fighter, in short, was a distraction-based tool, utilizing both audio and visual projection technology in order to befuddle opponents and then immobilize them from behind with soul-strengthened net launchers.

For more threatening targets, however, the nets would not serve well as long-term containment. Which, unfortunately, meant that the Mk. IIIs had to use that window of vulnerability to go in for the kill, instead."

"3552

It was a waste of perfectly good subjects for future experimentation, but they were the ones trying to push him into a corner here. This was what happened when you refused the Mad Demon's mercy.

When the Vannies noticed the Roberts, their ranks distorted instantly. Ehehe. Perhaps his little metal boys had left them with a bit of trauma? Funny, considering how old and powerful these uppity generals were supposed to be.

One, two, three captured piggies. Easy as pie. The projections really did work wonders, didn't they? Ah, Iceheart set about trying to free his companions immediately. Surprisingly warm of him, considering his reputation. Must've thought they were important.

Wasn't going well for the icy boy, though. Lad wasn't at his best, at the moment. Morgunov had made sure to infest him with plenty of little saboteurs, just as he'd done for Jackson. Didn't want Iceheart feeling left out, if he managed to survive all this.

Impressively, though, Iceheart was still managing to avoid capture himself. Hmm. Not being deceived by the Mk. IIIs' projections, huh? Interesting. Why might that be? Had that fellow developed aura sight while Morgunov wasn't looking? Finally seeing a bit more of the world, perhaps? Not letting that closed-mindedness of his continue to win out?

Eh. Doubtful.

Oop. Dog was back. Barreling toward him with that huge body like a torpedo. Ah, but Gohvis was intercepting again, allowing Morgunov to retain some of his breathing room.

Morgunov still wasn't buying it, though. Rather than moving to assist Gohvis, he kept running and devoted some thoughts to why the Monster might be pretending to go against his own mutant cronies, right now.

The main reason why Morgunov had not been able to deal with the enigmatic problem of Germal years ago was because the Liar had the protection of not only Koh but also Gohvis. So had the Liar lost Gohvis' favor?

Maybe, but Morgunov could see Gohvis pulling his punches here, too. If Germal had truly angered the Monster, then this scenario would be playing out quite differently, right now. That wouldn't just be a psychic projection over there. That would be the real Monster.

So what was the goal here, then?

Well.

To trick the Mad Demon, obviously.

But it wouldn't work.

Morgunov could sense. Morgunov could see.

The mayhem of the fight was increasing to a feverous pitch. Those familiar packets of floating light were beginning to appear. Whispers of freed energy."

"3553

How curious they were. He'd seen them many times before. In his clashes with the other emperors, most commonly.

He knew the theories, of course. The lights were vestiges of soul power that were escaping during the extreme exertion of an emperor's strength. Similar to beads of sweat escaping the body, perhaps. Or sparks flying away from a tempering metal. They certainly looked similar enough.

He never bought into that explanation, though, because this was a phenomenon that only ever seemed to occur when two or more very powerful servants clashed. If it were merely about the exertion of great power, then a single servant should have theoretically been capable of producing these mysterious lights, and yet Morgunov had never been able to do so.

No, he'd come to believe that they were not vestiges at all. Not little sparks of power being chipped away. Instead, he'd started to think they might be just the opposite.

They were entirely new energies. Being created from the clash of two great souls.

From the collision.

That theory had sparked all sorts of new queries in Morgunov's mind for many years, but unfortunately, these lights were all but impossible to study. The problem, of course, was that they vanished upon the cessation of hostilities between the two great souls, so the only opportunity to learn more about them directly was in the midst of the battle. At the peak of the battle, even. When the most danger was posed.

But perhaps here and now, he might finally have a window? While Gohvis was buying him time.

Oh dear. The temptation was so very strong.

He needed to not give in. He needed to remember the danger. He needed to keep going. Stay on task. The workshop. That was what mattered now.

Even if he might never get a better opportunity than this one...

No! Foolish thoughts!

And not even true, besides. Because he remembered now. There was actually another instance in which this same phenomenon could occur.

Feldeaths. They could produce this effect, too. It was rarer for them, but Morgunov had most definitely observed it a couple of times during his tumultuous research of those stubborn buggers.

Not all feldeaths seemed capable of pulling it off, though. That was the trouble with them. Their unpredictability. With two clashing emperors, it was much more consistent.

But perhaps there was some other, still-mysterious environmental condition that needed to be met with feldeaths."

"3554

Ah, wait a tick.

Feldeaths! Of course. He was recalling now. How could he have forgotten?

That was why he'd decided to head for Karugetti's workshop.

Because there was a feldeath there. Guarding it. And that was also why he'd never gotten around to putting a new fusion forge in there. Because that particular feldeath was a real son of a bitch, even when compared against others of its kind.

His long study of feldeaths might not have been nearly as fruitful as he would've preferred, but one thing he'd been able to learn quite clearly was that not all feldeaths were created equal. Far from it, in fact. He'd even begun work on a rigorous classification system for them.

It was far from exhaustive, though. The bastards never made it easy to measure their strength. And the true depths of their power might've simply been impossible to discover without first giving oneself over to certain death.

Mad as he supposedly was, even Morgunov was only willing to go so far for his work.

The naming scheme had taken him a while to nail down. On the one hand, he didn't want it to be all generic and boring, like with hurricanes, for example. But on the other hand, a good classification system needed to be largely intuitive to understand. So naming one of them Category Pickle Sandwich or Tier Snot Bubble was out of the question, unfortunately.

In the end, he'd decided that animals would be the best of both worlds. They could be both non-generic and also intuitive, as long as he picked the right animals for each tier.

Thus far, he'd created five categories, though he hoped to one day codify a sixth or even seventh. That would just depend on whether or not he could ever find any more distinguishing characteristics that corresponded with their varying degrees of power.

From least to most dangerous, they were Mouse, Rabbit, Swan, Hippo, and Moth.

That last one, admittedly, had been a bit of a rule break. He had to do it. Even if moths were supposed to be harmless, there was just something about them that he didn't trust. And besides, that tier was still a work-in-progress. He'd only ever encountered a single Category Moth, anyway, and he'd pretty much just run away from it the whole time. So it hardly mattered, right now. He could always rename it later, if he thought of something better."

"3555

As for the feldeath that had claimed Karugetti's workshop, Morgunov classified that one as a Category Hippo. Extremely dangerous. Certainly among the deadliest he'd ever spent time actually trying to fight.

This particular feldath was also one that had garnered a bit of fame for itself and earned a moniker. Kallmakk, they called it here in Ardora.

And it may have been the cause of Karugetti's death.

Morgunov still did not know that for sure, and he probably never would, but it was a very reasonable explanation for the famed inventor's sudden disappearance from the world stage during the height of his power and influence. Considering no human person ever tried to take credit for the man's death, that really only left two possibilities: either Karugetti gave it all up and went into hiding on his own, or he died with no witnesses and no means of ever confirming it.

Being such an admirer of the man's work from even a very young age, Morgunov had held onto hope for many, many years that Karugetti might still be alive. Heck, a part of him still wanted to think that way now.

But the workshop was pretty damning evidence. And from all accounts he'd ever read about Karugetti's personality, the man had actually been quite the social butterfly. It was therefore doubly unlikely that he would've faked his death to go live in quiet isolation somewhere.

Which was why Morgunov had decided to fight Kallmakk on more than one occasion. Vengeance for his fallen hero. Or, perhaps, a means of discovering some evidence that Karugetti was indeed alive. If such evidence existed, it would've made sense for Kallmakk to be in possession of or otherwise guarding it.

But to no avail.

On both counts, Morgunov had failed miserably. Kallmakk was simply too damn powerful. And even after trying to avoid the fight in order to sneak into the workshop and look for clues, he'd still turned up nothing.

Which was not to say that he'd entirely given up on the endeavor.

One day, he aimed to return and give Kallmakk a right thrashing.

And as a matter of fact, today seemed like as good a day as any. He certainly wouldn't mind if his pursuers managed to bring the stubborn jerk down.

So really, this was a win-win situation for him, regardless of who won.

Unless he himself got killed here, of course. Boy, that'd be a real downer."

"3556

It was a good thing he'd managed to remember in time. Would've been quite the gnarly surprise to run into Kallmakk without realizing.

Which reminded him of something further.

He'd forgotten on purpose. In order to deceive Germal. Morgunov was ninety percent certain that the mind flayer was capable of reading his thoughts, so he'd decided to put certain memories into a temporary mental storage state.

Eheheh.

Were you still reading these thoughts, Germal? It was too late to run away, now. Kallmakk was close.

The network of caves expanded out ahead of him into one enormous cavern. Distant holes in the ceiling allowed visible bars of sunlight to cut through the otherwise thick darkness.

The light couldn't disperse very much in here, which was the feldeath's doing, Morgunov knew.

One other thing that he had learned about them during his years of study was that feldeaths very frequently acquired an elemental affinity--but not in correspondence with the modern understanding of elements. Rather, it was the five classical elements that the feldeaths gravitated to. Earth, water, wind, fire, and--in Kallmakk's case--darkness.

Why this was, Morgunov still did not know. Truly baffling, he found it. But then, that was often the way with feldeaths, wasn't it? They were paradoxical beings that should not have been able to exist in the first place.

Regardless, it made fighting Kallmakk that much more of a challenge. Because this darkness wasn't just physical. It muddled soul senses and even aura sight, too, concealing the feldeath's presence beneath a kind of regional blanket.

Which meant that light was now a precious resource. Vital for survival here. These bars of it from the sun were nowhere near enough.

So he set about creating more. With integration, it was a simple enough matter. He stopped running abruptly and slapped the flat ground with one hand, sending dozens of glowing lines through the rock all around him, lighting up the entire cavern within seconds.

And there the surly bugger was, bundled up in a high corner above the workshop's entrance.

Kallmakk the Nightspinner.

The sight of it there made even his pursuers stop and pause.

Eheh. Getting cold feet? Bit late for that.

Kallmakk unfurled itself slowly, not unlike a massive serpent, but its actual form, to Morgunov's eyes, soon became that of a hulking, ethereal machine with a distorted clock face at its center. Blood oozed from its numbers and twitching hands, and black smoke seeped from cracks all over its body."

"3557

Now, of course, there was a very big problem with his plan here--something that he needed to address before doing anything else.

The thing about feldeaths was that they were very territorial creatures by nature, but normally, they would only kind of try to kill you. To shoo you out their domain, mainly. As long as you ran away properly, they'd leave you alone.

But when you decided to not flee and even attack them back--as Morgunov had done to Kallmakk here several times previously--that was when their cockles got all riled up.

That was the point at which merely running away ceased to be an option. That was the point at which no other being on this planet could compete with the feldeath's single-minded determination to kill you.

It no longer mattered how far you managed to get away from it. They would chase you, quite literally, forever. They would lock on to your soul signature and follow you endlessly, until either you or they were dead, because their ability to sense souls was unparalleled. Morgunov suspected that they could sense every single soul on the planet at all times. Which meant that there was no hiding from them, either.

Thankfully, however, he had learned of one trick to get them off his case. He kept thinking that it might one day stop working, but he'd used it on Kallmakk in order to end every fight, and it hadn't failed him yet.

He had to fake his death.

But not just his. He had to fake Bool's as well. Which was significantly harder.

The key was to give the feldeath that all-important final blow. That satisfying strike. Once the feldeath got that, it would calm down and forget all about you.

They were beings of pure instinct, after all. Or at least, they seemed to be. He'd tried to discern if there was anything more sophisticated going on inside those strange, ethereal minds of theirs, but never had he been able to detect anything else.

But again, this was still a very big problem, because now that Morgunov had reentered its territory, Kallmakk was going to remember him. The feldeath would therefore be attacking him first--and perhaps exclusively--unless he did something about that.

So what was the solution, then? To trick the others into attacking it, as well? That would certainly do it, but he doubted they could be deceived so easily. Even if his knowledge of feldeaths dramatically dwarfed all of theirs combined, they would still know that they should avoid attacking it all costs."

"3558

No. The solution was to trick the feldeath. A much simpler task, especially when it was already obsessed with killing him.

All he had to do was slap some of his own soul power onto the others. As long as he amassed enough of it, the feldeath would treat them just like him and try to kill them, too.

Easy. Especially for the ones who were already infested with his little nano-pals. Those unlucky bastards were truly screwed here. He might've even felt slightly bad for them, if he didn't find it so thoroughly amusing.

The feldeath's first attack was not long to arrive. And it was a speedy one, too. Enough so, in fact, that had he not been anticipating it this whole time, Morgunov might well have gotten hit.

Dark beams with vaporizing force. Lasers that emitted no light of their own. Which further meant that they were completely invisible to the naked eye, unless light was already present in the area to reveal their shadowy form. And in the Nightspinner's oppressive darkness, even soul senses and aura sight could not pick up the slack quick enough.

Thankfully, these weren't nearly as fast as real laser beams. If they were, then reacting to them would've been entirely impossible without a predictive insight.

The beam that came for him sheared the rock below his feet away as if it were no more resilient than butter, leaving behind a molten groove that could have fit a highway inside it.

And that beam had not been alone. Several of his pursuers received one just like it, and many did not fare as well as he.

Two or three of them seemed to have been deleted from existence. But he was fairly sure that they had not been dumb enough to bring their reapers along. Surely, these Vannie generals would've known better than that, right? Even if they thought they'd had the upper hand against him for a moment there, they couldn't have been that silly.

If not, though, then that would be quite funny. And well-deserved.

Ah, but the damn dog was still on his ass. Even with Kallmakk being all menacing over there, the pooch was still locked in on him, eh? Not that Morgunov had expected anything less. Gohvis couldn't be relied upon to truly hurt his mutant pals."

"3559

The real trouble with Koh was how resistant that big furry body was to all manner of attacks. One of Morgunov's favored approaches when dealing with powerful close-range threats was to use integration directly on their bodies in order to fuse limbs together--or organs, even. Or, perhaps, to convert chunks of their body into completely different compounds. Even servants with quite strong passive soul defenses could not ignore such attacks completely, not when Morgunov was able to lay his hands on them. And when combined with a few centuries' worth of wrestling practice, as well as the Demon's Grip on both hands, Morgunov usually loved to deal with big brutes who just wanted attack him head on.

But Koh was an annoying outlier. Not only was he durable in the extreme, even by old servant standards, he also seemed to be packing some kind of extra resilience to Morgunov's integration-based assaults. They did nothing to the mutt.

Was there some unknown protective factor causing that? Or was it just very impressive passive soul defenses? They would have to be truly exceptional indeed, if that was all it was. Superior even to his own, Morgunov knew. On par with Sermung's, perhaps. Which seemed unlikely.

Regardless, the dog couldn't be ignored. Morgunov had to let things get messy. Koh barreled into him, and the Mad Demon took it while sliding backwards, not letting himself be toppled over. He caught the animal by the neck, even as huge teeth dug into his shoulder, instantly threatening to sever his left arm.

A throat punch softened the dog's grip, but it still didn't let go until he hit it with a second one. And even then, the beast went straight back to mauling him.

Controlling those deadly jaws was priority number one. Allowing himself to get bitten gave too much advantage to Koh.

They hit the ground this time as they wrestled. This wasn't good, either. Koh's size gave him another advantage here. Needed to get back on his feet as soon as-- Morgunov saw the Nightspinner on the ceiling, already descending on them. There was no time to dodge.

This wasn't going to feel good.

Kallmakk body slammed them both, and an earthquake split the entire cavern in two.

Black smoke blinded him, filling his vision and even his mind. And there was pressure. From everywhere at once. Not unlike being at the bottom of an ocean, which he'd experienced a few times."

"3560

Fear and paranoia gripped his mind, threatening him with terrible familiarity. Dredging up ancient history. Assaulting him with that most deadly of weapons. Himself.

It was almost enough to make him lose track of his body. Of the pain surging through it.

These feldeaths had a way with that, he'd learned. They frequently found a way to override numbness, either by circumventing it and inflicting psychic pain instead or, even more terrifyingly, simply undoing it. As in, getting into the brain and deactivating the numbness that a reaper had previously activated. Almost like they could take over the reaper's role.

Thankfully, this was not the first time Morgunov had experience such an attack from Kallmakk. He knew what to expect. Knew to brace not just his body but also his mind.

It didn't make it hurt any less, but it allowed him to regain control of his faculties more quickly. Like bouncing back from a punch instead of getting floored by it.

He activated both Demon's Grips simultaneously to increase his weight. Double, triple, quintuple. Ten times, fifty times, a hundred times. Needed the extra inertia here, as his strength rose in correspondence with it.

Not enough. He was still stuck fast. Kallmakk's hold was ridiculous. Agh, had it gotten even stronger since the last time?

Five hundred times.

A thousand.

His arms twitched, then burst free, grabbing onto a chunk of physical darkness as if it were solid rock and ripping through it.

This did not help the pain one bit. His mind whited out for a second as he resorted to an ancient trick, trying to cope with the sheer, maddening degree of it, which left his body to stumble aimlessly through the blackness. He was moving, but it took him a while to even realize it.

Then he was in the air, still unsure why. Taken another hit? Probably.

He crashed into the ceiling and broke straight through, flying out of the cave and up into daylight. Quite the welcome sight, actually. Kallmakk would be much less threatening up here. Unless--

The sky darkened as the sun turned black.

Uh-oh.

Another dark beam came for him, and toppling through the air, he wasn't able to dodge this time. It hit him like a train, sending him even higher into the air.

Now stuff was missing. Clothes in tatters. Left arm? Side of his face? Both missing. Not good. That meant he'd lost a glove, too.

No time to fuss over it. Another beam was coming for him. Bastard was trying to juggle him until he was completely vaporized."

"3561

Truth be told, Morgunov had options, still. It might not have seemed like it, and he might not have even wanted to acknowledge it himself, but it was true. Pan-rozum, which he and Bool were currently in, always allowed for plenty of flexibility.

He just hated resorting to it. For a couple different reasons, really. The first being that it gave more power over to Bool. Whenever they merged these days, Morgunov's consciousness dominated Bool's to the point that he no longer felt any different when compared to his normal self. So he was able to enjoy some nice, passive bonuses without having to deal with yet another meddlesome voice in his head.

But the more proactive benefits of pan-rozum--such as tapping into materialization, for instance--required the reaper to put in some real work. Which meant Morgunov had to give up some control.

Quite unpleasant.

Another reason he hated it was because it just felt somewhat... cheap. Lame. Unrelated to his genius or hard work.

When it came to fighting, he always wanted to win because of his inventions, his mastery over integration, or with sheer martial prowess.

But ultimately, that was his hubris talking. Something that had, perhaps, grown a bit out of control over the last century or two.

Here and now, he was again being reminded of his own limitations. Of how, when the chips were down, he would do whatever it took. Ego be damned.

For the briefest instant, Rachman's face flashed through his mind. That smiling, self-satisfied face from right before Morgunov struck the final blow.

It was never going to stop haunting him, was it?

Morgunov split his body apart in order to avoid the next beam at the last possible second.

A most difficult technique. It required the simultaneous use of integration, transfiguration, and materialization.

For transfigurers in pan-rozum, they could turn their body into their element and manipulate it freely by merely adding materialization. Becoming beings of gas or liquid. But for integration users, the same trick required an extra step in the beginning. Fusing the body with the surrounding gaseous elements. Then he could access transfiguration as an extension of his integration ability, which was always going to be his most comfortable, instinctual power.

From there, he could turn his body into air and split it apart, then bring it back together with materialization and finally fuse it all again with integration in order to make himself whole."

"3562

It was difficult, yes. But it was a technique that he had mastered many, many years ago, back when Bool was still calling most of the shots and forcing him to learn this and that. He'd mapped it to an instinctual place in his mind, making it summonable on a moment's notice, whenever needed.

But these days, it really, really annoyed him whenever he had to use it.

A reminder of his failings. A loss of control. Of self-determination and agency.

There were few things in this world that he hated more.

Kallmakk really knew how to get under his skin.

Thankfully, though, his plan was working. Despite how intensely the feldeath was coming after him, the other combatants were still receiving plenty of attention, too. In the mayhem, he could sense those dark beams wreaking havoc among the Vanguardian ranks.

Where had the big pooch gotten to, though? Morgunov had no doubt Koh would be all over him again at any moment.

Aha. Morgunov sensed him. Still a ways away, on the ground. He finally had a few fresh moments of breathing room. He had to avoid another beam, but that was easy enough in this gaseous form.

Time to prepare the Roberts, then. They needed to assemble and transform. He gave the telepathic command via the chips in his brain.

Nothing less than three Mk. Vs would do, he decided. That wouldn't leave very many Mk. IIs behind to harass the Vannies, but it was a necessary risk. And Kallmakk was keeping them plenty busy, now. He wouldn't get a better opening than this.

In the meantime, he resorted to Invisibility, using one of his aberration bone items. Not a ring, like most of his boys had to use. No, his was a tooth. Or rather, a cap, installed over one of his molars.

A much better hiding place.

He knew it wouldn't work on Koh, though. He'd already tried it, and the mutt had no trouble keeping track of him, probably via both smell and aura.

Kallmakk, though, was a different story. Morgunov was reasonably certain that feldeaths sensed the world around them primarily via ardor and soul power. If they could sense aura, it was definitely much weaker.

And with so much of his soul power already in play elsewhere, this Invisibility was actually perfect for keeping the feldeath off his back. He would've used it even earlier, but he'd wanted to make sure Kallmakk became enraged, first. Plus, Koh would have torn through the Invisibility's coating, anyway, rendering it useless."

"3563

There was another problem to consider, however.

The black sun. The darkening atmosphere.

That was no mere cosmetic side effect of Kallmakk's presence. It was a sign that the feldeath was doing two things: boosting the potency of all its attacks, and also preparing one of its most powerful abilities. After having been obliterated by said ability twice in the past, Morgunov had taken to calling it "Domain Wipe."

It was either that or "Darkness Nuke." He wasn't sure which was more apt, but he liked the sound of the first one better.

Regardless, it was a thing that could not be ignored. If it was allowed to go off, it would probably kill everyone here simultaneously, and since he was the only one present who knew precisely how deadly it was, he couldn't count on the others to stop it. If he did, and they failed, he and Bool would end up just as dead as the rest of them.

Truthfully, though, he was still a bit tempted to let it go. How funny would it have been if, after so much fighting with each other, Kallmakk just killed them all with one attack? In terms of ways to go out, that was quite a chucklesome one.

If he didn't still have so much that he wanted to do, he might've allowed it.

With Invisibility, he circled around to the feldeath's backside. It probably made no difference, since he was fairly sure that Kallmakk had omnidirectional senses, but it wouldn't hurt, either.

With his one remaining glove, he gathered his strength into his hand and barreled into the giant abomination with a flying punch, not holding back in the slightest, because he knew the sucker could take it.

Kallmakk burst apart in an inky spray of black. The sun flickered and brightened, as did the rest of the sky, though it was noticeably slower to do so, as if a veil were being slowly peeled away.

That was better. The sun was still unnaturally dark, but that was fine. As long as it wasn't black.

Now for the Roberts. They should've been--

He spun around in midair just in time to catch Koh with another hooking punch. The dog went flying again and left a satisfying crater in the ground when he landed.

Hmph. Sneaky little jerk. Almost caught him offguard again. If he hadn't been anticipating--

From behind, he felt two hands grab his head."
"3564 -- CCXCVI.

~~"Hello, Demonnnnn."~~

The words were unlike anything he had ever heard or felt. Low and distorted, they stretched through his mind, dragging it along with with them, interfering with every new thought that struggled to arise.

A root cause attack.

Even just realizing the danger was difficult. He'd never experienced this before, but he'd read of it, long ago.

One of the most powerful psychic techniques ever invented--and by the most powerful psychics to have ever existed, no less. The ancient Kingsparrows.

It paralyzed their prey by preventing any and all thoughts from being formulated in the mind. Reserved for particularly resilient minds that the psychic could not simply snap with brute force. And once it was activated, there was no escaping it, except by the will of the psychic who used it.

Morgunov, therefore, found himself abruptly trapped in a prison of his own mind.

And yet, when he'd read the claims in that ancient text about just how strong a root cause attack was supposed to be, he'd found himself quite doubtful, especially regarding that last part.

So now, he was about to put it to the test.

Chapter Two Hundred Ninety-Six: 'The Dance of the Mad Gods...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

The first thing to do was invoke a feedback loop. It didn't require any real thought. More of a feeling than an idea. And quite simple, besides. Well-practiced.

So if he was to be trapped, then at the very least, he would not be alone here.

It only seemed fair, right?

Aha.

Yes.

Fascinating. The space of his mind had reduced immensely. No feeling of his body. No senses whatsoever. Not even aura or time.

A simple black void. But not even a vast one, like the true Void. This had walls. Impassable barriers all around him.

A tiny room.

Good thing he wasn't claustrophobic.

"But what about you?" said Morgunov without a mouth. His voice simply carried forth, originating from nowhere and everywhere at once. "You're not afraid of tight spaces, are you?"

His passenger was there, though he had no form, no body, just like Morgunov himself.

"There's no point playing coy, now," Morgunov went on. "Speak to me. It seems you've granted the both of us an abundance of time. And to be honest, I've been waiting for an opportunity like this for years. Germal."

A long silence drew out, but it didn't bother Morgunov in the slightest.

Actually, it made him giggle. Was he causing frustration for this creature that had long frustrated him? How positively delightful.

"You cannot sustain this, Demon."

"Mm, I dunno. I kinda feel like I can."

"3564 -- CCXCVI.

~~"Hello, Demonnnnn."~~

The words were unlike anything he had ever heard or felt. Low and distorted, they stretched through his mind, dragging it along with with them, interfering with every new thought that struggled to arise.

A root cause attack.

Even just realizing the danger was difficult. He'd never experienced this before, but he'd read of it, long ago.

One of the most powerful psychic techniques ever invented--and by the most powerful psychics to have ever existed, no less. The ancient Kingsparrows.

It paralyzed their prey by preventing any and all thoughts from being formulated in the mind. Reserved for particularly resilient minds that the psychic could not simply snap with brute force. And once it was activated, there was no escaping it, except by the will of the psychic who used it.

Morgunov, therefore, found himself abruptly trapped in a prison of his own mind.

And yet, when he'd read the claims in that ancient text about just how strong a root cause attack was supposed to be, he'd found himself quite doubtful, especially regarding that last part.

So now, he was about to put it to the test.

Chapter Two Hundred Ninety-Six: 'The Dance of the Mad Gods...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

The first thing to do was invoke a feedback loop. It didn't require any real thought. More of a feeling than an idea. And quite simple, besides. Well-practiced.

So if he was to be trapped, then at the very least, he would not be alone here.

It only seemed fair, right?

Aha.

Yes.

Fascinating. The space of his mind had reduced immensely. No feeling of his body. No senses whatsoever. Not even aura or time.

A simple black void. But not even a vast one, like the true Void. This had walls. Impassable barriers all around him.

A tiny room.

Good thing he wasn't claustrophobic.

"But what about you?" said Morgunov without a mouth. His voice simply carried forth, originating from nowhere and everywhere at once. "You're not afraid of tight spaces, are you?"

His passenger was there, though he had no form, no body, just like Morgunov himself.

"There's no point playing coy, now," Morgunov went on. "Speak to me. It seems you've granted the both of us an abundance of time. And to be honest, I've been waiting for an opportunity like this for years. Germal."

A long silence drew out, but it didn't bother Morgunov in the slightest.

Actually, it made him giggle. Was he causing frustration for this creature that had long frustrated him? How positively delightful.

"You cannot sustain this, Demon."

"Mm, I dunno. I kinda feel like I can.""

"3565

"A stalemate does not favor you here," said Germal.

"Oh? And how would you know that? I'm sure you have no perception of time, either. For all you know, this could last a good long while for us in here before anyone out there is able to interfere. Or even forever! Eheh! Now wouldn't that be something?! Trapped together for eternity!"

"You would never abide such an arrangement."

"Nor would you, I imagine!"

The Liar made no response.

Morgunov pondered the situation a bit more on his own, trying to assess himself. His thoughts may have been greatly diminished in this space, but he still felt like he had access to the full breadth of his memories. And his personality still felt entirely intact, for what that was worth.

Yes. It was really just his body that was missing. Interesting.

A root cause attack should have, theoretically, been suppressing every new thought, even these ones. He supposed it was because he'd pulled Germal in with him that it wasn't working properly. Either that, or that ancient text had been full of shit. What had it been called again?

Of Minds and Manipulation, by Harundel the Greater.

Ah, yes. One of those silly Harundels. Perhaps that made sense.

"Still reading my mind, Liar?"

"I am flattered that you continue to overestimate my abilities," said Germal.

"Mmhmm, mmhmm. That's right. Never stop trying to downplay yourself. Always seek to make your enemies underestimate you. Eheh. Did I teach you that? Surely not. Doesn't sound like me. So where'd you learn it from, hmm? You can tell me. Who was your mentor?"

"Oh, I've had many."

"Yeah? Who was the most impactful, then?"

"I couldn't possibly choose just one."

"Mm," hummed Morgunov. "Or perhaps you've had none at all? That's another way of thinking about it, isn't it? If you have enough teachers, then you cease taking after any of them, eh? You achieve that all-important originality, eh?"

"You flatter me again, ledo."

"Ooh, the honorific! Who's flattering whom now?!" Morgunov broke for a chortle. "Y'know, I've learned a thing or two about some of those curious words you use. Words I've never heard anyone else use."

"Is that right?"

"Sure is. What, did you think I haven't been observing you over the years? You may be a sneaky boy, but you're far from the first to hide from me. And honestly, you're not even that good at it. Gotten too comfortable behind that big pupper of yours, I'd wager."

"In that case," said Germal, "perhaps you could share what you've learned of me. At times, I feel as though even I do not know what I am doing or why."

"Oho! How I wish for that to be true!" said Morgunov. "Very relatable, that notion! But of course it would be, wouldn't it?! You've learned a thing or two about me, as well, I'm sure! Tryin' to soften me up with some familiarity, huh?!"

"Interpret things however you please, but I shall not deny that I have been studying you. The Problem of the Furies is an ever cycling one, but you, ledo, only ever make it worse. Ignoring you would have been foolish beyond measure."

Morgunov's eyes might have bulged if he could have felt them. "The Problem of the Furies, you say? Well, now... that's quite the juicy morsel you've just dropped at my feet! Hmm! I'm finally tempted to believe something you've said! Well done, Gergy!"

"Either you die this day, or I do. There is no point in lying."

"Said the Liar! Oh, and please, don't say that! If I have things my way, you won't be dying for a very, very long time!"

"All the more reason to bring your reign of terror to an end, then."

"Ooh, is that what this has all been about?! Gergy! Don't tell me! Are you one of those secret, noble heroes of the ancient world?! Fighting wickedness from the shadows?!"

"Anyone who goes against you can be considered a hero."

"Eheh. How mean. I can be heroic when I want to, you know. As a matter of fact, I have a sneaking suspicion that taking care of you, right here, right now, might just be one of the most heroic things I could ever do."

"You've really built me up quite a bit in your mind, haven't you?"

"It's nothin' you haven't earned, dear boy! Or, cedo, as you would say? Yes!"

"Indeed. Ah, but you still have not told me what you know of my words. Please, go on and enlighten me."

"I do love an attentive listener. Alright, then! Those words you use. They're psychic markers, aren't they? Meaningful to you in ways that are imperceptible to others. And I bet they make it easier to pry into the mind, don't they? Especially when you want to leave a lasting impression on someone, hmm? What better method than to take on a memorable way of speaking? You do love mucking about with memories, don't you?"

For the first time that Morgunov had heard, the Liar of Lyste returned a laugh.

"I shall never let it be said that you lack imagination, Demon.""
"3567

"And I shall never let it be said that you lack conviction," said Morgunov. "This whole thing was your doing, wasn't it? This plot to ambush me?"

"Well, if you are to blame anyone, it might as well be me."

"Ha! So casual! As if you did not plan it meticulously!"

"You are not as unpredictable as you think, Nibas. It was not that hard."

"Mm! How irksome. You really know how to get under a guy's skin, don'tcha?"

"I do my level best."

A funny thought struck Morgunov, and he decided to run with it. "But if that's really true, then you shouldn't mind proving it, eh?"

"Proving what?"

"That it wasn't that hard for you to ambush me! Because I'm so predictable, right? So prove it!"

A beat passed. "Heh. How would you like to me to do that?"

"Well, obviously, you should let me escape and then just ambush me a second time!"

Germal chuckled.

"C'mon!" said Morgunov, also laughing. "That'd prove your point more thoroughly than anything else! You know I'm right!"

"A tempting proposition."

"Hoho! Perhaps you've got some guts, after all! Not just a bag full of underhanded hijinks!"

"Tempting, I said. But no. I think not."

"Boo! What a chicken! A spoil sport! And, dare I say, an all-around fib-teller! You must not have found me predictable in the slightest! In which case, I believe this now counts as my victory. Too bad for you, Gergy."

"Truly, I am crushed."

"Well, either way, it seems we'll have to arrive at some sort of compromise here, eventually. I'm not letting you go unless you let me go, first. And since we've been gabbin' for a good little while now and no one's come a-knockin', I'd say we're well and truly stuck here."

"Perhaps so."

"Good, I'm glad you agree! So let's talk brass tacks, then! What's it gonna take for you to let me outta here, hmm?"

"Oh, well, what are you offering?"

"How about a big, friendly hug once we're free?"

"Ah. Not a death sentence at all, I'm sure."

"Of course not! Friendly, I said! How could killing you be considered friendly?"

"I'm sure you could think of a way to spin that."

"Alright, alright. How about if I promise not to immediately rip your head off, then?"

“How generous.”

“Right? I mean, we both know you would deserve it.”

“I think I’ll have to pass on that one, as well.”

“Really breakin’ my balls here, man. Why don’t you try suggesting something, then?”

”3568

“Instead of promises which are sure to be broken, perhaps you could provide me with information. Here and now.”

“Interesting!” said Morgunov. “I’m open to that! Only problem is that all I’d be getting in exchange would be a promise from you to release me. And as you said, promises are sure to be broken.”

“If I do not deliver on said promise, then we will both remain stuck here.”

“Exactly. Which further means that you could continue pumping me for information for as long as you please. So if you want my knowledge, then you’ll have to give me some of yours in return.”

“You surprise me. I thought you would surely believe that I could not possibly tell you anything that you do not already know.”

“Why? Because of the so-called ‘emperor’s hubris?’ Puh-lease! I’m the humblest emperor to ever walk the planet!” He paused. “Plus, I’m sure you’re hiding all sorts of juicy secrets in that freaky little horn of yours.”

“It is not freaky.”

“It’s pretty freaky.”

“Hmph.”

“Oh, and since you’re the one holdin’ the key here, you’ve got a bit more negotiating power than I do. So that means I’m gonna need you to go first with the answering of questions. As a show of good faith, you understand.”

“I do not like the sound of that. If I have more negotiating power, as you claim, then surely it is you who should be going first, not me.”

“No, but see, if I go first, then you can just refuse to answer my question and ask another one of yours, instead. And you can just keep doing that endlessly.”

“You say that as if you would be incapable of refusing, yourself.”

“Of course I could refuse! But you could end the conversation whenever you want by just releasing us! And then what, huh? I’d be left alone, answerless, with my dick in my hand. And I would find that quite upsetting.”

“Hmm. I suppose you have a point.”

“Course I do!”

“But please keep your penis in your pants.”

“It was a metaphor. The youngins say that all the time. I can’t even feel my pants, right now.”

“I do not wish to see your metaphorical penis, either.”

“My--? Huh... Why do I feel so insulted, right now?”

“If I am to go first, then so be it. What is your question for me?”

”3569

“Ah, lemme think about that! Lots of things come to mind! And you’re quite likely to not answer anything I ask later, so I gotta pick something really good! Hmm! What’s the best question to ask first?!”

“I already have mine picked out.”

“Oh, well, look at you, Mr. Prepared. Got somethin’ you’ve been wanting to ask me for a long time, eh?”

“Indeed.”

“Interesting. And you didn’t think to simply ask? Y’know, before trying to kill me?”

“The thought did cross my mind. But I discarded it.”

“How cruel. You should indulge your curiosity more. It’s a very human quality, Gergy. And who knows? I might have pleasantly surprised you.”

“I doubt it.”

“Hmph. My question for you, then, is thus. What are you, really? You’re not a servant. I know that much. So tell me the truth of your existence, Liar of Lyste.”

“I’ve never cared for that name.”

“Gentleman of Palei, then.”

Germal took a long pause before answering. “I am that which you have been seeking, Demon.”

“Oh? And what is that?”

“A Primordial.”

Morgunov made no response. He just let that answer linger, thinking on it. Could that be true? This was coming from the Liar, after all. And that had been quite easily said.

Ah, but perhaps that was the trick here. Telling the truth so quickly would actually make it seem like a lie, wouldn’t it? Which would let Germal pass over it and move on to a more favorable fiction.

And if it were true, it would explain a few things. Morgunov had already come to the conclusion that the Liar had orchestrated this whole thing, which meant that the timing with Rasalased and his supposed sister had not been coincidental. It would make sense that a real Primordial would’ve had access to those two beforehand. Coordinated with them. To ambush him.

Yes.

“I don’t believe you,” Morgunov decided to say.

“How surprising. But I have answered your question. Now it is my turn.”

“I’m afraid not. We can’t move on until the question has been answered to the asker’s satisfaction. And I am far from satisfied. If what you said is true, then provide details. The term ‘Primordial’ has existed for eons. If you really are one of them, then tell me what that means to you. How do you define yourself?"

"My, my. There are any number of ways that I could answer that. If I were to ask you the same thing, to define yourself, could you do so?"

"You bet your ass I could. And if you want, I'd be more than happy to. When it's your turn.""

"3570

"You are setting quite the precedent here," said Germal. "I will be quite demanding with my question, now."

"Ha! You really don't know me very well at all, do you?! How delightfully surprising! Unlike you, Germey, I do not obsess over keeping all my knowledge to myself. In fact, giving lectures about the secrets of the world is something I quite enjoy!"

"You certainly do love to listen to yourself talk."

"I won't deny it! If only there were more who were bold enough to listen! Now tell me. How do you define yourself?"

Germal took a minute to answer. "...Truthfully, Demon? I define myself as one who would return this world to order. The way it was, long ago."

"Order, you say? Interesting! Now do you mean 'order?' Or do you mean 'Order?'"

"I am confused. What is the distinction you are referring to?"

A lie, for certain. Perhaps the greatest of all the lies the Liar had yet told.

Which was no surprise, of course, but this time was special. This time, Morgunov found it intensely annoying. "Confused, you say? Why should you be confused? Ah! Perhaps because you do not wish to acknowledge your great nemesis, hmm? To hear it named truly?"

Germal fell quiet at that.

Morgunov decided to let the silence linger for a bit. In truth, he'd been holding a few things back this whole time. A few memories. Locked away for safekeeping, just in case Germal started getting uppity with his mind reading again.

But those memories were now beginning to unlock themselves. As per their locking conditions, no doubt. A timed trigger? Hmm, unlikely, considering time seemed to have largely stopped in this strange space.

Ah. An emotional trigger, then. Related to his long-held ruminations on Order and Chaos.

Yes.

“You Primordials are beings of Chaos, are you not? Your great enemy, therefore, must be Order. So it makes no sense that you would seek to ‘put the world to Order.’ Unless, of course, you were using deliberately misleading language, and your idea of ‘order’ means something totally different, eh? Perhaps even the exact opposite thing! Eheh! But I’m sure a stand-up Gentleman like you would never do something like that!”

“...You remember more of Bellvine than you have let on.”

“Mm! Perhaps I do! But y’know, I feel talking to you is also helping me to remember even more things, too! So thanks for that. Maybe you’re not such a bad guy, after all.””

"3571

Germal chortled again. “Ah, but in that case, it should honestly be I who is thanking you. Without your intervention at that time, I am not sure that I could have returned to this realm.”

“Oh yeah? Well, you’re welcome, then. But you sure have a funny way of demonstrating your appreciation! Tryin’ to kill me ‘n all!”

“Kehe. Don’t act like you were not already planning to come after me again.”

“That’s hardly fair! Just because I’m planning something doesn’t mean I’ll follow through with it! Do you know how many things I have left on my to-do list?”

“A real shame, that. Anyway, have I answered to your satisfaction? I wish to take my turn, now.”

“Hmm! Almost! Just one little thing I want clarification on!”

“Yes?”

“If you’re all beings of Chaos, then what’s your beef with me, huh? I’m a reasonable fellow. In fact, I would’ve expected us to be on the same side! I happen to love Chaos! Everyone knows us Abolishers are big fans of the Void, of which Chaos is merely one aspect!”

“Calling yourself reasonable has to be a bigger lie than anything I have ever uttered.”

“Now you’re just being hurtful. Sure, my enthusiasm can get away from me, on occasion. But I genuinely think that you and I could have arrived at some quite amicable terms, many years ago, if you’d just tried to reach out. Explained your position a bit. Heck, maybe we still could! Wouldn’t that be neat?!”

“You would have almost certainly tried to capture me.”

“Well, yeah, of course I would have! But I’m tellin’ you: we would have eventually arrived at a place of friendship!”

Germal fell briefly quiet again. “Keheheh...”

“Somethin’ funny?”

“You do bring something out of me, Demon. I’ll grant you that.”

“Oh? Happy to hear it!”

“Unfortunately, that was not a compliment.”

“Aww.”

“I am tempted to play your game here. To indulge your offer of friendship, even. And continue this exchange elsewhere. But no. You are too dangerous to leave alive.”

“Mm. Heard that before. Real shame, coming from you. Was hoping you’d surprise me. Spice things up, somehow. But I guess in the end, you’re just another of those morality-obsessed do-gooders, eh? Despite so much evidence to the contrary! Talk about a letdown!”

“A morality-obsessed do-gooder? Now that is an interesting interpretation. Kehe. I fear you are still quite confused, my 'demonic' friend."

"Am I? How so?"

"3572

"There is no morality in this world, save that which we above decide," said Germal. "And you, cedo, are no ally of Chaos. You are, in fact, the furthest thing from it."

Morgunov paused. Hmm. There was a lot to unpack there. "What makes you say that? I've been spreading chaos all over the world my whole dang life! Go on, ask anyone!"

"Ah, but now it is you who is using misleading language. You spread 'chaos,' yes. But not 'Chaos.' In fact, for all your knowledge and experience, I suspect you hardly know what true Chaos is."

"Whoa, whoa, whoa. Easy with the insults there. You're not seriously trying to tell me that I've secretly, unwittingly been an agent of Order this entire time. Because frankly, that has to be the silliest darn thing I've ever done heard!"

"You truly do not understand? How short-sighted. Yes, you may not be of the Furies, but you incite them to move. You spur them on. Inspire them. And frequently, you do much more than that, don't you? You often allow them to live when you could easily end them. You even feel remorse on the rare occasions when you put one down. And of course, some, you teach directly as your students. Help them refine and grow themselves."

Morgunov had a lot to say, but he remained silent, because it seemed like this guy wasn't done yet, and he wanted to hear the rest.

"The mere act of inventing--don't you see? That, too, is making Order from Chaos. Taking the natural, beautiful Chaos of the world and twisting it into inert knots. That is the ultimate goal of all your efforts, whether you realize it or not. Whatever amount of Chaos you might bring--it is incidental and fleeting. Soon chased away by Order. You claim to be a gardener, as we are, yet you do nothing but plant and grow weeds."

Morgunov could stay quiet no longer. "Excuse me? Weeds? You think inventors, the brilliant and beautiful minds of the world, are weeds? The people who spend their lives advancing technology, pushing the boundaries of human knowledge and potential, usually at great personal risk to themselves--those are the ugly things you want to uproot?"

"Ah. Perhaps you do understand."

And for the first time in many, many years, Morgunov was struck dumb. With utter incredulity.

How could anyone believe something so obviously moronic?"

"3573

Well.

On second thought, he knew exactly how someone could believe that. He was suddenly reminded of his youth--of that special breed of proud, malicious ignorance that seemed to possess everyone around him in those days.

'Anti-knowledge,' he'd called it. Not just the desire to remain ignorant. No. It went a step further and sought to destroy the knowledge of others, too. To humiliate them for even having the gall to pursue said knowledge in the first place.

There was nothing in this universe that Morgunov hated more than that.

And his confusion, his disbelief--they melted gradually away.

Replaced in their entirety with rage. The kind he hadn't felt in countless years. The kind that threatened to overtake every cogent thought in his mind.

It was all he could do to contain himself. If the two of them were not already trapped, he would have killed Germal instantly. No games. No toying with his food. No experimenting with some untested invention. No saving his real trump cards for later. Not even any capturing for future study.

This creature in here with him--whatever it was--it needed to die.

“...You’ve fallen quiet,” said Germal.

Morgunov said nothing.

“Kehe. It seems I’ve accomplished the impossible.”

Morgunov knew he needed to steady himself. He’d allowed his emotions to rise too much.

He knew that.

And yet he didn’t entirely care. The thought occurred to him that, yes, if Germal could really read minds, then the bastard could be reading this, right now. That he--no, it--could’ve even known ahead of time exactly what to say in order to provoke this very reaction.

That it could’ve all been a lie, said for no other reason than to get under his skin.

If so, then Morgunov could admit: it had worked. And this bastard was going to regret it with every fiber of its being.

But for some reason, Morgunov felt like that wasn’t the case, either. That really was how Germal viewed the world, wasn’t it? Perhaps that was even how all the Primordials viewed it.

Which would certainly explain why the Void decided to rip them from this plane of existence.

Because they deserved it. And worse.

“Is it my turn, now?” said Germal. “Have I answered to your satisfaction?”

Still, Morgunov almost remained silent. But after a moment, he found enough poise to say, “Yes. Go ahead.”

"3574

“The Vessel of Trenoyis,” said Germal. “Where is it?”

“Trenoyis,” echoed Morguonv. “Hmm. Have you checked Trenoy? I hear they named that place after him.”

"Cute. You know this does not work if you refuse to answer, yes? You must answer to my satisfaction. You know the Vessel's whereabouts, don't you?"

"Do I? Why don't you just read my mind and see for yourself?"

"You know why."

"Oh, come now. Are you tellin' me that my measly little psychic defenses are able to thwart the efforts of a big, bad Primordial like yourself? Surely not."

"Measly, are they? You've created an entire labyrinth full of coma-inducing booby traps."

"What can I say? I don't like people rooting around in there without my permission."

"What if I promise to be gentle?"

"Oh, sure, but you have to let me run some experiments on you, first. I promise that I'll be equally gentle."

"Kehe. Indeed. We've arrived at yet another impasse, it would seem."

"Shocker, eh? And hey, let's not pretend like you psychics don't deserve a bit of backlash for all the stuff you've gotten up to over the years. Rifling through other people's memories--is there any greater invasion of privacy than that? I think not. And that's just one of the messed up things you've been doing!"

"The pot is truly screaming at the kettle, now."

"Eheh. I never said I don't have some backlash coming, too."

"Oh? Are you perhaps acknowledging that this ambush is deserved?"

"In a general sense? Yeah, maybe. But I don't recall ever wronging you specifically."

"No? You have been hunting me for decades."

"Yeah, what's wrong with that? I just wanted to have a nice chat. You're the one who made it weird."

"I'll be sure to keep that in mind. Now answer my question. Where is the Vessel?"

“What’s your interest in it?”

“Can you not guess, based on everything else I’ve already told you?”

“Maybe I want to hear it from the horse’s mouth. Are you a horse god, Gerny? I bet you are, aren’t you? I feel like that’d suit you.”

“The Vessel shall help me free Trenoyis.”

“You don’t say? Are you sure you want to do that? What would the Void think?”

A brief silence arrived. “Kehehe. Not much of anything, I suspect. Your faith in that being is misplaced, I’m afraid.”

Hmm. Morgunov wanted to scratch his chin. “So despite being of Chaos, you’re going against the Void’s will? Hmm. Now that just don’t seem right.”

"3575

“You conflate the two when you should not,” said Germal. “Chaos may be an aspect of the Void, but that does not mean they have the same desires. Does your stomach always want what you do?”

“I mean, usually. I’ve never been big on dieting.”

“Even so, that is the essence of it. The Void believes that it knows best. It often tries, foolishly, to ignore its many competing instincts.”

“Interesting. So what does that make you, then? A stomach virus?”

Germal laughed outright. “From your perspective, perhaps so! But you’ll have to forgive me if I do not measure my self-worth by the judgments of a gleeful, mass murdering psychopath.”

“Mmhmm. You say that, but if you’re really a Primordial, then the odds are quite good that you’ve dabbled in a bit of mass murder and/or psychopathy yourself.”

“A fair statement. Incorrect, but fair.”

“Oh? Which Primordial do you claim to be, then?”

"Ah-ah. It is still my turn. And you have yet to answer my question. The Vessel. Where is it located?"

"Fine, fine. I have it, actually. Locked up tight in one of my warehouses."

"Which warehouse?"

"Lemme go, and I'll take you there!"

"How kind of you to offer. But I shall make do with just the location, if you please."

"Hmph. It's in Luugh. Outside a little town called Ragayo. That specific enough for you?"

"No. What is the exact address?"

Tch. "Doesn't have one. No road nearby. Won't show up on a map, either."

"Landmarks?"

"It's surrounded by trees. Squirreled away, out of sight. I like my hidden things to remain hidden, y'know?"

"Security?"

"None at all."

"You're lying. I can tell. How much security is there?"

"Oh, I'm sure it's nothing a tough guy like you can't handle."

"Specifics, Demon. Answering to my satisfaction was your rule, remember?"

"Ugh, so dull! Can't you just appreciate a good surprise, every now and then?"

"No."

"Alright, alright. Lemme think. Umm. There were... twelve automatic turrets along the perimeter. Programmed to stun, not kill. Thirty-seven mines dotted the outer walls. Oh, and a small platoon of Roberts."

"Roberts?"

"My tin soldiers. That's what I call 'em."

"...How small is this platoon, precisely?"

"Oh, I, mm... sixty-eight."

"Sixty-eight of those monstrosities?"

Morgunov could not help feeling immensely pleased by the bastard's worried tone. "You and your boys made short work of them back at my workshop. And without me there to feed them orders, I'm sure you won't have any trouble." Assuming Germal actually brought all his buddies along to help, which seemed unlikely.

Eheh."

"3576

"How did you get your hands on the Vessel, anyway?" said Germal. "It should have been guarded by a cluster of feldeaths."

"Oh, you knew that, huh?" And a thought struck him. "Wait a minute! Don't tell me! You went and tried to grab it yourself, didn't you?! Only to find it missing after putting yourself in so much danger! Ahaha! That's what happened, isn't it?!"

Germal said no response, which prompted Morgunov to just keep laughing.

"That's excellent!" said the Mad Demon. "Wish I'd been there to see you scurrying about like a scared mouse!"

"Tell me how you snuck it out," said Germal.

"Curious, eh? Alright, fine. I lured a crew of worms over to distract the big fellas for me while I made off with the spoils. Which involved more than just the Vessel, by the way. In fact, I'd nearly forgotten about that old thing until you brought it up."

"Ah..."

"So there. Satisfied yet?"

"I suppose so."

"Good! Then we can be done with this whole thing and get back to the real world!"

"You have no further questions for me?" said Germal.

Morgunov paused. Truthfully, he wanted nothing more than to get back to ripping this guy in half as soon as possible, but he supposed he shouldn't waste this opportunity while he had it. Plus, something else was occurring to him. "If you're saying that, then you must have additional things to ask, mm?"

"Perhaps so. You are a font of knowledge, Demon. I should like to make use of you while I still can."

"Ooh. A threat and flattery. What a charming devil you are, Gemy. In that case, I'll indulge you a bit longer. Tell me. What are the Furies, exactly? How do you define them?"

"I'm surprised you do not already know that."

"Mayhaps I do. But I still want to know what your twisted and stupid perspective is."

"Kehe. The Furies, dear Demon, are the great agents of Order. They are a troublesome collective that span the breadth of history, often linked together unwittingly. They are one--and also many."

"Hmm. One and many, huh?"

"The collective supports the one. The emergent head of a given era. Only one exists at a time. It becomes the focal point to which flows all the troublesome toils of the others. And when the head is slain, another inevitably emerges. A hydra, of sorts. I am certain that you know exactly what I speak of. And that I am not lying, yes?"

"3577

"I don't think that I do," said Morgunov, though that wasn't entirely true. "You're tryin' to tell me that there's some grand, invisible force that's been creating great geniuses throughout history? And that only one can exist at a time? Why would that be true? Seems pretty inefficient to me. If the goal is to create Order, then the more brilliant minds there are, the better. Limiting it all to just one, singular dude sounds stupid as hell."

"I never said Order was smart, now did I?"

"Oh, c'mon, that's the best you've got? You're supposed to be the greatest liar in the world, aren't you? Come up with something more convincing!"

"What could be more convincing than the simple truth?"

"Eheh, oh, please. The best liars are able use the truth as if it were a lie--and vice versa. Think I'm not aware of that? Gotta say, you're really leavin' me quite unimpressed with your abilities so far, fella. Fumblin' the bag, as the youngins like to say!"

"Well, I did tell you from the beginning that you were overestimating me."

"Aha! True enough!"

"But alright. I cannot claim to know what Order is thinking--or if it even thinks anything at all, for that matter--but I do feel that you are misconceiving something. A true Fury is able to take inspiration from their contemporaries, as well. Not just from those in the past. So your idea that more would be better is rather moot."

"Hmm."

"Additionally, would more actually be better? They do say that too many cooks spoil the broth, no? Perhaps Order believes something similar."

Dang it, that was actually a good point.

Morgunov still had more to follow up on, though. "Okay, so the Furies are, what, the greatest minds of their eras? And yet you also told me that I'm not one of 'em? How can I not qualify, huh? After all I've done! That hardly seems fair!"

"Tis not a matter of intellect alone." A beat passed. "Though I'm sure you would be found wanting there, as well."

"Eheh, ouch! So what else factors in, then, hmm?"

"Personality, of course. Temperament. Desires of the heart and soul."

"You sayin' I'm not pure of heart?"

"Not at all. Your heart is perhaps the purest black I've ever seen."

"Really? Ever? You've known some real mean buggers from across all the Ages, haven't you? And yet you honestly think I'm the worst?"

"Yes. I do."

"3578

Morgunov needed a moment to deconstruct that statement. But only a moment. "Oh. Right. Because I'm also an inventor. And we're the worst by default, according to your twisted logic. Of course."

"There is far more to it than merely that, and I think you know that."

"Oh yeah? So you're tellin' me that I'm worse than Arnel the Terror? Really? Look, I know I've done some messed up things, okay? But that guy literally cooked people alive and ate them in front of their horrified family members."

Germal paused. "...Okay, well, I never met Arnel. And I said that you're the worst I've seen. Not the worst to ever exist."

"Wow, what a cop out. And still definitely untrue! You must've met Hada, right? Oh, unless you are him, I suppose. In which case, dang. You've really got no room to be calling me names."

"Hada does deserve admonishment, true. Which I have provided, on many occasions. In fact, it might be my single greatest pastime. But Hada is also a god, which affords him special consideration. You, however, deserve no such thing."

"Oh, so that's how it works. I'm not part of your privileged little club, so off with my head, eh?"

"In essence, yes. Ah, but now, perhaps you are thinking that you might like to join?"

Morgunov stopped on that notion for a bit. After all he'd just heard, there was no more repulsive idea to him than what Germal had just suggested. "Yeah, sure, man. Do I have to learn a secret handshake?"

"No. Unfortunately, there is no set path to godhood. No advice that can be granted. 'Tis something that one must arrive at in solitude. Or become a vessel and agree to incarnation. Might you be interested in that?"

"Oh, you mean giving up my corporeal form and sense of self in order to transform into an entirely new being?"

"Indeed. If you are amenable to the idea, then I can arrange it. There are many of us who are awaiting new vessels."

"Interesting! You can do it just like that, huh? Simple and easy?"

"Quite."

"And you're sure I'd make for a suitable vessel? I'm not too messed up or unworthy or anything?"

"Of course. You would do fine."

"Well, alright then! Let's make that happen, pal!"

"Truly? I thought you would be more--"

Morgunov waited. He would've smiled if he could've.

"...You're lying," said Germal. "You have no intention of incarnating with anyone. As soon as I free us, you will try to kill me."

"Well, duh. That was always going to happen, Germy. You're the one who decided to put your balls on the table and confront me. You can't honestly expect that I'm gonna let you get outta this unscathed, can you? But I do find it funny that you almost didn't realize it in time! You must be really eager to find vessels for all your little buddies! How quaint!"

"You are a bastard.""

"3579

"Anyway, enough of this," said Morgunov. "You've answered to my satisfaction. Take your turn, and then let's get out of here."

"Already?" said Germal. "This will only be my second question."

“What, that’s not enough? How many more could you possibly have for me? Aren’t you Primordials supposed to be all-knowing?”

“If only that were so.”

“Geez. Y’know, you’re comin’ across as kinda pathetic, right now. In fact, you’re makin’ me feel like the term ‘god’ applies more to me than it does to you. Aren’t you ashamed of yourself?”

“I can only apologize.”

“If this is some subtle strategy to make me arrogant and careless, then it won’t work! My carelessness has already given you plenty of chances! Don’t tell me you need even more! Greedy! That’s what that is!”

“I know my second question for you.”

“Out with it, then.”

“Why did you kill Dolf Rachman?”

Morgunov stopped.

Germal just waited for him, however. The son of a bitch.

“...That’s completely out of nowhere,” said Morgunov, suspicious. “Why do you care about that?”

“Kehe. I will admit it: you do not make it an easy process, but yes, I have been looking through your memories. And that is one that stuck out to me. I cannot discern your feelings from that time. It seems they are quite tender to you. A sore spot, perhaps? Surprising, for a madman like you. It has made me curious to know more.”

Psychics. This was precisely why he’d grown to hate them in his youth. These days, his feelings toward them had waned a bit. He’d grown powerful enough that they’d ceased being a real concern. And perhaps he’d begun to think that, as long they knew their place, they might not be so bad, after all. Fun to play with, even.

But now he was being reminded. Of what they were really like. When they lacked fear. When they’d been truly threatening. He understood completely why his ancient predecessors had sided with the Vanguard against the Kingsparrows. He would do the same, if such a time ever came again.

“...Ask me something else,” said Morgunov.

“Oh? Well, now you are only making me even more interested. Can it really be such a sensitive subject for you? Surely not. For a battle-hardened emperor such as yourself? How could that be?”

“This tack won’t work, either, Liar.”

“What tack? I’m simply confused. Because from everything you’ve claimed thus far--everything you even seem to believe--you love to see brilliance in action. You love human ingenuity. It’s why you’re an inventor. Why you’ve been once since you were but a boy. And yet, with Mr. Rachman--”

“You’re wasting your time. And your question.”

“Well, that’s my decision to make, now isn’t it?”

"3580

Morgunov remained quiet for a time. He needed to clear his mind. Dwelling on thoughts, wallowing in feelings--those were not only useless, but actively harmful in this particular conversation. With this disgusting creature searching for any potential vulnerability, there was nothing to be gained here and everything to lose.

So he delved further into his calm. His meditative clarity.

He’d not meditated in a very long time. He was most certainly out of practice. In fact, ever since mastering his psychic defenses, he’d begun to think that meditation was a pointless activity. No longer needed. Especially when he had so much other fun stuff that he could’ve been doing, instead.

But that was fine. It was like getting back on a horse. Old and familiar.

“It is no use trying to run from me,” said Germal. “We are trapped here, remember? There is nowhere to go.”

Morgunov ignored him. Calm and clear. Devoid of emotion.

Germal kept pushing. “You’re just not going to answer me at all, are you? Kehe. How cowardly.”

Just words. Empty words.

"Alright, I think I understand now. There can't be many reasons why something would be a sore spot for you. And I've already caught enough of a whiff to piece things together. So rather than you answering my question, how about I do you a favor and answer it for you? Generous of me, no?"

No. Ignore the mind flayer.

"The reason you killed Dolf--or rather, the reason it haunts you so--is because it was the moment when you were forced to confront your true self."

Bastard.

"The part of you that you hate. Your old, weak, scared, pathetic self. The self that you've tried, in vain, for centuries to overcome, then repress, then simply pretend it never existed. Dolf reminded you that all your lofty ideas about humanity, about the beauty of invention and innovation, about brilliance and technological progress--all those cherished thoughts are ultimately just bullshit when competing against your own fragile ego. Against the sudden realization that someone out there is actually smarter than you. Better than you."

"I'm going to kill you, mind flayer. And then I'm going to find you in whatever realm your recursive self calls home, and I'm going to kill you there, too. Or put you in a cage, perhaps. I'll have to make up my mind along the way. Regardless, there will be no more incarnations for you. Only the Void. And then I'll find a way to take that from you, too."
"3581 -- CCXCVII.

Germal just laughed.

Which only incensed Morgunov further.

But there was no point in voicing it. He hated losing control of his emotions like that and was already regretting it.

No. He was just going to follow through with his promises. And await the day when this smug creature was finally laid low. How thoroughly satisfying that was going to be.

"You've fallen silent again," observed the Liar. "Has our game come to an abrupt end? If so, then 'tis a shame. Strange as it may sound, I would say that you have indeed answered to my satisfaction. Kehehe. And so it is now your turn, my friend."

What a piece of shit. In this moment, Morgunov was not sure he had ever hated anyone so much. Anyone--or anything, even.

A disturbance arrived, however, causing sudden havoc with Morgunov's perception of this empty headspace that they were both trapped in. What in the world was that?

"Ah!" came a new voice. "There you both are! Finally!"

Who was that? Morgunov needed a second to--

"Master?" said Germal.

And Morgunov realized. "Gohvis? How did you find us?"

The Monster of the East ignored both their queries. "What are you two idiots doing? Having a nice chat in some kind of liminal space? How cozy. Meanwhile, I'm trying to prevent a feldeath of darkness from atomizing the pair of you."

"Oh, the fight's still going?" said Morgunov. "We thought time was simply moving differently for us in here."

"It is," said Gohvis. "I can sense the time dilation. But multiple minutes have still transpired for me outside. Do you realize how long that feels, right now?"

"Ah."

"Oh."

"Have you at least managed to talk through your disagreements?" said Gohvis. "This entire fight is pointless. We are all on the same side."

"If you actually believe that," said Morgunov, "then Germal's fooled you even more thoroughly than I thought."

"Master, please stop interfering. This matter has nothing to do with you."

"I hate you both so much."

Chapter Two Hundred Ninety-Seven: 'How Fire perceives Steel...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Warrenhold sure was feeling different, lately. And not just because of the restoration efforts, Roman felt. There was something more. Something he couldn't quite put his finger on.

Something to do with Hector.

This place. What exactly was it transforming into, he wondered? A place of safety? Refuge for all who needed it? Or an indomitable fortress? A headquarters from which an empire would be built?

Could all of those things be possible simultaneously?

Voreese seemed to think so."
"3581 -- CCXCVII.

Germal just laughed.

Which only incensed Morgunov further.

But there was no point in voicing it. He hated losing control of his emotions like that and was already regretting it.

No. He was just going to follow through with his promises. And await the day when this smug creature was finally laid low. How thoroughly satisfying that was going to be.

"You've fallen silent again," observed the Liar. "Has our game come to an abrupt end? If so, then 'tis a shame. Strange as it may sound, I would say that you have indeed answered to my satisfaction. Kehehe. And so it is now your turn, my friend."

What a piece of shit. In this moment, Morgunov was not sure he had ever hated anyone so much. Anyone--or anything, even.

A disturbance arrived, however, causing sudden havoc with Morgunov's perception of this empty headspace that they were both trapped in. What in the world was that?

“Ah!” came a new voice. “There you both are! Finally!”

Who was that? Morgunov needed a second to--

“Master?” said Germal.

And Morgunov realized. “Gohvis? How did you find us?”

The Monster of the East ignored both their queries. “What are you two idiots doing? Having a nice chat in some kind of liminal space? How cozy. Meanwhile, I’m trying to prevent a feldeath of darkness from atomizing the pair of you.”

“Oh, the fight’s still going?” said Morgunov. “We thought time was simply moving differently for us in here.”

“It is,” said Gohvis. “I can sense the time dilation. But multiple minutes have still transpired for me outside. Do you realize how long that feels, right now?”

“Ah.”

“Oh.”

“Have you at least managed to talk through your disagreements?” said Gohvis. “This entire fight is pointless. We are all on the same side.”

“If you actually believe that,” said Morgunov, “then Germal’s fooled you even more thoroughly than I thought.”

“Master, please stop interfering. This matter has nothing to do with you.”

“I hate you both so much.”

Chapter Two Hundred Ninety-Seven: ‘How Fire perceives Steel...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Warrenhold sure was feeling different, lately. And not just because of the restoration efforts, Roman felt. There was something more. Something he couldn’t quite put his finger on.

Something to do with Hector.

This place. What exactly was it transforming into, he wondered? A place of safety? Refuge for all who needed it? Or an indomitable fortress? A headquarters from which an empire would be built?

Could all of those things be possible simultaneously?

Voreese seemed to think so."

"3582

It was unsettling, to be sure. But also, admittedly, exciting. A mixture of hope and dread. Like he was watching history take shape before his very eyes, every single day.

And increasingly, he questioned his role in things here. A year ago, he and Voreese had been laying their long-visioned plans for building up a new faction of their own. Something that, according to her, would take a century or more before it began to bear any real fruit.

But now, it seemed as though they had been sucked into something entirely different. Voreese, for her part, seemed to have all but forgotten about her previous plan--not that there was any sense of urgency with it, of course. They could always circle back around to it later, Roman supposed.

Assuming they lived that long, of course. Which was kind of the sticking point here.

Their plan, more or less, had been to lay relatively low and accumulate strength, resources, and powerful allies over time. Now, whatever this current plan was--if it could even be called a plan--it seemed to have thrown that first part out the window.

Laying low? Who cared about that?

Sure, Hector and Garovel both came across reasonable enough when they spoke about plans and how to handle whatever the emergent situation at the time was.

But their actions... those told a somewhat different story, Roman felt.

They were just going to keep throwing themselves right into the thick of things, weren't they? He thought maybe that wouldn't be the case when they decided to stay here at Warrenhold and not venture off to Vantalay, especially since they'd had multiple motivating opportunities to, but this latest business with Banda Toro had now convinced Roman that Hector was indeed the maniac that he'd been fearing he was.

Damn it all. Roman felt like a dumbass. Why'd he have to go and become friends with a guy like that, huh? Especially right before a gigantic war broke out? Talk about bad timing.

The worst part, though, was that not many other people around Hector seemed to be seeing things the way Roman did. All these reapers and Rainlords. They were ready to do whatever Hector told them. As if he'd been their lord for years, already.

Which meant that, as his friend, Roman had a greater responsibility to not become a yes-man.

To keep his friend balanced.

Where the future of this country was concerned, Roman wasn't sure there was any more important task than that."

"3583

And to that end, Roman had begun restructuring several of his own companies and organizations in an effort to prepare for the future. Naturally, he'd been hit rather hard by this economic crisis that Atreya had been dealing with, so a restructure had needed to happen, regardless, but he was certainly taking a different approach to it than he would have a year or two ago.

He needed more flexibility. The vast majority of his money was tied up in things. He didn't like letting it just sit there, doing nothing, when he could instead invest in people who were trying to build things for their communities.

A nice idea, certainly. He'd helped a lot of people that way. Helped create work for tens of thousands of Atreyan citizens, mostly without even meeting any of them.

But now he was thinking that it sure would've been helpful if he could've freed up more of that cash without having to liquidate entire companies, especially at a time like this when those people needed their jobs more than ever. If he'd invested more into real estate, for example, then he could've flipped a bunch of properties and funneled a lot more cash into Hector's direction during this critical period. Which probably would've helped even more people out.

But eh. It was hard to know that for sure. Things were never really so cut and dry, were they? Especially when it came to multi-million troa businesses.

Perhaps he could free up some room with some of his underground workers. Technically, they were criminals, and if he was going keep spending so much time around the new hero of Atreya, it would be risky to keep conducting business via extralegal means; but on the other hand, those businesses were actually the best sources of the "flexibility" that he was looking for. And the criminals he employed would just find work elsewhere if he let them go.

Much worse work, probably. The non-victimless kind. The temptation to which only increased during times like this.

No, it was better to keep those under management. He'd just have to be even more careful than usual.

Thankfully, Warrenhold was a good place to hide. For the time being, anyway. If Hector ever decided to open it up to the public, then Roman would definitely have to leave.

Or disguise himself as a janitor, maybe. That might be fun. Hadn't done that one in a while."

"3584

Roman hovered through the air as he made his way through one of the two still-unnamed towers of Warrenhold. The stony floors were still dusty enough that he could make out visible tracks in them from where people had walked through in recent weeks--and maybe months, judging from the more faded tracks. Those might've belonged to the initial survey team that Hector had employed to help him explore and map out the castle grounds.

At the moment, this particular tower was only being used for storage--and only a little. Even when all the Rainlords had been present, this gigantic castle had not felt terribly crowded. The six named towers had been plenty spacious enough for everyone and everything. These other two had only been used for storing materials that were relevant to the castle's all-important hydroelectric generator, which sat below one of them.

Roman had been internally debating whether they should dub that one the Generator Tower. These things needed names, and it would be fitting. But on the other hand, perhaps it would be better to be more discreet about the location of the generator. The more obvious they made it, the more vulnerable it might be to some form of sabotage in the future.

Yeah.

That's probably what Hector would say if he broached the subject, Roman decided. The kid was pretty damn concerned about security, he'd noticed.

As he should be, Roman figured. This place had already become a focal point for the safety of the nation, it seemed. If the enemy realized how important Warrenhold was--and how powerful its current inhabitants were--then it was fairly likely that someone would send some manner of infiltrator here, eventually.

Roman intended to be quite vigilant on that front.

As did Voreese. That was one of the reasons why she'd been asking him to pay extra visits to these two empty towers: to make sure there were no secret squatters here. No unexpected visitors. The tracks in the dust were actually helpful to that end. As was he his ability to levitate and avoid leaving tracks of his own.

Plus, it made for decent practice, controlling his power over particle vibrations like this. It required slow, gentle precision on his part. Not like the haphazard flight that he'd grown more accustomed to.

The other reason she'd wanted to visit these towers, however, was because she suspected there were secrets here. Hidden areas that the survey team may have missed."

"3585

'Do you really think we're going to find anything?' said Roman.

'I don't know,' said Voreese. 'That's the point of searching, my dear boy. To dispel uncertainty.'

'Okay, but you were the reaper of this place's creator. So shouldn't you already know about any hidden areas?'

'Sure, apart from, y'know, the thousand-year gap between when I last visited and now. Wouldn't exactly be surprising to discover that one of its many inhabitants since then made some sneaky additions.'

As Roman was about to respond, he lost the balance of his hovering technique and had to catch himself on the floor. "Tch." He took a moment to regather his concentration and begin hovering again.

'Maybe you should focus more on your technique and less on running your mouth,' said Voreese.

'Oh, well, my mouth's not actually moving, so I guess it's fine,' said Roman.

'Heh. Feel free to shut the fuck up, anyway, if the mood strikes you.'
'It doesn't. Besides, I'm sure you'd just get bored if I did that.'

'That's actually true. I just like telling you to shut the fuck up. Don't actually do it, though. I'll get upset.'

'You're a complicated woman, Voreese.'

'Unfortunately, brilliance and simplicity rarely go hand-in-hand. That's always been my problem. Woe is me.' And she pretended to cry.

Roman decided to ignore that and change the subject. 'Wanna tell me more about Warrenhold's genius creator? Stasya Orlov, wasn't it?'

'Oh, you remembered. How uncharacteristically intelligent of you.'

'Somehow, I knew you were going to say that.'

'And yet you did nothing to preempt or prevent it. You're just getting lazy now, aren't you? Or too comfortable, maybe. Guess I'll have to find some new way to keep you on your toes.'

'You know what would really shock me? You giving me a straightforward, sincere answer for a change. Truly, I wouldn't know what to do.'

'Sounds lame.'

They arrived at a corridor that branched off into multiple rooms. He picked the nearest one, holding up his lantern as he hovered into the darkness.

The chamber proved larger than he expected, almost big enough to be a banquet hall. It was still totally empty, though, so there was no telling what its intended purpose might've been. Assuming it even had one.

'So? What was Stasya like?'

'The complete opposite of you,' said Voreese. 'I really miss her.'

Roman floated toward the far wall. If the point of this venture was to find hidden areas, then he had to inspect the walls thoroughly. Maybe there was a hole or loose stone somewhere.

'She was a troubled soul, in many ways,' the reaper went on, unprompted, which surprised Roman. 'Hated interacting with people. Seemed happiest whenever she could lose herself in her work.'

"3586

'How'd you first find her?' asked Roman as he scanned the gray stones in front of him, squinting and lifting his lantern up even higher.

'Heh. I saw her drawing on a big stone monument with a hunk of charcoal. She was just a little kid. Turned out, that stone monument was an important religious symbol in her village, marking passage into the afterlife. She caught hell for that stunt from her parents. Smacked her around like you wouldn't believe. Tough to watch, even back in those days when child abuse was hardly a concept.'

'Damn.'

'That charcoal drawing of hers, though--it had been of fractals. Not that I understood that at the time. Wasn't until centuries later, looking back, that I realized the significance. But it had been striking enough imagery to make me take notice of this strange little girl who seemed to already be the black sheep of her community. And honestly, I'm not even sure she understood her accomplishment at that time, either.'

'How do you mean?'

'Stasya was... well, she was probably more brilliant than anyone I've ever known--and I've known A LOT of people--but at the same time, she was also kinda... stupid, quite frankly. Or at least, that's what it seemed like to me.'

'You've lost me.'

'Agh. It was like... she had an intuitive understanding of the world--an ability to perceive patterns and make connections that no one else could. But she had no ability to explain her thought processes. She could solve almost any problem you put in front of her, but she couldn't teach you how she'd done it. And that really tormented her, I think. Made her feel isolated. On a deep, existential level.'

Roman bobbed his head a little as he tried to imagine that. 'Hmm. And you called that stupidity? Seems a bit harsh.'

'In its own way. Social intelligence seems to come easily enough to you, but for some people, it's a whole different animal. And she struggled with that more than anything else in her life, I think.'

'...Did you just compliment me?'

'It's a shame you're such a dumbass by every other intellectual metric.'

'Are you sure your constant insults weren't what was REALLY tormenting her?'

'Psh. I was way nicer to her than I am to you.'

'...That's still not saying much, honestly.'

'Oh, quit your whining. You know I love you, right?'

'Do I?'

'When you're not being a dumb bitch, yeah. Of course you know that.'"
"3587

Roman was getting fed up, but not with Voreese. This was just business as usual. No, he was getting annoyed with this search. All these damn stones looked identical. He decided to try pushing on some of them at random, since there were no discernible marks or clues anywhere.

‘Did you see something?’ said Voreese.

‘Nope,’ said Roman. ‘But I figure, if there’s a secret or something, then maybe it’s so secret that there are no visible hints. Maybe you’ve just gotta know the exact right spot to press.’

‘That’d be a pain in the ass for a normal person to remember, unless they were using it all the time.’

‘Or unless they had a reaper to remember for them.’

‘It sure would help if I could sense through these walls.’

‘That would make Warrenhold much less secure, though.’

‘Yeah, yeah. Stasya knew what she was doing.’

‘Do you ever get claustrophobic in this place?’ said Roman, still trying different stones as he hovered along the length of the chamber. ‘It must feel way different for you compared to being up on the surface, right? Where you can sense stuff in all directions?’

‘Claustrophobic? Nah. But you are right that it’s quite different. Wouldn’t surprise me if some other reapers found this place very uncomfortable. Me, though, I’ve come to find it quite cozy. Nice ‘n safe.’

‘Hmm. S’pose it helps that these walls are borderline unbreakable.’

‘It sure does.’

‘Has nobody managed to punch a hole through one yet?’

‘Not that I know of,’ said Voreese. ‘But I did see Hector testing them on his own the other day. I don’t think he was doing tests with brute force, though.’

‘What kind of tests was he doing, then?’

‘I didn’t actually ask him. Didn’t want to bother him.’

‘Didn’t want to--? Excuse me? Were you unwell? Had you just seen some flying pigs? Had Hell frozen over?’

‘Hah. Actually, I just kind of enjoyed watching him from afar. Seeing what he was getting up to all on his own. You can learn a thing or two about someone by observing them when they think nobody is around.'

'Oh, so you were stalking him.'

'I was silently and respectfully observing him! Nothing weird or creepy about it!'

'Uh-huh.'

'I mean, are you not worried about him at all?' said Voreese. 'That battle with Banda Toro was no fuckin' joke. I wouldn't be surprised if it had gotten to him a bit. Psychologically, I mean.'"

"3588

'Dunno,' said Roman. 'He seems just fine to me.'

'Oh yeah? Well, then, it must be true, because there's no way your young, inexperienced ass could be mistaken, right?'

'Pulling the age card, huh? What a surprise.'

'Damn right. And I'm not sorry, either. You'll just have to forgive me if I decide to trust my instincts over yours.'

'Not like I was expecting different.' The notion of using brute force was sticking in his mind, and Roman decided to invoke his power just a bit. He slammed the wall with a wave of force, knocking up a thin spray of dust from the floor but otherwise not even making the stones tremble.

'Getting frustrated?'

'A bit.' He tried again, putting more oomph into it.

It made no difference. The wall budged not a whit, nor did any of the individual stones, as far as he could tell.

"Geez," he muttered under his breath.

'Feeling inadequate?'

'Shut up.'

He could've put even more power into his next attempt, but he decided to just move on to the next room. He'd be here all night if he didn't pick up the pace. Hell, he probably still would, anyway. These towers were too damn big.

Which motivated his next question.

‘Why did Stasya make this place so friggin’ huge?’

‘She wanted it to be a hub between the surface and the Undercrust.’

‘Yeah, you mentioned that before, but still, was this size really necessary for that? I mean, the “Warrenhole” as you call it, is only so big. That’d limit how many people could come and go from above and below. There’s no way all this space would be necessary to handle the traffic. And even if it was, she could’ve just added more to the castle later, when it became relevant. But from the way you’ve described it, she didn’t do that, right? She made all this at once?’

‘It took her many years, but yeah. She never stopped work until she was done.’

‘So then why? This just seems so excessive.’

Voreese’s ethereal, avian eyes held on him for a moment. ‘You’re not wrong. In fact, I remember saying something much the same to her, myself. I didn’t exactly appreciate hanging around here, doing jack shit for years, while she toiled away in silence.’

‘How’d she respond?’

‘She told me she didn’t expect me to understand. And that if I was bored, I should leave.’

‘Harsh.’

‘Yeah, she was kind of a bitch, sometimes.’”

"3589

Roman breathed a laugh. ‘Really? The way you’ve been singing her praises, I thought you considered her some sort of angelic being, too pure and good for this world.’

‘Heh. Maybe. Life certainly wasn’t fair to her, which earned her a lot of sympathy points from me. But she was still a flawed human being, like the rest of us.'

Roman stopped for a moment as another question occurred to him, but he thought better of asking it.

Voreese took notice of the abrupt silence, however. 'Now you're wondering why I released her, aren't you?'

He gave the reaper a look and just sort of nodded.

She sighed. 'To make a very long story short... she went mad.'

Roman said nothing.

'Thankfully, she didn't hurt anyone. It wasn't really that type of insanity. But that also made it a much more difficult decision. For a long time, I thought it would be okay to just let things continue as they were. Madness is a somewhat subjective perception, anyway, right? And if she wasn't hurting anybody, then what was the harm in just letting her be?'

'Damn... so why'd you finally decide to do it?'

'Because I just... couldn't take it, anymore. For my own sanity, I felt like I had to.'

He nodded glumly. 'I can only imagine how difficult that must've been.'

'She just wasn't even there, anymore. The young woman I'd come to know and care for--she was gone. Replaced with constant, incoherent ramblings. I kept thinking that maybe she could come back from it. Or that maybe I was at fault, somehow. Like she'd ascended to a new level of intelligence that my meager mind could no longer comprehend. But no. Eventually, I came to the conclusion that those things were just wishful thinking and that keeping her as my servant was not an act of compassion. And I guess I also worried that, as she continued to grow in strength, she really would become a danger to everyone around her.'

Roman frowned. More questions bubbled up in his mind regarding other servants she'd had over the years, but as he mulled it over, he wasn't even sure he wanted such answers.

After all, he was on that exact same path, himself. Would hearing about his predecessors in this endeavor help him to avoid a similar fate?

He wanted to say yes. Of course he wanted that.

But in the recesses of his mind, he felt differently. And strongly.

This undead life was borrowed time. He'd known that ever since Voreese made that offer to him."

"3590

Perhaps that was a strange way to look at it. He was technically immortal, after all. He was literally unable to die on his own.

And yet... the more time he spent as a servant, the more tales he heard about servants of the past, and the more he saw of other, older servants around him... the clearer it became to him that things weren't so simple as all that. Surely, it was no coincidence that, despite the long history of reapers and humanity as a whole, the oldest living servants were still only a few hundred years old.

Voreese fell quiet for a while, and Roman did the same. As he went through the motions of mindlessly checking wall after wall, stone after stone, for some sort of secret passageway, he allowed his mind to wander, again, into the larger questions about this very odd life that he'd found himself living.

About what the future might hold in store for him.

He realized that, if he was being totally honest with himself, this immortality didn't feel so at all. In his gut, when it came to the subject of death, he had this looming sense of inevitability--much more so than before he'd become undead. Like it might just be around the corner, somehow.

But it didn't bother him.

Maybe because he'd already felt death once before. Maybe this was just an in-built adaptation that all servants had. He'd have to ask some others about that, sometime. Though, he suspected that Hector might be the exact wrong person to consult. And the Rainlords, too, for that matter. Hmm.

He remembered a time when he'd felt invincible. Multiple times, in fact, both before and after meeting Voreese. Naturally, when he'd discovered his new undead powers as a servant, that had been quite the confidence booster, until he'd learned more about how dangerous the world really was. But it was the times from before that were sticking in his mind, now.

Back when he'd been poor as dirt. Somehow, that hadn't seemed to affect his confidence at all. Not in those days. If anything, it had emboldened him. Perhaps it had been because he'd had nothing to lose. If his life was already at rock bottom, then the only way was up, right?

All that verve eventually caught up with him, of course, when his life of thievery led him into biting off more than he could chew.

At the time, anyway.

Once he'd revived, he discovered that he could suddenly chew quite a bit more. And his appetite had increased, as well.

With Voreese's help, his fortune accumulated quickly. Getting back at the rich bastard who'd killed him turned into something much more than just revenge. That score had been unlike any other. And it had allowed him to begin building himself into someone entirely new."

"3591

It had taken a while, of course. Years. And even now, he didn't feel like he'd completed that transformation. Sure, he swaggered around as if he'd figured it all out already, as if every bit of his wealth had been accumulated as a matter of course.

As if dumb luck hadn't decided most of his life for him.

But he knew the truth. Deep down, he knew. This so-called "empire" that he'd been building for himself--for Voreese and for Atreya, too--it was all still as fragile as a glass flute. It played a pretty tune, true, but one false move, and it would shatter.

Leo had seen right through it. The facade. The veneer of money. For a while now, Roman had been wanting to believe that Leo's assessment of him had been off the mark--or just an unfortunate coincidence, perhaps--but increasingly, he was coming to the realization that, no, that guy had hit the bullseye.

Which shouldn't have been so surprising, really. Leo, for all his faults and oddness, was one of the oldest servants in the world. Roman's amateurish "confidence" must have been plain as day to that guy.

Agh.

Money. When he first got his hands on it, he remembered thinking hard about his plans for it all. About how he wouldn't be like so many other rich assholes and just hoard it for no reason. About how he would find good uses for it wherever he could. Responsible uses for it.

But that certainly hadn't been easy. More responsibility meant a more complicated life. And while he hadn't lost faith in his original intentions, a part of him had a tiny bit more sympathy for those same hoarding assholes that he previously so despised. Saving his money for a rainy day certainly would've been easier. And it would've come in handy, too.

Egh. Nah. Those guys could still go fuck themselves. In fact, maybe he should--

His hand depressed against a stone, bringing Roman's attention back to the present.

He wasn't even sure how many of these rooms he'd been through now--or on what floor of the tower he was, for that matter.

But at least they'd found something. He pulled his hand back, and the stone shifted back into place.

He looked around at the empty chamber--and at Voreese, as well--but nothing appeared to have changed. He pressed the stone again, and indeed, it moved again, but nothing happened.

'Aw, shit,' said Voreese. 'It's a goddamn puzzle, isn't it? I hate puzzles.'

"3592

Roman pressed the stone a few more times, just to make sure that it hadn't triggered anything, then he looked around the room anew.

He'd been on autopilot just now as he'd let his mind wander, but with the realization that there was indeed something to be discovered here, he was suddenly eyeing every single stone much more carefully. Surely, there had to be some sort of visible clue.

But no. He still couldn't see anything. Even upon closer inspection of the one stone that he knew to be some sort of switch, he still saw nothing peculiar about it when it was in its default position.

"Goddammit," he mumbled. "Who fucking built this shit, huh? It looks completely seamless. No gaps between the stones where the switch is. How'd they even manage to pull that off? That seems impossible."

'You're talking aloud,' said Voreese, privately.

'Oh. Sorry.'

The reaper hovered around his shoulder, eyeing the same spot he was. 'But on second thought, maybe Stasya sneaked this into the building plans. You're right that this seems suspiciously well-crafted.'

'If she did, then why didn't you already know about it?'

'Hey, it wasn't like I stuck around her every second that she was building it. She was working on this place for a long ass time.'

'Ah. And you got bored and went off on your own for a while, didn't you?'

Voreese made no response.

Which was strange enough to make Roman pause and look at her. 'Voreese?'

Rather than biting back at him with another insult, as he'd been expecting, she shook her head, and her tone turned somber again--even more so than before, in fact. 'Yes... I did leave her alone.'

Roman was confused. What was she--?

Oh.

'I'm sure that didn't have anything to do with her going mad,' said Roman, trying quite hard to not sound like a sarcastic prick. 'There's no sense in blaming yourself, if that's what's bothering you.'

But again, Voreese merely remained quiet.

Well, shit.

Now he didn't know what to say.

He decided to begin blindly pressing stones again. If this one by itself hadn't done the trick, then there had to be others around here somewhere. Maybe they needed to be pressed in some sort of sequence.

He kept at it for a while, though, and eventually became discouraged when he still hadn't found a single new switch."

"3593

'This bites,' said Voreese. 'Now that we know there's definitely a secret here, it's going to bother the shit out of me until we figure it out.'

'Which could be never,' said Roman.

'That is not helping my mental state, right now.'

'Hmm. Maybe there's only one switch, and we just have to press it in the right way. Like with rhythmic timing or something.'

'Ugh, god. You wanna just head back and start pressing it over and over again, hoping to get lucky?'

'I mean... no. But it's worth a shot, I guess, considering we have no other leads. I'm not sure going around this giant tower, hoping to get lucky with finding another incredibly well-hidden switch is any better. Especially considering there could be MANY more switches. Hell, they could even be in the other towers, for all we know.'

'Aw, fuck me. When you put it like that, it seems pretty obvious that we need to enlist some help.'

Roman gave a nod. 'Sure, but everyone around here has a lot goin' on. And I don't know if I want to drag them into some wild goose chase.'

'Not the kids. I'm sure they'll love a wild goose chase. Just gotta turn it into a game.'

He scratched his chin. 'Hmm. That might actually work. And I bet the kids could use the distraction, too. I doubt they're thrilled about being cooped up down here all the time.'

'Hah. Spoken like someone who hasn't been paying much attention to them. Most of the little scamps seem to love this place.'

'Really? That's surprising.'

'Why? There's so much shit around here to explore, and they have plenty of friends to play with. Gina's been getting them access to all sorts of entertainment, too. Books, TV shows, movies, video games. You name it, they've probably got it.'

'Damn. Gina's been doing all that? I did think she seemed busier than usual, lately.'

'Yeah, some of the Rainlords asked her to assist them with setting up a makeshift academy for the kiddos while they're stuck here. Don't want them to fall behind on their educational development because of all the bullshit goin' on.'

'Sounds like a lot of work to be dumping on Gina. She doesn't need more on her plate.'

'Maybe so, but it wasn't like they forced her into it. She just likes to help out.'

'Believe me, I know.'

'You worried she'll burn herself out?'

Roman let his feet touch the floor, and he started walking. 'She has a nasty habit of taking care of everyone except herself. I should go check on her, actually.'

"3594

Voreese followed close behind. 'Y'know, it's cute 'n all, the way you both fuss over each other so much, but perhaps I should remind you that she HAS come out of her shell quite a bit since you two met. And she IS a grown ass woman. With quite a bit of backbone, in my opinion. You don't need to act like an overprotective babysitter. If the Rainlords were asking her to do something that she didn't want to do, I'm pretty sure she'd have the lady balls to tell them no herself.'

‘Weren’t you the one talking shit about the Rainlords, not so long ago?’

‘Who, me? Of course not. I would never talk shit about anyone.’

‘Hah.’ Roman picked up his pace. This damn unnamed tower had so many stairs.

‘Ooh, you’re really worried about her, huh? Wow. What, been too long since you last saw her? A whole three hours, maybe? My, my.’

‘It just occurred to me that I haven’t been checking in on her eating habits, lately. She’s become one of the best cooks I know, but if you leave her to her own devices, she’ll just sit in front of her computer all day and eat nothing but junk food.’

‘Okay, stop deflecting by making good points. I’m trying to tease you here, and that’s annoying.’

‘Subtle, as always, Voreese.’

‘So are you in love with her, or what?’

Roman shook his head and sighed but didn’t slow down. ‘Voreese…’

‘What?’

‘We’ve discussed this. Several times.’

‘Yeah, so why not add one more?’

‘If only you would stop at one…’

‘Heh. Maybe I would, if you ever gave me some answers that actually satisfied me. Weird, huh? Almost like you’re full of shit or something.’

Roman just ignored her.

‘You’re really not gonna pursue her, just because of some old vow? I think that’s dumb. You’re dumb. Stop being dumb.’

‘Shut up.’

‘No.’

‘It’s not just because of some old vow, and you know that.’

‘Oh, you mean because you don’t want to hurt her? Afraid of going back to your playboy ways and breaking her heart? Well, maybe you could just, y'know, control yourself, instead?'

He sighed again. 'Which is exactly what I'm doing.'

'Yeah, but not like that!'

'Oh, okay. Thanks. You're really helping me along on my journey of self-reflection and discovery. I'm sure this thing that's been tormenting me for years will be fixed in no time, now.'

'Alright, alright. I'm sorry. I just want to see you happy, is all. Genuinely, I mean. Instead of the facade you put up all the time.'"
"3595 -- CCXCVIII.

'Facade?' said Roman. 'I'm not pretending to be happy. I am happy. For the most part. I mean, what have I got to complain about?'

'Don't do that,' said Voreese, her tone abruptly more severe. 'Don't minimize yourself. We both know you've been through a lot, my dear.'

'I'm just saying: I'm fine. You don't need to worry so much.'

'Roman, it's one thing to keep a stiff upper lip and get on with your life. That's great. Admirable, even. It's another thing to pretend nothing ever happened in the first place. Especially if you're on a journey of "self-reflection," as you say.'

Maybe she had a point. It was rare to get this more serious, almost motherly side of her. She seemed to reserve it for when she really wanted him to listen.

Or at least, that was his impression.

He made no response, however, and just let her words sink in.

They finally made it out of the tower, but rather than heading straight for the Tower of Night to find Gina, Roman was made to stop and wonder what was going on in the central courtyard, instead. A crowd had gathered.

Voreese flew ahead of him and consulted the nearest reaper. 'Has something happened?' she asked.

‘Ill news from Vantalay,’ said the other reaper, whose name Roman could not recall. ‘Apparently, after getting into a disagreement with the other heads, Lord Elroy has disappeared.’

Chapter Two Hundred Ninety-Eight: ‘Shadow of the Dragon...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

The battle with Kallmakk went on for days and carried all of them across the vast expanses of the Ardoran continent. Several times, he thought they might’ve left some of the Vanguardians behind entirely, but most of them eventually caught back up and continued the fight.

In the beginning, he didn’t even know the feldeath’s name, but Morgunov eventually ended up explaining quite a bit, during the fleeting moments of downtime that they managed to acquire for themselves in the midst of all the chaos.

Gohvis-Aeha wished he hadn’t been saddled with this mission. Of all the places to be deployed, this had to have been the shittiest one, right? He was virtually certain. If he had more opportunity to meditate and convene with the others, then he would’ve confirmed it. And complained to them, no doubt.

As it was, though, he could only maintain a weak node within the network--and even that ended up getting destroyed repeatedly and needing to be rebuilt each time the fight demanded too much of his concentration."

"3595 -- CCXCVIII.

‘Facade?’ said Roman. ‘I’m not pretending to be happy. I am happy. For the most part. I mean, what have I got to complain about?’

‘Don’t do that,’ said Voreese, her tone abruptly more severe. ‘Don’t minimize yourself. We both know you’ve been through a lot, my dear.’

‘I’m just saying: I’m fine. You don’t need to worry so much.’

‘Roman, it’s one thing to keep a stiff upper lip and get on with your life.

That's great. Admirable, even. It's another thing to pretend nothing ever happened in the first place. Especially if you're on a journey of "self-reflection," as you say.'

Maybe she had a point. It was rare to get this more serious, almost motherly side of her. She seemed to reserve it for when she really wanted him to listen.

Or at least, that was his impression.

He made no response, however, and just let her words sink in.

They finally made it out of the tower, but rather than heading straight for the Tower of Night to find Gina, Roman was made to stop and wonder what was going on in the central courtyard, instead. A crowd had gathered.

Voreese flew ahead of him and consulted the nearest reaper. 'Has something happened?' she asked.

'Ill news from Vantalay,' said the other reaper, whose name Roman could not recall. 'Apparently, after getting into a disagreement with the other heads, Lord Elroy has disappeared.'

Chapter Two Hundred Ninety-Eight: 'Shadow of the Dragon...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

The battle with Kallmakk went on for days and carried all of them across the vast expanses of the Ardoran continent. Several times, he thought they might've left some of the Vanguardians behind entirely, but most of them eventually caught back up and continued the fight.

In the beginning, he didn't even know the feldeath's name, but Morgunov eventually ended up explaining quite a bit, during the fleeting moments of downtime that they managed to acquire for themselves in the midst of all the chaos.

Gohvis-Aeha wished he hadn't been saddled with this mission. Of all the places to be deployed, this had to have been the shittiest one, right? He was virtually certain. If he had more opportunity to meditate and convene with the others, then he would've confirmed it. And complained to them, no doubt.

As it was, though, he could only maintain a weak node within the network--and even that ended up getting destroyed repeatedly and needing to be rebuilt each time the fight demanded too much of his concentration."

"3596

More than once, he found himself questioning this mission in its entirety. The Prime wanted to assist everyone and reserve the value judgments for later, once Blacksong was successfully averted, but the longer that Gohvis-Aeha spent out here, so detached from the network, the more he wondered if it might not be better to turn on one of these annoying jackasses first. Or both of them, even. It seemed apparent enough that they deserved it.

Turning on Germal would be the most problematic, though. The Prime had devoted an enormous amount of time and effort to studying mutant physiology, and Germal had been one of the most useful subjects to that end.

In fact, it was not an exaggeration to say that the network itself may never have come to fruition without studying the so-called Liar of Lyste.

The split personality that existed within Germal's mind had been the basis for the network's creation. From that starting idea, the Prime learned to divide his own consciousness by aspects of personality and thereby create free-thinking, self-governing psychic projections.

It had taken many years, of course. As far as the Prime could discern, this technique was truly groundbreaking. The great difficulty of it had been striking the right balance. The personality aspects were important for the generation of new, independent thought, but at the same time, if that independence was too strong, then the more deeply held values within the Prime's psyche would be at risk of changing within the projections.

Which would cause a clash of more than mere personalities.

That was where the network came in--and why it was so important. The desire to maintain the network had been baked into each projection at the most basic level. They yearned to stay connected--and ached terribly when forced to sever the link, even briefly.

It certainly didn't make this fight any easier, either. Dealing with such a distracting feeling in the midst of keeping himself and everyone else alive at the same time--it was like trying to juggle flaming torches while starving to death.

He was not having a good time.

And of course, Morgunov and Germal refused to work together, even against the feldeath. They were constantly taking pot shots at one another, with Morgunov's being especially deadly to deal with.

The Mad Demon didn't often use his power this way. His mastery over integration, combined with pan-rozum, allowed him to create quite complex machinery out of almost anything. Not as complex as the "Roberts," as he was apparently calling them, but still."

"3597

It was a testament to how utterly infuriated Morgunov must have been, the fact that he was resorting to his power like this for attacks. Typically, the Mad Demon only liked to use his inventions in combat. As a matter of pride, the Prime had been told.

Thankfully, Gohvis-Aeha had something of a counter for that particular ability. His hyper-refined somatosensory system. The mechanoreceptors and thermoreceptors of his body may have merely been psychic imitations of the Prime's, but thanks to the passive telepathic link that he could establish with every living body in the immediate area, they might as well have been real. And more attuned to the environment than ever. Only the Prime himself would have superior senses, and only when not maintaining so many projections on the network.

The Mad Demon's power gave off slight environmental cues via heat and vibrations when activating on a given location. At an elemental level, the chemical reactions that the man was provoking may have been impossible by conventional standards, but they were reactions, nonetheless. And Gohvis-Aeha could sense them.

He could, therefore, also intercept them before they skewered Germal through the spine or skull; or captured him in an electrocuting cage; or torched him with roaring flamethrowers; or riddled him with bullet holes from primitive firearms.

It was like trying to swat a neverending swarm of flies. If those flies had learned to harness human weaponry.

And as the days drew out, the tactics naturally became more complex, as well. Morgunov increasingly sought to create distractions--or use distractions being provided by the damn feldeath--in order to land a much more devastating blow on Germal.

Truthfully, Gohvis-Aeha did not know if he could keep this up. The only saving grace here seemed to be that the Liar was a bit more evasive and durable than even the Prime had realized. Though, of course, Koh did quite a lot of heavy lifting there, too.

The Maneater of Melmoore was performing well, but that was no surprise. If anything, it seemed to him that Koh might've actually been holding back, somewhat. It made little sense, given everything he'd come to know of the very strange circumstances surrounding this battle, but when compared to some of the Prime's sparring sessions with Koh in the past, Gohvis-Aeha could not dismiss a certain sense of confusion.

But there was hardly time to dwell on it. And there was already plenty of confusion circulating from other sources during all this madness."
"3598

Kallmakk was truly a resilient bastard. Most attacks simply phased through or bounced off of it. After days of continuous combat, it was becoming quite clear that their only real hope of putting the thing down for good was to coordinate their attacks.

Which everyone refused to do, of course.

Save for him, at least. They would work together with him but not each other.

So that had become his task here. Finding the openings in the fight and using it to quickly discuss strategy with both sides. One time, he nearly tricked them into working together, but Morgunov saw through it at the last moment and used the opportunity to attack Germal, instead.

And in retrospect, Gohvis-Aeha supposed he should have been expecting as much. Morgunov, more than anyone else here, probably wanted Kallmakk to survive as long as possible. The madman had led them to it, after all. Trying to acquire the Mad Demon's assistance was probably a fool's errand, at least until the Vanguardian crowd was thinned a bit.

But when he decided to devote more of the openings to discussions with the Vanguardians, they proved just as stubborn, if not even more so. While they might have been more receptive to the idea of working together in order to eliminate the feldeath, they were not at all on board with his proposal to have some of them fall back. Even when he said he would help them fake their deaths in order to fool both the feldeath and Morgunov, they refused.

They were too eager. They saw an opportunity here to finally slay an emperor of Abolish and definitively shift the balance of power across the entire world in their favor.

These men.

They didn't care if they died in the process. Even their reapers.

He couldn't fault them for their bravery, at least.

But how long could this stalemate continue? Realistically, it could actually go on for many, many more days. Potentially even weeks. Everyone here was determined and immortal. The reapers could just keep pushing their servants on and on, not caring about the future consequences.

But those consequences could not be put off forever. The Prime had only experienced this a few times over the course of his long life: these sorts of fights that truly tested a servant's ability to endure.

Only a few times, yes, but every one of them had made for quite the lasting memory."

"3599

There'd been one particular battle, from the first so-called "Continental War" some hundred years prior, when the Prime's abilities had been tested like never before. Over two months of continuous combat. And during that time, he saw countless servants being pushed to their limit by their reapers and beyond.

Until they broke.

It had been roughly the same story as here, actually, though it had instead been Dozer that the Vanguardians were feverishly trying to corner and kill. They'd nearly managed it, too, truth be told, but in the end, Father escaped.

And their many noble sacrifices had been for naught.

Though, it did bring the war to a rather swift conclusion. Father wisely decided to lay low while he recovered from that grueling ordeal, and peace broke out in the meantime.

By comparison, these Vanguardians here were already not looking very good after only a few days of combat. But perhaps that was an unfair assessment, considering they had been Morgunov's prisoners for weeks beforehand, and there was no telling what sort of horrific treatment the madman had been putting them through.

Regardless, this couldn't go on for much longer. Unless they somehow found replacements, Morgunov would outlast them. Maybe even without the feldeath's help.

In that respect, Gohvis-Aeha could most certainly be of assistance. While his access to the network was tenuous and frequently getting interrupted, he did have a modest grasp of what was going on with some of the other warfronts.

Meaning he could try to steer this battle over to one of those.

But in service of which side?

Did he really want to assist the Vanguardians? The Prime had deployed him here in order to ensure Morgunov's survival, though not out of any sense of duty or affection. The Prime wanted something from him and didn't intend to let him die until he got it.

And yet, Gohvis-Aeha was also getting a faint impression that the others had already given Morgunov up for dead. That this was a lost cause. That the Mad Demon might as well be left to fend for himself at this point.

But his connection to the network wasn't strong enough to be sure of that. If only he could find an opening to meditate for a few minutes.

Yeah. This was definitely the shittiest job alright.

But as the days drew out, he began to think that perhaps this giant mess did have one, singular upside. Something that took a while to truly appreciate.

If he didn't have time to convene with the others or even consult the Prime, then that really only left one thing to do, didn't it?

He had to make the decision himself.

He had to be... independent.

What an absolutely wondrous realization."
"3600

It was a strange position to be in, he knew. If he did nothing here, then he had a rather strong feeling that, eventually, Morgunov would either escape or even turn the tables on the Vanguardians here. And judging by the man's aura, by what a furious inferno it was, the latter possibility was seeming quite likely indeed.

Did Morgunov even wish to escape? Or was killing Germal his foremost priority now?

Gohvis-Aeha couldn't allow that to happen, either.

Additionally, there were the vast distances to take into consideration. This battle here, while theoretically part of the Second Continental War, was not actually taking place on the Eloan continent like all the others. So if he meant to drag this battle over to one of those, it would mean crossing one of the oceans first--while the feldeath continued to give chase, no less.

Would that even be possible?

Well, yes, of course it would. An ocean wouldn't stop Kallmakk, nor Morgunov, nor Koh, nor Germal... but Iceheart and the rest of the Vanguardians?

Some of them would probably get left behind. Which would gradually weaken them, further strengthening Morgunov's position and diminishing Germal's. There were also aerial dogfights still taking place over the Luthic. That probably wouldn't be an issue, but there were a few pilots in the world who could make it one.

All in all, not ideal.

There were two other options, though.

Instead of bringing this fight to one of the other warfronts, he could bring it to the Prime. That would certainly mix things up. The Prime would probably be quite displeased with him, but at the moment, he was quite displeased with the Prime, too, so maybe that would only be fair.

For some reason, however, he found himself leaning away from that option. Why? There was scarcely enough opportunity to think all these things through, let alone dwell on his feelings about them. But it did bother him a bit. He wanted to return to the network, didn't he? To reestablish the strongest connection possible? Going to the Prime was the easiest way to do that. Probably the smartest, too.

And yet he was reluctant. He wanted to find some other way. Miserable as he was, he didn't want this to...

Ugh.

So what did that leave?

The last option. And perhaps worst. Or best, accounting for distance.

He could bring the battle to Father."

"3601

Father had told the Prime in no uncertain terms that he did not wish to get involved in this war, so Gohvis-Aeha had no doubt that Father would be supremely pissed off about being pulled into it.

Which could be a problem. For both himself and for the Prime.

But would Father even realize that this was his doing? He couldn't be blamed if it just seemed like a coincidence. In fact, if anyone was going to receive Father's blame here, it would almost certainly be Morgunov.

And better still, Father was perhaps the only one in the world who could talk any amount of sense into Morgunov, thereby saving Germal's life.

Admittedly, that might've been a bit overly optimistic, but in Gohvis-Aeha's opinion, no other path forward afforded even the slightest chance of such an outcome.

So that was the decision made.

The problem then became how he would actually make it happen. In actual practice, the notion that he could "steer" this battlefield somewhere was perhaps more ambitious than he'd realized.

Morgunov was the focal point. The Vanguardians were chasing him. And Kallmakk was constantly disrupting that, creating openings for the Mad Demon.

So the task here was... what, then? To force Morgunov in a certain direction?

Impossible.

The man could not be led by force. And trying to do so would likely make Morgunov think that he'd turned on him, which might prompt even more erratic behavior from the madman.

But again, this chase was a curious thing. Morgunov may have been leading it, but was he truly trying to escape?

Gohvis-Aeha could make a wager. Morgunov wanted Germal dead, yes? So carrying Germal away might prompt Morgunov to change up and give chase, instead. And Germal was much more manageable as a kidnappee than Morgunov.

So that was what he did.

He waited for another opening, which Kallmakk soon provided.

A great pillar of black energy dug a volcanic trench into the ground, leaving a chain of explosions, smoke, and molten earth in its wake as it ripped all the way into the horizon. Everyone on the field had to disperse in order to dodge it, with several not succeeding.

Gohis-Aeha knew he had to be precise with his movements here. The distraction was a bit too good, honestly. He might've been able to grab Germal here and get away entirely without Morgunov even noticing.

Which was a thought. Hmm. Would that be the better option?

Agh. Maybe. He could mull it over later. Better to stick with the plan, for now.

He blitzed across the sundered field and scooped up the Liar of Lyste like a sack of potatoes. Then he made sure to run by Morgunov, giving him a nice view of the prize."

"3602

It worked like a charm. Soon, Morgunov was the one giving chase while Gohvis-Aeha led the way.

As a result, a new lull in the fighting arrived as the Vanguardians struggled to keep pace while also fending off Kallmakk's attacks from the rear. Rarely did those same attacks reach all the way up to Gohvis-Aeha's position.

The main worry was simply paying enough attention to what Morgunov and his robots were up to. Perhaps the madman was hesitant to turn on him fully and threaten their neutral attitudes toward one another for the remainder of this battle, but he doubted that hesitation would last forever. Morgunov was not renowned for his patience or self-control.

The land at his feet became a blur as he sped across the wilderness. He no longer even felt like he was making contact with the ground while he ran. He might as well have been sailing over water.

He considered slowing down, in case Morgunov needed it, but that didn't appear to be the case. How was he doing that? Probably yet another of his hidden inventions. Koh certainly wasn't having trouble, though Gohvis-Aeha couldn't tell if the wolf was chasing after him now or still Morgunov.

At length, Germal's telepathic voice arrived. 'Master,' he said. 'Please, release me. You need not go to such lengths in order to protect me from the Demon. I came to this fight prepared.'

'Hmph, if only it were that simple,' answered Gohvis-Aeha.

'Your interference in our battle makes little sense, Master. Why do you seek to protect him? I have never known you to have any affection for him or his cronies. I thought your disgust with Vanderberk stemmed as much from the Demon as from the Weasel himself.'

He might have sighed if he wasn't already utilizing the full capacity of his psychically projected lungs. 'This is what you get for making a move without first informing me. If this has been your plan of many years, then you should have consulted me. We probably could have come to some sort of agreement and avoided this whole mess.'

'...Truly?'

'Truly. But now my hand is forced, and I must move to protect my own interests before they are destroyed. There is much work that would be lost, if I let you kill him. Not that I believe you would have managed to do so, mind you.'

"3603

'What work is so important that it requires the Demon be kept alive?' asked Germal. 'That man is an existential threat to our kind, Master.'

Gohvis-Aeha cocked an eyebrow at that but said nothing. There was no reason to answer Germal's question, especially after getting a glimpse of just how much the Liar had been hiding from him this whole time.

Germal kept going. 'If you do not kill him now, then you will have to do so sooner or later. It is inevitable, Master. And it will only become more difficult the longer we wait, as he continues to develop new technological menaces. You have seen what his "Roberts" are capable of firsthand, yes? Imagine how much more trouble they will become in even just twenty years, if he continues to refine them.'

The draconic projection wanted to laugh. 'What makes you think he is a threat to our kind?'

'I don't think--'

He felt the Liar twist and flail in his grip. If he didn't know better, he might've thought the man was trying to wriggle free.

There was no risk of that, though, and Germal would have known that.

No, this was something else.

The personalities were fighting again.

The Prime had seen this many times, though not in recent years. It had been particularly prevalent at the beginning of Germal's apprenticeship, to the point where the Prime had labored daily with the boy for months in order to help him get his mind under control.

When the thrashing stopped, psychic laughter arrived. 'Give up, you abominable fool! It's my win! The Mad Demon is forever against you now! Forever on OUR side!' And the laughter continued.

What in the world? That voice wasn't talking to him, Gohvis-Aeha felt. Both personalities within Germal revered the Prime and would never speak to him in such a manner.

He might've liked to hear what the other personality had to say in response, but this one seemed to be in full control, at the moment, so there was no hope of that.

'Ah! Master! Apologies! Please don't mind my gloating.' A few chortles still persisted, however.

'You seem quite pleased with yourself.'

'Oh, if only you knew, Master. How I wish I could explain everything in its entirety! But I lack the words. And the cohesion. And the time. Oh, the time. The damn time! It's never enough, Master! Never!'"

"3604

'I understand,' said Gohvis-Aeha. He didn't, really. But with the Prime having experienced this so many times before, he knew that it was better to keep this one talking, rather than trying to relate or sympathize or pose questions that diverted the train of thought. These days, this personality seemed to be the less dominant one. It only popped up when it was feeling quite strongly about something.

'Of course you do, Master! I've missed you! Thank you for everything!'

'You're very welcome, Jonah. It is good to hear from you again.'

More laughter. 'I've done it, Master! I beat him! The abomination! I finally got one over on him! He didn't see it coming until it was too late! Kehehe!

Interesting. He still didn't quite understand, but inquiring further wasn't the right strategy. 'That's good to hear. I'm proud of you, lad.'

And there was yet more laughter, lasting even longer this time.

How strange. By Gohvis-Aeha's estimation, that laughter carried with it a sense of genuine relief, not malicious delight as he had first thought.

But perhaps that was reasonable. The Prime had never known Jonah to be malicious in any way, other than towards Germal. Or himself. That was one of the most confusing things about this personality. It seemed to hate both its counterpart and itself, and yet it also seemed to love life as a whole. It had often expressed a desire to explore and see the world.

And it was gentle as a lamb, as well, which may have contributed to why the other personality had become so dominant by comparison.

Gohvis-Aeha wished he could consult the Prime's memories more deeply and check how long it had been since he'd last spoken to Jonah. He had a feeling that it had been many years, though he wasn't at all certain.

'It's not hopeless, after all, Master! They haven't won yet!'

The temptation to ask for clarification was truly strong now, but he resisted. 'Of course they haven't. I told you that long ago, did I not?'

'You did! Yes, you did! Truthfully, I don't think I quite believed! I'm sorry, Master! I believe you now!'

'I'm glad to hear that.'

'Ah... what a great day. Mm. Master. I can feel myself fading. I'm sorry I can't be more help. Don't be fooled by his lies. He's not as confused, anymore. He doesn't follow you. He'll--'

The thrashing returned, informing him that Germal was taking control again."

"3605

Gohvis-Aeha took the opportunity to reassess the state of the chase while he waited for Germal to regain his composure.

One of Morgunov's Roberts was getting closer, he noticed. The Vanguardians were keeping up fairly well, and Kallmakk, all the way at the rear, seemed to have calmed, somewhat, if only to focus on the chase, but there was definitely something brewing back there, too. He could sense a worrying buildup of ardor. If he didn't pay attention, that could turn into a very big problem.

Bah. He was going to be very annoyed if Kallmakk ended up killing Morgunov in the middle of this chase, while he was more focused on protecting Germal. Surely, the Mad Demon would not be that sloppy.

Egh...

'Master,' came Germal's voice. 'What did Jonah say to you?'

'Doesn't matter. Answer my question. Why do you think Morgunov is a threat to mutants? He has never expressed any desire to harm us. Only study us. And even that has been rather fleeting, compared to his other interests.'

'That is merely the way his mind works, Master. You know this as well as I. His interest in a given subject ebbs and flows. Make no mistake. He WILL come back around to us. And when he does, it will not be for some relaxed academic exchange with you. He will seek to enthrall as many of our kind as possible for his experiments. To make our power his own. And merge it with his abominable machines.'

He might've argued the point, but one of those same abominable machines was now getting even closer to his position.

Too close.

He sent a quick telekinetic wave in its direction, just trying to knock it off course and slow it down.

But it dodged his attack and continued to inch closer.

Annoying.

He decided to pick up the pace, instead. Just a bit.

Germal kept on talking in the meantime. 'I've read his mind, Master. It was difficult, but I was able to discern some of his plans. One of them is to complete work on something called an Omnivore Drive, which will allow his machines to grow more powerful by consuming the flesh of those he feeds to them.'

Well, that certainly sounded believable. Morgunov would absolutely work on a project like that.

Gohvis-Aeha did have a counterargument, though. 'Do you have any idea how many failed experiments that man has conducted since I've known him?'"

"3606

'What difference should that make?' said Germal. 'If anything, that should worry you even more, because it's a testament to just how persistent he is.'

He supposed the Liar had a point. Hmm. What would the Prime say here?

Egh, what difference did it make? The mission was clear enough. There was no utility in debate. Perhaps he should say as much. And remind Germal how much of a nuisance he was.

But no. Gohvis-Aeha decided to remain silent. Heh. Yeah. That was probably what the Prime would've done, anyway. Ignore useless conversations.

Germal kept pushing, however. 'Please, Master. You must see the danger. He will come to view us as useful materials for his Omnivore Drive--and other experiments, I am sure. Our ability to manifest new powers is unlike any of the others. And if that project succeeds, then those machines will become an existential threat to not just us but to all mankind.'

'Aha.' He could not stay quiet at that. 'So it is a matter of protecting mankind now, is it? How terribly noble of you.'

'I know you care for them, Master. Do not pretend otherwise. That may have its uses when talking to your contemporaries, especially within Abolish, but there is no need for that with me. That should be obvious by now, no?'

Hmph. Obvious. When it came to Germal, nothing was ever obvious.

But the man was no doubt referring to the founding of the Freeman Fellowship. Germal had done that at great personal cost to his reputation among his peers--to the point, even, that he had begun attempting to hide his own involvement in order to prevent his credibility from continuing to deteriorate.

But there was a game there. Gohvis-Aeha had no doubt of that. It was clear enough that Germal had been planning Morgunov's assassination for a very long time now. And while the Fellowship may not have played an obvious role in this attempt here, there were any number of ways that Germal might have been using it behind the scenes--or for some other obnoxious purpose, perhaps.

After all, if Morgunov was deemed an existential threat to humanity, then surely Father should also be considered one, no?

Logically, that followed.

But then again, Father and the Fellowship had a curious relationship. On more than one occasion, the Prime had seen him showing... what seemed to be affection toward them. And Germal, too."

"3607

Which was part of the reason why he was hoping now that Father might be able to broker a peace with Morgunov for the Liar's life.

But it was always impossible to tell what Father was truly thinking. Perhaps he merely thought them useful and wanted them to think that he had a soft spot for them. In fact, that was most likely the case.

Here and now, however, during this tentative downtime in the battle, Gohvis-Aeha was thinking that there was little point in trying to argue with Germal about any of this. Boy, did he want to, though.

No, he should focus on gathering as much information for the Prime as he could for when they eventually reconvened. The Prime could be the one to pass judgment on Germal. Or Father, perhaps.

Ah.

Iceheart seemed to be getting antsy. No doubt, being closest to the raging feldeath in this chase made for a rather uncomfortable position.

Gohvis-Aeha almost felt sympathy for the man, especially because the marshal still had subordinates that he was trying to keep safe.

With his predictive atmospheric senses, Gohvis-Aeha could all but see the unfolding mayhem back there. A whirlwind of ice, tossing Vanguardians haphazardly out of Kallmakk's path--including Iceheart himself, who still got clipped by a dark beam and lost a leg, only to replace it with an icy one a moment later.

Hmph.

Foolish Vanguardians. Throwing their lives away. Too young for this fight, most of them. He couldn't even recall any of their names. Maybe he could've, if he accessed the network, but that was still too dangerous to attempt. He needed every ounce of situational awareness, right now.

One of them caught a pitch black tendril across the torso and went flying. Unfortunate timing. Iceheart was too busy avoiding another three beams at once. That one who got sent flying was doomed. He could sense another tendril materializing from Kallmakk's back. It was almost certainly going to morph into a mouth and devour that poor bastard before he even touched the ground again.

Gohvis-Aeha's right eye shimmered, then winked.

The black tendril that he knew would appear did so, but it exploded apart in midair before it could reach the hapless Vanguardian. Instead of getting eaten, the battered man hit the ground rolling and quickly fell behind in the chase, disappearing from Gohvis-Aeha's sight.

Perhaps he was the foolish one. Why had he done that? The Prime wouldn't have bothered. The Vanguardians were idiots for thinking they could rely on him at all. They deserved to reap the consequences of their idiocy, didn't they?

Ugh."
"3608

These were not things that he had the luxury of dwelling on, right now. He had to put them out of his mind. To stay focused on the task at hand.

Germal wasn't making it any easier, though. 'I sensed that, Master. You saved that man just now, didn't you? Even as you protest, you continue to prove my point. You care for this world and its inhabitants deeply.'

What an irritating conversation. He wished one of those Roberts would get close enough to provide a meaningful distraction again.

Germal just kept going. 'I've always been able to sense your compassion, Master. You try to keep it buried. I know not why. But it has been there for as long as I have known you. In fact, I believe it is the very reason why you granted me the honor of getting to know you in the first place. And yet... here and now... I sense it more strongly in you than ever before. You are not trying nearly as hard to hide it, anymore. How curious...'

Gohvis-Aeha said nothing. While it was true that the Prime had created this powerful psychic cloning technique by studying Germal's multiple personality disorder, it had also never really been clear how much Germal himself had been able to discern about what the Prime had been doing. And naturally, the Prime had never bothered to explain this technique to anyone.

'Master, have you managed to evolve your projections still further?'

Well, he definitely wasn't going to answer that. The Prime would be furious.

Germal kept nattering as the chase drew out, and Gohvis-Aeha continued to ignore him. Even as the landscape began to change and the Giants of Jaskadan, as the trees were commonly known, came into view, Germal still did not let up. Only the subject matter shifted, as the Liar started questioning where they were going and why.

Thankfully, it didn't take much longer after that in order to finally reach Father's encampment. The massive swaths of deforested land made it rather obvious that they were quite close.

Now it was just a matter of getting to Father and warning him before Kallmakk began running amok through his mobile fortresses. The man was not going to be pleased about that, but there was no helping it.

Ah. There. He sensed Father's location and went straight for it like a lightning bolt, zigzagging through various troops on standby and probably knocking a few of them up into the air by accident as he passed, thanks to the wind tunnel being left in his wake.

Oh well. They were servants. They'd be fine."

"3609

Thankfully, Father was not in his quarters in the heart of the Obsidian Shell. It would have been momentarily tedious to breach the fortress' walls and reach him there with Germal in tow, and time was quite precious, right now.

Instead, he found Father at the center of a large gathering. Soldiers sat in large groups, feasting at long, hulking tables filled with tall, blazing braziers and ample food and drink. The raucous laughter in the air began to die out as many familiar faces noticed his presence.

If he hadn't known Father as well as he did, Gohvis-Aeha might have thought they were celebrating some great victory, but this was actually quite a regular sight. Father loved his banquets. He was always finding excuses to treat himself and his men to lavish, hearty meals whenever possible. Claimed it was good for both morale and recruitment--which was probably true.

The Prime found it to be a rather obnoxious and wasteful habit, but Father always countered by arguing what was the point in conquering the world if one didn't indulge in the excesses that said world could provide?

When Gohvis-Aeha finally laid eyes on Father, the man was already looking back at him and standing up from a chair that was so ornate and golden that it might as well have been a throne.

Then the ambient laughter truly died out as all eyes turned to Father, who sighed.

"What mess have you brought me?" said the old emperor.

First things first. He had to shift blame. "Morgunov picked a fight with a feldeath."

Fortunately, Father had no time to get mad at him, which he must have realized, because he immediately shouted to his men. "Battle stations! Defend the camp!"

And everyone began scrambling. Father's surrounding officers scattered to go organize and lead their individual sects.

Gohvis-Aeha moved out of the way as he sensed Morgunov try to blitz him from behind. He circled around behind Father, hoping that the Mad Demon would at least be distracted for a few more moments by a desire to exchange words with his fellow emperor.

A hope which proved true.

“Dozy! It’s been too long! How are you, ya old fossil?!”

“Worse for seeing your face.”

“Aww! Don’t be like that! Your boy here and I brought you a present! Ever heard of Kallmakk the Nightspinner?!”

“Yes.”

“Oh. Wait, really? That kinda ruins the surprise, man. Couldn’t you have at least pretended to--”

A dark beam ripped through the encampment, leaving behind a string of black-and-purple explosions that sent soldiers and debris into the air.”

"3610 -- CCXCIX.

The two emperors remained still as they observed the mayhem for a few more moments.

“You are going to owe me after this,” said Father.

“Sure, sure,” said Morgunov. “What do you want? Help with that big rocket ship of yours?”

“Touch that, and I’ll kill you. Bool, included.”

“Oh, c’mon!” said Morgunov, laughing. “I could make all sorts of improvements to it! And I won’t prank you this time! I swear!”

“I have a different project in mind for you.”

“Oh?! Color me intrigued! Of course, that won’t mean jack if Kallmakk beats your old ass like a paddle ball!”

"Hmph. From the sound of it, that is what he has been doing to you."

"Ehehe! Maybe just a bit! But I'm still here, aren't I? And frankly, I'm looking forward to seeing you get clobbered a few times!"

"The feeling is mutual. Now, let's go."

Chapter Two-Hundred Ninety-Nine: 'The Hunter's sight...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Diego Redwater didn't think he'd ever felt this bad for enemy combatants before. This battle had been a foregone conclusion for quite a while now. Over the past few weeks, every single one of the Vantalayan Military Police's assaults had been rebuffed, and now, things were going ever worse for them. Each new assault was not only failing but also turning into a counterattack by the Ridgemark Private Military Police, usually extending quite deep into the enemy line and ripping them to shreds.

It was a wonder they hadn't given up already. A wonder, but also sadly understandable.

The problem seemed to be that the VMP kept getting reinforcements from the larger VAF, the Vantalayan Armed Forces, as well as from Abolish. And those reinforcements were always substantial to prolong the fighting but never enough to actually make a difference. Every new platoon of soldiers seemed to make the VMP think that, surely this time, they could turn the tide. That they still had hope of taking over Ridgemark.

That full retreat wasn't inevitable.

But all Rainlords knew it. With as much power as they had on their side now, victory for the enemy was practically impossible.

To outsiders, perhaps that would've sounded cocky. Certainly, the Rainlords had suffered their share of defeats not so long ago, but those had occurred while they were divided--and with almost no allies, to boot.

Here and now, the VMP was facing the almost fully united Rainlord forces, as well as the quite shockingly powerful RPMP. Not to mention, Leo the Bull Leech.

And with Vanderberk now out of the picture, morale on this side of the battlefield was at an all-time high. More than once, Diego had heard loose talk that even if one of the emperors suddenly showed up to support the enemy, victory was still all but assured.

Maybe that was an exaggeration, but... truthfully, Diego felt it might actually be true, too."

"3610 -- CCXCIX.

The two emperors remained still as they observed the mayhem for a few more moments.

"You are going to owe me after this," said Father.

"Sure, sure," said Morgunov. "What do you want? Help with that big rocket ship of yours?"

"Touch that, and I'll kill you. Bool, included."

"Oh, c'mon!" said Morgunov, laughing. "I could make all sorts of improvements to it! And I won't prank you this time! I swear!"

"I have a different project in mind for you."

"Oh?! Color me intrigued! Of course, that won't mean jack if Kallmakk beats your old ass like a paddle ball!"

"Hmph. From the sound of it, that is what he has been doing to you.""

""Ehehe! Maybe just a bit! But I'm still here, aren't I? And frankly, I'm looking forward to seeing you get clobbered a few times!""

""The feeling is mutual. Now, let's go.""

Chapter Two-Hundred Ninety-Nine: 'The Hunter's sight...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Diego Redwater didn't think he'd ever felt this bad for enemy combatants before. This battle had been a foregone conclusion for quite a while now. Over the past few weeks, every single one of the Vantalayan Military Police's assaults had been rebuffed, and now, things were going ever worse for them. Each new assault was not only failing but also turning into a counterattack by the Ridgemark Private Military Police, usually extending quite deep into the enemy line and ripping them to shreds.

It was a wonder they hadn't given up already. A wonder, but also sadly understandable.

The problem seemed to be that the VMP kept getting reinforcements from the larger VAF, the Vantalayan Armed Forces, as well as from Abolish. And those reinforcements were always substantial to prolong the fighting but never enough to actually make a difference. Every new platoon of soldiers seemed to make the VMP think that, surely this time, they could turn the tide. That they still had hope of taking over Ridgemark.

That full retreat wasn't inevitable.

But all Rainlords knew it. With as much power as they had on their side now, victory for the enemy was practically impossible.

To outsiders, perhaps that would've sounded cocky. Certainly, the Rainlords had suffered their share of defeats not so long ago, but those had occurred while they were divided--and with almost no allies, to boot.

Here and now, the VMP was facing the almost fully united Rainlord forces, as well as the quite shockingly powerful RPMP. Not to mention, Leo the Bull Leech.

And with Vanderberk now out of the picture, morale on this side of the battlefield was at an all-time high. More than once, Diego had heard loose talk that even if one of the emperors suddenly showed up to support the enemy, victory was still all but assured.

Maybe that was an exaggeration, but... truthfully, Diego felt it might actually be true, too."

"3611

By now, he'd personally witnessed the strength of all three of the RPMP's most esteemed warriors. And they were nothing to sneeze at. He could see why both the Vanguard and Abolish had chosen to respect the RPMP's authority during their stay in Ridgemark.

Linus Maximillian, Kristof Raynor, and Daro Bright. The Linebreaker, the Jailer, and the Black Artisan, respectively.

Thus far, Diego had fought alongside Linus the most. He'd ended up practically glued to the man during the assault on Logden Prison, so he'd been able to witness Linus manhandling the likes of Raga Marda, Mikas Cross, and a powerful prison guard named Longvin--and all simultaneously, at some points.

Raynor, of course, had distinguished himself on multiple occasions, as well. When they were transporting those poor Miroan villagers over to Ridgemark, Raynor showed up and aided the Rainlords against Raga Marda and Jan Cross. And out here, on this battlefield, Raynor had been holding off the VMP since the very beginning of the siege--almost single-handedly, no less.

Because the third, Daro Bright, was exactly what his moniker, the Black Artisan, implied: an integrator who primarily took on the role of support.

But what incredible support it was.

Diego had gotten more than a few glimpses of the man's work by now--and even the opportunity to wield some of his custom-made weaponry and tools. Perhaps the most impressive was something that the RPMP troops were calling a ramata, or roughly "spell thrower" in Valgan.

In short, it was a device capable of mimicking servant powers.

True, they were quite limited in their capabilities, such as with materialization, where it could only create small, predetermined objects which did not last terribly long before disintegrating--but still.

It was hard not to be in utter amazement.

The ramata was also quite small and portable, not much larger than a standard sidearm but still smaller than a rifle. From what Diego had seen, it also required quite a bit of maintenance--and some sort of crystal as its fuel source. He had a feeling that was the real trick of it. Whatever those crystals were composed of, it couldn't be any normal thing, he felt.

He'd asked some of the reapers and other servants about it, but thus far, he hadn't been able to learn anything.

Other than the fact, perhaps, that some of the reapers were genuinely unsettled by its existence."

"3612

He didn't necessarily blame them, either. Over the years, he'd heard it mentioned a few times: the idea that reapers might one day be rendered obsolete by the advancement of technology. Clearly, that day was still quite far away, assuming it ever arrived at all, but the ramata did look like a rather significant step in that direction.

It was certainly an interesting notion, though. He remembered discussing it with Yangéra before, but unlike most other reapers, she actually seemed somewhat receptive to the possibility.

'Honestly, it might even be for the best,' she'd told him. 'Us reapers can be real troublemakers, even when we mean well. And especially when we don't. But if we were ever cast aside by the most powerful figures on the planet, then maybe we would have less ability to meddle in the affairs of the living world. If nothing else, it would definitely give fewer reapers an excuse to neglect the job of reaping souls.'

He didn't know if he believed all that, but maybe she had a point.

Either way, even if the ramata became advanced enough to perfectly replicate all servant abilities with little-to-no resource cost, Diego still doubted that any technology would ever be able to replace the reaper's ability to regrow servants from scratch. That seemed flatly impossible, no matter how many years passed.

The presence of the ramata also added one more wrinkle to this battle, however. Under no circumstances could they allow one of them to fall into the enemy's hands. The Artisan himself had made that abundantly clear. He did not want just any old soldier to be carrying one. He'd only distributed them to those of sufficient rank, and he'd even gone out of his way to discuss the matter with the Rainlords, petitioning them for their aid in ensuring that no ramatas survived the battle outside of the RPMP's custody.

For their help, he'd offered the Rainlords various means of payment: two ramatas to keep as their own, cold hard cash, and the chance to request a custom creation from him at some point in the future, once the war was over.

It was a hell of a deal, all things considered. When he'd heard the terms, Diego could hardly believe the man was being so generous, but then he'd heard that the Lord Santos Zabat had served as their primary negotiator, and then Diego was no longer surprised."

"3613

It was a hell of a thing, having everyone back like this. The Redwaters, in particular.

For months and months, he'd been the sole member of House Redwater among a sea of Rainlords. And for a while there, it had felt like that might continue to be the case for many months more. Years, even.

He'd never been terribly worried that they would be retrieved. For some reason, that had always felt like an inevitability to him. Perhaps that stemmed from his faith in the other Houses to see it done. He'd known quite early on that they would not rest until everyone was recovered.

But he had been worried about being the lone representative of the Redwaters. The only one able to speak and act for them.

Truth be told, he'd always felt like something of a black sheep within the family. Growing up, it seemed to him that he'd always been singled out for one reason or another. In the very beginning, it had probably been quite superficial: the other kids poking fun at him for his red hair, for instance. Very few Rainlords had that hair color, and he remembered it being a frequent topic of conversation.

But over time, it had grown beyond that. Because he adapted. Leaned into all of the attention. Embraced it, turned it around on people, made fun of them, and learned the difference between a gentle ribbing and genuine humiliation.

That had been very valuable when it came to making friends--and also when it came to getting out of trouble. Rainlord families may have been stricter than most, but it still never hurt, being able to schmooze conversations a bit with the grown ups. He couldn't recall how many times he'd been able to soften what would've otherwise been a brutal punishment for him and the other kids.

Now, he realized that he'd taken so much strength and vigor from the presence of his family. Just being around them had energized him. Made him feel whole.

So he had not been prepared when they all disappeared. When the weight and long history of House Redwater fell upon his shoulders, alone.

He tried to never let it show, of course. The insecurity. At least, not really. Joking about it was easy enough. And helpful for the deception, perhaps. And thankfully, there'd been plenty of opportunities to focus on whatever craziness was unfolding around them instead of his own fears and concerns.

But now that they were back, he felt a deeper, longer-lasting sense of relief than he thought humanly possible.

Out of all the Rainlords who'd been searching these many months for their lost kin, Diego Redwater didn't think any of them could've possibly been more contented right now than him. Even in the midst of battle, he could still feel it there."

"3614

That was not to say that everything was going perfectly, however. Far from it. New worries were arising every day, it seemed.

Such as the whereabouts of the Lord Zeff Elroy.

His disappearance had disturbed everyone, especially Grandma. And it had not escaped anyone's notice that this disappearance had come only after Zeff told them all about a sudden offer from the Monster of the East.

An offer to leave this battlefield behind and enter into Gohvis' protection, where Zeff would be able to meet up with his lost daughter, Emiliana.

That had certainly been a surprise. And discussing their response to that offer had been their first real act as a reunited council of Rainlord heads.

Unlike the Golden Council of the Sandlords, the Rainlords had no formal title for their gathering, because the government of the Wetlands was not entirely run by the Rainlords. It mostly was, maybe about seventy percent, but there had still been plenty of non-Rainlord leaders and officials going around.

If more of the members had been present for the meeting, the official government name for it would've been the Congress of Western Sair-- or the Wetlands Congress, as some called it.

Which led Diego down a whole other rabbit hole of worry, of course, about the current state of Sair. Of their subjects, who'd been forced to endure hell at the hands of Abolish.

He tried not to dwell on that too much, right now. The time for that would come.

Naturally, the decision regarding Gohvis' offer had been one of rejection. A few of the reapers had expressed an interest in accepting, as did Zeff, but even they seemed hesitant about it. In the end, the vote to decline was not merely a majority but fully unanimous.

Which was a little surprising, actually. A couple of the reapers, most notably Mevox, were infamous for being contrarians and voting against whatever the majority sentiment was.

Perhaps even Mevox was not in the mood to be playing around when matters were this severe.

So Zeff's disappearance was doubly confusing. One would've thought that if he wanted to see his daughter that badly, then he would have cast his vote in favor of acceptance.

'I don't know,' said Yangera when they'd discussed it privately. 'It actually makes a strange sort of sense to me.'

'What do you mean?'

'Zeff was in an impossible position. Torn between his two great responsibilities. That of a leader and that of a father. Perhaps voting the way he did was him trying to do right by us, and him disappearing was him trying to do right by his daughter.'"

"3615

‘But why not tell anyone, then?’ said Diego. ‘Did he think we wouldn’t understand? It’s his daughter.’

‘Maybe. Or maybe he was worried that some of us would try to go with him.’

‘Hmm. And the Monster of the East just accepted that? The offer was for all of us to leave, not Zeff by himself.’

‘You’re right. That does seem strange. There could be more to it.’

Indeed, that seemed likely. The timing couldn’t have been more peculiar. While it might’ve made sense on the surface that the Lord Elroy would’ve done anything in order to reunite with his lost daughter, Diego hadn’t forgotten the other news that Zeff had shared with them before.

About Field Marshal Graves putting Zeff in contact with his other lost daughter, Gema.

That one had not been an offer in exchange for anything. Graves had merely promised to make it happen, free of charge, whenever Gema became available.

And from the uncharacteristically happy way that Zeff had been when talking about it, Diego felt that there was precisely a snowball’s chance in lakefire that the man would have completely disregarded that in favor of going after Emiliana.

Granted, that would’ve been another impossible call. Choosing between children. But that was also why Zeff would have told someone about it, Diego thought.

If he knew he might miss his opportunity to meet Gema, surely Zeff would have informed someone of his intentions so that that person could go in his stead, no?

Agh. Or maybe not. Maybe Zeff expected to return soon and still make his meeting with Gema?

Or... maybe this disappearance was the meeting with Gema?

The more he thought about the matter, the more questions Diego had. And there was at least one person here who could provide some answers.

Talking to him alone didn't seem like the greatest idea, though. Diego didn't have any experience with meeting people that powerful. Amicable though the guy appeared, Graves did not strike Diego as the kind of person that one should speak to casually or unprepared.

And the man did not have much in the way of free time, apparently. As one might've expected, Graves was rather important to this entire warfront, now. Some would even call him the linchpin on which all their fates rested, though Diego and his fellow Rainlords, as well as the RPMP, would probably have something to say about that."

"3616

Regardless, jeopardizing their already tenuous relationship with the man was the last thing the Rainlords wanted to do.

And to that end, Darktide appeared to be in a peculiar state, at the moment. It was clear enough that Melchor wanted to talk to Graves at length about many different things, but he also seemed to have a similar understanding about the fragility of the current circumstances. Diego could sense the many questions that Melchor was holding himself back from asking.

Before disappearing, Zeff had made clear that, despite how much they were risking by siding with Graves here, he still did not wholly trust the man and did not think that the rest of them should, either.

Which was more than a fair point, Diego felt. The Vanguard had already betrayed them once before. No matter what happened, the Rainlords were, at the very least, united in their determination to not let things here in Ridgemark with Graves the Pale Hawk devolve into a repeat of what happened at Rheinhal with Sanko the Gargoyle.

Which was not to say that they feared Graves, necessarily. While Zeff's recounting of events had certainly been cause for worry, there was also the fact that Sanko had fought against half of the Rainlords' collective might whereas Graves here would have to deal with nearly all of it. Plus a few additional guests.

Such as Leo the Bull Leech.

That man was a strange one, to be sure. Thus far, his presence on the battlefield--and indeed, all of Vantalay since arriving here--had been surprisingly restrained. Diego had not been the only one concerned about bringing that guy along. After the mess they got into with him in the Undercrust, most of the Rainlords were not exactly thrilled to have him around.

But at this point, with how little Leo had actually contributed to most of the fighting, Diego wasn't sure what to think, anymore. On the one hand, it was definitely a good thing that Leo, a famous ex-subordinate of the servant empress Sai-hee, was not making a big splash here and potentially drawing her gaze toward them. But on the other hand, why had this fellow even bothered to come along in the first place if he wasn't planning on assisting? Would it not have been better for him to stay behind at Warrenhold?

Not to mention, Leo was an impossible person to read. Whatever was going on in that mind of his, Diego was just about done trying to figure it out.

Just about.

But not quite.

Because when Leo decided, for the first time, to accompany the Rainlords to a meeting with Graves, Diego's anxiety shot up."

"3617

"Mr. Leonardo," said Graves upon seeing the man file into the room behind the Rainlords. The recognition in his voice was unmistakable, and the look in his eyes spoke of a certain fondness. "How unexpected. I was beginning to think you were never going to show yourself before me."

All eyes turned to the Bull Leech, who took up a position at the other end of the circular table, not bothering to actually sit down in the chair that was there in front of him. The look on his face was as relaxed as ever.

The Rainlords all chose their seats, with Diego ending up next to his grandmother and Melchor Blackburn.

This chamber was another new one. It was a conference room in the Lucky Llama Hotel & Casino. By now, they'd conducted a few different meetings with Graves, and each time, it had been in a different location. The first one had been in a barn, right at the edge of the battlefield, while this place was in the heart of Ridgemark. Diego recalled one the Triplets mentioning that this building was owned by the Black Artisan's benefactor, much like the Ruby 88 was owned by the Linebreaker's.

"Figured it woulda been rude if I didn't drop by at least once," said Leo. "Y'know, at first, I thought I might be able to sneak under your radar, but then I realized there was prolly no hope of that, eh? Got your eyes and ears everywhere, don'tcha?"

"Heh. How long has it been?" said Graves. "Forty years? You're looking well. Better than I'd heard, actually."

"Oh? Been listenin' to rumors about me?"

"What, you don't listen to any about me? I'd be hurt if you didn't."

"Far as I remember, there've never been that many goin' 'round about you, fella. Which is prolly how you like it, eh?"

"Not at all. Whenever I find out that people have been talking about me, it makes me feel important."

Leo chortled. "That so? Then maybe I'll make up a few spicy rumors about you and spread 'em 'round. How's that sound?"

"As long as they're flattering."

"Ah. Spicy yet flattering. Tall order, that. Lemme think. Oh, maybe I could tell people about how you manhandled the Weasel and then kicked the Scourge's teeth in."

Graves paused. "I'm afraid you'd be a bit late to the party there. My own men have already been spreading that around like crazy, much as I wish they wouldn't."

"3618

"Can't blame 'em for bein' excited," said Leo. "Not every day that such a big shakeup in the established order 'o things happens, y'know? How many times have you clashed with some big name baddie and caused untold destruction, only for you both to walk away in the end, unscathed?"

Graves returned a nod. "Such is the nature of near-immortals being at war."

"You said it. Really makes a guy think, after a while."

"About what, precisely?"

"About the point of it all."

That left a silence in its wake as the two men merely looked at one another.

Then Graves eyed everyone else, who'd just been listening quietly as they conversed.

What was he thinking right now, Diego wondered? He had a feeling that these two could've gone on for hours, just chatting away--and hell, maybe the Rainlords wouldn't have even minded listening, either. It was really something, being able to hear what two old servants had to say to each other.

If only the battle for Ridgemark hadn't still been going on.

"In any case, thank you all for coming," said Graves, finally taking his seat. "As the hostilities here continue to wind down, I wanted to make one final attempt to convince you all to come with me to Czacoa. I know you said that you wished to leave as soon as Ridgemark is deemed fully secure again, but it seems to me that we could still be very useful to one another."

This again, huh? Diego was mildly surprised. He thought the Hawk had already given up on that.

The Lady Rayen Merlo spoke up first. "Did the Lord Elroy not make our position quite clear the last time you asked?"

Graves made no response.

Perhaps because Zeff indeed had made it quite clear. Diego remembered the conversation well. Rarely had he ever heard Zeff sound so authoritative and unmovable.

Which was saying a lot.

Rayen kept going. "Or perhaps you were thinking that the rest of our minds might be more malleable with him not present?" Despite the bite in her words, she had a gentle, almost musical voice. Two of her sons sat on either side of her, Gil and Andre, and they were even taller than she was, making that side of the table look not unlike a fortress wall.

Graves chuckled. "I have never been under the impression that the Rainlords of Sair are--or might ever become--'malleable.' And I pity anyone who treats you as such."

"3619

Leo was also sharing in the marshal's laughter. "They are a stubborn bunch, aren't they? I've started to like that 'bout 'em, though. They say what they mean. Don't try to trick ya with pretty words."

"Yes, I can certainly see the appeal," said Graves. And he paused to give Leo another look. "I must admit, however, that I am quite curious as to how you ended up in their company, Mr. Leonardo. They do not strike me as the type to accept others into their ranks easily, even those with famous names such as yourself; nor have you ever struck me as the type to throw in with a group with such strict ideas about lifestyle and structure. I always thought you were more of a free spirit."

Leo bobbed his head to the side. "Yeah, well, it's good to try out different things, now and again, ya feel me? Much as we might like to think otherwise, this world of ours just keeps on changin'. If we don't change with it, then what's gonna happen, ya think? A clash. Between us and it. And that's not good for anybody, now is it?"

Graves fell briefly quiet again. "An interesting perspective."

"Yeah, I been doin' lotta thinkin'. Maybe a bit too much, honestly. But that's prolly 'cuz it's long overdue." He broke for another chuckle. "But what about you, Mr. Hawk? How you feelin' 'bout your place in the world, hmm?"

"...Why do I get the impression that you're trying to sell me something?"

"Mm? Dunno, man. I'm just genuinely curious 'bout your state of mind, daddy-o. When's the last time someone asked you 'bout these sorts of things?"

"With respect, this hardly seems like the appropriate--"

"Nah, bro, this is important. Listen. It's super easy for us ol' fossils to end up all alone with no one to have real conversations with, y'know? I'm worried about it. And as a matter of fact, now that I'm really lookin' atcha and listenin' to ya, I'm actually startin' to get some real concernin' vibes from ya, pal. Like you're tryin' to avoid havin' a very important and necessary conversation about your own well-bein'. 'Cuz there's always somethin' else to distract yourself with, right? I know it, and I know you know it, brother."

Where in the hell was this going, Diego wondered?

And judging from the look on his face, the exact same question seemed to be occurring to Field Marshal Graves."

"3620

"Quit lookin' at me like a deer in the headlights," Leo went on. "It's a simple enough question. I'm sure you've given it plenty of thought over the years, at some point or another. So just tell me, man. How do you feel about your current place in the world?"

All eyes fell upon Graves again, who apparently needed a few more moments to find his answer. "...I am feeling just fine about it. But thank you for your concern."

"Oh. Yeah? That's great, dude. Happy to hear that. So you've got yourself a nice little support system in the Vanguard, then?"

"Support system? Yes, I suppose I do."

"Good, good. Glad to hear it. I'm tellin' ya, man. Social isolation: it's a silent killer. Even if it doesn't threaten your life directly, it'll mess with your head until you start thinkin' crazy stuff, daddy-o. Real family unfriendly stuff, know what I'm sayin'?"

"...From the passion in your words, I'm guessing that you have been struggling with such difficult thoughts yourself. Perhaps until quite recently?"

"Yeah. Well. No. But also yeah. It's been a complicated last few years for me, man. Simple, yet complicated. Much like myself, you might say!

Heh!"

"Right..."

"Long story short: my mind got messed with by a powerful psychic."

"Ah. I see..."

"Made me feel not quite myself for a good long while. And yet, in some ways, looking back on it all now, maybe it actually made me behave more like myself than ever before. Like it brought out the worst version of myself imaginable. That make sense?"

"I do believe I understand, yes."

"Course ya do. Knew ya would. Knowledgeable guy like you. Knowledgeable psychic guy like you."

Oh boy. Diego couldn't help tensing up, and he could practically feel the rest of his kin at the table tensing up right alongside him.

Melchor Blackburn was the one to speak up. "Leo..."

"No, man, relax. I'm not tryin' to pick a fight 'r anythin'. But I figure, maybe this fella here might know a thing 'r two about the other fella what messed with my noggin. 'sbeen on my to-do list, findin' out more about who did that to me."

"I see," reiterated Graves. "Yes, psychics can be quite the troublemakers. I assume this person has made it difficult for you to even remember much about them?"

"Sure has. But I did manage to learn the name Ettol. That mean anything to you?"

"3621

Graves cocked an eyebrow. "...Ettol, you say? That is the name of an Ancient Melmoorian trickster god."

"Yeah, dude, my reaper may've mentioned a thing 'r two about that," said Leo. "But I'm more interested in the modern day. So have you ever heard of a psychic who goes by that name?"

"I'm afraid not," said Graves. "But even if I had, what would you do with such information? Please tell me you do not intend to go after this person without some sort of plan."

"Plans come later, daddy-o. Once the gatherin' of intel is complete. Or further along, at least."

"Mr. Leonardo. I may not be fully apprised of your circumstances, but I do know something of the dangers you've described. Please trust me when I say that if it happened once, it can absolutely happen a second time. This does not sound like someone you should pursue haphazardly. I implore you to be exceedingly cautious."

"Ooh. If you're the one saying that, then maybe this fellow is even scarier than I thought. 'Preciate the warning, pal."

The marshal's gaze lingered on Leo for a few moments more before returning to the rest of the table.

Diego felt the whole room relax a little. Phew.

"Well," said Graves, "with that out of the way, I'd like to return to what we were discussing before. Czacoa."

"Still?" said Rayen Merlo. "I should think we have made ourselves quite clear by now."

"You have," said Graves. "But permit me this one last courtesy. Then I shall not trouble you with it again. Fair?"

The Lady Merlo glanced across the table and saw a few nods of affirmation before relenting and giving one of her own.

"Thank you," said Graves. He stood and produced a pair of tablets from his overcoat, fiddling with them briefly before sliding them over to the people on his right and left, who happened to be Rider, one of Santos Zabat's sons, and Delia, one of Evangelina Stroud's daughters. "This footage was taken from Denbohlt just yesterday. I'm sure I don't need to worry about your sensitivities, but even so, allow me to warn you: it is quite graphic."

The tablets passed along the edges of the table, and soon enough, one of them reached Diego's hands.

The scene unfolding on the screen was of a type that he'd witnessed before.

Razed buildings. Smote ground and smoldering piles of rubble. Smoke and ash filling the sky. Bodies littering the ground.

Diego passed it on to his grandmother.

"I well know the noble spirit of the Rainlords," said Graves. "I know you all have within you that most valiant of instincts to intervene and protect the innocent. But I'm sure that mere video footage will not be enough to sway you. So allow me to create an even more vivid depiction of what is happening over there, right now.""

"3622

The entire chamber went briefly dark, and when light returned, it looked and felt as though they had been transported to a completely different location.

It was a scene quite similar to the one that had just been on the screen--so similar, in fact, that Diego at first thought that it was simply the same one recreated--but as he looked further, he noticed different buildings and street markers, and the reddish sun was in a different position in the sky.

Ash and smoke choked the air, and it felt like Diego could actually smell them. The scent of blood and death hung thick here. An all too familiar scent.

Diego couldn't help standing to his feet.

They had all been told about the illusive capabilities of Graves by Zeff, and indeed, Diego had even caught a few glimpses of it firsthand on the battlefield since then, too.

But this was still quite a new and different experience for him. An illusion this realistic? It boggled the mind.

"This is not an illusion," arrived Graves' disembodied voice from all around them, as if in response to the thought that had just been in Diego's head. "This is a projection. A live feed, if you will. From one of the many townships on the outskirts of Denbohlt. This is what will soon become of the capital city, if action is not taken in its defense."

That information made Diego look over the scene anew. A live feed, was it?

So that flaming pile of the rubble there was burning as they spoke? Those rotting corpses along the sundered roadside were still there, right now?

And even that lone child wandering the street in the distance, face smeared black with soot and grime...? Even that was...?

Unconsciously, Diego raised a hand forward and took a step toward the child.

“...Ah.”

A hummingbird appeared before the child, drawing his or her attention. And Diego watched as the child began to follow it.

“Not to worry,” said Graves. “I will guide her to a safe place.”

Diego didn't know what to say.

The Lady Merlo certainly did, though. “Perhaps you could show us a live feed of Kuros. Or Zebul, perhaps. Or just about any of the major cities in eastern Sair, for that matter.”

“Alas, I cannot,” said Graves. “That is much too far. And the reason I am able to share this scene with you is because I am also in Denbohlt, actively monitoring things there, just as I am here.”

"3623

“This will not sway us,” said the Lady Evangelina Stroud. “Terrible though this may be, we have a responsibility to our own citizenry--one that is just as urgent, if not even moreso. Many among us feel that we have already tarried too long here in Vantalay as it is.”

“Moreover,” followed up Horatio Blackburn, “what need would you truly have for us? It seems to us that the famed Field Marshal Graves has proven himself more than capable of handling whatever remnants of Abolish may remain in this region by himself. If anything, I believe we are collectively of a mind to leave even sooner than we were originally anticipating.”

“Ah, that is news to me,” said Graves. “Well, well. I seem to have become a victim of my own success.”

“This is ridiculous,” said Rayen Merlo, apparently not in the mood for japes. “Stop wasting our time.”

“My apologies. Allow me to address your concerns in rapid succession. Please observe.”

And the scene before them shifted. It zoomed up and out, giving everyone a view of the battlefield from far above.

“See the battle lines?” said Graves, and the vision darkened, save for a few select areas which remained highlighted.

Indeed, Diego could see columns of soldiers forming up in the distance, flanked by tented encampments and standing behind large walls for cover.

There were large clusters of forces. One to the east and one to the west, judging by the position of the sun. And considering the geography, the one in the west must have belonged to the Vantalayan Armed Forces while the east belonged to the Czacoan Defense Force.

And their names, Diego realized, were unfortunately quite apt, what with the VAF being pluralized and the CDF being singular.

The CDF was clearly outnumbered here. Maybe by a hundred to one. Hell, maybe even more.

It made sense, of course. Vantalay's population dwarfed that of Czacoa. And the VAF was comprised of multiple military organizations while the CDF was really just one group.

“This is but one of the Vantalayan battlefields,” said Graves. “Here is another.”

The scene shifted again, this time blacking out first before revealing a different landscape with an apparently similar story unfolding thereupon. The battle lines were highlighted again, though this time there was a large stretch of open water in the middle and scores of warships included in the mix. “This one is farther north, and it is largely between the Vantalayan and Yena Marian navies, though I have also noticed a few groups scattered along the coastlines. Perhaps scavengers. Hard to tell for sure. But we must speed this along, allow me to show you another.”

And again, the scene changed. This time, it was almost all sea, with land only on the horizon. Dozens of warships dotted the shimmering waters, and active missile, torpedo, and cannon fire was visible. “This one is Naos--”

“We get the idea,” said Rayen. “And still, it makes no difference.””
"3624

“With respect to the Lady,” said Graves, “I do not think you do get it. These battlefields that I have shown you. Just involving Vantalay alone, how many do you think there are?”

She did not grace him with an answer.

He didn’t wait long. “Thirteen. One involving Czacoa, two with Naos, two with Yena Maria, this one here in Ridgemark, an additional one near Vantalay’s own capital, four more with Lyste along the western border, and then two others out in the Luthic Ocean regarding trade routes and pirates. So to your question of why I want your help: this is why. Out of the five active war fronts on the continent, this Vantalayan one is by far the messiest. And while it is very fortunate that I can be in more than one place at a time, thirteen is still a bit beyond me.”

That argument seemed to have struck a chord, because the Rainlords fell briefly quiet.

It was the Lord Santos Zabat who picked up the slack. “But the fact remains that there is not a single soldier on any of these battlefields who can stand against you.”

“Would that were so,” said Graves. “I have already died six times since my arrival in this country. Whenever I show myself, I become a point of great focus for the Vantalayans. Even I have trouble dealing with constant barrages of soul-infused missiles and machine gun fire. Which is to say nothing of the VAF’s elite unit of assassins that is constantly stalking me and waiting for even the slightest perceived opening to try and kill me permanently. Not to mention, there are actually a couple of warriors within the VAF that can threaten me on the battlefield if I am not careful.”

Huh.

Damn.

Diego didn't know the guy had it that bad. He'd always figured that the marshals had it kinda easy, considering how powerful they all were. But yeah, he supposed being the guy with the biggest target on his back might not be so fun in a warzone.

And when the Rainlords grew quiet again, Graves' tone shifted to one of confusion. "Are you really that surprised? Who do you think I am? Sermung?"

Mevox chose that moment to chime in. 'Wow. I never knew marshals could be such whining pussies.'

"Okay, who let that reaper talk again? I thought we agreed last time that he would stay silent."

"Sorry," said the Lord Salvador Delaguna."
"3625

Grandma decided to interject with a question that gave Diego pause. "Precisely how bad are you saying that things are for you here, Graves? Mevox is out of line, but he touches upon a relevant point. You are sounding like you think you will lose this warfront without our help."

The aerial view of the watery battlefield finally shifted back to the normal chamber again. "Well, only fools assume victory before it is achieved," said Graves. "Which is especially relevant in a war with so many involved parties who might show up unexpectedly at any time. But no, truthfully, I do not think I would lose the warfront without you. Rather, I think it would be woefully prolonged and cost many thousands more lives. Much of whom would be civilians."

"Of course we would like to help you," said Lord Salvador. "But as we have already said, several times now, we have our own obligations. Our own people to consider."

"Yes, and I have already offered to return this favor," said Graves. "Do this for me, and when you are prepared to retake your homeland, I promise that I will be there to help you do so."

"The delay is still an issue," said Lady Rayen. "And the Vanguard is the reason we lost our land in the first place."

"Then I should be honored as the one to begin making amends on the Vanguard's behalf," said the marshal.

"Would it be making amends or returning a favor?" said Lord Santos. "It cannot rightly be both."

Graves returned a nod. "A fair point. Perhaps there is some additional thing you might wish from me, then? I believe I have already made my desperation embarrassingly clear, so if you have terms, then you can at least be certain that I will listen to them carefully."

"Oh, I indeed have some extra terms in mind," said Lord Santos. "I do not know if you will like them, however."

"Well, if they are within my power, I will probably like them just fine."

"You tell me if these qualify, then. First, the immediate unfreezing of all Rainlords assets."

"Mm. I can do that, but it wouldn't be immediate. The Vanguard used proxies for that little trick, so it will take a bit of time and finesse to see it undone."

"Second, a formal contract, signed by Sermung--and Sanko, for good measure--agreeing that members of the Vanguard will never again enter any region of Sair without the expressed, written approval of the local ruling House."

"That... will be more challenging. You did hear the part about these things needing to be within my power, right?"

"Third, the complete and utter disavowal of Captain General Parson Miles. Or alternatively, the deliverance of him and his reaper into our custody."

"Ah..."

"3626

The table fell quiet again as they waited for Graves' response to that one.

Diego was quite uncomfortable. Frankly, he felt those demands were rather unreasonable to be asking of Graves, and by the look on the Lord of House Zabat's face, Diego was getting the feeling that the man had still more demands left in mind.

"...Parson Miles is not under my command," said Graves. "I can petition Lamont or Sermung for his removal, but the decision will ultimately fall to one of them. Which I'm sure you already knew, Lord Santos. So why are you asking me for things that you know I cannot provide?"

"Fourth, reparations for the nigh incalculable damage that the Vanguard has helped bring upon Sair and its citizenry."

Graves closed his eyes and sighed. "I see."

Diego did, too. Or at least, he thought he did. Santos had built up the severity of their case and was now going to steer the conversation in the direction of money. Whatever other demands Graves failed to provide could potentially be made up for by adding even more zeroes to the money offered.

Or in other words, it was a way for Santos to drive up their price.

A shrewd strategy. And one that Diego expected would not sit entirely well with everyone. Personally, he was all for it. He'd always felt that they should be trying to turn a profit whenever they could, but he knew only too well how strongly some of his kin felt about mercenary work. "Unbefitting of Rainlords," were the words that often got thrown around.

Would they see this differently? Maybe. If Lord Santos could convince them, too, perhaps.

Hmm. Knowing him, maybe he could pull it off.

From there, the meeting continued for a while longer, and it played out about how Diego expected it to. Lord Santos kept hashing out terms with Graves, but ultimately, before anything could be formally agreed upon, there was yet more work to be done--work that no longer involved the marshal, who eventually excused himself.

Several of the Rainlords dispersed as well, but the heads all remained in order to continue negotiations among themselves. Diego had the opportunity to leave--and maybe go enjoy the casino floor, since it was technically his day off--but he didn't take it. He wanted to hear everything Santos was going to say and be here to back the man up, if he needed it."

"3627

"I cannot believe we are even debating this," said Lady Rayen. "After all we have been through because of the Vanguard's machinations? They cannot be trusted."

"This is not just about them," said Grandma, which surprised Diego a bit. "There are multiple reasons why we might decide to stay and help. Not the least of which being that Graves was right about us. About what we all feel. The pull. You know of what speak. And I know you feel it, too, my dear."

"Do not talk to me like one of your children, Octavia."

"Have no fear of that. My children would never be so ill-behaved."

Uh-oh. Diego noticed Rayen glance in his direction.

"Easy now," said Lady Evangelina from across the table. "We have just been reunited. Let's not ruin it by picking needless fights."

"My apologies," said Octavia with a slight nod in Rayen's direction.

And after a moment, Rayen returned one of her own. "Mine as well."

"Whatever else might be said, this is an opportunity for us," said Evangelina. "Now we must determine whether it is worth taking or not. The first matter of concern to my mind is, assuming we were to refuse and return to Sair forthwith, do we even think that we would be able to retake the country with our current level of strength?"

A brief silence fell over the table.

"It may not be pretty," said Rayen, "but yes, I believe we could. We do not need Graves' help."

Lord Santos spoke up next. "If the Mad Demon is still there, then our odds of success are virtually nil, especially with the Sandlords scattered, too."

"All reports have suggested that Morgunov has departed that war front entirely," said Octavia.

"Reports are only so trustworthy," said Lord Salvador. "They also told us that Graves was no longer in Vantalay, and we see how that turned out."

"Agreed," said Santos. "We should not return without the expectation that we will have to fight anything less than the Mad Demon himself. Better to be overprepared than under."

"Not when time is of the essence," said Rayen. "Our people continue to suffer while we sit here, talking."

Santos wasn't done, though. "Even if we do manage to retake Sair on our own, we must have enough strength left to hold it. Even now, we're still recovering."

"And so your solution is to wade into another battlefield?" said Rayen. "Where our strength may be further depleted?"

"3628

"If the rewards can be deemed worth it, then yes," said Santos. "The money we could procure from this venture would be what allows us to rebuild our nation and protect it. And moreover, from the sound of things, the Drylands will have an even greater need of such funding. We may need to take stewardship over them while the Sandlords remain broken."

"Just as they did for our people," added Evangelina.

"And so our finances will be stressed even further," said Santos.

"Hold on now," said Salvador. "Abbas Saqqaf yet lives. Whatever else is uncertain, that much is not."

"Of course," said Santos. "And I am sure all of Hahl Saqqaf will wish to fight alongside us, but they alone cannot hold the entirety of the Drylands. Until more Sandlords return or make contact with us, we should plan to aid the entire nation, not just the Wetlands."

Horatio Blackburn decided to jump in now. "I do not know if that is wise. Would it not be better to focus our efforts on the Wetlands first, establish a foothold there, and then worry about expanding into the Drylands if and when it is deemed necessary? I feel we may be biting off more than we can chew, otherwise.”

“You’re right, of course,” said Rayen. “Our subjects must come first. Taking a long view of things is all well and good, Santos, but the grander we make our plans, the longer they will take to enact. The fact of the matter is that we may never feel fully prepared to return. It is always going to seem a great risk. But we have a duty to take it--and sooner rather than later.”

Santos made no response.

Damn. Diego wanted to help, but he wasn’t sure what to say here. He wasn’t even sure if it was his place to say anything. Truthfully, these big meetings with all the heads still made him feel knots in his stomach.

Fortunately, Grandma picked up the slack. “We also have a duty to our own Houses. Our families. And to each other. I am leaning toward Santos’ perspective of preparedness here. This is a critical time for our people. A cautious approach would be best, in my opinion.”

“Relying on the Vanguard again is not the cautious approach,” said Rayen. “If Zeff were here, I am certain he would be agreeing with me. And loudly so.”

Well, she was probably right about that, Diego thought.”
"3629

“I do share your trepidation when it comes to the Vanguard,” said Santos. “I do not think we should blindly trust in Graves.”

“Finally, you are talking some sense,” said Rayen.

An idea struck Diego, and he wondered if Lord Santos was already thinking the same thing. When the man remained quiet, however, along with the rest of the table, Diego felt that it might be his turn to say something.

“Perhaps we could test Graves,” said Diego, drawing everyone’s attention. He tried not to sound too stiff. “If his trustworthiness is the main question, then we should see about finding an answer to it.”

Lady Rayen snickered. “You play with fire, boy. What manner of test would you have us conduct on a Vanguardian field marshal, of all people?”

“Well,” said Diego, “the specific concern seems to be that he is attempting to manipulate us, yes? Moreover, he is notoriously secretive, even for a marshal, and yet we in this room now know more about him and the nature of his power than... just about anyone else in the world, I’d wager. So I’d argue that, if nothing else, he at least has a rather strong motive to not let us leave Vantalay. To keep us close so that we can’t go around spreading information about him.”

Salvador jumped in again. “Wait. You’re saying this is all, what? Just some scheme to keep us here? That he doesn’t actually need our help?”

“The thought has crossed my mind as well,” said Lord Santos. “We do indeed know far more about Graves than most, but in the end, what we’ve learned is still precious little. To my mind, he could have been playing up his disadvantaged position for two reasons. First, because he wants us to underestimate him. Personally, I find this quite believable, though not for entirely logical reasons. He simply strikes me as the type of man to do something like that.”

“A constant schemer,” said Rayen, the agreement strong in her tone.

“Indeed,” said Santos. “And the second reason why he might’ve been playing it up is because of what Diego just mentioned: he wants us to stay of our own volition, rather than having to fight and recapture us.”

Whoa. Diego hadn’t exactly said all that, but he had been intending to go in that direction. And yet Lord Santos just blurted it out like it was no big deal.”

"3630

The Lord Zabat wasn’t done. “If this is true, then even if we do choose to stay, he will undoubtedly find some other reason to keep us close after things here in Vantalay are settled. In fact, perhaps his promise to help us retake Sair could be considered part of that. It would give him an excuse to remain in our company.”

“Or,” said Diego, deciding to jump in again, “if the first reason is not true and he really does want our help, then he could still just be biding his time with us until Vantalay is secure. Once we’re no longer useful to him.”

“Also true,” said Santos. “In all likelihood, he is working multiple angles here.” And he paused to look directly at Diego. “Knowing all this, if we are to test him, then it must be on the matter of his trustworthiness, yes? And on something relevant to our current circumstances. Something which provides him with every motive to deceive or betray us. And if he still does not, then perhaps we can trust him.”

Geez. It felt like Lord Santos was already way ahead of him. “I was thinking,” said Diego, “that maybe we could just... leave. And see how he reacts. See if he actually lets us go. If he does, then maybe we could circle back and help him out. If not, then... well...”

“If not, then we are fighting him,” said Santos. “Interesting. If he tries to stop us from leaving, then he will give us no choice, but at least we will know his true character. And in such a case, we would have had to fight him eventually, anyway, whenever he finished whatever game he was playing with us. But it is still a great risk. And we would not be able to enact such a plan until our business with the RPMP is settled.”

“That won’t be much longer,” said Diego. “And I don’t have a better idea for a meaningful test, so unless someone else does, then...” He looked over the table.

As did Santos, until he landed on the head of House Merlo. “What say you, Lady Rayen?”

She leveled a stare at Diego. “I still think it would be best to leave and not come back, but... I do not hate this idea, I suppose.”

“And Lord Dimas?” said Santos. “You’ve said nothing at all so far. What are your thoughts?”

"3631

Dimas took a moment before answering. “It seems a solid idea to me. And perhaps our only option, for that matter. But I also do not wish for us to split our forces again, and if the intention becomes to stay and assist Graves, what then shall we do about that? Will we all stay in Vantalay? Or will some return to Warrenhold?"

"Good question," said Horatio. "I am also hesitant for us to divide ourselves again so soon after reuniting, but we have many non-combatants to consider, too. And Warrenhold is no short distance from here. It would be quite the separation."

"That is a decision that must come down to each House," said Santos. "If and when that time comes, every fighting man and woman among us should decide for themselves if they wish to stay or go, with the final say resting on the head of each House. At least, that is my view of it."

"I can agree with that," said the Lord Delaguna.

"I, as well," said the Lady Octavia Redwater.

"And me," said the Lord Dimas Sebolt.

"Here, too," said the Lord Horatio Blackburn.

"Wow," chortled Santos. "It sounds like we are already putting it to a vote. But before anything is finalized, surely we must hear from the other head at this table who has remained silent this whole time. Lord Valero?"

And all eyes turned to the very young, fresh-faced head of House Garza.

Of the ten Rainlord Houses of Sair, only eight heads were present, since both Zeff Elroy and Joana Cortes were missing, but there was little doubt in Diego's mind that House Garza was in the most awkward position of all of them, at the moment.

Which was saying a lot, considering how awkward he knew the Blackburns' position to still be, after their betrayal back in Sair contributed to the detainment of so many other Rainlords.

The problem for the Garzas was that their previous head, Lady Socorro, had been slain by Parson Miles back in Sair while the rest of them had already been captured by Sanko. Only a couple of their non-combatants had managed to escape, and neither of them was here, right now. Luciana and Elise Garza had remained behind at Warrenhold.

Perhaps they should have come along in order to help their family members come to terms with all that had happened, but it was too late for such thinking now."

"3632 -- CCC.

House Garza had been struggling to restructure themselves, which had been further compounded by the battle at Logden Prison, where apparently the two most obvious successors to Socorro had both lost their lives, putting the family into an even more confused state once the dust had finally settled.

Blessedly, there had not been many casualties from that mess of a fight--and none at all from this current defense of Ridgemark--but that was small comfort for the Garzas right now, Diego knew.

Their new head, Valero Garza, was even younger than himself.

He'd met him many times over the years, and yet Diego still felt like he'd never really gotten to know him. At most, he'd gotten the impression that Valero was a very humble, unassuming guy; and looking at him now with those wide eyes, that assessment seemed to be spot on. Of all the assumptions Valero might've made about the trajectory of his own life, becoming the new head of his entire House had probably not been among them. Especially at such a young age.

Not to mention with the war going on.

Diego felt for the poor fellow. What a time to be thrust into a leadership role.

To the man's credit, though, he did manage to speak up and answer Lord Santos. "...I-I think th-that's a sound plan, as well."

And that was all, apparently.

Well.

It got the job done, Diego supposed. But he was pretty sure Lord Santos had been hoping for a bit more than that.

The Lady Evangelina Stroud filled the ensuing silence. "As for me, I like Diego's idea well enough, but I still do not like the idea of staying in Vantelay to assist Graves. If he lets us leave without a fight, then I think we should just leave."

"Then Evangelina and I are of the same mind," said Rayen.

"It sounds like we are ready for a vote, then," said Santos. "Assuming Graves passes our test, all in favor staying to assist him?" And he held up his right hand.

As did Grandma, Horatio, Dimas, and Valero.

Salvador, Evangelina, and Rayen did not.

"Five to three in favor," said Lord Santos. "It would seem our course is set."

Chapter Three Hundred: 'O, enduring sands...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

What a strange place this was. What a strange feeling. A place and a feeling. Merged into one. Inseparable. Indistinguishable.

He couldn't think. Didn't even want to, really. It was so comfortable here. Warm and peaceful. And yet plenty busy, too. Plenty to watch and be entertained by."

"3632 -- CCC.

House Garza had been struggling to restructure themselves, which had been further compounded by the battle at Logden Prison, where apparently the two most obvious successors to Socorro had both lost their lives, putting the family into an even more confused state once the dust had finally settled.

Blessedly, there had not been many casualties from that mess of a fight--and none at all from this current defense of Ridgemark--but that was small comfort for the Garzas right now, Diego knew.

Their new head, Valero Garza, was even younger than himself.

He'd met him many times over the years, and yet Diego still felt like he'd never really gotten to know him. At most, he'd gotten the impression that Valero was a very humble, unassuming guy; and looking at him now with those wide eyes, that assessment seemed to be spot on. Of all the assumptions Valero might've made about the trajectory of his own life, becoming the new head of his entire House had probably not been among them. Especially at such a young age.

Not to mention with the war going on.

Diego felt for the poor fellow. What a time to be thrust into a leadership role.

To the man's credit, though, he did manage to speak up and answer Lord Santos. "...I-I think th-that's a sound plan, as well."

And that was all, apparently.

Well.

It got the job done, Diego supposed. But he was pretty sure Lord Santos had been hoping for a bit more than that.

The Lady Evangelina Stroud filled the ensuing silence. "As for me, I like Diego's idea well enough, but I still do not like the idea of staying in Vantalay to assist Graves. If he lets us leave without a fight, then I think we should just leave."

"Then Evangelina and I are of the same mind," said Rayen.

"It sounds like we are ready for a vote, then," said Santos. "Assuming Graves passes our test, all in favor staying to assist him?" And he held up his right hand.

As did Grandma, Horatio, Dimas, and Valero.

Salvador, Evangelina, and Rayen did not.

"Five to three in favor," said Lord Santos. "It would seem our course is set."

Chapter Three Hundred: 'O, enduring sands...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

What a strange place this was. What a strange feeling. A place and a feeling. Merged into one. Inseparable. Indistinguishable.

He couldn't think. Didn't even want to, really. It was so comfortable here. Warm and peaceful. And yet plenty busy, too. Plenty to watch and be entertained by."

"3633

The world. It was all around him. Streaming by him in a blur. Just waiting for him to look at it. All but asking him for his attention.

He couldn't process any of it. But he could observe. Like an enormous television. And him, an unthinking couch potato. Passively watching.

Was he learning anything? Retaining anything?

Hard to say. Impossible, actually. Perhaps if he ever managed to leave this place, he would know. But here and now, no.

Asad Najir merely existed. Scarcely even aware of himself. A pebble floating in an ocean.

"That is okay," came a voice. "Take your time, Young Lion. It is not as it seems, after all. There is much to do, and we cannot rush."

He made no response. Could not make one.

But he could listen.

"We at last meet," the voice went on. "This was not quite what I had in mind, but I suppose we must go through the doors that open to us. It is a relief merely to know that you have survived."

Survived? Survived what?

Mm. Eh. Didn't matter.

Ugh, he was so tired. Like he'd never felt before. And this place was so comfortable. A warm blanket.

"Good. Good. Yes. You need your rest. Worry not. And let me be your guide."

Mm. Guide? He didn't understand. Didn't care, either.

"No, Lion. You must care. You cannot leave until you do. You must not become an incarnation of me. That is not the way. I have become convinced. You must retain yourself."

What?

Oh, whatever.

"Rrgh. You are not going to make this easy, are you? Very well. Come along, then."

For a moment, the world swooshed more quickly past him, and then it slowed. To a crawl, actually. Enough for him to get a very clear picture of the scene in front of him.

Who was that? A familiar face. Very familiar indeed.

"The Sunsmith," said the voice. "You recognize him, of course. He toils daily, seeking the power to revitalize our people. And the wisdom to, as well."

Asad saw.

Abbas Saqqaf was there, sweating profusely and panting with one hand on a giant glass orb. He looked like he might collapse.

And that orb. Such a gentle light emanated from it. Asad had never seen the like before.

"He is more adrift than he allows others to see," said the voice. "His mind falters as much as his body does, and yet he pushes onward. Searching.""

"3634

Searching, was it? Again, Asad didn't understand. What purpose was there in searching? Everything was fine. Or soon would be. Or didn't matter.

"Those are not your thoughts, Young Lion. Disregard them. Rest now, but do not forget yourself. Remember your own life, at least."

Mm. His own life.

Hah.

He hadn't forgotten that. Not one bit.

That was precisely why this place was great.

By comparison.

He remembered the stress. The worry. The constant fear and disappointment. In himself. In his accomplishments. In his wife. And yes, in his children, too.

Perhaps that was wrong to think. As a father, he should have been more understanding. More accepting. Of their faults. And their failures.

He'd tried to be. Had he ever succeeded?

He couldn't recall. He could only remember the anxiety it caused him.

It was never enough. Nothing ever was.

"Stop," said voice. "That is not resting. That is killing yourself. Do not do that. Especially not here. This is not a place to chastise oneself. And moreover, you have done nothing to deserve it. You have always been too hard on yourself."

Had he? How would this voice know?

"Because I am Rasalased. And I have been observing you since the day you were born."

Oh.

Huh.

Kinda creepy.

"I can only agree. This is not the afterlife that I had envisioned for myself. But here I am. And being able to stay connected to all our kin throughout the ages has been wonderful, in its own regard."

Ah. So it wasn't just Asad that he'd been spying on.

"Indeed. That is how I know that the Sunsmith will have need of your help."

His help? Still, Asad didn't understand. What help could he be?

“Ah. That is indeed the question, isn’t it? But that is alright. For now. I fear it may yet be quite some time before you offer it to him. He will have to manage on his own for a while longer. Unless, perhaps, you are able to surprise me and get your act together more quickly.”

Huh?

Huh...

Mm...

So tired...

“Yes, I thought as much. Let us move on.”

The world sped by again.

Asad just watched.

It was beautiful.

So bright and colorful. So much life and wonder. A moving painting. A living stream, filled with more than mere images. He could feel them as they passed. Touch them, almost. The temptation to reach out came over him, but he resisted.

Just observing was good enough."

"3635

Ah...

Who was that? Another familiar face.

“Your brother by blood,” said the voice.

Haqq. Right.

It was good to see him. After everything.

Everything? What was everything?

Eh... Too much work to recall.

Haqq was at a table, laboring over something as usual. Research notes, it looked like. The expression on his face spoke of frustration.

That, too, was quite normal, Asad knew. When it came to research, Haqq had always tried to keep up an appearance of ease and confidence, but Asad knew how hard his brother worked. How much effort he was constantly putting in.

And how miserable it made him, more often than not.

It was something that Asad had never really understood. Why pretend? Why not let more people know how difficult his work was? Personally, Asad had always appreciated his brother's determination to keep pushing, even if he hadn't always appreciated the inventions that resulted.

"You have never realized?" asked the voice.

Hmm? Realized what?

"Your brother believes that his reputation is everything. And where his work is concerned, he may be right. One is not regarded as a genius through hard work alone. One must achieve great results--and so much the better if it can be made to look easy in front of others."

Reputation? Did Haqq really care about that so much? Asad had never gotten that impression. Haqq always seemed so detached from the world. So immersed in his projects.

"Ah. A pitiable blind spot, Young Lion."

What?

"Your brother has lived beside the divine power of our clan for most of his life. Beside the new Lion of the Desert. Have you given not a thought to how that has impacted him?"

He was suddenly reminded of their youth, long before either of them became servants. Haqq had followed him everywhere, pestered him constantly, wanting to be involved in everything he did.

Quintessential behavior of a little brother.

Asad wanted to smile, but he wasn't sure if he even possessed a mouth, right now.

"You have forgotten," said the voice. "Perhaps that is not surprising."

Forgotten? Forgotten what?

The world sped by again, but this time, when it slowed back down, Asad saw his younger self standing there. And Haqq, too.

They were on a balcony. A familiar one. Flanked by mounds of sand that twinkled in the morning sun.

Dunehall, he recalled. Yes. This was outside his childhood bedroom. One of his favored spots, growing up. The view of downtown Moaban from here was incredible, and the mountain of sand that covered most of the castle made this little balcony feel like a hiding spot, of sorts, what with the way it peeked out from a little hole in said mountain."

"3636

His younger self didn't seem to be enjoying the view very much, however. He was hunched over and leaning on the railing, face buried between his hands.

He could see his tattoos--and Haqq's, as well--so even though he couldn't see his face, he could at least surmise that this must have taken place in his teenage years.

Ugh, too much thinking. Better to just watch.

"I don't believe it," said Haqq. He wasn't facing Asad, but he was most certainly talking to him, as they were the only ones present.

His younger self made no response.

"It just makes no sense," said Haqq. "My mind can't accept it. Just like that? She's gone? No explanation? Tiriala just releases her? I don't buy it."

Still, there was no reply.

"And because I can't buy it, I can't bring myself to mourn her, either. She can't be gone. Not like this. She was... she is... it doesn't..." The boy sighed.

Finally, the younger Asad decided to say something. "...This is how it always is."

"What?" said Haqq.

"Historically. For our people. We're lucky when we get an explanation. Frequently, we just disappear. Killed in action where no one ever finds us. Or killed in such a way that we're reduced to dust. 'Returned to the Great Sand,' they used to call it. Qorvass told me about it."

Haqq scoffed. "That's his way of comforting you? Bastard."

"No. It was a while ago. He's been... perfectly nice to me."

"Hmph."

"...Do you think we'll die like this?"

"She's not dead."

"Then do you think we'll disappear like this, someday? Gone without a word or warning to everyone around us?"

"No. Our clan is too close-knit. This is extremely abnormal. Don't let Qorvass try to convince you that it is."

"That wasn't what he was--I already said--agh. It doesn't matter."

And the two young men both fell silent for a time.

Asad felt like he was starting to remember this conversation. But only vaguely. Why was the voice showing it to him?

"This won't happen to us," said Haqq. "I can promise you that."

"That's a promise you can't possibly keep. You don't know the future, little brother."

"Oh, but I do," said the young Haqq with a chuckle. "It's as clear to me as this conversation we're having, right now."

"Hah. Is that right?"

"It is. In the future, you become a great warrior. The likes of which our clan hasn't seen in generations."

"You're just repeating the old stories about the Lion of the Desert."

"No. I know it's true. Because I'm going to help you every step of the way. Just like Mother wanted. Like she wants.""

His younger self did not reply.

Maybe he hadn't really been listening. He recalled having quite a bit on his mind at this time.

From there, the scene faded to gray, then black.

"This moment mattered little to you," said the voice. "But not to your brother. He took it to heart and has held it there ever since."

Asad didn't know what to think. Or if he should think anything at all. Was it not still better to simply watch? Less tiring, for certain.

"Rest is important, yes, but you need not suppress all emotion and thought while you do so. Ignoring everything will do you no favors."

Mm. Perhaps the voice had a point.

Or perhaps it didn't. Eh. He could figure it out later.

"You are beginning to annoy me, Young Lion."

Asad missed breathing. Where had his breath gone? Was even alive, anymore? He wished he could feel his body, at least. He recalled that the ability to breathe had been so soothing, at times. It would've been lovely, right about now.

"Rgh. Let us move on."

More speeding. Shifting and spinning. Beautiful lights and colors. Mm.

When the scene settled, he saw yet another familiar face. Two faces, actually. Who? It was hard to think.

Two women. They were running. And fighting. Not each other but a host of pursuers. And something in the sky. Something with wings. Bullets were flying everywhere, both at and from the fleeing women.

One was clearly younger.

His daughter. Jada. Yes.

And the older woman. White smoke billowed from her arms. A familiar sight.

His sister. Imas.

The pursuers closed in but Imas rebuffed them with a wall of smoke, which passed over two men like a tidal wave and left half-melted corpses behind.

Corpses which did not stop moving. They were clearly slowed, but their pursuit did not stop.

Where were they? Why were they fighting? And who?

“Remember, Young Lion,” said the voice. “The disastrous fight at Uego. You witnessed it in part. This is but one consequence.”

This was current? Jada and Imas were fighting, right now?

“Alas, there may be no such thing as ‘current’ in this place. But yes. They are still fleeing for their lives, even now. For their lives--and for the lives around them.”

Asad saw. They were not alone. There were other warriors. Other familiar faces. Sandlords. Hahl Duxan?

So hard to remember.

But there were non-warriors, too. Children, even. Also fleeing.”
"3638

He felt something stir within him. An unwanted notion. A sense of urgency that betrayed this otherwise overwhelming desire to rest.

“They need help,” he said. Which surprised him, because that wasn’t the voice talking again. Not Rasalased. That was him. His own voice. Singular and distinct.

“Yes,” came the voice again. “But I have been monitoring them. And they have been managing. Perhaps this scene looks worse than it is.”

Ah. Asad saw what he meant. The pursuers were giving chase, but they were also themselves being chased by more members of Hahl Duxan. Walls of materialized metal appeared, barring their path, shielding innocents, and skewering the pursuers. It was the work of that one fellow in the back, Asad was fairly sure. Such a familiar face. The Lord Duxan's eldest son. What was his name again?

Malik Duxan. Yes. A formidable young man, Asad had always thought. It was a relief to see him there--and alive, for that matter.

And then there was Jada. She was defending herself but still not drawing too much attention--in part, perhaps, because Imas was drawing so much attention in her stead.

It was a worrisome sight, to be sure. But they were handling themselves well. As he might've expected. They were Sandlords, after all.

The sense of urgency abated, and he felt his weariness wash over him again, somehow even stronger than before.

"Ah," said the voice. "Dammit."

Mm?

"Well," the voice went, "I suppose this is fine, for now. You do need your rest. But there are many more scenes like this playing out--and far worse ones. The ruination of our ancestral homeland is a matter that cannot be ignored, forgotten, or forgiven. I would have you recover quickly, Young Lion, and not only rescue our scattered kin but take vengeance for them, as well."

So many words. Agh. Too much to think about.

The voice sighed.

Asad did not understand why.

"If your condition degrades much further, I fear I may need to do something quite drastic."

Degrade? Condition? Was he not resting? How could anything degrade while resting?

"A complicated matter, that. You must stay with me in order to recover, but the longer you stay, the more my soul will merge with yours. Which is not my desire. You must become a conduit for my power, not a vessel for my soul. No matter what anyone says, I am not a god. My flaws are too great and too numerous. I would not have you inherit them.””

"3639

His flaws? Asad still didn't understand. This was all too much. Far, far too much. He wanted to sleep. Or was he already sleeping? Was that not what was meant by resting?

Agh. He'd never felt so tired.

“Oh no. I fear I am failing to restore your strength and instead merely sapping it away. Damn my weakness. Even now, my failures continue to grow.”

Huh?

“This cannot happen. I will not allow it. Come along, Young Lion. You are not ready for where I am about to take you, but I do not see a better option. Clearly, you cannot stay with me, nor can I return you in your current state.”

Ugh, so many new questions were bubbling rebelliously into his exhausted mind. They were going somewhere new? Why? In fact, where were they now? What was wrong with this place?

“We will go to a place that I have found along the path of my great search. I do not know if things will be better or worse for you there, but I promise that I will do my utmost to protect you.”

Protect? From...? Hmm...

The voice sighed. “Alas, our ever-beleaguered kin. I fear you must abide these trials for some time yet.”

--++--++--

The blazing heat of the Undercrust was unfamiliar to him. He'd heard the stories from his cousins about this place, but actually being here for the first time was something else.

If only it had been under better circumstances.

He'd always intended to visit this place eventually, but never had he thought that the first time would be as a result of fleeing for his life.

From the mayhem at the Golden Fort.

Even now, all these weeks later, he still couldn't quite wrap his head around it. Tensions had been building between Sair and Calthos for a while, but it had been so slow. Nothing ever really happened. At least, that was what it had felt like. It was just something that all the adults had been talking about ad nauseum, an ever-present fear that he and the other young Sandlords had grown accustomed to.

Grown to ignore, perhaps.

And then everything went to hell.

The seat of his people's power, the Golden Fortress of Kuros, came under attack by the forces of Calthos and Abolish. By the fabled Mad Demon himself.

In his entire life, Taj Dagher had never been so terrified as he had on that day."

"3640

It had been a complete madhouse. Explosions and earthquakes. Battles breaking out in the middle of crowds. Blood and screaming and running and fighting.

Worse still, he knew now in retrospect that he himself had been among the luckier ones, too. Not only did he manage to escape, but the timing of things could have been far worse for him. He'd only been visiting the Golden Fort for a few days, serving as an apprentice to his much older cousin, who happened to be Lord Hamza's second son. If he hadn't been at the Golden Fort, he would have been back in Zebul, most likely in his little hut along the outskirts of Qalatin Castle.

And Zebul was much closer to the border with Calthos than Kuros was. If things had been that bad at the Golden Fort of all places, then he couldn't even imagine what Qalatin looked like now. He just hoped it was still standing. And that he would see it again, one day.

He'd been trying not to dwell on it too much, though. His reaper, Orolix, had been trying to keep him focused. News would come in time. Whenever they managed to get back up to the surface, most likely. It was more important to stay alert.

Logically, Taj knew the reaper was right. And he tried to listen.

But it was so difficult. He knew only too well that he wasn't the correct person for this job. This wasn't supposed to be his role.

Thus far, Taj had only ever been meant to observe and learn from his more experienced kin. And to do as he was told. Silently.

And most certainly, he had not been meant to end up in the custodianship of Ivan, the Salesman of Death.

But that is exactly what happened. Instead of returning home to Zebul, he'd been tasked with protecting a frozen head and thrown into a giant hole.

Far from ideal, to say the least.

Even now, he still didn't know what had become of his Hahl. Of his cousins or even Lord Hamza himself. The group of people he'd managed to escape with into the Undercrust had been hounded incessantly by Abolish pursuers, and now, there were only a handful of them left.

At this point, he was the most powerful warrior in their little troupe.

Which was terrifying.

His elder cousin, Jafar Dagher, had been the one leading them until only two days ago, when their pursuers had caught up to them again."
"3641

There was an image burned into Taj's brain now. An image of Jafar and his reaper, Karexa, standing there, facing down the enemy alone so that the rest of them could continue fleeing.

He didn't think he would ever forget that man. In fact, if he somehow lived through this, he was going to make his cousin's incredible bravery known to everyone he could. Somehow.

But that was a task for his future self. For now, he was still dedicating all of his effort to surviving their current predicament.

And while he was not one given to looking on the bright side, he knew that things were not yet hopeless. They'd managed to evade their pursuers this long, after all. And that was no fluke. His cousin and the reapers had taught him much about the nature of these sorts of chases.

The core problem, as one might expect, was the enemy reapers. Once they memorize their targets' soul signatures, a chase becomes much more dangerous. It becomes virtually impossible to lose them via hiding spots in the topography, and when they focus, they can sense souls across truly vast distances.

In the face of such problems, the group had been employing various methods of countering. None had worked flawlessly thus far, but there had been downtime here and there. Opportunities to sleep and eat, even. Luxuries for servants in the thick of battle, Orolix said.

Their first method of counter had been to infuse their souls into the environment as much as possible. If the soul power and ardor in the topography were too minuscule to interfere with an enemy reaper's sense, then the solution was to add more. As much as possible. Spread it around and lead them on a wild goose chase. It helped even more when they split up and sent the enemy in different directions.

But splitting up was dangerous, too, of course. And naturally, it couldn't last forever. Infused soul power dissipated over time, and it also took considerable skill to infuse it into objects across larger and larger distances. So in the end, that trick wasn't much use when the enemy reapers were already far away. In fact, it might've just made things worse, like leaving behind a giant trail of blood for them to follow. It was better for confusing the senses of reapers who were already close by.

When they already had more distance to work with, the better method was to hunt down localized sources of ardor. Which, mercifully, the Undercrust had in much greater abundance than the surface. He could understand why the decision was made to flee down here."

"3642

In particular, magma pools were their best friends. The ardor that emanated from those things could sometimes be so strong that it entirely blinded reapers who got too close.

Of course, that also made the pools terribly dangerous for their own reapers. Multiple times, Taj had noticed Orolix visibly hesitate when they were near one. While reapers didn't exactly feel "pain" in the same way that corporeal beings did, they apparently still regarded being incinerated in a pool of magma as quite a horrible way to die.

"Nightmarishly painful, just in a different sense," was how Orolix had described it to him.

He hadn't yet gotten clarification on that. Nor was he even sure that he wanted it.

Beyond that, there was only one other method of hiding that they had been using--and even then, they'd been rather reluctant to do so. Not only was it sometimes ineffective; it was also dangerous, for them and those around them.

Because it involved crowds.

When all else failed, trying to hide their souls among a large group of other souls was an option. Unless a soul was particularly powerful, reapers would often have trouble singling it out, even if they'd already memorized its soul signature.

But of course, if they still managed to--and if they were of Abolish--then a fight would immediately break out, and civilian casualties were all but guaranteed.

Taj and his kin hated resorting to that tactic. They'd been trying to avoid it as much as they could, but it had saved their lives in the city of Karetito. And it had gotten some hapless Hun'Kui passersby killed in the city of Noromonga.

It made for a difficult decision now, because according to Orolix, they were nearing another city called Acacero.

This current network of caves they were in had thus far proved quite barren. No magma pools to try to conceal themselves near, nor any convenient ardor-infused rock formations to provide cover for a while.

And hell, even if there were, the enemy had clearly grown wise to those tricks by now. They wouldn't pass by any magma or large accumulations of ardor without investigating those areas thoroughly. Perhaps that was why their pursuit had seemed to slow for a little while there, as they'd become extra cautious.

Regardless, it wasn't worth the risk. And being the strongest member of this group now, the others were looking to him to make that decision now.

So they kept on toward Acacero, where he suspected that things would either go well or very, very badly."

"3643

It took another full day to get there. Perhaps they could have gone faster if they were taking a more obvious path--one of the bigger tunnels, for example--but they preferred to stick to the narrower ones. The abundance of the ardor in the rock made it more difficult for the enemy to keep track of them here, and if they got lucky, the bastards might even lose track of them completely.

That was the hope, anyway. It hadn't exactly worked out so far.

Taj struggled to keep himself steady. On task. In charge.

There were only five others left, not including each of their reapers, but he could see the way they were all watching him now. Looking to him for leadership.

What a farce. He was barely old enough to withstand the heat down here unaided. He could barely protect himself, let alone anyone else. Four of the others were constantly fighting the heat, perpetually sweating and being clearly uncomfortable. A couple were even in visible pain, having to constantly materialize--or have materialized for them--a cooled metal coating.

The last one, Juda Mateen, was only better off because he'd apparently managed to snag a climate suit for himself before escaping.

At first, there'd been some noticeable resentment toward him from the others. Taj had thought that it was simple jealousy--and perhaps it was, in part--but after listening to an earlier argument, he realized that there was a bit more to it.

Juda wearing that suit meant that a non-servant wasn't wearing it.

In other words, he'd taken the place of a non-combatant who could have potentially escaped down here with them.

But in recent days, that resentment seemed to have died off. And Taj could understand why. If it wasn't clear before, it certainly was now.

Any non-servant that might have taken Juda's suit would almost certainly be dead by now. And they couldn't have afforded to slow down for them, either. If they'd tried, they would've all been killed a long time ago.

Or at least, that was how Taj saw things. Maybe he was overthinking it. Maybe the others were just too tired to fight among themselves now. He certainly wouldn't blame them if that was the case. Even on the rare occasions when they were able to sleep, he never felt rested after waking up."

"3644

Before they even reached Acacero, however, the reapers began giving them warnings about something being strange with the city.

'What in the world am I sensing?' said Orolix publicly.

'I sense it, too,' said Juda's reaper, name of Arigaja. 'What is that? A forest? Impossible. We didn't go in the wrong direction, did we?'

'Even if we had, there still shouldn't be a forest down here. At least, not that kind of forest.'

The uncertainty made little difference, though. Everyone already knew that they couldn't turn back. Whatever was awaiting them in Acacero, they would have to deal with it.

When the city finally came into view, the reapers' questions only seemed to increase.

The cave let out onto a ledge with a narrow, winding path that led down onto a major road below. But the view that the ledge provided was truly something else. Taj's hazel eyes widened as he absorbed the scene before them.

It did indeed appear to be a forest in the middle of the city, trees as tall as any of the buildings. But they glowed green and white, illuminating the greater cavern in which the city sat, revealing many other tunnels high up on the walls and even in the ceiling.

There were great rocky pillars, too, but they were less apparent than in the previous cities they'd passed through. These ones were adorned with more glowing foliage, and not all of them reached all the way up to the ceiling, either. Some of them merely plateaued higher up and had buildings of their own on top of them.

In fact, one plateau in particular was more noticeable than the rest. Right there in the center of the city, it didn't rise as high as the others, but an enormous structure sat upon it. What was that? A stadium? No.

He had to squint at this distance, but he could see turreted towers. Long banners hanging from battlements.

That was a fortress. A palace, even.

The trees all around its exterior made it luminous and verdant, the vibrant centerpiece of the entire city.

'...This city is not how I remember it,' said Arigaja.

'I've never seen this type of flora in the Undercrust,' said one of the other reapers, name of Elbadon.

Taj was as confused as anyone, but his mind was still consumed with a sense of urgency. "We can't stand around here gawking," he said, starting down the pathway. "Let's go see things up close."

"3645

As they descended the steps and neared the edge of the city, Taj began to feel a change in the air. And smell it, too.

This familiar freshness. It wasn't quite the same as being back up on the surface, but it was definitely much more comparable to it. Thus far, the Undercrust's air had been, at best, stagnant and stale. At worst, it had been filled with deadly fumes that threatened to burn his eyes out of his skull and his lungs out of his chest.

And for a few of the others in their group, those fumes had succeeded in doing both. More than once, even.

But this place. This feeling. It was hard to call it comforting when the temperature was still so damn high, but after everything they'd been through lately, he couldn't think of a more appropriate word.

If nothing else, it was certainly a welcome surprise. Almost like the city itself was inviting them in.

The first proper street that they found seemed to be empty. No Hun'Kui in sight yet.

That was both good and bad, Taj felt. Good because it meant no one was barring them entry and bad because it meant there were no crowds to hide in. They had to keep pushing. Acacero wouldn't make for very good cover if they couldn't find anyone.

Whatever had caused the city look like this, Taj prayed to the Eternal Oasis that it hadn't made all the inhabitants evacuate.

'Can you sense anyone in these buildings?' asked Taj privately.

'They are infused with ardor, so no,' said Orolix. 'And these trees are not helping, either. Everything is so clouded.'

Not what he wanted to hear.

The number of trees only seemed to be increasing as they continued onward. Denser and denser forest. Soon, he could see the root systems taking over the ground. Where before it had been only rock and pavement, now roots covered the ground.

And yet it was not entirely gnarled and uneven. The edges of the road were indeed so, but the middle remained perfectly smooth and flat. Maybe even more than before. Little saplings were sprouting along the edges, too, providing an extra line of illumination for the road.

In spite of himself, Taj slowed his pace a bit in order to inspect the wall of glowing trees more closely. And he saw something peculiar. Or thought he did, at least.

The lights made it hard to tell, but he could've sworn the bark had a slight sheen to it. The metallic kind. But there was clearly wood in there, too. He could see that much. And even feel it, upon reaching out and touching it."

"3646

‘You shouldn’t go touching strange materials,’ said Orolix, still wrapped in the echo of privacy. ‘These trees could be dangerous.’

He supposed that was true, but it was a bit late to be fussing over it. He gripped the tree a little harder. Yeah. Definitely felt like there was metal in there. ‘This town could be an even better hiding spot than we hoped for,’ he said, not taking his eyes away from the greenery. ‘All the buildings and trees will conceal us from the enemy.’

‘True,’ said Orolix. ‘But that may also make things much worse for the people here. If our pursuers have proved one thing to us, it is that they are not going to give up. If they truly lose track of us, I have no doubt that they will begin to tear this place apart until they find us again.’

Damn. Couldn’t really argue with that logic. And this group wasn’t exactly in a position to protect the hapless citizenry, either.

As they continued onward, deeper into the city, Taj wrestled with his uncertainty.

Agh. What should they be doing here? Hiding might work for a little while, but it clearly wasn’t a long-term solution. He tried to think. He’d had discussed their objective with Orolix repeatedly on the way here--just as the reapers had discussed it with each other--and it was clear enough that they needed to get topside again, but how were they to accomplish that, precisely?

The reapers knew of various great holes that led back up to the surface, but actually reaching them was another matter. Not to mention, the closest ones were also the most dangerous. There was apparently one that led up to the Swallow’s Nest in Egas, but did they really want to return to Sair, right now? Certainly not. That would be a death sentence, unless they somehow got confirmation that Egas had not been overrun by Abolish.

Furthermore, according to the reapers, the chances of finding a great hole that was not already under someone’s control were virtually nil. And since all of the holes that the Sandlords controlled could not be trusted, it was not going to be a simple matter to secure safe passage through one.

But he supposed that was a starting point, at least. If they were going to have to parley with or beg someone powerful in order to get back up to the surface, then the first task was to find such a person, no?"

"3647

And to that end, that big fortress in the middle of the city might've been their best bet.

After a while longer of letting his thoughts stew in his own mind, he decided to make clear his intentions to the others.

None argued with his reasoning, not even the reapers.

Now they just needed to find a way up there. A materialized platform would certainly do the trick, but that would also make quite the spectacle. Taj didn't want to resort to that just yet. There had to be a method by which normal citizens could reach that palace.

Or maybe not.

Even as they began to near the base of the grand plateau on which their new objective sat, they still did not encounter a single soul. The overgrown streets had ample space for enormous crowds, yet they remained entirely empty.

It made him uneasy. Perhaps they really had evacuated. And if so, why? What in the world had happened here?

Finally, something caught his eye at the base of the massive plateau. A tunnel. It was narrower than the street but still large enough for vehicles to enter. Perhaps it would lead them to a lift or staircase, though he already wasn't looking forward to making such a trek on foot. That had to be, what? Two hundred meters? He'd seen skyscrapers that weren't as tall as this plateau.

Oh, man.

Nothing for it, though. They had to go.

Before they could reach the tunnel, however, Orolix's urgent voice rang out publicly. 'Behind us!'

Taj turned just in time to see a steaming, car-sized boulder clobber one of his companions. He didn't have time to panic, either, because he could already see another one coming for him.

Rather than trying to dodge, he instantly dropped to the ground and slapped it with his right hand, materializing a metal slope for the boulder to launch off of.

Which it did. It sailed straight into the rock wall of the plateau behind them and bounced off, leaving only a scuff mark behind.

Taj had grown quite familiar with such boulders over the course of this long chase. It was composed of the element gallium, which had a low enough melting point that the boulder couldn't hold its shape for long here in the Undercrust.

Which might've seemed like a good thing, but it made these fights extra messy the longer they drew out, with liquid gallium splashing all over the place."

"3648

And that was no trivial matter, because in every previous encounter, this enemy--whose name he still did not know--had used the splashing to conceal further attacks. The freshly melted gallium would be cool to the touch and largely harmless, but when they tossed some boiling hot gallium into the mix, too, it became much more difficult to simply ignore the splashing.

Not to mention, against Taj's aluminum materialization--and many other metals for that matter--gallium had a corrosive effect. Normally, such corrosion required considerable time to take effect--days or weeks--but whoever was wielding it now was able to enhance its reactive properties, causing embrittlement to occur within seconds.

Taj knew they had to flee. These attacks were just from one of their pursuers, who'd apparently grown confident enough to not even bother waiting for their comrades to catch up. He could see the figure in the distance, surging toward them on a moving platform from far down the street.

Taj raised a large aluminum wall. It wouldn't stop them, of course, but it would block their sight, at least. While there was only one enemy to worry about, their odds of escape were still good. He grabbed one of the others by the hand, shouted for everyone to follow, and began sprinting for the open tunnel.

Going in there was a risk. If it was a dead end, then they would be forced to fight their way back out again. So to help mitigate that danger, he raised more walls behind them as he ran, making sure to provide plenty of space between each one so as not to accidentally trap any of his kin.

He aimed to create a maze, to further obstruct the enemy's vision. If it worked, then their pursuer might not even realize that they'd gone into the tunnel for quite some time, which was all they really needed, right now: time.

Great crashing sounds arrived from behind him, which was probably from his materialized walls getting destroyed. He thought he could hear even more than that, though, like that of buildings collapsing. He couldn't afford to turn around and look, though. The walls were obscuring his vision, and even if something really important was going on back there, Orolix would warn him.

Before they could reach the tunnel, however, an alarm blared. Its ear-splitting pitch was enough to make Taj flinch and stagger, and he was not the only one. He could see his kin doing the same--and even the reapers, too, writhing in the air."

"3649

And before anyone could recover, an earthquake arrived.

From there, Taj lost track of what was happening. His feet no longer touched the ground. Rocks flew up around him. Something passed by his vision. A hulking thing, the size of a bus. And there was a loud voice in the air, but it was distorted as through a bullhorn, and he couldn't make out what it was saying in the slightest. Whether that was because of said distortion or because the voice was simply speaking an entirely foreign language, he also could not tell.

But he did get plenty of time to think about it, because he abruptly found himself stuck fast, suspended in midair and unable to move any of his limbs.

He didn't understand. Was this Abolish's doing? It took a few more moments of futile struggling before he realized that he wasn't merely stuck: there was something wrapped around him. Something huge and serpentine.

Something breathing.

It made a low noise, too. An almost clicking sound. Repeating, too.

Where had the alarm gone? He didn't hear it, anymore. A new voice arrived, however. This one was much crisper, though he still could not understand what it was saying.

It was coming from above, which made him look up to see a Hun'Kui man there, sitting atop whatever this... hulking thing was. The man was shouting at him, and Taj had no idea how to respond, so he merely said nothing.

Then the aluminum maze that Taj had been building came crashing down as another gallium boulder flew through multiple walls.

Another hulking serpent appeared in Taj's vision and blocked the flying boulder before it got any closer.

Taj still didn't understand. It had blocked it with its body--and been no worse for wear, seemingly.

Then, finally, as he saw the boulder be quickly absorbed into the monster's body, he realized that these were not serpents at all.

These were worms.

He'd never seen one before, but he'd certainly heard the stories. There were countless different types of them. The more infamous and terrifying ones were supposedly like gargantuan mountains of sludge, but these ones here, while still quite large, seemed much more normal. He could feel its coarse flesh against his own. It did feel rather sticky and gross, but it certainly wasn't sludge.

The worm holding him began to move, and so he went along for the ride."

"3650

He got a surprisingly good view of the action from this strange position. He couldn't comprehend how this giant thing was able to move so fast with part of its body still coiled around him. It felt like speeding down the road on a motorcycle, and when yet another gallium boulder came flying toward them, the worm's long tail surged forward and spiked it right back at the attacker like a volleyball.

They'd gotten close enough now for Taj to make out the look of surprise on the Abolish servant's face just before his own boulder clobbered him. The rock dug into the road and stuck there, hissing with steam.

If the Abolisher was still alive under there, then he would probably need a while to recover and dig himself free, but apparently, he wasn't going to get that much time.

A third worm appeared from over the line buildings along the right side of the street and went straight for the embedded boulder, coiling around it and smothering it. He could see another Hun'Kui riding atop it.

And Taj squinted, because he again found himself questioning what his eyes were telling him. A dark ooze emerged from the worm's body, coating the rock and seeping down into in the road.

Was that the fabled sludge? It must've been. So even though these worms were smaller, they could still generate sludge like the bigger ones.

He was both fascinated and repulsed.

A string of explosions arrived from down the road, along with a flurry of flaming acid and flying material. They pelted the oozing worm that was presumably trying to retrieve and capture the buried servant.

Taj saw the new attackers. They were still rather far away, but they must have been the rest of the Abolishers, having finally caught up.

The attacks seemed largely ineffectual against the preoccupied worm, but they still did not last very long, as Taj saw worms with riders appear over the building and convene on the enemy. Within moments, the servants were being jackhammered into the ground and smothered.

It didn't take much longer before they were restrained, much like himself.

And Taj was finally beginning to get the picture. These worm riders were some kind of peacekeeping force here. And clearly quite powerful.

The rider for his worm was talking to him again, this time with less intensity."

"3651

Taj reached out to his reaper. 'Orolix? Where are you?'

'I made it to the tunnel. I'm hiding. What's your status?'

'I've been captured by the locals. They're talking to me, but I can't understand their language.'

'I see.'

And Taj waited, but the reaper said nothing more. 'I sure could use a translator over here, Orolix...'

'Hmm.'

'Orolix...'

'Taj.'

'You're not abandoning me, right?'

'Of course not.'

And Taj waited again for elaboration which never arrived. 'You're abandoning me.'

'I'm not. I'm tactically retreating in order to get help and rescue you later. So just hang in there until I return.'

Taj took a deep breath and sighed. The worm rider was still talking to him, and he was still not understanding a single word. He could see the other worm riders moving closer now, having apparently mopped up the Abolishers already.

Yep. He'd never learned the names of the Abolishers, but he could certainly recognize their faces, and now they were all stuck fast in moving prisons of worm flesh, just like him. They didn't look too happy about it, either, with a couple of them shouting and yelling at their respective riders.

'The locals have captured the Abolish servants, too,' said Taj. 'Orolix, if they can speak Hunese, they can lie to these guys and convince them that we're in the wrong.'

'Doubtful. I'm sure the Hun'Kui could tell who the aggressors were in that fight. You didn't even attack anyone.'

The reaper was grasping at excuses now, Taj felt. 'I don't think these Hun'Kui will hurt you, Orolix.'

'Better to not take the risk.'

The worst part was, he knew the reaper had a point. It wasn't exactly pleasant, but this was the safest course of action for them.

But not necessarily for everyone else. 'If they take Ivan's head from me and free him, it won't be good for anyone. I at least need someone who can tell them not to do that.'

'Mrgh...'

The group started moving in unison. Taj strained to see if any of the other reapers had been captured, but he couldn't tell for sure. There were even more worms present than he'd first thought, and their hulking bodies were blocking much of his view. They seemed to be heading toward the big plateau, though, so maybe this wasn't the worst thing in the world.

'Okay, I'll teach you a simple Hunese phrase you can say,' said Orolix.

Of course. Taj just sighed again."

"3652 -- CCCI.

Chapter Three Hundred One: 'Gentle listener, prepare thy Path...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector was anxious. At this point, it was starting to seem like the reports from Vantalay were being purposely designed to test his patience. The Rainlords kept saying that they would be returning soon. Soon. Always soon.

Apparently, they'd encountered another Vanguardian field marshal, this one named Graves, but things had worked out with the guy. It was nothing to worry about. Everything was under control.

Supposedly.

The more they told him that, the less inclined he was to believe it.

Not to mention, they'd consulted him for his opinion about an offer from the freaking Monster of the East--who'd apparently popped over there, too. But no, it was fine. Nothing to worry about. They hadn't accepted that offer.

But now there was a new offer, this one from Graves. And they'd decided to stay a bit longer.

And Zeff was still missing, of course.

Ugh.

But what was he to do about any of it? He couldn't justify leaving Warrenhold, right now. Not with Bloodeye still being a factor. While it seemed unlikely that another attack would arrive, they couldn't simply assume that it wouldn't. Especially if Bloodeye somehow caught wind that Hector had left the country. That might just provoke an attack all on its own.

Or at least, that was Garovel's reasoning. And Hector found it difficult to disagree with him.

He hated feeling so powerless. So uncertain. He much preferred when Warrenhold felt like a place of comfort for him, not when it was starting to make him worried and stir crazy.

He could make some trips out to Lorent, though, especially to talk to Abbas about his progress with the Candle. The Sunsmith had been working on it whenever Hector visited--and sometimes looking exhausted to the point of collapse.

More than once, Hector had all but forced the man to take a break and have a meal with him.

"Thank you for doing this again," said Raheem Saqqaf, one of Abbas' many sons. "And I apologize for him. I know this must be a hassle for you."

"Don't worry about it," said Hector. They were standing outside together on a grassy hill, a short distance away from the great tree that housed Cocora's Candle. "How's he been doing?"

Raheem looked toward the tree with a heavy breath. "He's still hardly letting anyone into the workshop with him. For our own safety, he says. But he looks more haggard by the day. I am not sure he is even sleeping."

"3652 -- CCCI.

Chapter Three Hundred One: 'Gentle listener, prepare thy Path...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector was anxious. At this point, it was starting to seem like the reports from Vantalay were being purposely designed to test his patience. The Rainlords kept saying that they would be returning soon. Soon. Always soon.

Apparently, they'd encountered another Vanguardian field marshal, this one named Graves, but things had worked out with the guy. It was nothing to worry about. Everything was under control.

Supposedly.

The more they told him that, the less inclined he was to believe it.

Not to mention, they'd consulted him for his opinion about an offer from the freaking Monster of the East--who'd apparently popped over there, too. But no, it was fine. Nothing to worry about. They hadn't accepted that offer.

But now there was a new offer, this one from Graves. And they'd decided to stay a bit longer.

And Zeff was still missing, of course.

Ugh.

But what was he to do about any of it? He couldn't justify leaving Warrenhold, right now. Not with Bloodeye still being a factor. While it seemed unlikely that another attack would arrive, they couldn't simply assume that it wouldn't. Especially if Bloodeye somehow caught wind that Hector had left the country. That might just provoke an attack all on its own.

Or at least, that was Garovel's reasoning. And Hector found it difficult to disagree with him.

He hated feeling so powerless. So uncertain. He much preferred when Warrenhold felt like a place of comfort for him, not when it was starting to make him worried and stir crazy.

He could make some trips out to Lorent, though, especially to talk to Abbas about his progress with the Candle. The Sunsmith had been working on it whenever Hector visited--and sometimes looking exhausted to the point of collapse.

More than once, Hector had all but forced the man to take a break and have a meal with him.

"Thank you for doing this again," said Raheem Saqqaf, one of Abbas' many sons. "And I apologize for him. I know this must be a hassle for you."

"Don't worry about it," said Hector. They were standing outside together on a grassy hill, a short distance away from the great tree that housed Cocora's Candle. "How's he been doing?"

Raheem looked toward the tree with a heavy breath. "He's still hardly letting anyone into the workshop with him. For our own safety, he says. But he looks more haggard by the day. I am not sure he is even sleeping."

"3653

"I'll have another talk with him," said Hector, making for the tree. He was wearing his darker armor with the standard gray iron coating that allowed him to still fly in it, but as he neared the entrance, he let the coating melt away with dematerialization. One of the other reasons for his semi-frequent visits to this place was to get Abbas to examine this strange new material. Thus far, results had been largely inconclusive with Abbas telling him to come back in a few days.

Haqq Najir, of course, had not stopped pressuring him to buy new, incredibly expensive scientific equipment in order to supposedly make that examination process easier. At first, Hector had thought the man was simply spouting lies in order to get some cool new toys to play with--and in fact, he still thought that--but given how much trouble even the Lord Abbas Saqqaf was apparently having with determining what this stuff was made of... well, maybe Haqq wasn't completely full of shit.

He still wasn't planning on blowing that much money on it, though.

He pushed on the door to open it, but it hardly budged.

Huh.

Strange.

Abbas had installed a modern doorknob and locking mechanism shortly after their discovery of the place, but this was the first time Hector had noticed Abbas actually bothering to use it, probably because he was always here, anyway.

He tried turning the knob, only to realize it actually wasn't locked. It turned just fine, and yet the door still barely moved.

Raheem was approaching from behind. "Apologies. I forgot to mention that he seems to have barricaded himself in this time. We didn't want to break into your property without your permission, lord."

What the hell? Why would Abbas barricade the door?

This didn't seem right. There must've been something else going on here.

Hector concentrated on what the Scarf could tell about what was going on behind this door.

Whoa.

"...He didn't barricade the door," said Hector. "At least, not with furniture."

"Lord? What do you mean?"

“The room is overgrown with plants,” said Hector. “They’re everywhere.” He was trying to sense Abbas’ shape, but the chamber was such a tangled mess of branches and vines and leaves that he was having trouble.

Then he realized the other reason why it was so difficult.

Abbas was on the floor, not moving.

“Shit!” Hector took a quick step backward, gently pushing Raheem out of the way as he revved up a bladed disc into orbit around himself. He added heat to it, wanting it almost molten, and then he loosed it on the door.”

"3654

The red-hot blade cut through the solid wood and branches behind it, flying upward in one clean stroke and leaving a smoldering crevice in its wake. It went higher than he’d intended and gouged its way up through the rest of the trunk and canopy as well, but he was of no mind to worry about that, right now.

But apparently, Raheem was. “Lord, you set the sacred tree on fire!”

Aw, fuck. “Er, take care of that for me, please!” Hector pushed through the breach in the door with his armor and created a man-sized hole for himself. More branches barred his path, but they were similarly weakened and able to be walked through with brute force.

The branches were less dense near the great orb, instead replaced by an overabundance of snaking vines.

Vines which were moving, he noticed. They lashed against his armor, leaving behind a sticky residue that slowed him down--and stunk, too. It smelled so foul that he thought he might vomit. He choked as he tried to hold his breath and not gag, but then his eyes started to burn, too.

Thankfully, Garovel was still cozied up inside his armor from the flight over here.

‘Can you numb my sense of smell for me?’ thought Hector.

‘Uh. That’s an unusual one, but yeah, I think so. Lemme try.’

‘Pain, too, please,’ he said through his searing tears.

Then it was gone, and he could breathe again. He could also feel his throat and eyes tingling with a very familiar sensation that he felt whenever dealing with acid, but at least it didn’t hurt. It sure would later, though.

The vines were still being a problem, however. And now that he could breathe and think more clearly, he had an idea.

“Candle!” he shouted angrily. “It’s me! I know you can understand me! I’m not here to hurt you! Let me reach Abbas! I need to check on him!”

And it took a moment, but to his surprise, the writhing vines began to slacken and then settle down entirely.

He was still covered in goo, though, and had to trudge the rest of the way toward the Lord Saqqaf as if he were suddenly a hundred pounds heavier thanks to how sticky it was. He realized that he probably could have dematerialized his armor safely and then immediately rematerialized it, but he wanted to play it safe, just in case the Candle decided to go berserk again.

He also figured that he would owe it an apology after this, but that could wait."

"3655

When he finally reached Abbas, he confirmed that the man was indeed unconscious. Moreover, he saw that his reaper, Worwal, was right there alongside him, reduced to a formless puddle on the floor.

He knew it was not typically a good idea to move people with unknown injuries, but this was a servant and reaper, and he was worried that this environment could have been draining their soul power or something.

‘Sucking their souls out of their still-living bodies’ was how Abbas had once described it to him.

So he grabbed them both. With some vigor from Garovel, he hoisted the Lord Saqqaf over his shoulder and brought him and Worwal outside, where he laid them both down on the open grass.

He looked over and saw Raheem taking care of the fire as requested, having bounded up the tree like a leopard in order to smother the flames with the thick robe that he had been wearing.

Huh. Did the man not have a better way of dealing with fire? Ah, wait, no, that made sense. He recalled that Raheem's power was also materialization, but it was potassium. If he'd tried to use that, it might've set the whole tree ablaze.

The man seemed to be managing just fine, though. Only a bit of smoke remained, and Raheem was already patting his blackened robe down. More Saqqafs were running up to the tree as well.

They'd set up an encampment for themselves not terribly far away, concealed by the edge of the Imara Forest. Abbas had wanted to stay close to the Candle but also remain hidden from any unexpected visitors.

The various Saqqafs divided themselves between the tree and Hector. He recognized one of Abbas' granddaughters, Ghaliya, approaching first. She was a mature woman with only a few lines among her smooth features and a bit of gray in her otherwise brown hair. All in all, she looked older than Abbas, which must have been a strange feeling.

She asked after her grandfather's well-being, of course, to which Hector had no real answers. She bade him carry them both over to the encampment, and Hector did so.

He did not stay long, however. Abbas seemed to be out cold, and judging by Worwal's visibly concerning condition, the two of them would not be waking for a while.

For now, he wanted to check on the Candle's condition. When he returned to it, he found the Saqqafs gathered outside, discussing their options."

"3656

Raheem seemed relieved upon seeing Hector approaching. "Lord Goffe. How would you like us to proceed? I do not think my father would want us venturing in there without him, even if only to investigate what happened."

"He told us endlessly how dangerous it was," said Munir at Raheem's side. Munir was much younger, though it hardly showed by appearance alone. "We should wait for him to wake up before doing anything rash."

"We cannot just sit here," said Jibril, the balding man on their right. He was even younger than the others--a great-great grandson of Abbas, as Hector recalled--and yet he looked older than everyone here. "Didn't you see the state Worwal was in? They will be out for days, at least."

Hector could understand their reticence, especially after seeing what had happened to Abbas, but he was already in agreement with Jibril here. "It's alright," said Hector. "I'll go in first. I already have a... rapport with the Candle. Wait for my word before following."

Raheem returned a nod. "As you say, lord."

Munir seemed less certain, however. "And what if you also fall unconscious, Lord Goffe?"

"He won't," said Jibril. "He already went in there once to retrieve him."

"Briefly, yes," said Munir, "but we have no idea what prolonged exposure may do. If you are to go, lord, then you should not be alone."

"Hmm," hummed Hector. The man might've had a point. But Hector really didn't want to put any of them at risk when the situation was still so uncertain. "Alright, here's what I'll do: I'll go in alone, but I'll keep a materialized orb hovering outside the door. As long it remains hovering, you'll know I'm still conscious. Sound good?"

And Munir took a moment, but he nodded, as did the others.

Jibril reached into a pouch inside his robe and pulled out a radio, handing it to Hector. "This probably won't be necessary, but take it just in case."

Hector did so. And without further ado, he walked over to the open hole where the door used to be and reentered the tree on his own. Privately, he asked Garovel if he wanted to wait outside with the others, but the reaper refused, of course.

'I actually feel safest inside this spiffy new armor of yours,' the reaper told him.

Hector didn't argue. Without knowing more about what they were dealing with here, it was anyone's guess what the safest course of action really was."

"3657

Inside the tree again, he took his time. It wasn't making him feel any different compared to outside, and now that he'd refreshed his armor to get rid of the goo, it was much easier to move around in here, too.

The overgrown branches were still a problem, though--even moreso now, because he was reluctant to cut a swath through them, in case they were in some way important to the Candle itself. Which reminded him.

"Uh. Hey there, Candle, um... sorry about before. I didn't mean to hurt you. I was just trying to reach Abbas quickly."

As ever, the Candle remained silent.

He hadn't actually expected it to respond with noise, but some wiggling vines or branches wouldn't have been out of the question. No such answer arrived, however.

Hmm. Was that a good or bad thing, he wondered? Because it seemed kind of bad.

Having spent so long inside that strange space with it, learning from it and about it, he felt a certain connection to it now. Granted, he hadn't actually communicated with it since returning to the real world.

In fact, now that he was thinking about it, that moment when it settled down had been the first time. He'd been talking to it like crazy during that so-called "soul coma," but ever since waking up, he hadn't talked to it at all. He hadn't even really tried, either. He'd just taught Abbas everything he'd learned about its operation.

Maybe that was a problem.

"Candle," Hector tried again as he pushed through the opening in the branches toward where Abbas had been, "I'm also sorry that I haven't been talking to you more during my visits. I hope you haven't been unhappy here."

Did Fusions Forges actually feel happiness or lack thereof? He had no fucking clue. It didn't seem outside the realm of possibility, though.

There was still no response.

He neared the big glass globe at the center of the room. Vines were draped all over it, almost like curtains, to the point where he couldn't quite see inside. He thought he spotted something, though, in between the gaps, but he had to get even closer first, which was difficult with the gnarled branches everywhere.

"...Did you and Abbas make something new?" asked Hector.

And at that, a shiver ran down the vines along the globe, as if a slight breeze had arrived from nowhere.

Huh. "...Can you show me?"

"3658

The branches directly in front of him shivered, then stretched themselves to create an opening for him--some to the point of even snapping apart and falling to the floor.

"Ah, geez," said Hector as he moved through the hole, "don't hurt yourself on my account."

The branches formed a narrow tunnel for him, arching around the great orb until leading him over to it.

He remembered seeing Agrian, one of the forge's two creators, standing here and working with it. This was the spot where the orb could open itself up and reveal its contents.

During all the time he'd observed Agrian using the Candle, he'd never seen this kind of overgrown state from the forge. He had to wonder what prompted it.

Well, clearly, even if Abbas succeeded in creating a powerful new artifact, some part of this must not have been intentional. Abbas wouldn't have been trying to exhaust himself and end up unconscious. So perhaps all these vines and branches were merely the result of things going a bit haywire at the end.

It might also make sense as to why he'd never seen Agrian end up in a state like this. Agrian's main problem, by Hector's estimation, was that the Candle itself ended up turning on him. Over time, it simply refused to work for him, anymore. Its power never went out of control for Agrian, probably because the Candle never allowed the man much access to its power in the first place.

Hmm.

Thinking about it like that was a little exciting, Hector felt. And worrying, too. Because if that was correct, then it would mean that the Lord Abbas Saqqaf had already accessed more power from the Candle than Agrian ever did. In fact, given the state of things, Abbas may have accessed more power than even he himself realized existed within the forge.

He remembered Abbas telling him about the Candle's "disposition." About its gentle nature. Calm and warm with an affinity for flame, not unlike a crackling fireplace.

As a perfectly straight crevice appeared in the great orb and the drooping green vines all trembled around the opening glass, Hector had to wonder what Abbas might say about the Candle's disposition now. If his opinion might have changed at all. Or if the Candle itself had changed, perhaps. That didn't seem impossible, either, at this point.

He stepped through the opening and pushed away the vines in order to finally get a clear view of the object waiting therein.

It was entangled on a pedestal of branches, and he still couldn't quite tell what he was looking at. Some sort of lamp? And was that a flame encased inside it? A lantern, then?"

"3659

Huh.

It was still concealed a bit by the branches, but it seemed quite small--and not terribly intimidating, either, when considering the state of Lord Abbas and the giant mess around here. Perhaps he'd allowed his expectations to build up a bit too much. Abbas was still relatively new to using the Candle, after all.

But this lantern. He remembered seeing Agrian make a lantern, too, actually. That one had looked quite different. Bigger, darkly metallic, and more rectangular, almost like an entire suitcase. This one was more like a snow globe in size--and a small one, too--barely big enough to fit in the palm of one's hand.

In fact... it looked rather like a tiny version of the great glass orb that had created it.

Which gave Hector pause. Hmm.

During his last few visits with Abbas, they'd discussed the man's work a bit. Naturally, with the Sunsmith looking so disheveled each time Hector showed up, the subject of why the guy was pushing so hard had come up.

And repeatedly, the answer had been that Abbas wanted to retake Sair as soon as possible. Which was fair enough, Hector thought. So Hector had stopped asking about it, more or less.

But there'd been one time when the answer had been a bit more elaborate than that. And now that Hector was looking at this object in front of them, he was beginning to think about that answer more.

"...It is my hope," Abbas had told him, "to establish an entirely new class of armored warriors. Warriors who will not require reapers in order to stand up and protect our land and our people. That has always been my end goal, ever since I began drafting up plans for my prototype suit."

Hector had blinked at that revelation. "You mean... you want to mass-produce your armor?"

"Ah. Well, that would be quite a few steps into the future. I do not know about that. Perhaps. At the moment, my foremost concern is rendering it usable by non-servants. My armor, if you have not already been able to tell, drills directly into my brain in order to establish a neural link. Obviously, this is only possible because I am a servant. Before any other strides can be made, I must find a way to change this."

And now, as he stepped closer to the wooden pedestal, sizing it up, Hector wondered how in the world a lantern might've been meant to address that problem. Or if it even was meant to. Maybe Abbas had pivoted and made something completely different.

That seemed unlikely, though. Knowing Abbas as he now did, that man did not strike Hector as the type to get distracted or change his mind very easily."

"3660

The gnarled pedestal cracked and then began to shrink, slowly retracting itself into the ground as it revealed the item more fully.

And gradually, Hector saw that there wasn't just a little glass globe. It also had a cord wrapped around it in an X-pattern, connecting the orb to a round metal band.

Which confused Hector further.

A tiny orb with a flame flickering inside. And a little circular hoop. What in the world was this thing supposed to do?

He probably shouldn't touch it. In fact, he knew he shouldn't.

But then again...

Abbas was unconscious and would likely remain so for at least a few days. And Hector wasn't about to let anyone else do something this stupid, so that would mean they would all have to remain in the dark about whatever this thing was until Abbas finally woke up and explained it to them.

Or he could just touch it and find out, right now. Maybe.

This was Abbas and the Candle's creation, after all. They wouldn't make something that could rip his soul out through his asshole or anything, right?

Hmm...

'Whatcha thinkin' there, buddy?' came Garovel's echoing question.

And Hector hesitated. Because he had a rather strong feeling that if he explained what was going through his head right now, then Garovel was actually not going to be the voice of reason here and tell him not to do it.

The reaper was gonna tell him to touch the hell out of that shit, wasn't he?

'...I'm just wondering what to do now,' said Hector. 'I, uh... I probably shouldn't touch this thing until we know more about it, right?'

'Probably,' said Garovel.

And Hector just remained there, awkwardly standing in silence.

Apparently, Garovel couldn't bear it for very long. 'Or...' The thought went unfinished, though.

Not that Hector needed it to be. 'I shouldn't...'

'Of course not. Definitely. You're right. Let's just. Let it sit there. For the next week or so... taunting us with its mysteries...'

Hector exhaled a curt breath. 'Hold on. You're inside my armor. Can you even see this thing?'

'Oh, I found some nice little cracks to peer through. The slits you made in the faceguard in front of your mouth are actually quite helpful, because everywhere else is so closely fitted together that, if I didn't know better, I might've thought you somehow made this suit airtight.'

'Ah...'

'Anyway, touch it.'

'Garovel...'

'Go on. I'm sure it'll be fine.'"

"3661

'I swear you used to be the responsible one in this relationship,' said Hector. 'What ever happened to that, huh?'

'Well, yeah, in the beginning, I had to be. You didn't know shit about shit. I had to take care of you. Or try my best to, at least. But now that you're all sauced up and weirdly powerful, it actually frees me up to be my truest self, unburdened by things like worry for our combined well-being. Great, right?'

'I know you're being funny right now, but you're also just... telling the truth, aren't you?'

'They say jokes are funniest when they have a vein of truth to them.'

'Rrgh...'

'C'mon! Touch that shit. I know you want to.'

Hector shook his head. But he also reached his hand out. 'Why am I so stupid...?'

'Many a time throughout history, genius has been indistinguishable from stupidity.'

'Oh, really? Well, this is definitely not one of those times.' And his gauntlet made contact with the small globe.

Nothing happened.

'C'mon, we went over this with the mirror at the Gate. You gotta touch it with your bare hands.'

Inside his helmet, Hector's brow flattened, as did his mouth. 'As I recall, you told me to do that, and then it made no difference whatsoever.'

'Your recollection must be flawed, then.'

'Nope.'

'Hector, please. Leave the remembering of things to a professional. And do as I command of you, my loyal servant.'

'Oh, shut up.' He did dematerialize his right gauntlet, however. He braced himself, then pressed his bare hand against the orb.

A few long beats passed.

'...Anything?' asked Garovel.

'Uh. Well, it's warm.'

'How thrilling.'

'There is something weird here, though.'

‘Oh?’

‘Er, uh, not like with my senses or anything. It’s just that... I mean, the flame inside the orb is completely encased. There’s no hole for oxygen to get in, so how is it burning?’

‘Ah.’

‘Can ardor do that? Maintain a flame without oxygen?’

‘Dunno. Maybe the cord is letting oxygen in.’

Hector picked the orb up to inspect it more closely. As far as he could tell, the cord didn’t seem like a hollow tube. To the touch, it felt more like rope or string. And the metal band that it was connected to looked about as simple as could be. Featureless steel.

‘Hmm.’ Hector held up the band next, eyeing it closely. ‘Maybe I’m supposed to wear this? Like a bracelet or something?’”

"3662

‘That’s as good an idea as any,’ said Garovel. ‘Give it a try.’

Hector slipped his bare hand through the band. It was quite loose around his wrist, however, which made him think that this wasn’t quite right.

But then the band shrunk.

It fit snugly around his wrist. So snugly, in fact, that he couldn’t slide it back off.

“Uh-oh.”

‘Wow, did you fuck it up, already?’

‘I might’ve...’

‘Well, before we resort to chopping your arm off, why don’t you just take a moment to reassess? How are you feeling, right now?’

Hector shrugged. ‘Fine, I guess. No different.’

‘Hmm. And your senses? Your concentration? You could try focusing.

Or meditating.'

'I could,' said Hector with a bob of his head. 'I've got a different idea, though.' He took a breath and held his wrist up. "Hey, Candle, can you show me how to use this thing?"

And they waited, but no response arrived.

'Damn,' thought Hector. 'Guess that would've been too easy.'

'It was worth a try. You keep reminding me that the Candle has a mind of its own, and yet somehow, I keep forgetting. It just doesn't seem possible, but I guess that's the whole thing about Fusion Forges. Doing the impossible. Maybe you should try asking it something else. Something a little easier.'

Easier, huh? "...Can you show me how to activate it, at least?"

Still no response arrived, however.

'That wasn't much better, Hector. In fact, that was almost the same question.'

'Look, man, I don't know what I'm doing here.'

'I can tell. Why don't you just ask it to wake Abbas up for us while you're at it?'

A beat passed as Hector chewed on that. "Hey, Candle, could you wake Abbas up for us? And, er, heal Worwal, too?"

A response did not arrive for that, either.

'Hector, I was joking. There was no way that was going to work.'

'Yeah, but I mean... what if it did, though? You were just talking about how forges can do the impossible.'

'I feel like your expectations for the Candle are increasing with each new sentence out of your mouth.'

'It's called keeping an open mind, Garovel. Not that you'd know much about that.'

'Hoho,' laughed the reaper. 'Alright, Mr. Free Thinker. How about, instead of trying to get the Candle to do everything, you actually put that open mind of yours to work? Try focusing, like I said.'

'Fine...'

"3663

Hector concentrated, though he wasn't entirely sure on what. The orb? The flame? The metal band? He felt like he had to pick one.

He chose the flame. It seemed to be the centerpiece of the contraption, after all.

And as such, he did not close his eyes. Instead, he fixated them upon the fire.

It was certainly no normal flame. That much had already been obvious, but as he stared at it further, he began to sense something even stranger about it.

Yes. It had an aura.

Subtle. Quiet. But there, nonetheless.

How did that make sense, though?

As far as he knew, only living things possessed an aura.

Unless...

'Garovel, I think this thing might be alive.'

'Excuse me?'

'I think this little flame in here is alive. A living flame.'

'Huh.'

Hector waited. 'That's all you got for me? No ancient insights into the nature of life or whatever?'

'Well, I do sense ardor in it, but that doesn't confirm life. Rocks in the Undercrust, for example, are often chock full of ardor. Are you sure you're not mistaken?'

'Of course I'm not sure. I've never seen anything like this before. But it has an aura. And... I don't know... I just feel like it's... waiting.'

‘Waiting? For what?’

‘Good question. For me? The wearer? To do something? I’m not sure what else would make sense.’

‘Hmm. Okay. Let’s think about this, then. It’s not guaranteed, of course, but I’d say it’s a fair assumption that Abbas invented this object in order to assist with his goal of making powered armor usable by non-servants. That’s what he kept talking about when you asked him, right?’

‘Yeah.’

‘So... maybe this is some sort of... neural interface. Meant to safely connect a person’s brain to Abbas’ armor.’

Hector bobbed his head a little. ‘That sounds like a pretty good guess to me.’

‘Thank you. But if I’m right, then that might also mean that this thing actually does nothing on its own. And that we’re wasting our time, right now.’

‘Aww... In that case, I hope you’re wrong.’

‘Wow, Hector.’

‘Maybe we just need to connect it to something.’

‘Well, it’s probably meant to connect to Abbas’ armor and not anything else.’

‘You don’t know that. Maybe it could connect to all sorts of things.’

‘Oh yeah? Like what?’

‘Uh...’ Hector looked around the room from within the great glass orb. ‘I mean, there IS a big ass Fusion Forge just sitting here...’

Garovel was quiet a moment. ‘Y’know something, buddy? In terms of the most stupidly dangerous ideas we’ve ever contemplated, that might be the new number one. Genuinely, I am impressed, right now.’

"3664

‘Oh, come on,’ said Hector. ‘You’re exaggerating. I mean, yeah, okay, it’d be dangerous, but not THAT dangerous. Not number one.’

‘And you’re even downplaying it, too! It’s like you’re trying to outdo me!’

‘The Candle’s not that dangerous, Garovel. It’s calm and gentle.’

‘It just got done putting Abbas into a coma, Hector.’

‘I--er, I mean, we don’t know that was the Candle’s doing. He might’ve, y’know, just exhausted himself from overwork.’

‘Worwal was a puddle on the floor.’

‘So they both exhausted themselves. As a team. Which is what we are, right? A team.’

‘You’re really grasping at straws here, pal.’

Hector wanted to argue, but he couldn’t. Instead, he shrugged and shook his head. ‘I know.’

‘You really wanna connect to the Forge that badly?’

‘...Kinda, yeah. Who knows what we could learn from it?’

‘Didn’t it already teach you everything?’

‘No, I mean... well, maybe it did. I don’t actually know.’

‘Ah. More uncertainty. Great.’

‘Look, Garovel, it’s just... my time spent inside the Candle was... well, it was pretty useful and cool, okay? And it’d be amazing if we could establish a way to reconnect with it whenever we wanted. The sheer volume of information that the Candle has access to is... astounding. And I still don’t even know how it’s sourcing that information. If this works, we might be able to answer some important questions. And not just about the Candle itself but maybe even about Fusion Forges in general.’

‘Hmm.’

‘Don’t you want to know more? There’s a chance that you’d be able to come along with me this time.’

‘Now you’re just saying whatever you think I want to hear.’

Hector had to relinquish a nod at that. ‘I’m just trying to make my case. C’mon. I know you’re just as intrigued by the possibilities here as I am.’

‘Ugh. I really hate how right you are. None of these arguments should be convincing me, and yet here I am, ready to go along with whatever dumb shit you wanna try next.’ The reaper broke for a pause. ‘This better not be your weird aura bullshit influencing me, fucking with my sense of reasoning. I’m gonna be pissed if I find out that’s the case later.’

‘You say that as if you’re normally some paragon of rational thinking.’

‘I am. And fuck you for suggesting otherwise.’

Hector decided to step out of the big glass orb. He still didn’t really know how he was going to try and ‘connect’ this thing to the Candle, but somehow, he felt like doing so while inside the main workspace would’ve been even more stupid and dangerous. Like trying to start a car while sitting inside the engine."

"3665

He wanted to circle around the outside of the globe in order to perhaps find a better place to attempt this, but there were still branches all over the place, barring his path. Hacking through them didn’t seem worth the effort, and he supposed it wouldn’t make much difference, anyway. What did he expect to find? A hidden connection port somewhere in the globe’s base? Not likely.

This spot would have to do, he decided. And with one hand clutching the encased flame, he placed his other hand on the big orb.

He’d witnessed both Abbas and Agrian working with the Candle. This was how it was done. It was an entirely mental process.

Whether or not this would work for a non-integration user... well, he was about to find out. Technically, he’d done this before, with Abbas’ help while the Candle was still dormant. He hadn’t tried it since then, though.

He pressed his soul into the glass.

Instantly, he felt it. The full breadth of its physical volume. Like an extension of his own body, almost. And there was so much more, too, just waiting for him to push further.

But he was familiar with this feeling now, so he knew to hold himself back. To not walk off the metaphysical cliff in front of him.

But wow.

The Candle's power was clear to him. A radiant ball of concentrated energy, filling his mind's eye like a sun. Or a volcanic pit, perhaps.

It seemed quite tepid, somehow. Despite all that energy sitting there, it was still... quite calm. Maybe even... tired?

Ah. From creating a new object, of course. Right. It wanted to rest. The more he observed, the more obvious that feeling became.

Interesting. Thinking back to his observations of Agrian's work, he didn't recall the Candle ever appearing tired or drained. Which, he supposed, further supported his theory that Agrian had never really managed to summon the fullness of the forge's power.

Either that, or Agrian had just been better at maintaining control. Rendering the Candle 'tired' wasn't exactly a desirable outcome, nor was putting oneself into a coma, as Abbas had apparently done.

Hmm. But what of this weird new object? He could feel it there in his hand, radiating with that very same energy. And the metal band, too. It glowed just as brilliantly in his mind, making him feel... rather strange, honestly.

And quite powerful. Like the energy was also an extension of his body.

Like he could bend it to his will, maybe.

Whoa..."
"3666

This was dangerous.

Supremely so, Hector felt.

No. Actually, he didn't feel that. In fact, that was the whole problem. He felt the power there in his hand. Felt the desire to hold it closer, to use it, to wield it wildly and experimentally. To begin limit-testing right away.

But he knew this feeling. He'd felt it once before. During his meditations.

When he'd gone so deep into his own mind that he felt like he'd touched the so-called Void.

This was like that. Almost exactly like it, actually.

Which was more than enough to give him pause.

Wow.

If he hadn't had that experience already, then he might not have realized the danger here. His emotions, his feelings--they were telling him to push on. To grasp this power and do as he pleased.

It was only his rational mind that was keeping him in check.

His focus lingered on the ball of molten energy in the palm of his hand. Such a curious thing. Like it wanted him to use it. Like it was daring him to, even.

It made Hector wonder something. Had Abbas made contact with this, too? And had he, perhaps, been seduced by its energizing allure?

This had happened many times before. Countless times, in fact, across history. Brilliant minds creating or discovering something incredible, only for it to destroy them.

The memories from the Candle told him so.

Dammit. Perhaps he should've warned Abbas. Agh, but how could he have? It hadn't seemed like his place to warn such an old and experienced servant about anything. Had Abbas truly never encountered this sort of thing before?

Impossible to tell now.

Worse still, Hector was realizing that Abbas' current condition might actually be much worse than a mere week-long coma. If the man had not only touched this but actually embraced it fully and tried to wield it immediately like it was tempting Hector to do, then...

There was a chance that Abbas and Worwal would never wake up at all.

That realization made Hector bristle with irritation. His focus shifted again, bringing everything to bear upon the power in his hand.

Damn light. This was not going to happen. Hector was not going to allow it.

'We are not going to let Abbas stay that way,' thought Hector. 'You understand me, you little ball of fury?'

He felt it shudder in his grasp. It was saying something. Protesting? Telling him to seize its power for himself. To forget Abbas.

That pissed Hector off immensely. 'Out of the question,' he thought, his voice booming with reverberation. 'He created you, goddammit.'"
"3667

'Uh. Are you talking to it?'

Hector's anger abated, and he might've blinked if he could feel his eyes. 'Garovel! You're here.'

'I am. Though I have no idea what in the world is going on.'

'Oh. Um. Well, this... Mini-Candle or whatever you wanna call it... uh, it's alive, just like we thought. And it's being an asshole, right now.'

'Excuse me?'

'It's got an attitude problem. It wants me to abandon Abbas and take its power for myself.'

'Wow. Talk about ungrateful.'

'Exactly!'

'But, um. How are you able to communicate with it, precisely?'

Hmm. That was a good question. 'I don't know. I guess I'm just... reading its aura?'

'Ah. So it's a new, unprecedented thing you can do. Cool.'

'Garovel...'

'No, I'm happy for you. That's super neat. I'm sure it'll come in handy.'

'The sarcasm in your voice is painful.'

'Is it? Ah, my bad. I frequently find myself wanting to give you a hard time for no reason.'

'Well, at least you're acknowledging it.'

The Mini-Candle pulsed in his hand another time. It was protesting again, Hector realized. It wanted him to remove Garovel from this headspace and talk only to it.

'What's it saying?' asked the reaper.

Rather than getting angry, however, Hector couldn't help being amused. 'It doesn't like you, Garovel. It wants me to abandon you, too.'

'Wait, what? The fuck did I do?'

'Dunno. Hey, Mini-Candle, what's your problem with Garovel?'

It pulsed again. Hector listened. For a while, actually. It just kept going on.

'...Well?' said Garovel.

'Uh. Okay, first off: you're a reaper. It doesn't like reapers.'

'Oh, so it's racist, too. Excellent. Wait, how does it even know what reapers are? It was just born, wasn't it?'

'Beats me. Maybe it absorbed knowledge from the Candle.'

'Okay, well, what else? I assume there was more.'

'Er. To make a long story short... it said that it can sense your desire to conquer the world.'

'What the hell?'

'Well, Garovel? What do you have to say for yourself? Have you secretly wanted to conquer the world this whole time?'

‘N-no...’

‘Oh yeah? Why’d you stutter there?’

‘Agh, bec-because! It’s such an out-of-nowhere question! I was taken aback!’

‘Hmm...’

‘Hector, please. You’re killin’ me here.’

‘I mean, it wouldn’t be the first time someone’s told me that reapers are secretive and ambitious...’

‘Buddy. I don’t want to conquer the world.’ The reaper paused. ‘At least, not in the literal sense.’

The small orb pulsed yet again.

‘It wants to know what you mean by that,’ said Hector.”
"3668

‘I feel like this is a conversation we should be having in private,’ said Garovel.

‘I’m pretty sure this little guy isn’t gonna tell anyone.’

‘Oh, he’s a trustworthy little guy now, is he? A minute ago, you called him an asshole.’

‘Well, he was being one.’

Another pulse.

‘Yes, you were. Anyway, Garovel, continue. If not in the “literal sense,” then in what sense do you want to conquer the world?’

The reaper sighed. ‘Technically, I suppose... in the sense of wanting to uncover all the world’s lost and hidden knowledge... then yes, one might consider that a form of conquest. I suppose. If you squint.’

There arrived still another pulse.

'It says you're leaving something out.'

'Ugh. FINE. Not just the lost and hidden knowledge. The lost and hidden powers, too. One could argue that I am... a bit... perhaps... slightly... power hungry. Okay? Geez. Why do you gotta make me feel so bad about it, huh? Everyone likes power, don't they?'

'Hmm. What do you want to do with all that power?'

'I--egh--I don't know! I just--! I want to see it! Experience it. Understand it. Maybe find new ways to put it to good use, if we can. Or... I don't know. It's just a... an instinctual thing, I suppose. I've never really been forced to articulate the entirety of my feelings on the matter like this, so... genuinely, I'm not sure what I would do. Perhaps it would depend on the exact nature of said powers.'

Hector wanted to scratch his chin. 'So you're telling me you're not interested in oppressing the masses?'

'Of course not.'

'Of course you're not telling me that? Or of course you're not interested?'

'Hector. Don't even joke about that shit. I've seen far too many oppressors throughout history to want to become one myself. I don't even find the idea funny.'

'Really? Not even a little bit? God-King Garovel?'

'Shut the hell up. I'd sooner let myself get eaten by a feldeath.'

'Wow.'

The Mini-Candle pulsed again.

'It doesn't believe you,' said Hector. 'And to be honest, I'm not sure I do, either.'

'Well, it's a good thing that I don't have to prove shit to either of you, then. I know I'm speaking the truth, and that's all that matters.'

There came a sudden period of silence as apparently no one knew what to say next.

Eventually, Hector came up with something. 'Okay, but if you DID want to conquer the world literally, you probably wouldn't think of it as oppressing anyone. It'd be, like, "for the greater good" or some shit, right?'

'I hate this conversation.'

"3669

Hector snickered. 'I'm just trying to make sure you're being entirely truthful with me. Because, Garovel, if you DO have some sort of dark ambition, I'm going to find out sooner or later. That's not something you'll be able to keep hidden from me forever. So I figure it'd be best if I found out sooner, considering the fact that we're kinda stuck together.'

'...Hector. You almost sound like you WANT me to harbor such ambitions.'

'Eh. "Want" would be a strong word. Let's just say I'm keeping an open mind.'

'I'm not sure whether to find that heartwarming or very worrying,' said Garovel.

'I think you've earned the benefit of the doubt,' said Hector. 'I'm not gonna jump to some crazy new conclusions about you, just 'cuz some judgmental little orb tells me to.'

The orb pulsed again, more violently than ever.

And then it wasn't just a pulse, anymore. A line of radiant energy lashed out like a great tentacle and snaked toward his intangible form.

Instantly, Hector's anger returned with equal violence. 'STOP THAT RIGHT NOW.'

The entire headspace shook with each word, as if caught in a momentary earthquake, and the tentacle retracted back into the orb, which was left shuddering there in his hand.

Hector needed a moment to calm his own fury. He wasn't mad that the thing had tried to attack him. In fact, for some reason, he felt as though it could not possibly harm him, no matter how hard it tried.

No, he was mad because it had tried to attack Garovel. In that briefest window of assault, he'd sensed its intent. It had wanted to remove the reaper from this place by force, uncaring of the harm it might cause in the process.

'What's the matter with you?' said Hector. 'What, you think you know everything? That you have full understanding of someone, just because you can sense a few of their secrets? And you think that justifies doing whatever you want to them?'

And Hector left an opening for it to respond, but it had nothing to say, this time.

'This is my warning to you,' said Hector. 'I sense a bit of your hubris now. You think you're really valuable. Really special. And you are. But don't for one second think that you're too valuable and special to destroy. You understand me? You've already endangered Abbas. And now you've tried to harm my best friend. If you keep behaving like that, then I will make sure you can never harm anyone ever again.'

"3670 -- CCCII.

Still, the orb remained silent.

Hector just let his words linger, feeling that he had said all he needed to.

Garovel was next to speak. 'Damn, Hector. That even scared me a little.'

Impulsively, he wanted to apologize, but he caught himself, because he was certain that he had done the right thing. 'This Mini-Candle here needs to realize that it doesn't know everything and that we won't be dancing to its tune. If I wasn't here, it wouldn't have attacked you, but instead, it would've tried to manipulate you.'

'Oh? I suppose I'll just have to trust your judgment on that one,' said Garovel.

'Think so?' said Hector. 'I'm betting you can at least feel its pull, though, can't you? I mean, heck, you just admitted to being a power-hungry maniac, so you're probably feeling pretty tempted to seize its power, aren't you?'

'H-heh, I thought we'd moved past that already...'

‘It was like one minute ago, Garovel.’

‘Well, time is not time, right? That means it’s actually ancient history.’

‘That’s not what that means at all.’

‘Also, I never called myself a maniac. I resent you using that term.’

‘Look, the point is, this thing would manipulate you into wielding its power and then probably turn it against you.’

‘Ah... am I to assume that is what happened to Worwal, then?’

‘I think so,’ said Hector. ‘And now we’re going to have this little guy undo what he did.’

‘Uh. What makes you think he even can?’

‘Because I’m gonna be real pissed off if he can’t.’

He felt the orb shudder again.

‘Huh. Well, my little orby friend... I forgive you for attacking me, since you’ve just been born ‘n all, but it would appear you’ve already gotten yourself into some hot water. Best of luck to you.’

Chapter Three Hundred Two: ‘A prince’s position...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

The heel of David’s shoe tapped rapidly against the marble floor as he eyed his watch for the twentieth time since sitting down at this small table. During his time here in Intar as an Atreyan Ambassador, he’d grown quite accustomed to playing the slow game, to being exceedingly patient, but this particular wait was proving too much even for him. He’d already ordered his meal, finished it, ordered dessert, and finished that, too.

It was hard not to be annoyed.

These “meetings” that he’d been taking of late could hardly be regarded as such. They were always with individuals who were rather low on the political totem pole, but that usually also meant that they didn't have as much trouble making time for him. In fact, that was the main reason why he'd been pursuing them in the first place.

So it was quite obnoxious whenever one of them was a no-show."
"3670 -- CCCII.

Still, the orb remained silent.

Hector just let his words linger, feeling that he had said all he needed to.

Garovel was next to speak. 'Damn, Hector. That even scared me a little.'

Impulsively, he wanted to apologize, but he caught himself, because he was certain that he had done the right thing. 'This Mini-Candle here needs to realize that it doesn't know everything and that we won't be dancing to its tune. If I wasn't here, it wouldn't have attacked you, but instead, it would've tried to manipulate you.'

'Oh? I suppose I'll just have to trust your judgment on that one,' said Garovel.

'Think so?' said Hector. 'I'm betting you can at least feel its pull, though, can't you? I mean, heck, you just admitted to being a power-hungry maniac, so you're probably feeling pretty tempted to seize its power, aren't you?'

'H-hey, I thought we'd moved past that already...'

'It was like one minute ago, Garovel.'

'Well, time is not time, right? That means it's actually ancient history.'

'That's not what that means at all.'

'Also, I never called myself a maniac. I resent you using that term.'

'Look, the point is, this thing would manipulate you into wielding its power and then probably turn it against you.'

'Ah... am I to assume that is what happened to Worwal, then?'

‘I think so,’ said Hector. ‘And now we’re going to have this little guy undo what he did.’

‘Uh. What makes you think he even can?’

‘Because I’m gonna be real pissed off if he can’t.’

He felt the orb shudder again.

‘Huh. Well, my little orby friend... I forgive you for attacking me, since you’ve just been born ‘n all, but it would appear you’ve already gotten yourself into some hot water. Best of luck to you.’

Chapter Three Hundred Two: ‘A prince’s position...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

The heel of David’s shoe tapped rapidly against the marble floor as he eyed his watch for the twentieth time since sitting down at this small table. During his time here in Intar as an Atreyan Ambassador, he’d grown quite accustomed to playing the slow game, to being exceedingly patient, but this particular wait was proving too much even for him. He’d already ordered his meal, finished it, ordered dessert, and finished that, too.

It was hard not to be annoyed.

These “meetings” that he’d been taking of late could hardly be regarded as such. They were always with individuals who were rather low on the political totem pole, but that usually also meant that they didn’t have as much trouble making time for him. In fact, that was the main reason why he’d been pursuing them in the first place.

So it was quite obnoxious whenever one of them was a no-show.”
"3671

This particular diner was one of several that he had been using, of late. One thing he appreciated about his time in this melting pot of a country was the opportunity to sample all the different types of cuisine that it had to offer, especially here in the heart of its capital city.

But the problem with trying new things, of course, was that they weren't always to his taste. So perhaps that was another reason for his foul mood, at the moment. He had not enjoyed his lunch, nor even the experimental dessert thereafter. The other meals he'd tried here had been exquisite, but that one...

Maybe Jesbolese food was simply not for him. Or maybe this otherwise excellent restaurant did not know how to prepare it. He supposed he would have to give it at least one more try in order to be sure.

At length, he decided that continuing to wait like this was pointless. The young paralegal that he'd been hoping to talk to had probably forgotten. The kid had seemed a bit airheaded, after all. Or just overwhelmed with work. It was strangely difficult to tell one from the other, sometimes.

He'd already paid, so he gathered up his things, put his coat on slowly, and then finally left.

Out on the street, he had a car waiting for him in order to take him back to the Livingston Grand Castle where he was but one of many resident ambassadors.

Before he even made it three steps to the car, however, a familiar face arrived in his vision--a face which brightened with recognition in return.

"Prince David," said the young mustachioed man. A friendly smile crossed his lips, though it seemed rather muted when compared to how amicable David remembered this fellow to be. "A pleasure to see you again, sir."

"Likewise," said the Prince. This was not the same young man that he had been meant to have lunch with here today, but as David recalled, the two of them were coworkers. "Young Victor Branson the Paralegal. What a coincidence. Do you fancy this place, as well?"

"Ah... yes, sir, I do. I come here all the time. Their Jesbolese meatballs are to die for."

David had to consciously avoid wincing at that remark, considering he'd just dined on exactly that meal and reached the exact opposite conclusion. "Heh. I see. You know, I was supposed to have lunch with Charlie, but he never showed up. I was hoping to pick his brain on a couple of subjects."

Victor's eyes widened. "Ah..."

"3672

Prince David's brow twitched at that reaction. "But perhaps his loss can be your gain," he said. "I've just finished eating, but what say I buy you lunch, instead?"

"S-sir... that is a generous offer, but I feel I should inform you that... Charlie Rogerson is, um... well, he passed away this morning."

Somehow, David did not feel nearly as shocked by this news as he probably should have. But appearing too calm here would do him no favors, either. "What?! What do you mean? What happened?"

Victor sighed and rubbed his forehead. "I'm still not quite sure I believe it, myself. But, um... he was in his bed, and he just... didn't wake up. Which, I suppose actually means he passed away last night, not this morning... agh... I don't know. It's all been too much for me to process."

"I'm so sorry to hear that," said David. "I saw him not two days ago, and he seemed the very picture of health. Full of youthful zeal. I can hardly... imagine..."

Victor nodded. "I know, right? The paramedics said he was already gone by the time they arrived, but they couldn't be sure of the cause of death yet and didn't want to speculate. Our guess was... some freak aneurysm or something in his brain."

"...Our?"

"Ah. Me and the other roommates. We were all in total shock. Hell, I think I still am."

"Understandable. You've had one heck of a morning."

Victor didn't say anything and just kept rubbing his head with a distant look in his eyes.

Wow. Talk about a tough conversation to maintain. He did his best, though. "I didn't realize you and Charlie were roommates."

“Yeah... been that way since university...” Victor gave a solemn shake of his head. “He was just talking about moving out the other day, actually. Not anytime soon, but just as a future goal. I thought maybe he’d found a girlfriend or something...”

Oh boy. David looked around. The street was rather busy, and his car was still waiting for him. What to do here...?

Simple enough, he decided. He couldn’t just leave the poor kid here, not without at least offering something more elaborate in the form of condolences. He bumped the young man on the shoulder with one of his gloved hands. “It sounds like you might need a bit more than just lunch, right now.” He motioned to the blue-and-white sedan on the curb. “I was just headed back to my little embassy at Livingston. Would you like to tag along? See some of the sights? And I’ll still treat you to lunch, too, if you like.”

"3673

Victor eyed the vehicle. “I-I don’t know... I have a deposition in a couple days that I haven’t finished prepping for...”

Oh? Hmm. “Let me think. As I recall, your boss is... Senator Leoric, no?”

“Yes, sir.”

“I’m sure she will understand if you need to take some time off, right now. In fact, she might well force you to do so.”

“Ah... I very much doubt that, sir.”

The Prince tilted his brow. “Truly? I’ve heard the stories about her, but surely, she is not that much of a...” The words on the tip of his tongue were ‘slave-driving witch,’ but he changed them in favor of some new ones. “...Of a stern boss. Time off should be a matter of course after something like this, no?”

Victor gave him a look. His lips didn’t move, but his face said everything.

David didn’t force him to elaborate. “Well, in that case, you absolutely must come with me. You can make use of the embassy’s facilities to conduct your prep work, and if they prove insufficient, the greater castle around it has plenty more to offer. Including some quite luxurious spots, I must say.”

Victor still wasn't saying anything, but his expression spoke of temptation.

The Prince started toward the car and opened the door, offering to let Victor get in first.

The kid looked like he was finally about to say something, but then he just hopped in.

David followed suit, told the driver their destination, and then they were off.

The tinted windows offered a now-very-familiar view of Andeyal, the Intarian capital city, as they sped down the road. The highways here very much lived up to their name, rising so far up into the air that entire office buildings could fit beneath--and often did. Many of the skyscrapers that filled the cityscape were nestled up right alongside the elevated roads, sometimes offering a surprisingly clear view into their mid-level offices.

The boy was still being quiet, so David had to be the one to revive the conversation. “These Intarian buildings of yours are something else,” he said as he craned his neck, staring out the window. “Every time I find myself on these roads, I’m tempted to bring a pair of binoculars and do some proper snooping. Perhaps try to discover exactly how many floors up we are.”

“...Depends on the building,” said Victor, “but this area’s about thirty. Highest I’ve seen was about fifty, I think.””

"3674

“I’ve always found it curious,” said David. “With how much land Intar has at its disposal, one would think the greater imperative would be to build outward, not upward.”

“Intarians have always had a fascination with the sky,” said Victor. “Even back in the days of the Mohssian Empire, the people here were always building monuments as tall as humanly possible.”

“Ah, yes, I believe I’ve heard a little of that. Wasn’t there a formalized competition at one point?"

The kid nodded. "There was. Emperor Armadus III instituted it as a yearly tradition, and an entire festival grew around it. Then eventually, it became a minor holiday."

"Cloudseeker Day," said David.

"Oh, you know of it. I haven't met many foreigners who did."

"I lived here for a few years when I was younger," said the Prince with a small smile. "But that still doesn't sate my curiosity about the Intarian obsession with building upwards. Where does the interest in the sky originate? It's an interesting element of your culture."

"Oh, I see what you mean now. Yeah. I've always heard that the origins of our interest were a bit muddy. Some say one thing, others say something different."

"I've heard that as well," said David. "The most common theory seemed to involve religion. Cocora, specifically. The ancient Mohssians wanted to be closer to the Goddess of Light, so they reached for the Sun."

"That's the theory I like best," said Victor. "There's something romantic about it."

"Heh. I can only agree."

A lull in the conversation arrived, and David struggled for the next topic. Perhaps it was a bit early to be pushing for more detailed information, but he supposed there was no harm in asking the boy to talk. The lad could just say no, and that would be fine. There was no urgency here.

Not yet, at least.

"...Do you want to talk about Charlie?" said David.

Victor hesitated.

The Prince felt the need to clarify. "It is perfectly okay if you do not. I am merely offering an attentive ear, if you want one."

Still, Victor remained quiet. Perhaps even he himself wasn't sure what he wanted, right now.

Hmm. David thought for a moment. "...Well, perhaps I could talk about him, then. What little I was able to learn, at least. Would that be alright with you?"

The kid took a second, but he nodded.

"He seemed quite the energetic fellow. I only spoke with him, maybe... four times, but on each occasion, he certainly never had any trouble speaking his mind. I quite liked that about him."

"3675

Victor's gaze fell down to the floor of the car as he listened.

"He seemed particularly passionate about the current divide between the Moons and the Grands," David went on. "I remember him telling me at length that the disparities between the two parties were more illusion than reality. 'A demonstration for the masses,' was how he put it. He said that unity between the two was not just possible but inevitable without constant intervention from those currently in power." David chortled. "An interesting perspective, I thought."

Victor still wasn't looking back at him. He just chewed on his lip as he stared at the back of the driver's seat in front of him.

The Prince wondered what might be going through the lad's mind, right now. David wanted to keep talking about Charlie, but he was struggling. He only had so much to pull from. He wished he'd been able to talk to the boy more. "Ah... I remember thinking that he could have been a speechwriter, what with how strongly held some of his opinions were, and he told me that he hoped to become one, someday. Said he wasn't experienced enough yet as a rhetorician--and that one of his friends had always been far better at it. Said he'd always been a bit envious of the fellow..."

Victor's eyes widened a little, then he stopped chewing his lip and simply frowned. He shook his head and sighed.

David couldn't help wanting to connect the dots. "He... hadn't been talking about you, had he?"

The kid scratched his brow. "I don't know... maybe..."

That sounded like a 'yes' to David. "Do you have an interest in becoming a speechwriter, too?"

"Mm... I wouldn't turn the job down, but no, I wouldn't say that was my overall goal. I'm more interested in drafting policy. Making real change happen."

David felt he had to pick him up on that. "One could argue that persuasion is the only way that real change ever comes to pass. The legal agreements that follow might be considered more of a formality than a conducted change. Or, perhaps, an argument over semantics rather than the greater issues."

The young man exhaled a curt breath. "Are you sure you only spoke with him a few times? You're starting to sound just like him."

"Heh. To my ears, that sounds like quite the compliment."

"3676

Victor made no response, though David did spot a small smile on his face.

And again, the Prince found himself struggling to keep up the conversation. He supposed he shouldn't try to force it. Perhaps just giving the young fellow some peace and quiet was better, anyway. He'd never considered himself very good at keeping his mouth shut, but perhaps on this occasion, he shouldn't be considering himself at all.

He let the silence linger. It was still a ways to Livingston, but oh well.

At length, however, Victor decided to speak up on his own. "Prince David, sir... um..."

"Yes?"

"...Have you ever... um... have you ever lost someone close to you?"

Ah. So we were going in this direction, were we? Oh, boy. Truth be told, David never much cared for talking about his own past, but he supposed if there was ever a time for it, it would be now.

The Prince took a long, slow breath before finally answering. "I have, indeed. Most recently, my brothers.”

“Brothers?” said Victor. “As in, multiple?”

“Yes. I am one of eight children. And last year, four of my brothers were killed.”

“Oh my god. I’m so sorry. I had no idea. I can’t even imagine...”

“Yes, well... it was a complicated matter with... complicated emotions. Saying that we were close would perhaps be an overstatement. But... we had our moments.” He wondered if he should also mention that he’d essentially lost a fifth brother as well, considering the fact that Luther had been imprisoned for murdering the other four.

But he decided against it. He didn’t think the purpose of Victor’s question had been to hear about royal family drama.

In fact, with that in mind, perhaps bringing his brothers up at all had been the wrong call. Perhaps the death of his father would have been a more apt comparison?

Eh...

Well. He did have a different memory to pull from. It would probably be more fitting here, as well. But did he really want to talk about that? Especially with this young man he barely knew?

Not really.

“...Do you believe in an afterlife, sir?”

Agh. Wow. This hardly felt like the time to say that he didn’t. Somehow, that just seemed too disrespectful. So instead, he chose to soften his response. “I’m not sure what I believe.””
"3677

Victor gave him a skeptical look, however. “Is that the truth, sir? A man your age is still uncertain of his beliefs?”

David’s head reared back, and he couldn’t help snickering. “Excuse me, but please leave my age out of this. I do not believe I’ve said anything so offensive as to justify such a scathing attack on my person.”

"Ah... my apologies, sir."

"Heh. I forgive you. You are young and stupid, after all."

That earned a snort from the lad. "Sir, please. Hypocrisy misbecomes you."

"You think so? Then why do I feel so much better?"

Soon enough, they arrived at their destination. Livingston Grand Castle was an ancient structure and incomparably gigantic, having been repeatedly expanded upon since the middle years of the Mohssian Empire. King William surely could have told him every detail of its long history, but David was only aware of its more infamous tales.

It had a strange reputation, this place. Having been built during the empire's so-called Golden Era, it was meant to be a demonstration of the emperor's unmatched power and wealth. But the construction had been plagued by endless turmoil, and that very same emperor died long before it was completed. The story went that the emperor had been on a tour of the construction site just as the second floor was being built, and then a stone--supposedly no bigger than a baseball--fell from a worker's grasp, bounced off a wall, and landed squarely atop the emperor's bald head, killing him instantly.

Apparently, the emperor's retainers didn't even realize what had happened for quite some time, because the blow did not appear that deadly. The man even remained on his feet. And since touching him without his expressed permission was a taboo punishable with execution, none dared to confirm his death for hours, until they were finally able to fetch his favorite wife to do the job.

Ever since the castle's inauspicious beginnings, rumors abounded that this place was cursed--and by extension, so too was the empire. As such, multiple emperors had chosen not to live here, but each time one did so, some great misfortune seemed to befall him within a decade of his rule, typically resulting in his death.

And so the rumors grew. Until eventually, Livingston Grand Castle acquired a rather notorious moniker.

'The Burden of Rule' was what many had come to call it. To live in it was dangerous, but to ignore it was deadly."

"3678

For his part, though, Prince David did not mind staying here in the slightest. Thus far, several months into his ambassadorship, the castle's ominous reputation had still not touched him one bit, nor did he ever expect it to. In the first place, he did not buy into such superstitions, but even if he did, there was no reason to think they would apply to foreign visitors.

Plus, the food here was spectacular.

If anything, it was hard to pull himself away from this place. That was one of the reasons why he'd been trying to hold his meetings at various restaurants in town: to force himself to leave. To not stay cooped up in the lap of luxury.

Also, there was just... something about Livingston. Something he couldn't quite put his finger on. Food aside, he simply found this place very comfortable. He wasn't sure why. He slept soundly at night, felt a great peace in the extravagant gardens, and quite enjoyed the beautiful sunsets from the top floors. Thankfully, the sky-bending towers of downtown Andeyal did not entirely wall those off. In fact, he felt they might've been enhancing them with their shimmering windows.

As he stepped out of the vehicle, David noticed the young Victor gawking at the magnificent building in front of them. "First time here?" said the Prince.

"Y-yes... it's, um... much more intimidating in person..."

"Think so?" David took a moment to share in the view, in the tall, black-lined windows with sharp, pointed apexes, almost like spikes. The walls had a repeating pattern of gray-on-darker-gray stones, and the steep rooftops with long eaves created some rather heavy shadows, even during the middle of the day like this. "What's so intimidating about it?"

The young man turned to him. "Is that a joke? Just look at it."

David did so. And then shrugged. "I think it looks quite majestic."

Victor blinked. "W-well, yes, it does, b-but..."

More vehicles were arriving behind them, stopping curbside in order to drop passengers off. David was now at a point where he could recognize some of the faces coming and going, but only some. Livingston was always abuzz with activity, and keeping track of so many different people was no easy thing.

His own car drove off to go find a parking spot, but he knew the driver would not be leaving him alone for long. That was his bodyguard, Vito, and David had come to realize that even when the fellow wasn't immediately present, he was still watching."

"3679

Even now, after all these months of being shadowed by the man, David still did not know much about Vito's abilities, but it was at least clear that the new Lord of Warrenhold had not chosen this man thoughtlessly. Vito did not speak very much, even when spoken to, but David was quite confident that he was taking this job very seriously.

It had become something of an ongoing project for David: trying to crack through that wall of stoicism. Plus, it was an opportunity to learn more about the fabled Rainlords of Sair. He'd already known a fair amount about the Sandlords of Sair, thanks to his brother Meriwether's marriage to Nasira Saqqaf, but the Rainlords had always been comparatively more mysterious. As far as he knew, Atreya had never had any formal relations with them, so in some sense, this young bodyguard here was making history.

If only he could convince Vito to see it that way. Maybe he'd be more talkative.

For the moment, however, David remained entirely focused on his other young friend as they entered Livingston together. The great antechamber was so large that it could have easily handled hundreds more entrants--and frequently did so, he knew. Despite how many people he saw around, the place still managed to feel somewhat empty.

It was a long trek to the Atreyan Embassy, but thankfully, the seemingly endless hallways had travelators to make the journey easier. Victor continued gawking the whole way, and David didn't blame him. At every intersection, there seemed to be yet another opulent thing to stare at and admire. A Pre-Imperial statue of the God of Death. A gigantic painting of Arcanus Daris, the first Mohssian Emperor. A golden chandelier the size of a truck. Another Pre-Imperial statue of the Goddess of Relief, joined by an angel holding a sleeping baby in swaddling clothes.

That one was particularly famous, as was the scene it depicted. David had seen it many times throughout his life, in almost every medium of artistry imaginable, but he felt that the statue might have been his favorite, even if he personally harbored little-to-no love for religion in general.

It was the scene of the Goddess Xixa and the Archangel Maximillius allowing the God of Death to be born into the world in order to ease the suffering of mortals."

"3680

"How can anyone stand to live in a place like this?" said Victor.

"What do you mean?" said David. "I find it terribly charming here. So much beauty and history rolled together for all to admire, even in the small hours of the night."

"...Prince David, sir, are you secretly a vampire?"

The Prince just chortled.

"You didn't lure me here just to kill me, right?" said Victor.

"Of course not, my dear boy. I have to feed you and fatten you up, first."

Now Victor laughed. "Hold on. I thought vampires only drank blood."

"Ah, yes. Well, perhaps I'm trying something new."

Eventually, they arrived at the Embassy. It was a comparatively modest set of chambers, including an office, a small meeting room, and then David's private quarters in back.

He'd seen much more extravagant accommodations given to other countries' representatives, but he could not complain. Nor did he wish to. These were just about perfect for him. Anything more would have been a waste of space, he felt. Perhaps Vito might have preferred a bit more room so that he didn't have to sleep on the fold-out couch in the office, but if so, the young man had been keeping those feelings to himself, even at David's prodding.

David directed Victor to the office, where the boy could use the computers as he pleased, once David logged in for him. The Prince wasn't concerned about Victor seeing any sensitive information on there, because he'd barely been using those devices. He much preferred his personal tablet and government-issued phone.

He stayed with the kid for a while longer and continued to chat, then retired to his bedroom. It was still far too early in the day for sleep, but there was plenty of news to scroll through on the internet.

He didn't get the chance, however, because just as he was going to sit down on his bed, the ground shook with such force that he practically fell on top of it, instead.

David sat up in a rush, attempting to make sense of what had just happened. An earthquake? Andayel didn't get earthquakes.

He moved to stand, but then another tremor arrived, not quite as strong as the last one but still enough to give him pause.

Not more than a few moments later, he saw Vito in the open doorway. "Lord Prince, are you alright?!"

"I'm absolutely fine, Vito, but thank you for your concern. Do you have any idea what's going on?"

"3681

"I believe it may be an attack," said Vito, calmer now.

"An attack?" David's head reared back. "What makes you say that?"

"Call it a hunch, lord. Please do not leave my side."

He certainly hadn't been planning to.

Victor scrambled over from the other room. "Did you guys feel that? I've never--"

Another quake arrived, stronger than the previous two combined. Paintings fell off the walls, and a vase in the corner crashed to the floor while David just held onto the bed, trying not to fly off.

When everything finally settled again, the room was in shambles, and David saw a giant fissure running up through one of the walls.

Vito was already next to the bed, helping the Prince up. "We should get out of here, lord. Please follow me."

"A-alright..." David was trying to remain calm. Emergency scenario. Was he forgetting anything? If he never returned to this room, was there anything he needed from it? Tablet, phone, shoes, wallet, royal pendant. All good. Coat? Hat? Briefcase? Not sure. He grabbed those last three, just in case.

Then they were on the move. Vito led the way while David made sure Victor was still behind them.

Gigantic windows along the inner hallway provided a view of one of Livingston's several courtyards, and through them, David saw a smoldering mountain, looking like a fallen meteorite.

What in the world? He wanted to stop and stare, but apparently, his feet knew better and kept going. He thought he saw figures among the smoke. Were they appearing out of the meteorite?

Screams in the distance. Several at once. All cut short.

David's blood ran cold.

People filled the corridor now, most running in the same direction as them, until yet another quake made everyone stumble.

David could hardly process what was happening now. Too much shaking. He was on his hands and knees. Trying to get up as the trembling abated. Vito was there again, helping him.

Bless this kid.

Victor? Already up, too. Good on him.

Then a wall ahead of them exploded, and David spotted shapes moving quickly through the dust and debris--and not in unison, either. They bounced and clashed off of one another, and he heard the sound of clanging metal and gunshots ring out. Along with more screams.

"Okay, maybe we shouldn't go that way," said Vito, looking around."
"3682

More gunshots rang out--much closer this time--and they didn't stop, either. David heard the hail of bullets whizzing through the air, and he ducked without thinking.

Then Vito was suddenly behind him, standing tall, and David instead heard the sound of bullets ricocheting off of metal. But only briefly. Because Vito returned fire and began shoving both David and Victor toward the open doorway on their right.

They reached the room and found another group of people already there, all looking terrified as they huddled behind a line of desks by the far wall.

The gunfire didn't stop, and Vito didn't stop pushing them until they were deeper into the room and behind a thick desk of their own.

When a strange man charged through the doorway after them, Vito met him head on.

Everything happened so fast that David's eyes struggled to process it. The stranger was already firing as Vito closed in and grabbed the gun, blocking the barrel with his hand as if the bullets exploding out of it were no more deadly than foam darts.

The stranger swung on him. Vito dodged and countered with a right hook that sent him back through the door he'd just entered, taking part of the frame and wall with him.

Another figure appeared to take the previous challenger's place. This one seemed to be a woman, but Vito showed no hesitation, grappling her in an instant and twisting her head off like a plucked watermelon. Her body dropped to the floor, and when another man arrived, Vito brained him with her severed head.

David merely watched with wide eyes, unable to look away.

Vito didn't leave the doorway, even as another hail of gunfire visibly pelted the walls around it. Thankfully, only a few of the bullets seemed to be breaking through, but Vito spared a glance back in their direction, probably to make sure they were staying low like he'd said.

Did he have metal skin? David could still hear the pinging of ricochets, and there was definitely a shimmer there that the Prince hadn't noticed before.

Vito returned fire again, but he soon ran out of bullets and had to reload. He didn't seek cover, though, and when still another man sprinted over to interrupt him, Vito pistol whipped the guy, swept his feet, and then caved his skull in with the heel of his boot."

"3683

After that, the fighting slowed, as perhaps the attackers had begun to think twice about continuing to charge in at Vito, who still did not budge from the doorway.

David could still hear gunfire in the distance, along with more screaming, but it was the rumbling that was truly unsettling. Explosions? Invasive meteorite impacts? He wasn't sure which to be more worried about.

Another large quake arrived, pulling unsettled dust out of the ceiling and making the Prince wonder if it was about to cave in on their heads. Thankfully, it held strong, but he saw Vito holding onto the doorframe and struggling to stay on his feet.

Then the door and the wall around it exploded, and Vito went flying backward through a cloud of debris. In the wall's place, a great horizontal mass appeared, some kind of long and flat boulder, though it did not stay long. It seemed to disintegrate among the dirt and rubble, but David did not understand how or why. Nor did he much care. He was far more concerned about Vito, who'd left a giant hole in the wall on the other side of the room.

"Come on out, you rich little piggies!" came a booming voice. "Don't make your poor lapdogs give their lives for you! We're here for a good time, not a long time! If you can amuse us with your pathetic begging, then we'll spare your lives and be on our way!"

David's heart was in his throat as he listened. This was all too familiar. Perhaps he was jumping to conclusions with far too little information, but it seemed suddenly quite obvious who these attackers were.

More maniacs from Abolish. He'd gotten to know their ilk better than he'd ever wanted to.

It had taken only a handful of them to occupy Atreya and manipulate the entire country, and he was getting the distinct impression that there were far more of them here, now.

David's eyes were locked on the giant hole that Vito had flown through. He didn't know what to do other than hope for his young bodyguard to reappear.

And reappear he did.

A metallic hand gripped the edge of the hole with an audible crack, and Vito pulled himself through the opening, looking shinier and more silver than ever. His left arm was twisted in the wrong direction, and his neck seemed to be bent a little far to the right, but they soon corrected themselves."

"3684 -- CCCIII.

Vito met David's gaze, then motioned toward the hole he'd just climbed through. He didn't say anything, and he didn't need to, either. The Prince understood. The hole was big enough for them to escape through, and Vito intended to buy time for them to do so.

David grabbed Victor's arm and pulled him up, then began motioning for the other non-combatants to follow.

The Abolishers did not continue waiting, however. They stepped through the missing wall where the doorway had been.

And David picked up his pace, but he still could not help noticing how many of them there were. He counted at least five. And he had a terrible feeling there were even more behind them.

Chapter Three Hundred Three: 'O, tempered child of the Burning Sea...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Vito Sebolt had never faced such odds. But Kerikos certainly had. And as they activated the hyper-state of pan-forma, all of the reaper's memories and experience became his own.

Unfortunately, those things still did not fill him with confidence. If anything, Kerikos' memories only served to reinforce how bad this situation actually was.

But oh well. Better to have the knowledge than not. At least now they were able to decide quickly on their best course of action here.

They knew there were plenty of other allied servants here in Livingston. They'd already sensed and even witnessed some of them fighting.

So it was just a matter of leading the fight over to some of those other warriors.

Easier said than done, perhaps. Especially when they couldn't allow any of these Abolish bastards to get near the Prince or any of the other non-combatants. Not to mention, if those other warriors weren't already rushing over to help him, then it was doubtless because they had their hands full.

Regardless, Vito and Kerikos didn't have the luxury of time to mull things over. They had to give the Abolishers something to think about.

And with Vito's lutetium transfiguration, the first tactic that entered their minds was a horizontal shower of bright red fireballs.

They would have to sacrifice considerable body mass in order to cover so many enemies at once, but that was where pan-forma's near-instant regeneration became extremely helpful.

The room roared to life with a red wave of flaming lutetium, filling the entire missing wall in seconds. The debris all over the floor caught fire instantly and began to melt or burn."

"3684 -- CCCIII.

Vito met David's gaze, then motioned toward the hole he'd just climbed through. He didn't say anything, and he didn't need to, either. The Prince understood. The hole was big enough for them to escape through, and Vito intended to buy time for them to do so.

David grabbed Victor's arm and pulled him up, then began motioning for the other non-combatants to follow.

The Abolishers did not continue waiting, however. They stepped through the missing wall where the doorway had been.

And David picked up his pace, but he still could not help noticing how many of them there were. He counted at least five. And he had a terrible feeling there were even more behind them.

Chapter Three Hundred Three: 'O, tempered child of the Burning Sea...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Vito Sebolt had never faced such odds. But Kerikos certainly had. And as they activated the hyper-state of pan-forma, all of the reaper's memories and experience became his own.

Unfortunately, those things still did not fill him with confidence. If anything, Kerikos' memories only served to reinforce how bad this situation actually was.

But oh well. Better to have the knowledge than not. At least now they were able to decide quickly on their best course of action here.

They knew there were plenty of other allied servants here in Livingston. They'd already sensed and even witnessed some of them fighting.

So it was just a matter of leading the fight over to some of those other warriors.

Easier said than done, perhaps. Especially when they couldn't allow any of these Abolish bastards to get near the Prince or any of the other non-combatants. Not to mention, if those other warriors weren't already rushing over to help him, then it was doubtless because they had their hands full.

Regardless, Vito and Kerikos didn't have the luxury of time to mull things over. They had to give the Abolishers something to think about.

And with Vito's lutetium transfiguration, the first tactic that entered their minds was a horizontal shower of bright red fireballs.

They would have to sacrifice considerable body mass in order to cover so many enemies at once, but that was where pan-forma's near-instant regeneration became extremely helpful.

The room roared to life with a red wave of flaming lutetium, filling the entire missing wall in seconds. The debris all over the floor caught fire instantly and began to melt or burn."

"3685

The Abolishers scattered. Some dashed backward, trying to get out of the way, but two simply pushed straight through the inferno, aiming to get right up in Vito's face.

He welcomed them with another blast of fire, but this time, he lived inside the flames himself. He let the lutetium keep burning and create a soul-infused haze around his own body.

And he kept launching projectiles, too, but now they were nearly the size of his entire body and so would look like duplicates to confuse the enemy's senses. With the help of pan-forma, he and Kerikos could do this so quickly that it wasn't even necessary for each duplicate to serve as an attack. Some could be sent purely as distractions.

Without a doubt, the two frontal attackers ended up with more than they'd bargained for as the flaming body doubles swarmed and pummeled them into the ground.

The added control of Kerikos' mind was key here. There was no way that Vito could have kept track of all the projectile duplicates without the reaper's help, especially when he was also trying to keep track of the enemy's position, as well. The reaper's soul senses were much needed there, too, thanks to the blinding red light that filled his vision.

In the distance, Kerikos could sense some of the attackers from earlier, the same ones that Vito had made short work of. They were still regenerating, having to regrow their bodies either from scratch or from the neck down.

So Vito decided to get ahead of that problem while he could and incinerate their regenerative efforts. The reapers attached to them fled but not without incurring some damage themselves.

That was all the opening he got, though, because the other Abolishers were reconvening on him with long-ranged assaults. Gunfire, materialized projectiles, acid and explosions came for him all at once.

He dispersed more duplicates in quick succession in order to confuse their targeting, but there was still no way to avoid the attacks completely. It was his turn to endure a pummeling as he sprinted left while his duplicates scattered in all directions.

All directions, that was, except behind. At all costs, he couldn't draw enemy fire toward the escaping civilians. Kerikos was keeping track of them, too, of course. If Vito could just buy a bit more time for them to finish climbing through that hole, then this fight might become a bit more manageable."

"3686

That was easier said than done, though. He could sense even more enemies at the periphery of Kerikos' senses. How he wished that some of those were defenders of the castle, but judging from the fact that none of them were attacking each other, he had to put that hope out of his mind.

No time for stray thoughts. The enemy was swarming, circling around the edge of his flames to try and get in close while others stayed back to pelt him with projectiles and flame-dampening blankets of materialization.

Good thing he didn't rely on only fire.

Soul-strengthened lutetium still packed quite a punch on its own. In an instant, metal spikes flew out of his body like a porcupine, covering the same area that the flames just did but extending even farther, skewering multiple attackers at once.

But one of them pushed through, taking several spikes in the arms and chest while batting the rest away with a big wooden club.

Vito was forced back as the club came crashing down in front of him, and if the crater it left in the floor was any indication, that attack would have almost certainly flattened him if he hadn't avoided it.

And Kerikos expected the man with the club to keep pressing the advantage, but to Vito and the reaper's combined surprise, the man just stood there and raised a hand, which was apparently enough to bring the other attackers to a halt, too.

"You're a tough one, aren'tcha?!" the man said with wide eyes and a toothy smile. "Tell me your name, warrior!"

Vito's jaw clenched. Truthfully, he and Kerikos were both tempted. Perhaps if they hadn't been trying to keep a low profile, they would have acquiesced to the enemy's request. It was a most ancient gesture of respect on the battlefield to ask for the opponent's name.

In the modern day, it was something of a lost practice. To hear it uttered from this strange villain now was certainly a surprise.

"Heh! If you don't give me a name, then I'll just have to invent one for you! You don't want that, do you? Better to just tell me something, even if it's a lie!"

"I trust you to give me something good," said Vito.

The stranger burst out laughing. "He speaks! And what a thing to say! I think I like you!"

"3687

Kerikos was seeing an opportunity here, and Vito decided to take it. "The feeling might very well be mutual," said Vito. "You seem too honorable for Abolish. What are you doing with them?"

"What, we can't have honor over here? Says who?"

That was at least confirmation that they were indeed members of Abolish. "The many child-murderers and genocidal maniacs among your ranks, perhaps?"

The man laughed again. "Well, everyone's entitled to their opinion, eh? Even maniacs."

Vito's gaze moved between the differing attackers as they stalked slowly around his vision, watching him with obvious anticipation on their faces. This little exchange was very much a double-edged sword, right now. On the one hand, it was buying precious extra time for the civilians to escape, but on the other, it was also giving the enemy servants time to regenerate and regroup. He could see some of the downed and scorched ones in the back getting back up again.

Maybe it was unwise to let this draw out any further.

But no.

Prince David's safety came first. Lord Goffe had entrusted this task to him. The shame he would feel upon returning to Warrenhold alone...

There could be nothing worse. And not just for him, either. For the entirety of House Sebolt. The dishonor that would bring to his ancestors was painful to even countenance.

"You are a strange one," said Vito. "I know this may be rude, considering I have not given you mine, but would you tell me your name?"

"Rude, and yet somehow still so polite! Surely, you are the strange one here, my friend!"

"I will not argue with that."

"Hah! Alright. My name is Barnabas." And he hoisted his huge club over his shoulder with an audible thud. "Sure you still don't want to tell me yours?"

Vito almost wanted to smile. "How about this? If we ever meet again, I'll tell you then."

"Oho! Deal! Though, it's a bit unlikely that you and I will both live through this first encounter of ours."

"Not if you go easy on me," said Vito.

Barnabas guffawed again, even louder than before. "Stop making me laugh so much, damn you! I already don't want to kill you!"

"Our interests are aligned, then. I don't want you to kill me, either."

"Oh, man! At least I know you can't possibly be a member of the Vanguard, with a sense of humor like this!"

"3688

Kerikos' senses were telling Vito that Prince David and the other non-combatants had all made it through the hole and were running together. That was a relief, but he also had to be concerned about other enemies scattered throughout the castle. The reaper could sense so much chaos around Livingston, right now. It was difficult to parse through it all, but for the moment, their escape path seemed clear.

If they ran into trouble, would he be able to reach them in time? His hands were quite full here, but even if they weren't, the growing distance might become an issue.

It was time to go for that previous strategy he'd thought of. He needed to steer this fight toward potential allies.

"Why so quiet all of a sudden?" said Barnabas. "I was enjoying our conversation!"

"As was I," said Vito. "Apologies. Might you be willing to tell me what your goal here is?"

"Goal?" said Barnabas with another mild laugh. "Don't know, don't care. You'd have to ask the bigwigs about that."

Kerikos had to wonder if that was the truth. Clearly, this fellow had enough authority to make all these other Abolishers listen to him, so it seemed unlikely Barnabas here would be that uninformed about whatever this current operation was.

Playing dumb, perhaps?

"I'll tell you my name if you tell me your motive," tried Vito.

Barnabas' brow twitched. "You hard of hearing, friend? Can't tell you what I don't know."

Hmm. "Then maybe you could tell me who is leading this attack, instead."

"Now why would I tell you that?"

"Because you like me?"

"Heh. Not that much."

"Shame. What if I tell you my name in exchange?"

"You were so protective of that before, but now you want to use it as a bargaining chip? Not just tough, but wily, too, eh? Somethin' tells you're trying to take advantage of my amicable nature, right now. Probably feed me some bullshit alias, instead, hmm?"

"Same could be said about you," said Vito. "You wouldn't lie about your leader's name?"

"Of course not. I'm an honorable fellow, as you yourself have already pointed out."

"True. But if you're really so honorable, then you should trust me to be honorable in return."

"Aha. Unfortunately for you, I've made that mistake before and learned my lesson. It's a fine line between honorability and gullibility."

"Don't be like that," said Vito. "If we can't trust each other's word, then what are we even doing, right now?"

Barnabas rolled his shoulders. "Good question."

Aw, shit."

"3689

"No one interferes," said Barnabas, looking briefly around. The other Abolishers seemed disappointed, but none argued.

Vito was about to say something else, but Barnabas didn't give him time.

The man blitzed forward, wooden club cocked back for a big swing.

Vito reacted without thinking. He sacrificed both arms to a surge of molten lutetium as the rest of him dashed backward in a succession of quick hops.

Barnabas took the attack head on and didn't stop. The club crashed down just in front of Vito--and kept crashing even as he moved. Barnabas followed him with continued, thunderous swings, leaving craters and kicking up debris with each of Vito's hops.

And it soon became apparent to Vito that this was not going to stop. They were in a chase now, one spurred on by superhuman endurance. They were not going to get tired for hours, days, or even weeks, depending on how hard their reapers chose to push them.

The castle was taking more of a beating than Vito. In their wake, Barnabas' great wooden club annihilated inconvenient walls and rendered the ground virtually impassable for normal people.

There were close calls, though. Vito could feel the rush of air from each swing, enough so that it was almost a distraction unto itself. He wanted to slide through a blow for a counterattack, but he knew that to be a deadly gamble, at best. Barnabas was able to swing that thing as if it weighed no more than a knife.

So Vito decided to just keep blasting him with fire, instead. The attacks weren't doing much, but they weren't doing nothing, either. He could see Barnabas' smoldering, half-melted skin. It was obviously going to take a lot more than that in order to bring down a servant, but in a battle of attrition, Vito would eventually get there while these swings would not.

Still, this was not ideal. One slip up might just be the end. He didn't know if he'd be able to survive even a single attack from that club. It seemed a peculiar choice of weapon, and Vito had a rather strong suspicion that there was more to it than met the eye.

He had to endure. To stay focused. On both Barnabas and their environment. Leaping continually backwards like this was no easy feat. Kerikos had to make sure the way behind them was clear. That they weren't backing themselves into a corner."

"3690

But this also gave them an opportunity to steer the direction of the fight. Kerikos could sense potential allies in various directions. Vaguely familiar soul signatures. Moving with quickness and certitude. Castle guards, most likely.

They just had to make sure that those guards didn't confuse them with the attackers. Even with reapers for observational support, friendly fire was still undoubtedly a threat in the midst of all this chaos.

And the best way for Vito to distinguish himself as an immediate ally was to spare an extra attack for the castle guards' opponents.

Which would be quite difficult with Barnabas hounding him like this.

There was nothing for it. He'd have to take a risk, Vito decided. He needed to create enough of an opening for himself, first.

The same duplicate technique from before might do the trick. But yes, it would be a risk. If Barnabas wasn't fooled by the decoys when Vito tried to use them for cover, then Vito might very well have to eat that club with his face.

So the answer was to be patient, first. Try the duplicates multiple times. See how Barnabas reacted to them before committing to anything else.

And that was what he did.

The lutetium reacted as he engulfed himself in a deep reddish flame once more. He sent out the three duplicates, spreading behind him as he moved.

Barnabas changed tactics on him. Instead of continuing to pummel the ground, the man gave a big, sweeping swing of his club and caught two of the three duplicates at once--and almost the real Vito as well, if he didn't take an extra hop backward to avoid it in time.

Agh.

Barnabas didn't let up, either, and the chase continued.

Vito tried again. Five duplicates this time, spreading out even farther. It was more taxing on Kerikos, but it worked. Barnabas swung wide, catching three copies instead of the real thing.

Vito seized the opening. He circled around to Barnabas' back and grappled him under the club arm and around the neck. He twisted with all his strength, but the man's head didn't pop free like Vito intended. In fact, it hardly felt like Barnabas was under his control at all.

Barnabas' free hand found Vito's left shoulder and gripped it with such strength that the bones therein snapped instantly. And even from that awkward angle, when Barnabas yanked on the crushed shoulder, Vito felt that the man might actually succeed in pulling him off his back unless he did something."

He resorted to spikes again. Targeting the back of Barnabas' skull, in particular. It was right there, after all. Easy pickings.

And the spikes connected, too. Skewering the man's entire body, including the head. Straight through.

Barnabas did not stop moving, however. He still managed to yank Vito free and fling him away.

And he didn't let up there, either. He continued to give chase, swinging the club wildly again.

Vito was confused, but he didn't have the time to sit there and deconstruct what in the world had just happened. He returned to dodging and had to rely on Kerikos' extra thought process in order to reassess the situation.

He could see lutetium spikes all over Barnabas' body. They did not stay long. They were being pushed out by the undead regeneration.

That was a clue. Normal regeneration typically had trouble removing large foreign bodies from one's flesh.

But enhanced regeneration? Such as that of pan-forma? That would do the trick. And yet, that also made little sense here, because thus far, Barnabas had not been speaking with the telltale double-voice indicative of a hyperstate. So what was going on here?

Wait a moment.

Vito's eyes never strayed from the wooden club, but now he was seeing it in a new light. Hmm.

"What's the matter?" said Barnabas in the midst of his barrage. "You look confused."

But this time, Vito did indeed hear the two voices speaking in unison.

Kerikos felt like he understood. Barnabas' reaper had been concealed inside the soul-infused club this whole time, just waiting for the right moment to pop out and shift the tide of battle with a hyperstate.

"Neat trick," said Vito.

"I don't know what you mean," said Barnabas.

"Hmph."

This wasn't good. Pan-forma gave flat bonuses to a servant's durability, connectivity, and regeneration. Vito could still avoid these attacks, but for how much longer? The boost to connectivity could manifest in any number of surprising and unwelcome ways, depending on what Barnabas' exact ability was. Most likely, it was some form of transfiguration, since materializers tended to lead with it.

Well, Vito had a trick of his own in mind. The castle guards were close enough now that he could try to enact his plan.

Rather than attacking Barnabas in order to create a much more comfortable opening, he'd just have to use the duplicate technique in order to distract and then throw out a quick attack at the guard's opponents. It wouldn't be much, but hopefully, it would still be enough for the guards to realize that he was indeed on their side.

So that was what he did."

"3692

The duplicates went in all different directions, and soon as he saw Barnabas swing at the wrong ones, he sent out an extra duplicate--this one ablaze--toward the group of hostiles on the other side of the hall.

It soared over there like a burning missile and erupted into a blanketing inferno, catching multiple opponents on fire at once.

Good. That was--

Barnabas twisted suddenly and backhanded him across the face.

Vito staggered. And instinctively, he knew that the next, far more deadly blow would already be on the way. That meager attack could only have been meant to create an opening for a follow-up with that club.

So without thinking or even trying to regain his footing, Vito dropped to the ground just as the club swung horizontally over his head. Then he went for Barnabas' right leg, wrapping himself around it like a snake and twisting in order to pull Barnabas down the ground along with him.

Normally, this was a move that could paralyze the opponent with pain, but that obviously wasn't going to work on a servant. It was, however, still quite useful for shifting the momentum of the fight. By now, Vito knew only too well how dangerous it was to fight this guy up close, so he decided to scramble back up to his feet while still maintaining his grip on Barnabas' leg. Then he mustered all his strength and swung the man around like a sack of concrete, sending him crashing into a wall. Wood, plaster, and insulation exploded out of the impact point, covering the area in dust and debris.

And then there was an opening in the fight. Vito considered using it to dive through the debris and pummel Barnabas up close, but he decided not to risk it and throw a blanket of flames over the scene, instead.

This way, Kerikos could also reacquire the location of Prince David's soul. It wouldn't do if they lost track of him for too long.

Ah, there he was. A good distance away. And still moving, seemingly.

Barnabas stood up through the fire, sweeping it away with a single stroke of his club.

Vito expected another front assault, but the other man took a moment to say something, instead.

"I hate hypocrites," said Barnabas. He was scowling. Not looking at all like his previously laidback self.

Vito's brow furrowed, and he tilted his head. "Excuse me?"
"3693

"All that talk about honor," said Barnabas, "and yet what are you doing now? Trying to bring others into our fight. I told my men to hang back so that you and I could have a proper go of it. You disappoint me, stranger."

"That's not honor," countered Vito. "What you're talking about is merely pride. Honor is something done in service of others, not to satisfy one's own ego.”

“Rationalizations of the cowardly.”

“That is incorrect. Would I like for us to have a proper duel? Sure. But when you have responsibilities beyond indulging in your own personal desires, honor becomes something much greater than a simple feeling in your gut.”

Barnabas squinted at him but made no further retort.

“I respect your desire for an honest fight,” said Vito. “If I can spare your life, I will. But it seems to me that the company you keep has given you a false concept of what true honor is.” Not that Vito was terribly surprised by that. Anyone who participated in the wanton slaughter of civilians couldn’t have understood much about honor, no matter what they said.

Vito decided to hold his tongue on those last thoughts, though. He had a feeling that they would fall on deaf ears to any Abolisher, since they’d probably heard something similar countless times before. Kerikos had often found that people had an odd compulsion to disagree with arguments they’d heard too many times, regardless of how much merit said arguments actually had.

For his part, Barnabas remained quiet, merely standing there instead of continuing the attack.

Which Vito found surprising. Perhaps he should have used this opportunity to press his own advantage, but something was stopping him. Something in that uncertain expression on the other man’s face.

Before their dialogue could resume, however, another quake arrived; but this one was unlike any of the others.

It was sharp and brief. Not terribly disorienting--or even that dangerous, really.

But something else occurred along with it.

The entire corridor behind Barnabas was gone. The connecting rooms, too. Part of the courtyard. An entire chunk of the castle.

Just gone.

In its place was a great crater. A half-sphere, gouged out of the building and the earth. And stranger still, it looked so clearly cut. Not like the aftermath of an explosion. Rather, it looked more like the mass had simply been subtracted from the space that it had been occupying mere moments ago.

Wide-eyed, Vito had no idea what to make of it."
"3694

After another moment, he noticed people in the crater. They were gathered together at the bottom, looking around with apparent confusion.

Kerikos recognized their soul signatures as that of the Abolishers who'd just been in the area. They'd been spared from the blast--or whatever it was that had made the crater.

More disturbingly, Kerikos could not sense any of the castle guards who those Abolishers had just been fighting. Which could only mean one thing.

This crater was undoubtedly the work of Abolish. Perhaps their leader, even. So there was nothing to prevent another crater from appearing on top of Vito and Kerikos, right now.

They had to move. Barnabas and the other Abolishers were looking similarly befuddled, so Vito decided to take the opening to flee before they came back to their senses. This fight wasn't important. Only the Prince's safety was.

Kerikos had a bead on Prince David's position. Vito bolted through the corridor, bounding over rubble and weaving between more fights going on along the way. He spared a blanket of flaming lutetium for another group of attackers as he passed, but that was it. The remaining castle guards would have to fend for themselves.

Another problem arose when he sensed some of the previous Abolishers in pursuit. The last thing he wanted to do was bring hostiles closer to the Prince, but another brief quake cut that concern short, and Vito saw another gaping hole in the castle on his left. Where entire rooms had been, now only open air remained.

The pursuers were the lesser worry now, he felt. He had to get Prince

David away from these vaporizing blasts first. The pursuers could be dealt with later.

More running. Dodging. Weaving through mayhem. A tall window offered a shortcut, and he took it, crashing through to reach the outer edge of the castle grounds. He had eyes on Prince David now, scrambling through an enormous garden among a crowd of other non-combatants. They'd nearly reached the castle's eastern exit. Would that be far enough away from the danger? Probably not, Vito felt.

Then his vision went white, and his mind blanked out. When he regained awareness, he was flat on his back in the grass.

What in the world was that? Had he gotten hit? Was he hit? Where was he hit? Where? He couldn't feel--

The left half of his body was missing. No arm. No leg. He still had both eyes, though."

"3695

Vito was floundering. His mind felt scattered. His senses. His limbs. Why weren't they reappearing? The regeneration. It was still happening. He could feel it. But it was slow. Not like pan-forma. What happened to the hyperstate?

His senses. Yes. No. Foggy. Too greatly diminished. Something was very wrong, and he quickly realized what it was.

'Kerikos?' he thought. 'Where are you?'

There. Vito saw the reaper in the grass, not far away. Smoldering with ethereal, black-and-white smoke. Wounded. Badly.

To Vito's eyes, the reaper was supposed to look like a honey badger, but right now, Kerikos was virtually without form. Little more than a blob.

Vito crawled with his one arm, trying to will the other to grow back faster.

So much blood. Still gushing out of his wounds even as they healed.

He didn't understand. How had they been separated? Where had the attack even come from?

Might this be how he was going to die? Without even a clue as to what happened? Just caught up in some mayhem beyond his comprehension? Wrong place, wrong time? In some foreign land? Never to see his family again? His dorky little sister? His stubborn father? His brave cousins? Lord Dimas?

This wasn't right. It wasn't fair, either. He couldn't explain why. Couldn't think it through. Couldn't process any of it.

But he could feel it. In his gut, he could feel it. How wrong this was. How cruel.

He kept pushing. Kept crawling. Somehow, with each passing moment, it seemed to be getting harder, not easier. That also made no sense. He was still regenerating. He should've felt the improvement. And yet.

It was like the world itself was pushing down on him. Telling him to stop crawling. Telling him to give up.

It kept growing more difficult. His vision stretched before him. It felt like Kerikos was getting farther away, too. Not closer. That couldn't be right. Even time itself was all wrong. This felt like an eternity going by. How could Kerikos be so far away? He'd been right there a moment ago.

Agh. He knew the problem. Rationally, he knew it. He was delirious. His senses were lying to him. Aftermath of the hyperstate. That had to be it. Only explanation.

Or he was dying. Truly dying. Turning slowly feral after his link to his reaper had been severed.

No. No, no. He refused to believe it. That was just the fear talking. Trying to take over. Make him panic.

Kerikos was right there. Wounded, sure, but still alive. He could almost touch him."

"3696

Something was pushing down on him now. As if gravity had suddenly quadrupled. He could feel it there on his back. The added pressure. Almost like the foot of a giant. Was it real? An actual giant pinning him down?

He discarded the questions as soon as they entered his mind. Distractions. Unimportant. Didn't matter if it was real or not. Didn't matter if the Mad Demon himself was sitting on his back, right now.

The only thing that mattered was reaching Kerikos.

His muscles ached. Fatigue struck.

But so what?

His body didn't want to listen to him?

So what? He was in charge, not his body.

He could hardly think straight?

So what? There was only one thing to think about, anyway.

Time stretching away from him?

So what? Time could stretch for a thousand years. Vito would crawl for a thousand and one.

The entire world was unraveling around him? Peeling away from his vision like a torn painting?

So. What.

He crawled. And kept crawling. Ignoring all the rest. Everything else.

And finally, he reached his reaper. With his lone hand, he grabbed the lump of soul power that was Kerikos and pulled him close.

And he breathed. He didn't know what to do now, but that was fine. For the moment, that was fine. He could figure that out later.

Ground shaking.

Whatever.

Kerikos was alive. But just barely. Completely unconscious. Unable to reinitiate the hyperstate. Problem? Mm. Maybe for the best. Might not have been able to maintain it for much longer, anyway.

Tired.

Absurdly so.

Not sure he'd ever felt so tired before. Couldn't think. Couldn't recall. Wanted to slip off. To sleep. To rest. Deserved it, didn't he? Such a long day. Time to let go.

...Except.

Bother. There was a bother. Still. Somehow. Somewhere.

Back of his mind. Couldn't grasp it. But it was there. Scratching at him. Yelling at him. Familiar faces with familiar voices. So familiar. And yet, he felt certain that he'd never seen them before. How could that be?

They were reaching out to him. And he heard what they were saying. Just a bit. Just enough.

"Not yet."

His palm found the hard earth. And after a moment, his other palm found it, too. Regrown. Still regenerating. Slow but steady.

His bare skin felt the grass again. And the cool air.

No. Not cool, actually. Extremely warm. An intense heat. Had he set himself on fire again? That didn't seem right."

"3697

He climbed to his knees and finally regained a proper sense of environmental awareness as his vision cleared. And yet he felt more confused than ever, because he could hardly understand what he was looking at.

The entire world was on fire. Everything around him. Ablaze.

Even himself. All up his arms and legs and chest. But these weren't the reddish flames of his lutetium.

And strangest of all, they didn't hurt, either. Because of numbness? No. The flames weren't burning him. Not cooking his flesh.

If anything, he was feeling somewhat better, actually. Invigorated. This was the intense heat that he felt before. It wasn't painful. It was like a deeply warm embrace, covering his entire body.

But he could see other things burning around him, too. Smoke and damage. Craters in the ground. Burning men running across his vision. Screaming.

What the hell was happening here?

Kerikos stirred within his grasp. 'Ogh...'

'Kerikos!' thought Vito. 'You're conscious?!'

'Mgh... I don't... what...?'

Before he could question the reaper any further, however, a blinding light in the sky stole his attention, and he had to shield his eyes. When it abated, he saw a great fireball suspended there, looking not unlike a meteor, but it was just hung there in midair, seemingly not moving.

And then it clicked for him. Could that be Jackson up there?

Vito had heard that the Radiant Sentinel, the Star of the West, had gone mysteriously missing after a terrible battle with the Mad Demon in the Uego Desert. Theories abounded about what might have become of him, but one of the more popular ones had been that he was recovering here in Intar.

If that was really him, then perhaps the situation wasn't so--

Agh, he was getting distracted, Vito realized. He needed to find Prince David again. In all this chaos, that was going to be difficult. He needed a reaper's senses.

'Kerikos, can you hear me?'

'Rgh...'

'Kerikos!'

No response, this time.

Shit.

He tucked the reaper under his arm as he looked around. The flames all over his body had diminished, but they weren't entirely vanishing, and the same could be said for those covering the courtyard. It was a bit easier to see, at least. And he recalled the general direction in which the Prince had been fleeing.

So he started running.

Whatever else was going on around him, whatever this mad battle was and whatever big names might be involved in it, Vito Sebolt knew his task. And he was going to see it done."

"3698 -- CCCIV.

Chapter Three Hundred Four: 'Awakening of the Sun...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Abbas Saqqaf groaned as his eyes eased open. They resisted. They wanted to stay closed. And he wanted to let them, too. But in his gut, he knew he couldn't. He knew something was amiss.

He tried to sit up and encountered more resistance there. He pushed through that, too.

He found a dimly lit room around him. A bed beneath him. The smell of morning dew in the air.

"There you are," came a voice on his left. "Welcome back."

It was the Lord of Warrenhold sitting there, he realized between blinks. The young black man had a grip on Abbas' forearm. Instinctually, he wanted to ask why, but when he laid eyes on the glowing object in Hector's other hand, he became much more interested in that.

The Living Core. Hector was holding it. Hector was using it.

Abbas stared.

"Your family has been worried about you," said Hector, letting go of him, "but not as much as they would have been, if they knew just how close you and Worwal came to killing yourselves. Before I let anyone else in here, you and I need to have a talk."

Worwal? Ah, there he was on the right. To his eyes, reapers were regal horned lizards with ethereal black-and-white flames tracing the outlines of their bodies.

'It seems we've upset our host,' said Worwal.

"I'm not mad," said Hector, sounding quite mad. "But this thing you've created is incredibly dangerous. I wish you would've at least told me more about it before actually trying to forge it."

Ah...

Abbas had to clear his throat before speaking. "Yes, well... with the benefit of hindsight, I would have to agree. It did not seem such a dangerous idea at the time..."

"Creating a living, thinking interface didn't seem that dangerous?" said Hector.

The doubt in the young man's voice made Abbas feel suddenly defensive, but he had to ask something else first. "What have you learned of it so far?"

"Oh, quite a bit," said Hector. "I've learned that it's capable of making moral judgments. I've learned that it can influence you emotionally. I've learned that it can manipulate soul power and ardor. But most importantly, I've learned that, personality-wise, it's kind of a dick."

Abbas almost couldn't believe what he was hearing.

Almost.

When dealing with this particular person, Abbas was somehow beginning to feel as though incredulity was to be expected."
"3698 -- CCCIV.

Chapter Three Hundred Four: 'Awakening of the Sun...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Abbas Saqqaf groaned as his eyes eased open. They resisted. They wanted to stay closed. And he wanted to let them, too. But in his gut, he knew he couldn't. He knew something was amiss.

He tried to sit up and encountered more resistance there. He pushed through that, too.

He found a dimly lit room around him. A bed beneath him. The smell of morning dew in the air.

"There you are," came a voice on his left. "Welcome back."

It was the Lord of Warrenhold sitting there, he realized between blinks. The young black man had a grip on Abbas' forearm. Instinctually, he wanted to ask why, but when he laid eyes on the glowing object in Hector's other hand, he became much more interested in that.

The Living Core. Hector was holding it. Hector was using it.

Abbas stared.

"Your family has been worried about you," said Hector, letting go of him, "but not as much as they would have been, if they knew just how close you and Worwal came to killing yourselves. Before I let anyone else in here, you and I need to have a talk."

Worwal? Ah, there he was on the right. To his eyes, reapers were regal horned lizards with ethereal black-and-white flames tracing the outlines of their bodies.

'It seems we've upset our host,' said Worwal.

"I'm not mad," said Hector, sounding quite mad. "But this thing you've created is incredibly dangerous. I wish you would've at least told me more about it before actually trying to forge it."

Ah...

Abbas had to clear his throat before speaking. "Yes, well... with the benefit of hindsight, I would have to agree. It did not seem such a dangerous idea at the time..."

"Creating a living, thinking interface didn't seem that dangerous?" said Hector.

The doubt in the young man's voice made Abbas feel suddenly defensive, but he had to ask something else first. "What have you learned of it so far?"

"Oh, quite a bit," said Hector. "I've learned that it's capable of making moral judgments. I've learned that it can influence you emotionally. I've learned that it can manipulate soul power and ardor. But most importantly, I've learned that, personality-wise, it's kind of a dick."

Abbas almost couldn't believe what he was hearing.

Almost.

When dealing with this particular person, Abbas was somehow beginning to feel as though incredulity was to be expected."

"3699

Abbas sat up more fully in his bed. "...Personality-wise, you say? So you have already managed to communicate with it?"

"Yeah," said Hector.

"How in the world did you accomplish that? I have not yet created instructions for its use."

"Oh, uh. I just kinda... connected it to the Big Candle and dove right in."

"The Big Candle?"

"Right, uh. Since we've got this Mini-Candle now. Big Candle and Mini-Candle."

Wow. Abbas needed a moment. "Alright, well, before you go renaming my creations permanently, that object is called the Living Core."

"Oh. Huh. Okay. I guess that sounds better than Mini-Candle, anyway."

"If you were able to communicate with it, then I am surprised you were not able to learn its name without my help."

Hector paused for an odd look, then clicked his tongue. "Uh... well, there might be a reason for that..."

"What do you mean?" said Abbas.

"Ah... I'm not sure how to tell you this, but, er... this thing, the Living Core... it doesn't seem to like you very much."

Abbas blinked again and furrowed his brow. "Excuse me?"

"Like I mentioned, it's kind of a dick. It doesn't appreciate you. In fact, that's why you and Worwal both nearly died."

Died? Hmm. Yes, this was the second time Hector was mentioning that, but only now was it beginning to sink in. "How... how did it nearly kill us?"

Hector took a long breath. "Well, from what I've been able to piece together, this Living Core here... ah... it led you astray. Technically, I guess it didn't try to kill you directly, meaning with its own power, but... it was the equivalent of leading you into a minefield. With a blindfold on."

"...How do you know this?"

Hector scratched his brow. "It's hard to explain. The power that this thing can tap into is the same as the Candle. Or maybe that's only when it's connected to the Candle. I'm not sure yet. But the point is, it leads to a deep, dark place. Full of... incredible power. Infinite, maybe. It might be what they call the Void."

Abbas remained quiet, though he exchanged looks with Worwal.

"I've felt it once before," Hector went on. "Recently, actually. In my meditations. So I knew a little of how to deal with it. But you..." Hector leveled a stare at Abbas. "Was that the first time you've ever encountered it?"

"3700

Abbas chewed on that question for a bit as he met Hector's gaze. He decided against answering it straight away. "The Void... that is what Abolish calls it. Their god."

"Yeah, but I don't think it's as simple as that," said Hector. He squinted. "And something tells me that you don't think so, either."

Hmm. "What do you know of the Void?" said Abbas.

"...I asked you first," said Hector. "You're not trying to avoid my question, are you?"

Hmph. He supposed there was no point in trying to hide anything, considering how invested he and his kin already were with this young man. "...No, that was not my first time encountering it. I've glimpsed it before. A few different times, in truth.”

Hector’s head reared back a little, but the stern expression on his face didn’t change into one of surprise. “So you knew the danger. And did it, anyway.”

Abbas pulled his legs over to the side of the bed and sat on the edge, putting his back to Hector but not standing to his feet just yet. “Of course I did.”

“Then why did you--? Agh. That was so reckless!”

“Hah! Hector. This is the risk we take. This is the nature of working with a Fusion Forge. I told you before, did I not? The Candle may be “gentle,” but that does not make it harmless. In some ways, that may even make it more dangerous. It can lure one into a false sense of security.”

“I understand that,” said Hector. “But you still could have at least told me you were planning to do something risky. That way, I would’ve been more prepared to help you, if something went wrong. Like it did.”

“Hector. Every time I use the Forge, this can happen. There is no safe handling of it. I knew the danger, yes, but I had no reason to think that this instance would be any different from the others. Because, frankly, it wasn’t. This was just the first time things went wrong.” He stood up and straightened his robe. “There will probably be more.”

The young Lord of Warrenhold stood up, too. “Respectfully, Lord Abbas, that’s a stupid approach to take. And unlike you.”

Abbas chortled. “I don’t disagree. But I’m not going to stop using the Forge.”

“I’m not saying you should,” said Hector. “I’m saying you should be smarter about it. We should be smarter about it. Let me help you.””
"3701

“Help me in what capacity?” said Abbas. “You’ve already done more than I could have imagined.”

“The Void,” said Hector. “Talk to me about it. When have you encountered it before?”

Abbas had no idea where this was going, but he supposed there was no reason not to answer. "That is a difficult matter. It's something that inventors have contended with throughout history. Even before I ever faced it myself, I had heard the tales. About how the greatest minds to ever live could reach out and touch this... realm of brilliance. Some called it the Void, yes. Others called it Enlightenment. Or the Heavens. But all agreed that it was something beyond the self. A rarely reachable place where new ideas could be discovered, where old ideas could be found again, and where struggling ideas could come together and find beautiful harmony."

Hector remained quiet, merely listening.

At the boy's apparent attentiveness, Abbas decided to continue. "As for myself, I have been fortunate enough to encounter this feeling on... six occasions that I can remember. Now, whether or not I truly came face-to-face with the so-called Void in these moments... well, that may be unknowable. I can only report how I felt. And the results that followed. Each time, I was met with a great euphoric epiphany. A breakthrough in the work that I had been toiling away at for... years, in most cases. And there is no doubt in my mind that I would have been incapable of building my armor if I had never experienced those moments."

Hector nodded. "Okay. I understand the problem."

"Problem?"

"Yes," the young lord went on. "The problem, Lord Abbas, is that you're too smart."

Abbas returned a dull blink. "Excuse me?"

"First, you need to adjust your mindset. Because you're too smart, you need to slow down and come to the realization--the epiphany, to use your word--that you're actually not smart. That you're a big dumbass."

"Hector, I am receiving some rather mixed messaging here..."

"Look. The Void will turn your own intellect against you. Your mind will become lost to infinity. So... yeah, in a weird way, you need to become stupider."

'In that regard, this conversation will surely help,' said Worwal.

At that scathing remark, Abbas might've expected the Lord of Warrenhold to take offense.

But Hector just paused for a laugh, instead.

Which ended up pulling one out of Worwal, too.

Quite the uncommon sight from his reaper, Abbas noted with mild shock."

"3702

"I know how it sounds," said Hector, still chuckling a bit. "But I'm serious. I've seen this problem many times, thanks to the Candle's memories. It knows the history of other Forges, too. Forges have always attracted brilliant inventors. And they've always come up against this same problem. You understand? I need you to listen to me on this. If you don't adjust your approach, then the Void--or whatever you wanna call it--it'll lure you in and eat you alive."

Worwal glanced at Abbas, and they didn't even need to exchange words privately in order to know what each other was thinking. Abbas returned a nod, knowing that the reaper would be able to sum up both of their thoughts just fine.

'We appreciate your concern,' said Worwal, 'but let us not forget that, Candle or not, you are still quite inexperienced in these matters, Lord Goffe. Nor are you an inventor. Abbas and I have our own process. We have been doing this for a very long time. And yes, we do understand the risks. But trying to "adjust our approach," as you put it, would not be as simple a matter as you seem to be implying. Moreover, it might just ruin everything and set our progress back by years, potentially. Which is time that our kin may not have. Particularly, our subjects back in Sair.'

Hector's brow lowered now. "You know what would really set you back? Getting yourselves killed."

'That seems a bit rich, coming from you,' countered Worwal. 'You think we aren't aware of your recent exploits? Knowing that you are not nearly as old as you pretend to be, the risks that you have taken are truly absurd. I would've thought that you and Garovel would understand our position a bit better than this.'

“Oh, I understand it perfectly well,” said Hector. “And you make a fair point. Maybe it is a bit rich coming from us. But that’s just another reason why I know what I’m talking about here.”

‘Heh. The confidence of youth. And the naivete, too.’

At that, Garovel, who’d thus far remained silent behind Hector, decided to chime in. ‘Oh, I’m sorry,’ said the reaper, sounding not sorry at all. ‘Who was it again that pulled your sorry asses out of a coma just now? Ah, that’s right. It was my boy Hector here. So how about you show a little more respect and do as he asks, hmm?’

“Garovel--” tried Hector.

"3703

The reaper wasn’t done, though. ‘He might be too nice to say it, but I’m not. It seems to me that you could both do with a dose of humility here. You should take Hector’s advice seriously before you get yourselves killed for some completely avoidable reason. And make me sad. You don’t want to make me sad, do you? I hate being sad.’

At this point, Abbas knew that many reapers would take Garovel’s words as a challenge, of sorts, and begin arguing relentlessly with him.

But Worwal was not one such reaper. A fact for which Abbas was eternally grateful.

Instead, Worwal merely looked over at Abbas and returned a nod of his reptilian head, informing him that it was his turn to say what they were both thinking.

“Amusing,” said Abbas, “but I am still a bit confused about what ‘advice’ we are meant to be taking here. I am unsure how I am supposed to ‘be stupider,’ precisely. If I am to take that more seriously, then perhaps you should propose it more seriously, hmm?”

Hector and Garovel exchanged looks of their own, probably consulting each other privately.

Then Hector spoke up again. “Okay. So. I might not be the best at explaining things... but, uh... it’s like this: when you come up against the Void again, your mental state is key. You need to be rock solid.

Unmovable. You said it yourself: you experienced a 'euphoric epiphany,' right? That's what's dangerous. When your emotions try to take over, when they fill you with a sense of power and... ambition, I guess... that's when things are most likely to go horribly wrong. That's when the Void will lure you into infinity and make it so you never wake up again. Both of you."

'Which is what almost happened, by the way,' added Garovel. 'Thankfully, you weren't yet so far gone that Hector couldn't dive in and retrieve you. With the aid of your Living Core, it must be said. I'm not trying to argue that you didn't create something incredible, because you most certainly did.'

Hmm. Interesting.

Rather than responding right away, Abbas took his time mulling that information over.

Worwal had a question for them, though. 'How long were we unconscious?'

'Tough to say for sure,' said Garovel. 'We didn't know you were in trouble for a while, because your family thought you were merely being... shall we say, 'eccentric' by barricading yourselves inside the tree.'

"Barricading?" said Abbas.

"3704

'Oh, right,' said Garovel. 'The Candle went completely out of control, and there were branches everywhere. Hector had to cut a path to you. He set the tree on fire, actually.'

"What?!"

"Agh, you didn't have to tell--"

'Eh, it's fine. Don't worry. Raheem put it out. That's just how worried Hector was about you. Almost accidentally destroyed one of the most valuable objects on the planet. What a great friend he is, right?'

"Garovel, please stop..."

‘Interesting,’ said Worwal. ‘But I doubt a bit of fire would have destroyed the Candle.’

‘You’re probably right,’ said Garovel. ‘Would’ve been funny, though. In a tragic sort of way.’

‘I think you and I may have very different senses of humor.’

‘Maybe. But anyway, to finish answering your question, you were probably out for a few hours, at least. Raheem could give you a better estimate, I suspect.’

Abbas’ eyes returned to the Living Core in Hector’s hand. The metal band was already wrapped around the boy’s wrist, Abbas noticed. “You said... you used the Core to retrieve Worwal and I?”

‘That’s right,’ said Garovel. ‘And apparently, it wasn’t too keen on cooperating, either. Hector practically had to force it.’

Hector asked the next question. “Did you give it such a bad personality on purpose? That had to have been an accident, right?”

Well, now they were coming up on a portion of the conversation that he didn’t necessarily wish to discuss. Out of embarrassment, primarily. But he supposed there wasn’t much point in trying to save face now, especially when keeping information from these two could just end up causing more problems later.

“...Truthfully,” said Abbas slowly, “the development of the Core required me to tread into... unfamiliar territory. Do you know what a pseudo-consciousness is?”

‘Is it what it sounds like?’ said Garovel. ‘A fake personality?’

“Somewhat,” said Abbas. “More specifically, the term pseudo-consciousness refers to an advanced technique in integration. It is what you might call a ‘soul construct.’ That is, a pocket of soul power that is able to react to some form of stimuli. Typically, that stimulus is a person pressing their own soul power into the associated object. That is the most primitive form of pseudo-consciousness, though it is still quite advanced by conventional integration standards.”

“Hmm,” hummed Hector. “This thing seems way more advanced than just that. It can react to a lot more than just my soul power. I mean, I can talk to it.”

"Y-yes..." Abbas rubbed his chin as his eyes slowly widened. "I must admit, that is... unexpected."

"3705

Hector looked confused. "Unexpected? What's unexpected, exactly? The fact that I can talk to it? Or the fact that it even has as personality in the first place?"

"The latter, I'm afraid," said Abbas. "My intent for the Living Core was to have to have it become the foundation of a larger interfacing mechanism for non-servants in the use of ardor. I felt that a complex pseudo-consciousness would be well-suited to that purpose. But from the way you are describing your interactions with it, perhaps I... erred in some way. Hmm."

'So you accidentally created a sentient being,' said Garovel.
'Wonderful.'

Abbas paused on that thought. Had he truly done so?

No, no, that couldn't be right. Sure, his plans for the Living Core had been quite advanced--perhaps the most advanced individual item he'd ever developed, even--but it just didn't make sense to him that it could have manifested an entire personality without him realizing. Its ability to "think" shouldn't have even been that sophisticated. It was only meant to simplify complex processes and bridge the sensory gap for individuals who could not innately detect ardor.

This didn't make sense. How could it have--?

Abbas' expression slackened as a thought struck him, and he felt compelled to ask a new question. "Wait a moment. You said that you... 'connected' the Core to the Candle and then 'dove right in,' didn't you?"

"Er. Yeah?"

"And that is when you began to communicate with it?"

"Yeah..."

Oh. Gods. "And are you still able to communicate with it even now? At this very moment?"

Hector's eyes went from him to the Core and back again. "Y-yeah..."

Abbas rubbed his temples with one hand as he processed that. "Then in that case... I believe that this 'accident' as you put it, is not my doing. Or at least, not entirely. It is also yours."

"W-what do you...? Uh... Oh." Hector smacked his lips. "We shouldn't have done that, huh?"

Abbas sighed. "Probably not, no."

'Sorry, I'm a little lost here,' said Garovel. 'What shouldn't we have done?'

"When you connected the Core to the Candle--especially so soon after its creation--you essentially poured... an unknowable quantity of ardor and... gods know what else... directly into the Core. So it is not unreasonable to think that the Core may have... shall we say, imprinted some of that metaphysical data onto itself?" Abbas tapped his head and groaned. "Agh, the memory structure! I spent so long weaving it together! I'd just put the finishing touches on it when I passed out, which means... it would have been empty and pristine at the time you connected it to the Candle... ah..."

"3706

"H-hold on a second here," said Hector. "You're saying that its problematic personality came from the Candle?"

Abbas was hardly listening, however, as he rubbed his brow. "Ugh, I'm already dreading what I'm going to see when I look at it again. If an entire personality has taken root in it, then I can only imagine what a mess the memory structure has become. I probably won't even be able to make heads or tails of it for weeks..." Agh, or even longer, potentially. He hadn't examined very many sentient objects before, but they were always absurdly complex. In the past, he'd tried referencing neurological maps as a point of comparison, but they never seemed to help much. The difference between a fully ardor-based mind and a human brain was simply too great, apparently.

But perhaps he should treat this as yet another opportunity to learn. With the Core being so portable, it could possibly serve him well as a point of comparison with similar objects. The Candle itself would obviously be the most convenient for that purpose, but given its intimate role in the Core's creation, it would almost certainly be of limited use here. Their structures would probably be practically identical. In which case, it might be best to compare them for their differences rather than their similarities.

No, what he needed was a sentient object--preferably more than one--that had no ties to the Candle whatsoever. That would likely prove the most illuminating. But he couldn't do that here, now could he? Such an endeavor would no doubt require--

"Lord Abbas," came Hector's voice, along with a forceful hand on his shoulder. "Can you hear me?" He sounded concerned.

Abbas saw the young man there, looking up at him. Apparently, he and Hector had both moved closer to the entrance of the tent. Ah. Abbas had always had a mildly troublesome habit of unconsciously pacing back and forth when brainstorming. "Apologies," he said. "I was merely lost in thought. Nothing to worry about."

'I told you,' said Worwal. 'He is fine. He does that all the time. It's not a side effect of anything.'

Hector pulled his hand back. "Okay, well... good. You just woke up, you know. You had me worried for a second."

"Did I ignore an important question?" said Abbas, far from the first time in his life.

'Yes,' said Garovel. 'Several, actually. He really does that all the time?'

"3707

'Only when he gets particularly excited about his work,' said Worwal. 'So yes, all the time.'

'Sounds like a real hassle,' said Garovel. 'You have my sympathies.'

'Heh, thank you. And knowing what I do of your servant, you also have mine, a'hkin.'

'Oh, wow. I haven't been called that in millennia. I'm not sure it suits me, but I appreciate the gesture, at least.'

"Which questions did I miss?" asked Abbas.

"Uh... well, to put 'em all together, I guess I was just wondering how the personality for the Living Core could have come from the Candle when... I mean, the Core literally told me that it put you into that coma. So the personality must've been there before we connected it to the Candle, because that happened after you and Worwal were already passed out."

"Ah, yes. An understandable point of confusion. There are two possible explanations for that. Both of which harbor some rather unfortunate implications, I'm afraid. The first is, in my estimation, far more likely. And that would be that the Core's personality did indeed already exist within the Candle. So it would also remember doing that to us."

"Huh. Wouldn't that mean that the Candle itself hates you, too?"

"Not necessarily." Abbas allowed a beat to pass. "But yes, probably."

"Aw, shit. And the second explanation?"

"Temporal interference," said Abbas.

"Say what?"

"When dealing with Fusion Forges--or dense pockets of ardor in general--time itself can become something of a blurry concept. For example, the precise moment that something is created can turn into more of a... 'range' of creation, rather than a singular instant."

"What the heck? Why would that happen?"

"Oh, any number of reasons, depending on the exact nature of the object in question. But from what I have read, it can be especially likely to occur when the object being created is something particularly influential over ardor itself. It is an interesting phenomenon. I remember reading one theory that said it was a consequence of an ardor feedback loop." Abbas tilted his head as he recalled the essay more fully. "In fact, it said that such a feedback loop, if unable to rectify itself, could result in a spatial distortion akin to a... black hole. Hmm..."

Hector just stared at him.

Worwal's next words were wrapped in the echo of privacy. 'You do realize that we're trying NOT to come off as unhinged madmen in front of our gracious host, right?"

"3708

Perhaps the reaper had a point.

But oh well. In this moment, Abbas Saqqaf could not bring himself to care about appearances. It seemed quite clear to him now that the young Hector Goffe of Atreya was going to be an important ally for the foreseeable future. Trying to present a false image to him, therefore, would not be good in the long run, even if it made things less bumpy in the here and now.

The glowing orb in Hector's grasp drew the young man's glance, along with a raised eyebrow.

Abbas wondered what that might be about, but when Hector elected not to say anything, the Lord Saqqaf decided to steer the conversation elsewhere. "In any case, I will take what you have told me into serious consideration. Worwal may pretend to know everything, but I will not."

'Hey.'

"It may well be true that we should reevaluate our approach to using the Forge," said Abbas. "And your perspective on the Void is... intriguing to me. I shall have to give that more thought. But in the meantime, I must get back to work. The Core is but the first step in a larger project. More of a proof of concept than a finished product."

"Ooh, yikes," said Hector. "It doesn't like hearing that."

Abbas returned a flat smile. "Heh. Perhaps I shouldn't even bother examining that one and instead merely leave it in your care. How would you feel about keeping it?"

"Uh. I'm not sure, but I kinda feel like I have no choice. How would you feel if I decided to destroy it?"

Abbas blinked. "Why would you do that?"

"Because it's insanely dangerous."

Abbas kept blinking. "And you just told me that it doesn't like what I was saying. I can't imagine it was too pleased to hear those words from you."

"Oh, it already knows how I feel about it. We had a long chat before you woke back up. If it can't learn right from wrong, at least in the most basic sense, then I don't really care how much power it has to offer us. It's too dangerous to keep around."

"...You are treading into the territory of complex ethical questions, Hector. That may not be a human being in your hand there, but it is still a sentient, thinking entity that you are talking about killing."

Hector's gaze was steady. "I know. But it tried to murder you and Worwal. And possibly also Garovel."

'Yup,' said Garovel. 'Hates my guts, too, apparently.'"
"3709

Hmm. Abbas couldn't help being a bit surprised at how certain Hector sounded of his convictions here. Young people did not often have such feelings toward such matters, he'd found. It usually took them quite some time to determine their beliefs in one direction or the other.

But for the few young people who did have such feelings, it was usually a red flag. A warning sign. That they were either thoughtless toward the real consequences of their actions, or that they simply had a callous--or even cruel--nature to them, deep down.

Neither of those descriptions seemed to fit Hector here, but it was also still too soon to be sure. They hadn't actually known this fellow for very long, had they?

There was a third explanation, though. For an attitude like this in a young person. Abbas had seen it a few times.

It could manifest when a young person had been forced to confront the matter by a particularly horrific event. When they'd been given no choice but to reach a strong decision about it.

And right now, observing this young man's gaze, Abbas was leaning toward that explanation. What exactly had this child been through? Even among Sandlord and Rainlord children--children who tended to mature quite quickly--this was rare to see.

It was one thing to bear witness to some terrible trauma. That was more than bad enough. But it was another thing to be forced into a terrible decision regarding that trauma, too.

If it hadn't felt wildly inappropriate to do so, Abbas might have inquired further.

Instead, he decided to stay on topic. Hector and Garovel were already being quite generous with how much time they were giving him to think.

"...To be quite blunt," said Abbas, "I would be upset if you destroyed the Living Core. Even disregarding how much effort I put into its creation, I simply do not see how there would be any need to destroy it. In the worst case, putting it in storage would be the more desirable outcome."

Hector made no response, but his eyes went to the floor, and he rubbed his chin.

Abbas kept going. "Especially considering the fact that you do not know how the Candle might react to its destruction. If it feels any sort of attachment to the Core, then you would be jeopardizing our relationship with it, too."

"3710

'You make a fair point,' said Garovel. 'Perhaps we should emphasize that Hector and I would much prefer to keep the Core around, as well. No matter how much of a jerk it is, we would take no pleasure in the destruction of such an incredible object. In fact, one of our primary goals for Warrenhold is to use it as a place to preserve knowledge far into the future, and I would say this little guy qualifies.'

Abbas recalled them mentioning the like before. "That is some comfort, then. But generally speaking, I do hope that you and Hector will never grow too eager to deliver death and punishment. It is a timeless problem that those in power must struggle with: that we do not become callous or cruel with the passage of time."

And Abbas half-expected Hector to return a dismissive look or some word of protest--as youth was often wont to do--but the boy surprised him yet again with his silence, with the seriousness in his expression, and with the slight nod he gave.

A lull in the conversation arrived, but it didn't take long for Garovel to fill it.

'Well, I suppose we should let your family in here before they worry themselves into a frenzy,' said the reaper. 'But one last thing: have you made any progress on that Kag we asked you about?'

"Ah... um. No."

'Oh. Been too busy, huh? That's a shame. Or is it that you just don't think you can do it?'

'What?' said Worwal.

Uh-oh.

'It's okay if you can't,' said Garovel. 'I mean, Kags are pretty rare to begin with, and recreating a specific one doesn't exactly seem like it would be a cakewalk. I understand if it's too much for you.'

'Too much?' said Worwal, hardly able to conceal the irritation in his tone.

Abbas felt compelled to intervene privately before things got out of hand. 'Worwal, relax. It is an innocent question.'

The reaper's next words were also private. 'A mere Kag? Too much for you? Laughable. Is Garovel stupid? Or just trying to annoy me? Agh, this must be some ploy.'

'I don't think he knows you that well yet,' said Abbas. 'Calm down before you say something we both regret.'

'Mrgh.'

Garovel picked up on the abrupt silence. 'Fellas? Something wrong?'

'Listen to his smug tone,' said Worwal, still privately. 'I hate him.'

Abbas had to consciously avoid rolling his eyes. 'No, you don't. Just let me do the talking.'

"3711

‘Go on, then,’ Worwal told him.

“What exactly do you need this Kag for again?” said Abbas. “I don’t recall what you told us before.”

‘That is because they didn’t tell us anything,’ said Worwal, no longer with the echo of privacy. ‘They just asked if we could make one for some monolith back in Atreya.’

Abbas gave the reaper a look.

‘Alright, fine,’ said Garovel. ‘I’ll admit: we were being a little cagey with the details. It’s a personal project that I’ve been working on for a very long time, so I’m a bit reluctant to go into it too much.’ He spared a glance at Hector. ‘But I suppose if the two of you deem it important, we could reveal a few things. Not that there’s that much to be revealed. I’m not trying to hype it up that much.’

‘A long-term project, you say?’ said Worwal. ‘How long, precisely?’

Garovel bobbed his reptilian head a little. ‘Oh, you know... a couple thousand years or so.’

‘And yet you also say you’ve not made much progress on it?’

‘What can I say? I’m easily distracted.’

Worwal snickered.

Well, that was a good sign, at least, Abbas felt. He decided to jump in again before Worwal’s mood had the opportunity worsen. “Tell us about this project then, if you please.”

‘Okay. Uh. I’m guessing you’re familiar with the name Rathmore, yes?’

Abbas’ head reared back. “Certainly.”

‘Well, one of his Tools is in Atreya. Rathmore’s Gate, to be exact. We were investigating it, and we think a Kag might be able to reveal some of its long-held secrets.’

Holy oasis. “A Kag for one of Rathmore’s Tools... If you’d told me that before, I would’ve made it more of a priority.”

‘Well, you had a lot going on. Still do, in fact. As do we. And I consider this more of a side project, at the moment. While I do want your help, I also don’t want to take up too much of your time. I imagine you’ll at least need to make a trip to the Gate itself for this, yes?’

“Atreya is quite close,” said Abbas, already thinking of putting his armor on right away. “I could knock that out in an hour. Or less, perhaps. And the examination wouldn’t take--” Abruptly, Abbas decided to cut himself off and stop wasting time altogether. He started for the exit of the tent. “In fact, I’ll go right now.””

"3712

“Uh--h-hold on a second there--” tried Hector.

Abbas was already pushing past the flaps into the cool air of the Imara Forest. It smelled rather nice out here, but he paid it no mind at all, instead focusing on where his armor was in relation to their current position. It would have been in the tree with him when--ah.

A worrisome thought. But it should’ve survived whatever mayhem the Core instigated. He turned to his right. The southern horizon. Where the Imara Forest gave way to the grassy landscape of the great tree. Not too far away. He started walking.

New voices arrived in his ear. Familiar ones. His many children and cousins. His beloved Hahl.

He didn’t stop walking.

“I am fine,” he said in Valgan for them. “I will return shortly. Alert me if an attack arrives.”

More voices. Many more. Some raised. But none angry. Just concerned. And none talking to him of imminent danger.

He needed not pay more attention than that. All was well. Or well enough, at least. For now.

He could concentrate on the work to be done. That was good. There was much to do.

Someone was following him. Several people, actually. Worwal was running interference for him, though. Assuaging their worries, no doubt. Helpful.

His mind was on the suit. On its current specs. He'd been tweaking it little by little. The Core had been intended as a bigger step in that effort, but it seemed to have been a failure in that regard. Disappointing, but not outside expectations. The next attempt would be better. After this trip to the Gate. In fact, depending on what he found, things might speed along even faster.

Shouldn't get his hopes up, though. Too soon to know.

Ah, one of the followers was being persistent. Hector? Of course it was him. He was saying something, too.

Important?

Expressing reservations.

No, then.

Ah, but Abbas realized that he still needed to ask the boy something.

"What are the coordinates of Rathmore's Gate?" said Abbas.

"Oh, I--uh--coordinates? Er, I don't--er--"

"Quickly now, Hector. Time is short."

The boy exhaled. "Agh, I don't know coordinates. Do I look like a map? Garovel?"

'Just bring us with you,' said the reaper. 'Hector can't fly as fast as your suit can, so that'll be fastest.'

"Garovel, please, for the love of--"

"Very well," said Abbas."

"3713

Hector was sighing again. Exasperated, no doubt.

Understandable. A part of Abbas sympathized. Related, even. A shadow of a memory tickled the back of his mind. Time spent with his mentors. They'd often behaved unreasonably in his presence. Been too caught up in their work to pay much attention to anything else. Dolf, in particular.

So perhaps that shadow of memory should have given him pause. Made him reevaluate his current actions. Made him hesitant.

But it didn't. He gave it almost no consideration at all.

Instead, perhaps there was something ever so slightly invigorating about it. A whisper of nostalgia.

A fondness for those eccentric masters of old.

He could feel, in some small way, a kinship with them. Many times over the course of his life, he had struggled hard in his studies and his work just for the mere opportunity to feel that way. To feel a modicum of worthiness when comparing himself against their incredible legacies.

They'd simply been too great. Too brilliant.

But here and now, despite barely even being able to acknowledge it, he did feel it. Perhaps more strongly than ever, in fact.

The feeling that he was ready. Finally. To match them. To make them proud.

By the time he made it to the tree, he was raring to go. He had a preliminary overview of the suit's working condition already in his head, in accordance with his last memory of its operation. True, that had been a few days ago, but it was still quite clear to him. As long as nothing had changed with it while he'd been unconscious, everything should have been fine.

Overgrown branches were indeed all over the place, but Abbas just pushed through them without hesitation. Was Worwal enhancing his strength? He wasn't even sure. Didn't matter. He reached the armor quickly and set about entering it.

In the past, that had been a point of great difficulty. Laborious and time-consuming. But efficiency had become a priority of late, and in just the past few weeks, he had managed to improve his speed putting it on by over fifty percent.

Hector offered to help him with it, but Abbas refused. It would have been a needless distraction and probably made things go slower.

The donning of the helmet was done last. Allowing it to drill through his skull and into his brain was a sometimes-risky endeavor, rendering him briefly unconscious if he messed it up. Thankfully, that hadn't happened in a while."

"3714 -- CCCV.

When he was ready, Abbas stomped back outside, grabbed the young Lord Darksteel with one hand, pulled him under his arm, and used his strengthened legs in order to gain distance from the grassy earth before rocketing away at a medium burn. No sense in following Hector's example and leaving another fire behind for Raheem or someone else to put out.

Once he had sufficient altitude, he cranked up the burn to eighty percent. He was tempted to go for the full hundred, of course, but after the recent tweaks he'd made to the fusion-propulsion system, he expected the jets to be slightly more powerful than before. And as he had yet to actually test them, it would have been rather irresponsible to do so now, when he had a passenger with him.

...But on the other hand, he was quite certain that the new calculations were correct, and even if they weren't, the built-in fail-safes meant there was zero risk of accidentally instigating antimatter reactions.

Well.

Mathematically zero.

Yeah. He should just go for it. Hector was undead, and time was wasting, after all.

Chapter Three Hundred Five: 'Thy distant coruscations...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Well, this wasn't how he'd been expecting the day to unfold. Being carried like a sack of potatoes through the sky was one thing. Doing it while also breaking the sound barrier was quite another.

Hector didn't know much about g-forces, but after feeling like he'd been hit by a truck and passing out--or perhaps dying, actually--and then later waking back up again, he resolved to add that to his list of things that he needed to learn more about.

In fact, he'd been meaning to do that ever since his flight with Dimas Sebolt back during the battle at the Lorent-Callum border, when they'd flown to Hahl Saqqaf's aid. That had been quite the experience, too--and not entirely dissimilar to this current one. It just hadn't been nearly as intense, though the fight had that followed it more than made up for that discrepancy.

Admittedly, he could have prepared himself a bit better, but Hector wanted to test something of his own during this trip. He figured that they would have to do this twice--to the Gate and then back again--so for the first one, he made the rather haphazard decision to not materialize his newer, more powerful armor."

"3714 -- CCCV.

When he was ready, Abbas stomped back outside, grabbed the young Lord Darksteel with one hand, pulled him under his arm, and used his strengthened legs in order to gain distance from the grassy earth before rocketing away at a medium burn. No sense in following Hector's example and leaving another fire behind for Raheem or someone else to put out.

Once he had sufficient altitude, he cranked up the burn to eighty percent. He was tempted to go for the full hundred, of course, but after the recent tweaks he'd made to the fusion-propulsion system, he expected the jets to be slightly more powerful than before. And as he had yet to actually test them, it would have been rather irresponsible to do so now, when he had a passenger with him.

...But on the other hand, he was quite certain that the new calculations were correct, and even if they weren't, the built-in fail-safes meant there was zero risk of accidentally instigating antimatter reactions.

Well.

Mathematically zero.

Yeah. He should just go for it. Hector was undead, and time was wasting, after all.

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Well, this wasn't how he'd been expecting the day to unfold. Being carried like a sack of potatoes through the sky was one thing. Doing it while also breaking the sound barrier was quite another.

Hector didn't know much about g-forces, but after feeling like he'd been hit by a truck and passing out--or perhaps dying, actually--and then later waking back up again, he resolved to add that to his list of things that he needed to learn more about.

In fact, he'd been meaning to do that ever since his flight with Dimas Sebolt back during the battle at the Lorent-Callum border, when they'd flown to Hahl Saqqaf's aid. That had been quite the experience, too--and not entirely dissimilar to this current one. It just hadn't been nearly as intense, though the fight had that followed it more than made up for that discrepancy.

Admittedly, he could have prepared himself a bit better, but Hector wanted to test something of his own during this trip. He figured that they would have to do this twice--to the Gate and then back again--so for the first one, he made the rather haphazard decision to not materialize his newer, more powerful armor."

"3715

He wanted to see how his normal iron armor truly compared to the dark suit in this particular scenario. It seemed to him that it wouldn't make much difference at all, since the aforementioned g-forces that his body was being subjected to would be the same.

But again, he didn't know much about g-forces to begin with. So maybe it would have made a difference? Or maybe the suit had some other component to its protective capabilities that he did not yet fully understand?

It did give him a strange sort of feeling in that regard. An extra layer of comfort--in his mind, at least. But that very well could have just been his own messed up head playing tricks on him. In fact, that was quite probably the case, Hector thought. Even his iron armor often made him feel more comfortable than normal clothes did.

There was just something so calming about wearing armor. He didn't know how to explain it. Maybe there simply wasn't a way to.

Regardless, the iron suit worked about as well he'd expected it to. Which was to say: not very.

It didn't take them very long to reach the Carthrace Nature Reserve, wherein stood Rathmore's Gate, but by the end of the trip, Hector felt like his whole body had turned to jelly. It didn't hurt, thanks to Garovel numbing the pain for him, but he'd experienced this type of wobbly sensation many times before, and it always meant that he had a lot of broken bones. Hell, maybe all of them.

That seemed rather unlikely, though, knowing what he now did about how many bones there were in just the hands and feet.

Eh, he was letting these spare thought processes go off in weird directions. Time to focus, he decided.

After being gently set on the ground by Abbas, Hector immediately did his best impression of an unfolded pile of laundry, crumpling into an iron heap. His foremost thought process was disoriented beyond all recognition, but thanks to the others, he was at least able to observe as Abbas moved toward the Gate on his own.

The man seemed to be taking his time in his approach, walking slowly around it before finally getting close enough to touch it. By the time he actually made physical contact, Hector had regenerated enough to walk again.

He double-checked everything he was carrying. Shard. Scarf. Core. Phone. Oh, that was broken. Of course it was. Dammit."
"3716

How many times did he have to do something incredibly stupid before he finally started remembering that he should leave his phone behind? He felt especially dumb here, knowing that they were already planning to return to the Forge, where he could have safely left it.

He could already picture the judgmental look on Ms. Rogers' face when he told her that he needed another replacement.

Ah well. Problems for later.

As Hector moved toward the Gate, Garovel decided to speak up privately from inside Hector's armor.

'Hey, make the Darksteel Armor before you get any closer. I find it much cozier to hide in.'

'...What did you just call it?'

'The Darksteel Armor. It still needs a name, right? And that one seems pretty much perfect to me.'

Hmm. Well, the reaper did have a point. Hector had been meaning to give it a name for a while now, if only to make it even easier to materialize. Zeff and Asad had both mentioned that naming techniques was good for that purpose, but Hector hadn't fallen in love with any of the things he'd come up with so far. Plus, it hadn't exactly been a priority. The dark armor was already pretty easy to materialize, he felt.

'I don't know,' said Hector. 'Naming it after myself just feels kinda... douchey. Y'know?'

The reaper gave an echoing chortle. 'But it's so fitting, though! It's both dark and steel! Ish!'

'Ish? Steel-ish? I feel like if you have to add an -ish, then it might not actually be that fitting, Garovel.'

'Agh, fine. Name it something else, then. Anything. I just want to call it something other than 'the dark suit.' That sounds way too generic and vague.'

'Uh... hmm...'

'How about the Shadowsteel Armor?'

'I... actually don't hate that.'

'Yeah? It's settled, then!'

'Hold on, I didn't say yes. Just that I kinda liked it.'

'What do you mean? That's the same thing, Hector. Those are equivalent statements.'

'Nuh-uh. Saying that I like it just means that I think you're... er...

heading in the right direction, I guess.'

The reaper sighed. 'Alright. Not Shadowsteel. Just the Shadow Armor, then?'

Hector bobbed his head a little to both sides, then shook it. 'Nah, I don't like that one as much. Sounds kinda... I don't know...'

'Then how about the Nightsteel Armor? You like the steel part of the name, right?'

'I... kinda don't, actually.'

'Huh? You don't? But you just--what? Why not?'

'I dunno.'

'Just the Night Armor, then?'

'...Eh.'

'Hector. Quit being a picky bitch.'

'...No.'

'Oh, my god.'"

"3717

'Garovel, I just feel like it's not that important. The armor's not hard to materialize, so if I don't think a name fits, then I'll just go without it.'

'Yeah, that's fine for you, but what about me? I wanna call it something cool.'

'Wow,' said Hector. 'Which one of us was three thousand years old again?'

'I'll thank you to take your ageism and leave it out of this conversation.'

'Ageism, huh? You've called me young and stupid before. Like a lot.'

'I said THIS conversation. We can both go back to being ageist in the next one.'

That made Hector chuckle.

A brief silence arrived as they both just continued to watch Abbas from this short distance away.

‘But c’mon. Name. While we’ve got time. Let’s figure this out.’

‘You’re really not gonna let this go, huh?’

‘Maybe if you can distract me with something sufficiently interesting. Can you?’

‘Nothing’s coming to mind.’

‘Name, then. I threw a bunch at you. It’s your turn to suggest one.’

‘Well, uh... hmm. I guess... I kinda feel like a good name would pay homage to the shield that it used to be. So maybe Amir?’

‘Amir, huh? Just Amir?’

‘Yeah, why not? Short and simple.’

‘You know Amir is an actual Valgan name, right? For a person? And a fairly common one, too. It’d be like naming your armor Fred.’

Admittedly, Hector hadn’t thought of it that way. He bobbed his head again and rubbed his chin as he gave it more serious consideration.

‘You are NOT naming your armor Fred, right now.’

‘I mean... I could...’

‘Hector.’

‘What?’

‘That’s dumb.’

‘Why? I can name it what I want, can’t I? No one else will ever even hear it, except us. Probably.’

‘What if you become good friends with a guy named Fred at some point, huh? Or Amir, for that matter? It’ll be needlessly confusing.’

‘Hmm. That’s a good point. So I should just always be rude to any Freds or Amirs, then...’

It was the reaper's turn to laugh. 'If you want the name to have some sort of sentimental meaning, then perhaps you should ask Abbas or Haqq about why they named it Amir. Just in case there's some context we're missing.'

'Good idea. Plus, that'll let me put off making this decision for a little longer, too.'

'You're really obnoxious sometimes, you know that?'

'Whoa. That's pretty mean, Garovel.'

'If you don't decide soon, I'm just gonna start calling it the Darksteel Armor on my own, because fuck you.'"

"3718

Smiling to himself, Hector finally did as Garovel initially requested and materialized the dark suit. He stepped a bit closer to Abbas, who had his eyes closed and seemed to be off in his own world.

It wasn't so long ago that Hector would've had no idea what the man was doing, right now. But thanks to the Candle's memories--and from his own personal experiences, of course--he knew that Abbas was examining the structure of its soul power and/or ardor. And that required intense concentration.

So intense, in fact, that Hector didn't even want to say anything aloud, in the off chance that it might distract the Lord Saqqaf. It probably wouldn't, given how well-practiced the man no doubt was at this type of thing, but it still would've been impolite.

It was tempting, though. Worwal was floating right there next to the man, observing silently. Hector might've liked to ask the reaper for his opinion on the Gate, but he supposed that could be saved for later.

As he kept moving slowly closer, however, a different idea entered into his mind.

He pulled the Living Core out of his armor and eyed it for a moment. Then Rathmore's Gate. Then the Core again.

Worwal was staring at him now, Hector noticed. The reaper didn't say anything, though.

Hmm.

'Hector,' came Garovel's private voice again, embedded with a familiarly apprehensive tone. 'You're not thinking what I think you're thinking, are you?'

'Depends. What do you think I'm thinking?'

'I think you're thinking that using the Living Core to interface with Rathmore's Gate wouldn't be an incredibly stupid thing to do.'

'Hah. Well, you're wrong, because I definitely know that it would be.'

'Ah. And you're thinking about doing it, anyway.'

'Maybe.'

'Hector. Haven't we fulfilled our stupid quota for the day? Trying to interface with the Candle when we had so little information was bad enough, no?'

'I mean... yeah. You're right. Obviously.'

A beat passed.

'But what if we just--?'

'Hector, stop. Don't say any more.'

'Why?'

'Because I'll say yes! And I don't want to do that, right now!'

Hector breathed a laugh, trying to keep it quiet.

'Remember that whole speech that you just gave to Abbas about taking a step back and realizing that you're actually a big dumbass? I think you should take your own advice. And so should I, frankly.'

'Aw, c'mon...''

"3719

'Hector, I'm serious,' said Garovel. 'Increasingly, I'm beginning to see the danger we pose to each other. We're even more alike than I first realized. We both have a very high tolerance for risk. More than that, I think we both find enjoyment in it, too. Like it's slowly becoming our hobby to risk our lives while flirting with the unknown.'

The reaper's heavier tone dampened Hector's spirits a bit, but perhaps that was a good thing. Rationally, he still knew that Garovel was right. And he was being reminded of his meditations again. Of his possible encounter with the Void.

This wasn't the same as that. The danger didn't feel nearly so immediate or threatening.

But it wasn't entirely dissimilar, either.

A background thought process took up the question. Where had these urges come from? Was it from a place of confidence? That seemed wrong, since confidence had always felt like such a foreign concept to him, but... maybe...

He did have a sense that he could control the Living Core. Or at least, keep it in check. And he didn't feel threatened by Rathomre's Gate, either. They hardly seemed comparable to the danger posed by something like the Void itself.

Perhaps, then... yes. He did have confidence in himself. That he could handle whatever crazy shit they might stumble into here.

Wow. That really was it, wasn't it?

Because he didn't feel like he was actually putting Garovel in danger here.

But he was, wasn't he? He was playing with things beyond his comprehension.

And not just that, either. Abbas and Worwal were both here, too. Messing with the Gate in their presence could potentially put them at risk also. Strong as they were, they still deserved consideration for their safety, didn't they?

Not to mention Warrenhold.

He couldn't afford to let himself get put into another coma. Warrenhold couldn't afford it. Not until the Rainlords got back, at the very least.

He was supposed to be a lord. He was supposed to have a sense of responsibility. Not just indulge in whatever sounded fun.

Agh. He could already feel various counterarguments rising to his defense. It wasn't just about fun, surely. These were calculated risks. Necessary ones, even. They needed to obtain more power. To protect Warrenhold. To protect Atreya. From the likes of Abolish. And more, perhaps.

The path forward was not a gentle one. Not a safe or easy one.

But those were just excuses, weren't they? Even if there might've been some truth to them, it didn't change the fact that he'd been getting carried away."

"3720

He took in a deep breath and steadied himself, seeing that Worwal was still looking at him. 'You're right,' he told Garovel, and he put the Core back inside his armor. 'At the very least, we should consult Abbas before pulling another stunt like that.'

'Mmhm. And can you imagine how much shit he and Worwal would give us if we just jumped in there, right now? In the middle of the examination, too? We'd look like huge assholes.'

'Yeah...'

'But I like your thinking, kid. You've got moxie. Don't lose it, just 'cuz I'm fightin' ya on this one.'

Hector frowned inside his helmet. 'Kid? You've never called me kid before.'

'Yeah, I'm tryin' it out. Whaddya think?'

'...I hate it, honestly. From other people, sure. But from you, egh. No.'

The reaper laughed. 'Alright, fine.'

They decided to wait patiently for Abbas to finish his examination. Hector thought about sitting down and meditating, but it didn't take much longer for the man to let go of the monument and walk over to them.

‘So what’s the verdict?’ said Garovel publicly.

“It is a magnificent structure,” said Abbas. “The etchings on the surface are almost invisible to the naked eye, but the flow of ardor through them is still pristine. As if they’d been crafted yesterday. That is how you know they are the work of a master integrator. Eliminating all leakage is a thing that even I still struggle with. Fortunately, my work rarely calls for such precision. Machinery will always be in need of repair or refinement, regardless of how much time is spent perfecting the finished product.”

‘...Alright. I’m not too proud to admit that most of that went over my head,’ said Garovel. ‘Was any of that relevant to the issue of creating a new Kag?’

“Yes,” said Abbas. “The flawlessness of the etchings will need to be replicated in the Kag itself, which will make the project a bit more time-consuming for me. But that is all. I could still manage it in a day. Perhaps a week if I take breaks to work on other projects. You said this was not an urgent matter to you, yes?”

‘We did. Anything else you can tell us about the Gate?’

Abbas’ brow twitched as he eyed Garovel. “You also said this was a long-held project for you. Have you never had anyone else examine this monument?”

Garovel shook his skull. ‘Not this one specifically, no. But others, sure. Many, many years ago.’”

"3721

‘And did you discover anything else after those examinations?’ said Worwal.

‘Not particularly,’ said Garovel with a hint of exasperation. ‘They’re unbreakable, immovable, and typically reach far deeper into the earth than one might expect.’

“Immovable?” said Abbas. “What do you mean by that, precisely?”

‘Oh, did you not know that about them? They can’t be removed from whatever location they are found in. Even if you dig out all the dirt and rock around them, carve an entire canyon where they stand, they'll actually stay exactly where they are. They'll float in midair, even.'

That was news to Hector. He could see the surprise on Abbas and Worwal's faces, too.

'Truly?' said Worwal. 'You are not making that up, are you?'

Garovel seemed amused. 'Not only that, but the land around them will slowly regenerate into its previous state, too. So even if you did go through all the trouble of carving out a whole canyon, your work would be undone in a matter of... hmm, days? Weeks, maybe?'

"Remarkable," said Abbas. "How have I never learned of this?"

'Heh. Don't feel bad. Instead, feel impressed. By me. And how incredibly knowledgeable I am.'

'I am still not entirely convinced that you are being serious,' said Worwal.

'Oh, I am. Like I said, I've been studying these things for a very long time. I'm familiar with many of the quieter efforts made throughout history to learn more about the Tools--and let me tell you: more than a few of those efforts have ended up largely forgotten by the academic community.'

'Ah. A sadly all too common tale.'

'Indeed,' said Garovel with a nod. 'And it doesn't help that the Tools themselves have also been forgotten by many. But yeah. I'm sure you've seen similar problems in your own research, no? Fierce competition. Information being purposely buried. That sort of thing.'

'Of course,' said Worwal, an abrupt heaviness in tone. 'Along with... much worse things, as well. But I'm sure I do not need to tell that to a Prime Archiver.'

Garovel seemed to match his energy. 'Yes. I've witnessed more collateral damage done to the world for this infuriating reason than I even care to remember. If only it were possible to forget.'

A silence arrived as the two reapers fell quiet.

Hector exchanged looks with Abbas, not knowing if one of them should try to revive the conversation."

At length, Abbas decided to speak up. "While we are here, I would like for you to try interfacing with Rathmore's Gate, using the Living Core."

Hector's eyes widened, and he blinked.

The previous moment of tension had been rather unceremoniously obliterated. Had Abbas not even noticed it in the first place? Or simply not cared, perhaps?

Abbas' expression remained unchanged as he elaborated. "That is, if you are comfortable doing so. I understand that it may seem a bit risky, but Worwal and I will be here to pull you out, should anything go wrong. Just as you did for us."

Worwal jumped in before Hector could respond. "That is a weak safety net, I feel. We were unable to pull Hector out of his coma when he first interfaced with the Candle. Why should he and Garovel believe now that we would be able to retrieve them from a dive into the Gate?"

"Because now we have the Core," defended Abbas.

'But the Core hates us, apparently.'

"I am aware. And that is why Hector should be the one to dive instead of me. He has already demonstrated ample skill in controlling it. You and I will be there to assist and guide him, if necessary."

'Or,' said Worwal, 'we could simply have neither of you do this, instead. And avoid a needless risk.'

"The risk is minimal," said Abbas, looking from Worwal to Hector and Garovel. "If you are worried about accidentally triggering the Gate's power, don't be. Without a Kag, it is dormant."

'You sure about that?' said Garovel. 'Hector and I have both experienced its power once before, when it teleported us here from the Undercrust. Along with several other people.'

"Excuse me?" said Abbas, eyeing the monument another time. "Ah, of course. I believe I have already heard much of that tale. So this was how you returned, then? Interesting."

‘Yeah, so it’s definitely not dormant. Not completely, anyway.’

Abbas shook his head. “No, it is. I’m certain of it. But that means someone else is already in possession of a working Kag for this Gate. Whoever it was that activated it for you. There were multiple strange figures involved, yes? What were their names again?”

‘Malast and Royo Raju,’ said Worwal. ‘Correct?’

‘That’s right,’ said Garovel.

Hector didn’t recall ever telling them that, but he supposed it was only natural that word would have gotten around, especially to the reapers, who were always talking to one another.”

"3723

“That is important information,” said Abbas, “and all the more reason why we should have a working Kag of our own as soon as possible. At the moment, the Gate is a one-way road. If, gods forbid, an invasion were to be launched through it, we would have no ability to mount a counterattack until a new Kag was made. I suppose I should make it a top priority project, after all, just to be safe.”

Holy fuck. That was a scenario that Hector hadn’t even considered before. He held back a sigh as he rubbed his forehead. “It was bad enough when I only had to worry about a war arriving through Lorent...”

Abbas regarded him with a hint of amusement in his expression. “As you grow older, you will no doubt come to understand that, if you are acting as a true lord over your lands, then ‘worrying’ is your entire profession.”

Hector merely frowned, not exactly loving what he was hearing.

Abbas looked toward Worwal, who then chimed in again. ‘As a great statesman once said, “In every Age, the state of the world will drive you mad, if you allow it. And unfortunately, allow it we must, in the hope that our subjects might be spared from some portion of its unending cruelty.’

Hector’s frown didn’t get any better, but he did feel compelled to say something. "Worwal, holy crap. You're as bad as Garovel."

'I beg your pardon, young man? What is that supposed to mean?'

"It means you're a real downer!" said Hector.

Abbas snorted, then laughed outright.

Worwal did not, instead merely cocking a skeletal eyebrow at his servant.

'For the record, I resent that,' said Garovel. 'I can be optimistic.'

"Yeah, you can be," said Hector. "But you're not."

The conversation continued on that track for a bit longer, with Worwal expressing his displeasure at both Hector and Abbas; and Hector offered a small amount of appreciation for the reaper's words of old wisdom, but for the most part, he held his ground. Because for some reason, he felt as though he had to, or else these ancient, jaded-as-hell reapers would overwhelm him and Abbas both.

The Sunsmith, for his part, merely seemed entertained.

Eventually, however, the subject moved back to the Gate, and Hector and Garovel had to consult with each other privately as they came to a decision about it."

"3724

'Looks like we've got their permission,' said Hector.

'Yup,' said Garovel, though it did come with a sigh.

'You sound disappointed,' said Hector.

'I'm not. At least, not really. If anything, I'm only disappointed with myself for how excited I feel.'

'What? You're a walking contradiction, Garovel. Er. A floating one.'

'Well, when you can acknowledge your flaws and try to change them, only to revert back to your degenerate ways, it can come with some complicated feelings.'

‘Y’know, I remember you calling me a drama king, once. Turns out, I was in good company.’

‘Alright, smartass. Let’s just get on with this, shall we? And if anything goes horribly wrong, this was never our plan. It was purely Abbas and Worwal’s idea. Agreed?’

‘One hundred percent.’

And so it was that they approached Rathmore’s Gate as the sun hung low in the sky, blanketing the natural scenery in a deeply red-orange glow. The monument was cool to the touch, and Hector kept the rest of his armor on, save only the gauntlets for his bare hands. He took a long, slow breath as he cleared his mind and found his concentration.

First, he felt for the Gate with his soul. Easy enough. It was clear as day to him now. Aura, too. Like a great pillar of light shining in his mind’s eye. Then, he felt for the Core in his hand.

And that was when the world around him came alive in an entirely new way.

What an incredible sensation. Like he was suddenly in a car--or motorcycle, perhaps--speeding down a highway when he’d been standing perfectly still only a moment prior.

He felt the world rushing past him. In fact, he might have mistaken it for actual wind, if not for the Scarf telling him the air currents around had not changed a bit. Still the same calm breeze he’d felt before.

Then he felt the circling, too. The spinning. The world, revolving.

Huh.

What was it doing?

He sensed more there now. Yeah. The aura. He sensed intent. Desire.

Whoa.

Distinct. Different. As all auras were, of course. But this one was very different. Despite how powerful it was, it felt much less... sentient. Maybe not at all, even. Unaware of itself? But still waiting. Patiently.

For him?

Yes.

For him to provide it with something. A command? No. A direction? Ah. Maybe so.

Desire, but not awareness. Not intelligence. How weird."

"3725

It wasn't like Cocora's Candle. That thing had a real sentience to it. It could talk to him--or try to, at least. This didn't. This was different.

Heh. Wow. He remembered how strange and overwhelming all of his encounters with the Candle had felt. But oddly enough, this experience here--with this quiet Gate--made those previous ones with the Candle feel somehow more sensible to him. Like it was adding a new context through which he could view a problem that used to befuddle him.

And it also reinforced how truly special the Candle was, by comparison. How much more sophisticated it was. If the Candle was like an animal, then this was like a single-celled organism.

Interesting.

Ah, but still. Careful, he told himself.

Abbas said this thing was dormant, and while Hector did believe the man was correct, he still didn't wish to test that statement too much. If the Gate was waiting for a 'direction,' then that seemed like a somewhat dangerous thing to be providing without due consideration, given the fact that he already knew it was a teleporter.

Hmm.

But there was a lot more here than just that, too. The aura was so receptive to him. So welcoming. And it had such depth to it. The 'direction' that it desired from him wasn't just physical. It would accept a different kind, too.

But what did that mean, exactly?

Agh.

This "aura reading" thing was hard. Messy. Maybe there was some special trick to it that he didn't understand yet. Right now, it was like trying to grab water with his hands. Technically possible, sure, but one wrong move, and it would slip right through his fingers.

He refocused.

What did it want? What was the true nature of this non-sentient thing's desire?

...To see? No. To show.

It wanted to show him something. Anything, really. Anything he asked it to. Anything within its ability to.

Anything within the ability of its aura.

Whoa.

He knew quite well by now that auras could retain memories. And they could reveal memories in others, too. As auras linked together. Worked in tandem. Or were manipulated by a greater aura. Such as that of a Sparrow.

He sensed a change in the Gate. Because it was sensing him now, too. More specifically, it was sensing an opportunity to provide him with something. To show him. In accordance with its desire.

Did he wish to view a memory? And if so, which one?

Aha. He needed only to provide it with a direction."
"3726

He understood a little better now. It probably couldn't transport him anywhere, just like Lord Abbas said, but perhaps it could show him something from the past.

Just him, though? What about everyone else?

He pulled himself back a bit, wanting to sense everyone around him again.

Garovel. Worwal. Abbas.

And there they were. Right alongside him. But he maintained his connection to the Gate, too. It was surprisingly easy.

Because of the Core. Ah. It was behaving. Good.

‘Whoa,’ came Garovel’s silent voice. ‘This is different. What am I even sensing, right now?’

‘Oh, you can sense a change,’ thought Hector. ‘I’m trying to include you guys.’

‘Was that Hector?!’ came another voice, one Hector didn’t recognize at first.

Hector might’ve blinked if his eyes weren’t already closed. ‘Was that Abbas?’

‘We can hear each other’s thoughts!’ said the Lord Saqqaf, sounding quite amazed and pleased. ‘Aha! How are you doing this?!’

‘That’s a good question, uh... I think it’s mainly our proximity to the Gate. Its aura is... kinda huge, actually. Covers this whole area. And I... think I’ve kinda... tapped into it a little. Thanks to your Living Core.’

‘Incredible...!’

‘While it is amazing, I also find it mildly unsettling,’ said Worwal.

‘Me, too, actually,’ said Garovel. ‘Servants shouldn’t be able to communicate with each other like we do. That’s supposed be our thing and no one else’s. What’re you gonna steal from us next, huh?’

Hector snickered. ‘Garovel... shut up.’

‘What else can the Core allow you to do?’ said Abbas.

‘Not sure yet,’ said Hector. ‘But I think the Gate can let us view memories of the past. That’s why I wanted to include you all. With any luck, we can all witness something together.’

‘Memories, you say?’ said Worwal. ‘What sort of memories?’

‘That’s also a good question,’ said Hector with a bob his head. ‘Uh... I think... just about anything? Or rather... anything within proximity of the Gate. Within the aura.’

‘Hmm,’ hummed Abbas. ‘Does that include us?’

‘...I guess so?’

‘A test, then,’ said Abbas. ‘Show me the birth of my son, Raheem.’

Holy shit, uh. Okay. The man was ready to go, apparently.

Hector concentrated, thinking about that request more. How to accomplish it? Hmm. Auras, auras. Uh. They were kinda muddy, still. Hard to read, let alone connect to. Maybe if he... hmm...

‘Er... can you put your hand on my shoulder?’ asked Hector.”
"3727

A moment later, the man’s palm arrived exactly there, and just as Hector suspected, Abbas Saqqaf’s aura became clearer in his mind’s eye. Along with his soul, too. Both shone together brilliantly, almost indistinguishably from one another, as he peered harder into them. Searching. Thinking of the memory as Abbas had described it.

It should have been obvious. Abbas was probably thinking about it right now, himself. Unless he was being a jerk and purposely trying to make things harder.

Yes. The first thing of substance was there. That seemed right. Felt right. He embraced it with his own aura, let the Core have a bit of leeway. Freedom to help. It wanted to. He could sense its desire.

He felt a change all around him, but in his mind’s eye, he saw not much difference.

So he tried opening his eyes.

A pristine white hallway. A continuous bar of golden paint on each wall. Valgan words on each sign. A floor of polished tile. More white and gold, but with outlines of black, too.

It didn’t quite look like a hospital, Hector thought. In fact, it looked a bit like the Golden Fort, which he and Garovel had visited in Kuros. Not identical, though. Perhaps this was a different area of it? Or it had been remodeled since then? Raheem was probably quite old, so that might make sense.

Then he noticed Abbas. A second one, that was. Visibly younger, though not terribly so. But perhaps that was due, at least in part, to how utterly haggard the younger Abbas looked. Frazzled hair. Deep bags under his eyes. Pacing back and forth across the floor. And smoking a cigarette, too. That was a surprise.

Meanwhile, the older Abbas was right there next to him, looking on with complete awe, stepping closer, then to the side, as if not wanting to get in the way of his younger self.

A baby's cry arrived, muffled behind a closed door. The younger Abbas instantly turned and bolted through it.

Hector and the other three observers followed.

Young Abbas was bent over the bed, hugging his wife and new child.

And sobbing uncontrollably.

The staff were smiling and presumably congratulating the couple in Valgan, but they were also giving some strange looks to the loud, weeping man in front of them, even as they mopped the floor and wiped down the room. One of them was attempting to apply a stethoscope to the child and not succeeding, because Abbas was in the way and apparently too far gone to even notice."

"3728

'Wow,' said Garovel. 'I know this is an emotional moment in every father's life, but, uh... you really, um... just... wow.'

The older Abbas scratched his cheek. 'Ah... perhaps I should have picked a different memory...'

Garovel chortled. 'First one that came to mind, huh?'

'Indeed...'

'He cried more than Raheem did that day,' said Worwal. 'Far more. It was very heartwarming, I thought. And perhaps a little pathetic, too.'

Abbas shot the reaper a look.

'But there was also more going on in our lives than is made clear by this scene here,' added Worwal. 'It had been... a difficult few years.'

That piqued Hector's curiosity--as well as his hesitation. 'W-what do you mean?'

The vision paused, along with the younger Abbas' wailing. Hector hadn't intended to do that, but now that it was done, it seemed better to keep it that way.

Rather than answering the question, however, Worwal deferred to his servant.

Abbas looked over his captive audience, and for a very strange moment, Hector felt like he could see exactly how old Abbas truly was. That expression on the man's face didn't change much at all, and yet there was still something in his eyes--a tiredness, perhaps--that spoke of many feelings all at once.

Hector had never witnessed the like before. And it made Hector hang on to every word that Abbas was about to say.

'There were many reasons why I... fell apart like this. When I was young--even younger than here, I mean--I never thought much of having children. Of carrying on my family line. I partook in many different hobbies, you see. Many personal interests. And social interaction was... decidedly NOT one such area, to say the least.'

Hector was suddenly trying hard not to relate too much. And failing.

'My reclusive nature caused friction between me and... well, my parents, of course. But also my entire family. Worwal here, included.'

The reaper gave an acknowledging nod.

'I was neglecting my responsibility, they said. And they were right. As a man of Hahl Saqqaf, I had a duty to carry on my bloodline. But I also had eight brothers. All of whom were much more sociable than I. All of whom seemed to be doing just fine in carrying on our family's legacy. And I think my parents probably thought the same, deep down. We all had our quirks. This was just one of mine. They could let it slide. And so this continued on for many years.'

Oh, man. Hector had a dreadful feeling that he knew where this was going."

"3729

‘Over time,’ Abbas went on, ‘my large family gradually diminished. Wars took their toll on us. In more ways than one. And I... ignored it all, for the most part. I grieved, sure. Endured the misery. As we all do. But I never changed my thinking. I focused only on my work. On myself. Whenever I thought of the future, it was in terms of technological development and nothing else.

‘It is to my shame that I did not truly begin to change until there were only four of us left. Four brothers. And finally, I started to view Abolish for what they truly are.’

Hector didn’t follow. ‘What do you mean by that?’

The Sunsmith met his gaze. ‘They are an ideologically-possessed opponent. Exceptions within their ranks can certainly be found, but at their core, they are a cult of death. An enemy of all human life, seeking its destruction wherever and however they can. When I was younger, I viewed them as nothing more than... a physical threat. An enemy to be fought solely on the battlefield. With power. With technology. But then I began to see that fighting them--truly fighting them--can involve more than killing their warriors and protecting innocent life. It can also involve creating new life.’

Hector’s eyes shifted to the illusory floor as he absorbed those words. Huh...

‘When I viewed the world in that context,’ said Abbas, ‘I rather abruptly began to feel that having children was not merely a duty to my own family and bloodline. It was also a moral imperative in this neverending battle against human extinction.’

Damn. Hector had no idea how to respond to that.

‘And so, from there, I became highly motivated to find a wife and have as many children as I possibly could. But in the pursuit of our dreams, life often provides us with more difficulty than we anticipate. While I did manage to meet a lovely woman and get married, we struggled terribly trying to have children. She had four miscarriages within the span of two years. Then she vanished, and I have not seen her since. I have no idea what became of her, though I... I suspect...’ He closed his eyes and shook his head before continuing. ‘I don’t know.’

Hector was at even more of a loss than before.

‘And so we have the scene before you now,’ said Abbas. ‘Raheem’s mother was my second wife. And when he was born, I was indeed... beside myself with relief and joy. In fact, it might well stand as the happiest moment in my life. Embarrassing though it may be, I am also... pleased that I can relive it again like this.’”

"3730

Wow. Somehow, Hector felt like he’d just received a lot more information than he’d expected. And he’d expected a fair bit.

And it wasn’t just in regard to Abbas’ personal history, either. That certainly interested Hector, too, but there was something else. Something in the underlying philosophy that the man had just espoused. The way Abbas described the world.

A neverending struggle against human extinction.

One of Hector’s background thought processes had held on to those words. Brought them close. And now he couldn’t stop examining them.

Why?

Why did they feel so relevant to him on an intimate level? They were summoning two contradictory feelings at once. They made him feel as if he’d never thought that way before. But also as if he’d always thought that way.

How did that make any sense?

It was enough to make all of his thought processes converge together, and he couldn’t help remaining silent for a while, even after the Lord Saqqaf seemed to finish his story.

Thankfully, Garovel was there to keep up the conversation in his stead. ‘Heh,’ the reaper laughed. ‘Thank you for sharing all of that with us. Especially that last part. Think I felt my cold, dead heart warm up just a little. And truthfully, I’m also incredibly relieved by what I’ve learned of you here today, Lord Abbas.’

Abbas tilted his head. ‘Relieved? In what manner?’

Worwal snickered but didn’t say anything, drawing the Sunsmith’s glance.

'There is a certain amount of... shall we say, "historical justification" for worrying about powerful integrators. Inventors, in particular. Strange and brilliant minds. Far too often, with people like you, your work consumes you. Until you lose all connections to the world. And of late, you have been exhibiting some... troubling behavior in that regard, specifically.'

Abbas opened his mouth, then closed it again without retort.

'But I see now that your family does indeed mean everything to you,' said Garovel. 'Until now, I feared that, perhaps, all of these children and grandchildren you have might've merely been the result of some societal obligation that you felt. And that you were still at great risk of becoming lost to us all through your work. So yes, I am relieved and happy to get a glimpse of your deeply held emotional ties.'

Worwal decided to chime in again. 'To be clear, he IS still at risk of that. I worry about it constantly.'

Garovel chortled. 'Of course. I didn't mean to imply that there was no risk at all. Just that there was less than I feared. Which is a comforting thought.'

"3731

As their conversation continued on, Hector remained largely stuck in his own head. Mulling over everything Abbas had just told him. He felt so odd. Like he was having an epiphany. And also not. As if something he'd always known was suddenly being made clear to him. And yet he couldn't even articulate what it actually was.

It was some kind of cerebral stalemate. A knot, struggling to untie itself.

Agh. He wished he wasn't so stupid. Maybe then, he wouldn't have to think so hard to figure this weird knot out. Or maybe it wouldn't have gotten all knotted up in the first place.

Even as he kept listening to the others' conversation, his mind was looking for answers. For clues, even. Anything to help him solve the puzzle that was his own confusion.

Abbas had caused this. It followed, therefore, that Abbas would hold more answers. The only problem was that Hector didn't even know the questions to ask. And they were still talking, besides.

Interrupt? With what? He didn't know.

Instead, he found himself reaching out. For what? For more memories. Of what?

Abbas' children?

Would that be wrong? Hector didn't know that, either. Truthfully, he still didn't rightly know how any of this was working. Auras, the Gate, connecting with his mind, manifesting illusions from the past. He wasn't sure how much there was to find. Did Abbas have to offer the memory up willingly? Consciously? Probably. And if not, then maybe that wouldn't be--

He found something. Before he could learn anything more about it, the new memory was already manifesting, recasting an illusion over the world around them.

The other three took notice of the change, too. Of course they did. The illusion melted into a completely different scene. The location was blurrier, but the people were not. In it, Abbas was grinning ear-to-ear and holding up a slightly older Raheem, whose little face was already recognizable to Hector as the fully grown man he would one day become.

The baby boy was saying something, Hector realized. Too bad it was in Valgan, so he couldn't--

"Abbi! Abbi!"

No, wait. Now that he thought about it, he did know what that meant, didn't he?

Heh.

He wasn't sure when he'd learned it, but he supposed the dots also weren't terribly difficult to connect, given the context here. Raheem's mother looked just as pleased as her husband did."

"3732 -- CCCVI.

This time, however, the illusion didn't stay long. It shifted quickly into another, similar scene, where Raheem was a bit older again--only this time, he wasn't alone. Another, smaller child was right in front of him, tucked in a small cot and sleeping away while Raheem watched.

Then again, the scene changed, even more rapidly than before--so fast, even, that Hector had trouble making sense of everything. And it just kept going. More scenes, more children, more locations and situations. All in glimpses. The only clear throughline was Raheem himself, growing steadily older as siblings sprouted up all around him, pestering him, making him laugh, making him worry, making him angry, even making him cry.

It was remarkable, Hector thought. Overwhelming and remarkable. Too much to take in all at once like this, certainly, and he couldn't stop trying, either.

The others were saying things now. Abbas and Garovel and Worwal. And he fully intended to listen to whatever they were saying and respond to it.

But for a few moments longer, Hector Goffe simply kept observing in awed silence.

Chapter Three Hundred Six: 'O, long-departed ingenue...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

"You have a troubled soul, child."

"Oh, really? Thanks." She knew this wasn't going to be fun. Even with all the training she'd been put through in recent years specifically for this purpose, it would've been foolish to think that this mission was going to be some sort of cakewalk.

Dealing with psychics was always going to spell trouble.

And this was a whole town full of them. A whole society.

Well. Mostly whole.

There was, of course, a non-psychic group at the heart of it all. They were also rather important to this place, to say the least.

“That was not meant as a compliment,” said her tall guide as they walked down a long, green-lit corridor together.

She knew that, of course. That was just how she dealt with rude people. By pretending she didn’t understand. In her line of work, it often made things easier. So she made no response here, instead choosing to let her eyes wander at the verdant surroundings, as if she were barely even paying attention to the conversation.

This guide was a persistent one, though. “Your thoughts seem to be of somewhere else. A homesickness, perhaps?”

Ah, she could respond that. “Yeah. Family issues, y’know? But I miss them. As surely as the sun shines.”

"3732 -- CCCVI.

This time, however, the illusion didn’t stay long. It shifted quickly into another, similar scene, where Raheem was a bit older again--only this time, he wasn’t alone. Another, smaller child was right in front of him, tucked in a small cot and sleeping away while Raheem watched.

Then again, the scene changed, even more rapidly than before--so fast, even, that Hector had trouble making sense of everything. And it just kept going. More scenes, more children, more locations and situations. All in glimpses. The only clear throughline was Raheem himself, growing steadily older as siblings sprouted up all around him, pestering him, making him laugh, making him worry, making him angry, even making him cry.

It was remarkable, Hector thought. Overwhelming and remarkable. Too much to take in all at once like this, certainly, and he couldn’t stop trying, either.

The others were saying things now. Abbas and Garovel and Worwal. And he fully intended to listen to whatever they were saying and respond to it.

But for a few moments longer, Hector Goffe simply kept observing in awed silence.

Chapter Three Hundred Six: ‘O, long-departed ingenue...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

“You have a troubled soul, child.”

“Oh, really? Thanks.” She knew this wasn’t going to be fun. Even with all the training she’d been put through in recent years specifically for this purpose, it would’ve been foolish to think that this mission was going to be some sort of cakewalk.

Dealing with psychics was always going to spell trouble.

And this was a whole town full of them. A whole society.

Well. Mostly whole.

There was, of course, a non-psychic group at the heart of it all. They were also rather important to this place, to say the least.

“That was not meant as a compliment,” said her tall guide as they walked down a long, green-lit corridor together.

She knew that, of course. That was just how she dealt with rude people. By pretending she didn’t understand. In her line of work, it often made things easier. So she made no response here, instead choosing to let her eyes wander at the verdant surroundings, as if she were barely even paying attention to the conversation.

This guide was a persistent one, though. “Your thoughts seem to be of somewhere else. A homesickness, perhaps?”

Ah, she could respond that. “Yeah. Family issues, y’know? But I miss them. As surely as the sun shines.””

"3733

“I see,” said her guide, though he left it at that.

Which was a bit surprising, she felt, but she wasn't complaining, either. Thus far, the psychics here were truly a different breed. She had to wonder how much contact with the outside world they actually experienced, because unlike the ones she'd met before, these people were completely unafraid to tell you that they were trying to read your thoughts.

In a weird way, despite how utterly rude it was, she kind of respected it. At least they were being straightforward. Not trying to subtly manipulate her.

As she'd been taught, the main trick to defending against psychics was to create a smokescreen over one's thoughts. There were various methods of accomplishing that, of course, but the easiest one was to use emotion. More complex thoughts could also be used for that smokescreen, but that was obviously going to be harder, since it essentially involved maintaining two different lines of thought at once. She wasn't quite capable of that yet, but she hoped to be, one day.

It had been plenty difficult learning how to summon, harness, and wield her own emotions defensively. Her teachers had been rather ruthless about it, too, save one. But that was just another reason why Captain General Fen Frederick was her favorite. Technically speaking, Captain General Parson Miles might've been the better instructor--and the entire reason why she'd been able to even meet Dr. Frederick in the first place--but in her estimation, the Surgeon Saint truly did live up to his moniker.

That man had some kind of otherworldly charisma to him. And a heart of gold to go along with it.

So when she saw her chance to join one of his divisions, she took it. And now, here she was, traveling around the world on some of the most secretive missions that the Vanguard had to offer.

Her career had only just gotten moving, and yet she already had a fair few stories under her belt. Whether she would actually be able to tell them to anyone was another matter. If her littlest sister ever found out about her work, then the questions would no doubt become incessant.

Assuming she ever returned home, that was.

Gema Elroy genuinely did not know if such a time would arrive. Her reaper kept telling her not to think that way, that there was no telling what the future held, but at the moment, Gema just couldn't see it happening."

That last fight with her parents had been so bad. The memory of it was still dreadfully vivid in her mind. Some of the things she'd said...

And yeah, her parents had said some horrible things, too. Particularly her mother. And yeah, Gema certainly didn't regret everything that she had said. There'd been several years' worth of cathartic release from that conversation.

But there was one thing she felt guilty about above all the rest.

"I wish you were dead! I wish you and your bitch sister had been killed along with everyone else that day!"

It was painful even to think about. Strict as he might've been with her, Papa hadn't deserved that. Nor had Aunt Joana.

The worst thing, though, was that Papa hadn't even gotten mad.

He'd just looked hurt.

That expression on his face. She'd never seen it before.

In the moment, worked up as she was, she'd actually been happy about that reaction. She'd intentionally said the most hurtful thing that she could think of, after all. And she'd succeeded. Achieved her goal.

Then her mother immediately slapped the shit out of her and yelled at her to get out of the house.

It wasn't until later, after she'd left and started to calm down, that she began to feel regret.

Now, all these years later, calling it regret would have been an understatement. That expression on her father's face haunted her.

Especially lately.

News of the turmoil in Sair had done nothing to soothe her heart. And then the greater war, as well?

She'd actually managed to get reassigned to Sair after the war broke out, working as a scout, but that hadn't lasted long. The call came down that Frederick was in need of agents with anti-psychic training, and so she answered.

There hadn't been anything to see in Sair, anyway. She'd been too late. She visited the family estate in Aguary, but there was no one there. Not even the staff had remained behind. Good thing, too, since the city had turned into a battlefield.

Now she didn't even know if that house would still be there when she returned.

If she returned.

So she'd decided to throw herself into her work. Fully commit to the cause. Few were more just than this one, after all. This war needed fighting. And its warriors needed information, resources, and allies. She intended to do her part and then some."

"3735

The strangest part of it all, however, had to be the fact that her increased emotional disturbance was actually useful to her work. Her worry over her family's circumstances made it easier to summon an emotional smokescreen for her thoughts against psychics. She just had to think about her father for a bit--or her little siblings--and the emotions popped right up, persisting even after she started thinking about other things.

Much of the training had been about achieving that emotional summon on command in one's mind. Entering the appropriate state of mind. Controlling the breathing. Tapping into memories. Or conjuring imaginary scenarios, if memories didn't do the trick. And meditation, too, of course.

Now that all seemed a bit unnecessary. She had a shortcut to use.

Or at least, that was how Miles had reframed the situation for her.

<"Make use of what is useful,"> he'd told her. <"However you can. Even when it's painful.">

She still didn't know to feel about that. Or about him, frankly. He'd always seemed to have an answer for everything. A solution for every problem. But sometimes, those solutions were a bit... unsettling.

She'd wanted to ask him and Overra more about what had really transpired in Sair, before the war broke out, but he'd been so difficult to get ahold of. The one time she'd been able to talk to him had been over the phone, and he'd told her not to worry too much and that it would all get sorted out, eventually.

<"It's all a big mess and too difficult to explain right now, but trust me when I say that your family and everyone else are going to be just fine. Once things settle down a little, I promise to answer all your questions. For now, just focus on your missions. Fen's got you doing important work for him, right? I knew you'd be a perfect fit over there.">

She didn't exactly take that advice to heart, at first. Her trip back home to Aguary had required quite a bit of finesse and favor-providing, especially on the part of her reaper, Ozolos. He was a very old reaper--on par, even, with Axiolis--and so, he had a number of friends within the Vanguard to ask for help.

He certainly hadn't been quick about it, though. For as long as she'd known him, Ozolos had always been peculiar. Even among other reapers, he apparently had that reputation."

"3736

When she first became a servant and met this enigma of a reaper, it had been more than a little confusing. She'd sometimes heard her parents talk about their reapers and their personalities, but with Ozolos being the very first one she ever spoke to herself, she'd still needed Axiolis to come along shortly thereafter and inform her that they weren't all like that.

'Ozolos is someone who never moves at anyone's pace other than his own,' Axiolis had told her. 'I won't lie to you, girl. He may become a source of regular frustration for you. He may confuse you and annoy you and even cause problems for you with other people, who also find him bothersome. But one thing I have learned about him over the many Ages that I have known him is that deep down, he has wisdom. And when the chips are down, when it really matters, you will be able to rely on him.'

For her part, after five or so years as his servant, Gema still didn't quite know if she agreed with that assessment. She'd been trying to give the reaper the benefit of the doubt, but it was hard, sometimes.

Life was hard, sometimes. And being considerate became all the more difficult.

She'd yelled at the reaper quite a bit, early on. Lost her cool.

It never seemed to faze Ozolos in the slightest. Perhaps that was why she'd stopped. She would've liked to believe, instead, that it was simply because she'd grown more mature and level-headed, but eh. That was probably wishful thinking, she knew.

Here and now, the reaper was attached to her back, just below her right shoulder. Not saying a word, as usual.

This was another of his habits. He often just grabbed onto her with no explanation and went along for the ride. She was beginning to think he just didn't like floating around under his own power or something.

On this occasion, at least, there was justification for it. Reapers were vulnerable to psychics--not always, but often. Clinging to her like this afforded him a bit more protection against them.

Technically, Ozolos had undergone the exact same training as she had, but it was anyone's guess if it had stuck. The two of them hadn't encountered any problems thus far, so it was probably fine, but still. It was a nagging thought. One of many, when it came to Ozolos."

"3737

'I have a question for you,' said Ozolos publicly.

"Yes?" said their guide.

'Do your people take offense to being compared with the Dulvani?'

The guide fell quiet for a moment. "...Compared to? No, I should think no offense would be taken there. But if you presume overmuch about us because of them, then yes, you may create some awkward conversations. Why do you ask this of me, by the way?"

'Curiosity.'

"No other reason?"

'History, as well.'

"What do you mean by that?"

Unfortunately, however, this proved to be yet another of those instances wherein Ozolos decided not to respond, leaving only an uncomfortable silence behind.

Enough so, in fact, that the guide's head turned one hundred and eighty degrees around in order to look at the two of them, his wooden neck making a crackling noise all the while. He didn't stop walking forward, either.

Not knowing what else to do, Gema just gave a flat smile and then returned to examining the walls and windows.

Play dumb. Just play dumb. Dumb and innocent. Her tried and tested tools.

It seemed to work well enough. The guide gave up and turned back around, making it a full three hundred and sixty degrees.

She'd gotten used to that a while ago. This was not her first encounter with the Methusel.

They were a fascinating people but not exactly the easiest to read. Or learn about at all, for that matter. She'd never even heard of them three years ago, and in the time since then, she hadn't been able to discover much about them or their history.

They all seemed to be quite stoic and soft-spoken. They were still human-shaped overall, but their bodies were noticeably more malleable. She wasn't yet sure if they had any flesh beneath the 'bark' that covered them entirely or if they were actually wooden all the way through; but she did know that said bark could grow and change at will. And quite quickly, too.

At the moment, their guide's bark was a smooth, pale white with an occasional black knot in it, but when she first saw him, it had been a deep brown color full of ridges.

She'd asked Ozolos about them numerous times, because she suspected he knew plenty, but thus far, he'd yet to elaborate. Thankfully, one of the other reapers within the CID, name of Vales, had been able to illuminate a few things for her."

"3738

'They are one of the most well-hidden branches of humanity to ever walk the planet,' Vales had told her. 'Not only are they capable of manipulating minds and wiping memories like Sparrows, but they also possess an impeccable capacity for camouflage. My advice to you, therefore, is to treat them with exceptional compassion and politeness, because no matter how well you develop your psychic defenses, you may never truly know how many of them are in a room with you at a given moment. You should always assume that you are greatly outnumbered and being judged by attentive observers.'

Needless to say, that hadn't been the most comforting thing to hear, but she'd tried to take it to heart during each of her visits to this place.

They finally reached the end of the long corridor, and a grand view of the main town opened up before her.

The central plaza drew the eye first, being so open and full of foot traffic. The buildings all around it were not uniform at all, varying in not only size and shape but also color, texture, and decoration. Where one was covered in vines and greenery, another looked as though it had been chiseled out of rock by a sculptor obsessed with geometry. Still another building had a decidedly Jesbolese aesthetic with its swooping roof and curving angles, while the one next to it looked more Intarian with how harsh and pointy it was.

There was even a building that just looked like a big pile of sticks thrown on top of each other. Crazier still, Gema thought she might actually know who lived in that one, despite never having gone inside.

Trees were also a common sight here, but perhaps not as much as one might've expected from the Methusel. She'd wondered why that was, and Valess had told her that it was because the Methusel did not care for shelter very much. They preferred to sleep outside, apparently.

Having never witnessed any of them sleeping, she supposed she would just have to take Valess' word on that.

But that of course meant that all the buildings here were not for the Methusel. They were for the island's primary inhabitants. The ones whom the Methusel had been protecting since time immemorial.

And Gema could see them out and about, all over the plaza.

Reapers. As numerous as she'd ever seen. And with nary a servant in sight."

"3739

To her eyes, reapers were pitch-black swordfish with a silvery glow and beady eyes alight with tiny white flames. Ozolos, however, did not entirely conform to that look. Rather than black, he was more of a dark gray, and his eyes shone a little more brightly than others.

Why that might've been, she still had no earthly idea, nor had anyone else she'd asked about it. The most reasonable explanation she'd gotten was that the slightly altered appearance was a byproduct of reapers with particularly strange personalities. A natural phenomenon observed throughout history.

She felt like there had to be more to it than just that, but at the same time, it did seem appropriate for her reaper in particular.

The reapers here, however, were also special. Maybe not in appearance like Ozolos, but by reputation, because this place was the Wandering Island of Faridel, home of the reaper enclave known as the Old Wardens. And she knew there was yet far more to be seen here, squirreled away in tunnels or behind illusory walls in giant boulders--and probably plenty of other hiding places that she still hadn't learned about.

She'd been trying her damndest to learn more about the history of the Wandering Island whenever she could, but information about it was preciously rare, and trying to get the Wardens to talk about it was like trying to get water from a stone.

The most she'd been able to learn had come from the Prime Archivists in Luugh. She'd been fortunate enough to be given a mission near there a couple years ago and had decided not to waste the opportunity.

There were many mythic tales of this place, such as the one of its origin. Supposedly, the Island was carved out of the small Luughian continent by a great sea turtle, who took the land upon its back in order to rescue the native population from a monstrous horde of invaders that was soon to arrive.

Of course, these days, it was easy enough to see from the air that there was no giant turtle beneath the island. And while its wandering nature was still somewhat mysterious, there were plenty of scientific explanations for it, such as buoyant algae along the underside of the island and large pockets of gas being trapped underground.

Took a bit of the mystique away, perhaps, but on the whole, she preferred science to legend."

"3740

The guide continued onward through the throng of reapers in the plaza. Gema could see a few of them eyeing her, though whether it was out of curiosity or suspicion was anyone's guess. The Old Wardens were a peculiar bunch, to say the least. Personally, Gema had found that many of them were intensely interested in hearing all about the outside world, while many others were decidedly not so.

There seemed to be a divide, of sorts, within the culture here.

Which, she supposed, actually made it no different from most other places in the world.

The journey kept going for even longer than she expected. Each time she'd visited, the meeting place had been different, and indeed, this occasion was apparently going to continue that trend. They ventured all the way through another street full of peculiar buildings and into a more wooded area, where the trail was barely visible.

Soon, the trees grew so thick that she had to push closer to the guide in order make sure not to lose track of him.

Eventually, the guide came to a halt, though not for any obvious reason that Gema could see.

Rather than voicing her confusion, however, she merely waited.

The guide raised his gangly arms over his head, and then the world ahead of them shuddered visibly. The dark forest wavered for a moment like a tapestry caught in a sudden breeze, and then a bright slit appeared down the center of it before transforming into an entire doorway.

An illuminated corridor lay inside, though it thankfully did not appear nearly as long as the last one. She followed the guide through, and soon enough, they arrived in a much larger chamber, one that looked rather like the main hall of a castle.

An invisible castle, she supposed.

Huh.

More reapers were here, of course, but these ones appeared to have been awaiting their arrival. Gema spotted a few more Methusel, as well, which only made her wonder how many others might secretly be observing.

‘Paraya,’ said the centermost reaper as they approached.

That was a word she’d become intimately familiar with over the years. She’d been trying to learn all she could about their language here, but as in all things, they didn’t make it easy. Each time she’d asked for someone to teach her directly, she’d been refused. Even when she asked what a particular term meant, she’d usually been ignored or simply met with silence.”

"3741

Ozolos told her not to worry about it so much, but it was difficult. She had the feeling that the reason she was being refused a teacher was because they preferred being able to talk in front of her without her understanding.

So that they could say all sorts of mean and horrible things, probably.

But the joke was on them, because she was learning. Slowly, but she was learning. Paraya was their term for outsiders. And in her estimation, it harbored a slightly negative connotation.

“Councilors,” said Gema with as much respect in her voice as she could muster. She came to a stop in front of them all and gave a bow. She counted seven of them on this occasion, though she knew there were many more.

The one who’d spoken was named Gardorox, and he continued doing so. ‘What trinkets of the heavenly ones have you brought us this time?’

“No trinkets this time, I’m afraid,” said Gema with a sympathetic smile. “Instead, I bring news.”

The look of disappointment on each of their piscine faces was somehow quite apparent.

She’d been a little worried about that, but there was nothing she could do about it now. “As agreed, Doctor Frederick will soon be sending the first group of reapers here. I have come in order to ensure that you are not surprised by their arrival. And that the transition goes as smoothly as possible.”

‘So you intend to stay a while, then?’ said another reaper, this one feminine. Her name was Atriza, as Gema recalled.

"If the Council is gracious enough to allow it, then yes," said Gema.

The Councilors all exchanged looks with one another, and many more words were exchanged in that mysterious language of theirs. Unfortunately, she still couldn't understand very much of it, but she did pick up a few stray words here and there.

Families? Innocence? Young ones? Fighting? No, war.

Bah. Not enough to go off of.

Once they were finished discussing, Gardorox spoke for the group again. 'The first group will consist of only three, yes?'

"Yes," said Gema.

'And they have been chosen personally by the Ohja, yes?'

The Ohja was their term for Cpt. General Fen Frederick. It seemed to be one of particular reverence, though she still wasn't sure as to its exact meaning yet. "Correct," she said.

'Then you may stay,' said Gardorox. 'In fact, you must. Until these new arrivals are fully integrated, we shall make use of you.'

"3742

Gema hesitated at that. "Ah--fully integrated? Um. How long do you suppose that might be?"

'As long as is required.'

Oh no. These were reapers. And some of the oldest ones on the entire planet, most likely. And she herself was technically immortal, too. So she was suddenly getting the distinct impression that this guy could be talking about decades here--or even centuries, for that matter.

She couldn't just let that go by without addressing it. "I cannot stay indefinitely," she said, stiffening her posture. "My work for Dr. Frederick comes first."

'You will stay as long as you are needed,' said another of the female council members. This one's name was Harilixa, as Gema recalled.

‘The Ohja owes us much. Any demand we make of him will be satisfied.’

Gema’s brow twitched at that, and she struggled to maintain the smile on her face. “Dr. Frederick is also very busy with the war. Many innocent people are relying on him for protection, right now. As members of the Vanguard, our first duty is to them.”

‘All the more reason why he should not refuse us,’ said Harilixa. ‘Without our continued support, the Ohja’s triumphs will dry up like a summer rain.’

Her jaw clenched as she held back the retort on the tip of her tongue. She wanted to tell them that ‘their support’ amounted to little more than a promise. They had not sent any actual troops or aid to the Surgeon Saint’s side. Only a guarantee that he could use this place as a bargaining chip when negotiating with enemy reapers.

Gema had to be careful here, though. Her emotional shield was only so strong. If a new emotion was allowed to take over--such as irritation, for instance--then her thoughts would no longer be protected from all the observing Methusel.

And perhaps that was exactly why Harilixa was saying such inflammatory things. To get a rise out of her.

‘Be mindful how you speak to us, girl. We may adore the Ohja, but you are not he. You are merely one of his pawns.’

Or perhaps she was just a bitch.

“I understand, Councilor,” said Gema, having solidified her smile again. “I can only apologize for any offense given.”

Harilixa said nothing more, and silence filled the chamber for a time.

Gardorox led them out of it. ‘In any case, there is much yet to discuss. Are you hungry from your journey? We will prepare a meal for you.’”
"3743

A meal, was it? That was a surprising offer. In all her visits to this place until now, she’d never been given food. In fact, with so many reapers and Methusel around, she’d been under the impression that food was not even a subject that crossed their minds.

Which had made her pity the handful of servants who had to live here.

Granted, none of her previous visits had been for that long. She'd only been allowed to stay for a few hours at a time, if even that.

A look of amusement seemed to cross Gardorox's fishy face. 'You look surprised. You thought us incapable of providing sustenance, didn't you?'

She supposed she could admit that. "Er, yes..."

'Heh. Then you are in for a treat. As is your reaper.'

Gema was confused. "What do you mean?"

'I shall let that be a surprise.' Gardorox's tail fin waved broadly to the side. 'Please escort young Gema to her quarters. Dinner will be prepared shortly.'

And just like that, the reapers all began to disperse, not even bothering to inform each other that they were leaving. They simply flew off at a leisurely pace, going up into the ceiling or through the walls or even into the polished floor. Only a couple of them remained behind to strike up a conversation with each other.

Another Methusel appeared on her right--one she hadn't even noticed a moment ago--and motioned for her to follow.

She did so.

As they walked, she decided to try consulting Ozolos one more time, despite knowing that it was most likely pointless. 'Do you have any idea what they were talking about back there?' she asked.

'Yes,' said the reaper privately.

Which was more of an answer than she'd expected, at least. But she still kept pressing. 'And? Spill the beans, Ozzie. C'mon.'

'They are trying to seduce me.'

She couldn't help blinking. 'Uh... say what?'

'This is how it starts. Appeals to fleshly indulgences. Reminders of mortal pleasures. Things thought long lost to us. 'Tis a potent strategy.'

'Okay, yeah, I get that much. I think. But... "Seduce," though? Is that really the right word for it? I mean...'

'It is. Once seduced, control soon follows. Manipulation. Even slavery. Of the mind. And soul, too, no doubt.'

'Whoa. Um. Alright. Don't like the sound of that.'

'Good. Remember your training. Hold truth. And see this place for what it really is.'

"3744

Gema said nothing more, finding herself abruptly unsettled. It was a rare thing to have Ozolos speak to her so much like this. But it was rare still for him to speak with such clear intensity.

If he was a telling her all of this, then perhaps she had misjudged their present circumstances a bit.

Perhaps this place was even more dangerous than she'd realized.

She recalled the last time Ozolos had spoken to her in such a tone. In fact, she might never be able to forget it, because it had been when the Second Continental War began.

Ozolos had been more vocal--and more irritable--that entire day, even before they had heard about the invasions. He'd told her again and again to pay attention.

'See the world around you,' he'd said privately. 'Do not simply look. See it. Listen to it. Read between its lines. Uncover what it is trying to hide from you.'

And the time before that, it had been when she'd learned about the Rainlords' betrayal of the Vanguard. Ozolos had been especially strange on that day.

'The Veil shudders, my dear. It shudders and cries. It weeps, and it lies. It sells, and it buys. It whispers, and it dies. Listen to it carefully. But don't believe it overly. Our people, our people. Who are they truly?'

And so on. She certainly hadn't understood what he was talking about, but at the very least, she could tell that he'd been greatly upset. Even moreso after they heard the news.

As had she, of course.

Ever since leaving home, she'd harbored conflicting feelings about her heritage. Not once had she actually told anyone in the CID that she was a Rainlord.

She wasn't trying to hide it, necessarily, and she was certain that plenty of the higher-ups already knew, but it still wasn't something she'd wanted to advertise. Would it have made people treat her differently?

Probably.

Did she even deserve to use that label, anymore?

No idea.

She'd learned the history. Her parents had drilled that into her, most certainly. She'd learned about the larger-than-life heroes of yore. And about the ideals they tried to hold to throughout their difficult lives.

But she'd never really known what to make of all that stuff, never known if she really believed in it like everyone else did. Or like they seemed to, at least.

And yet, when that news first arrived, when she'd heard that her kin had "betrayed" the Vanguard and even fought against the Gargoyle of Korgum, of all people... she'd still ended up feeling profoundly hurt and confused."

"3745

She'd wanted to look into the details more. Find a proper report about what actually happened. But it had been difficult, to say the least. She'd been buried in work constantly. Whenever she returned from a mission, no matter how swiftly she'd been able to complete it, there'd always been another one waiting for her. She'd never found the opportunity to ask her direct superior about it, much less Miles himself, who'd supposedly been there.

...Hmm?

Her eye twitched.

She'd never asked? Never been time?

No. That wasn't right. She'd visited home again, hadn't she? There must've been--

"Are you unwell?" came the voice of the Methusel who'd been guiding them.

She suddenly realized that they had all stopped walking--including herself--and were now in some sort of large, warmly lit dining chamber. Ugh. Had she gotten that lost in thought? How unprofessional. She tried not to cringe as she apologized. "Yes, I'm sorry. I-I was just... not paying attention. It has been a long day, I fear."

"You have a troubled soul," the Methusel said.

Her brow furrowed a little. Again? Wait, was this the same Methusel from earlier? It was horrible to admit, but she couldn't actually tell and was afraid to ask. The shifting colors and textures of their bark made it quite difficult to keep track of who was who.

Rather than questioning it, she elected to say nothing and simply sit down at the long table. Dishes were already arriving from a connecting room. It was a bit surreal to see more Methusel carrying dinner plates full of food. She'd known all along they worked for the Old Wardens, of course, but she hadn't realized that they served as waiters and maybe even chefs, too.

Before she could actually inspect the food, however, the same Methusel spoke up again.

"If you are in a state of emotional distress or discomfort, we may be able to help," said the tree man. "Some among us specialize in treating such conditions."

What the heck?

Ozolos answered for her. 'A kind offer, but we must politely decline. We outsiders have our own ways of handling these things.'

The Methusel seemed to hesitate for a moment, but then he bowed and moved away.

'They may attempt to lay hands on you,' said Ozolos privately. 'Do not let them.' The reaper's tone wasn't doing much for her anxiety.

'A-alright...'"

"3746

The spread of food in front of her continued to grow until there was a veritable banquet filling the table. Obviously, this was far more than she alone could have been expected to eat, so she could only assume that more people were going to be joining her soon.

Or at least, she hoped so.

As for the dishes themselves, Gema had to lean forward and inspect them more closely, because even at a glance, they looked truly otherworldly. She wasn't sure she'd ever seen food glow before. She'd heard about a couple of entrees in the Undercrust that also did, but she'd yet to actually visit and see for herself.

This was not just a couple of things, though. All of it was glowing. The entire feast. She was looking for even just one portion that looked in some way normal, but she couldn't find it.

On the bright side, however, nothing looked or smelled particularly horrible. In fact, some of the scents she was picking up were quite enticing. The dish closest to her smelled faintly of honey and cinnamon, which happened to be some of her personal favorites.

It was still a bit questionable as to whether or not those two things were actually in the food, though. She had a rather strange feeling that they might not be. Like maybe this was all some sort of elaborate sensory illusion, designed to appeal directly to her psychically-determined preferences.

The temptation was certainly there, though. And a variety of utensils were already laid out in front of her, too.

And as she continued looking and smelling, she couldn't help feeling terribly ill-at-ease by this whole situation. Like she'd been dropped into a den full of psychic booby traps. Like there was nothing she could do and nowhere she could go to escape.

But thankfully, that was just a feeling. And Gema Elroy was quite good at ignoring those.

She'd always preferred to flip a situation on its head, instead of stewing in silent discomfort.

After a few more silent moments of deliberation, she turned to the nearest Methusel behind her and said, "Excuse me. I'm sorry to be a bother, but how many calories are in this dish, right here?" And she pointed.

The Methusel looked at her like she was speaking in tongues.

Gema Elroy was not deterred. She looked to the next Methusel. "Maybe you could just show me the packaging for the ingredients used. That might give me a rough estimate."

Shockingly, still no answer arrived."

"3747

'My dear,' said Ozolos publicly, 'I do not think any of this was bought from a grocery store.'

"What do you mean?" said Gema. "Where would it have come from, then?"

'Apologies for my servant,' said Ozolos, stretching himself over her shoulder to look at the same Methusel. 'She is a notoriously picky eater.'

"I am not!"

'She is also in a denial about a great many things in life.'

Gema made a face--and not entirely as part of their performance. That remark felt like it had a little too much subtext.

Ozolos didn't stop, though. "Tis not entirely her own fault, however. Over the long years among our storied kin, there have been many figures who were infamously difficult to please at the dinner table. I have begun to think that it may instead be some strange byproduct of Rainlord culture. Or Arman culture, perhaps. I hope your masters will not be offended if she does not partake very deeply of this wonderful banquet that you have all so graciously provided to us.'

“...Arman?” said the Methusel. But he did not get the chance to elaborate, because another silent voice interrupted.

‘This banquet is not only for her enjoyment. It is also for you, her noble guide.’

Without the clear direction of audible sound waves to rely on, Gema had to look all around the room before her eyes finally landed on the voice’s owner. It was Gardorox again, and this time, he was joined with someone who had not been present during their earlier encounter.

Someone quite important. Someone she’d only met once before but remembered quite clearly for the impression he’d made.

That was Nixil, the Head of the Warden’s Council--and by extension, the leader of this entire enclave.

Not many reapers within the Old Wardens were individually famous in the outside world, because they rarely ever left, but Nixil was certainly an exception. In fact, his name was one of the most recognizable in the entire world, as he was historically known to have negotiated with servant emperors across every Age.

And when they crossed him, it was often to their great detriment, in one way or another.

Or at least, that was how Ozolos had explained it to her, prior to their very first visit to this place.

On that particular occasion, it had not escaped Gema’s notice that Ozolos had seemed a little different in Nixil’s presence. Here and now, she was already wondering if it would be so again."

"3748

For his part, however, Ozolos was currently still remaining silent.

Gardorox pushed a bit more. ‘Please, do give it a try. It is quite rare that we allow any outsider to experience this, so I am interested to see your reaction to it.’

Admittedly, Gema was a little curious to see that herself, but rather unsurprisingly, Ozolos made neither a response nor a move toward the glowing banquet before them.

And perhaps it was just her, but Gema abruptly felt as though the tension in the room had become thick enough to use one of these strange utensils on.

It was Nixil who pulled them out of the silence. With a chortle, no less. 'I fear we have wasted our time and resources. This one will not be indulging in our generosity, I suspect.'

'Hmm?' Gardorox looked to his leader. 'Why do you say that?'

Nixil did not answer him. 'Your name was Ozolos, correct?'

Immediately, Nixil received his own treatment, as Ozolos elected to say nothing.

Nixil's fishy face remained unbothered. 'You are quite wary of us, it would seem. Not at all like the countless sycophants that my colleagues are so accustomed to dealing with. I find it rather refreshing, honestly. A change of pace, if nothing else.'

'You honor me with more attention than I deserve,' said Ozolos. 'I merely keep to the old ways of my people.'

'Oh, you are too humble by a half,' said Nixil. 'I thought there was something peculiar about you the first time we met, and now, having had time to meditate on it, I think I may know what it is.'

Oh, gosh. Gema was listening even more intently than before.

'You are one who has been reborn,' said Nixil. 'Aren't you?'

Ozolos made no response.

'Perhaps you even went by a different name, once upon a time,' said Nixil. 'Perhaps I would even recognize that name, were you to tell it to me. And perhaps the reason you are so wary is because you are already quite familiar with our customs. Indeed, perhaps you were once one of us, hmm?'

What in the world? Gema wanted to say something, but she had no idea what.

She was not alone in her confusion. 'What are you saying, Nixil?' Gardorox swam nearer, though still not too close. 'Reborn? How could such a thing--?'

‘Be silent, please, my friend.’

And Gardorox did exactly that."

"3749

‘That is an interesting term to use,’ said Ozolos. ‘Reborn. I had not thought of it that way before.’

‘Oh? How would you put it, then?’

‘Scarred. Mutilated, even.’

That left a lingering and tense silence in its wake.

Gema felt her heart beat a little faster as she waited to learn how the leader of the Old Wardens was going to take that response.

‘...I understand,’ said Nixil. ‘That, too, is a reasonable perspective. I only question its productiveness. Moving forward has always been the more appealing way of thinking to me.’

‘Another interesting term,’ said Ozolos. ‘Moving forward. It does not strike me as appropriate for you, however. You, who leads one of the most infamously isolationist societies in the world. It seems, rather, that you and your kin would prefer to move any which way but forward.’

‘Watch how you speak to the Rahja,’ said Gardorox.

‘I said be silent,’ said Nixil, this time with noticeable force. Enough so, in fact, that Gema could feel the words in her chest.

Which confused her further.

After a moment, Nixil’s tone softened again as he addressed Gardorox. ‘I would have our guest speak his mind before us. I tire of mealy mouths.’

Hold on. She was a guest here, too. Did she not count? Eh, who was she kidding? Probably not.

Nixil turned back toward them. ‘So tell me, Ozolos. Were you always called such? Were you once one of us?’

‘Perhaps,’ said Ozolos. ‘Or perhaps not.’

For some reason, that made Nixil burst into laughter. ‘Oho! For a moment there, you seemed without humor! But that is quite the inside joke! I must say! And a telling one, as well!’

‘Then it is as I thought,’ said Ozolos, sounding not at all jovial by comparison. ‘You have had encounters of your own.’

‘Heh.’ It took Nixil a bit longer to settle himself fully. ‘Indeed.’

‘Yet you seem no worse for wear, as far as I can tell.’

‘Yes. I have always been able to negotiate from a position of strength. They have sought me out in every Age, sometimes stealthily, sometimes forthrightly. Always hoping to find me more agreeable.’

‘...To speak so candidly, you must be quite confident in yourself,’ said Ozolos. ‘In my experience, words must be chosen carefully, even in total privacy. To do otherwise is to invite the Unwavering Gaze.’

‘Not here,’ said Nixil. His tailfin gestured broadly. ‘Not among our stalwart friends. You need not fear. Faridel is well-protected from such invasive eyes.’

"3750

‘You will have to forgive me if I do not trust that claim,’ said Ozolos.

‘Of course,’ said Nixil. ‘Your trepidation is understandable. Unburdening yourself of it will take time, no doubt.’

‘Time which my servant and I may not have,’ said Ozolos. ‘Wonderful as this island is, we do have lives that we must get back to. We cannot stay here indefinitely for the mere purpose of helping new reapers integrate into your fold--especially when we are not exactly integrated ourselves. That seemed a strange demand of your kin, if you do not mind my saying so.’

Nixil shook his head. ‘It saddens me to hear you say so, but perhaps that is my failing. I’ve become so accustomed to hearing about how passionately outsiders wish to join us here that it did not occur to me that you might feel differently.’

‘So it WAS on your request that we be ordered to stay here,’ said Ozolos. ‘That Harilixa of yours was quite insistent. And demanding.’

And rude, thought Gema.

‘Was she now?’ said Nixil. ‘She can be rather passionate, at times. But yes, I did mention to the Council that I wished for you to stay a while upon your next visit. You piqued my curiosity.’

‘You honor me, Rahja.’

‘And I would so even more, if you would but stay. There is much I would discuss with you, Ozolos.’

‘We had already intended to stay for a few days after the new residents arrived. Beyond that, however, I’m afraid we cannot linger.’

‘Mm.’ Nixil turned and swam a few paces backward before returning. ‘Then perhaps I should not waste time. Tell me, Ozolos. Can you see them still? Do you know their current faces? Do their strings still pull on you?’

Ozolos fell quiet.

Nixil didn’t push him, though. He merely waited.

And again, Gema felt like the air got even thicker. Much more than this, and she wondered if she would have trouble breathing.

‘...You ask too much of me, my friend,’ said Ozolos.

‘That is why you should stay,’ said Nixil. ‘So you can learn not to fear them. This place will be good for you. It will rejuvenate your spirit, if you allow it. Heal some of those “scars,” perhaps.’

‘They’ve healed well enough on their own.’

‘Then why do you not speak more freely?’

‘Because I know the danger therein.’

‘Again, I tell you that danger does not exist here. The Methusel guard us well.’

‘The danger is also in you.’”

For a time, Nixil merely stared back at the two of them.

And Gema felt a shiver down the length of her body. Despite all their conversing, Ozolos had still never detached himself from her. He was clinging to the back of her shoulder even now.

'My friend,' said Nixil, 'I give you my word that I wish no harm upon you or your girl here. You are free to leave at any time.'

'Harm is not all that concerns me,' said Ozolos. 'This girl, despite her youth, has already endured much. She has become the instrument of forces far beyond her ability to even perceive, let alone control. And you, good Rahja, are yet one more player of a game in which she is only a pawn.'

Wow. Gema certainly wanted to interrupt and defend herself, but on the other hand, this felt like it might be a rare, true glimpse into her strange reaper's heart.

Either that, or he was lying. In which case, she didn't want to ruin his performance.

'I have no designs on your servant,' said Nixil. 'She matters nothing to me.' He spared her a glance. 'Meaning no offense.'

Gema merely bobbed her head and returned a flat smile.

'My only interest is in you, Ozolos. I understand your worry, but from the way you are talking, it sounds to me as though you are already in quite a difficult position. Within the Vanguard, perhaps? Their machinations have been rather concerningly opaque, of late. It would not surprise me to learn that you have become stuck in a troublesome spot of that web.'

Hmm. How much did this fellow know about what the Vanguard was actually up to, Gema wondered? Because she had a feeling that it was quite a lot. The Covert Intelligence Division probably wouldn't be bending over backwards to try and accommodate these people if that weren't the case.

'Your assessment has merit,' said Ozolos. 'Are you offering to help us out of our bind?'

‘Yes,’ said Nixil. ‘But are you willing to trust us in this task? Because if not, then nothing can be accomplished. Regardless of what the caged fools or the wicked birds or anyone else may have done to you, it cannot be undone without your consent.’

What in the world were they talking about now? Gema was completely lost.

But apparently, Ozolos wasn’t. ‘Cannot? Or will not? Is that an expression of your inability? Or your unwillingness to compromise your principles?’

‘The latter. We will not do anything to you without your permission. On this matter, you have my most sincere promise.’”

"3752

‘A noble claim,’ said Ozolos. ‘If only it were the truth.’

‘I can do naught else but give you my word,’ said Nixil. ‘In the end, it is your choice whether to trust it.’

Then there came a long silence.

So long, in fact, that Gema began to think that perhaps she was missing something. Which made sense, she supposed, considering how lost she’d ended up.

She looked around the dining chamber another time and noticed a few more Methusel than before, but knowing what she did of them, they may very well have been there all along.

One thing was certain, though: she was more uncomfortable than ever. She remembered thinking that, if things got any tenser in here, she might have trouble breathing, and yet somehow, it was still a surprise to find that she had actually been right about that.

Her breaths were hard and sharp. Not difficult, necessarily. But she had to concentrate on them a little. Force the air in.

Even if she couldn’t follow what the reapers had been saying, she could follow this feeling. And it didn’t bode well.

Finally, Ozolos spoke up again. 'I'm afraid I must respectfully decline.'

'That is a shame,' said Nixil. 'But I hope to change your mind before your stay here concludes.'

'I think we will also be cutting our stay short,' said Ozolos. 'In fact, we will be leaving immediately, as there is something we must report to Captain General Frederick. Thank you for your hospitality, good Rahja.' And then privately to Gema, he added, 'Stand up and go.'

Oh. Geez. Uh. Crap. She did as she was bid and moved to leave. She made it most of the way across the room before Nixil's next word arrived.

'Stop,' was all he said.

But it was said with force. It reverberated in her mind and body at once, and Gema couldn't help but do so.

She tried, but for some reason, she couldn't take another step.

And it was all she could do to not panic.

Ozolos' silent voice remained as calm as ever, however. 'And so your true colors are revealed. That was surprisingly easy. I thought you would at least let us leave the building.'

'I do not appreciate these games, Ozolos.'

'No. You do. You simply do not appreciate losing them.'

'Hoh! I've lost, have I? Why? Because you've succeeded in irritating me?'

'In part, perhaps. But primarily, because you are out of practice sparring with equals.'

"3753 -- CCCVII.

Nixil paused at that. 'My equal? In what capacity?'

'All capacities.'

'Hmph! How bold! You are all but asking me to test you, you know! Are you sure that you can handle it? I do not wish to harm you, my friend.'

'That will not be necessary.' Then, in a tremorous voice, he added.
'Release her.'

And suddenly, she noticed the Methusel there next to her. Their hands had been on her wrists and ankles, apparently. But now they were letting her go and slinking away.

'Go now, Gema,' said Ozolos privately. His voice was not commanding any longer. Only gentle and familiar.

And she went. Through the open doorway and into the corridor.

Nixil gave chase. 'You can command the Methusel!' he said, sounding equal parts shocked and delighted. 'I knew you were one of us! You must tell me your identity!'

'No longer.'

'Do not say that! Were you among the exiled?! If so, then put your fears aside! After such a transformation, I am sure we could arrive at a new arrangement for you! Bygones could well and truly be bygones if you wish it! Do you know how rare of an opportunity that is! Countless of our kind would kill for such a chance!'

Gema just kept going, feeling that she absolutely should not stop walking unless Ozolos told her to.

'I was not exiled,' said Ozolos. 'I left of my own accord. And you, Nix, have gotten much worse in my absence.'

Nixil stopped following.

'Wait,' said Ozolos privately.

And she stopped as well. She looked back toward the other reaper.

Nixil was just floating there, silent. A group of Methusel had followed, though they seemed to be keeping their distance.

'I thought perhaps you might've changed for the better after all this time,' said Ozolos. 'But I see you have become even more manipulative than ever. Power has gone to your head, little brother.'

Nixil was visibly struggling. 'You... which of my brothers are you claiming to be?'

‘Even now, you still cannot tell?’

‘Do not try that. Tell me now or be slain as a liar and imposter of the highest order.’

Ozolos sighed. “Tis I. Skapa.’

Chapter Three Hundred Seven: ‘O, lost dragon...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Meditation was helping him to remain calm. To remain sane, even.

Meditation, that was, in combination with pan-forma. If there was one bright side to this sudden and strange captivity, it might have been that. He could delve deep into Axiolis’ memories. He could literally live in the past. In the presence of his many ancestors.

For a time, anyway."

"3753 -- CCCVII.

Nixil paused at that. ‘My equal? In what capacity?’

‘All capacities.’

‘Hmph! How bold! You are all but asking me to test you, you know! Are you sure that you can handle it? I do not wish to harm you, my friend.’

‘That will not be necessary.’ Then, in a tremorous voice, he added. ‘Release her.’

And suddenly, she noticed the Methusel there next to her. Their hands had been on her wrists and ankles, apparently. But now they were letting her go and slinking away.

‘Go now, Gema,’ said Ozolos privately. His voice was not commanding any longer. Only gentle and familiar.

And she went. Through the open doorway and into the corridor.

Nixil gave chase. 'You can command the Methusel!' he said, sounding equal parts shocked and delighted. 'I knew you were one of us! You must tell me your identity!'

'No longer.'

'Do not say that! Were you among the exiled?! If so, then put your fears aside! After such a transformation, I am sure we could arrive at a new arrangement for you! Bygones could well and truly be bygones if you wish it! Do you know how rare of an opportunity that is! Countless of our kind would kill for such a chance!'

Gema just kept going, feeling that she absolutely should not stop walking unless Ozolos told her to.

'I was not exiled,' said Ozolos. 'I left of my own accord. And you, Nix, have gotten much worse in my absence.'

Nixil stopped following.

'Wait,' said Ozolos privately.

And she stopped as well. She looked back toward the other reaper.

Nixil was just floating there, silent. A group of Methusel had followed, though they seemed to be keeping their distance.

'I thought perhaps you might've changed for the better after all this time,' said Ozolos. 'But I see you have become even more manipulative than ever. Power has gone to your head, little brother.'

Nixil was visibly struggling. 'You... which of my brothers are you claiming to be?'

'Even now, you still cannot tell?'

'Do not try that. Tell me now or be slain as a liar and imposter of the highest order.'

Ozolos sighed. 'Tis I. Skapa.'

Chapter Three Hundred Seven: 'O, lost dragon...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Meditation was helping him to remain calm. To remain sane, even.

Meditation, that was, in combination with pan-forma. If there was one bright side to this sudden and strange captivity, it might have been that. He could delve deep into Axiolis' memories. He could literally live in the past. In the presence of his many ancestors.

For a time, anyway."

"3754

Not only did it have a quieting effect on his own mind; it also gave him the opportunity to search through the past for anything that might've been useful in the present day. Perhaps that was a fruitless endeavor, since Axiolis could theoretically just tell him anything that might be discovered here, but Zeff Elroy couldn't help himself.

There was just a feeling he had. Somewhere in the back of his mind. A feeling of unrest. Tension. Like maybe this chaotic world would make a little more sense if he could figure out what he was missing.

Plus, there was the fact that he and Axiolis both now knew that the reaper's memories had been tampered with in the distant past. The sudden remembrance of Kingsparrows during their first encounter with Graves had left a lasting impression on the two of them. Perhaps that was why Axiolis seemed just as keen as he to conduct these meditative dives. The reaper was thinking of it as a kind of personal audit, a search for anything else that might've been suppressed--or perhaps that had simply slipped through the cracks.

Zeff, however, was uncovering a further problem.

Because there were times during their meditation--not often, sure, but they were there--when he could sense an abrupt discord between his mind and Axiolis'. And it was bad enough that it even threatened to prematurely end their hyper-state merge.

He'd discussed the matter with Axiolis multiple times now, but the reaper just kept telling him that it was a matter of continued practice. That it was a sign they needed to refine their skill with pan-forma, perhaps instigated by the immense amount of emotional and psychological turmoil that they had both undergone over the last several months.

Which, frankly, Zeff did not entirely buy. It was a fair excuse, sure. They had indeed been through much. It made a degree of sense that it might begin to impact their mental performance.

But he'd also begun to think that, perhaps, Axiolis was hiding something from him. Perhaps there were memories which the reaper did not wish for him to see.

And yet, that notion was also a bit peculiar. When it came to the merging of their two consciousnesses within a hyper-state, Zeff had never been under the impression that he should be privy to each and every memory that Axiolis had ever experienced."

"3755

There had always been an understanding between the two of them that some things were simply... private. That they did not need to be shared, much less delved into fully.

Memories of intimacy, for example. When Zeff thought of his late wife, Mariana, there were certainly things there that he did not particularly wish to share with Axiolis. And so of course, there were going to be similar instances for the reaper, who'd lived an almost unfathomably long life. He suspected this was the case for virtually every hyper-capable pairing of reaper and servant in the world.

If Axiolis did not wish to share something with him, then that was perfectly fine and fair, Zeff felt.

Unless there was some other reason for it. Something less personal. Something more troubling.

Zeff couldn't quite pin down what that might be, though. It was just another vague feeling in his mind. Another muted worry for the ever-increasing pile.

If he allowed such concerns to drive his thinking too much, he knew that he would only drive himself mad. Or. Further mad, perhaps.

He'd reached a peculiar state of mind. This calmness from his meditations. This steadiness. It felt almost artificial in nature. A mask that he was wearing. Trying to fool even himself.

And maybe it was even working a bit? He was a fool, certainly. He'd come to understand that quite clearly by now. So what was wrong with simply... letting it be so? Accepting it? If only a little?

Trapped as he was, what other option did he have? Raging hadn't accomplished anything thus far. This way, he could think more clearly.

Theoretically, at least. Was it helping with the task of searching through Axiolis' memories? Of learning yet more about his ancestors? He hoped so, but he wasn't sure.

Agam Elroy had become a frequent focus again. Knowing of Agam's connection to Graves and Bernardino Blackburn--of the supposed "quest" that the three of them had once ventured upon together--Zeff had been hoping to uncover some great revelation, but even now, Axiolis had no direct memory of such a thing.

But of course, Agam had lived a very long life--as had Bernardino--and there had been plenty of opportunity for such an adventure to occur without Axiolis' knowledge. Graves had mentioned "Little Dino Blackburn," which implied that it would have occurred while Bernardino was still quite young."

"3756

And as the two of them continued to dwell on it, they did eventually realize that there was one particularly turbulent time period which might fit the bill.

The Breaking of Korgum.

Or rather, the period leading up to it. The Breaking had been the culmination of several mad years all around the world, and while the Rainlords had not gotten directly caught up in it, the mayhem had still been encompassing enough that many of their kin had gone mysteriously "missing" during it.

That in itself wasn't such a strange thing, historically speaking. Rainlords had always had a habit of sticking their noses in other people's business, and one of the mechanisms they used to cope with that problem was to "disappear" for a time so as not to draw attention back to their families.

It hadn't always worked. And blowback was still a fairly regular occurrence--as were the great campaigns that followed.

After all, when someone decided to strike them, the world needed to know that such actions would not go unanswered. That they would fall upon their enemies with all the fury of a storm. Or else even more enemies would come, after seeing weakness in them.

This had always been their way, ever since the Armans took up the fight against the Lyzakks.

Naturally, it was not perfect. No doubt, many mistakes had been made over the long years of fighting. But despite all the madness their people had endured, they had actually enjoyed more peace.

It certainly didn't always feel like it, of course. Especially these days. But the homeland of the Armans, the People of the Rain, had far more often been peaceful than not. From a pure numbers perspective, their children had almost always been able to grow up in complete safety.

That was small comfort at the moment, however.

Regardless, the timeline for the Breaking seemed to fit, as far as Axiolis could tell. Bernardino would indeed have been extremely young but still a servant, and Agam would have been powerful but not yet in the prime of his fame. Graves, of course, remained a mystery on that front, but if his current age could be estimated at between two and four hundred years, then he would fit in just fine, as well.

And there were plenty of events leading up to the Breaking that could have involved the three of them in some way. Too many, in fact."

"3757

For example, there was the infamous Theft of the Crown Jewels of Yena Maria. That had caused quite the stir, since the Jewels were supposed to harbor incredible, otherworldly power--power which had supposedly been what allowed the royal family of Yena to solidify their rule some four hundred years prior. Axiolis recalled hearing that such claims were overblown, that the noble Hahl Yena had no genuine need of such trifles, but within five years of the theft, their dynasty collapsed, overthrown by rebels.

And then it was a decade of civil war for that little country. Despite its size, Yena Maria had always been renowned for its incredible riches. Even to this day, that aspect of its reputation was not entirely gone. Doubtless, that played a role in the nation's decision to join in the fight against Vantalay. If the Vantalayans had actually succeeded in their conquest of Czacoa, Yena Maria probably felt that it would be next.

Such a grim fate was quite unlikely now, though. With Vanderberk out of the picture and Graves seemingly in full control of the entire warfront, Zeff doubted that the hostilities in this region of the world would last for very much longer.

Or at least, he hoped so.

Another possibility for Agam's secret quest might have involved something closer to Korgum itself. The nation of Azirat, Korgum's northern neighbor, had struggled with a number of high-profile assassination attempts in the years leading up to the Breaking. Many of those attempts had been successful, too, igniting a long-enduring paranoia for an entire generation of the Azirat citizenry. It grew so bad, in fact, that politicians stopped giving speeches in public entirely.

Famously, it wasn't until one newly elected President Herman began giving daily speeches from the front porch of his own modest home--without ever getting shot at--that cultural sentiment began to shift away from those fears.

But how might Agam, Bernardino, and Graves have been involved in such events? Ax could only wonder. Graves mentioned heroism on the part of the other two, but without anything else to go on, it was anyone's guess.

Zeff wished now that he'd gotten more specifics out of the marshal. If he'd known that he was going to end up isolated from everyone else like this, he would have made it more of a priority to learn as much as he could from the Pale Hawk in the short time he had left.

Bah. Strange thoughts."

"3758

He began to feel his concentration wavering, his focus lagging. A sign of fatigue. These heightened meditations were tiring. He wanted to keep going, but it was probably time to stop--or to take a break and reassess, at least.

It wasn't immediate. Pulling himself and Axiolis safely out of the trance required a bit of patience. A gradual awakening back into the real world.

Although, "real" might not have been the most accurate word, at the moment.

As his eyes eased open, and as Axiolis' soul melted out of his own, Zeff was again reminded of his ethereal surroundings.

The sky was completely dark, though not because it was nighttime. This place had no sun at all, as far as he and Ax had been able to discern. And yet it was not without luminance.

The world itself glowed with a ghostly pale light. Buildings were almost as dark as the sky, but they had flickering outlines to them, highlighting every edge, every corner. The ground, too, was dark, illuminated primarily by lines in the sidewalk and cracks in the pavement.

It had taken a while of frustrated faffing about, but they'd come to the conclusion that this place was actually Ridgemark. Or some shadowy representation of it, perhaps. If they'd been more familiar with the city, maybe it wouldn't have taken them so long to locate some of its more notable landmarks.

The Ruby 88 Hotel & Casino, for example, was standing not far in the distance as Zeff sat cross-legged on a street corner. By now, they'd also seen the Lucky Llama and the Golden Hierophant, too. They'd gone inside each one multiple times--along with most of the other buildings around here--hoping to find something. Or someone. Or just some trace of life, even.

But to no avail.

This phantasmal world was empty, save only the two of them.

And they still had no idea how they'd ended up in this place, much less how to return. Zeff and Axiolis had both woken up here, and that was the last thing they remembered after being with everyone else at their encampment in the defense of Ridgemark.

Which was doubly odd, of course, because reapers did not sleep, other than when they were seriously wounded.

Or being psychically manipulated, maybe.

By now, the notion had certainly crossed Zeff's mind that their new friend, the esteemed Field Marshal Graves, might very well be the one responsible for their current predicament."

"3759

In fact, with each passing hour, he was becoming increasingly convinced that was the case. If anything, he was now looking for evidence that might somehow prove Graves' innocence. It sure would be nice if someone other than one of the most dangerous men in the world was to blame.

He supposed that the Black Scourge was also suspect, but that wasn't exactly an improvement. Nor did it track with what little he knew of Gohvis' motives. Yes, the man had come to him in secret and made negotiations, but those had been an attempt to move all the Rainlords away from Vantalay, not just Zeff.

'Maybe it was neither of them,' said Ax as they wandered around the phantom city again, just trying to kill time. 'Garovel mentioned an experience like this, not so long ago. He, Chergoa, Hector, and Emiliana all became trapped in a pocket dimension during the battle at Dunehall.'

Zeff recalled. 'Is this how they described their experience? A world full of phantom lights?'

'No. For them, it was apparently just total darkness. No visual stimuli whatsoever. But it still bears consideration, I think. They ended up trapped because of an accident. Garovel described it as some kind of phenomenon when the Marauder of Calthos' power clashed with the Shards of the Dry God.'

'I don't recall anything like that happening to us before waking up here.'

'Neither do I, but is it not still possible that some similar phenomenon might be to blame?'

'Are you sure you're not just searching for excuses?'

‘Hmph. For whom? Graves? If he is at fault, then so be it. Our kin have overcome greater foes.’

Zeff actually smiled at that, though only just. He appreciated the reaper’s spirit, but he knew it would take a lot more than a winning attitude to fight someone like that.

‘But truly, I am starting to think it might not be him,’ Ax went on. ‘Which could be even worse for us, actually.’

‘Oh? And here I was admiring your optimism.’

‘We have been here for several days now. I worry that the culprit should have revealed themselves by this point. Meaning that there may not be one in the first place--and that we’ll have to find our own way out.’

Zeff exhaled. ‘More searching, then.’

‘Indeed.’

They’d already found the outer bound of this realm a couple days ago. It was just a veil of thin light, but it was as impassable as a wall of soul-strengthened diamond."

"3760

It wasn’t even that far away, either. They’d walked all the way around the perimeter, searching for any gaps and finding none whatsoever. They’d climbed all the way up most of the buildings as well, looking down on the city from the rooftops for better vantage points.

They’d even tried flying up into the sky, but there was a barrier up there, too. It seemed to be a translucent dome over Ridgemark’s entire downtown area.

Naturally, Zeff had also tried attacking the buildings, too. With his materialization, knocking them down should have been a simple feat, and yet they were entirely unmoved by anything he did, just as the barrier itself was.

Stranger still, they didn’t even get wet. Any lingering water just disappeared on its own, without him needing to dematerialize it.

Quite the concerning little detail, he felt, even if it made no practical difference as of yet. It suggested that his powers were not working entirely as normal in this place.

And so they began yet another search, taking a rather leisurely pace this time, since they had no idea what to be looking for--or if there even was anything to be found.

Remaining attentive was a chore. With no clues or clear plan, Zeff's mind wanted to wander. To return to his many worldly concerns.

But he could do that during meditations. Sort of. That was muddy, too, honestly, but he wanted to stay present. For now, at least.

And at length, to his and Axiolis' shared shock, they finally spotted something.

A great beam of white light appeared in the sky, rising up from the ground. It looked like all the other phantom lights, only much larger and brighter. A faint trembling arrived with it, enough for Zeff to feel it in his feet, which was still more than could be said for any of the heavy impact assaults that he had himself conducted on various buildings during their time here.

The giant light did not linger, however. After only a matter of seconds, it was gone, leaving a reddish afterimage in his retinas behind.

No questioning was necessary. They rushed toward its point of origin, which seemed to be a few streets over.

'Hmm,' hummed Ax as they moved. 'That's unsettling'

'What do you mean? It's the first sign of anything being there other than us.'

'Yes, but I can't sense it. I can see it but not sense it. And in all my experience, that is not typically a good omen.'

"3761

Lakefire. What was the problem going to be this time, Zeff wondered? 'How "not good" are we talking here?'

'Well, considering the fact that I haven't sensed anything at all--other than you--the entire time we've been here, it could be that my senses are being blocked. And to accomplish that feat would require someone or something quite powerful.'

'Wonderful.'

'But who knows? They could be friendly. Or perhaps my senses simply don't work in this realm to begin with.'

'But if you can still sense me, then shouldn't that mean they're working just fine?'

'In theory. Hence why I haven't been too bothered about it until now. But our connection as reaper and servant might guarantee my ability to sense you regardless of what strange spaces we find ourselves in. It is difficult to be sure.'

It didn't take much longer to reach their estimated destination. With no other clues or senses to rely on, they still had to resort to a visual search.

Before they discovered anything, however, a shout from afar found them first.

"Hey! What do you think you're doing here?! This is private property!"

It took Zeff a second to comprehend the words, because they were Valgan, and while he was mostly fluent in it, he still required some processing time in his head. He turned and saw a figure running over to him from the other end of the road.

He braced himself for hostilities, but after a few moments, he was surprised to discover that he actually recognized who it was.

And judging from the expression on the other man's face, the feeling was mutual. "Wait a minute," the fellow said, still in Valgan. "Is that you, Water Dragon?"

Zeff couldn't conceal his own surprise. He was worse at speaking in Valgan, so he stuck with Mohssian, feeling quite confident that this man would be more than merely fluent in it. "It is. And is that you, Black Artisan?"

Daro Bright the Black Artisan, one of the three most powerful servants within the RPMP, flashed between irritation and amusement. "Yes, it is," he said, now also in Mohssian. "How in the black hells did you get here?"

'We have no idea,' said Axiolis. 'We simply woke up and found ourselves in this place. Is this... your domain, perhaps?'

"Yes, it's a--" Daro cut himself off and looked over the two of them again, moving only his eyes and not his head, perhaps debating how much he should explain."

"3762

Zeff and Axiolis merely waited for the man to complete his thought. If they had accidentally intruded upon his space--whatever it was--then Zeff didn't feel like the guy had an obligation to tell them anything.

"...It's a workspace," said the Artisan. His bushy black eyebrows settled flatly over his gaze, creating an expression that seemed somewhat stern but not necessarily upset or angry. The man's modest stature made it so he had to look up at Zeff, but the bulk on his frame and the confidence in his tone suggested that he felt in no way beneath the person he was looking at.

'Interesting,' said Axiolis. 'Is this a physical space? As in, are we truly here? Or are our minds merely being projected here while our bodies remain in the real world?'

"It's physical," said Daro. "Partially, anyway. In order to conduct certain tests, I needed it to retain at least some of the same physical properties as reality."

Perhaps this was going to end up a pointless question, but Zeff couldn't help asking it. "How were you able to create this place?"

The Artisan regarded him for a long moment, weighing him with his eyes. "It's complicated."

"I don't doubt it," said Zeff, looking around again. "I'm simply... flabbergasted, I suppose. I thought this was some sort of natural phantom realm. A mere shadow of reality, perhaps, but still natural nonetheless. To think it is actually a man-made construct... I..."

"Hmph. Impressed, are you?"

"You could say that."

“You are a materializer, yes?”

Zeff cocked an eyebrow. “That’s right.”

Daro took another moment to eye them both as he rubbed his chin. “And you really have no idea how you ended up here?”

‘We were thinking maybe it was some natural phenomenon that we got caught up in, but we can’t recall experiencing anything that strange recently.’

“Or that someone kidnapped us,” added Zeff. “But if you’re the founder of this realm and didn’t even know we were here, then I suppose it wasn’t that, either.”

Daro’s chin-rubbing seemed to increase in intensity, and his eyes narrowed. Like Zeff, he also decided to look around. “No. That second guess might’ve been correct, though it obviously wasn’t my doing. I’ve no reason to meddle with you or your affairs.”

“If not you, then who?” said Zeff.

“That is indeed the question. And I fear I know the answer. But I must be sure.”

"3763

“What are you going to do?” said Zeff.

Rather than answering, Daro asked a question of his own. “How long have you two been stuck here?”

‘Several days, we think,’ said Ax. ‘It is difficult to tell.’

“And how do you feel, right now?” said Daro, stepping closer to Zeff and eyeing him up and down.

“Fine...?”

“Fine, you say?” The man looked abruptly annoyed. “Pardon me, but I must inspect you now.”

“What do you mean inspect?”

“Physically. May I have your permission to lay my hands on you? It won’t take but a minute, nor will it be invasive.”

The edges of Zeff’s mouth curled down. “Why?”

“I will explain after. For now, please. ‘Twill be a mere examination. Quick and painless. I promise.”

His frown only deepened, and he looked to Ax for some sort of guidance.

‘Well, at least he is asking for permission,’ said the reaper privately. ‘Just say yes.’

Zeff released a growling sigh. “Very well. Do what you must.”

“Appreciated.”

The man’s hands found Zeff’s face and turned his chin left, then right. He brought Zeff’s head down to his own and then stared directly into his eyes.

Daro’s black pupils and brown irises went gray, then the sclera did, too, making them look almost like they’d turned to stone.

Then Zeff felt the entire world waver, as if it were suddenly closing in around him. A great pressure arrived all over his body, as if he’d been wrapped up in cloth.

His body wanted to panic. Wanted to twitch and flail. But his mind remained firm. Unbothered.

Then Daro’s eyes went from mere gray to pitch black, and the intensity all around Zeff heightened. Doubled. Tripled, perhaps.

Zeff was unfazed, however.

This strange state continued on for a few moments more, and then it abated. Daro’s gaze returned to normal, as did the world.

“Hmph. Interesting.” Daro let go of his face and moved down to Zeff’s left arm, feeling along the wrist with both thumbs. “Sorry about that,” he said without looking up. “That hadn’t been what I intended to test, but I noticed something and grew curious. I suppose I shouldn’t be too surprised that a Water Dragon would be in possession of that.”

Zeff wanted to ask what, but he held his tongue. Daro seemed to be focusing, and questions could wait until this exam was over."

"3764

"Hmph. You said you were fine." The Artisan sounded rather annoyed again, and he held up Zeff's own wrist as if to show the man something he hadn't seen before. "You're not. You have no pulse."

"Oh." That remark, Zeff felt compelled to respond to. "Well, yes, as we said, it's been several days. Without food or water, of course my flesh has died."

"Then you should not have said you were fine," said Daro.

"Why not? It's hardly a bother for the undead."

"Because it supports your claim of innocence."

Zeff was lost. "What? How?"

"Hmph. You really are out of your depth here, aren't you?" He finally let go of Zeff and turned around in order to pace a few steps back, rubbing his chin again as he seemed to be lost in thought for a time. "Perhaps I will share a few things with you, Water Dragon."

"Alright..." He still had questions, of course, but he also had a feeling that this odd man was only going to continue generating new ones, regardless of what Zeff asked.

"This war has put me in a rather difficult position," said Daro. "War tends to do that to everyone, of course, but without hubris, I say that mine is especially so. And perhaps you can already surmise why."

Axiolis answered for them. 'Your technology?'

"Hmph. Yes. You've gotten a few glimpses of my work already, yes?"

'We've seen your 'ramata' weapon. It was indeed impressive.'

A brief silence passed as Daro eyed them expectantly. "...Is that it? Just the ramata? No other works?"

Zeff and Axiolis exchanged uncertain looks.

‘Uh... oh, did you work on those Invisibility rings, too, perhaps?’

“Those? A trifle.” A small smile crossed his face. “Huh. Perhaps my efforts at concealing my work have been going better than I thought, then. Pleasant news! Hmph!”

‘So you are concerned about your ideas being stolen during this conflict?’

“Yes and no. Such theft is, in some ways, inevitable. Ideas must proliferate in order for this world of ours to advance, yes? And theft at a particularly bad time can have terrible consequences, of course. But what I am most concerned about is my work being destroyed.”

‘Ah, of course,’ said Ax. ‘A familiar historical tale.’

“There are those seeking to use the chaos unfolding around Ridgemark in order to move against me. To steal, as you said. Or to destroy.”

"3765

‘In that case, I am surprised you were not much more aggressive upon first seeing us here,’ said Ax. ‘Perhaps I was mistaken, but you came across as more annoyed than truly threatening.’

“Hmph. I do not eagerly resort to violence. Much more can be learned and accomplished through conversation, even with hostile individuals. Sometimes, especially with hostile individuals.”

Ax kept pushing, though. ‘Even so, you are trying to protect your life’s work, are you not? I hardly would’ve blamed you if you considered that more important than virtually anything else and had decided to attack us on sight.’

Daro met the reaper’s gaze steadily. “My friend, you are either very understanding or very much trying to coax something out of me.”

‘Heh. Well, I am a reaper, after all. ‘Twas not my intention to pump you for information in any surreptitious manner, but perhaps my instincts got the better of me. I apologize if I have caused offense.’

“Hmph.”

Zeff eyed the both of them for a moment, then decide to address Ax openly. "If you're curious about something, then just be direct with him. That has always been our way."

Ax returned a look. In the echo of privacy, he said, 'It most certainly hasn't.'

Zeff just furrowed his brow.

After another few silent beats, however, the reaper spoke publicly again. 'Fine. Mr. Bright. I'm quite old. I've known many a powerful inventor in my time. And heard the tales of many more. But never have I known them to be so... calm when the fruits of their long labors have been threatened. Now, I am not saying that Zeff and I are such a threat, of course, but it does strike me as quite strange that you are not MUCH more upset with us for being here, right now.'

Daro's flat expression didn't budge. "So? What of it? Am I supposed to be bothered about being different from all the wackos you've known?"

The reaper chortled. 'I should think not, no. But it does make me question how precious this 'workspace' is to you. It seemed quite a useful and powerful thing to have, at first. In fact, I can say I've never personally seen the like before. But perhaps to you, this place is actually... quite mundane and unimportant? Just one of many, perhaps?'

The Black Artisan made no response.

Zeff was beginning to feel impatient. "Ax, what difference does it make? This is none of our business."

The reaper sighed. 'Why do I feel like the two of you are cut from the same cloth?'

"3766

"If I do not curtail your natural curiosity," said Zeff, "then we will be here until our gracious host decides that he can no longer tolerate our presence. I would sooner leave this place and let you ask your questions later."

'That's understandable, but if there is, as I suspect, some kind of favorable time dilation in this workspace, then it would actually be best to indulge our curiosity before we leave, while the moments are lasting longer. Would my guess be correct, Master Artisan?’

“Hmph. It would, yes. But I rather appreciate your servant’s desire to not impose. And time dilation is not without its own costs, especially now that our souls are sharing this space. It would still be better not to linger without clear purpose. Plus, I have matters to attend to.”

‘I see. Well, then perhaps I should skip a few of my questions and get right to the objective. Would you happen to know of any item or artifact that could help locate a lost person?’

At that, Zeff’s eyes widened a little. The mere idea of such a thing was enough to spark an almost unwelcome sense of hope in his chest.

“A soul compass, you mean?” said Daro.

‘Or anything functionally similar to one, yes. Anything we could use to find a person whose whereabouts we currently have no clues for.’

Daro scratched his brow. “What is the nature of your need, precisely?”

Zeff could answer that. “Lost children. My own. One kidnapped. Another simply missing.” There was Gema, too, of course, but her circumstances were more questionable and less pressing than those of Emiliana and Francisco, he felt.

The other man’s stony expression twitched.

--++--++--

Daro Bright’s heart was breaking. Of all things, kidnapping? The mere mention of it was enough to bring on a tidal wave of bad memories.

Vantalay, his beloved homeland, had seen many horrible things over the last half-century. This current power struggle between Ridgemark and the rest of the nation was merely the apex of a long buildup of problems that never seemed to get addressed. Only swept under the rug.

It wasn’t typically Daro’s purview to worry about such things, though. His talents were best spent in the background, toiling away on projects that could aid others in the medium- and long-term. Dealing with the ugly flaws and terrible complexities of the world was more the work of Linus and Kristof.

Usually."
"3767

Over the course of his long life, Daro had naturally found plenty of opportunities to break from his norms. The recent news of human trafficking near Ridgemark, for example, had not come as much of a surprise. He'd seen it happening too many times over the last few decades.

It just never ended. Linus or Kristof or even Daro himself would ride over to the rumored region--sometimes quite far away from Ridgemark--and deal with the problem, only for it crop up again a year or two later.

Even the dysfunctional Vantalayan government had occasionally been their ally in such endeavors. There'd been times when, through such noble work, it had felt like the tension between the VMP and RPMP could potentially come to an end. That they could negotiate some sort of contract, perhaps, to preserve the peace of the nation.

And then, every time, something horrible would happen in that government. A public humiliation. A loss of confidence. An assassination. An entire regime change, even. And then all those prospects would dry up. Tension would return, greater than before.

Where was the land of his childhood? What had become of it? Even now, he did not understand why it had changed so much.

If anyone would understand, he knew these Rainlords would. Time and again throughout history, their land had been disputed. And now, again. At least Daro still had Ridgemark to call home.

So the temptation was certainly present to aid this poor man in front of him. To help Zeff Elroy in any way that he could think of.

But there were wrinkles. Big ones.

Axiolis had been right, of course. This workspace was but one of many. A lesser domain for less sensitive projects. And a serviceable decoy, besides.

Daro absolutely could not allow anyone to find his main project. Even his benefactor didn't know what he was truly working on. All the things that he was providing for the RPMP, the weapons and armor and supplies--mere toys, in truth. Quick and dirty projects meant to appease. To keep eyes off of him while he continued his real work.

Not that it was near completion, of course. He didn't know how many more years he might need in order to see it bear fruit. Gods, maybe it never would. That was always a possibility, now wasn't it? Always the struggle when attempting to breach through the Veil into the unknown."
"3768

Which was why he was particularly concerned about it being discovered during this conflict. He knew the prying eyes and ears were out there. Searching for a way in. The Vanguard and Abolish both. And others, too. The Old Wardens. The Andanatt. Those bastards might well be the greatest threat of all, as far as he was concerned.

And maybe one more whose name he did not yet know. Assuming they even had a name in the first place. He knew so little about their existence that they might not have even been real. It might've just been a feeling in his gut. That there was some unknown extra party out there, observing from some unknown place in some unknown way.

But beyond doubt, Daro Bright knew that if any of those groups found out what he was planning, they would stop at nothing to get in his way. They wouldn't just kill him. They would seek out anything he'd touched in the last thirty years and annihilate it.

Including the Anvil, of course. His Fusion Forge.

Right now, he had to protect that above all else. Creating it had been an undertaking like none other. He had, quite literally, poured his very soul into it. To the point that he had needed two months to recover. And even then, he still hadn't felt the same afterwards.

He likely never would, either. That was what it meant to harness the soul to such an extent. To sacrifice part of it, essentially. Fully recovering from that may've been simply impossible. Even for the undead.

His reaper, Marlizia, had not been pleased when she discovered his thoughts on that. It was her soul, too, after all. And that deal was even more than she'd bargained for, no doubt. It had been difficult enough to convince her that they should risk their lives in the attempt to construct the Anvil in the first place; so to then learn that they might never again be whole... well, that was just the cherry on top for her.

She had come around, though. Eventually.

The Anvil was his masterwork. It had been what allowed him to create these various “workspaces” for everything. Every future project. Every important idea.

Every single thing that needed hiding from the intrusive eyes of the world.

The Anvil was the beginning of everything. If he could just live long enough, survive long enough, then he could change this world. He could fulfill Marlizia’s dream for her. The one she hadn’t dared tell him about until he’d already been her servant for a hundred years.

He could give mortals a chance."

"3769

Real, living, human mortals. The older he’d gotten, the more he’d learned about the history of the world--the history of how oppressed normal human beings had been by forces beyond their control.

Or more accurately, by reapers.

Which was perhaps a strange point of focus to make, considering he was beholden to one himself, but he knew that Marlizia felt even more strongly on this subject than he did. She was the one who’d convinced him of the truth of it, after all.

Eleg was under a stranglehold. For thousands of years. It was the battleground and plaything of those whose time should have long since passed.

‘We are thieves of the youth,’ was how Malizia had put it. ‘We have all the time in the world, and yet it’s not enough. We have to steal away what little time mortals get by shaping the world to our will. Not just in petty and pointless wars, but also in the organization of society. I thought the Vanguard would be different with their rule of non-interference in mortal governments, but that has proved to be just another placating lie. Each new generation of human beings should have the chance to remold and reforge civilization anew. But they can't do that when they're stuck under the countless quiet tyrannies of superpowered immortals.'

Which was why, above all else, Daro Bright felt that his work--his true work--was too important to gamble with. Marlizia was obviously not like the rest of her kind. If they discovered what he was trying to accomplish...

It didn't even bear thinking about. There would be no chance of survival. Not for him, Marlizia, or anyone near them.

But the actual task of excising reapers from the world was certainly no easy feat. Cancerous though they were, they still served an important function in the ferrying of souls into the afterlife.

In the prevention of feldeaths from being born, more specifically. Without an alternate solution to that little problem, removing reapers from the world was the same as dooming it. In Daro's estimate, feldeaths would overrun the world and annihilate all of humanity within five hundred years.

He knew the stakes. The fire that he was playing with.

But he was also prepared to abandon the project entirely if a workable replacement for reapers could not be found."

"3770

It was Marlizia's dream, sure--as well as his own, at this point--but he would not succumb to something as moronic as the sunk cost fallacy. Even if he spent the rest of his life struggling for that answer and never found it, then so be it. This was the survival of the human species that they were talking about. Nothing was more important than that. Not even freedom from tyranny.

So to say that the Black Artisan of Vantalay was feeling conflicted at the moment would have been quite the understatement. He absolutely could not do anything that might jeopardize the secrecy of his work, and the Water Dragon's mere presence here was rather strong evidence that someone was already snooping around. Searching for weaknesses in his defenses.

How much did they already know? Certainly not everything, or else Ridgemark would already be a crater.

And it was furthermore obvious to Daro that Zeff Elroy here was not at fault. Whether the man realized it or not, he was a pawn in some greater player's game. But who? Graves? Daro had been intensely wary of the Pale Hawk from the very moment of the man's arrival in Vantalay.

From all of Daro's surveillance of him, Graves appeared to be quite preoccupied with the war effort. It seemed unlikely that he would even have the time for this at the moment, especially considering the risks involved. Toying with his own allies? Endangering their fragile partnership in this corner of the war?

Hmm. It was possible. A hell of a juggling act, perhaps. But possible.

Yet there was another threat that came even more readily to mind. The silent figure in Ridgemark. The one who'd all but disappeared since her arrival here, around the same time as Graves.

Daro had been wondering what she was up to all this time. But perhaps that was her goal. Why bother even revealing herself at all if she was only going to vanish throughout this entire conflict? Or maybe something had befallen her in secret? Neutralized her? Or killed her, even?

He was thinking of Jun. The Wandering Phantom, as some knew her. One of the famed Kubi, which were the five most powerful servants under Sai-hee.

Why, precisely, Jun had decided to come here to Ridgemark after the outbreak of the war, Daro had been trying his damndest to discover."
"3771

Conventional wisdom suggested that she wanted to keep an eye on this corner of the war for Sai-hee. After all, the servant empress was supposed to be quite influential in Steccat, which was Vantalay's northern neighbor--and also one of the three most powerful nations on the Eloan continent. If the conflict here spread all the way up there, Sai-hee would almost certainly take action.

But if Jun's objective was merely to observe, then why had she made such a show of her arrival? That had not been some accident. The woman had conducted a veritable parade down Mahzuz--or "Lucky Street," as most tourists knew it. She'd even had a small troupe of Sai-hee's famous Wind Dancers escorting her and entertaining the onlookers.

Not exactly the typical modus operandi for the Wandering Phantom, as far as Daro knew. She was supposed to be quite reclusive, like all the Kubi, whose names were often not widely known, nor their face recognizable. Even Daro didn't know who each of the current five members were, and he'd been trying to find out for years.

He did know about Leo the Bull Leech, though. And it certainly hadn't escaped his notice that the man was currently working alongside the Rainlords in this very country. It seemed furthermore apparent that Leo was trying to keep a low profile, as well, which begged all sorts of questions.

Daro had been expecting Jun to at least make contact with Leo--or vice versa, perhaps--but if the two of them had done so, then they'd successfully managed to hide it from him. Which was quite the feat, because Daro had eyes on Leo at nearly all times.

There had, however, been a quite public meeting between Jun and Graves, right after her arrival. In fact, it had nearly turned into a fight, until Linus and Kristof intervened.

But after that, Jun had gone completely dormant. Supposedly, she'd just been quietly gambling, sunbathing, attending evening shows, and ordering room service. Enjoying a nice vacation in the middle of this war, seemingly.

Perhaps she was just living up to her moniker. Wandering without purpose. Doing as she pleased.

Daro had to plan for the worst, though. If she was trying to get to him--to his most concealed workspaces--then it was possible that she could've been using Zeff Elroy here as a distraction while she probed his defenses."

"3772

Agh, but what sense did that make? Why announce her arrival so publicly if she'd intended to conduct stealth operations against him?

Perhaps she'd changed her plans partway through. Perhaps she'd wanted to give him something to worry about. Or perhaps she was just one of those mercurial individuals who never really made plans in the first place, much less stuck to them. Daro had known a few like that in his time. They always drove him absolutely mad.

Regardless, he needed to go check on things now.

Or. No. Wait a moment. Did he truly need to do that? Wouldn't that be precisely what his unseen opponent would expect him to do? And even if not, doing so might alert them that he was onto their game.

Yes. The smarter move, therefore, would be to either play along or do something completely unpredictable. And besides, he had confidence in his work. The weaves were strong. They could resist tremendous efforts to damage or otherwise tamper with them. Not to mention, none of the perimeter sensors had alerted him to any unexpected visitors. And while that was hardly proof of security, he had spent considerable labor upgrading those sensors himself.

He should have more faith in himself, he decided. If he panicked over every little wrinkle, he wouldn't last through another year of this secrecy, let alone ten.

What to do with this Water Dragon, though? The man was giving him a look like he was expecting to receive terrible news. Not assuming that Daro was actually going to help him, eh? Sensible. From what Daro had learned of the Rainlords' recent exploits, they must've been growing quite accustomed to things never going their way.

On this day, however, Daro was pleased to surprise. "Very well. I shall help you."

And the ensuing expression on Zeff Elroy's face was as enjoyable as Daro expected. "...You will?" said Zeff.

Daro turned and began walking. "Follow me," he said as he reached into his vest for a pair of devices. A Remapper and Needle, as he'd dubbed them.

The Remapper was a messy cluster of metallic circles connected by thin, flexible rods. To the untrained eye, it probably looked like some of kind of monstrous, janitorial key ring--which wouldn't be entirely inaccurate.

The Needle, however, looked very little like its namesake. It was more akin to a baton with a sturdy handle, though the mechanical tip did conceal a few sharp points within it."

"3773

The resonance point was only a short walk away. Technically, he could have brought it closer if he really felt like it, but that would bring with it a needless risk of destabilizing the weaves within the workspace's fabric. And repairing that would be a pain in the ass. More than once, he'd ended up merely scrapping a space entirely rather than trying to fix it. At a certain point, it was better to simply move everything important out and then start over from scratch.

The Remapper was good for that task, if necessary, but here and now, he only wanted it for connectivity. As the three of them neared the resonance point, the rings of the Remapper came alive with movement and a soft white glow. Slowly, as he pointed them at the correct location, they positioned themselves into a perfectly cylindrical form. That was their primary function: to aid him in pinpointing the exact spot of geographic resonance within a given domain.

In this case, having built this place himself, he didn't necessarily need the Remapper's help for that, but using it was a force of habit by now. Better to be precise than to rely on his fallible memory, especially if he happened to mix this workspace up with one of the others. Some of them looked extremely similar, after all.

He'd made that mistake once before, actually. And he'd ended up having to scour the domain up and down for nearly two weeks before finding the resonance point again and finally escaping.

Talk about embarrassing. Good thing Marlizia wasn't the type to make fun of him. Most other reapers would've never let him live that down--and probably told everyone they knew about it, too.

The Needle was what actually aided in parting the weaves and opening the doorway out of the workspace. With a twist of the handle, the tip popped open, exposing its multiple small spikes, which crackled with an electric current.

That current, however, was no normal thing. It pulled on his very soul with enough force to knock a younger servant out cold. For him, it was merely uncomfortable, but he knew that if he sustained it for too long, it would become truly dangerous.

Incidentally, he'd been working on a means of properly weaponizing that interaction, but it was proving more difficult than expected.

With a vertical swipe, the Needle ripped a hole through the resonance point. It was merely a pitch-black space at first, which was where the Remapper came in again. He held it up to the hole and concentrated, searching his mind for the correct workspace."

"3774

When he found it, the Remapper's rings became a lens through which he could look at the dark hole in the workspace's weave. To the naked eye, the hole remained unchanged, but when he peered through the cylinder formed by the rings, he could see through to the desired destination, allowing him to visually confirm that he had indeed chosen the correct space with his mind.

Through that clear portal lay his second most advanced workspace. The Black Citadel, he'd dubbed it. Many of his more elaborate projects were placed there--though not the Anvil, of course.

The Fusion Forge was actually an entire workspace unto itself, and he had never taken anyone else there, save Marlizia. Nor did he ever intend to.

With another slash of the Needle, he widened the portal enough for both him and Zeff Elroy to step through. He went first, ushering for the Water Dragon to follow.

The man did so, though not without obvious hesitation. When he and Axiolis were both through, Daro twisted the handle on the Needle again, and the portal blinked shut, leaving the invisible weave untouched.

There were other ways to breach the weave, of course, but the Needle did so without damaging it. Which meant that, in all likelihood, that previous workspace was now damaged by whoever snuck the Water Dragon into it.

Rather annoying. Daro didn't know if he would be able to find the time to go hunt down the damaged sector and repair it. Depending on how subtle the damage was, that could take quite a while. But leaving it that way might also prove dangerous. Like a tunnel that some stranger had dug into his property.

Well, that was why he had so many different workspaces. The lesser ones could serve as decoys. And the greater ones, like the Citadel here, had much more elaborate defenses baked into them.

"...What in the world?" said Zeff Elroy, gawking as they made their way down the enormous portcullis that led up to the Citadel proper. "You made all this?"

Daro had to pause and look around for a moment. Hmm. He supposed it was rather ornate these days, wasn't it? He'd gotten so accustomed to the place that the view hardly even registered for him, anymore. The sky-bending towers. The sweeping, intricate archways. The gargantuan doorways. The sparkling moat. The twinkling stars lighting up the endless night."

"3775

And so many little bells and whistles. Tiny things he'd added over time with nary a thought. A glowing bed of artificial flowers here. A waterless fountain, made entirely of Heartstone. A luminescent bird feeder, even though there were no birds here.

Perhaps he'd gone a bit overboard, now that he was thinking about it.

A stone Border Collie, locked in a running pose.

Yeah, okay. He'd definitely gone overboard. He hardly even remembered doing most of these.

Oh, that's right. Many of them were probably the result of his sleepwalking. Or "sleepworking" as Marlizia liked to call it.

As they passed into the Black Citadel's atrium, the full vastness of the compound became more visible. From this central area, any other location within the fortress could be reached. Every major hallway connected here, and stairways lined each the walls so that the second and third floors could be easily accessed, as well.

Daro didn't linger. Their destination was the Eastern Laboratory.

Before reaching the corridor, however, he noticed that Zeff and Axiolis were lagging behind.

Gawking again, seemingly.

Flattering, perhaps, but also mildly annoying. Were they not the ones who should be feeling a sense of urgency here? He walked back over to them, still deciding on whether or not he wanted to chastise them.

Axiolis spoke up first. 'This material here. Might you tell us what it is?'

Daro raised an eyebrow. They were both staring at a tall stone pillar, one of a dozen that lined the atrium's outer footpath. "Why? What is your interest in it?"

"...We feel like we've seen this before," said Zeff. He touched the pillar with a pair of fingers. "Quite recently, in fact."

Oh? Daro needed a moment to think about that. What might they be referring to? He didn't recall building anything out of this stuff back in Vantalay. Or anywhere in the real world, for that matter.

And while it had certainly been a while since he'd made them, but he remembered clearly enough what these particular pillars had been hewn from. Unlike some of the other decorations around here, it wasn't Heartstone or Luughite or basteria. Not khamarasta or Ardoran angel stone, either.

"You recognize it, do you?" said Daro. "I find that curious. Its formation was from a most ancient recipe. One that I feared might become lost to history. Hence why I went to great lengths recreating it."

'Almost lost to history, you say? Do you even know its original name, then?'

Daro smiled. "Nightrock."

"3776 -- CCCVIII."

Click to display entire chapter at once -- (mobile link)

Rarely had the Living Void been pushed so hard. Kallmakk the Nightspinner simply would not die. Crushing blow after crushing blow, the stubborn bastard took them all--and kept moving forward, besides.

Since joining, Dozer had been fighting for two entire days without a true break. And apparently, the battle had already been going on for multiple days beforehand.

At times, it was an exercise in tedium. A battle of incredible attrition. The feldeath's mood was likely to blame. Dozer had noticed that about his encounters with the creatures over the years. Their energy levels tended to fluctuate, even in the midst of combat.

It had to do with the way they became enraged, he suspected. It only made sense that their emotions would subside after a while, if only by a little. And with it, their attacks became slightly less ferocious.

Of course, to the average combatant, such differences would probably be imperceptible. Even their weaker attacks were still capable of obliterating most servants.

Not to mention, the lulls were temporary. In drawn out conflicts like this one, it was only a matter of time before the thing became enraged again.

And then things weren't so tedious, all of a sudden. In fact, things became a little too exciting, even for Dozer's liking.

The conventional wisdom, therefore, was to strike during a lull. If it was less dangerous, then it was more vulnerable, yes?

No. Because it also withdrew into itself during those times, bolstering its defenses. And with particularly powerful feldeaths like this one, doing any kind of damage to it at all became almost impossible.

It didn't help that the blasted Gargoyle of Korgum had joined in the fray, either, along with a host of her underlings.

They didn't really think they could score a kill on him or Morgunov here, did they? Whatever their plan had been with this so-called Blacksong, they had to have realized by now that it was not going their way. Gohvis had not turned against him--at least, not fully--and Iceheart's half of the Vanguardian forces were clearly running on fumes.

How Lamont was even still in the fight, Dozer did not know. He was almost impressed. Maybe he'd make the man another offer to change sides. See if the winds had shifted at all since the last time they'd met.

Probably not, knowing the man's reputation. But it never hurt to ask."
"3776 -- CCCVIII.

Chapter Three Hundred Eight: 'The Crisis in the Luthic...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Rarely had the Living Void been pushed so hard. Kallmakk the Nightspinner simply would not die. Crushing blow after crushing blow, the stubborn bastard took them all--and kept moving forward, besides.

Since joining, Dozer had been fighting for two entire days without a true break. And apparently, the battle had already been going on for multiple days beforehand.

At times, it was an exercise in tedium. A battle of incredible attrition. The feldeath's mood was likely to blame. Dozer had noticed that about his encounters with the creatures over the years. Their energy levels tended to fluctuate, even in the midst of combat.

It had to do with the way they became enraged, he suspected. It only made sense that their emotions would subside after a while, if only by a little. And with it, their attacks became slightly less ferocious.

Of course, to the average combatant, such differences would probably be imperceptible. Even their weaker attacks were still capable of obliterating most servants.

Not to mention, the lulls were temporary. In drawn out conflicts like this one, it was only a matter of time before the thing became enraged again.

And then things weren't so tedious, all of a sudden. In fact, things became a little too exciting, even for Dozer's liking.

The conventional wisdom, therefore, was to strike during a lull. If it was less dangerous, then it was more vulnerable, yes?

No. Because it also withdrew into itself during those times, bolstering its defenses. And with particularly powerful feldeaths like this one, doing any kind of damage to it at all became almost impossible.

It didn't help that the blasted Gargoyle of Korgum had joined in the fray, either, along with a host of her underlings.

They didn't really think they could score a kill on him or Morgunov here, did they? Whatever their plan had been with this so-called Blacksong, they had to have realized by now that it was not going their way. Gohvis had not turned against him--at least, not fully--and Iceheart's half of the Vanguardian forces were clearly running on fumes.

How Lamont was even still in the fight, Dozer did not know. He was almost impressed. Maybe he'd make the man another offer to change sides. See if the winds had shifted at all since the last time they'd met.

Probably not, knowing the man's reputation. But it never hurt to ask."
"3777

As for the battle itself, Dozer had to acknowledge that it was indeed a unique one. Over the course of his very long life, he'd never been involved in one quite like this.

The utter chaos that Kallmakk brought to the field meant that different people could obtain the brunt of its pursuit at different times. It would fixate on Gohvis, then on Morgunov, then on Sanko, and so on and so forth. Dozer had yet to get a turn himself, but if this stalemate continued for much longer, then it was probably only a matter of time.

And with each shift of the feldeath's primary attention, there came with it virtually no warning. Nor did the timing seem particularly predictable, either. Sometimes, Kallmakk would change targets within minutes. Other times, it might take hours.

The result of this madness was that the battle had carried them all the way to the western coast of Ardora.

And beyond it, even.

Gone were the Gettira Plains and the Jaskadan Forest. Which was quite irritating for him, since he still had business left undone there. Instead, they were replaced by the vast and unbelievably turbulent expanse of the Luthic Ocean.

They fought on the open water, amid raging waves as tall as skyscrapers. The sky darkened regularly, sometimes even completely. Such was the Nightspinner's power. More than once, Dozer had gotten tossed around by pitch black waters. Even his soul senses were of little use, much of the time. Ardor permeated everything, rolling just as chaotically as the waves themselves.

And the storm. Their fighting had kicked up a hurricane, and it, too, had been following them since the coast, as if it had also developed a mind of its own.

More likely, it was just a natural consequence of atmospheric disturbance. Storms were a common result when servants of this level clashed, even on land. The ocean just seemed to amplify it.

For his part, the water wasn't such a problem, really. Disorienting, sure. Annoying, of course. But whenever he needed to reestablish himself and get his bearings back, Dozer could do so with ease. The ocean waters around him would break with explosive force, creating a becalmed pocket of air the size of a city block--or even bigger, if he preferred.

That was the sphere of influence at work. The conquering of the environment, using nothing but the strength of one's soul. The others could all do it, too. Even some of the underlings could pull it off, Dozer had noticed."

"3778

And while it was an easy solution when the situation grew too immediately chaotic, it was also part of the reason why the storm kept worsening. Ultimately, the technique only served to heighten the disturbances in the atmosphere, especially when conducted by multiple people in rapid succession.

Almost like they were boiling the sea.

He could already tell that the environmental damage of this battle was going to be a lasting one. And being in the middle of the Luthic Ocean to boot? The coasts of Eloa, Ardora, and Qenghis were all going to feel this one. Maybe the other continents, too, if things didn't conclude soon.

It thrilled him to his core.

Sure, it was annoying. Kallmakk was a bastard. Morgunov was a jackass. The Vanguard were fools.

But dammit if it didn't also feel good to truly let loose again. With as safe as he normally liked to play things, opportunities like this had become genuinely rare.

When it was finally his turn to receive the brunt of Kallmakk's attention, Dozer couldn't help smiling just a bit.

A solid beam of dark energy divided the sea in two, creating a canyon with cliffs of water so deep that the ocean floor became briefly visible in the moments of lightning flashing across the sky.

Dozer didn't dodge it, though. He swatted it away with the back of his hand, and the beam arced off into the distance like a streaming firework, skipping across the water before finally exploding into a black dome of pure energy that kicked up yet more tidal waves.

Dozer's entire arm was smote black, numb, and trembling, but that was all. Not as bad as he expected, honestly. Probably not Kallmakk's full power, then, judging by some of the other mad things that he'd witnessed the feldeath do.

Heh. Or perhaps he was simply stronger than even he himself realized. It had been quite a while since he'd tested his own limits, after all.

Dozer's ability was a rather uncommon one. He'd only met a few people over the course of his life who shared it. Moreover, it was peculiar enough that he'd come to believe some people might have manifested it without even realizing what it truly was, instead believing it to be something else. Vibrations, for instance. Or perhaps velocity as a whole.

But those were too broad. Young alteration users often made that mistake, not understanding the more specific natures of their powers until they were much older. It didn't help that they usually started off pathetically weak, compared to other ability types."

"3779

Historically, however, the confusion had also been something of a boon to himself. The more nuanced his ability was, the more difficulty his enemies would have in trying to understand everything of which he was capable. And of course, whenever he made a breakthrough with it, that only served to throw his opponents for even more of a loop.

Not that he could expect such convenience when fighting a feldeath.

Kallmakk was still giving him its full attention, obviously unbothered by the relative ease with which Dozer had deflected its attack. It was bearing down on him like a battleship.

And it was nearly the size of one, too. To his eyes, the creature was a great serpent with multiple humanoid heads. Each of its gazes was alight with black-and-white fire, and its hulking body moved in utterly impossible ways, tearing through the open water with no resistance whatsoever.

Worse still, its apparent lack of limbs was a deception. He knew only too well that long, stringy arms with razor sharp claws could appear from nowhere and flash across his vision in an instant, threatening to shred him with hardly a moment's warning.

And there was even more to worry about, too, thanks to the other attackers. As much as Dozer had been anticipating this attention from Kallmakk, there could be little doubt that the Vanguardians had been waiting for this opportunity with even greater eagerness.

This was their chance, after all. To gang up on him all at once.

The flash freezing effects of Iceheart were already here, Dozer knew, with stealthier addendums on the way, no doubt. And the blasted Gargoyle was aiming to smother him with a tornado of mud and rock, if only to help conceal everyone else's attacks. And all the little underlings were flinging their attacks at him, too, of course.

Kallmakk charging him head on. And every Vanguardian providing covering fire?

A bit much, even for him.

Thankfully, he had his own subordinates to pull some of the weight off his shoulders.

He could focus primarily on Kallmakk, Iceheart, and Sanko.

The flash freezing was countered easily enough with simple heat generation. That was one of the earlier tricks that Dozer had mastered, but it had of course required considerable refinement in order to repel the mind-numbing oppression of Iceheart's power over absolute zero.

It was a good thing he'd developed that particular technique so much, too, because Dozer's alteration power over inertia might have struggled to deal with such a problem, otherwise."

"3780

In the early days, some half-millennia ago, the very concept of inertia hadn't even been discovered yet. It had therefore been quite difficult and laborious to arrive at any kind of understanding of its nature. In fact, it wasn't until a couple centuries of undeath that he really began to feel as though he'd truly wrapped his head around it. And even now, he occasionally still found himself questioning what he thought he knew.

His younger years had been quite turbulent, as a result. For a while, he'd thought that his power was simply to "adjust the weight" of things. That he could only make things lighter or heavier. Then he went through a period where he thought that, no, perhaps his power was instead to control some otherworldly force and flame, granted to him by the Void itself. There was ancient precedent for that, after all. Some called it the Inferno. Then, still later, he learned about a discovery called friction, and so he thought it might be that, too.

Even after he'd learned about inertia, that hadn't been the end of his uncertainty. While he did indeed settle on it as the most likely candidate over which his power held sway, there eventually came the discovery of subatomic particles, which again threw him for a loop, making him reevaluate everything.

Ultimately, though, he returned to inertia, as it was the most fitting. He decided that even though it seemed like he could manipulate subatomic particles quite freely, everything of which he was capable could still be explained by the manipulation of inertia upon those same particles. The localized generation of heat, for example, might have looked like the result of excitement in particle vibrations, but it also could have been the subatomic application of inertia upon particles within an open system.

The sudden, dramatic change in inertia for certain particles but not others could theoretically create a need for energy transference among said particles in order to reestablish equilibrium. And the more dramatic the change, the more rapid the need would become.

The more heated, in other words.

So Iceheart's ability to remove the heat out of any system, while indeed deadly, was by itself not nearly enough to give Dozer trouble. As long as he could still think, he could create as much heat as he needed. And in this fight, with his soul power added on top of things, he was constantly keeping his entire body heated nearly to the point of bursting into flames."

"3781

If it were only Iceheart's interference that he had to worry about, this whole situation might not have been so bad. He was a threat, of course, but a controllable one. The Gargoyle, however, was proving exceedingly obnoxious. As ever.

Her ability to melt into the environment and--quite literally--turn the world against him was something that had never become easier to deal with. Even after all these years, she was still one of the most irksome opponents he'd ever face. And at this point, he may well have fought more battles against her than anyone else in his life. Rarely ever had she managed to wound him, but she always managed to find ways to make things more difficult. Battles of attrition were perhaps her specialty now, and this one certainly qualified as that.

One might have thought that all these rolling seas and howling winds would be causing no end of trouble for her here, but if they were, it wasn't obvious. Perhaps they were even helping her by masking her movements. Whenever a surge of water lashed against him or a gust threatened to knock him off course, it could have been her doing. Or it could've just been the chaos of this fight.

He remembered hearing from Ito that she'd recently begun harnessing lightning, too, and indeed, it seemed to be so. The dark skies cracked and flashed constantly, and while it was thankfully not as controlled as Dozer might've expected, it was still quite the hassle, especially for his men. Ito himself was here somewhere, but Dozer kept losing track of him.

Had to stay focused on Kallmakk. The feldeath was still the most pressing concern, of course.

After two days of combat, Dozer still didn't really know how much of the creature's power he could withstand, but he was keen to find out, now that it was finally his turn to be its punching bag.

He met its charge head on. Kallmakk plowed into his becalmed sphere of influence like a thrashing bull, covered in seawater and enormous bulbs of dark energy. Lightning sparked across its hulking form as he drew close, and then there was suddenly a massive claw flying toward him from the right.

Dozer swatted it away, just like he did with the beam, but rather than flying away, the claw exploded apart and disintegrated.

That didn't stop the rest of its body from slamming into him, though."
"3782

He went for a ride. The feldeath carried him along as if on the nose of a train. Together, they quickly reached the edge of his emptied sphere of influence and splashed through a towering cliff of seawater.

Dozer's fingers sunk into the monster's hulking, ethereal body as he held onto it. The force against his back was even greater than he'd expected, to the point where he could hardly move a muscle as they torpedoed through the Luthic Ocean.

That wasn't right. This force pinning him down was more than just that of speed and water.

Ah. So this was the power of the Nightspinner's domain. Its own sphere of influence. Was it trying to absorb him?

It was in for a rude awakening, if so.

The torpedoing soon began to slow, until it was more like crawling, and then it stopped all together. He could feel the beast still pushing against him, thrashing ever more wildly with each passing second, like a great eel that had suddenly discovered the wall of its aquarium.

He was that wall. And he would not budge.

With his own body's inertia cranked up this high, the feldeath could have been replaced with a rocket ship for all the difference it would have made here.

But Dozer could still move himself, if he wished. It took immense concentration and effort, but he could. That had been one of the most difficult things to master: how to control his body with such precision that, when inertia was maxed out, it would still listen to him.

How to become one with inertia. How to make the world break upon his immovable form without actually becoming immovable himself.

A delicate balance. More about refining mental precision than about summoning new strength. Fragile. Disciplined. Experienced. Tedious, even.

But the payoff had been enormous.

Because when he moved his body in this state, the world could only crumple before him.

With both of his arms spread wide as he gripped the feldeath's body, Dozer brought his hands together.

And Kallmakk the Nightspinner, this dark serpent of the ocean, combusted like a popped balloon.

There wasn't nearly enough light to see it with his eyes, but he could certainly sense the change. The oppressive interference over his mind, the blanket of ardor covering everything around him, just had a great hole punched through it, and suddenly, the world was much less murky."

"3783

It was much clearer, yes, but not much calmer. The ferocity of the surrounding hurricane only became more apparent. The Vanguard was still after his head, after all.

But how much longer would their fighting spirit last, he wondered?

He couldn't yet tell if the feldeath was dead, but if it was, then the Vanguard were about to become desperate. Which would make them temporarily more dangerous. One last assault. Trying to catch him while he was still on the backfoot.

Once that was broken, though, they would be done. Their morale would plummet, and they would scatter like the roaches they were, hoping and praying for Sermung to show up and save them.

Because they would know that nothing less would suffice. Dozer would make them pay sorely for this overextension.

But that was only if Kallmakk was truly dead. Dozer didn't get the opportunity to check, because Iceheart and the Gargoyle were both bearing down on him at the same time.

Aiming to keep him suppressed at the very least, no doubt. Couldn't very well let him run loose, now could they?

Ah.

But he'd already entered the Void State.

That was what he called it, anyway. Truthfully, he had no idea if it was the Void's doing. It just seemed like the most reasonable explanation for this phenomenon that he'd been experiencing for over two hundred years now.

In the beginning, he'd thought it was perhaps a byproduct of his power. That, somehow, his ability to manipulate inertia could also affect his perception of the world writ large.

Of time itself, even.

As if he'd become so immovable that he could even resist the flow of the future. Watch it unfold more slowly. Perceive it more deeply.

But sadly, that explanation didn't appear to be quite accurate.

‘Wow, nice one!’ came that all-too-familiar voice.

Dozer’s head began turning, though only very slowly. Thankfully, he didn’t actually need to look over in the direction of Morgunov in order to know that the voice belonged to him. ‘Already here, too, are you?’ said Dozer.

‘Oh yeah,’ said Morgunov from afar. ‘All this fighting opened the place up for me days ago. Nice to not be alone anymore, though! Been a while since I got to experience this with you! How nostalgic! We HAVE been through some stuff together, haven’t we? What a couple of cards we are, eh?! Ehehehe!’

‘Do you think Kallmakk is dead?’

‘Mm, probably not. A few days ago, I got the sucker pretty good, too, and he only stayed down for like four minutes.’

Dozer wanted to sigh."

"3784

‘Gave me quite the scare, too, when he suddenly popped back up, even angrier than before! Thrashed me somethin’ fierce! So look forward to that, buddy!’

A part of him was. He wasn’t about to admit that to this fool, though. ‘I cannot sense Kallmakk’s presence clearly any longer. If he is not dead, then where has he gone?’

‘Everywhere. All around us. I think he’s melting into the shadows as we speak. Then, when he’s ready, he’ll spring out again and smack you upside the head. Probably via some kind of sucker punch, too. Real sneaky jerk, this fella. So don’t say I didn’t warn ya.’

Hmph. Morgunov was being oddly helpful. And Dozer had an idea as to why. Before potentially burning that bridge, however, he decided that he should get a bit more use out of it. ‘You’ve been studying these creatures extensively, have you not?’

‘Sure have.’

‘And you have discovered no common weaknesses? Nothing we can exploit here?’

‘Nope. Every feldeath is unique, just as the old masters claimed they were. I really hate it when old wisdom turns out to have been right all along, but I also gotta give credit where credit is due, I guess.’

‘Hmph.’

‘But for Kallmakk here, I’m thinking maybe we need more light. If it’s escaping into the shadows when it’s wounded, then perhaps the solution would be to remove all shadows from the area, eh?’

‘Interesting.’

‘Easier said than done, though, since the bugger can generate its own new shadows. Doesn’t have to rely on the environment.’

‘What do you mean it can “generate” them? Surely, it is merely the suppression of light, not the generation of anything new.’

‘Oh, yeah, if feldeaths were bound by the laws of physics, then sure, you’d be right. But from what I’ve observed, Kallmakk’s shadows have actual mass to them. Which, frankly, is making me slightly worried that it’s going to start slinging black holes at us one of these days, but that hasn’t happened yet. Thankfully.’

Wonderful. ‘So we will be needing a truly overwhelming source of light, then.’

‘That’s what I’m thinkin’. Not quite sure how to pull it off, though.’

Dozer paused. He supposed he’d gotten enough. He could push now. ‘Is that the truth? Or have you simply not been trying hard enough?’

‘Excuse me? You callin’ me lazy? I am offended, sir!’

‘Perhaps because you have been too preoccupied with trying to kill Germal, instead.’

‘Ah...’

‘Explain yourself.’”

"3785

‘Hmm! Gotta be honest, pal. Was really hopin’ you hadn’t noticed that.’

‘You’ve never been known for your subtlety.’

‘Eheh! True! But look. Guy’s a traitor. He’s the mastermind behind this entire operation to kill me.’

‘The entire operation? All of Blacksong?’

‘Oh, I don’t know about all. But this part of it, certainly. Admitted it to me himself, when we had a nice little heart-to-heart of our own. Not unlike the one you and I are having right now, actually.’

That piqued Dozer’s curiosity. ‘Germal can access this space? I do not sense him here.’

‘No, no, it was a different thing. Similar, but different. More hostile, too. Guy really hates my guts. And he might be an ancient Primordial, too. Or possessed by one, maybe. Tough to say for sure. He IS the Liar of Lyste, after all.’

Possessed? Hmm. Now that was an intriguing little revelation. The leader of the Freeman Fellowship, possessed by one of the so-called Primordials?

Questions pooled in his mind as he humored the possibility. Germal had indeed always been something of a curiosity, ever since appearing before him and Gohvis as a sickly child all those years ago. Dozer recalled Gohvis mentioning the child’s oddness many times. The split personality, among other things.

And naturally, Dozer had experienced his own strangeness with Germal, as well. The man’s ability to charm people was certainly no normal thing. The immense utility of it was why he’d allowed Germal to form his little Fellowship in the first place. And it had proved plenty useful, too.

‘If he is a traitor as you say,’ said Dozer, ‘then it is my responsibility to deal with him, not yours.’

‘Oh, believe you me: this is one responsibility I don’t mind unburdening you from, my friend. He needs to die. As soon as possible. And I’m going to make sure that happens.’

‘You do not appear to be doing a very good job of that so far.’

‘Hoho! Now you’re TRYIN’ to piss me off, aren’tcha?!’

‘You have been fighting for many days now, and he yet lives. Do you require my help?’

‘Hah...’ Morgunov fell briefly quiet. ‘And here I was, tryin’ to be nice to you. Tryin’ to keep things light. Pleasant. Tryin’ to not hate you. So why ya gotta say stuff like that, huh? Why can’t you just be a little courteous, instead of slappin’ my hand away whenever I reach out, hmm? What, are you just too broken inside, old man? Can’t allow us to share a nice moment, every now and then?’”

"3786

‘A nice moment,’ echoed Dozer flatly. ‘Now what might that look like for you? Perhaps like the moment when you sabotaged my project that was decades in the making?’

‘Hey, man, that was just, like, a prank. Y’know?’

‘I lost twenty of the brightest minds working under me.’

‘I offered to replace them! You said no!’

‘Tens of thousands of hours of labor. Lost in a single explosion.’

‘Technically, it was more than one. Chain reaction ‘n all.’

Dozer might’ve paused for a deep breath to steady himself, if his physical body wasn’t in this veritable stasis. Instead, he had to satisfy himself with merely ignoring Morgunov and taking a moment to instead reassess the field of battle.

Everything was moving so slowly that it might as well have been motionless. Even himself. That was how this strange Void State worked. It allowed him time to stop and think, even in the middle of utter chaos.

But it was flexible, too. He was still present at the normal speed of the world, as well. It was more like his mind had been divided by two, and this one here, within the Void State, was nearly detached from the thread of time.

It was a supremely odd feeling, one he’d never even attempted to explain to anyone before. Here, time didn't feel "slow," exactly. Rather, it felt almost non-existent. As if it held hardly any sway over him at all. So even though this half of his mind may have been "dragging" behind the other half at a snail's pace, it wasn't bothersome in the slightest. There was no sensation of having to "wait" or "catch up" to the present.

And not only that, if he concentrated on it, he could actually perceive events across a range of time, both forward and backward. If he missed something amid the chaos, he could go back and inspect it more closely. If he wanted to predict what was about to happen--such as what Iceheart and the Gargoyle were about to do--then he could do that, as well, though it wasn't always as clear or reliable.

Especially against certain opponents. And these two absolutely qualified, even though they were still apparently not on a high enough level to speak to him and Morgunov here. Perhaps they'd already developed some awareness of this space, too, even if they couldn't yet breach it."

"3787

Morgunov was still blabbering on while Dozer hardly listened. Doubtless, the fool would never give up trying to convince the entire world--including himself--of his ultimate and noble brilliance, but Dozer had no patience for that, right now. Even if they had all the time in the world, it wasn't enough.

Dozer had seen and heard that song and dance far too many times. Morgunov was an ally, but only in the most superficial sense. The appearance of their partnership was more important than the actuality of it. In the end, the so-called Mad Demon could never be trusted in any meaningful capacity.

The only thing he could ever be was useful.

'--stick in the mud! I'm offerin' to help you out, y'know! Just like always! And yeah, I might get a little silly with it, every now and then, but I always come through, don't I? When have I not, huh? I mean, besides the rocket prank.'

'Do you know why Sermung is not here?' said Dozer.

'Hmm? That dull jerk? No idea. I keep expecting him to, and he keeps not showing up. Honestly, it's kind of disrespectful, don't you think? I mean, how often do we give him a prime opening like this? And what, he's too busy to make time for us, these days? Don't make a lick of sense, if you ask me. But I know one thing: if he keeps on leaving us hanging like this, then pretty soon, I'm gonna make sure he's REALLY got somethin' to keep him busy.'

'Is that right?'

'Sure is. Curious? Go ahead and ask. Maybe I'll tell you! If you start being nicer to me!'

'I'd sooner die ignorant.'

'Pah! You're certainly on course for that!'

'What about Sai-hee? Do you know anything of her whereabouts?'

'Maaaybe. Why? Think she'll decide to make an appearance, too? Seems doubtful to me, but I wouldn't mind seein' that old bat again!'

'She will never warm to your advances.'

'Says you! So negative! I'm telling you, one day, she'll come around! And then our children will become the stuff of legends!'

'The stuff of nightmares, more like.'

'Well, that'd be cool, too.' Morgunov broke for a telepathic cackle.

'What about you, old man? Made any new lady friends since I last saw you? Any new kids? Hmm? Hmmm?'

'Even if I had, why would I share that information with you?'

'Uh, because I'm the best godfather ever? Obviously.'

"3788

'Every child I have ever sent to study under your tutelage has come back either unrecognizable or not at all,' said Dozer.

'But not stupider! Never that! And c'mon. Let's not pretend like this is some one-sided thing. You've offed plenty of my little fellas.'

'I've dealt with raving lunatics who you failed to control, yes. That is not the same.'

'Sure it is! And that's perfectly fine by me! Nothin' to be embarrassed about! If anyone is ever gonna finally stand alongside us, then they'll have to be capable of dealing with all of our unfair bullshit! Trial by fire is the only way!'

Hmph. A rare point of agreement between them. Dozer didn't want to acknowledge it, though, so he merely said nothing. That was no problem, of course, because one of the things that made this man so insufferable was his ability to ramble on endlessly with no input from whomever he was supposedly having a conversation with.

'Don't be coy, Dozy! I know you well enough by now! You're just as uncompromising as I am when it comes to disciplining the so-called "rising stars." Sure, I may do it more often, and sure, you may not make as much of a show of it as I like to, but that doesn't change the fact that, ultimately, we're cut from the same cloth, you and I. More in common than not, I'd say. In fact, that's probably why we're so good at getting under each other's skin, eh?'

Nonsense. They couldn't have been more different. But saying as much would only provoke further irritating remarks, no doubt. He wanted to move the subject back to something more utilitarian. The slowed down mayhem before him was still inching closer. He'd have to decide what to do about it soon. 'You should be aware that if you do manage to kill Germal, I will require tremendous compensation. He has proven immensely useful to me. Replacing him will not be a simple task.'

'Hmm! Sounds like a you problem!'

'I will ensure that it is yours, as well.'

'Ugh, come on. What am I even supposed to do for you, huh? Every time I offer you a favor, you tell me to screw off! Kinda hard to compensate you when you're always acting like such an unpleasable ass.'

'That is because your "favors" are always poisoned.'

'They are not!'

'Lies upon lies.'"

"3789

‘You’re impossible to work with sometimes, y’know that? I don’t know how Suresh did it so much. Did he just have a much higher tolerance for your abuse, or were you actually a nicer guy back then, huh? Tell me, please.’

‘Hardly. He hated me far more than you do now.’

‘Psh! That’s difficult to believe!’

‘He plotted my death constantly. You only do that occasionally.’

‘Eheh! Maybe that was just how he demonstrated his affection!’

‘If that is so, then perhaps this entire mess is the same. Perhaps Germal is secretly enamored with you.’

And to Dozer’s muted surprise, that actually gave the Mad Demon pause. A brief silence intervened before Morgunov picked the conversation back up.

‘...Y’know, I hadn’t even considered that.’

Dozer might’ve sighed if he could have. Of course, on the rare occasion when he’d deigned to make a joke, this idiot would take it seriously. He didn’t know whether to feel further amusement or merely pity.

‘I mean, he DID try to recruit me,’ said Morgunov. ‘And he nearly believed me when I said sure! You might be on to something!’

Pity. He definitely felt pity now. What a chaotic fool.

‘Shame I promised I’d kill him. Too late to go back on my word now, even for a secret admirer. But talk about flattering! A Primordial crush, eh?! How adorable!’

‘What makes you so convinced that Germal is one of these so-called Primordials?’

‘So-called? How much do you know about them? I’ve been studying them, on and off, for centuries. But especially recently.’

‘Personally,’ said Dozer, ‘I have never been convinced they were ever real to begin with. It has always been just stories and myths. And we both know how those propagate themselves over the eons. How they stretch the truth and exaggerate. How they become narrative tools, more than anything else. To strike fear in the weak and discourage undesirable behavior.’

‘Oh, so you just think it’s all a buncha hooey, huh?’

‘Even if not, why should we worry over them? In their own tales, they were, in the end, as nothing before power of the Void.’

‘That’s what I’m sayin’! And that’s also why I hope they’re real, too! So I can bring ‘em down a peg! I gotta tell ya, if it turns out that ol’ Germy actually ISN’T a Primordial after all this, then I am gonna be in SUCH a sour mood! Warnin’ ya now, pal! If that happens, ya better not bother me for a while, unless you’re spoilin’ for a real fight!’

Hmph. A tempting notion."

"3790

‘Anyway, I should relax. Shouldn’t get too worked up about something tha hasn’t even happened yet. Tell me what’s been goin’ on with you, old man! We shouldn’t waste this opportunity to bring each other up to speed on everything!’

Ugh. Unfortunately, he was correct about that. This Void State was not something that they could harness at will. It was an emergent phenomenon that only manifested during furious clashes. As much as he might’ve liked to ignore Morgunov’s rambling--or at least postpone it for another occasion after the battle--that would not be a very efficient use of their time.

‘I encountered the Mendocava on the Gettira Plains of Ardora.’

‘Oooh! The skeleton guys?! Our undead cousins?!’

‘You sound even more surprised than I expected. Did your men tell you nothing of what my forces have been up to?’

‘Oh, they probably did. And I probably wasn’t listening. Been kinda busy with my own stuff, lately, y’know? Startin’ a war ‘n all. And besides, I’d rather get the details from the horse’s mouth! Which is you, big fella!

'Do you know anything about the Mendocava that might prove useful to me?'

'Mm, well, now, lemme think here... Haven't thought about those guys in an Age. But I do recall studying them fairly extensively for a while. Back when I was just an uppity little snot, myself. Historically, the Mendocava are something of an anomaly. They pop up every now and then, cause some sort of ruckus, only to disappear for centuries thereafter. Or longer, even. And this, despite many curious historians' and adventurers' best efforts to locate and learn more about them. I remember reading one sad book about a guy who spent his whole life searching for them. Literally, his whole life. From when he was a child until he penned his final work on his death bed. Never encountered them even once. And yet, here you are, stumbling onto them by total accident!'

'Lucky me.'

'Benefits of living so long, eh? Now you're makin' me want to encounter them, myself!'

'Join my campaign in Ardora, and you will.'

'Huh?! You're really offering me that?! How unexpected! They must be annoying the shit out of you over there!'

'Not just them. The Jaskadan Forest and the Dulvani, too. It has all devolved into quite the tedious affair. One I'd see resolved sooner rather than later, if at all possible.'"

"3791

'Ah. The Dulvani. Hmm. The Dulvani and the Mendocava. Never knew of a connection between them.'

'I do not know if there is one,' said Dozer. 'I've not uncovered any communication between them, but admittedly, matters are still unclear.'

'Sounds like some interrogations are in order.'

'Indeed. I was hoping to employ a softer touch with the Dulvani, but if you kill Germal, that option may become untenable.'

'Softer touch? You mean like asking them nicely for information? Saying "pretty please?"'

'Better than wasting resources on a needless fight.'

'Bah. Resources, shmee-sources. You're always so obsessed about that. Resources are meant to be used! Not hoarded and hoarded for some rainy day that'll never come!'

'It'll never come, will it? Look around, fool. This very day seems quite rainy indeed.'

'Oh, please. You're not actually worried about this little tussle, are you?'

'I am not, but that is beside the point. Crises have a way of sneaking up on the unprepared and careless, such as yourself. This situation still has the potential to begin spiraling.'

'Mm, I disagree. Now that we've both entered the Void State, these poor saps are all pretty well screwed. Doomed. Hecked, even! Our reaction times are through the roof. We can talk as much as we want. Assess the battlefield as much as we want. Coordinate our attacks as much as we want. Even plan far into the future as much as we want! In fact, I'd say that not only is this fight already over, it's also the beginning of far bigger problems for the rest of the world! Eheh!'

'Your arrogance will be your undoing, one day.'

'Promises, promises! You keep telling me that, and yet it keeps not happening! At this rate, they'll get you before they get me! And then who'll be the fool, huh?!'

'Still you.'

'Hmph! Anyway, those guys are gettin' awfully close to you over there. You gonna do something about that, or what?'

'Still mulling it over.'

'Hah! What, are you thinkin' you can withstand this simultaneous assault from Sanko and Lamont when you're already off balance?'

'I know I can. It is just a matter of whether I want to or not.'

'Tough talk! Wanna make it interesting?'

'...What do you have in mind?'

'I'll bet you two Judicators that they're about to send your old ass flying.'

'Two? Of the winner's choosing?'

'Of course.'

'Do you even have two Judicators in your entire army that I would want in mine?'

'I don't know. Do I?'"

"3792

The fool was playing it up now, Dozer knew. When it came to the men working under him, Morgunov was not nearly as flighty or mercurial as he wanted people to think. It was part of the game that he played as the leader of so many absolute lunatics. An idiotic strategy, to be sure, but one that had somehow managed to keep his half of Abolish from collapsing in on itself dozens of times over.

'Don't try that with me,' said Dozer. 'I know you obsess over all of your men's abilities and accomplishments, down to the middle ranks at least. And Judicators are far above that.'

'Nah, nah, maybe I used to be that way, but I've been out of sorts for years. Too busy workin' on my inventions and stuff. I barely know who's who, anymore!'

'You just don't want to tell me who your best are. Afraid you'll lose your favorites over a trifling wager. Which, to use one of your favorite words, is quite cowardly of you.'

'Hoh. Ahh... The c-word, is it? Resorting to that now?'

'If the shoe fits.'

'Well, too bad! Not fallin' for it, this time! The wager is for the winner's choosing, right? So if I do lose, then that means you have to pick them yourself! Not get me to do it for you! Lazy bastard!'

Hmph. Unfortunately for Morgunov, it would likely make no difference. 'I want the Crazy Bull and the Jackrabbit.'

'Agh, you bastard. Why even say all that, huh? When you already knew who my favorites were!'

'Why would I pass up an opportunity to point out your hypocrisy?'

'Prick! C'mon, sure you don't want someone else?! How about the Man of Crows?'

'The Man of Crows is dead.'

'Ah. Heard about that already, huh? Your spies've been busy.'

Agh. A mistake, Dozer realized too late. He shouldn't have let slip that he knew about that. Morgunov had said that as a trap for him. A fool as always, yes, but the man was still, at times, a clever fool. 'I cannot help it if your men like me more than you. When they come to me with information, should I turn them away? Punish them for their ambition? I think not.'

'Okay, now THAT'S bullshit. My men don't come to you and yours for anything. Or if they do, it's to try and swafferdonk your boys out of some resource or another. You're just tryin' to prevent me from hunting down the moles you've sent over.'

'Delude yourself however you like.'

"3793

'Alright, well, if I win,' said Morgunov, 'then I want the Black Hand and the Demonic Tornado. Everyone already thinks that guy works for me anyway, so we might as well make it official.'

'The latter is fine. The former is not.'

'Whoa, whoa, whoa, we just went over this! You don't get a say! It's my choice!'

'If I told Ito that he now works for you, he would commit suicide. In fact, I recall him telling you as much himself.'

'Oh, I remember! That's why it'd be funny! I wanna see if he'd really do it!'

'Of course he would. I will not abide such wastefulness. Pick someone else.'

'Psh. Fine! Hmm!' The Mad Demon paused for a snicker. 'The Monster of the East!'

'He is not a Judicator.'

'So demote him! C'mon! It'd be hilarious!'

It actually might, Dozer thought. 'No. Pick seriously.'

'The Liar of Lyste, then!'

'He is not a Judicator, either.'

'Eh, he might as well be! Promote him! Hell, it wouldn't even BE a promotion! More like a side-motion! A transfer! C'mon! Imagine the look on his face!'

'Pick someone you actually wish to use and not kill.'

'What if I promised to let him live?'

'For as believable as that would be, you might as well promise to never speak again.'

'Tch! You're as bad as Bool, y'know that? I swear I'm gonna find your sense of humor, one of these days!'

'I am about to move. If you do not choose, the bet is off.'

'Alright, alright! I want Lucky!'

Dozer might've blinked at that if he could have. Lucky? That was probably the least accomplished Judicator in his entire army. His moniker--if it could even be called that--stemmed from his reputation of supposedly failing upward. Why in the world this idiot pick him? Did he know something that Dozer didn't?

Agh. After all this back-and-forth, however, he didn't feel like questioning it, nor did he have any real justification to refuse like he had with the others. 'Fine.'

And he returned the majority of his attention to the present world.

To the avalanche of destruction heading his way.

A torrential wall of mud and water. A dozen spears of jagged ice, all spinning with such force that the wind and water around them distorted with tornadic fury.

Everything fell upon him simultaneously."

"3794

Dozer had said he was "about to move," but the truth was, in fact, the opposite. He intended to prevent his movement entirely. So he just braced himself and took it. The window of response was short, but within it, he pumped the inertia of his body up to even greater heights. As much as he could with what little time was available.

The force against his body was tremendous. A tidal wave crashing against a cliffside, trying to break it apart. Tear off a chunk. Pull it into the ocean.

And it didn't stop, either. After the initial impact, it turned into a storm unto itself, focused entirely on him. Swirling, lashing, swarming.

Dozer barely budged. Even suspended in midair, with nothing to brace himself against but his own power, the attack pushed him hardly a foot backwards before turning into a swarm.

Satisfactory. The bet was his.

Sanko and Lamont did not realize that they had just disappointed Morgunov, however. Nor would they have cared one iota. They resorted to an imprisoning technique, instead.

A wise move. If they could not make him budge, then perhaps they could lock him down.

The temperature plummeted. The water and sediment encased him totally.

A frozen prison, meant to suppress not just his ability to move but even his ability to think.

The numbing of the mind was an especially potent trick against servants. It was the main reason why Iceheart was such a problematic enemy. Wave after wave of servants could be sent against that man, but unless they had a sufficiently powerful method of countering his high-unrivalled ability to manipulate atmospheric temperature, those servants might as well have been normal human beings, for all the damage they would be able to do to him.

What a valuable subordinate he would have made. If only Dozer had found him before Sermung.

Rather than breaking himself out right away, Dozer decided to stay in this prison for a few moments. A bit of peace and quiet was a welcome change of pace in the middle of all this mayhem, he felt.

And he still had the Void State. Which he dove back into.

‘It’s my win, fool.’

Morgunov groaned. ‘You can still talk from in there? Shouldn’t Sanko’s cage be blocking your thoughts from me? What, is she not even empowering it with her soul?’

‘She is. I can sense it.’

‘Then how?!’

‘Because this is the Void State, I suppose.’

‘Because this is bullshit, more like!’

‘Stop looking for excuses to delay your concession. You’ve lost. Admit it.’

‘Agh! Fine!’”

"3795

‘Good,’ said Dozer. ‘Now how much longer should we draw this out?’

‘Mm, getting bored already? We have all the time in the world here. We shouldn’t let it go to waste, y’know.’

‘Yes. So let’s go on with it, then. Tell me of your long-term plans for this continental war that you started.'

'Long-term plans?'

Dozer wanted to shake his head. 'I knew it. You have none. You started it on a whim, didn't you?'

'Well, I mean, all that geopolitical tension was just sitting there...'

'You really are a fool.'

'Alright, look, man, I wanted to do something that would ruffle a few feathers. And the war provided me with some excellent cover for it. But now I've basically accomplished my objective, so what happens now with the war doesn't really matter to me.'

'Ah. Are you referring to your little escapade in Sair?'

'Got wind of that, huh? Of course you did. How much do you know?'

'Not as much as I'd like. I know you ventured out into the Uego Desert, made Jackson and Lamont look like children, kicked off an incursion into Sair, and then left your incompetent men behind to see things through. Which they have not, of course.'

'What, you disappointed? If you wanted to mount some kind of massive assault on Intar through Sair, then you could have. No one was stopping you from heading over there and picking up where I left off.'

'I have no desire to get involved in your messes. That is almost always how I end up in situations like this one.'

'Oh, come on! I know you're secretly havin' fun, right now! Just embrace it! If I can admit I lost the bet, you can admit to enjoying my company just a little!'

'I'd rather saw off my own hand.'

'That doesn't mean much when you can just grow it back. Anyway, pushing harder into Sair would've been pointless. Yeah, I probably could've conquered it 'n everything, but there's no way I would've held it for very long. Intar would've mobilized once things got bad enough, and I'm sure Sermung would've shown up soon or later and massacred a buncha my boys.'

'Were you not looking to test these "Roberts" of yours against him?'

‘I was, but preferably in a lower-stakes setting, first. Without more data on how they’d perform against him specifically, I’d rather not gamble too much on an all-or-nothing battle. Not yet, anyway.’”
"3796

‘Good luck with that,’ said Dozer. ‘He’ll never show himself before you unless the stakes are sufficiently high.’

‘Yeah, he’s been a real jerk about that, lately. Even more so than you, actually! And you never do shit! Maybe you could help me test my Roberts out, then!’

‘I don’t think you want me to do that.’

‘Pah! Why? Because you you’d destroy them totally? Big talk, old man! I bet they’re tougher than you think!’

‘Is that another wager I hear?’

‘It might just be!’

‘Interesting. Once we’re done here, bring them to my camp and have them assist against the Mendocava. If they prove useful in concluding my business there, then I will test them for you.’

‘Mm, tempting, tempting! But I feel you’d be getting way more out of this than I would!’

‘We can work out the details of the wager later, once it is assured to occur.’

‘Sure, but I’m still lending you my toys. My toys that I’ve spent years working on, by the way! You gotta give me something more for that kind of assistance!’

‘What do you want?’

‘Hmm! Mmm! How about Lucky?!’

‘Why are you so fixated on him?’

‘Honestly, I dunno! He just seems like a funny little guy! Piqued my curiosity, somehow!

‘Honestly, you’re lying.’

‘Bah, you always think that!’

‘Because it’s always true.’

‘Is not!’

‘What if I offered some land, instead?’

‘Land? I got plenty of land. What do I need yours for? You’re just being stingy because I expressed an interest in something! That’s so spiteful! Just gimme--’ Morgunov cut himself off, and a beat passed. ‘...You sense that?’

He did. A new presence. Faint but distinct. Even the Void State itself was beginning to shudder. But why?

Because it was preparing.

To welcome another into this place. A third mind capable of existing here.

‘Who is that?’ said Dozer.

‘Can’t tell yet,’ said Morgunov. ‘Ooh, maybe it’s one of these two here. Finally manifesting a presence of their own, hmm?’

Sanko or Lamont? He greatly doubted that, but it was possible, he supposed. Even he and Morgunov still knew very little of this Void State, since it was virtually impossible to study. Neither of them had ever been able to find mention of it in any of the Archives around the world.

Though, admittedly, Morgunov could have been lying about not finding anything. The man liked to claim that he did not hoard knowledge for himself, but Dozer knew better than to take him at his word by now."
"3797

‘I don’t sense any kind of change in them yet,’ said Dozer.

‘Could still be a ways off,’ said Morgunov. ‘If the Void State is only preparing for the new arrival, then maybe it’s still a few minutes away. Or hours, even! With how long these fights can last, there’s no telling!’

‘If that is so, then it is almost as if the Void State is telling us to kill them both before one of them breaches through.’

‘Eheh. Maybe it is! Do you think the Void cares about the two of us that much?’

Now there was a loaded question. He decided to ignore it. ‘There IS another explanation for this, you know.’

‘Sure. But if it’s Sermung, he wouldn’t already be attuned to the Void State, right? He’d need a bit of time within the fury of battle.’

‘Unless, perhaps, he has been fighting elsewhere.’

‘What, you mean he’s pre-gaming? For a fight against BOTH of us? I mean, that’s just insulting. He wouldn’t want to come into this tired.’

‘Tired? You and I are not tired, and we made it here. Why would he need to be?’

‘Actually, I’m feelin’ pretty winded.’

‘Mm. Pitiful.’

‘Okay, man, I’ve been fighting for like two weeks straight. You don’t get to make fun of me yet. Not until your old ass has been in the fryer for at least as long.’

‘If it is Sermung, then he must be about to teleport in, because I do not sense his presence anywhere nearby.’

‘Tch, I hate that he can do that.’

‘You hate that you were not able to replicate it.’

‘I could’ve! If I’d kept working the problem, I could’ve!’

‘So why didn’t you?’

‘I got distracted.’

‘That is equivalent to failure.’

‘Nuh-uh! A victory delayed is still a victory earned!’

‘Not if Sermung kills you today.’

‘Puh! Worry about yourself, old man.’

‘That was not worry. I assure you.’

‘Whoop. I sense another change. Whoever it is, they’re close now.’

Indeed, Dozer could sense it, too. The Void State was practically trembling. A hidden earthquake, of sorts. Perceptible only to him and Morgunov.

And then there was enough. The new presence began to crystalize, and he could finally tell who it was.

‘Nooo!’ laughed the Mad Demon, disbelief in his tone.

It was a rare moment of shared sentiment between them, because Dozer could hardly believe it himself.

How many years had it been since Sai-hee, the Empress Peacemaker, had decided to make such a bold move as this?"